 That's all the care he takes. I pity you, madam:

You're young, the very spring's upon you now,
 The roses on your cheeks are but new blown—
 Take you together, you're a pleasant garden
 Where all the sweetness of man's comfort breathes.
 190 But what is it to be a work of beauty
 And want the heart that should delight in you?
 You still retain your goodness in yourselves,
 But then you lose your glory, which is all.
 The grace of every benefit is the use,
 195 And is't not pity you should want your grace?
 Look you like one whose lord should walk in groves
 About the peace of midnight? Alas, madam,
 'Tis to me wondrous how you should spare the day
 From amorous clips, much less the general season
 200 When all the world's a gamester.
 That face deserves a friend of heart and spirit,
 Discourse and motion, indeed such a one
 That should observe you, madam, without ceasing,
 And not a weary lord.

WIFE Sure, I was married, sir,
 205 In a dear year of love, when scarcity
 And famine of affection vexed poor ladies,
 Which makes my heart so needy. It ne'er knew
 Plenty of comfort yet.

VOTARIUS Why, that's your folly,
 To keep your mind so miserably, madam.
 210 Change into better times. I'll lead you to 'em.
 What bounty shall your friend expect for his?
 O, you that can be hard to your own heart,
 How would you use your friend's? If I thought kindly,
 I'd be the man myself should serve your pleasure.

WIFE How, sir?

VOTARIUS
 Nay, and ne'er miss you, too: I'd not come sneaking
 Like a retainer, once a week or so,
 To show myself before you for my livery.
 I'd follow business like a household servant,
 220 Carry my work before me and dispatch
 Before my lord be up, and make no words on't,
 The sign of a good servant.

WIFE 'Tis not friendly done, sir,
 To take a lady at advantage thus,
 Set all her wrongs before her, and then tempt her.

VOTARIUS [aside]
 225 Heart, I grow fond myself! 'Twas well she waked me,

187 new blown just opened

193 all everything

194-5 The...grace? The value of every natural gift lies in its use, so isn't it a shame that you lack the proper appreciation?—There are further implications: if Anselmus is not making proper, i.e. sexual, use of his wife, he is not according proper value to her attractions (also, the Wife's frustration will contribute to her surrender and consequent loss of spiritual grace).

199 clips embraces

200 a gamester at (sexual) play

201-3 a friend...you these terms all carry sexual overtones: friend, i.e. lover (as at A2.1.65); spirit, i.e. semen (as in modern 'spunk'); discourse i.e. intercourse; motion i.e. during the sexual act; to observe is to attend on, pay court to.

205 dear year year of famine

209 your...miserably your own wishes so neglected

217-22 Like...servant This passage plays upon resemblances between the terms of domestic and sexual service: a retainer lived outside the household, only coming in for his 'livery', a payment of food or clothing (in this case, sex). Business and work can both refer to the sexual act; to dispatch is to finish, and 'up' means erect.

A225 Heart 'God's heart!' This and 'Life' (i.e. God's life!) are the two most frequently used oaths in the play. Both Buc, the official censor and others at the playhouse deleted a number of examples, in accordance with contemporary laws against blasphemy on the stage.

Before the dead sleep of adultery took me—
 'Twas stealing on me. Up, you honest thoughts,
 And keep watch for your master.—[To Wife] I must hence.
 [Aside] I do not like my health; 't'as a strange relish.
 230 Pray heaven I plucked mine eyes back time enough.
 I'll never see her more. I praised the garden,
 But little thought a bed of snakes lay hid in't.
 [He prepares to leave]
 WIFE [aside]
 I know not how I am! I'll call my woman.—
 [To Votarius] Stay! [Aside] For I fear thou'rt too far gone already.
 VOTARIUS [aside]
 235 I'll see her but once more. Do thy worst, love,
 Thou art too young, fond boy, to master me.
 [To Wife] I come to tell you, madam, and that plainly,
 I'll see your face no more. Take't how you please!
 WIFE
 You will not offer violence to me, sir,
 240 In my lord's absence? What does that touch you
 If I want comfort?
 VOTARIUS Will you take your answer?
 WIFE
 It is not honest in you to tempt woman
 When her distresses takes away her strength:
 How is she able to withstand her enemy?
 VOTARIUS
 245 I would fain leave your sight, an I could possible.
 WIFE
 What is't to you, good sir, if I be pleased
 To weep myself away, and run thus violently
 Into the arms of death, and kiss destruction.
 [She runs to him and kisses him]
 Does this concern you now?
 VOTARIUS Aye, marry, does it. [Returning her kiss]
 250 What serve these arms for but to pluck you back,
 These lips but to prevent all other tasters,
 And keep that cup of nectar for themselves?
 [Aside] Heart, I'm beguiled again! Forgive me, heaven!
 My lips have been naught with her! Sin's mere witchcraft!
 255 Break all the engines of life's frame in pieces,
 I will be master once, and whip the boy
 Home to his mother's lap. [To Wife] Face, fare thee well!

Exit [abruptly]

WIFE
 260 Votarius? Sir? My friend? Thanks, heaven, he's gone
 And he shall never come so near again.
 I'll have my frailty watched ever. Henceforward
 I'll no more trust it single, it betrays me
 Into the hands of folly. Where's my woman?
Enter Leonella
 My trusty Leonella!

LEONELLA Call you, madam?

WIFE
 Call I? I want attendance! Where are you?

LEONELLA
 Never far from you, madam.

265 WIFE Pray be nearer,
 Or there is some that will, and thank you, too;
 Nay, perhaps bribe you to be absent from me.

LEONELLA
 How, madam?

WIFE Is that strange to a lady's woman?
 270 There are such things i'th' world, many such buyers
 And sellers of a woman's name and honour,
 Though you be young in bribes, and never came
 To the flesh market yet.—Beshrew your heart,
 For keeping so long from me!

LEONELLA What ail you, madam?

WIFE
 Somewhat commands me, and takes all the power
 Of myself from me!

275 LEONELLA What should that be, lady?

WIFE
 When did you see Votarius?

LEONELLA [aside] Is that next?
 Nay, then, I have your ladyship in the wind!
 [To Wife] I saw him lately, madam.

WIFE Whom did'st see?

LEONELLA
 Votarius.

WIFE What have I to do with him
 280 More than another man? Say he be fair,
 And his parts proper both of mind and body,
 You praise him but in vain in telling me so.

LEONELLA [aside]
 Yea, madam, are you prattling in your sleep?
 'Tis well my lord and you lie in two beds!

WIFE [aside]
 285 I was ne'er so ill. [To Leonella] I thank you, Leonella, My negligent woman, here you showed your service.

 ally or spiritually)

 cannot stop the truth pouring out of the Wife)

LEONELLA
 By my faith, madam, you shall pardon me,
 I have a love of mine own to look to,
 And he must have his breakfast. [Calling offstage] Psst!
 Bellarius!
Enter Bellarius, muffled in his cloak

BELLARIUS Leonella?

LEONELLA
 295 Come forth, and show yourself a gentleman,
 Although most commonly they hide their heads,
 As you do there, methinks!
 And why a taffeta muffler? Show your face, man.
 I'm not ashamed on you.

BELLARIUS I fear the servants.

LEONELLA
 300 And they fear their mistress, and ne'er think on you.
 Their thoughts are upon dinner, and great dishes.
 If one thing hap, impossible to fail, too,
 (I can see so far in't), you shall walk boldly, sir,
 And openly in view through every room
 305 About the house; and, let the proudest meet thee,
 I charge you give no way to 'em.

BELLARIUS How thou talk'st!

LEONELLA
 I can avoid the fool, and give you reason for't.

BELLARIUS
 'Tis more than I should do, if I asked more on thee:
 I prithee, tell me how?

LEONELLA With ease, i'faith, sir.
 310 My lady's heart is wondrous busy, sir,
 About the entertainment of a friend, too,
 And she and I must bear with one another
 Or we shall make but a mad house betwixt us.

BELLARIUS
 I'm bold to throw my cloak off at this news,
 [He does so]
 315 Which I ne'er durst before, and kiss thee freelier!
 [He kisses Leonella]
 What is he, sirrah?

LEONELLA Faith, an indifferent fellow
 With good long legs, a near friend of my lord's.

BELLARIUS
 A near friend of my lady's, you would say!
 His name, I prithee?

LEONELLA One Votarius, sir.

Bellarius His name means aggressive, warlike (he does not appear in Cergentlemen might hide their heads for

I can explain what I've just said.

A308/B307 'Tis more...thee If I ask you to A312-13/B311-12 And...us She and I must put up with one another (also, take the weight of our lovers), or else between the two of us we'll turn the house upside down ('mad' has undertones of sexual obsession and lunacy, as in Changeling:

 e.g. I.1.146).

BELLARIUS
 What sayest thou?
 320 LEONELLA He walks under the same title.
 BELLARIUS
 The only enemy that my life can show me!
 LEONELLA
 Your enemy? Let my spleen then alone with him.
 Stay you your anger, I'll confound him for you.
 BELLARIUS

 LEONELLA I'll prevent his venery.
 He shall ne'er lie with my lady.
 325 BELLARIUS Troth, I thank you!
 Life, that's the way to save him! Art thou mad?
 Whereas the other way, he confounds himself
 And lies more naked to revenge and mischief.
 LEONELLA
 Then let him lie with her, and the devil go with him!
 330 He shall have all my furtherance.
 BELLARIUS
 Why, now you pray heartily, and speak to purpose.

 Some mild news, I hope,
 Comes with my father. No, his looks are sad.
 There is some further tyranny.—Let it fall!
 Our constant suff'rings shall amaze it.
 [She kneels before Helvetius]

In despite of all
 The Tyrant's cruelties, we have got that friendship
 E'en of the guard that he has placed about us,
 My lord and I have free access together, 5
 As much as I would ask of liberty.
 They'll trust us largely now, and keep sometimes
 Three hours from us, a rare courtesy
 In jailers' children.

 There is no religion in't, no reverent love,
 Only for fashion and the praise of men.

Why should you think so, sir?

HELVETIUS Think? You come too late

If you seek there for me. I know't and see't.
 15 I'll sooner give my blessing to a drunkard
 Whom the ridiculous power of wine makes humble,
 As foolish use makes thee.—Base-spirited girl,
 That canst not think above disgrace and beggary
 When glory is set for thee and thy seed,
 20 Advancement for thy father, beside joy
 Able to make a latter spring in me
 In this my fourscore summer, and renew me
 With a reversion yet of heat and youth!
 But the dejection of thy mind and spirit
 25 Makes me, thy father, guilty of a fault
 That draws thy birth in question, and e'en wrongs
 Thy mother, in her ashes, being at peace
 With heav'n and man. Had not her life and virtues
 Been seals unto her faith, I should think thee now 30 The work of some hired servant, some house tailor,
 And no one part of my endeavour in thee.

 But merely cozen thy posterity
 Of royalty and succession, and thy self
 Of dignity present?

LADY Sir, your king did well

'Mongst all his Nobles to pick out yourself
 45 And send you with these words. His politic grace
 Knew what he did, for well he might imagine None else should have been heard. They'd had their answer

Before the question had been halfway through.
 But, dearest sir, I owe to you a reverence,
 50 A debt which both begins and ends with life,
 Never till then discharged, 'tis so long lasting.

 A kingdom for thy servant, which thou left'st 45 Basely, to serve thyself. What dost thou in this
 But merely cozen thy posterity
 Of royalty and succession, and thy self
 Of dignity present?

LADY Sir, your king did well

'Mongst all his Nobles to pick out yourself
 50 And send you with these words. His politic grace
 Knew what he did, for well he might imagine None else should have been heard. They'd had their answer

Before the question had been halfway through.
 But, dearest sir, I owe to you a reverence,
 55 A debt which both begins and ends with life,
 Never till then discharged, 'tis so long lasting.

A7-9/B14-16 Thy...vainglory Your obedience is a matter of convention, just as most rich men pray in church but really worship only fashion and self-advancement.
 A17/B23 use custom
 A22/B28 my fourscore summer my eightieth year (a symbolic, rather than literal figure)

 A23/B29 reversion return, recovery
 A24/B30 dejection degradation, baseness
 A29/B35 seals guarantees A33/B39 to...hazard to the extent of risking my eternal salvation A41-3/B47-9 cozen...present cheat your descendants of royalty and inheritance of the throne, and yourself of immediate honours

 A45/B51 politic cunning, scheming

Thou know'st the end of greatness, and hast wit Above the flight of twenty feathered mistresses That glisten in the sun of princes' favours. Thou hast discourse in thee fit for a king's fellowship, A princely carriage and astonishing presence. What should a husband do with all this goodness? Alas, one end on't is too much for him, Nor is it fit a subject should be master Of such a jewel. 'Tis in the king's power To take it for the forfeit!—But I come To bear thee gently to his bed of honours, All force forgotten. He commends him to thee With more than the humility of a servant That since thou wilt not yield to be his queen, Be yet his mistress. He shall be content With that, or nothing. If she be wise, as I suspect not thee.
 And having youth, and beauty, and a husband,
 Thou'st all the wish of woman. Take thy time, then.
 Make thy best market.

LADY Can you assure me, sir,
 95 Whether my father spake this, or some spirit
 Of evil-wishing that has, for a time,
 Hired his voice of him to beguile me that way,
 Presuming on his power and my obedience?
 I'd gladly know, that I might frame my answer
 According to the speaker.

100 HELVETIUS How now, baggage!
 Am I in question with thee? Does thy scorn cast
 So thick an ignorance before thine eyes
 That I am forgotten too? Who is't speaks to thee
 But I, thy father?
Enter Govianus, discharging a pistol. [Helvetius falls]

GOVIANUS The more monstrous he!
 105 Art down but with the bare voice of my fury?
 Up, ancient sinner, thou'rt but mocked with death.
 I missed thee purposely, thank this dear creature.
 O, hadst thou been anything beside her father,
 I'd made a fearful separation on thee.
 110 I would have sent thy soul to a darker prison
 Than any made of clay, and thy dead body
 As a token to the lustful king thy master.
 Art thou struck down so soon with the short sound
 Of this small earthen instrument, and dost thou 115 So little fear th'eternal noise of hell?
 What's she? Does she not bear thy daughter's name?
 How stirs thy blood, sir? Is there a dead feeling
 Of all things fatherly and honest in thee?
 Say thou couldst be content, for greatness' sake,
 120 To end the last act of thy life in panderism
 (As you perhaps will say your betters do),
 Must it needs follow that unmanly sin
 Can work upon the weakness of no woman
 But hers, whose name and honour natural love
 125 Bids thee preserve more charily than eyesight,
 Health or thy senses? Can promotion's thirst
 Make such a father? Turn a grave old lord
 To a white-headed squire? Make him so base
 To buy his honours with his daughter's soul
 130 And the perpetual shaming of his blood?
 Hast thou the leisure, thou forgetful man,
 To think upon advancement at these years?
 What wouldst thou do with greatness? Dost thou hope

A91/B88 as...thee as I don't doubt that you are

A94/B91 Make...market Drive the best bargain you can.

A101/B98 Am...thee? Are you questioning who I am?—When Gratiana tempts her daughter Castiza, in Revenger, 2.1.156–
 7, Castiza replies: 'I cry you mercy, lady,
 I mistook you. | Pray did you see my mother?'

A105/B102 Art...fury? Have you been struck down merely by the sound of my anger?—The stage direction brings Govianus onto the stage at A104.1/B101.1, but he may enter earlier and overhear some of the preceding dialogue.

A109 a fearful separation i.e. of your body

from your soul

A114 this...instrument i.e. the pistol

A125 more charily more carefully, lovingly
 (the preciousness of a child is compared

135 To fray death with't, or hast thou that conceit
That honour will restore thy youth again?
Thou art but mocked, old fellow, 'tis not so.
Thy hopes abuse thee. Follow thine own business,
And list not to the sirens of the world.

140 Alas, thou hadst more need kneel at an altar,
Than to a chair of state,
And search thy conscience for thy sins of youth:
That's work enough for age; it needs no greater.
Thou'rt called within; thy very eyes look inward
To teach thy thoughts the way, and thy affections.

145 But miserable notes that conscience sings,
That cannot truly pray, for flattering kings.

HELVETIUS
This was well searched indeed, and without favouring.
Blessing reward thee! Such a wound as mine
Did need a pitiless surgeon! Smart on, soul, 150 Thou'lt feel the less hereafter. Sir, I thank you.
I ever saw my life in a false glass
Until this friendly hour. With what fair faces
My sins would look on me, but now truth shows 'em
How loathsome and how monstrous are their forms.
[He rises to his knees]

155 Be you my king and master, still. Henceforward,
My knee shall know no other earthly lord.
Well may I spend this life to do you service
That sets my soul in her eternal way.

GOVIANUS
Rise, rise, Helvetius!

HELVETIUS I'll see both your hands
Set to my pardon first.

160 GOVIANUS Mine shall bring hers.

LADY
Now, sir, I honour you for your goodness chiefly.
You're my most worthy father. You speak like him.
The first voice was not his. My joy and reverence Strive which should be most seen. Let our hands, sir,
[They raise Helvetius to his feet]

165 Raise you from earth thus high, and may it prove
The first ascent of your immortal rising,
Never to fall again.

HELVETIUS A spring of blessings
Keep ever with thee, and the fruit thy lord's.

GOVIANUS
I ha' lost an enemy and have found a father. Exeunt kneels to Govianus and the Lady, until they bless him and raise him to his feet

Lady knelt for a blessing at the opening of the scene). His rising prefigures his 'immortal rising' (eternal salvation), and the avoidance of a further fall (into sin).

2.2 Enter Votarius sadly

All's gone! There's nothing but the prodigal left.
I have played away my soul at one short game
Where e'en the winner loses.
Pursuing sin, how often did I shun thee?
5 How swift art thou afoot, beyond man's goodness,
Which has a lazy pace: so was I caught.
A curse upon the cause! Man in these days
Is not content to have his lady honest,
And so rest pleased with her without more toil,
10 But he must have her tried, forsooth, and tempted,
And when she proves a quean, then he lies quiet:
Like one that has a watch of curious making,
Thinking to be more cunning than the workman,
Never gives over tamp'ring with the wheels
15 Till either spring be weakened, balance bowed,
Or some wrong pin put in, and so spoils all.
How I could curse myself! Most business else
Delights in the dispatch, that's the best grace to't;
Only this work of blind, repented lust
20 Hangs shame and sadness on his master's cheek;
Yet wise men take no warning—
Enter Wife

It cannot stand against her. Chamber thoughts
And words that have sport in 'em, they're for ladies.

Proceed, sir.

I came to give you warning my lord's come.

VOTARIUS How?

30 WIFE My lord!

LEONELLA [aside]

Alas, poor vessels, how this tempest tosses 'em!

2.2.1-3 All's...loses Votarius compares himself to a spendthrift who has gambled away his soul at a game (of cards or dice), where even the winner (he has had sex with the Wife) loses. For similar imagery, see ll. 168-9 and Penitent Brothel's soliloquy in Mad World, 4.1.4-5, 'Thou wretched unthrift, that hast play'd away | Thy eternal portion at a minute's game'. This scene parallels and contrasts with 2.1: one of the tempters (Helvetius) is saved, the other (Votarius) is damned.

4 Pursuing sin sin that pursues (man)
7 cause...days 'the cause' was Anselmus's insistence that Votarius make trial of his Wife; Anselmus is typical of 'man in these days'.

11 quean promiscuous woman

15-16 spring...all The carefully made, easily broken watch signifies the Wife, spoiled by her husband's interference: the main spring drives the mechanism; the balance regulates the speed, but when a 'wrong pin' (peg, also penis) is 'put in' to her 'wheels', she is ruined. Watches were comparatively new at this time, like the 'German clock' which occurs with similar wordplay in Penitent Brothel's soliloquy, cited at ll. 1-3.

17-20 Most...cheek Most other activities are a source of pleasure after they are performed—that's the most attractive aspect of them; but illicit lovemaking leaves one feeling guilty and miserable (lust is blind because it does not rightly see its object or foresee its consequences, as at 1.2.226; see also Solomon, 6.114; Game, 5.2.75).

23 Chamber thoughts bedroom thoughts; see l. 76, and especially ll. 129, 138.
26 She's myself i.e. as secret as if she were me lowers her raised skirts), while Votarius's 'main mast' falls, in detumescence. Leonella, by contrast, is more 'seaworthy': she fears no 'tossing' (sexual activity). Her 'trick' to keep out water (also, semen) may be a stratagem to protect her love affair (such as she uses later in this scene), or possibly a device to avoid pregnancy ('vessel' and 'barque' can be used of women as sexual objects; 'trick' may also be a sexual act).

46 I'm...him I'm more than even with him.
48-52 Methinks...cunning If Anselmus were cleverer, he would notice that his Wife was pretending, giving him only the kiss that she received from his friend (Votarius), while she keeps a second, more intimate kiss for her first (best

Enter Bellarius, passing over the stage, [then exits]

Ha! What's he?

100 Life, 'tis Bellarius, my rank enemy, Mine eye snatched so much sight of him. What's his business?
His face half-darkened, stealing through the house
With a whoremaster's pace—I like it not.
This lady will be served like a great woman
105 With more attendants, I perceive, than one.
She has her shift of friends. My enemy one?
Do we both shun each other's company
In all assemblies public, at all meetings,
And drink to one another in one mistress?
110 My very thought's my poison. 'Tis high time
To seek for help. Where is our head physician,
A doctor of my making, and that lecher's?
O woman, when thou once leav'st to be good,
Thou car'st not who stands next thee! Every sin
115 Is a companion for thee, for thy once-cracked honesty
Is like the breaking of whole money:
It never comes to good, but wastes away.

Enter Anselmus

ANSELMUS

Votarius?

VOTARIUS

Ha!

ANSELMUS We miss you, sir, within.

VOTARIUS

I missed you more without. Would you had come sooner, sir!

ANSELMUS

Why, what's the business?

120 VOTARIUS You should ha' seen a fellow,
A common bawdy-house ferret, one Bellarius,
Steal through this room, his whorish barren face
Three-quarters muffled. He is somewhere hid
About the house, sir.

ANSELMUS Which way took the villain,

125 That marriage felon, one that robs the mind
Twenty times worse than any highway striker?
Speak, which way took he?

VOTARIUS

Marry, my lord, I think—

Let me see—which way was't, now? Up yon stairs.

ANSELMUS

130 The way to chamb'ring! Did not I say still
All thy temptations were too faint and lazy?

100 rank absolute (also, lustful)

105-6 With...friends Votarius suddenly suspects the Wife of having other lovers (‘attendants’), and varying them like a change (‘shift’) of clothes.

109-10 drink...poison share the same vessel or cup, as a pledge of trust or friendship (since both may be having sex with the Wife). Votarius feels himself poisoned by this thought, and begins to experience Anselmus's irrational

111 head physician Anselmus is the ‘head

Votarius and Bellarius, but now needed of being horned, i.e. sexually betrayed.

115-16 for...money Once women gave up sexual fidelity, they were supposed to have lost their value, like cracked coins which, when sufficiently damaged, were no longer legal tender.

122 barren ugly

125-6 That...striker That marriage thief takes away peace of mind, and so is far worse than the highwayman (who only takes money).

129 chamb'ring illicit lovemaking (as at l.
138)

131 play 'em home push them (in) far enough (Anselmus is unconscious of the innuendo)

135 dearly eagerly (also, expensively)—Anselmus fails to notice the ironic meaning of his words, but his keenness to hear of his wife's adultery is perverse.

138 chambered upstairs in the bed chamber, but also inside a woman's vagina; 'aloft' means sexually erect, as well as on high

147–8 Revenge... harm Any benefit revenge appears to offer is outweighed by the spiritual damage it does. (According to the Church, revenge was the prerogative of God alone, as in Solomon 18.227–8: 'Man did not overcome his foes with arms, | But with thy word, which conquers greater harms'.)

149 Suspect suspicion
mingled cup strong cocktail

152 mystical secret (as in 'mystical strumpet', Banquet, 4.3.175; 'mystical harlot', Hengist, 5.2.154)

155–6 I... husband I'm allowed to—he is my fiancé. Leonella pretends to be, or is perhaps, engaged, and thus entitled to refer to Bellarius as her 'husband'.

158 sudden craft quick invention

159 close secret, intimate

160 thy light i.e. of life lover), if they turn out not to be true. I must not be without her. I've lacked the sight of her for too long.

seven. Sophonirus seems to be referring to himself, and the Tyrant replies as if speaking of him.

is always butting in (suggesting his impotence).

A81 Thou'lt . . . shortly You'll soon find yourself relieved, i.e. of the weight of your honours.

A85–6/B75–6 And . . . thee And abandon a better workman, i.e. God. If your honours only allow one to live basely, take them back.

A87/B77 There's one gapes There's someone with his mouth wide open (i.e. for honours).

A90–3/B80–3 Leave . . . me Even if you leave me, wretched king, as poor as Truth, that will not change me. (Helvetius personifies Truth as a woman of good family come down in the world, whose simple way of life will not deter him from his service to her. This image and his refusal to be altered recall the Lady's words at A1.1.123/B1.1.104 and A1.1.171/B1.1.152, and at A2.3.96–9/B2.3.86–9 he will echo Govianus at A1.1.210–11/B1.1.187–8 in welcoming his imprisonment.)

A93/B83 Our guard The guard called out here is apparently distinct from the 'resolute fellows' summoned at l. A113/

A96/B86 close closely confined

These men seem to be identical with the soldiers summoned at 4.2.37–8, 'The men I wished for, | For secrecy and employment', though by 5.2.111.1, they seem to have become the official guard.

A118/B108 time... them the time appointed, agreed with them
A122-3/B112-13 As... bottom Dishonest servants would drink their masters' wine and leave them the dregs. The analogy has a sexual twist, as in Mad

World, 5.2.306-8, Banquet, 4.3.282, and Changeling, 5.3.170-1.
3.1.3 such business i.e. luring the Lady back to the court. Govianus is reluctant to recognize the danger that threatens her; he reacts slowly, and with disbelief.

Down, villain, to thy everlasting weeping

Now, sir, quickly!

SERVANT
55 Which way soe'er I cast mine eye, my lord,

Gathered in companies and all whispering,

SERVANT
Their eyes still fixed upon the doors and windows.

GOVIANUS
60 I think thou'st never done. Thou lov'st to talk on't.
'Tis fine discourse. Prithee find other business.

SERVANT
Nay, I am gone. I'm a man quickly sneaped. Exit

GOVIANUS
He's flattered me with safety for this hour.

LADY
Have you leisure to stand idle? Why, my lord,
It is for me they come.

65 GOVIANUS For thee, my glory,
The riches of my youth, it is for thee.

LADY
Then is your care so cold? Will you be robbed
And have such warning of the thieves? Come on, sir,
Fall to your business, lay your hands about you!

70	Do not think scorn to work. A resolute captain Will rather fling the treasure of his bark Into whales' throats than pirates should be gorged with't. Be not less man than he. Thou art master yet And all's at thy disposing. Take thy time;	70

80	LADY Shall I be taken And lost the cruell'st way? Then wouldst thou curse That love that sent forth pity to my life, Too late thou wouldst.	80
	GOVIANUS O, this extremity! Hast thou no way to 'scape 'em but in soul? Must I meet peace in thy destruction, Or will it ne'er come at me?
85	'Tis a most miserable way to get it. I had rather be content to live without it Than pay so dear for't, and yet lose it too.	85

Thou canst not lose me there, for dying thine,	145

109 most i.e. in heaven
113-16 'Tis...shame But it won't turn out as well as that, for we often see condemned men at death's door, yet it's just their luck to get better in time for their execution, so they get up from their sick-beds only to be brought down by a shameful death. The association of the setting sun with shame is characteristic of Middleton (see Dissemblers, 'an ill cause...sets in shame', 2.1.17-9), as is the metaphorical use of 'set', meaning 'to go down'.

117 What...now Supposing I were to kill myself now, while she isn't looking? Govianus's difficulty in 'dispatching' the Lady efficiently throughout this scene seems to him 'unmanly' (l. 119), and his fear of failure carries sexual undertones: to inflict death (also, to bring to orgasm) is 'more than I can perform' (126).

137 Makes shift with makes do with
140 hand course (i.e. what should I do?)

Thou dost enjoy me still. Kings cannot rob thee.

VOICES WITHIN

Do you hear, my lord?

LADY Is it yet time or no?

Honour remember thee.

GOVIANUS I must. Come, prepare thyself!

LADY

Never more dearly welcome!

[Govianus, with his sword drawn,] runs at her and falls by the way in a swoon

Alas, sir!

150 My lord, my love—O thou poor-spirited man!
He's gone before me. Did I trust to thee,
And hast thou served me so? Left all the work
Upon my hand, and stole away so smoothly?
There was not equal suffering shown in this,
155 And yet I cannot blame thee: every man
Would seek his rest. Eternal peace sleep with thee.

[She takes up Govianus's sword]

Thou art my servant now. Come, thou hast lost
A fearful master, but art now preferred
Unto the service of a resolute lady,
One that knows how to employ thee, and scorns
160 death

As much as great men fear it. Where's hell's ministers,
The Tyrant's watch and guard?

'Tis of much worth

When with this key the prisoner can slip forth.

[She kills herself [by falling on the sword]
A great knocking again

GOVIANUS [awaking from his swoon]

165 How now? What noise is this? I heard doors beaten.
Where are my servants? Let men knock so loud
Their master cannot sleep?

VOICES WITHIN The time's expired,
And we'll break in, my lord.

GOVIANUS Ha! Where's my sword?
I had forgot my business! [Seeing the Lady] O, 'tis done,

And never was beholden to my hand.

170 Was I so hard to thee, so disrespectful of thee
To put all this to thee? Why, it was more Than I was able to perform myself
With all the courage that I could take to me.
It tired me. I was fain to fall and rest.

175 And hast thou, valiant woman, overcome
Thy honour's enemies with thine own white hand,
Where virgin-victory sits, all without help?
Eternal praise go with thee!—[Calling] Spare not now,

Thou dost enjoy me still. Kings cannot rob thee.

 [He drags the body of Sophonirus across the stage]
 —I'll plant this bawd
 180 Against the door, the fittest place for him,
 That when with ungoverned weapons they rush in,
 Blinded with fury, they may take his death
 Into the purple number of their deeds,
 And wipe it off from mine.
 [He sets the body against the door, calling out]
 How now? Forbear,
 My lord's at hand.
 185 VOICES WITHIN My lord, and ten lords more,
 I hope the king's officers are above 'em all.

 GOVIANUS
 Life, what do you do? Take heed—Enter the Fellows, well weaponed, [striking and stumbling over the body of Sophonirus]
 Bless the old man—
 My lord?
 [He examines Sophonirus]
 All-ass, my lord? He's gone!
 FIRST FELLOW Heart, farewell he, then.
 190 We have no eyes to pierce thorough inch boards.
 'Twas his own folly. The king must be served
 And shall. The best is, we shall ne'er be hanged for't, There's such a number guilty.
 GOVIANUS Poor my lord!
 He went some twice ambassador, and behaved himself
 So wittily in all his actions.
 SECOND FELLOW [seeing the Lady]
 My lord, what's she?
 195 GOVIANUS Let me see,
 What should she be? Now I remember her.
 O she was a worthy creature
 Before destruction grew so inward with her.
 FIRST FELLOW
 Well, for her worthiness, that's no work of ours.
 200 You have a lady, sir. The king commands her
 To court with speed, and we must force her thither.
 GOVIANUS
 Alas, she'll never strive with you. She was born
 E'en with the spirit of meekness.—Is't for the king?
 FIRST FELLOW
 For his own royal and most gracious lust,
 Or let me ne'er be trusted.
 205 GOVIANUS Take her, then.
 SECOND FELLOW
 Spoke like an honest subject, by my troth.

Make all the haste you can.

Her resolution. 'Tis a triumph to me

SECOND FELLOW How came this, sir?
The king must know.
GOVIANUS [pointing to Sophonirus]
215 From yon old fellow's prattling:
All your intents he revealed largely to her,
And she was troubled with a foolish pride
To stand upon her honour, and so died.
'Twas a strange trick of her. Few of your ladies 220 In ord'nary will believe it; they abhor it.
They'll sooner kill themselves with lust, than for it.
FIRST FELLOW
We have done the king good service to kill him,
More than we were aware on. But this news
Will make a mad court. 'Twill be a hard office 225 To be a flatterer now. His Grace will run
Into so many moods, there'll be no finding on him:
As good seek a wild hare without a hound now.

Will hearken after secrets as their lives,
230 But keep 'em in, e'en as they keep their wives!

To see 'em gone without her. Faith, she told me
Her everlasting sleep would bring me joy,
Yet I was still unwilling to believe her,
235 Her life was so sweet to me. Like some man
In time of sickness that would rather wish,
To please his fearful flesh, his former health
Restored to him than death, when after trial,
If it were possible, ten thousand worlds
240 Could not entice him to return again

I'd do the like myself to serve my prince.

 Come, thou delicious treasure of mankind:

 And can discreetly love her, the whole world
 Yields not a jewel like her, ransack rocks
 And caves beneath the deep.—O thou fair spring
 Of honest and religious desires,

 After death's marble lip.

 To lie entombed now by my father's side;

 VOTARIUS
 Prithee forgive me, madam. Come, thou shalt!
 WIFE
 I'faith, 'twas strangely done, sir.
 VOTARIUS I confess it.
 WIFE
 Is that enough to help it, sir? 'Tis easy
 To draw a lady's honour in suspicion,
 5 But not so soon recovered and confirmed
 To the first faith again from whence you brought it.
 Your wit was fetched out about other business
 Or such forgetfulness had never seized you.
 VOTARIUS
 'Twas but an overflowing, a spring tide
 10 In my affection, raised by too much love,
 And that's the worst words you can give it, madam.
 WIFE
 Jealous of me?
 VOTARIUS Life, you'd 'a' sworn yourself, madam,
 Had you been in my body, and changed cases:
 To see a fellow with a guilty pace
 Glide through the room, his face three-quarters
 15 nighted,
 As if a deed of darkness had hung on him.

A246/B232 discreetly wisely
 A247/B233 ransack i.e. even if one were to ransack
 A253/B239 Without offence in kindred without breaking the rules as to who may be buried in the family tomb. The Lady was betrothed, but not yet married to Govianus, so would not normally have been buried with his family.

4.1.1 shalt must
 2 strangely done an unfriendly thing to do
 3 to help it set it right
 3-6 'Tis... it It's easy to throw suspicion upon a lady's honour, but not so easy to restore it and re-establish the original trust which you destroyed.
 7 Your... business your mind was distract-

[He takes the Lady's body in his arms]
 Come, thou delicious treasure of mankind: 230
 To him that knows what virtuous woman is
 And can discreetly love her, the whole world
 Yields not a jewel like her, ransack rocks
 And caves beneath the deep.—O thou fair spring
 Of honest and religious desires, 235
 Fountain of weeping honour, I will kiss thee
 After death's marble lip.
 [He kisses her]
 Thou'rt cold enough
 To lie entombed now by my father's side;
 Without offence in kindred there I'll place thee
 With one I loved the dearest next to thee. 240
 Help me to mourn, all that love chastity!
 Exit [carrying the body of the Lady]

 Enter Votarius with Anselmus's Wife
 VOTARIUS
 Prithee forgive me, madam. Come, thou shalt!
 WIFE
 I'faith, 'twas strangely done, sir.
 VOTARIUS I confess it.
 WIFE
 Is that enough to help it, sir? 'Tis easy
 To draw a lady's honour in suspicion,
 5 But not so soon recovered and confirmed
 To the first faith again from whence you brought it.
 Your wit was fetched out about other business
 Or such forgetfulness had never seized you.
 VOTARIUS
 'Twas but an overflowing, a spring tide
 10 In my affection, raised by too much love,
 And that's the worst words you can give it, madam.
 WIFE
 Jealous of me?
 VOTARIUS You'd 'a' sworn yourself, madam,
 Had you been in my body, and changed cases:
 To see a fellow with a guilty pace
 Glide through the room, his face three-quarters
 15 nighted,
 As if a deed of darkness had hung on him.

Nay, for a need, I'll draw some rapier forth That shall come near my hand, as 'twere by chance, 60 And set a lively face upon my rage— But fear thou nothing. I too dearly love thee To let harm touch thee.	50	Upholding still the same, as being emboldened By some loose glance of mine, you shall attempt (After you've placed my lord in some near closet) To thrust yourself into my chamber rudely, As if the game went forward to your thinking; Then leave the rest to me. 				[MEMPHONIUS]	What strange fits grow upon him! Here alate His soul has got a very dreadful leader. What should he make in the Cathedral now,

A38 Run, Afranius the name of the first soldier, only given in the original version, was taken from John Fletcher's recent Tragedy of Valentinian, where he is a captain loyal to the Emperor, and appears in 5.4 and 5.8.
A42/B45 close lanterns dark, i.e. shuttered lanterns
A44/B47 trow trow ye, i.e. do you think? or, I wonder?
A47/B50 so cozened so cheated (of her) A47-9/B50-2 Though...me She gave up her life, like a widow who deliberately puts her (e)state in trust (i.e. in order to prevent it from falling into the hands of her second husband), to frustrate my plans.

A55-7/B58-60 I hold...law I'll wager my life that this money will come to no good. It's a sure saying, ill-gotten gains are always paid out in legal costs.
B4.2a This additional passage was partly inserted to avoid the Tyrant and his soldiers leaving the stage and immediately re-entering at a different location (at 4.3.0.1-2). The speaker's name appears in the margin as Mr Gough, an actor for the King's Men, and the speech was almost certainly spoken by Memphonius. It enlarges upon the Tyrant's mental breakdown and announces the conspiracy to release Helvetius, who was originally intended to reappear in the last scene, though at a later stage his part in it was cut altogether (see Introduction, 834).

B1 alate of late, recently
B2 a very dreadful leader i.e. the devil
B3 make do
B6-8 He...long He grows to be a weight upon his Nobles' minds; his moods are so difficult that they cannot put up with them, and are not prepared to do so much longer,
B9 father of the state the most senior and respected member of government
B11 close policy secret stratagem

4.3 Enter the Tyrant again [followed by the soldiers] at a further door, which opened, brings him to the tomb where the Lady lies buried. The tomb here discovered, richly set forth

TYRANT Softly, softly!
Let's give this place the peace that it requires.
The vaults e'en chide our steps with murmuring sounds
For making bold so late.—It must be done.

5 FIRST SOLDIER [aside] I fear nothing but the whorish ghost of a quean I kept once. She swore she would so haunt me I should never pray in quiet for her, and I have kept myself from church this fifteen year to prevent her.

TYRANT
The monument woos me; I must run and kiss it.
10 Now trust me if the tears do not e'en stand Upon the marble. What slow springs have I? 'Twas weeping to itself before I came. How pity strikes e'en through insensible things And makes them shame our dullness.
15 Thou house of silence, and the calms of rest After tempestuous life, I claim of thee A mistress, one of the most beauteous sleepers That ever lay so cold, not yet due to thee By natural death, but cruelly forced hither
20 Many a year before the world could spare her. We miss her 'mongst the glories of our court, When they be numbered up. All thy still strength, Thou grey-eyed monument, shall not keep her from us.
[To Second Soldier] Strike, villain, though the echo rail us all 25 Into ridiculous deafness. Pierce the jaws Of this cold ponderous creature.

SECOND SOLDIER Sir!
TYRANT Why strik'st thou not?
SECOND SOLDIER I shall not hold the axe fast; I'm afraid, sir.

5 The hour so deep in night? All his intents Are contrary to man, in spirit or blood. He waxes heavy in his Nobles' minds, His moods are such, they cannot bear the weight, Nor will not long, if there be truth in whispers! The honourable father of the state, Noble Helvetius, all the lords agree
10 By some close policy shortly to set free. [Exit]

TYRANT Why strik'st thou not?
SECOND SOLDIER I shall not hold the axe fast; I'm afraid, sir.

4.3.0.3-4 here discovered i.e. revealed, probably by the drawing back of a curtain across the 'discovery space' at the back of the stage. The tomb remains on stage for this scene and the next, when the curtain would be redrawn.
3 The vaults the vaulting is probably that of the Cathedral itself. Jacobean tombs were often 'richly set forth', i.e. elaborately sculptured, with effigies of those buried within, and set along the aisle or in side chapels. The soldiers' sense of being in church suggests that this scene takes place in the Cathedral itself, rather than in the crypt beneath (which would also have been vaulted).

6 quean whore, as at 4.1.86
7 for her because of her
9-11 The...marble The Tyrant's desire to run and kiss the monument suggests that it includes an effigy of the Lady which seems to be weeping. By contrast, the Tyrant's eyes are 'slow springs', i.e. slow to respond.

23 grey-eyed perhaps because stone-coloured (but grey eyes have been admired since the ancient Greeks)

O shame of men! A soldier and so limber?

SECOND SOLDIER
'Tis out of my element to be in a church, sir.

True, there thou hast room enough to run away.

A28 limber limp, feeble B28 fearful 'Fie, my lord, fie—a soldier and afeared?' Macbeth, 5.1.34–5.
29 out of my element not natural to me
34 for with regard to 35–6 I... living i.e. ghosts are the last people alive that I'd want to disturb.
A36 that's my humour that's the way I am
(a popular catch-phrase of the day)

43 I... that I should gain a great deal from that (ironic).
46 with him in him
A47 stone-cutter ironic, since the first soldier's reluctance to break into the tomb prevents him from becoming a stone-cutter, in the sense of a mason (it can also mean a surgeon who removes internal stones or cuts off 'stones', i.e. testicles)

47–9 Very... lieutenants Fear itself will almost convert me to some religion or other, and so force me to give up my lieutenancy (soldiers were often thought of as irreligious).
50 vassals slaves

FIRST SOLDIER This is ten thousand times worse than ent'ring upon a breach!
'Tis the first stone that ever I took off 60 From any lady. Marry, I have brought 'em many,
Fair diamonds, sapphires, rubies.
[They remove the stone from the tomb]
TYRANT [gazing into the opened tomb]
O, blest object!
I never shall be weary to behold thee.
I could eternally stand thus and see thee.
Why, 'tis not possible death should look so fair;
65 Life is not more illustrious when health smiles on't.
She's only pale, the colour of the court,
And most attractive. Mistresses most strive for't
And their lascivious servants best affect it.
[To Soldiers] Where be these lazy hands again?
ALL My lord!
TYRANT
Take up her body.
FIRST SOLDIER How, my lord?
70 TYRANT Her body!
FIRST SOLDIER
She's dead, my lord!
TYRANT True, if she were alive
Such slaves as you should not come near to touch her.
Do't, and with all best reverence place her here.
FIRST SOLDIER
Not only, sir, with reverence, but with fear.
75 You shall have more than your own asking once.
I am afraid of nothing but she'll rise
At the first jog, and save us all a labour.
SECOND SOLDIER
Then we were best take her up and never touch her?
FIRST SOLDIER
Life, how can that be? Does fear make thee mad?
80 I've took up many a woman in my days,
But never with less pleasure, I protest!
[The soldiers lift the Lady's body out of the tomb]
TYRANT
O, the moon rises! What reflection
Is thrown about this sanctifièd building,
E'en in a twinkling! How the monuments glisten,
85 As if death's palaces were all massy silver
And scorned the name of marble!

58 ent'ring upon a breach making an attack through a gap blown in fortifications during a siege (also sexual penetration)

59-61 'Tis...rubies The first soldier continues punning on 'stones', first as testicles (you couldn't take those off a woman), then as gemstones. It is not clear from the text whether the stone removed from the tomb is a side panel, or forms the lid (as ll. 131-2 suggest, though this might be awkward if the tomb had an effigy on top).

66 pale a fair (i.e. not sunburned) complexion was considered desirable at this period

68 best affect it imitate it, or aim for it most

70 Take up The Tyrant's order, that the soldiers 'take up' (i.e. lift up) the Lady's body, has a secondary sexual meaning, of the taking up of clothes before lovemaking, or simply the act itself, as does 'touch' at l. 72, which also means to make sexual contact. The soldiers play on these different senses in ll. 78, 80.

How, my lord What do you mean, my lord?

75 You...once You'll get more than you bargained for.

82 the moon rises i.e. her body is lifted from the tomb (a dummy may have been used for this—see note at 5.2.13.1)

86-7 cold?...yet Dead (or, sexually unresponsive)? I still can't believe it.

[He receives the Lady's body from them]

Art thou cold?

I have no faith in't yet; I believe none.
Madam! 'Tis I, sweet lady, prithee speak!
'Tis thy love calls on thee, the king thy servant.
90 No, not a word? All prisoners to pale silence?
I'll prove a kiss.

[He kisses the body]

FIRST SOLDIER [aside]

Here's fine chill venery!

'Twould make a pander's heels ache! I'll be sworn
All my teeth chatter in my head to see't.

TYRANT

95 By th' mass, thou'rt cold indeed; beshrew thee for't!
Unkind to thine own blood? Hard-hearted lady,
What injury hast thou offered to the youth
And pleasure of thy days! Refuse the court,
And steal to this hard lodging, was that wisdom?
O I could chide thee with mine eye brim-full,
100 And weep out my forgiveness when I ha' done.
Nothing hurt thee but want of woman's counsel:
Hadst thou but asked th'opinion of most ladies, Thou'dst never come to this! They would have told thee

How dear a treasure life and youth had been:
105 'Tis that they fear to lose; the very name
Can make more gaudy tremblers in a minute
Than heaven, or sin, or hell—those are last thought on.

And where got'st thou such boldness from the rest
Of all thy timorous sex, to do a deed here
110 Upon thyself, would plunge the world's best soldier,
And make him twice bethink him, and again,
And yet give over? Since thy life has left me,
I'll clasp the body for the spirit that dwelt in't,
And love the house still for the mistress' sake.
115 Thou art mine now, 'spite of destruction
And Govianus; and I will possess thee.
I once read of a Herod whose affection
Pursued a virgin's love, as I did thine,
Who for the hate she owed him killed herself
120 (As thou too rashly didst) without all pity;
Yet he preserved her body dead in honey
And kept her long after her funeral.

But I'll unlock the treasure house of art
With keys of gold and bestow all on thee.
125 [To the soldiers] Here, slaves, receive her humbly from our arms;

91 prove try

91-2 chill . . . ache lovemaking so cold that it would make even a pimp's heels ache (pimps were supposed to 'cool their heels', while they waited for their clients)

94 beshrew thee curse you

105-7 the . . . hell the mere mention (of losing life and youth) can make more revellers tremble in a moment than can heaven or sin or hell

112 yet give over eventually give up violation of the tomb, the (now empty) house of the body

117-22 read . . . funeral the full horror of the Tyrant's plan is finally revealed, through the legend of Herod's preservation of Mariamne's body—according to some versions, in order to have sex with it—as related in the Works of Josephus (trans. Thomas Lodge, 1602) and elsewhere

Upon your knees, you villains! All's too little,
 If you should sweep the pavement with your lips.

 And cover emptiness?

 Like a great city-pie brought to a table
 Where there be many hands that lay about.

4.4 Enter Govianus in black, a book in his hand, his page carrying a torch before him

GOVIANUS
 Already mine eye melts. The monument
 No sooner stood before it, but a tear
 Ran swiftly from me, to express her duty.
 Temple of honour, I salute thee early,
 5 The time that my griefs rise. Chamber of peace,
 Where wounded virtue sleeps, locked from the world,
 I bring to be acquainted with thy silence
 Sorrows that love no noise: they dwell all inward,
 Where truth and love in every man should dwell.
 10 [To the page] Be ready, boy; give me the strain again.
 'Twill show well here, whilst in my grief's devotion
 At every rest mine eye lets fall a bead
 To keep the number perfect.

The song:

15 If ever pity were well placed
 On true desert and virtuous honour,
 It could ne'er be better graced;
 Freely, then, bestow't upon her.

20 Never lady earned her fame
 In virtue's war with greater strife.
 To preserve her constant name
 She gave up beauty, youth and life.

133 city-pie pie made for the Lord Mayor's or Aldermen's feasts in the City of London. Sometimes elaborate pie-crusts were put back on the dishes after they had been emptied. The pie crust or lid was also known as the coffin.

134 lay about grab what they can

4.4.1-5 Already...rise Unlike the Tyrant, Govianus weeps at once. It is now early morning ('the time that my griefs rise'). The play's action takes place over twenty-four hours, although the movement of time is telescoped to create a sense of continuous action.

3 her duty i.e. my duty to her

10-13 give...perfect a strain is a musical passage (as in Twelfth Night, 1.1.4), which will 'show well' (fit appropriately) at this point. Rests are pauses in the music, and Govianus's falling tears (beads) keep the numbers (i.e. the measure) of the song in strict time.

And here he weeps,
The lord unto so rare a wife.

25 Weep, weep and mourn lament,
You virgins that pass by her,
For if praise come by death again,
I doubt few will lie nigh her.

GOVIANUS

30 Thou art an honest boy. 'Tis done like one
That has a feeling of his master's passions
And the unmatched worth of his dead mistress.
Thy better years shall find me good to thee
When understanding ripens in thy soul,
Which truly makes the man, and not long time.

At cloister door.

Enter Lady: Rich. Robinson

Mercy look to me! Faith, I fly to thee!
Keep a strong watch about me—now thy friendship!
45 O never came astonishment and fear
So pleasing to mankind! I take delight
To have my breast shake, and my hair stand stiff.
If this be horror, let it never die!

45

In terror, I beseech thee: I'd not change
This fever for felicity of man

25 mourn lament sadly sing a lament.
The words of the song show that the Lady was both 'wife', i.e. betrothed to Govianus, but also virgin (see also 37–8).
27–8 if...her if a virgin were to achieve praise again through death, I am sure that few would approach her in virtue 32 better later, older 35–6 attend...door wait for me at the door to the cloisters.
38–40 like...harvest like the seeds of virtue, secret and concealed, until they shall bear fruit at God's harvest of souls (i.e. be resurrected at the last judgement). Govianus's words refer to the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, a further powerful reason why the Lady's body must be saved from the Tyrant's lust.

40 I am not here According to the gospels, angels clothed in white told mourners at Christ's tomb, 'He is not here, for He is risen'. The mysterious offstage voice prepares us for the Lady's miraculous appearance two lines later, probably through a trapdoor, since she arrives

'standing just before him'.

42 idle meaningless beaten echoing

42.4 as went out A baffling phrase, which looks as if it should mean 'as she left the stage', or 'as she was when she died', but since the Lady was then in black,
and is now in white, 'stuck with jewels',
this seems less likely.

B4.2.7 Enter Lady: Rich. Robinson Richard Robinson was a boy actor with the King's Men (see Introduction, 835).

44 thy friendship I need (faith's) friendship

Or all the pleasures of ten thousand ages.

LADY
Dear lord, I come to tell you all my wrongs.

GOVIANUS
55 Welcome! Who wrongs the spirit of my love?
Thou art above the injuries of blood,
They cannot reach thee now. What dares offend thee?
No life that has the weight of flesh upon't,
And treads as I do, can now wrong my mistress!

LADY
60 The peace that death allows me is not mine.
The monument is robbed. Behold, I'm gone,
My body taken up.

GOVIANUS [looking into the tomb]
'Tis gone indeed.
What villain dares so fearfully run in debt
To black eternity?

LADY He that dares do more—
The Tyrant!

65 GOVIANUS All the miseries below
Reward his boldness!

LADY I am now at court,
In his own private chamber. There he woos me
And plies his suit to me with as serious pains
As if the short flame of mortality
70 Were lighted up again in my cold breast;
Folds me within his arms and often sets
A sinful kiss upon my senseless lip;
Weeps when he sees the paleness of my cheek,
And will send privately for a hand of art
75 That may dissemble life upon my face
To please his lustful eye.

GOVIANUS O piteous wrongs,
Inhuman injuries, without grace or mercy!

LADY
I leave 'em to thy thought, dearest of men.
My rest is lost. Thou must restore't again.

GOVIANUS
O, fly me not so soon!

80 LADY Farewell, true lord. Exit

GOVIANUS
I cannot spare thee yet. I'll make myself
Over to death too, and we'll walk together
Like loving spirits—I prithee let's do so.
She's snatched away by fate and I talk sickly.
85 I must dispatch this business upon earth
Before I take that journey.
I'll to my brother for his aid or counsel.
So wronged! O heav'n, put armour on my spirit:
Her body I will place in her first rest
90 Or in th'attempt lock death into my breast. Exit

Finit Actus Quartus

59 treads walks on the earth
63-4 What . . . eternity Who is so wicked that he dares incur a debt that must be paid for eternally in hell?

65 below of hell
74 a hand of art the hand of an artist
75 dissemble give the appearance of 80 fly me not do not fly from me

88-90 put . . . breast give me spiritual protection. I will restore her body to its original resting-place, or die in the attempt.

5.1 Incipit Actus Quintus
Enter Votarius with Anselmus, the husband
 VOTARIUS [pointing out the closet]
 You shall stand here, my lord, unseen, and hear all.
 Do I deal now like a right friend with you?
 ANSELMUS Like a most faithful.
 VOTARIUS
 You shall have her mind e'en as it comes to me,
 Though I undo her by't. Your friendship, sir,
 5 Is the sweet mistress that I only serve.
 I prize the roughness of a man's embrace
 Before the soft lips of a hundred ladies.
 ANSELMUS
 And that's an honest mind of thee.
 VOTARIUS Lock yourself, sir,
 Into that closet and be sure none see you.
 10 Trust not a creature. We'll have all run clear,
 E'en as the heart affords it.
 ANSELMUS 'Tis a match, sir.
 [He withdraws to the closet]
 VOTARIUS [aside]
 Troth, he says true there: 'tis a match indeed.
 He does not know the strength of his own words,
 For if he did, there were no mast'ring on him.
 15 He's cleft the pin in two with a blind man's eyes.
 Though I shoot wide, I'll cozen him of the game.

 Bellarius
 LEONELLA
 Dost thou see thine enemy walk?
 BELLARIUS I would I did not.
 LEONELLA
 Prithee rest quiet, man. I have fee'd one for him,
 A trusty catchpole, too, that will be sure on him.
 20 Thou know'st this gallery well. 'Tis at thy use now;
 'T'as been at mine full often. Thou mayst sit
 Like a most private gallant in yon corner,
 See all the play, and ne'er be seen thyself.
 BELLARIUS
 Therefore I chose it.
 LEONELLA Thou shalt see my lady
 25 Play her part naturally, more to the life

5.1.2 right true. Votarius hides Anselmus in the closet so that he may overhear what ensues (as he had done earlier at 1.2.71.1, or as the deceived Harebrain does in Mad World, 3.2.191-5).
 3 have know
 8 that's... thee that shows an honourable attitude on your part.
 10 clear smoothly, also openly or transparently
 11-16 'Tis... game That's agreed. In an aside, Votarius plays on further meanings of this expression—that Anselmus and he are playing a match against one another for the Wife, but if Anselmus were to realize this, there would be no controlling his rage. Anselmus is like a blind man at an archery match who has accidentally managed to split the centre ('pin') of the target. Even if Votarius cannot beat him (shooting wide of the mark), he can still cheat him of the prize.

 18-19 I... him I have paid an officer to arrest him (a catchpole was an officer who arrested debtors),—a reliable one who will make sure that he's got him.
 22 Like... corner Gallants (men-about-town)

 LEONELLA Thou shalt see my lady

sat on the stage and in the galleries of the theatre, partly in order to be seen. Bellarius, by contrast, will be 'private', i.e. invisible to the actors, but able to watch the performance about to take place on the stage below. The fifth act sets up a piece of play-acting which suddenly becomes reality, but unlike comparable scenes in Mad World, Hengist and Women Beware, this one is not presented as a formal entertainment.
 25-6 more... on more realistically than she realizes

Than she's aware on.
 BELLARIUS There must I be pleased.
 Thou'rt one of the actors, thou'lt be missed anon.
 LEONELLA
 Alas, a woman's action's always ready.
 Yet I'll down, now I think on't. Descendet Leonella
 BELLARIUS Do, 'tis time, i'faith.
 ANSELMUS [apart, at the closet]
 30 I know not yet where I should plant belief,
 I am so strangely tossed between two tales.
 I'm told by my wife's woman the deed's done,
 And in Votarius' tongue, 'tis yet to come:
 The castle is but upon yielding yet,
 35 'Tis not delivered up. Well, we shall find
 The mystery shortly. I will entertain
 The patience of a prisoner i'th' mean time.
 [He locks himself in [the closet]
Enter Anselmus' Wife with Leonella [who hangs up the sword]
 WIFE [aside to Leonella]
 Is all set ready, wench?
 LEONELLA Push! Madam, all.
 WIFE [louder, as if replying to Leonella]
 Tell me not so. She lives not for a lady
 That has less peace than I.
 40 LEONELLA Nay, good sweet madam,
 You would not think how much this passion alters
 you:
 It drinks up all the beauty of your cheek.
 I promise you, madam, you have lost much blood.
 WIFE
 Let it draw death upon me, for till then
 45 I shall be mistress of no true content.
 Who could endure hourly temptation
 And bear it, as I do?
 LEONELLA Nay, that's most certain,
 Unless it were myself again. I can do't,
 I suffer the like daily. You should complain, madam.
 WIFE
 50 Which way, were that wisdom? Prithee, wench, to whom?
 LEONELLA
 To him who makes all whole again, my lord.
 To one that, if he be a kind, good husband,
 Will let you bear no more than you are able.
 WIFE
 Thou know'st not what thou speak'st. Why, my lord's he

26 There...pleased I'm bound to be pleased about that.

28 a woman's...ready women are always ready to play their part; also, women's (sexual) parts are always ready.

31 tossed...tales 'Never was man so tossed between two tales! | I know not which to take, nor which to trust' (No Wit, 3.208-9).

34-5 The castle...up The castle is only at the point of surrender—it has not yet been handed over.

39 She...lady There is no lady living
 43 blood the Wife is pale—supposedly from being persecuted, but actually from sexual passion (according to contemporary medical theories, the body's liquids needed to be maintained at steady levels for health).

44 death with the secondary meaning of orgasm, which she must 'bear', as at A2.I.80

49 I suffer the like I put up with the same thing. Leonella hastens to assure the Wife that she suffers the same pleasures or pains.

50 Which...wisdom In what direction? Would that be wise?

54-5 my lord's he | That it is my lord who

The poison, like fire in the blood, acts out the destructiveness of sexual passion (as in Hippolito's death from poisoned darts, Women Beware, 5.1.177-9, 186-7).

114 What ... heart What am I doing here? (this phrase is used by Bianca at the end of Women Beware, 5.1.247). I had forgotten my own feelings. Bellarius speaks these lines from the gallery ('here'), but descends immediately, challenging Anselmus at l. 117. As it normally took about eight lines for an actor to descend from the gallery (as at ll. 29–38), he may jump, swing or slide down onto the main stage (depending on the height of the gallery).

119–20 And ... scape So you're going to call in my life, then (i.e. in payment for Leonella's)? I'll pay you back in full, scoundrel, for your previous offence (i.e. illegally entering my house).

121 I come, Votarius The Wife is (symbolically) slain between two men. As Bellarius suggestively puts it at l. A164, 'She ran upon two weapons' (swords/penises). Her last words suggest self-immolation for the accidental killing of Votarius, as well as her desire to join him. They seem to be said to herself or in an aside, since Anselmus does not apparently overhear them.

126–7 must ... chance Must I goad you into fighting? Either get up, or I'll risk killing you where you are.

129 quean promiscuous woman

131–2 That ... now That was once taken in by her own trick,—as I have been taken in by my own.

133 mine enemy's i.e. that of Votarius

134–5 Is ... withal (The poison) is saucily familiar with my blood, also, and will suffice to bring about both our deaths (i.e. his and that of Votarius, since Anselmus dies from Bellarius's sword, which has not been poisoned).

BELLARIUS

O rage! I pity now mine enemy's flesh.
Enter Govianus with servants

GOVIANUS

Where should he be?

FIRST SERVANT My lady, sir, will tell you.

She's in her chamber here.

SECOND SERVANT [looking about]

O, my lord!

145 GOVIANUS Peace!

My honourable brother, madam, all!
 So many dreadful deeds and not one tongue
 Left to proclaim 'em?

BELLARIUS Yes. Hear, if a voice

Some minute long may satisfy your ear;
 I've that time allowed it.

150 GOVIANUS 'Tis enough.

Bestow it quickly ere death snatch it from thee.

BELLARIUS

That lord, your brother, made his friend Votarius
 To tempt his lady. She was won to lust,
 The act revealed here by her serving woman.
 155 But that wise, close adulteress, stored with art,
 To prey upon the weakness of that lord,
 Dissembled a great rage upon her love,
 And indeed killed him; which so won her husband,
 He slew this right discoverer in his fury,
 160 Who, being my mistress, I was moved in heart
 To take some pains with him, and he's paid me for't.
 As for the cunning lady, I commend her:
 She performed that which never woman tried,
 She ran upon two weapons, and so died.

165 Now you have all, I hope I shall sleep quiet.

138-40 If...spirit If whatever's left of my strength, as I bleed, is only enough to buy my death (beside my mistress), I have gained the dearest wish of my great spirit.

143 O rage! He feels the burning of the poison, and momentarily pities Votarius.
 155 close secret

157 Dissembled...love pretended to be furiously angry with her lover

159 right discoverer person who exposed the truth (i.e. Leonella)

161-4 To...died to take some trouble over him, and he has repaid me for it. As for the crafty (also, sexy) lady, I congratulate her: she did something no woman has ever attempted before: she threw herself upon two weapons, and so killed herself (Bellarius suggests that the Wife deliberately set out to achieve such a consummation).

B166-79 O thunder...lust In this additional passage, Anselmus survives long enough to learn from the dying Bellarius that his Wife had, in fact, betrayed him, and despairs.

B168-9 I...me Bellarius's words burn Anselmus inwardly, as the action of the poison had consumed the others. They condemn him to hell, both because they make him burn with anger (as if he were already there), and also because he would reject heaven itself to avoid meeting his Wife there, as he explains at ll. B175-7.

B171 believing trusting
 B173 grow beggars are emptied of blood sue beg, pray

B177 sup with torments i.e. in hell
 B179 "The...lust" This epigram links women's lust to the serpent that persuaded Eve to disobey God by eating the apple, thus bringing desire, death, and misery into the world ('Now, the serpent was more subtil than any beast of the field...', Genesis 3:1). Even at the point of death, Anselmus remains self-deceived since he cannot admit his own part in his Wife's fall.

GOVIANUS

Is death so long a-coming to mankind,
It must be met halfways? 'Las, the full time
Is, to eternity, but a minute, a [breath].
Was that so long to stay? O cruel speed!
170 There's few men pay their debts before their day;
If they be ready at their time, 'tis well,
And but a few that are so. What strange haste
Was made among these people! My heart weeps for't.

[To the servants] Go, bear those bodies to a place more comely.

[The bodies are carried out]

175 [To Anselmus] Brother, I came for thy advice, but I

Find thee so ill a counsellor to thyself
That I repent my pains, and depart sighing.—
The body of my love is still at court.
I am not well to think on't. The poor spirit
180 Was with me once again about it, troth,
And I can put it off no more for shame,
Though I desire to have it haunt me still
And never to give over, 'tis so pleasing.
I must to court. I've plighted my faith to't.
185 'T'as opened me the way to the revenge.
Tyrant, I'll run thee on a dangerous shelf,
Though I be forced to fly this land myself!

Exit

5.2 [The throne is set out]
Enter Tyrant with attendants

TYRANT

In vain my spirit wrestles with my blood,
Affection will be mistress here on earth.
The house is hers, the soul is but a tenant.
I ha' tasked myself but with the abstinence
5 Of one poor hour, yet cannot conquer that.
I cannot keep from sight of her so long.

ANSELMUS

O thunder that awakes me e'en from death,
And makes me curse my confidence with cold lips!
I feel his words in flames about my soul.
He's more than killed me.

GOVIANUS Brother!

ANSELMUS I repent the smile

That I bestowed on destiny! A whore! 170

[He throws the Wife's body from him]

I fling thee thus from my believing breast
With all the strength I have. My rage is great,
Although my veins grow beggars. Now I sue
To die far from thee. May we never meet!
Were my soul bid to joy's eternal banquet 175
And were assured to find thee there a guest,
I'd sup with torments and refuse that feast!
O thou beguiler of man's easy trust,
"The serpent's wisdom is in women's lust!"
[He] dies

GOVIANUS [to the servants]

Go, bear those bodies to a place more comely. 180

[The bodies are carried out]

[To the body of Anselmus] Brother, I came for thy advice, but I

Find thee so ill a counsellor to thyself
That I repent my pains, and depart sighing.—
The body of my love is still at court.
I am not well to think on't. The poor spirit 185
Was with me once again about it, troth,
And I can put it off no more for shame,
Though I desire to have it haunt me still
And never to give over, 'tis so pleasing.
I must to court. I've plighted my faith to't. 190
'T'as opened me the way to the revenge.
And I must through. Exit

5.2 [The throne is set out]
Enter Tyrant with attendants

TYRANT

In vain my spirit wrestles with my blood,
Affection will be mistress here on earth.
The house is hers, the soul is but a tenant.
I ha' tasked myself but with the abstinence
5 Of one poor hour, yet cannot conquer that.
I cannot keep from sight of her so long.

A166-7 Is...halfways Is death so slow to arrive for men that it must be met halfway? (Govianus voices the common man's reaction to the violence that has cut short the lives of five people.)

A170-3 There's...people Few men pay their debts (i.e. give up their lives) before they fall due; if they are ready to do so when called upon, that's good, but even then, only a few are. What a strange hurry these people were in.

A179/B185 I am...on't It makes me ill to think of it.
A180/B186 about it concerning that (i.e.
her body having been taken to the court) A184/B190 plighted my faith given my word
A186 I'll...shelf I'll drive you onto dangerous rocks.
B192 I must through I must go through with it. As the closing line of a scene, this recalls Maximus's words at the end of act 3 of Fletcher's Tragedy of Valentinian: "Give me a certain ruin, I must through it" (3.3.170).

5.2.1-5 In...that My soul is wrestling unsuccessfully against my body: passion must rule here on earth. She owns the house (i.e. the body, as at 4.3.114); the soul is no more than a lodger. I have set myself to abstain (i.e. from seeing her) for a single hour, yet I cannot achieve even that (compare 2.3.3).

I starve mine eye too much. [To an attendant] Go,
 bring her forth,
 As we have caused her body to be decked
 In all the glorious riches of our palace.
 [Exit attendant]

10 Our mind has felt a famine for the time;
 All comfort has been dear and scarce with us.
 [Enter soldiers with the Lady]
 The times are altered since. Strike on, sweet harmony!
 [Music plays]
 A braver world comes toward us.
They bring the body in a chair, dressed up in black velvet which sets out the paleness of the hands and face, and a fair chain of pearl across her breast and the crucifix above it. The Tyrant stands silent awhile, letting the music play, beckoning the soldiers that bring her in to make obeisance to her, and he himself makes a low honour to the body and kisses the hand.
A Song within, in voices

15 O what is beauty that's so much adorèd?
 A flatt'ring glass that cozens her beholders:
 One night of death makes it look pale and horrid;
 The dainty preserv'd flesh, how soon it moulders.
 To love it living, it bewitcheth many,
 But after life is seldom heard of any.

FIRST SOLDIER [aside]

20 By this hand, mere idolatry! I make curtsy
 To my damnation. I have learned so much,
 Though I could never know the meaning yet
 Of all my Latin prayers, nor ne'er sought for't.

TYRANT [to the Lady's body]

25 How pleasing art thou to us even in death!
 I love thee yet, above all women living,
 And shall do sev'n year hence.
 I can see nothing to be mended in thee
 But the too constant paleness of thy cheek.
 I'd give the kingdom but to purchase there 30 The breadth of a red rose in natural colour,
 And think it the best bargain
 That ever king made yet; but fate's my hindrance,
 And I must only rest content with art,
 And that I'll have in spite on't!—[To Second Soldier] Is he come, sir?

SECOND SOLDIER
 Who, my lord?

I starve mine eye too much. [To an attendant] Go,
 bring her forth,
 As we have caused her body to be decked
 In all the glorious riches of our palace.
 [Exit attendant]

SECOND SOLDIER Who, my lord?

10-11 Our...us My mind felt starved during that time (i.e. of her absence); any comfort seemed expensive and hard to come by.
 13 braver brighter, better
 13.1 the body in a chair probably a dummy (or else another actor), since the Lady's ghost enters at l. A153.1/B128.1 and speaks at l. A164/B139
 13.2 sets out sets off
 13.7 honour a bow (a distinctively Middletonian sense of the word) 13.9 in voices with different voices taking different parts. Sung offstage, the words of this madrigal emphasize physical decay, thus commenting ironically on the Tyrant's ceremony, although he seems unconscious of them. Polyphonic singing was characteristic of Catholic services.

 A20-3 By...for't The first soldier finds the ceremony idolatrous or even Roman Catholic, as his reference to Latin prayers suggests (Anglican prayers were said in English). Protestants in any case considered Catholics idolatrous.

 A26 And...hence Like Herod, who kept Mariamne's body embalmed for seven years (see 4.3.117).
 A30/B25 The breadth as much colour (as...)
 A32 fate's my hinderer; B26 fate is my hinderer fate (in the form of death) will prevent me
 A33-4/B27-8 I...on't I shall have to be satisfied with mere artifice, and that I'll have, in spite of fate.

35 TYRANT Dull!—The fellow that we sent
For a court schoolmaster, a picture drawer,
A ladies' forenoon tutor. Is he come, sir?
FIRST SOLDIER
Not yet returned, my lord.
TYRANT The fool belike
Makes his choice carefully, for so we charged him,
40 To fit our close deeds with some private hand.
[To the Lady] It is no shame for thee, most silent
mistress,
To stand in need of art,
When youth and all thy warm friends has forsook
thee.
Women alive are glad to seek her friendship
45 To make up the fair number of their graces,
Or else the reck'ning would fall short sometimes,
And servants would look out for better wages.
Enter Third Soldier with Govianus [disguised as a painter]
SECOND SOLDIER
He's come, my lord.
TYRANT Depart then.
[Exeunt First and Second Soldiers and attendants]
Is that he?
THIRD SOLDIER The privat'st I could get, my lord.
GOVIANUS [aside]
50 O heav'n, marry patience to my spirit!
Give me a sober fury, I beseech thee,
A rage that may not overcharge my blood
And do myself most hurt! 'Tis strange to me
To see thee here at court, and gone from hence.
55 Didst thou make haste to leave the world for this?
And kept in the worst corner!
O who dares play with destiny but he
That wears security so thick upon him,
The thought of death and hell cannot pierce through!
TYRANT [to Third Soldier]
60 'Twas circumspectly carried. Leave us, go.
[Exit Third Soldier]
[To Govianus] Be nearer, sir: thou'rt much commended to us.
GOVIANUS
It is the hand, my lord, commends the workman.
TYRANT
Thou speak'st both modesty and truth in that.
We need that art that thou art master of.
GOVIANUS
65 My king is master both of that and me.

TYRANT Dull!— 30
The fellow that we sent for a picture drawer,
A ladies' forenoon tutor. Is he come, sir?
FIRST SOLDIER
Not yet returned, my lord.
TYRANT The fool belike
Makes his choice carefully, for so we charged him.
Where is he?

TYRANT
Thou speak'st both modesty and truth in that.
We need that art that thou art master of. 50
GOVIANUS
My king is master both of that and me.

A35/B30 Dull Stupid
A37/B32 ladies'... tutor Court ladies supposedly spent their mornings painting their faces, or having them painted.
A40 fit...deeds suit our secret activities
A44-7 Women...wages Living women are happy to seek the help of art to make up the full quantity of their attractions, otherwise their sum total would sometimes fall short, and their lovers would look elsewhere for better rewards.

A51/B38 sober restrained, controlled A56 corner secret or concealed place, perhaps for sexual activity, or for forbidden religious practices

A58/B44 security over-confidence—according to Calvinist theology, sinners were often impervious to the fear of eternal punishment

TYRANT
Look on yon face and tell me what it wants.

GOVIANUS
Which? That, sir?

TYRANT
That. What wants it?

GOVIANUS
Troth, my lord,
Some thousand years' sleep and a marble pillow.

TYRANT
What's that? [Aside] Observe it still. All the best arts 70 Hath the most fools and drunkards to their masters.
[To Govianus] Thy apprehension has too gross a film
To be employed at court. What colour wants she?

GOVIANUS
By my troth, all, sir. I see none she has,
Nor none she cares for.

TYRANT [aside] I am overmatched here.

GOVIANUS
85 A lower chamber with less noise were kindlier
For her, poor woman, whatsoe'er she was.

TYRANT
But how if we be pleased to have it thus
And thou well hired to do what we command?
Is not your work for money?

GOVIANUS
Yes, my lord.

80 TYRANT
I would not trust at court, an I could choose.

TYRANT
Let but thy art hide death upon her face
That now looks fearfully on us, and but strive
To give our eye delight in that pale part
Which draws so many pities from these springs,
85 And thy reward for't shall outlast thy end,
And reach to thy friend's fortunes, and his friend.

GOVIANUS
Say you so, my lord? I'll work out my heart, then,
But I'll show art enough.

TYRANT
About it, then.
90 [Aside] I never wished so seriously for health
After long sickness.

GOVIANUS [aside]
A religious trembling shakes me by the hand
And bids me put by such unhallowed business,
But revenge calls for't, and it must go forward.
'Tis time the spirit of my love took rest.
95 Poor soul, 'tis weary, much abused and toiled.

TYRANT
Look on yon face and tell me what it wants.

GOVIANUS

And thou well hired to do what we command?

GOVIANUS
Yes, my lord. 65

TYRANT
I would not trust but few, an I could choose.

TYRANT
Let but thy art hide death upon her face
That now looks fearfully on us, and but strive

'Tis time the spirit of my love took rest. 80
Poor soul, 'tis weary, much abused and toiled.

A66/B52 wants lacks
A68/B54 thousand...sleep sleep of the dead until the judgement day
A70/B56 to for A71/B57 Thy...film Your understanding has too thick a skin over it.
A74/B60 overmatched outdone (in repartee), or out of my depth A75/B61 lower chamber lower room, i.e. a grave
A78/B64 hired rewarded
A80 I...choose I would not give credit at court, if I had the choice. The Tyrant reminds Govianus that he is an employee, but Govianus (mis)understands him to mean 'Don't you work for ready money?'

Since aristocrats could not be arrested for debt at this period, tradesmen were reluctant to grant credit.
A81/B67 hide death ironic: Govianus's art hides death in a sense that the Tyrant does not anticipate A84/B70 pities...springs tears from these eyes

A85-6/B71-2 And thy...friend and your reward for this shall extend beyond your death, to include your friends and theirs A87-8/B73-4 I'll...enough I'll work as hard as I can (also, fulfil my purpose), then, and show all the art you could wish for.
A90/B76 After...sickness i.e. as I have wished for this (perhaps recalling A3.I.235-41)
A92/B78 put...business give up such an unholy task

A127 O...villain Govianus denounces the Tyrant's sin as unparalleled, changing from the respectful 'you' to the scornful 'thou'.

Thou thief of rest, robber of monuments!
 Cannot the body after funeral
 130 Sleep in the grave for thee? Must it be raised
 Only to please the wickedness of thine eye?
 Does all things end with death and not thy lust?
 Hast thou devised a new way to damnation
 More dreadful than the soul of any sin
 135 Did ever pass yet between earth and hell?
 Dost strive to be particularly plagued Above all ghosts beside? Is thy pride such Thou scorn'st a partner in thy torments too?

 Beyond the Frenchmen's tortures!

 Unto one head to help thine own invention,
 And make my end as rare as this thy sin
 145 And full as fearful to the eyes of women,
 My spirit shall fly singing to his lodging
 In midst of that rough weather. Doom me, tyrant!
 Had I feared death, I'd never appeared noble
 To seal this act upon me which e'en honours me
 150 Unto my mistress' spirit—it loves me for't.

Act 5 Scene 2

The Ladies' Tragedy

'Tis built within this bosom! My lords, treason!
Enter [Memphonius and] Nobles
 GOVIANUS
 Now, death, I'm for thee: welcome!
 TYRANT Your king's poisoned!
 MEMPHONIUS
 The King of heav'n be praised for't!
 TYRANT Lay hold on him,
 On Govianus.
 170 MEMPHONIUS E'en with the best loves
 And truest hearts that ever subjects owed.
 TYRANT
 How's that? I charge you both, lay hands on him!
 MEMPHONIUS
 Look you, my lord, your will shall be obeyed.
[The Nobles lay their hands on Govianus in homage.]
Enter Helvetius
 Here comes another. We'll have his hand, too.
 HELVETIUS
 175 You shall have both mine, if that work go forward,
 Beside my voice and knee.
[He lays his hands on Govianus]
 TYRANT Helvetius?
 Then my destruction was confirmed amongst 'em,
 Premeditation wrought it.
[The Nobles kneel to Govianus]
 O, my torments!
 ALL [rising]
 Live Govianus long our virtuous king!
 TYRANT
 That thunder strikes me dead!
[He dies]
 180 GOVIANUS I cannot better
 Reward my joys than with astonished silence,
 For all the wealth of words is not of power
 To make up thanks for you, my honoured lords.
 I'm like a man plucked up from many waters
 185 That never looked for help, and am here placed Upon this cheerful mountain where prosperity
 Shoots forth her richest beam.
 MEMPHONIUS Long injured lord,
 The tyranny of his actions grew so weighty,
 His life so vicious—
 HELVETIUS To which this is witness,

'Tis built within this bosom! My lords, treason!
Enter [Memphonius and] Nobles
 GOVIANUS
 Now, death, I'm for thee: welcome!
 TYRANT I am poisoned!
 MEMPHONIUS
 The King of heav'n be praised for't!
 TYRANT Lay hold on him,
 On Govianus.
 MEMPHONIUS E'en with the best loves

 Govianus is expecting to be put to death,

 Memphonius deliberately misinterprets his words to mean 'lay hands on him in

A173.3 Enter Helvetius Helvetius's final appearance, though prepared for by the

LEONELLA (169 lines): The Lady or page of Govianus
The LADY (168 lines): The Wife or Leonella

In the performance version, Helvetius's part at 5.2 has been cut altogether, which may indicate that he was played by a particular character actor, rather than being doubled. Allowing for rapid costume changes, it would have been technically possible for the Lady to double as the Wife, Leonella as the page, and for Sophonirus, Memphoni-us and the Tyrant to play Anselmus, Votarius and Bellarius, so that as few as 7 actors would have been required, plus walk-on parts. The two soldiers and/or fellows would have been played by clowns.

A CHASTE MAID IN CHEAPSIDE

Edited by Linda Woodbridge

AMONG the greatest of Middleton's city comedies, A Chaste Maid in Cheapside is a blistering satire whose relentless sexual jests lend a farcical atmosphere; but this can darken to unveil bleak vistas: with Sir Walter's collapse and the Allwits' defection the 'farcical surface . . . buckle[s]', exposing the authentic horror of The Changeling and Women Beware Women' (R. B. Parker). Farce serves the cause of 'horror': in a superficial world of materialism, sensuality, self-serving, and cheap intrigue, horror lies in recognizing that this ugly surface is the world: there is nothing underneath. Life's farcicality, unlike its tragedy, is offset not even by human dignity; such recognitions are savage. Yet Chaste Maid's very savagery crackles with vitality and a spirit of play.

The romantic plot is primarily sexual (though—compared to the rest of the play—refreshingly non-commercial). Touchstone Junior first speaks of his love in appetitive terms ('I must hasten it, | Or else peak o' famine; her blood's mine'), and addresses Moll first in unromantic prose (1.1.145–6, 150–5). 'Who can imagine a Berlioz or a Tchaikovsky writing a Touchstone Junior and Moll Yellowhammer overture?' demands G. R. Hibbard. (Though one might imagine songs written for them by Cole Porter or Kurt Weill.) Shakespearean comedy's joyful promise of fruition is here translated into a harsh 'nowadays'; though Middleton is obsessively interested in fertility, conception often proves disastrous, and not one of the play's babies is legitimate (Arthur Marotti). At the wedding, fruition is not mentioned. Though Ruby Chatterji finds family values affirmed in the emphasis on family life—birth, christening, education, and marrying of children—Joanne Altieri notes the play's exposure of kinship relations as economic relations. Satiric touches undermine the play's Aristophanic celebration of sex as a priapic elemental force: Touchwood Senior's keeping fools to which to marry his pregnant wenches is a quite unmythic family planning.

The funeral scene has been condemned as Beaumont-and-Fletcher-style cheap theatricality, and defended as a legacy of the commedia dell'arte, as an echo of fertility ritual's rebirths, or as parody of contemporary plays' extravagant theatricality. The abrupt rising of 'corpses' from coffins could be staged as a comical popping-up, like jacks-in-the-box. This scene is punctuated by unison utterances by everyone on stage; the first, 'Ne'er more pity!', sounds like a congregational response, but the third, 'Alive, sir? O sweet, dear couple!' might well be delivered by the assembled cast in a self-consciously camp style, as might the longest united declaration, 'Never was hour so filled with joy and wonder' (5.4.21, 30, 53). E. A. J. Honigmann discusses ways to make such simultaneous utterance more realistic on stage; but in this scene a frankly non-realistic delivery might be highly effective.

There are several 'humours' characters, each governed by one hyperbolic trait—Touchwood Senior's tall-tale virility, Allwit's preening wittoldry, the Kixes' fighting and reconciling. The protagonist is Cheapside life. The play combines densely specified Jacobean London rejoicing in sophisticated urban gamesmanship with figures and action from Roman comedy (the outwitted old father, the witty servant) and from folk tradition. From folk tale come the childless couple, numskull brother, clever wench (both the Wench with the child and Susan), the motif of the biter bit, and above all the tricksters. Touchwood Junior tricks Yellowhammer with a ring; Allwit and the Wench trick the Promoters; Sir Walter tricks Tim into marrying a 'whore'; Touchwood Senior tricks Sir Oliver with a potion; a series of tricks spirit Moll away. Aptly for a world of trickery and false appearance, over seventy speeches are delivered as asides. Surprise and reversal of expectation abound. Touchwood Senior's sober encomium to companionate marriage is followed by his confessing he has got seven women pregnant in three weeks. The Wench's pitiful 'thou hast undone me' yields to her revealing that she accuses various men of fathering her infant(s), and she abandons her baby. Yellowhammer's shock at hearing of Sir Walter's turpitude yields to his remarks on his own bastard. Early reversals undercut seemingly virtuous characters; late-play repentances and changes of heart continue the campaign of surprise—though in late play, too, comes the sudden revelation of cold ruthlessness underlying Allwit's wife's bovine complacency.

Mecca of tricksters, London springs to life, with its wharfs, steeples, guildhalls, gutters. Middleton began writing Lord Mayor's shows the year Chaste Maid was first acted; to The Triumphs of Truth, Chaste Maid is almost an anti-pageant, exposing London at its worst. As Gail Paster argues, civic pageants and city comedy exemplify laus (praise) and vituperatio (blame), idealization in the one just as hyperbolic as cynicism in the other (Idea). The city's moral status is slippery: the comedies' exposés of city wickedness shade off into celebration of city sophistication. Middleton avoids the city-bashing of pastoral writers to whom the countryside is a repository of simplicity and virtue: his Wench and Welsh gentlewoman are as corrupt and street-wise as the canniest Londoners.

Street-smartness is itself a primary value, and scorn is heaped on its converse, university education.

The play offers a textbook example of Gayle Rubin's 'Traffic in Women'. In a nexus of money and sex, Allwit exchanges his wife for material comforts; Sir Walter values Moll for her dowry; Lady Kix's pregnancy has cash value. Like other misers of both gold and women (Shakespeare's Shylock, Spenser's Malbecco), Yellowhammer locks up his daughter 'as carefully as my gold', and equates elopement with theft, with daughter-stealing (3.1.41-3, 1.1.207). London was already one of the world's great commercial cities; Heywood's If You Know Not Me, You Know Nobody, Part 2 (1605) renders mythic the founding of the Royal Exchange. Yet there is something fishy about Chaste Maid's financial world. Though commercial and sexual value operated on a gold standard—a chaste maiden was proverbially 'a girl worth gold'—the opening scene in a goldsmith's shop reveals a world of shifting and shifty value. Moll's love affair involves a commercial transaction over a ring, and is juxtaposed with a transaction involving a gold chain. Though goldsmiths sell, for money, objects fashioned from gold, here a gentleman tries to sell a goldsmith already-fashioned jewellery for money. That his first business in the play is assessing jewellery to be melted down gives Yellowhammer the air less of a respectable artisan than of a pawnbroker or even a fence. This erosion of the play's gold standard (abetted by talk of counterfeiting) may reflect on Moll's chastity too. The shopkeeper's formula 'What is't you lack?' (1.1.100) is apt for a consumer society—not having everything is construed as lack; but this gentleman lacks not goods but money. In a play in which much is consumed, the consumer society creates not wealth but lack. The absence from the play of those city-comedy favourites, prostitutes, bawds, and usurers, alerts us to the fact that it locates its marketed sex not in the streets but within marriage, while the complement of marketed sex, usurers' grasping materialism, here resides within the respectable milieu of shopkeepers and tradesmen.

The early modern shift to a money-based from a land-based economy habituated the mind to abstraction, a disappearance of the material that is like consumption. The gentleman values his chain at 100 pounds, residually a measure of weight; Yellowhammer offers 100 marks, a currency whose value was set by the government. In inscription-value money, as in language, abstract signs represent material reality (Marc Shell, Jean-Joseph Goux). Chaste Maid associates deceptive words with counterfeit coins: 'Has no attorney's clerk been here o'late | And changed his half-crown piece his mother sent him, | Or rather cozened you with a gilded twopence, | To bring the word in fashion?' (1.1.30-3). The many sexual puns are a sort of counterfeiting—a respectable word turns out to have a filthy meaning, like a gilded tuppence. Like Freud, the play associates money with sexuality: money, sex, and language are weirdly interchangeable. Sir Walter transmits English to his mistress through intercourse, like a venereal disease, and also turns her into gold (1.1.105-7);

Tim labours to beget an epitaph (5.2.22); a man is to 'utter all' on his wedding night (5.4.48)—'utter' could mean to speak, to ejaculate sexually, to sell in the market, or to pass counterfeit money. 'Metaphors are words exchanged for other words' (Allen Hoey), and the play's similes often represent monetary exchange. The Welsh counterfeit virgin's fortune 'shine[s] like [her] bright trade', the simile exchanging 'fortune' for prostitution; Moll, 'like a mermaid', may be 'sold to fishwives' (1.1.108; 4.4.30-1).

Of one of Moll's several threats to die, Maudline scoffs, 'You that have tricks can counterfeit' (4.4.26); acting a part was a counterfeit coining. John Vernon's theory that similar mental operations underpin accepting money (as the equivalent of labour or goods) and accepting a realistic fiction as empirical reality works well here. Dense local reference creates 'realism'; but it takes a mentality habituated to accepting money as a signifier to find 'realistic' this outrageous plot, these extravagant caricatures. Whorehound's name specifies his character; yet meaning, transparent to the audience, is opaque to the characters, an impression of realism paid for in counterfeit coin. In the funeral scene, the play slips its mask, metatheatrically trumpeting its own extravagant artifice; here 'play' as acting and 'play' as game intersect. The playwright has been playing with us. An audience that believes in money will believe in anything. The final trick is on us, for finding in the play a realistic London.

England's grand market-place, London lives by exchange. Yellowhammer, making a ring, is one of only a few characters who perform work, or add labour value to an object; the porter and watermen ply their trade, but it is conveyance, not production: this is a world of middlemen, not producers. Allwit has quit work and lives by exchanging his wife; the Welsh gentlewoman exchanges her body as a mistress and later a wife. The gentry live off inheritance. Here is no green world, no contact with a world where food, cloth, metal are produced. And the market-place was changing, from an open area of communal life to a set of private shops, the commercial equivalent of the increasingly interiorized abstracting mind, unlike the more community-oriented medieval personality. This play about antisocial selfishness opens in a private shop, and satirizes both Puritans and acquisitive bourgeoisie. The Puritan ideal of knowing God by 'inner light', which helped interiorize the personality, risked a tendency to selfishness, to disregard of community and even family. The language of material exchange structured even spiritual life: Sir Walter repents that he has 'exchanged [his] soul' for sexual pleasure (5.1.81). The selfish greed of the ideal capitalist citizen is Cheapside's foremost trait.

The exchange system included brokered marriages. A Moll/Sir Walter match would give a merchant family gentility and a gentleman money. Tim's marriage is supposed to give a bourgeois family land. The Civil War was only a generation off, and much class tension simmers in Middleton's plays. In Chaste Maid citizens acquire gentlemen's possessions (the Allwits keep the booty that has helped to bankrupt Sir Walter) and a lewd knight consorts with a citizen's wife. Allwit thinks merchants live largely at the expense of 'prodigal heirs' (1.2.44). Servants, too, figure in class tensions: Allwit's and Sir Oliver's servants satirize their masters. Sometimes lower classes speak for the common decency their 'betters' neglect: the watermen call Maudline 'cruel'; Susan, 'made of pity', helps the lovers (3.3.29). But the money-mindedness and self-interest infecting various classes in the play erode class distinctions. And the play itself was commercial, part of a lucrative entertainment industry; Chaste Maid's language/money equation points to the drama's own embeddedness in the market (see Douglas Bruster).

Sexual profligacy, part of the popular stereotype of gentlemen, does not disqualify Sir Walter or the 'decayed gentleman' Touchwood Senior from gentility in characters' eyes. Allwit's wittoldry, however, threatens to drop him out of the respectable middle class: 'he's but one pip above a servingman' (1.2.67-8). In a patriarchal society, a husband's abdication of sexual rights was the most contemptible of failings; our own marital climate, less patriarchal, may obscure for us how anti-ideological is Allwit's behaviour. The ubiquitous Renaissance cuckold jokes remind us how deep ran concerns about patriarchal authority and familial legitimacy—seriously disrupted by the Allwits and Kixes.

In the Renaissance, water imagery conventionally attended concupiscible passions—lust, gluttony, acquisitiveness (as in Spenser's Faerie Queene, book 2). The prominence of the latter passions in Chaste Maid makes logical its association of concupiscence with liquids. As Gail Paster shows, the play's permeable females drink too much, talk loosely, cry copiously, are sexually loose, and wet themselves ('Leaky Vessels'). The ideal woman was a sealed container, letting no drink or semen in, no tears, talk, or urine out. One index of Moll's chastity is that, like a 'good' woman in patriarchal ideology, she speaks little: when upset she cries 'O death'; when happy she murmurs 'I am silent with delight' (5.4.49). (Even the contemptuous term 'baggage', seven times applied to her, suggests a container.) Renaissance men were to go out to work, women to work in the house, reflecting the container metaphor; men were to make money, women to conserve through household thrift. (Women who worked in shops—often in the same premises as their homes—are a frequent source of male sexual anxiety in city comedies.) Paster thinks the pervasive images of female leakiness reflect cultural anxiety about women's potential for disrupting the protocapitalist system through spending rather than conserving. Male sexuality too is expressed in liquids: Touchwood Senior's 'water' or semen, or the name 'Walter'—pronounced 'Water'—for a lewd gentleman. In the usual way of gender ideology, female liquidity represents leakiness, while male liquidity spells potency.

That the lovers' break for freedom leads naturally to the river is a hint that London mirrors the human body. The Thames is the city's 'master-vein' which 'shoots from the heart' (3.1.16): 'blood' (that is, lust) naturally seeks it.

Escape (from a household, from restraint) leads to lower ground and flowing water, associated with sex and with urine and excrement: Puddle Wharf, where horses left puddles, and Dung Wharf, where garbage was loaded on to barges, are to the city what urethra and anus are to the body. Yellowhammer tries to make his house a sealed-up vagina; Allwit's house in its fecundity and gluttony is womb and mouth. Though called 'the heart of the city' (1.1.101-2), Cheapside, home to grocers and butchers, is more the mouth of London: gustatory and sexual consumption proceed unchecked even in Lent.

This Lenten play is set in a meat market. 1613, when the play was first acted, saw one of the strictest Lents ever: the harvest had failed and meat was severely restricted. Yet a spirit of pre-Lent carnival pervades the play, recalling Bruegel's painting The Battle of Carnival and Lent. In Chaste Maid, Carnival seems to be winning. Mikhail Bakhtin shows how in carnival's topsy-turvydom, lower-body functions—eating, sex, urination, excretion—overwhelm the upper body's emotional, spiritual, and intellectual concerns. The play's main emotional tie, between the lovers, is openly sexual. Advocates of spiritual life, Puritans, are seen tipling, pilfering food, and lusting, and a parson leers 'I'll not be long | A-clapping you together' (3.1.8-9). Intellectual life is reduced to Tim and his tutor, a move which uncrowns the university. The outfitting of the Promoters who enforce Lenten laws is a carnivalesque subversion of obnoxious authority, as is the inversion wherein servants speak for common decency. Language is topsy-turvy: learned, cerebral Latin is translated into Anglo-Saxon monosyllables belonging to the lower body: parentibus becomes 'a pair of boots'; fertur becomes 'farts' (1.1.71, 4.1.114-16). The frank talk of sex, eating, excreting is also carnivalesque; improprieties are 'unofficial elements of speech, ... liberated from norms, hierarchies, and prohibitions of established idiom' (Bakhtin); as Susan Wells notes, satirists like Middleton 'were claiming a similar right to free speech'. Carnival expressed class tensions; but it had also traditionally comprised a festive world where a community celebrated together, and Middleton's invoking it exposes poignantly the breakdown of communality in this savagely self-centred society.

Meat-smuggling, conspicuous consumption at the baptism, gold jewellery, Allwit's orgasmic inventories of his goods—all paint brilliantly a consumer society, which finally consumes even people. Women are 'mutton'. Puritan brethren are 'consumed' (3.2.48). And a whiff of cannibalism attends the baby smuggled under meat, a prophetic glimpse of Swift's world, where a baby born poor might as well be eaten as starve. For all its scorching satire, the play's values are hard to pinpoint. No character 'sets a moral standard' (David Richman). Not even Moll: she bears a criminal name, is not put off by her lover's filthy talk, keeps trying to elope; and one can hardly serve as the play's moral centre who speaks so few lines—a total of forty-seven in the play, less than a third of the lines even of the witless Tim. Only four of Moll's speeches are more than one line long. This title figure is sketchily characterized, and though silence was linked to chastity, she could easily be staged as a sulky teenager or even an oversexed bimbo. People triumph at the end 'not because they are good but because they are clever intriguers' (Parker). 'Only Sir Walter is thoroughly penitent, and only Sir Walter is thoroughly crushed' (Alexander Leggatt); the scapegoating of Sir Walter, who siphons off the others' guilt, screams out the absence of poetic justice. Stephen Wigler sees Allwit/Touchwood Senior and Whorehound as Jungian 'splits', with Allwit/Touchwood the infantile self, given creature comforts and taking no responsibility for children fathered, and Whorehound the adult self which (however lewd) accepts family responsibility. This being so, the outcome conspicuously fails to valorize adult values: sympathetic figures 'live as if there were no tomorrow'; Sir Walter, who 'provide[s] carefully for the next day', is annihilated. Adultery is rewarded: for Lady Kix's adultery, the Kixes receive what they wanted: a baby, an inheritance, a reputation as a man for Sir Oliver. The lack of a moral centre, the 'starless ensemble character' of the action (Altieri), the reversals which keep us off balance, foster a decentredness congenial to our post-modern climate.

The play's treatment of women is mixed. Some speakers who paint women as commodities, property, food, as extravagant, sexually loose, leaky, gluttonous, or garrulous are being satirized for their attitudes, but the women's behaviour allows some charges to stick. The christening party is a fine example of the 'gossips' meeting' genre, a traditional male-authored vehicle for antifeminist comment, as is the schooling of a young woman by an older, with frank talk of men and sex, which opens the play (Woodbridge). The allusion to cosmetics' disgusting ingredients (3.2.53-4) belongs to an ancient misogynistic topos. Partly because literature lacked similar topos for criticizing the male sex, the vices and follies of individual male characters tend not to be generalized to the male sex as a whole; generalizations about women at 1.1.36, 3.2.62-3, 3.2.203, and 5.4.15-16 find no counterpart in generalizations about males. Education was closed to most women, and Latin a male preserve; but Latinless women (Maudline, the Welsh gentlewoman) are still scorned. Moll can be bought and sold in marriage by parents who own her, but no one criticizes patriarchy; it may be 'not the system going wrong here but Moll's despicably bad parents'. We see nothing of Allwit's wife's feelings about her prostituted state, and the text 'makes us regret that Allwit is not more of a patriarchal male' (Ingrid Hotz-Davies). On the positive side, the play has an extraordinary number of female characters—twenty-one out of fifty-four or fifty-five. As is very rare in Shakespeare, a woman speaks the opening lines. Unlike the contemporary Triumphs of Truth which opens with an idealized Mother London, Chaste Maid is hard on mothers (Maudline, Allwit's wife, Lady Kix, the Wench), but at least (unlike many Shakespeare plays) it has mothers. In a play valuing street-smartness, women are among the most successful tricksters: the

Notions of masculinity are unstable. Allwit abdicates conventional masculinity in not locking up his wife or exhibiting patriarchal dynastic concern. Such potential feminism is presented as an erosion of masculinity, as is his 'cotqueanish', unmanly interest in domestic furnishings; yet the character's sheer theatrical appeal subverts any easy pronouncements about patriarchy. Though Allwit's neglect of jealousy may undermine his masculinity, Sir Walter's rigorous jealousy does not make him a model male, nor does his sexual potency, which is presented as mere lewdness, though Touchwood Senior's priapism is treated with good-humoured indulgence, combining with his trickery to produce a near-magical figure of male potency. Manly Touchwood Senior is bereft of worldly goods, while those most prosperous are deficient in conventional masculinity—Yellowhammer the outwitted father, Allwit the wittol/cotquean, Sir Oliver the impotent. Critical of his society's materialism, Middleton did not define masculinity in terms of material success. Nor of violence: the one instance of physical aggression—the duel—ends with both parties severely wounded and nothing settled in the way of respective masculinity. Though women are mocked for ignorance, Tim's foolishness and the irrelevance of Latin disputation to practical life undermine intellectual prowess as a bulwark of masculinity. The one context where formation of masculine identity could have been explored, Tim's coming-of-age, treats the issue flippantly. And to the extent that a patriarchy depends on certainty of paternity, in Cheapside the state totters.

In a world lacking manual labour, sex role distinctions are diminished. Living by exchange, trickery, and inheritance rather than by productive labour destabilizes gender roles. Antifeminism and uncertainty about masculinity are both symptoms of that potentially fruitful (though locally uncomfortable) instability.

Reflecting fluid boundaries of social class, the play's versification effaces the common distinction in which lower orders speak prose. Allwit's servants, the Kixes' maid, the Wet Nurse, Wench, Watermen, even the Promoters speak verse. The verse/prose boundary is fluid too, with prose heavily rhythmic while verse is angular and unmetrical, with irregular syllable counts, and with many anapaests and feminine endings. The racy, colloquial effect resembles the 'strong lines' of contemporary John Donne. Despite its jaunty, prosy air, Chaste Maid is Middleton's only city comedy mainly in verse.

Exploring the play's intricate structure, Richard Levin notes four sexual triangles of two men and one woman: in the Touchwood Junior/Moll/Sir Walter triangle, the elder Yellowhammers labour to prevent a marriage and fail, but later accept it; in the Tim/Welsh gentlewoman/Sir Walter triangle, they promote a marriage and succeed, but later regret it. (Moll's dowry of £2,000 in gold symbolizes her virtue; the Welsh gentlewoman's imaginary two thousand runts, her vacuum of virtue. Moll sings a piteous, sentimental song, the Welsh gentlewoman a bawdy one.)

The Allwits/Sir Walter triangle and the Kixes/Touchwood Senior triangle involve a long-married couple and cuckolding man. The Kixes have been married seven years with no child; Sir Walter has kept Allwit's wife for seven years, with seven children. The first marriage displays true affection despite scrapping; the second is sordid, a business arrangement. (Levin's scheme neglects the Touchwood Seniors/Wench triangle.) The brilliant dovetailing of five plots is a tour de force even in an age revelling in multiple plots, yet 'the play never sprawls under the weight of its abundance' (Samuel Schoenbaum). An adaptation of ancient 'ring composition' can be glimpsed in the parallel between the first and last scenes, between 2.1 and 3.3, and elsewhere. The play also twins scenes: one illegitimate baby elaborately christened, another ingeniously abandoned; Allwit and Touchwood Senior both uttering soliloquies praising the married state in circumstances undercutting the praise; hypocritical promoters drooling over the flesh they confiscate, hypocritical Puritans professing spirituality while succumbing to animal appetites.

There are no definite sources but several close analogues (see R. C. Bald). The fertility-potion plot recalls Machiavelli's Mandragola and Andrea Calmo's La Potione. Allwit resembles the wittol in Mateo Aleman's Guzman de Alfarache, and his soliloquy echoes (at one point verbatim) Thomas Campion's Observations in the Art of English Poesie. The christening scenes may be indebted to The Bachelor's Banquet, a translation of the antifeminist Le Quinze joies de mariage, although lore of guzzling gossips was widespread. The Wench's baby trick may echo an event reported in an anonymous pamphlet of 1613, though such tricks (often involving country wenches duping shrewd cockneys) are common in ballads. The lamb/baby trick, the couple impoverished by too many children, the juxtaposition of tricksters with a central Christian festival, the alliance of a married couple (the Allwits) for trickery, recall the Wakefield cycle's Second Shepherd's Play; the guild plays' volatile mix of religious sobriety, socio-political shrewdness, and merry hi-jinks may have contributed to the tone of Middleton's city comedies. It is fitting that The Second Shepherd's Play, the first English double-plot play, has some relationship to one of the best English multiple-plot plays, Chaste Maid.

The play was first acted at the Swan Theatre by Lady Elizabeth's Men, probably augmented (to handle the many female roles) by the Queen's Revels boys, for whom Middleton had written earlier city comedies. The action and language of Chaste Maid undercut Alfred Harbage's theory of the uplifting influence of public theatre audiences. After its Jacobean performances, the full play was not staged again (to our knowledge) until 1938, perhaps because too bawdy, but the bawdy later twentieth century has seen many revivals, the majority at universities. (The revenge of Tim?) The first modern professional revival, William Gaskill's at the Royal Court Theatre in London in 1966, was variously reviewed as a justly neglected 'filthy farce' and as a 'bawdy, realistic, and brilliantly directed comedy of Jacobean London' (Parker). Chaste Maid has been produced oftener than any Middleton play except The Changeling and The Revenger's Tragedy (Marilyn Roberts). Modern productions often cut the promoters and many topical references; but those retaining the topical have found audiences responsive to the densely realized urban world, however unfamiliar the place-names. The play will have a stage future as long as audiences can respond to wit, trickery, brilliant plotting, infectious cynicism, and sheer vitality. It still bids us, in Maudline's words, 'Draw near and taste the welcome of the city'.

I. I [Incipit] Actus Primus
Enter Maudline and Moll, a shop being discovered MAUDLINE Have you played over all your old lessons o' the virginals?
MOLL Yes.
MAUDLINE Yes? You are a dull maid o' late; methinks
5 you had need have somewhat to quicken your green sickness. Do you weep? A husband. Had not such a piece of flesh been ordained, what had us wives been good for? To make salads, or else cried up and down for samphire. To see the difference of these seasons! When I was of your youth, I was lightsome, and quick, two years before I was married. You, fit for a knight's bed!

Drowsy-browed, dull-eyed, drossy-sprited. I hold my life you have forgot your dancing. When was the dancer with you?

MOLL
The last week.

Title Possible pun on 'chaste': (a) sexually pure; (b) chased (Moll is pursued by two suitors and—in three elopement attempts—by her parents; with a possible suggestion of prostitutes 'chased' behind carts as a punishment). The echo effect between 'chaste maid' and 'Cheapside' sets the one against the other, suggesting that Cheapside is a difficult place in which to stay chaste. The title may well be meant to sound oxymoronic, like Honest Whore. Cheapside was the market district, the word coming from the Anglo-Saxon ceap meaning 'market'.
I. I. O. 2 Maudline Derived from pictures of the weeping Mary Magdalene (a reformed prostitute), the name suggested tearful sentimentality and a shady past.

Moll pet form of Mary. Though 'Mary' brings to mind the Virgin, Moll was a traditional name for a prostitute or criminal's companion (see 2.2.69).
discovered revealed
2 virginals small, harpsichord-like instrument, with a suggestion of 'virgin', or chaste maid
5 quicken bring life to; suggests pregnancy
5-6 green sickness anemia in young women; unfocused sexual desire 8 make salads become salads (associated with impropriety because highly seasoned; also, women without men are like green salads without meat)

cried up and down shouted by sellers up and down the street 9 samphire herb provoking urine and desire for meat seasons times, ages
10 lightsome graceful, merry; with a suggestion of 'sexually easy' quick lively, ready to act; with a suggestion of 'pregnant' 12 drossy-sprited scummy-spirited
13 dancing Though dancing and musicianship were genteel accomplishments, teachers of dancing and music often had sex with their pupils in popular tales and plays; 'dancing' was slang for sexual intercourse.

- 15 MAUDLINE Last week! When I was of your bord,
He missed me not a night; I was kept at it;
I took delight to learn, and he to teach me;
Pretty brown gentleman, he took pleasure in my company;
But you are dull, nothing comes nimbly from you,
20 You dance like a plumber's daughter, and deserve
Two thousand pound in lead to your marriage,
And not in goldsmith's ware.
Enter Yellowhammer
YELLOWHAMMER Now, what's the din betwixt mother and daughter, ha?
- 25 MAUDLINE Faith, small; telling your daughter Mary of her errors.
YELLOWHAMMER
Errors? Nay, the city cannot hold you, wife,
But you must needs fetch words from Westminster.
I ha' done, i'faith!—
30 Has no attorney's clerk been here o'late
And changed his half-crown piece his mother sent him,
Or rather cozened you with a gilded twopence,
To bring the word in fashion for her faults
Or cracks in duty and obedience?
35 Term 'em e'en so, sweet wife.
As there is no woman made without a flaw,
Your purest lawns have frays, and cambrics bracks.
MAUDLINE
But 'tis a husband solders up all cracks.
- MOLL
What, is he come, sir?
YELLOWHAMMER Sir Walter's come:
He was met at Holborn bridge, and in his company 40
A proper fair young gentlewoman, which I guess
By her red hair and other rank descriptions
To be his landed niece brought out of Wales,
Which Tim our son, the Cambridge boy, must marry.
'Tis a match of Sir Walter's own making, 45
To bind us to him and our heirs for ever.
MAUDLINE
We are honoured then, if this baggage would be humble
And kiss him with devotion when he enters.
I cannot get her for my life
To instruct her hand thus, before and after— 50
Which a knight will look for—before and after.
I have told her still, 'tis the waving of a woman
Does often move a man and prevails strongly.
But, sweet, ha' you sent to Cambridge?
Has Tim word on't? 55
YELLOWHAMMER Had word just the day after, when you sent him the silver spoon to eat his broth in the hall amongst the gentlemen commoners.
MAUDLINE O, 'twas timely.
Enter Porter
YELLOWHAMMER How now? 60
PORTER
A letter from a gentleman in Cambridge.

- 15–18 When... company The whole description of tutelage is sexually suggestive.
- 15 bord bore, calibre (with indecent implication); condition
- 18 brown dark-skinned or tanned, or brunette. Possibly suggests an Italian dancing master, drawing on stereotypes of lascivious Italians.
- 21 to your marriage a reference to the dowry ('to' means 'for')
- 22 goldsmith's ware i.e., gold
- 22.1 Yellowhammer (a) slang for a gold coin; (b) contemptuous term for a jealous husband (here extended to a protective father). He plays the conventional role of the senex iratus, angry old man who opposes his child's marital choice in favour of another suitor. Making him a goldsmith may be revenge—a money-lending goldsmith took Middleton to court four years before the play was first acted.
- 27 Errors To Yellowhammer a word with the aura of the law courts with their writs of error, or perhaps of chivalric romance, seems out of place in Goldsmith's Row.
the city The city mentioned so often in Jacobean comedy was both London and the realm of commercial enterprise as opposed to the country, the court, the church, or the university; the city was both a geographical location and a state of mind.
- 28 hold contain; also, keep from speaking
- 28 must needs feel driven to
- Westminster the law court district
- 31 half-crown piece French crowns were in circulation in England, as well as English crowns and half crowns; the crown was worth five shillings.
- 32 cozened cheated
- twopence silver coin worth two pence. The half-crown piece would have been worth about 15 times as much, and, since the twopence was much smaller, only a fool would have mistaken even a gilded half-crown for a twopence.
- 33 the word i.e., 'errors'. The clerk palms off counterfeit words as if they were of the mother tongue, as he fobs off a counterfeit coin as a gold piece given him by his mother. Attorneys are seen as purveyors of deceptive language or hifalutin jargon.
- 37 Your... frays proverbial
- lawns pieces of fine linen, resembling cambric
- frays frayed or worn away places
- cambrics fine white linens, originally made at Cambray in Flanders
- bracks flaws in cloth
- 38 solders up all cracks mends all character
- 40 Holborn bridge crossing the Fleet ditch on the main road from Wales into London via Newgate
- 42 red hair apparently a sign of Welshness; could also suggest sexual looseness
- rank descriptions signifiers of high social standing; with a suggestion of rankness or lustfulness
- 44 Tim sometimes a term of abuse
- 47 baggage impertinent wench, good-for-nothing woman (referring to Moll)
- 52 waving with an affected gesture, perhaps demure or coy face fanning; suggestion of changing capriciously, said in this period to be a feminine flirting tactic
- 58 gentlemen commoners undergraduates whose wealth entitled them to dine apart from poorer students (they also wore different academic dress and paid higher fees). At Cambridge these were actually called 'pensioners'—Middleton's use of the Oxford term may recall his own student days at Oxford, an affiliation which helps account for his making witless Tim a student at Oxford's rival university.
- 61 letter the first of an unusually large number of stage properties in the play

- YELLOWHAMMER
O, one of Hobson's porters: thou art welcome!
I told thee Maud, we should hear from Tim. [He reads]
Amantissimis carissimisque ambobus parentibus patri et 65 matri.
MAUDLINE What's the matter?
YELLOWHAMMER
Nay, by my troth, I know not; ask not me:
He's grown too verbal, this learning is a great witch.
MAUDLINE
Pray, let me see it; I was wont to understand him.
70 Amantissimis carissimis: he has sent the carrier's man, he says; ambobus parentibus: for a pair of boots; Patri et matri: pay the porter or it makes no matter.
PORTER Yes, by my faith, mistress! There's no true construction in that; I have took a great deal of pains and 75 come from the Bell sweating. Let me come to't, for I was a scholar forty years ago. 'Tis thus, I warrant you:
Matri: it makes no matter; ambobus parentibus: for a pair of boots; patri: pay the porter: amantissimis carissimis: 80 he's the carrier's man, and his name is Sims. And there he says true, forsooth; my name is Sims indeed. I have not forgot all my learning. A money matter; I thought
I should hit on't.
YELLOWHAMMER Go, thou art an old fox! [He gives him money] There's a tester for thee.
85 PORTER If I see your worship at Goose Fair, I have a dish of birds for you.
YELLOWHAMMER Why, dost dwell at Bow?
- PORTER All my lifetime, sir; I could ever say boo to a goose!
Farewell to your worship. Exit
YELLOWHAMMER A merry porter! 90
MAUDLINE How can he choose but be so, coming with Cambridge letters from our son Tim?
YELLOWHAMMER What's here? [He reads] Maximus diligo?
Faith, I must to my learned counsel with this gear, 'twill 95 ne'er be discerned else.
MAUDLINE
Go to my cousin, then, at Inns of Court.
YELLOWHAMMER
Fie, they are all for French; they speak no Latin.
MAUDLINE
The parson then will do it.
Enter a Gentleman with a chain
YELLOWHAMMER Nay, he disclaims it,
Calls Latin 'papistry'; he will not deal with it.
What is't you lack, gentleman?
GENTLEMAN Pray, weigh this chain. 100
[Yellowhammer weighs chain]
Enter Sir Walter Whorehound, Welsh Gentlewoman, and Davy Dahumma
SIR WALTER
Now, wench, thou art welcome to the heart
Of the city of London.
WELSH GENTLEWOMAN Duw cato chwi.
SIR WALTER
You can thank me in English, if you list.
WELSH GENTLEWOMAN
I can, sir, simply.
- 62 Hobson's Cambridge carrier, or hauling and message company. Hobson's porters were comic types in the jest book 'The Pleasant Conceits of Old Hobson'.
64-5 Amantissimis...matri 'to mother and father, both my most loving and beloved parents' (Latin)
66 What's the matter? what does this mean? or, what is wrong?
68 verbal verbose witch bewitcher. To Yellowhammer, the Latin sounds like an incantation.
69 Pray I pray thee; i.e., please was wont to used to 70 man employee
72 matter sense
73-4 true construction accurate translation
75 the Bell an inn frequented by Cambridge messengers come to't have a try at translating it 82 hit on't understand it
84 tester sixpence
85-7 Goose Fair...Bow a fair at London suburb Stratford-le-Bow featuring young geese; 'goose' also meant fool or whore, and 'bow' could mean 'pudendum'. The Porter's saying 'boo to a goose' puns on 'Bow'; 'boo' was probably pronounced 'bo'.
85-6 dish of birds a serving of loose women 88 ever always
- say boo to a goose proverbial; 'boo' means to shout at or shoo away
89 worship form of address in deference to social superior
93 Maximus diligo Tim's error for either the Latin Maxime diligo, 'I love very greatly', or maxima diligo, 'I choose the greatest'
94 counsel attorney gear business
95 discerned made sense of
96 Inns of Court where lawyers were educated in London
97 Fie mild exclamation of disapproval or disagreement
French Inns of Court students used law-French; also, hints at French pox (syphilis)
99 papistry hostile term for Roman Catholicism, with its Latin mass
100 What...lack shopkeeper's formula, similar to 'May I help you?'
weigh this chain Gentlemen often wore gold chains, and often (owing to their dicing, wenching, and extravagant tailoring) had to sell them to stay afloat financially, an emblem of the gentry's loss of wealth and power to merchant-class citizens like Yellowhammer.
100.2 Sir Walter Whorehound 'Walter', related to 'wallow', suggests gross de-
- light in sensuality. It can also mean 'overthrow', which hints at the character's final comeuppance. Pronounced 'water', it ties in with the play's pervasive imagery of liquids. 'Whorehound' means a chaser after whores, but 'water horehound' was also a plant that grew in moist places—its connection with deceptive practices is appropriate to the character.
100.3 Davy Dahumma 'Dahumma' is a phonetic spelling of the Welsh dewch yma, 'come hither'; 'man' means manservant.
101 wench a term of affection which, because of its implications of lower social class and of intimacy, Sir Walter does not address to the Welsh Gentlewoman in front of those who know nothing of their relationship. Sir Walter and the Welsh Gentlewoman are conversing apart, unheard by the Yellowhammer family.
101-2 heart...London Cheapside lay in the heart of the city. That this is said while a gold chain is being weighed suggests that London has a heart of gold, in the sense that trade is the essence of the City.
102 Duw...chwi God be with you (Welsh)
103 list like

- SIR WALTER 'Twill serve to pass, wench; And kiss with trembling thighs. Yet see, she comes,
105 'Twas strange that I should lie with thee so often sir. 125
To leave thee without English; that were unnatural.
I bring thee up to turn thee into gold, wench,
And make thy fortune shine like your bright trade;
A goldsmith's shop sets out a city maid.
Davy Dahumma, not a word!
- 110 DAVY Mum, mum, sir.
SIR WALTER [to the Welsh Gentlewoman]
Here you must pass for a pure virgin.
DAVY [aside] Pure Welsh virgin!
She lost her maidenhead in Brecknockshire.
SIR WALTER
I hear you mumble, Davy.
DAVY I have teeth, sir;
115 I need not mumble yet this forty years.
SIR WALTER [aside]
The knave bites plaguily!
YELLOWHAMMER [to Gentleman]
What's your price, sir?
GENTLEMAN A hundred pound, sir.
YELLOWHAMMER
A hundred marks the utmost; 'tis not for me else.
What, Sir Walter Whorehound? [Exit Gentleman]
MOLL O death! [Exit]
MAUDLINE Why, daughter!
120 Faith, the baggage!
[To Sir Walter] A bashful girl, sir; these young things are shamefaced;
Besides, you have a presence, sweet Sir Walter,
Able to daunt a maid brought up i' the city:
Enter Moll
A brave court-spirit makes our virgins quiver
- SIR WALTER Why, how now, pretty mistress? Now I have caught
you.
What, can you injure so your time to stray
Thus from your faithful servant?
YELLOWHAMMER
Pish, stop your words, good knight—'twill make her blush else—
Which sound too high for the daughters of the freedom. 130
'Honour' and 'faithful servant'! They are compliments
For the worthies of Whitehall or Greenwich;
E'en plain, sufficient, subsidy words serves us, sir.
And is this gentlewoman your worthy niece?
SIR WALTER
You may be bold with her on these terms; 'tis she, sir, 135
Heir to some nineteen mountains.
YELLOWHAMMER Bless us all!
You overwhelm me, sir, with love and riches.
SIR WALTER
And all as high as Paul's.
DAVY [aside] Here's work, i'faith!
SIR WALTER How sayest thou, Davy?
DAVY
Higher, sir, by far; you cannot see the top of 'em. 140
YELLOWHAMMER
What, man! Maudline, salute this gentlewoman,
Our daughter if things hit right.
Enter Touchwood Junior
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR [aside]
My knight, with a brace of footmen,

105-6 'Twas... English i.e., it would be strange if I had slept with you so often and left you without knowing English
107 turn... gold recalls Rumpelstiltskin's turning straw into gold. The play's talk of 'gold' more often than 'money' has a folk-tale resonance.
108 your may be impersonal, i.e., 'one's', thus referring to any lucrative trade; or may be personal, referring to her trade as 'whore'
109 A goldsmith's... maid serves as a foil to, heightening her attractiveness. May mean that as fiancée of a goldsmith's son the Welsh Gentlewoman will be 'set out' in the city, or may refer to Moll, whose city life has given her advantages over the Welsh Gentlewoman; in either case, 'sets out' suggests wares displayed for sale.
110 Mum i.e., I will keep silent
111 pass for a pure virgin Phrasing appropriate to supposed pure gold, this injunction gestures toward the play's counterfeiting motif.
113 Brecknockshire county in Wales

116 plaguily vexatiously
118 marks a mark was two-thirds of a pound
119 O death! Why Moll cries 'O death!' and exits is unclear. The scene could be played so that she overhears Sir Walter's private conversation with the Welsh Gentlewoman which her father is too distracted by customers to hear; or she could suffer revulsion against the appearance or demeanor of her husband-to-be, or simply be upset at his arrival because she is already in love with Touchwood Junior. Why she re-enters voluntarily four lines later is also obscure.
121 shamefaced shy; modest
124 court-spirit one accustomed to life at court
128 your faithful servant Sir Walter speaks the conventional language of courtly love; Jacobean comedy, however, regularly debases key terms of courtly love so that 'servant' comes to mean 'illicit lover'.
129 Pish expression of impatience

130 the freedom those licensed to practise trade in London
131 'Honour' Sir Walter has not actually used this word.
132 worthies persons of note or standing
Whitehall... Greenwich royal palaces
133 subsidy fit for the bourgeois world of material goods serves are good enough for. Middleton often uses singular verbs with plural nouns.
136 mountains In Elizabethan stereotype, Wales was nearly all mountains; possible quibble on 'mountings'.
138 as high as Paul's i.e., Saint Paul's Cathedral; proverbial
141 salute greet, often with a kiss
142 hit work out
142.1 Touchwood Junior One meaning of 'touchwood' was a passionate, impulsive person. Both Touchwoods' names suggest the expression 'touch wood', living by luck.
143 brace two (usually applied to game birds)

- 145 Is come, and brought up his ewe-mutton
To find a ram at London; I must hasten it,
Or else peak o' famine; her blood's mine,
And that's the surest. Well, knight, that choice spoil
Is only kept for me.
[He whispers to Moll from behind]
- MOLL Sir?
- 150 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Turn not to me till thou mayst lawfully; it but whets my stomach, which is too sharp-set already. [Giving her a paper] Read that note carefully; keep me from suspicion still, nor know my zeal but in thy heart. Read, and send but thy liking in three words; 155 I'll be at hand to take it.
- YELLOWHAMMER [to Sir Walter] O, Tim, sir, Tim!
A poor plain boy, an university man;
Proceeds next Lent to a bachelor of art:
He will be called Sir Yellowhammer then 160 Over all Cambridge, and that's half a knight.
- MAUDLINE Please you, draw near and taste the welcome of the city, sir.
- YELLOWHAMMER
Come, good Sir Walter, and your virtuous niece here.
- SIR WALTER
'Tis manners to take kindness.
- YELLOWHAMMER Lead 'em in, wife.
- SIR WALTER
Your company, sir?
- 165 YELLOWHAMMER I'll give't you instantly.
[*Exeunt Maudline, Sir Walter,
Davy, and the Welsh Gentlewoman*]
- TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR [aside]
How strangely busy is the devil and riches!
Poor soul, kept in too hard, her mother's eye
Is cruel toward her, being kind to him.
'Twere a good mirth now to set him a-work
170 To make her wedding ring; I must about it:
Rather than the gain should fall to a stranger,
'Twas honesty in me to enrich my father.
- YELLOWHAMMER [aside]
The girl is wondrous peevish, I fear nothing
But that she's taken with some other love,
Then all's quite dashed: that must be narrowly looked to,
175 We cannot be too wary in our children.
[To Touchwood Junior] What is't you lack?
- TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR [aside to Moll]
O, nothing now; all that I wish is present.
[To Yellowhammer] I would have a wedding ring made for a gentlewoman
180 With all speed that may be.
- YELLOWHAMMER Of what weight, sir?
- TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Of some half ounce;
Stand fair and comely with the spark of a diamond.
Sir, 'twere pity to lose the least grace.
- YELLOWHAMMER
Pray, let's see it.
[He takes diamond from Touchwood Junior] Indeed, sir, 'tis a pure one. 185
- TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
So is the mistress.
- YELLOWHAMMER
Have you the wideness of her finger, sir?
- TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
Yes, sure, I think I have her measure about me.
Good faith, 'tis down; I cannot show't you,
I must pull too many things out to be certain.
190 Let me see: long, and slender, and neatly jointed;
Just such another gentlewoman that's your daughter,
sir.
- YELLOWHAMMER
And, therefore, sir, no gentlewoman.
- TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
I protest I never saw two maids handed more alike;
I'll ne'er seek farther, if you'll give me leave, sir.
- YELLOWHAMMER
If you dare venture by her finger, sir. 195

144 ewe-mutton Jacobean comedy frequently refers to sexually-available women in terms of meat, 'mutton' applying especially to aging women with much sexual experience. The play's language repeatedly connects illicit sexuality with illicit meat-eating during Lent.

145 hasten it hurry

146 peak waste away

her blood's mine i.e., she is as full of sexual desire for me as I am for her; referring to Moll, not the Welsh Gentlewoman of whom he has just been speaking

147 that's the surest i.e., the best assurance that Moll will prefer me to Sir Walter choice spoil prized acquisition or plunder, i.e., Moll

150-1 Turn...lawfully i.e., do not acknowledge our relationship until we are betrothed or married

151 stomach sexual appetite sharp-set aroused

152 paper perhaps a love letter or details of an elopement plot

154 liking (a) consent; (b) expression of sexual desire

158 Proceeds...to receives a degree as next Lent Since Tim is called a bachelor at 3.2.123 and 3.2.134, Act One must occur before Lent; Lent is first mentioned at 2.1.108.

159 Sir Yellowhammer The title 'Sir' acquired merely through taking a university degree was used with the surname only, hence making one 'half a knight'.

161 Please you if it pleases you taste the welcome an invitation to come into the Yellowhammers' private chambers for refreshment. They would have lived in the same building as the shop.

164 take kindness accept hospitality

168 him i.e., Sir Walter

169 him i.e., Yellowhammer

172 'Twas it would be father father-in-law-to-be 183 Stand i.e., standing spark a small jewel

187 measure size, with bawdy innuendo

188 down deep in my pocket; suggestion of 'flaccid'

191 that's i.e., as

192 no gentleman Moll is of the merchant class; Yellowhammer may be displaying a humility that would be good for business, or may be warning off the gentleman by implying 'don't flirt with my daughter—she isn't of your social class'.

195 venture risk, in a commercial sense

- TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Ay, and I'll 'bide all loss, sir.
 YELLOWHAMMER
 Say you so, sir? Let's see hither, girl.
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 Shall I make bold with your finger, gentlewoman?
 MOLL
 Your pleasure, sir.
 [He tries the ring on Moll's finger]
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 That fits her to a hair, sir.
 200 YELLOWHAMMER What's your posy now, sir?
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 Mass, that's true: posy? I'faith, e'en thus, sir:
 'Love that's wise
 Blinds parents' eyes.'
 YELLOWHAMMER
 How, how! If I may speak without offence, sir,
 I hold my life—
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 What, sir?
 205 YELLOWHAMMER Go to; you'll pardon me?
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 Pardon you? Ay, sir.
 YELLOWHAMMER Will you, i'faith?
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Yes, faith, I will.
 YELLOWHAMMER
 You'll steal away some man's daughter: am I near
 you?
 Do you turn aside? You gentlemen are mad wags!
 I wonder things can be so warily carried,
 210 And parents blinded so; but they're served right
 That have two eyes and wear so dull a sight.
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR [aside] Thy doom take hold of thee.
- YELLOWHAMMER
 Tomorrow noon shall show your ring well done.
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 Being so, 'tis soon. Thanks, [to Moll] and your leave, sweet gentlewoman.
 Exit
 MOLL Sir, you are welcome.
 215 [Aside] O, were I made of wishes, I went with thee.
 YELLOWHAMMER
 Come now, we'll see how the rules go within.
 MOLL [aside]
 That robs my joy; there I lose all I win. Exit Enter Davy and Allwit severally I.2
 DAVY [aside]
 Honesty wash my eyes! I have spied a wittol.
 ALLWIT
 What, Davy Dahumma? Welcome from North Wales,
 I'faith; and is Sir Walter come?
 DAVY New come to town, sir.
 ALLWIT
 In to the maids, sweet Davy, and give order
 His chamber be made ready instantly. 5
 My wife's as great as she can wallow, Davy,
 And longs for nothing but pickled cucumbers
 And his coming; and now she shall ha't, boy.
 DAVY She's sure of them, sir.
 ALLWIT
 Thy very sight will hold my wife in pleasure 10
 Till the knight come himself. Go in, in, in Davy.
 Exit [Davy]
 The founder's come to town. I am like a man
 Finding a table furnished to his hand,

196 'bide pay, if he should be wrong about the size
 197 hither here
 198 make bold be bold, by holding her finger
 199 to a hair to a tee; with bawdy suggestion of pubic hair
 200 posy verse motto inscribed inside a ring
 201 Mass by the mass (oath). 'Mass' for the eucharistic service, denounced by Reformation Protestants as a relic of papistry, survived by habit in oaths.
 203 Blinds... eyes Language of blindness and incomprehension pervades the play, related to its themes of proneness to trickery and of moral blindness.
 205 hold my life i.e., I'll wager that Go to come on 207 am I near you? do I guess your secret? (with an unintended irony in 'near': Yellowhammer himself is the man whose daughter is to be stolen away; possible unintended suggestion of 'nearly related', which they will ultimately become)
 208 wags mischievous youths

213-14 Tomorrow...soon possible allusion to proverb 'Soon enough if well enough'
 216 went would go
 217 rules revels
 I.2.0.1 Allwit all-knowing, full of wit; transposition of 'wittol', a willing cuckold severally separately
 I Honesty...eyes i.e., may clean thinking clarify my vision (he ironically attributes his identification of Allwit as a wittol to his own filthy mind). Though as Sir Walter's man, Davy knows about Allwit, the secret seems otherwise well-kept; those who believe that no material comforts could compensate for the contempt in which a wittol is held ignore the fact that (at least until Allwit tips off Yellowhammer in 4.1) no one in Cheapside knows about Allwit's cuckoldry.
 wittol a willing cuckold
 6 great far advanced in pregnancy
 wallow walk rollingly, like a sow wallowing in mud

7 pickled cucumbers Pregnancy's exotic cravings were a common theme of gynecological works and of satires on women such as Le Quinze Joies de Mariage, which often mention women's desire for dainty delicacies. That 'longs' refers to both cucumbers and Sir Walter's coming is one of the play's connotations of sex and food. Cucumbers are notably phallic.
 9 She's...them either she is sure of both the pickled cucumbers and Sir Walter's arrival, or (if the actor emphasizes 'them') she is sure of the cucumbers but Sir Walter's coming (in a sexual sense) is a matter of doubt
 12 founder's a founder is normally one who founds a charitable institution with funds to maintain it perpetually; here, one who maintains Allwit's household
 13 Finding...furnished allusion to Psalm 23, line 5: 'Thou dost prepare a table before me' (Geneva) to his hand near at hand

- As mine is still to me, prays for the founder:
 15 'Bless the right worshipful the good founder's life.'
 I thank him, he's maintained my house this ten years,
 Not only keeps my wife, but a keeps me
 And all my family. I am at his table;
 He gets me all my children, and pays the nurse
 20 Monthly or weekly; puts me to nothing, Rent, nor church-duties, not so much as the scavenger:
 The happiest state that ever man was born to!
 I walk out in a morning; come to breakfast,
 Find excellent cheer; a good fire in winter;
 25 Look in my coal-house about midsummer eve,
 That's full, five or six chaldron new laid up;
 Look in my backyard, I shall find a steeple
 Made up with Kentish faggots, which o'erlooks
 The water-house and the windmills: I say nothing, 30 But smile and pin the door. When she lies in,
 As now she's even upon the point of grunting,
 A lady lies not in like her; there's her embossings, Embroid'rings, spanglings, and I know not what,
 As if she lay with all the gaudy-shops
 35 In Gresham's Burse about her; then her restoratives, Able to set up a young pothecary,
- And richly stock the foreman of a drug-shop;
 Her sugar by whole loaves, her wines by runlets.
 I see these things, but like a happy man
 I pay for none at all; yet fools think 's mine;
 40 I have the name, and in his gold I shine;
 And where some merchants would in soul kiss hell
 To buy a paradise for their wives, and dye
 Their conscience in the bloods of prodigal heirs
 To deck their night-piece, yet all this being done,
 45 Eaten with jealousy to the inmost bone—
 As what affliction nature more constrains
 Than feed the wife plump for another's veins?—
 These torments stand I freed of; I am as clear
 From jealousy of a wife as from the charge.
 50 O, two miraculous blessings! 'Tis the knight
 Hath took that labour all out of my hands.
 I may sit still and play; he's jealous for me,
 Watches her steps, sets spies. I live at ease;
 He has both the cost and torment: when the strings
 55 Of his heart frets, I feed, laugh, or sing:
 [Singing] La dildo, dildo la dildo, la dildo dildo de dildo.
Enter two Servants
- FIRST SERVANT
 What, has he got a singing in his head now?

- 15 Bless... life 'God bless the founder' was proverbial.
 16 house The play repeatedly exploits different meanings of this word—home, lineage, bloodlines, family, business establishment, brothel—for ironic effect; the word's biblical resonance (as in 'the house of David') adds to the irony.
ten years The duration of the arrangement is said to be ten years here and at 2.3.8, but twice said to be seven years (3.2.66–9, 4.1.229).
 17 a he
 19 gets begets
 21 church-duties...scavenger Church dues were paid with money or parish work; scavengers oversaw pavement repair, street cleaning, and repair of chimneys and furnaces; Sir Walter has paid in cash, relieving Allwit of parish work.
 25 midsummer eve day before Midsummer Day, June 24, one of the four quarter days. That the winter's coal is laid up this early indicates Sir Walter's zealotry toward his illegitimate family, or perhaps merely his efficiency.
 26 chaldron cauldron (32 bushels, or 198 to 238 cubic feet); five or six chaldron would provide enough to burn a bushel a day for half a year. A reference in Pepys's diary to the delivery of 10 chaldron of coal suggests that the amount is not necessarily hyperbolic, though Pepys would have had a large house, and in any case overstatement would fit in with the steeple-high firewood and wine in huge casks.
 28 Kentish faggots firewood from the county of Kent o'erlooks is higher than 29 water-house a new pump-house; or perhaps a reservoir built by goldsmith Hugh Myddelton, opened in 1613, the year Chaste Maid was first performed windmills several were patented and erected at about this time, some for pumping water into private houses 30 pin bolt
lies in is confined for childbirth
 32 A lady...her The dainty tastes and extravagant demands of wives in the weeks before and after childbirth, the 'lying in' period, were a staple of Renaissance antifeminist satire.
embossings embossed ornaments
 33 spanglings bits of glittering metal decorating fabrics
 34 gaudy-shops boutiques
 35 Gresham's Burse a kind of shopping mall, a covered walk lined with stalls featuring clothes and trinkets, on the south side of the Royal Exchange restoratives foods, cordials or medicines to restore health or strength 36 set up set up in business
pothecary apothecary, druggist
 37 foreman May allude to Simon Forman and the scandalous Essex divorce case with its drugs and accusations of impotence; see Masque of Cupids.
 38 loaves a 'sugar loaf' was refined sugar moulded into a loaf or cone runlets casks of varying sizes, up to 18.5 gallons 42 would...hell would (figuratively)
 sell their souls to the devil; possible suggestion of witches' supposed practice of kissing the Devil's anus
 43–4 dye...heirs have upon their conscience the sin of having helped ruin prodigal heirs by selling them expensive wares
 45 night-piece insulting term for wife or other sexual companion
 47 nature more constrains more violates nature
 48 feed...veins 'Veins' is a synecdoche for a body in the throes of lust, envisioned as hot blood pulsing wildly; 'feed' paints lust as cannibalism, a wife fattened to be served at another's table.
 52 labour...hands A husband's duties, such as sex and jealousy, were sometimes regarded as drudgery.
 54 live at ease Allwit's famous soliloquy parodies praises of the Golden Age, a classless utopia where all are fed abundantly without needing to work: closely contemporary with Chaste Maid, The Tempest's Golden Age set piece imagines 'all men idle' and abundance produced 'without sweat or endeavour', a vision that a Middletonesque bystander glosses 'all idle: whores and knaves' (2.1.160–72).
 55–6 strings...frets the heart was thought to have strings, which could fray from emotional turmoil
 57 dildo (a) a meaningless word in ballad refrains; (b) an artificial penis 58 singing in his head possible reference to headache caused by cuckold's horns

- SECOND SERVANT
Now 's out of work, he falls to making dildoes.
- ALLWIT
Now, sirs, Sir Walter's come.
- 60 FIRST SERVANT Is our master come?
ALLWIT
Your master! What am I?
FIRST SERVANT Do not you know, sir?
ALLWIT Pray, am not I your master?
FIRST SERVANT
O, you are but our mistress' husband.
ALLWIT Ergo, knave, your master.
Enter Sir Walter and Davy. [Allwit removes his hat.]
FIRST SERVANT
65 Negatur argumentum.—Here comes Sir Walter.
[Aside to Second Servant] Now a stands bare as well as we; make the most of him, he's but one pip above a servingman, and so much his horns make him.
SIR WALTER [to Allwit]
How dost, Jack?
ALLWIT Proud of your worship's health, sir.
SIR WALTER
How does your wife?
70 ALLWIT E'en after your own making, sir;
She's a tumbler i'faith; the nose and belly meets.
SIR WALTER They'll part in time again.
ALLWIT
At the good hour they will, an please your worship.
SIR WALTER [to First Servant] Here, sirrah, pull off my 75 boots.—[To Allwit] Put on, put on, Jack.
ALLWIT I thank your kind worship, sir.
SIR WALTER Slippers! [Second Servant brings slippers] Heart, you are sleepy!
ALLWIT [aside] The game begins already.
80 SIR WALTER Pish! Put on, Jack.
- ALLWIT [aside, putting on his hat] Now I must do it, or he'll be as angry now, as if I had put it on at first bidding. 'Tis but observing; 'tis but observing a man's humour once, and he may ha' him by the nose all his life.
- SIR WALTER [to First Servant]
What entertainment has lain open here? 85
No strangers in my absence?
FIRST SERVANT Sure, sir, not any.
ALLWIT [aside]
His jealousy begins. Am not I happy now
That can laugh inward whilst his marrow melts?
SIR WALTER
How do you satisfy me?
FIRST SERVANT Good, sir, be patient.
SIR WALTER
90 For two months' absence I'll be satisfied.
FIRST SERVANT
No living creature entered.
SIR WALTER Entered? Come, swear!
FIRST SERVANT
You will not hear me out, sir.
SIR WALTER Yes, I'll hear't out, sir.
FIRST SERVANT
Sir, he can tell, himself.
SIR WALTER Heart, he can tell!
Do you think I'll trust him?—as a usurer
With forfeited lordships. Him? O monstrous injury! 95
Believe him? Can the devil speak ill of darkness?
[To Allwit] What can you say, sir?
ALLWIT Of my soul and conscience, sir, she's a wife as honest of her body to me, as any lord's proud lady can be. 100
SIR WALTER
Yet, by your leave, I heard you were once off'ring
To go to bed to her.
ALLWIT No, I protest, sir!

59 out of work (a) out of work; (b) sexually inactive

61–3 What am I? . . . husband recalls King Lear's demanding of a servant 'Who am I?' and being impertinently answered, 'My lady's father' (1.4.76–7 [Folio])

64 Ergo therefore (Latin)

65 Negatur argumentum the argument is denied (Latin)

66 a he stands bare with his hat removed, a mark of respect for Sir Walter (hats were worn indoors in this period)

67 pip the mark on dice or playing cards; hence, a very small degree

68 horns the (figurative) insignia of a cuckold

69 How dost how do you do

Proud pleased, glad

70 after . . . making as you have fashioned her, with suggestion of 'making' meaning 'mating'

71 tumbler (a) acrobat (nose meeting belly requires contortions); (b) copulator nose . . . meets proverbial description of pregnancy

73 good hour most auspicious time an if it

74 sirrah term of address to male servants or boys, contemptuously expressing authority

75 Put on Allwit is still standing hatless.

77–9 Heart . . . already Sir Walter may be musingly addressing himself, to let the others know he is ready for bed, which prompts Allwit to observe that the game of sex with his wife is beginning; or Sir Walter may be upbraiding the servant for 'sleepy' or slow service in bringing the slippers, a prelude to his testy interrogation of the servants, in which case the 'game' is jealousy. ('Heart' is an exclamation of surprise.)

83 humour disposition, temperament

84 by the nose under his influence; proverbial

85 lain open Sir Walter's diction in this passage—'lain open', 'entered'—plays upon a common Renaissance identification of a woman's body with a house, which can be locked up but may also be illicitly entered.

88 marrow seat of animal vitality; love proverbially melted the marrow

92 out . . . out the first 'out' means 'to the end of my statement', the second 'the true story' (as in 'the truth will out')

93 he i.e., Allwit

94–5 usurer . . . lordships moneylender who has foreclosed on aristocratic property for non-repayment of loans. The passage may mean 'as I will trust a usurer not to foreclose on aristocratic property if given a chance'.

99 honest chaste

- SIR WALTER
Heart, if you do, you shall take all. I'll marry.
ALLWIT O, I beseech you, sir!
- 105 SIR WALTER [aside]
That wakes the slave, and keeps his flesh in awe.
ALLWIT [aside]
I'll stop that gap where'er I find it open.
I have poisoned his hopes in marriage already—
Some old rich widows and some landed virgins,
Enter two children, [Wat and Nick]
And I'll fall to work still before I'll lose him, He's yet too sweet to part from.
- 110 WAT [to Allwit] Good e'en, father.
ALLWIT
Ha, villain, peace.
NICK Good e'en, father.
ALLWIT Peace, bastard! [aside] Should he hear 'em! [Aloud]
These are two foolish children, they do not know the gentleman that sits there.
- 115 SIR WALTER O, Wat! How dost, Nick? Go to school, ply your books, boys, ha?
ALLWIT [aside to boys] Where's your legs, whoresons?
[Aside] They should kneel indeed, if they could say their prayers.
- 120 SIR WALTER [aside] Let me see, stay;
How shall I dispose of these two brats now
When I am married? For they must not mingle
Amongst my children that I get in wedlock;
'Twill make foul work, that, and raise many storms.
125 I'll bind Wat prentice to a goldsmith—my father Yellowhammer, as fit as can be! Nick with some vintner; good, goldsmith and vintner; there will be wine in bowls,
I'faith.
Enter Allwit's Wife
- 130 WIFE Sweet knight,
Welcome! I have all my longings now in town;
Now, welcome the good hour.
- SIR WALTER How cheers my mistress?
WIFE Made lightsome e'en by him that made me heavy.
SIR WALTER Methinks she shows gallantly, like a moon at full, sir.
ALLWIT True, and if she bear a male child, there's the man in the moon, sir. 135
SIR WALTER 'Tis but the boy in the moon yet, goodman calf.
ALLWIT There was a man, the boy had never been there else.
SIR WALTER It shall be yours, sir.
ALLWIT No, by my troth, I'll swear
It's none of mine. Let him that got it keep it!
[Aside] Thus do I rid myself of fear, 140
Lie soft, sleep hard, drink wine, and eat good cheer.
[Exeunt]
- Finis Actus Primus*
- [Incipit] Actus Secundus 2.1
Enter Touchwood Senior and his Wife
- WIFE 'Twill be so tedious, sir, to live from you,
But that necessity must be obeyed.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
I would it might not, wife. The tediousness
Will be the most part mine, that understand
The blessings I have in thee; so to part, 5
That drives the torment to a knowing heart,
But as thou say'st, we must give way to need,
And live awhile asunder; our desires
Are both too fruitful for our barren fortunes.
How adverse runs the destiny of some creatures: 10
Some only can get riches and no children,

105 slave contemptible fellow
106 gap i.e., the possibility of Sir Walter's marrying. Given adjacent imagery of openings, 'gap' is also sexually suggestive.
108.1 Wat (a) short for Walter; (b) a hare Nick In the sense 'notch' perhaps suggests a notch on the belt of Sir
Walter's sexual conquests.
115 ply work at 117 Where's your legs i.e., why aren't you bowing or kneeling? (Children knelt before their parents.)
whoresons Allwit's calling the boys
'bastard' and 'whoresons' raises the question of whether they know they are not his children, in which case he has committed the despicable act of implicating young children in the household's immoral arrangements; his thus addressing them if they think he is really their father is not very attractive behaviour either.

118–19 if...prayers i.e., Sir Walter should be considered their God
122 mingle intermix with, be acknowledged as heirs on an equal footing with 124 storms disputes, probably over property and equitable treatment
125 prentice apprentice. Since apprentices lived in their master's households, Sir
Walter is imagining the cruel situation of forcing his illegitimate son to live as an apprentice in the very household where his legitimate offspring will have the status of grandchildren.
128.1 Allwit's Wife The fact that Allwit's wife, Lady Kix, and Touchwood Senior's wife are designated in the list of the 'Principal Persons' and elsewhere in the text only as 'his wife' is one instance among many in the play of wives being considered mere objects. Of the play's dozen wives, only Maudline Yellowhammer is given a first name.
130 longings desires. The word was especially used for pregnancy's cravings.

132 lightsome light-hearted, happy heavy pregnant, with a paradoxical play on another meaning, 'sad'
136 calf dolt; suggestion of 'mooncalf'— natural idiot or aborted foetus 137 There...else i.e., there must have been a man, or else there could be no boy
138 It...yours Sir Walter may mean that Allwit wins the prize for this wit duel;
Allwit takes him to mean that the child will pass as his legitimate heir.
139 Let...keep it proverbial
141 good cheer plentiful food
2.1.0.2 Touchwood Senior Touchwood was tinder used to ignite the touchhole of a musket, with a sexual implication.
1 from separated from
2 necessity...obeyed proverbial
5 blessings (a) happiness; (b) offspring
6 knowing i.e., savouring marital bliss;
'know' also meant to have sex with

- We only can get children and no riches.
Then 'tis the prudent'st part to check our wills
And, till our state rise, make our bloods lie still.
15 Life, every year a child, and some years two—
Besides drinkings abroad, that's never reckoned;
This gear will not hold out.
- WIFE Sir, for a time
I'll take the courtesy of my uncle's house,
If you be pleased to like on't, till prosperity
20 Look with a friendly eye upon our states.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Honest wife, I thank thee. I ne'er knew
The perfect treasure thou brought'st with thee more Than at this instant minute. A man's happy
When he's at poorest that has matched his soul
25 As rightly as his body. Had I married
A sensual fool now, as 'tis hard to 'scape it
'Mongst gentlewomen of our time, she would ha' hanged
About my neck, and never left her hold
Till she had kissed me into wanton businesses,
30 Which at the waking of my better judgement
I should have cursed most bitterly,
And laid a thicker vengeance on my act
Than misery of the birth—which were enough
If it were born to greatness, whereas mine
35 Is sure of beggary, though it were got in wine.
Fullness of joy showeth the goodness in thee;
Thou art a matchless wife: farewell, my joy.
- WIFE I shall not want your sight?
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR I'll see thee often,
Talk in mirth, and play at kisses with thee,
Anything, wench, but what may beget beggars;
40 There I give o'er the set, throw down the cards,
And dare not take them up.
- WIFE Your will be mine, sir. Exit
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
This does not only make her honesty perfect,
But her discretion, and approves her judgement.
Had her desires been wanton, they'd been blameless
45 In being lawful ever, but of all creatures
I hold that wife a most unmatched treasure
Than can unto her fortunes fix her pleasure
And not unto her blood. This is like wedlock;
The feast of marriage is not lust but love
50 And care of the estate; when I please blood, Merely I sin and suck out others'; then
'Tis many a wise man's fault, but of all men
I am the most unfortunate in that game
That ever pleased both genders: I ne'er played yet
55 Under a bastard: the poor wenches curse me
To the pit where'er I come; they were ne'er served so,
But used to have more words than one to a bargain.
I have such a fatal finger in such business
I must forth with't, chiefly for country wenches, 60 For every harvest I shall hinder hay-making:

- 13 check curb
wills sexual desires 14 state financial condition bloods sexual passions
15 Life God's life (oath)
16 drinkings abroad cost of drinking or dining out, with a suggestion of sexual encounters with other women 17 gear business; with a suggestion of 'genitals'
19 like on't approve it
20 states situations
23 instant present
32-3 And...birth i.e., he would make himself more miserable by cursing himself than the ensuing child would be made miserable by poverty; or, cursing would be an even greater penalty to him than the birth of the child would 33 misery...birth The Renaissance commonplace that humans are born into misery comes from Christianity (original sin) and from classical Greek authors.
33-5 which...beggary i.e., the birth of a child would be sad enough if it were born into wealth, whereas my child is certain to be poor
35 got in wine conceived while the parents were drunk (possible allusion to proverb 'let him drink, and forget his poverty'; perhaps alludes to a superstition that children begotten by drunken parents would grow up to be rich)
37 matchless peerless; also, possibly, husbandless
38 want lack
40 Anything...beggars His sexual 'fast' is counterpoised against Lenten food fasting in the play, the former being about as rigorous as the latter.
wench here, simply an affectionate term with no suggestion of rusticity or lower class 41 give...set give up the game (of sex); game imagery pervades the play
43-63 Touchwood Senior's soliloquy is balanced against Allwit's soliloquy in the preceding scene; both men relinquish their sex lives with their wives; both praise the married state in circumstances undercutting that praise.
44 approves confirms 49 like wedlock what wedlock should ideally be 50-1 The feast...estate for similar sentiments, see No Wit 9.214-5 and Women Beware 1.3.22-35, 41-49
52 Merely...others' i.e., I commit an absolute sin and harm other people ('others' means 'other people's sins')
55-6 ne'er...bastard i.e., never had sex without producing at least one bastard. The image is perhaps from card-playing—to have a bastard is to be left with a card that scores against one.
57 the pit Hell; suggestion of pudendum
57-8 ne'er...bargain i.e., the maids are not used to conceiving after only one sexual encounter. To 'have more words than one to a bargain' is proverbial.
59 fatal (a) doomed by destiny; (b) deadly, ruinous finger contribution, influence (figurative); with a suggestion of a sexually potent penis 61 hinder hay-making i.e., the pregnant country wenches cannot help with the harvest

- Enter a Wench with a child*
 I had no less than seven lay in last progress
 Within three weeks of one another's time.
- WENCH
 O, snap-hance, have I found you?
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 How snap-hance?
- WENCH [showing him the baby]
 Do you see your workmanship?
 Nay, turn not from it, nor offer to escape; for if you do,
 I'll cry it through the streets and follow you.
 Your name may well be called Touchwood, a pox on
 you!
- 70 You do but touch and take; thou has undone me;
 I was a maid before, I can bring a certificate for it
 From both the churchwardens.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 I'll have the parson's hand too, or I'll not yield to't.
- WENCH Thou shalt have more, thou villain! Nothing grieves me but Ellen, my poor cousin in Derbyshire; thou hast cracked her marriage quite; she'll have a bout with thee.
- 75 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 Faith, when she will, I'll have a bout with her!
- WENCH A law bout, sir, I mean.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 True, lawyers use such bouts as other men do.
 An if that be all thy grief, I'll tender her a husband.
 I keep of purpose two or three gulls in pickle
 To eat such mutton with, and she shall choose one.
 Do but in courtesy, faith, wench, excuse me
- Of this half yard of flesh, in which I think it wants A nail or two.
- WENCH No, thou shalt find, villain,
 It hath right shape and all the nails it should have.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 Faith, I am poor. Do a charitable deed, wench;
 I am a younger brother and have nothing.
- WENCH
 Nothing! Thou hast too much, thou lying villain, Unless thou wert more thankful.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 I have no dwelling;
 I brake up house but this morning. Pray thee, pity
 me;
- I am a good fellow, faith, have been too kind
 To people of your gender; if I ha't
 Without my belly, none of your sex shall want it.
 [Aside] That word has been of force to move a woman.
 95 [To her] There's tricks enough to rid thy hand on't,
 wench:
 Some rich man's porch, tomorrow before day,
 Or else anon i' the evening; twenty devices.
 [He gives her money] Here's all I have, i'faith, take purse and all;
 [Aside] And would I were rid of all the ware i' the shop so!
- 100 WENCH
 Where I find manly dealings, I am pitiful:
 This shall not trouble you.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 And I protest, wench, the next I'll keep myself.
- WENCH Soft, let it be got first!

- 61.1 Wench A wench was a rustic or working-class girl, often regarded as sexually 'easy' and sometimes as witty and resourceful.
- 62 lay in were confined for childbirth progress The monarch and members of Court went on a royal tour of England in July or August; they were lavishly entertained and courtiers often wreaked havoc on the local population; Touchwood Senior's impregnation of seven women parallels Sir Walter's fathering seven children by Allwit's wife.
- 64 snap-hance (a) bandit; (b) the flintlock or cock which ignites 'touchwood' or tinder in the touchhole (suggestion of pudendum) of a gun
- 69 touch and take speedily lay hands on; proverbial; with a suggestion of speedy impregnation undone ruined my reputation and marital prospects
- 70 certificate a warrant of good conduct required of all those who moved out of their own parish; notoriously unreliable
- 71 churchwardens lay officers who helped parishioners
- 72 parson's hand the parson's signature,

- proving the maid's chastity
- 75 cracked broken
- 76 bout she means a law suit; but he interprets 'bout' as a sexual encounter
- 80 An if if
- 81 of purpose on purpose
gulls fools
in pickle (a) stored up, like pickled food; (b) in tubs for treating syphilis. Possibly recalls the pickled cucumbers with which Sir Walter is associated (1.2.7), obliquely suggesting that he, like the gulls, is being used.
- 82 mutton whore
- 84 half yard of flesh the baby
- 84-5 wants . . . two (a) is short of a half yard by a nail (measure of 2 1/2 inches) or two; (b) lacks some nails (children of syphilitics sometimes lacked finger- or toenails)
- 88 younger brother By the custom of primogeniture, in which the first-born son was heir to his father's title and estate, younger male children had little material wealth. Touchwood may be lying to the wench, since 'Touchwood Senior' suggests that he is the eldest son.
- 89-90 Thou . . . thankful She seems to mean

- that he will have 'too much' in that she will make him take the baby, unless he proves more grateful ('thankful') by giving her money.
- 91 brake up house parted from my family
- 92 good fellow good-hearted womanizer
- 94 Without my belly outside my belly; i.e., any food not actually eaten already; with sexual innuendo
want lack
- 95 That . . . woman i.e., that pose as a benefactor of the female sex has worked with women before
- 96 There's . . . on't i.e., there are many ways to rid yourself of a baby
- 98 anon at once devices schemes
- 100 ware . . . shop Middleton's characters often use 'ware' to mean sexually available woman, casting women as shop goods in a consumer world.
- 101 manly dealings sardonic reference to his pay-off pitiful pitying
- 104 Soft mild exclamation, similar to 'Wait a minute!'
got begotten

- 105 [Aside] This is the fifth; if e'er I venture more,
Where I now go for a maid, may I ride for a whore.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
What shift she'll make now with this piece of flesh
In this strict time of Lent, I cannot imagine;
Flesh dare not peep abroad now. I have known 110 This city now above this seven years,
But, I protest, in better state of government
I never knew it yet, nor ever heard of.
There has been more religious wholesome laws
In the half circle of a year erected 115 For common good, than memory ever knew of,
Enter Sir Oliver Kix and his Lady
Setting apart corruption of promoters,
And other poisonous officers that infect
And with a venomous breath taint every goodness.
- LADY
O, that e'er I was begot, or bred, or born!
- SIR OLIVER
Be content, sweet wife.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR [aside]
120 What's here to do, now?
I hold my life she's in deep passion
For the imprisonment of veal and mutton
Now kept in garrets; weeps for some calf's head now.
Methinks her husband's head might serve with bacon.
Enter Touchwood Junior
125 LADY [to Sir Oliver] Hist!
SIR OLIVER Patience, sweet wife.
- [They walk aside]
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
Brother, I have sought you strangely.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR Why, what's the business?
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
With all speed thou canst, procure a licence for me.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR How, a licence?
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
Cud's foot, she's lost else! I shall miss her ever. 130
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR [giving money]
Nay, sure, thou shalt not miss so fair a mark
For thirteen shillings fourpence.
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Thanks by hundreds!
Exit
- SIR OLIVER [to Lady Kix]
Nay, pray thee, cease; I'll be at more cost yet,
Thou know'st we are rich enough.
- LADY All but in blessings,
And there the beggar goes beyond us. O, O, O! 135
To be seven years a wife and not a child,
O, not a child!
- SIR OLIVER Sweet wife, have patience.
- LADY
Can any woman have a greater cut?
SIR OLIVER
I know 'tis great, but what of that, wife?
I cannot do withal; there's things making, 140
By thine own doctor's advice, at pothecaries':
I spare for nothing, wife, no, if the price
Were forty marks a spoonful;

105 the fifth her fifth child out of wedlock, or perhaps the fifth man she has accused of fathering this baby

105-6 if e'er...whore i.e., if I pull this stunt again, I may no longer pass as a maid, but may be known as a whore. 'Ride' suggests the sex act and may also suggest a whore's punishment of being carted through the streets; or she may be anticipating not having to walk ('go') but being able to ride in a carriage, from her gains through prostitution.

107 shift evasive device piece of flesh the infant. His conflation of the infant with a piece of Lent-forbidden meat foreshadows the 'shift' she will actually practise.

108 strict...Lent From 1608 onwards acts which forbade the killing and eating of meat during Lent were more strictly enforced, and in 1613 laws were passed against even ill people and pregnant women having meat during Lent. Playwrights were not warmly-disposed toward Lent in the best of times, since theatres were often closed during Lent.

113 religious wholesome laws Lenten laws; Touchwood Senior's defence of these laws, unless ironic, may have aimed at mollifying King James, promulgator of Lenten prohibitions—James's daughter was the acting company's sponsor; a nearly identical phrase, used non-ironically, occurs in The Triumphs of Truth, 1613, 142

115.1 Sir Oliver Kix an oxymoronic name: 'Oliver' means 'fruitful', but a kix is a dry, hollow plant stalk, and hence a dried-up, sapless person. It is also the English name for cicuta, an anaphrodisiac medication that could prevent sexual maturation.

116 Setting apart except for promoters informers. In 1613 the Privy Council appointed 'messengers' to spy out abuses of the Lenten regulations.

120 What's...do i.e., what's all this about?

121 I...life i.e., I would wager my life that passion sorrow

123 garrets Butchers who wanted to evade Lenten laws sometimes operated secretly in attic rooms (cf. 2.2.91-2).

calf's head literally, meat; figuratively, fool. Touchwood Senior thinks that Lady Kix is upset about the lack of meat in Lent—he does not yet realize that this is not the sort of flesh she is longing for.

124 husband's head suggests that Sir Oliver has a calf's head or is a fool

125 Hist! silence! (She wishes not to be overheard by Touchwood Junior, who is entering; the Kixes have not noticed being overheard by Touchwood Senior.)

127 strangely urgently

128 licence A marriage licence from the bishop was necessary for a marriage that took place outside a church or chapel or for which banns had not been called.

130 Cud's foot by God's foot (oath)

miss her ever lose her forever

131 giving money shows he was lying when he told the Wench, shortly before, that he was giving her all his money (2.1.99)

mark (a) archery target (with suggestion of target as pudendum); the target image involves a pun on 'miss', which in the previous line meant 'lose' and here means 'fail to hit'; (b) thirteen shillings and fourpence, or two-thirds of a pound; the cost of a marriage licence

138 cut (a) misfortune; (b) pudendum. Since 'cut' can also refer to gelding, this could also apply to Sir Oliver.

140 cannot do withal cannot help it; or, cannot copulate

141 pothecaries apothecaries, druggists

	I'd give a thousand pound to purchase fruitfulness: [Exit Touchwood Senior]	O, one of them, one of them, would ha' served my turn.	170
145	'Tis but 'bating so many good works In the erecting of bridewells and spittlehouses, And so fetch it up again; for, having none, I mean to make good deeds my children.	SIR OLIVER Sorrow consume thee, thou art still crossing me, And know'st my nature— Enter a Maid
	LADY Give me but those good deeds, and I'll find children.	MAID O, mistress! [Aside] Weeping or railing, That's our house harmony!
	SIR OLIVER Hang thee, thou hast had too many!	LADY What say'st, Jug?
150	LADY Thou li'st, brevity!	MAID The sweetest news!
	SIR OLIVER O, horrible! Dar'st thou call me 'brevity'?	LADY What is't, wench?
	Dar'st thou be so short with me?	MAID Throw down your doctors' drugs: They're all but heretics; I bring certain remedy That has been taught and proved and never failed.	175
	LADY Thou deservest worse. Think but upon the goodly lands and livings That's kept back through want on't.	SIR OLIVER O that, that, that or nothing!
155	SIR OLIVER Talk not on't, pray thee; Thou'lt make me play the woman and weep too.	MAID There's a gentleman, I haply have his name too, that has got Nine children by one water that he useth: It never misses; they come so fast upon him, He was fain to give it over.	180
	LADY 'Tis our dry barrenness puffs up Sir Walter; None gets by your not-getting but that knight; He's made by th' means, and fats his fortunes shortly In a great dowry with a goldsmith's daughter.	LADY His name, sweet Jug?
160	SIR OLIVER They may all be deceivèd; Be but you patient, wife.	MAID One Master Touchwood, a fine gentleman, But run behindhand much with getting children.
	LADY I have suffered a long time.	SIR OLIVER Is't possible?
	SIR OLIVER Suffer thy heart out, a pox suffer thee!	MAID Why sir, he'll undertake, Using that water, within fifteen year, For all your wealth, to make you a poor man, You shall so swarm with children.	185
	LADY Nay, thee, thou desertless slave!	SIR OLIVER I'll venture that, i'faith.
165	SIR OLIVER Come, come, I ha' done; You'll to the gossiping of Master Allwit's child?	LADY That shall you, husband.
	LADY Yes, to my much joy! Everyone gets before me; there's my sister Was married but at Barthol'mew-eve last, And she can have two children at a birth:	MAID But I must tell you first, he's very dear.	190

144.1 Exit Touchwood Senior COTES does not direct Touchwood Senior to exit here, but the plot seems to demand it. Touchwood, after remaining onstage long enough to overhear the Kixes' plight, exits for long enough to enlist the maid in his scheme; otherwise, the maid would be acting on her own initiative, unlikely since the miraculous 'water' she reports is actually Touchwood Senior's fabrication, tailored to this situation.

145-6 'Tis...spittlehouses i.e., to finance fertility treatments, I would only have to reduce my spending on charities—the building of bridewells (workhouses for the poor, and houses of correction for prostitutes) and spittlehouses (leper houses, and hospitals for treating venereal diseases)

147 fetch...again (a) raise money for fertility treatments; (b) regain sexual potency

147-8 for, having...my children i.e., I will compensate for having no children by being a philanthropist

149 good deeds sexual acts

150 too many too many sexual encounters brevity (a) shortness of penis, sexual inadequacy; (b) possible reference to the stature of a boy actor (With so many boys necessary to play the female parts, one of them could have been doubled into this part.)

152 short rude; with a pun on 'brevity'

153-4 Think...on't i.e., think about the property that will go elsewhere (to Sir Walter Whorehound) because of your heirlessness. Some estate has been entailed so that the property passes to Sir Walter if the Kixes have no children.

155 play the woman behave like a woman

157 gets makes money

not-getting failure to impregnate

158 by th' means i.e., by their infertility fats increases

162 pox venereal disease

163 desertless undeserving

165 gossiping christening or christening feast

168 Barthol'mew-eve August 23. Since it is now not even Mid-Lent Sunday (cf. 2.2.182), the twins were probably conceived out of wedlock.

170 served my turn suited my purposes

171 crossing agitating

174 Jug a common substitute for 'Joan', a generic name for maid-servants

176 heretics i.e., doctors are to medicine what heretics are to religion—purveyors of falsehood

179 haply (a) happen to; (b) fortunately

180 water (a) liquid medicine; (b) semen; a frequent Middleton double entendre

182 fain glad

184 run behindhand fallen into debt

190 dear expensive

SIR OLIVER
No matter; what serves wealth for?
LADY
True, sweet husband.
SIR OLIVER
There's land to come. Put case his water stands me
In some five hundred pound a pint,
'Twill fetch a thousand, and a kersen soul.
I'll about it.
195 LADY And that's worth all, sweet husband.
Exeunt

Enter Allwit
ALLWIT
I'll go bid gossips presently myself.
That's all the work I'll do; nor need I stir,
But that it is my pleasure to walk forth
And air myself a little: I am tied to nothing
5 In this business; what I do is merely recreation,
Not constraint.
Here's running to and fro—nurse upon nurse,
Three charwomen, besides maids and neighbours'
children!
Fie, what a trouble have I rid my hands on;
It makes me sweat to think on't.
Enter Sir Walter Whorehound
10 SIR WALTER How now, Jack?
ALLWIT
I am going to bid gossips for your worship's child, sir;
A goodly girl, i'faith, give you joy on her!
She looks as if she had two thousand pound to her portion,
And run away with a tailor; a fine plump black-eyed slut:
15 Under correction, sir,
I take delight to see her.—Nurse!
Enter Dry Nurse
DRY NURSE Do you call, sir?

ALLWIT
I call not you, I call the wet nurse hither.
Exit [Dry Nurse]
Give me the wet nurse!—
Enter Wet Nurse [with baby]
Ay, 'tis thou;
Come hither, come hither!
Let's see her once again; I cannot choose 20 But buss her thrice an hour.
WET NURSE You may be proud on't sir;
'Tis the best piece of work that e'er you did.
ALLWIT
Think'st thou so, nurse? What sayest to Wat and Nick?
WET NURSE
They're pretty children both, but here's a wench
Will be a knocker.
25 ALLWIT [fondling the baby]
Pup!—Say'st thou me so? Pup! Little countess!
Faith, sir, I thank your worship for this girl
Ten thousand times and upward.
SIR WALTER
I am glad I have her for you, sir.
ALLWIT Here, take her in, nurse; wipe her, and give her 30 spoon-meat.
WET NURSE
Wipe your mouth, sir. Exit [with baby]
ALLWIT And now, about these gossips.
SIR WALTER
Get but two; I'll stand for one myself.
ALLWIT To your own child, sir?
SIR WALTER
The better policy, it prevents suspicion;
35 'Tis good to play with rumour at all weapons.
ALLWIT
Troth, I commend your care, sir; 'tis a thing
That I should ne'er have thought on.
SIR WALTER [aside] The more slave!

the extravagant christening clothes) as tailor sluttishness)

15 Under correction if I may presume to say so (deferential phrase) 16.1 Dry Nurse a nurse who tended, but did not breastfeed, an infant
17 I . . . you Rejection of the Dry Nurse after she speaks only four words gives this character little purpose in the play, except that preference to the Wet Nurse continues the play's pervasive imagery of liquids; and the presence of two nurses in the household underlines the Allwits' extravagance.

fool or slobberer—possibly for making a fool of himself by cooing over the baby 33 Get . . . myself A child normally had three godparents; besides the obvious hypocrisy of Sir Walter's attempt to conceal his paternity, this may be a reference to the Puritan practice of standing as godparents to their own children.

SECOND PROMOTER And the butcher, belike,
Should kill and sell close in some upper room?

ALLWIT

I know not which, i'faith.

95 SECOND PROMOTER Either will serve:
This butcher shall kiss Newgate, 'less he turn up
The bottom of the pocket of his apron.

FIRST PROMOTER
That shall not serve your turn.—What a rogue's this!
How cunningly he came over us.
Enter a Man with meat in a basket

SECOND PROMOTER Hush't, stand close!

MAN
I have 'scaped well thus far; they say the knaves
Are wondrous hot and busy.

FIRST PROMOTER By your leave, sir,
105 We must see what you have under your cloak there.

MAN
Have! I have nothing.

FIRST PROMOTER No? Do you tell us that?
What makes this lump stick out then? We must see,
sir.

MAN What will you see, sir? A pair of sheets and two of my wife's foul smocks going to the washers?

110 SECOND PROMOTER O, we love that sight well! You cannot please us better.
[He pulls meat out of basket]
What, do you gull us? Call you these shirts and smocks?

MAN Now, a pox choke you!

You have cozened me and five of my wife's kindred
Of a good dinner; we must make it up now 115
With herrings and milk-pottage. Exit

FIRST PROMOTER 'Tis all veal.

SECOND PROMOTER All veal? Pox, the worse luck! I promised faithfully to send this morning a fat quarter of lamb to a kind gentlewoman in Turnbull Street that longs; and 120 and how I'm crossed!

FIRST PROMOTER Let's share this, and see what hap comes next then.
Enter another [Man] with a basket

SECOND PROMOTER
Agreed. Stand close again: another booty.
What's he?

FIRST PROMOTER
Sir, by your favour.

SECOND MAN Meaning me, sir?

FIRST PROMOTER
Good Master Oliver? Cry thee mercy, i'faith! 125
What hast thou there?

SECOND MAN
A rack of mutton, sir, and half a lamb;
You know my mistress' diet.

FIRST PROMOTER
Go, go, we see thee not; away, keep close!—
[To Second Promoter] Heart, let him pass! Thou'lt never have the wit 130
To know our benefactors. [Exit Second Man]

SECOND PROMOTER I have forgot him.

FIRST PROMOTER

That is in fee with us.

SECOND PROMOTER Now I have a feeling of him.

FIRST PROMOTER
You know he purchased the whole Lent together,
Gave us ten groats a-piece on Ash Wednesday. 135

SECOND PROMOTER

101 That... turn i.e., that excuse will not

101 do. Allwit thinks that since his wife 'lies

101 in', she will be allowed meat during

101 Lent, but the 1613 Lenten laws denied

101 pregnant women the usual exemption.

102 How... us How Allwit eludes the Promoters, despite the fact that his trump card 'my wife lies in' is negated by the changed Lenten law, is obscure, as is the precise nature of the trick by which he 'baffles' them. It could be played as if in the false security of his misunderstanding of the law, he simply skips boldly off, while the Promoters do a double take, realizing they have not been swift enough to catch him and do not know his name.

103 knaves the Promoters

104 wondrous amazingly

104 hot keen

109 foul dirty

119 haunt of prostitutes and thieves. The 'gentlewoman' is probably a whore.

120 longs has the cravings of pregnancy

120 crossed thwarted

121 hap chance occurrence

133 is... with i.e., has bribed

133 have a feeling seem to remember

Enter a Wench with a basket, and a child in it under a loin of mutton

FIRST PROMOTER

A wench.

SECOND PROMOTER Why, then, stand close indeed.

WENCH [aside]

Women had need of wit, if they'll shift here,
And she that hath wit may shift anywhere.

FIRST PROMOTER

Look, look! Poor fool, she has left the rump uncovered too,

140 More to betray her. This is like a murd'rer
That will outface the deed with a bloody band.

SECOND PROMOTER What time of the year is't, sister?

WENCH

O, sweet gentlemen, I am a poor servant,
Let me go.

FIRST PROMOTER

145 You shall, wench, but this must stay with us.

WENCH O, you undo me, sir!

'Tis for a wealthy gentlewoman that takes physic, sir;
The doctor does allow my mistress mutton.

150 O, as you tender the dear life of a gentlewoman!
I'll bring my master to you; he shall show you
A true authority from the higher powers,
And I'll run every foot.

SECOND PROMOTER Well, leave your basket then,
And run and spare not.

WENCH Will you swear then to me
To keep it till I come?

FIRST PROMOTER Now by this light I will.

WENCH

What say you, gentleman?

155 SECOND PROMOTER What a strange wench 'tis!
Would we might perish else.

WENCH Nay, then I run, sir.
Exit, [leaving the basket]

FIRST PROMOTER

And ne'er return, I hope.

SECOND PROMOTER A politic baggage!

She makes us swear to keep it:

I prithee look what market she hath made.

FIRST PROMOTER

Imprimis, sir, a good fat loin of mutton.

160

What comes next under this cloth? Now for a quarter
Of lamb.

SECOND PROMOTER

Now for a shoulder of mutton.

FIRST PROMOTER

Done!

SECOND PROMOTER

Why, done, sir!

FIRST PROMOTER

By the mass, I feel I have lost;

'Tis of more weight, i'faith.

SECOND PROMOTER

Some loin of veal?

FIRST PROMOTER

No, faith, here's a lamb's head,
I feel that plainly; why, I'll yet win my wager.
[He takes out baby]

SECOND PROMOTER

Ha?

FIRST PROMOTER

'Swounds, what's here?

SECOND PROMOTER

A child!

FIRST PROMOTER

A pox of all dissembling cunning whores!

SECOND PROMOTER

Here's an unlucky breakfast!

FIRST PROMOTER

What shall 's do?

SECOND PROMOTER

The quean made us swear to keep it too.

170

FIRST PROMOTER

We might leave it else.

SECOND PROMOTER

Villainous strange!

Life, had she none to gull but poor promoters
That watch hard for a living?

FIRST PROMOTER

Half our gettings must run in sugar-sops
And nurses' wages now, besides many a pound of soap

175

And tallow; we have need to get loins of mutton still,
To save suet to change for candles.

SECOND PROMOTER

Nothing mads me but this was a lamb's head with
you;

137-8 shift...shift (a) make a living by one's own devices; (b) employ evasions, live by fraud

141 outface...band pretend innocence even though his collar or cuff is blood-stained

147 physic medicine

151 true authority In 1613, even the sick needed a special licence to buy meat in Lent.

154 by this light oath similar to 'by God's light'

157 politic baggage crafty strumpet; may say more than he knows in suggesting the tricky nature of the actual baggage or basket

159 market purchase

160 Imprimis a word introducing a list of items (Latin)

161-2 Now...lamb i.e., I'll wager that there is a quarter of lamb under this cloth

162 Done! the wager is agreed to 166.1 baby The discovery of a baby where a lamb was expected recalls the discovery of a sheep where a baby was expected in The Second Shepherd's Play. The trick is funny in context (the Promoters so richly deserve their comeuppance), but not far from sober reality: in early modern times between 10 and 40 per cent of urban children were abandoned, mostly out of poverty.

167 'Swounds God's wounds (oath)

170 quean whore

174 sugar-sops bread soaked in sugar water, to be given to the baby

176 tallow animal fat for making cheap candles

177 candles Candles, made of tallow and suet, are required because the baby will need night-time care.

178-9 Nothing...felt it i.e., nothing annoys me so much as to think that you, who felt the baby, still thought it was a lamb's head

- 180 You felt it! She has made calves' heads of us.
 FIRST PROMOTER Prithee, no more on't.
 There's time to get it up; it is not come
 To Mid-Lent Sunday yet.
- SECOND PROMOTER
 I am so angry, I'll watch no more today.
- FIRST PROMOTER
 Faith, nor I neither.
- 185 SECOND PROMOTER Why then, I'll make a motion.
 FIRST PROMOTER Well, what is't?
 SECOND PROMOTER
 Let's e'en go to the Checker at Queenhithe,
 And roast the loin of mutton till young flood;
 Then send the child to Brentford. [Exeunt]
- 2.3 Enter Allwit in one of Sir Walter's suits, and Davy trussing him
- ALLWIT
 'Tis a busy day at our house, Davy.
- DAVY
 Always the kers'ning day, sir.
- ALLWIT Truss, truss me, Davy.
- DAVY [aside] No matter an you were hanged, sir.
- ALLWIT How does this suit fit me, Davy?
- 5 DAVY Excellent neatly; my master's things were ever fit for you, sir, e'en to a hair, you know.
- ALLWIT Thou hast hit it right, Davy,
 We ever jumped in one this ten years, Davy,
 So well said.
- Enter a Servant with a box
 What art thou?

 Enter two Puritans
 ALLWIT Here comes our gossips now; O, I shall have such kissing work today!—Sweet Mistress Underman, welcome, i'faith. 15
 FIRST PURITAN
 Give you joy of your fine girl, sir!
 Grant that her education may be pure
 And become one of the faithful.
 ALLWIT
 Thanks to your sisterly wishes, Mistress Underman.
 SECOND PURITAN
 Are any of the brethren's wives yet come? 20
 ALLWIT
 There are some wives within, and some at home.
 FIRST PURITAN
 Verily, thanks, sir. Exeunt [Puritans]
 ALLWIT Verily, you are an ass, forsooth:
 I must fit all these times, or there's no music.
 Enter two Gossips
 Here comes a friendly and familiar pair:
 Now I like these wenches well.
 5 FIRST GOSSIP How dost, sirrah? 25
 ALLWIT
 Faith, well, I thank you, neighbour, and how dost thou?
 SECOND GOSSIP
 Want nothing but such getting, sir, as thine.
 ALLWIT
 My gettings, wench? They are poor.
 FIRST GOSSIP Fie, that thou'lt say so!
 Th'ast as fine children as a man can get.

 profligacy. Partly because they were opposed to stage plays on moral grounds, Puritans were relentlessly satirized as hypocrites and sensualists in Jacobean drama; Middleton's satire on contemporary vices suggests that he agreed with many Puritan beliefs—what he consistently satirizes is not religious reform movements but ultra-holiness and hypocrisy.

 tomary sail-trimming, Allwit says what what Sir Walter wants to hear.

 wife) lying to prevent word getting back to Sir Walter that he is the father of his own children.

- DAVY [aside]
 30 Ay, as a man can get, and that's my master.
 ALLWIT
 They are pretty foolish things, put to making in minutes;
 I ne'er stand long about 'em. Will you walk in, wenches?
 [Exeunt Gossips]
Enter Touchwood Junior and Moll
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 The happiest meeting that our souls could wish for!
 Here's the ring ready; I am beholden
 35 Unto your father's haste, he's kept his hour.
 MOLL
 He never kept it better.
Enter Sir Walter Whorehound
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Back, be silent.
 SIR WALTER
 Mistress and partner, I will put you both
 Into one cup.
 [He drinks their health]
 DAVY [aside] Into one cup! Most proper:
 A fitting compliment for a goldsmith's daughter.
 ALLWIT [to Sir Walter]
 40 Yes, sir, that's he must be your worship's partner
 In this day's business, Master Touchwood's brother.
 SIR WALTER
 I embrace your acquaintance, sir.
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR It vows your service, sir.
 SIR WALTER
 It's near high time. Come, Master Allwit.
 ALLWIT Ready, sir.
 SIR WALTER [to Touchwood Junior]
 Will't please you walk?
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Sir, I obey your time. Exeunt
 2.4 Enter [at one door] Midwife with the child, [Maudline, the two Puritans,] and the [five] Gossips, to the kers'ning
 [Exit at another door Midwife with the child]
 FIRST GOSSIP [offering precedence]
 Good Mistress Yellowhammer.
 MAUDLINE In faith, I will not.
- FIRST GOSSIP
 Indeed, it shall be yours.
 MAUDLINE I have sworn, i'faith.
 FIRST GOSSIP I'll stand still then.
 MAUDLINE
 So will you let the child go without company,
 And make me forsworn. 5
 FIRST GOSSIP You are such another creature.
 SECOND GOSSIP Before me? I pray come down a little.
 THIRD GOSSIP Not a whit; I hope I know my place.
 SECOND GOSSIP Your place? Great wonder, sure! Are you any better than a comfit-maker's wife? 10 THIRD GOSSIP And that's as good at all times as a pothecary's.
 SECOND GOSSIP Ye lie! Yet I forbear you too.
 FIRST PURITAN
 Come, sweet sister; we go in unity, and show
 The fruits of peace, like children of the spirit. 15
 SECOND PURITAN I love lowliness.
 FOURTH GOSSIP
 True, so say I: though they strive more,
 There comes as proud behind as goes before.
 FIFTH GOSSIP Every inch, i'faith. Exeunt
Finis Actus Secundus
- [Incipit] Actus Tertius 3.1
Enter Touchwood Junior and a Parson
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 O sir, if ever you felt the force of love,
 Pity it in me!
 PARSON Yes, though I ne'er was married, sir,
 I have felt the force of love from good men's daughters,
 And some that will be maids yet three years hence.
 Have you got a licence?
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Here, 'tis ready, sir. 5
 PARSON That's well.
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 The ring and all things perfect. She'll steal hither.
 PARSON
 She shall be welcome, sir; I'll not be long

31 put to making conceived

32 stand long (a) waste much time; (b) remain erect very long

33 happiest meeting The fact that a court- ing couple must seize on any pretext even to see each other is a measure of how thoroughgoing was a merchant- class patriarch's surveillance over his daughters.

37-8 put . . . cup i.e., I will pledge you both in a single toast. Since a couple drank from a single loving-cup after the betrothal ceremony, Sir Walter's words are unconsciously ironic.

42 It vows your service i.e., knowing you prompts me to promise to serve you

43 high time the appropriate time

44 obey your time i.e., follow your lead (a musical image)

2.4.1-19 Good . . . i'faith the christening party make a fuss about social precedence

6 You . . . creature light-hearted retort to an accuser; proverbial

7-13 Before . . . too The Second Gossip, an apothecary's wife ('As proud as an apothecary' was proverbial) thinks she is socially superior to the Third, a comfit-maker's wife.

7 come down a little be socially humbler

16 I love lowliness satirical portrait of a Puritan taking pride in the affectation of humility

18 There . . . before i.e., a person in high estate may be humble and a person of mean condition proud (proverbial). The meaning 'proud' as sexually excited is perhaps taken up in the next line.

3.1.4 some . . . hence including some that are still actually virgins, or will go on pretending to be virgins for at least another three years (at which time they will perhaps reach marriageable age)

- A-clapping you together.
Enter Moll and Touchwood Senior
- TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR O, here she's come, sir.
 PARSON
 What's he?
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 My honest brother.
 10 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR Quick, make haste, sirs!
 MOLL
 You must dispatch with all the speed you can,
 For I shall be missed straight; I made hard shift
 For this small time I have.
 PARSON Then I'll not linger.
 Place that ring upon her finger:
 15 This the finger plays the part,
 Whose master-vein shoots from the heart.
 [Touchwood Junior puts ring on Moll's finger]
 Now join hands—
Enter Yellowhammer and Sir Walter
 YELLOWHAMMER Which I will sever,
 And so ne'er again meet, never!
 MOLL
 O, we are betrayed!
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Hard fate!
 SIR WALTER I am struck with wonder.
 YELLOWHAMMER
 20 Was this the politic fetch, thou mystical baggage, Thou disobedient strumpet! [To Sir Walter] And were
 you
 So wise to send for her to such an end?
 SIR WALTER
 Now I disclaim the end; you'll make me mad.
 YELLOWHAMMER [to Touchwood Junior]
 And what are you, sir?
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR An you cannot see
 25 With those two glasses, put on a pair more.
 YELLOWHAMMER
 I dreamed of anger still!—Here, take your ring, sir.
 [He pulls ring off Moll's finger]
 Ha, this? Life, 'tis the same! Abominable!
- Did not I sell this ring?
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 I think you did; you received money for't.
 YELLOWHAMMER Heart, hark you, knight,
 30 Here's no inconscionable villainy:
 Set me a-work to make the wedding ring,
 And come with an intent to steal my daughter.
 Did ever runaway match it?
 SIR WALTER [to Touchwood Senior]
 This' your brother, sir?
 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR He can tell that as well as I.
 35 YELLOWHAMMER
 The very posy mocks me to my face:
 'Love that's wise
 Blinds parents' eyes'!
 I thank your wisdom, sir, for blinding of us;
 We have good hope to recover our sight shortly;
 40 In the mean time I will lock up this baggage
 As carefully as my gold: she shall see
 As little sun, if a close room or so
 Can keep her from the light on't.
 MOLL O, sweet father,
 For love's sake, pity me!
 YELLOWHAMMER Away!
 MOLL [to Touchwood Junior] Farewell, sir,
 45 All content bless thee, and take this for comfort:
 Though violence keep me, thou canst lose me never,
 I am ever thine although we part for ever.
 YELLOWHAMMER
 Ay, we shall part you, minx. Exit [with Moll]
 SIR WALTER [to Touchwood Junior]
 Your acquaintance, sir,
 50 Came very lately, yet it came too soon;
 I must hereafter know you for no friend,
 But one that I must shun like pestilence
 Or the disease of lust.
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Like enough, sir; you ha' ta'en me at the worst time for words that e'er ye picked out: faith, 55 do not wrong me, sir. Exit [with Parson]

- 9 A-clapping you together joining your hands, marrying you (with a sexual suggestion) 12 straight right away made...shift managed, with difficulty
 13–17 Then...hands Doggerel verse substitutes for the Prayer Book wedding ceremony which would have been dangerous to echo onstage. The Parson continues this doggerel at 5.4.35 exactly where he leaves off here.
 15–16 This...heart An artery was popularly believed to run directly from the heart to the third finger of the left hand.
 17 join hands 'handfasting', the legally binding part of the marriage ceremony, is here interrupted
 20 politic fetch cunning trick

- mystical secret
 21 strumpet prostitute. In this patriarchal society, disobedience to one's father is easily conflated with sexual looseness, reflecting also the theory that one kind of vice led quickly and inevitably to others.
 22 end purpose
 23 disclaim the end deny that my asking her to be a godparent was aimed at this purpose (her elopement)
 24 An if
 26 dreamed...still kept dreaming about anger (perhaps prophetically, the night before this occurrence)
 27 'tis the same i.e., the ring Yellowhammer made for Touchwood Junior 31 no inconscionable (a) very lacking in conscience (employing the double

- negative as an emphatic); or (b) not unconscious
 34 Did...it? i.e., did any runaway ever equal this villainy?
This' i.e., this is 43 close locked
 50 lately recently
 52 pestilence plague
 53 disease of lust (a) lust considered as a disease; (b) venereal disease resulting from lust
 54–5 ta'en...out i.e., for rendering a man at a loss for words, the situation in which you have caught me is the worst possible
 56 do...me i.e., I am not so bad as the present situation makes me appear

- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Look after him, and spare not: there he walks
That never yet received baffling: you're blest
More than e'er I knew; go, take your rest. Exit
- SIR WALTER
60 I pardon you, you are both losers. Exit
- 3.2 A bed thrust out upon the stage, Allwit's Wife in it. Enter all the Gossips, [the Puritans, Maudline, Lady Kix, and Nurse with child. Low stools set out.]
- FIRST GOSSIP [to Allwit's Wife]
How is't, woman? We have brought you home
A kersen soul.
WIFE Ay, I thank your pains.
FIRST PURITAN
And, verily, well kersened i' the right way,
Without idolatry or superstition,
5 After the pure manner of Amsterdam.
WIFE
Sit down, good neighbours.—Nurse!
NURSE At hand, forsooth.
WIFE
Look they have all low stools.
NURSE They have, forsooth.
SECOND GOSSIP
Bring the child hither, nurse.—How say you now, Gossip, is't not a chopping girl? So like the father.
THIRD GOSSIP
10 As if it had been spit out of his mouth!
Eyed, nosed, and browed as like a girl can be,
Only indeed it has the mother's mouth.
SECOND GOSSIP
The mother's mouth up and down, up and down!
THIRD GOSSIP
'Tis a large child; she's but a little woman.
- FIRST PURITAN
No, believe me, a very spiny creature, but all heart; 15
Well mettled, like the faithful, to endure
Her tribulation here and raise up seed.
- SECOND GOSSIP
She had a sore labour on't, I warrant you;
You can tell, neighbour.
- THIRD GOSSIP O, she had great speed;
We were afraid once, but she made us all 20
Have joyful hearts again; 'tis a good soul, i' faith;
The midwife found her a most cheerful daughter.
- FIRST PURITAN
'Tis the spirit; the sisters are all like her.
Enter Sir Walter with two spoons and plate, and Allwit
- SECOND GOSSIP
O, here comes the chief gossip, neighbours.
[Exit Nurse with child]
- SIR WALTER
The fatness of your wishes to you all, ladies. 25
- THIRD GOSSIP
O, dear, sweet gentleman, what fine words he has:
'The fatness of our wishes!'
- SECOND GOSSIP Calls us all 'ladies!'
- FOURTH GOSSIP
I promise you, a fine gentleman and a courteous.
- SECOND GOSSIP
Methinks her husband shows like a clown to him.
- THIRD GOSSIP I would not care what clown my husband 30 were too, so I had such fine children.
- SECOND GOSSIP She's all fine children, gossip.
- THIRD GOSSIP Ay, and see how fast they come.
- FIRST PURITAN
Children are blessings, if they be got with zeal
By the brethren, as I have five at home. 35
- 57 Look after him watch out for him
58 baffling disgrace. This jousting term for the defeat or humiliation of an unworthy knight foreshadows the duel at 4.4.61–72; but its lofty chivalric connotations are undercut by the fact that Allwit uses the same word for his trick on the Promoters (2.2.74).
58–9 you're . . . knew you are luckier than anyone I've known (i.e., to escape with your life)
60 I . . . losers possible allusion to the proverb 'Give losers leave to speak'. Sir Walter's game image suggests that as one of life's winners he can afford to pardon the losers; his last lines (at 5.1.151) will reverse this boast.
3.2.2 kersen Christian or christened
3 kersened christened
5 Amsterdam a haven for Puritans and other religious dissenters. This remark, and the Puritans at the christening, may suggest that the Allwits have Puritan leanings, though Allwit mocks the excesses of the play's two doctrinaire Puritans.
8 hither here
9 chopping strapping
10 spit . . . mouth proverbial. The baby's likeness to Allwit may be (a) a polite christening cliché; or (b) an intimation that Allwit is actually the father. Campaign's portrait of a wittol, on which Middleton seems to have drawn, stresses that the wittol 'cuckolds' the man who keeps the wittol's wife.
13 up and down exactly
15 spiny lean
16 mettled spirited, with possible suggestion of 'tipsy' the faithful Puritans (in their own parlance)
16–17 endure . . . here Earthly life was called a tribulation to be endured as preparation for eternal life.
17 raise up seed produce and raise offspring
18 sore . . . on't difficult labour warrant assure 19 You can tell The eyewitness reports of the labour and birth show that Allwit's wife has followed the common custom of giving birth in the company of a group of women friends.
great speed good success
23 the spirit (a) the Holy Spirit; (b) alcohol 23.1 spoons a common christening gift plate gold or silver ware
25 fatness fullness; suggestion of over-indulgence
27 Calls . . . 'ladies' 'Lady' denoted aristocracy or gentry, appropriate to Sir Walter's class and to Lady Kix but an inflated compliment to the middle-class women at the christening.
29 shows . . . to appears like a country bumpkin by comparison with 32 She's she has 34 Children are blessings proverbial zeal religious enthusiasm, with suggestion of sexual gusto

- SIR WALTER [to Allwit's Wife]
The worst is past, I hope now, lady.
WIFE So I hope too, good sir.
ALLWIT [aside]
Why, then, so hope I too for company;
I have nothing to do else.
SIR WALTER [giving cup and spoons]
A poor remembrance, lady,
40 To the love of the babe; I pray, accept of it.
WIFE O, you are at too much charge, sir!
SECOND GOSSIP
Look, look! What has he given her? What is't, gossip?
THIRD GOSSIP
Now, by my faith, a fair high standing-cup
And two great 'postle-spoons, one of them gilt.
FIRST PURITAN
45 Sure that was Judas then with the red beard.
SECOND PURITAN
I would not feed my daughter with that spoon
For all the world, for fear of colouring her hair;
Red hair the brethren like not, it consumes them much:
'Tis not the sisters' colour.
Enter Nurse with comfits and wine
ALLWIT Well said, nurse;
50 About, about with them amongst the gossips!
[Aside] Now out comes all the tasselled handkerchiefs,
They are spread abroad between their knees already;
Now in goes the long fingers that are washed
- Some thrice a day in urine; my wife uses it.
Now we shall have such pocketing: see how
They lurch at the lower end!
FIRST PURITAN Come hither, nurse.
ALLWIT [aside]
Again? She has taken twice already.
FIRST PURITAN [taking comfits]
I had forgot a sister's child that's sick.
ALLWIT [aside] A pox! It seems your purity loves sweet things well that puts in thrice together. 60
Had this been all my cost now, I had been beggared;
These women have no consciences at sweetmeats,
Where'er they come; see an they have not culled out
All the long plums too, they have left nothing here
But short wriggle-tail comfits, not worth mouthing. 65
No mar'l I heard a citizen complain once
That his wife's belly only broke his back;
Mine had been all in fitters seven years since,
But for this worthy knight,
That with a prop upholds my wife and me, 70
And all my estate buried in Bucklersbury.
WIFE [pledging them]
Here, Mistress Yellowhammer and neighbours,
To you all that have taken pains with me,
All the good wives at once!
[Nurse goes around pouring wine]
FIRST PURITAN I'll answer for them. 75
They wish all health and strength,
And that you may courageously go forward

38 for company in order to be sociable, with suggestion of sexual company; another example of Allwit's obsequious agreement with everything Sir Walter says
40 accept of accept
41 you... charge i.e., you have spent too much money
43 standing-cup stemmed goblet
44 'postle-spoons silver spoons with an apostle portrayed on the handle; though a common christening gift, the spoons are considered idolatrous by the Puritans gilt silver covered with gold
45 Judas... beard The disciple who betrayed Christ was traditionally depicted with red hair, linked with lechery (note that the Welsh Gentlewoman has red hair). If the First Puritan is right about the identity of the apostle on the spoon, Judas seems an odd choice for a gift decoration, but apt enough considering all the betrayals in the play.
48 consumes eats them up (with anger, or lust)
49 sisters female Puritans
49.1 Enter Nurse... wine From here on, the scene becomes a stock portrayal of female carousing, gormandizing, and gossiping at a christening party, found in many male-authored Renaissance antifeminist writings.

comfits sweets
49 Well said well done
51 tasselled handkerchiefs fashionably large, ornamental handkerchiefs with tassels at the corners
54 urine used as a cleansing or cosmetic lotion. The disgusting ingredients of cosmetics were a staple of antifeminist satire.
55 pocketing smuggling home of sweets
56 lurch filch
lower end far end of the table, with bawdy innuendo
59 A pox oath, equivalent to cursing the Puritan sister with venereal disease 62 no... sweetmeats The notion of Puritan gluttony may have arisen from Puritan opposition to Lenten and Friday fasting, which Puritans saw as popish.
sweetmeats goodies preserved in sugar
63 an if
64 plums sugar plums. Their choosing the long sweets in preference to the short is phallically suggestive.
65 short... mouthing suggestion of short phallus and oral sex; 'wriggle-tail' seems to describe a twisted sweet, but is also sexually suggestive. (Freudian readings make much of the play's oral and urogenital fixations as suggesting infantile gratification.)

66 No mar'l no marvel; i.e., it is no wonder 67 his... back (a) her gluttony, and pregnancies necessitating expensive, gluttonous christening parties, made him overwork to support her; (b) her demands for sex taxed his virility only alone
68 Mine had been my back would have been fitters small pieces
seven years see note to 1.2.16. In addition to Sir Walter's seven-year support of the Allwits, Touchwood Senior has lived in London for over seven years, the Kixes have been married and childless for seven years, and two sets of seven children are mentioned; the ubiquity of the number seven may suggest the Renaissance theory of seven-year cycles or climacterics, hinting that this materialistic society is at the end of a cycle, on the verge of regeneration.
since ago
70 prop financial support, with phallic suggestion
71 Bucklersbury street running south from Cheapside, occupied by grocers and apothecaries. Without Sir Walter, Allwit would have given these shopkeepers all his money for catering christenings.

- To perform the like, and many such,
Like a true sister, with motherly bearing.
[She drinks]
ALLWIT [aside]
Now the cups troll about to wet the gossips' whistles.
80 It pours down, i'faith; they never think of payment.
FIRST PURITAN Fill again, nurse.
[She drinks]
ALLWIT [aside]
Now, bless thee, two at once! I'll stay no longer;
It would kill me an if I paid for't.—
[To Sir Walter] Will it please you to walk down and leave the women?
SIR WALTER
With all my heart, Jack.
85 ALLWIT Troth, I cannot blame you.
SIR WALTER
Sit you all merry, ladies.
ALL GOSSIP Thank your worship, sir.
FIRST PURITAN Thank your worship, sir.
ALLWIT [aside]
A pox twice tittle ye, you are last and lowest!
Exit [with Sir Walter]
FIRST PURITAN
Bring hither that same cup, nurse; I would fain
90 Drive away this—hup!—antichristian grief.
[She drinks]
THIRD GOSSIP
See, gossip, an she lies not in like a countess.
Would I had such a husband for my daughter!
FOURTH GOSSIP
Is not she toward marriage?
THIRD GOSSIP O no, sweet gossip!
FOURTH GOSSIP
Why, she's nineteen!
THIRD GOSSIP Ay, that she was last Lammas,
95 But she has a fault, gossip, a secret fault.
- FOURTH GOSSIP
A fault? What is't?
THIRD GOSSIP I'll tell you when I have drunk.
[She drinks. Exit Nurse]
FOURTH GOSSIP [aside]
Wine can do that, I see, that friendship cannot.
THIRD GOSSIP
And now I'll tell you, gossip; she's too free.
FOURTH GOSSIP
Too free?
THIRD GOSSIP
O ay, she cannot lie dry in her bed.
FOURTH GOSSIP
What, and nineteen?
THIRD GOSSIP 'Tis as I tell you, gossip. 100
[Enter Nurse]
MAUDLINE
Speak with me, nurse? Who is't?
NURSE A gentleman
From Cambridge; I think it be your son, forsooth.
MAUDLINE
'Tis my son Tim, i'faith; prithee, call him up
Among the women, 'twill embolden him well,
[Exit Nurse]
105 For he wants nothing but audacity.
'Would the Welsh gentlewoman at home were here
now.
LADY Is your son come, forsooth?
MAUDLINE Yes, from the university, forsooth.
LADY 'Tis great joy on ye.
MAUDLINE There's a great marriage towards for him. 110
LADY
A marriage?
MAUDLINE Yes, sure, a huge heir in Wales
At least to nineteen mountains,
Besides her goods and cattle.

77 perform...such have many more successful childbirths

79 troll circulate

80 of payment i.e., of how much all this costs. It is ironic that Allwit the wife-renter is offended by the gossips' trivial failings, and that he who pays for nothing complains of the expense of the celebration; it is possible, though, to see Allwit here as a choric spokesman for patriarchal values, horrified that women, who are supposed to conserve, are extravagantly spending, a moral lapse paralleling their bladder incontinence.

84–5 Will...Jack a good example of male homosocial bonding fostered in opposition to female camaraderie, portrayed as disgusting

88 tittle (a) intoxicate; (b) descend on you as payment for your drunkenness; (c) topple, cause to fall down last and lowest the Puritans sisters' wish for lowliness and insistence on low stools is now transmuted into the likelihood of their lying in a drunken stupor on the floor; possible ironic twist of proverb 'last but not least'

90 hup hiccup

91 an she lies not i. e., doesn't she lie countess another possible reference to the extravagant lying in of the Countess of Salisbury

93 toward marriage about the age to be married

94 Lammas August 1, church harvest festival

95 secret fault That the gossip declares the fault secret and then immediately divulges it exemplifies the Renaissance stereotype that women cannot keep a secret; tipping exacerbated this fault in many satiric scenes of the period.

Since the ideal chaste woman was seen as a sealed container, the 'bad' woman suffered varieties of leakiness: bibulousness, talkativeness, sexual profligacy, bladder incontinence.

97 Wine...cannot i.e., wine can produce intimacy that even friendship cannot produce; possible reference to proverb 'In wine there is truth' or 'What soberness conceals drunkenness reveals'

99 cannot...bed is a bed-wetter (another reference to women's physical incontinence, thought to reflect moral incontinence)

105 wants lacks

110 towards in the offing

111 huge heir heir to huge estates

112 At least to to at least

113 cattle (a) her two thousand runts; (b) chattel as wealth, property

Enter [Nurse with] Tim

TIM O, I'm betrayed! Exit

MAUDLINE What, gone again? Run after him, good nurse;
[Exit Nurse]

115 He's so bashful; that's the spoil of youth.
In the university they're kept still to men,
And ne'er trained up to women's company.

LADY 'Tis a great spoil of youth, indeed.
Enter Nurse and Tim

NURSE Your mother will have it so.

MAUDLINE Why son, why Tim!

120 What, must I rise and fetch you? For shame, son!

TIM Mother, you do entreat like a freshwoman;
'Tis against the laws of the university
For any that has answered under bachelor
To thrust 'mongst married wives.

MAUDLINE Come, we'll excuse you here.

TIM Call up my tutor, mother, and I care not.

MAUDLINE What, is your tutor come? Have you brought him up?

TIM I ha' not brought him up, he stands at door:
Negatur. There's logic to begin with you, mother.

MAUDLINE Run, call the gentleman, nurse; he's my son's tutor.
[Exit Nurse]

130 [To Tim] Here, eat some plums.

TIM Come I from Cambridge, and offer me six plums!

MAUDLINE Why, how now, Tim?
Will not your old tricks yet be left?

TIM Served like a child,

When I have answered under bachelor!

MAUDLINE You'll never lin till I make your tutor whip you;
You know how I served you once at the free-school
In Paul's church-yard?

TIM O monstrous absurdity!
Ne'er was the like in Cambridge since my time;
Life, whip a bachelor! You'd be laughed at soundly;
Let not my tutor hear you!

140 'Twould be a jest through the whole university.
No more words, mother.
Enter Tutor

MAUDLINE Is this your tutor, Tim?

TUTOR Yes, surely, lady, I am the man that brought him
In league with logic and read the Dunces to him.

TIM That did he, mother, but now I have 'em all in my own pate, and can as well read 'em to others.

TUTOR That can he, mistress, for they flow naturally from him.

MAUDLINE [to Tutor]
I'm the more beholden to your pains, sir.

TUTOR Non ideo sane.

MAUDLINE True, he was an idiot indeed,
When he went out of London, but now he's well mended.

150 Did you receive the two goose-pies I sent you?

TUTOR And ate them heartily, thanks to your worship.

MAUDLINE [to Gossips] 'Tis my son Tim; I pray, bid him welcome, gentlewomen.

TIM 'Tim'? Hark you: 'Timotheus', Mother, 'Timotheus'.

MAUDLINE How? Shall I deny your name? 'Timotheus', quoth he. Faith, there's a name! 'Tis my son Tim, forsooth.

155

I'm betrayed Tim seems to have walked unwittingly into the scene of drunken gossiping.

115 spoil ruination

116-17 In...company a commonplace

116 still to always with

121 freshwoman female equivalent of 'freshman', a first-year university student (an absurdity since women never attended university); possible play on 'fresh' as sexually impudent

123 answered...bachelor achieved the standing of 'bachelor'

124 thrust with sexual innuendo

125-7 up...up Maudline seems to mean 'up from London', but Tim thinks she means 'upstairs'.

128 Negatur it is denied; portion of the Latin formula for denying an opponent's argument in an academic debate

131 plums perhaps a babyish food, unfitting for a university man; but 'plum' also had slang meaning 'puendum'

133 Will not...left i.e., don't you retain any of the habits and likings of your childhood?

135 lin cease; i.e., stop being insubordinate to her whip Students could be whipped by their tutors, but this was rare once they had reached adult age (about 18) and had taken their B.A. Whipping was considered such a disgrace that a year before Chaste Maid was first acted, the son of the Bishop of Bristol killed himself to avoid being whipped.

136 served treated; i.e., whipped or had him whipped for disobedience free-school St Paul's School, founded by John Colet for poor scholars

144 Dunces 'schoolmen', the disciples of John Duns Scotus (1265?-1308?). When these scholastic philosophers were attacked by sixteenth-century humanists and reformers, the term came to mean 'blockhead', or 'pedant'.

146 pate head

147 naturally (a) spontaneously; (b) half-wittedly

149 Non ideo sane 'not for that reason indeed' (Latin); common tag in academic disputation. Maudline takes 'ideo' for 'idiot'.

155 Timotheus Latinization of 'Tim'; spoofs the affectations of university learning, where published scholars often Latinized their names

156 Shall I deny your name? ironic echo of Revelation 3:8 (Geneva): 'Thou... hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name'

- LADY You're welcome, Master Tim.
She kisses Tim
- 160 TIM [aside to Tutor] O this is horrible, she wets as she kisses! Your handkerchief, sweet tutor, to wipe them off as fast as they come on.
- SECOND GOSSIP Welcome from Cambridge.
She kisses Tim
- 165 TIM [aside to Tutor] This is intolerable! This woman has a villainous sweet breath, did she not stink of comfits. Help me, sweet tutor, or I shall rub my lips off.
- TUTOR I'll go kiss the lower end the whilst.
- TIM Perhaps that's the sweeter, and we shall dispatch the sooner.
- 170 FIRST PURITAN Let me come next. Welcome from the wellspring of discipline that waters all the brethren.
[She] reels and falls
- TIM Hoist, I beseech thee!
- THIRD GOSSIP O bless the woman!—Mistress Underman!
- FIRST PURITAN 'Tis but the common affliction of the faithful; We must embrace our falls.
- 175 TIM [aside to tutor] I'm glad I 'scaped it; it was some rotten kiss, sure, it dropped down before it came at me.
Enter Allwit and Davy
- ALLWIT [aside] Here's a noise! Not parted yet? Heyday, a looking glass! They have drunk so hard in plate
- 180 That some of them had need of other vessels.
[Aloud] Yonder's the bravest show!
- ALL GOSSIPS Where, where, sir?
- ALLWIT Come along presently by the Pissing-Conduit With two brave drums and a standard bearer.
- ALL GOSSIPS O, brave!
- TIM Come, tutor! Exit [with Tutor]
- ALL GOSSIPS [to Allwit's Wife] Farewell, sweet gossip. 185
Exeunt [Gossips]
- WIFE I thank you all for your pains.
- FIRST PURITAN Feed and grow strong.
Exeunt [Maudline, Lady Kix, and Puritans; the bed, with Allwit's Wife in it, is withdrawn]
- ALLWIT [calling after the Puritans]
 You had more need to sleep than eat;
 Go take a nap with some of the brethren, go,
 And rise up a well-edified, boldified sister! 190
 O here's a day of toil well passed o'er,
 Able to make a citizen hare-mad!
 How hot they have made the rooms with their thick bums!
 Dost not feel it, Davy?
- DAVY Monstrous strong, sir.
- ALLWIT What's here under the stools? 195
- DAVY Nothing but wet, sir, some wine spilt here belike.
- ALLWIT Is't no worse, think'st thou?
 Fair needlework stools cost nothing with them, Davy.
- DAVY [aside]
 Nor you neither, i'faith.
- ALLWIT Look how they have laid them,
 E'en as they lie themselves, with their heels up! 200
 How they have shuffled up the rushes too, Davy,
 With their short figging little shuttle-cork heels!
 These women can let nothing stand as they find it.
 But what's the secret thou'st about to tell me,
 My honest Davy?
- DAVY If you should disclose it, sir— 205
- ALLWIT Life, rip my belly up to the throat then, Davy.
- DAVY My master's upon marriage.

165 sweet breath . . . comfits i.e., the scent of comfits overwhelms the alcohol on her breath. 'Kissing comfits' were taken like breath mints.

167 lower end those at the bottom end of the table the whilst meanwhile

168 that's the sweeter Tim seems to think that 'the lower end' means 'the lower end of the women'.

171 wellspring of discipline Contemporary Cambridge was strongly Puritan; Tim's attending there is one of the indications that the Yellowhammers have Puritan tendencies.

waters spiritually nourishes, with a suggestion of urination (especially after 'lower end' in 3.2.167)

brethren Puritan brothers

172 Hoist lift up. This could be played so that she falls on top of Tim, which would lend piquancy to the ensuing line, which shows that it is Mistress Underman who has fallen on top of a man.

175 embrace our falls accept our moral (and sexual) lapses; a travesty of Calvin's doctrine that humans must humbly accept their fallen state

179 Heyday expression of surprise looking glass (a) mirror in which the gossips can view their behaviour;

 (b) chamber-pot

in plate i.e., in the silver-plated vessels used for the christening party

180 other vessels chamber pots

181 bravest most magnificent

182 presently immediately

Pissing-Conduit a channel in Cheapside, close to the Royal Exchange, whose name has obvious resonance with the gossips' condition; since Allwit's house overlooks the Conduit, it must be located in the Stocks meat market

183 two . . . bearer The phallic description of this procession rouses the gossips' enthusiasm; and it helps Allwit decoy them out of the house before they have a chance to drink any more.

brave splendid

187 Feed eat heartily

192 hare-mad as mad as a hare, which becomes wilder around breeding season—'as mad as a hare' was proverbial; possible pun on 'hair' as in pubic hair

193 bums (a) bumbasts, padding; (b) rumps

198 needlework stools stools with expensive embroidered covers (a current fashion) cost . . . them are not valued by them, because they did not pay for them

201 rushes green rushes were strewn on the floors of homes, in place of carpets

202 short . . . heels a loose woman was said to be short-heeled because she fell over backwards easily; 'shortheels' was slang for 'tart'

figging worthless

shuttle-cork heels punning alteration of 'shuttle-cock', a slang term for whores (since shuttle-cocks bounce back and forth from player to player). Cork heels, much in fashion, were also associated with sexual profligacy.

203 stand (a) remain; (b) stay erect, in a sexual innuendo

204 thou'st thou wast

206 then i.e., if I tell

	ALLWIT	Marriage, Davy? Send me to hanging rather!		And shake the golden fruit into her lap; About it, before she weep herself to a dry ground And whine out all her goodness.
	DAVY	[aside] I have stung him.		TOUCHWOOD SENIOR	Prithee, cease;
	ALLWIT	When, where? What is she, Davy?		I find a too much aptness in my blood
210	DAVY	E'en the same was gossip, and gave the spoon.		For such a business without provocation;	15
	ALLWIT	I have no time to stay, nor scarce can speak. I'll stop those wheels, or all the work will break.		You might' well spared this banquet of eryngoes, Artichokes, potatoes, and your buttered crab: They were fitter kept for your own wedding dinner.

10				TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR	Hope tells me so; But from your love and time my peace must grow.	35
					Exit

208 hanging allusion to proverb 'Weddings and hangings go by destiny'

210 gave the spoon Moll was not actually present at the spoon-giving (see 3.2.23-49), which is odd since she was one of the baby's godparents; perhaps we are to assume that after the foiled elopement in 3.1, she was either not in a partying mood, had no wish to participate in a ceremony with the other godparent (Sir Walter), or had been grounded by her father. 'Gave the spoon' might indicate she had literally or metaphorically 'signed the card' accompanying the gift, or simply that as a godparent she was a spoon-giver, a kind of defining epithet like 'treasure-giver' to an Anglo-Saxon king.

211-12 speak...break a common rhyme (both rhymed with 'cake')

212 wheels plots, machinations

214 him i.e., Allwit rank (a) sweaty; (b) corrupt

215 him i.e., Sir Walter

217-18 build...child probably a rhyme

3.3.6 gameful joyful

7 space time

9 lay...merit make his financial fortunes as bankrupt as is his moral worth

10 his wife i.e., Lady Kix perch...tree-top the image is that of a harvester shaking down fruit into the apron of his helper below

11 golden fruit golden apples guarded by the Greek nymphs, the Hesperides; a symbol of sexual delight

12 About it get on with it

13 Prithee I pray thee; please

16 might' might have

16-17 eryngoes...crab delicacies, considered aphrodisiacs (eryngoes are candied sea-holly root); metaphorically, Touchwood Senior's erotically-charged language, which has an aphrodisiac effect

19 an if

21 Pleas i.e., when in need; literally, in the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, where civil cases were heard. Ties in with other legal language ('suit', 'case') to cast Touchwood Senior as his brother's legal advocate.

23 crosses setbacks

24 new additions (a) fresh information; (b) increases to your fortune

25 look for expect

30 Weighing...own i.e., considering Moll's situation as if it were her own; possible quibble on 'case' as pudendum she's led she has led the way gutters house gutters; Moll escapes over the roofs (cf. 4.1.273)

32 ha' have

- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
You know the worst then, brother.—Now to my Kix,
The barren he and she; they're i' the next room;
But to say which of their two humours hold them
Now at this instant, I cannot say truly.
- 40 SIR OLIVER (to his lady, within) Thou liest, barrenness!
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
O, is't that time of day? Give you joy of your tongue,
There's nothing else good in you. This their life
The whole day, from eyes open to eyes shut,
Kissing or scolding, and then must be made friends;
45 Then rail the second part of the first fit out,
And then be pleased again, no man knows which way:
Fall out like giants and fall in like children;
Their fruit can witness as much.
Enter Sir Oliver Kix and his Lady
SIR OLIVER 'Tis thy fault.
LADY
Mine, drought and coldness?
SIR OLIVER Thine; 'tis thou art barren.
LADY
50 I barren? O life, that I durst but speak now
In mine own justice, in mine own right! I barren?
'Twas otherways with me when I was at court;
I was ne'er called so till I was married.
SIR OLIVER
I'll be divorced.
LADY Be hanged! I need not wish it;
55 That will come too soon to thee: I may say
'Marriage and hanging goes by destiny',
For all the goodness I can find in't yet.
SIR OLIVER
I'll give up house, and keep some fruitful whore,
Like an old bachelor, in a tradesman's chamber;
She and her children shall have all.
60 LADY Where be they?
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR Pray, cease;
When there are friendlier courses took for you
- To get and multiply within your house
At your own proper costs, in spite of censure,
Methinks an honest peace might be established. 65
SIR OLIVER
What, with her? Never.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR Sweet sir—
SIR OLIVER You work all in vain.
LADY
Then he doth all like thee.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR Let me entreat, sir—
SIR OLIVER
Singleness confound her! I took her with one smock.
LADY
But, indeed, you came not so single
When you came from shipboard.
SIR OLIVER [aside] Heart, she bit sore there!— 70
[To Touchwood Senior] Prithee, make 's friends.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR [aside]
Is't come to that? The peal begins to cease.
SIR OLIVER [to Lady Kix]
I'll sell all at an outcry!
LADY Do thy worst, slave!—
[To Touchwood Senior] Good sweet sir, bring us into love again.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR [aside]
Some would think this impossible to compass.— 75
[To them] Pray, let this storm fly over.
SIR OLIVER
Good sir, pardon me; I'm master of this house,
Which I'll sell presently; I'll clap up bills this evening.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR Lady! Friends! Come!
LADY
80 If e'er ye loved woman, talk not on't, sir.
What, friends with him! Good faith, do you think I'm mad?
With one that's scarce the hinder quarter of a man?
SIR OLIVER
Thou art nothing of a woman.
LADY Would I were less than nothing!

mean that his brother's fortunes, having touched bottom, are bound to be on the way up.

38 two humours two moods, loving and fighting
41 Give i.e., God give falling out may allude to the war of the Titans

intercourse; they make up 'like children', without fully consummated sex, as their lack of issue demonstrates 48 fruit offspring, or lack thereof insulted at court, where people are more polite than you are; (b) I was never called barren at court because there I was sexually loose

54 divorced Divorce, possible only for a very few, necessitated an individual act of Parliament; barrenness would not be sufficient grounds for divorce, but Sir Oliver might plead non-consummation, or complain of the profligacy at court to which Lady Kix may just have confessed.

SIR OLIVER
Nay, prithee, what dost mean?

LADY
I cannot please you.

SIR OLIVER
I'faith, thou art a good soul; he lies that says it;

85 [Kissing her]
Buss, buss, pretty rogue.

LADY
You care not for me.

TOUCHWOOD SENIOR [aside]
Can any man tell now which way they came in?
By this light, I'll be hanged then!

SIR OLIVER
Is the drink come?

TOUCHWOOD SENIOR (aside)
Here's a little vial of almond milk,
90 That stood me in some threepence.

SIR OLIVER
I hope to see thee, wench, within these few years,
Cirled with children, pranking up a girl,
And putting jewels in their little ears;
Fine sport, i'faith!

LADY
Ay, had you been ought, husband,

95 It had been done ere this time.

SIR OLIVER
Had I been ought! Hang thee! Hadst thou been ought!
But a cross thing I ever found thee.

LADY
Thou art a grub to say so.

SIR OLIVER
A pox on thee!

TOUCHWOOD SENIOR [aside]
By this light, they are out again at the same door,
100 And no man can tell which way! [To Sir Oliver]
Come, here's your drink, sir.

SIR OLIVER
I will not take it now, sir,
An I were sure to get three boys ere midnight.

LADY
Why, there thou show'st now of what breed thou com'st,
105 To hinder generation. O thou villain,
That knows how crookedly the world goes with us

For want of heirs, yet put by all good fortune.

SIR OLIVER
Hang, strumpet! I will take it now in spite.

TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Then you must ride upon't five hours.
[He gives vial to Sir Oliver]

SIR OLIVER
I mean so. Within there!
Enter a Servant

SERVANT
Sir?

SIR OLIVER
Saddle the white mare.
[Exit Servant]

I'll take a whore along and ride to Ware. 110

LADY
Ride to the devil!

SIR OLIVER
I'll plague you every way.
Look ye, do you see?
[He drinks]

'Tis gone.

LADY
A pox go with it!

SIR OLIVER
Ay, curse and spare not now.

TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Stir up and down, sir, you must not stand.

SIR OLIVER
Nay, I'm not given to standing. 115

SIR OLIVER

I learned it of my father, ever figient.
How if I crossed this, sir? 120

[He capers]

TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
O passing good, sir, and would show well a-horseback; when you come to your inn, if you leaped over a joint-stool or two, 'twere not amiss;
(Aside)—although you brake your neck, sir.

SIR OLIVER [capering]
What say you to a table thus high, 125
sir?

TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Nothing better, sir; [Aside—if it be

102 An even if

- 130 SIR OLIVER [capering about the stage all the while] Or else I had a bad head: you must receive, sir, four hundred pounds of me at four several payments: one hundred pound now in hand.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR Right, that I have, sir.
SIR OLIVER
135 Another hundred when my wife is quick; The third when she's brought a-bed; and the last hundred
When the child cries, for if it should be still-born, It doth no good, sir.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
All this even still: a little faster, sir.
140 SIR OLIVER [still capering] Not a whit, sir; I'm in an excellent pace for any physick.
Enter a Servant
SERVANT
Your white mare's ready.
SIR OLIVER [still capering] I shall up presently.
[Exit Servant]
[To Lady Kix] One kiss, and farewell. [He kisses her]
LADY Thou shalt have two, love.
SIR OLIVER
Expect me about three. Exit, [capering]
LADY With all my heart, sweet.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR [aside]
145 By this light, they have forgot their anger since, And are as far in again as e'er they were. Which way the devil came they? Heart, I saw 'em not,
Their ways are beyond finding out. [To Lady Kix]
Come, sweet lady.
LADY How must I take mine, sir?
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Clean contrary; yours must be taken lying. 150
LADY
A-bed, sir?
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
A-bed, or where you will for your own ease,
Your coach will serve.
LADY The physick must needs please. Exeunt

4.1.1-20 Latin disputation was the major teaching method in Renaissance universities. The argument here, on a common topic, relies on both parties accepting the traditional definition of a human as a 'rational animal or creature' (animal rationale). Parker translates the dialogue as follows:
TIM Your proof is denied, tutor.
TUTOR I demonstrate it to you, pupil, a fool is not a rational creature.
TIM You will certainly fail.
TUTOR I beg you to be silent: I prove it to you—
TIM How do you prove it, sir?
TUTOR A fool has not the power of

- reason, therefore he is not a rational creature.
TIM Thus you argue, sir: a fool has not the power of reason, therefore he is not a rational creature. Your argument is denied again, tutor.
TUTOR Again I demonstrate the proof, sir: he who does not share the power of reason, in no wise can be termed rational; but a fool does not share the power of reason, therefore a fool in no wise can be said to be rational.
TIM He does share it.
TUTOR So you argue: who shares it, how does he share it?
TIM As a man: I will prove it to you by a syllogism.
TUTOR Prove this.
TIM Thus I prove it, sir: a fool is a man just as you and I are; a man is a rational creature, just so a fool is a rational creature.
12 rationalibus the Tutor's mistake for rationalis

 25 Your reasons are both good, whate'er they be;
 Pray, give them o'er; faith, you'll tire yourselves;
 What's the matter between you?
 TIM
 Nothing but reasoning about a fool, mother.
 MAUDLINE About a fool, son? Alas, what need you trouble 30 your heads about that? None of us all but knows what a fool is.
 TIM Why, what's a fool, mother? I come to you now.
 MAUDLINE Why, one that's married before he has wit.
 TIM 'Tis pretty, i'faith, and well guessed of a woman never 35 brought up at the university; but bring forth what fool you will, mother, I'll prove him to be as reasonable a creature as myself or my tutor here.
 MAUDLINE
 Fie, 'tis impossible.
 TUTOR Nay, he shall do't, forsooth.
 TIM 'Tis the easiest thing to prove a fool by logic;
 By logic I'll prove anything.
 40 MAUDLINE What, thou wilt not!
 TIM I'll prove a whore to be an honest woman.
 MAUDLINE Nay, by my faith, she must prove that herself,
 Or logic will never do't.
 TIM 'Twill do't, I tell you.
 MAUDLINE Some in this street would give a thousand 45 pounds
 That you could prove their wives so.
 TIM Faith, I can,
- And all their daughters too, though they had three bastards.
 When comes your tailor hither?
 MAUDLINE Why, what of him?
 TIM By logic I'll prove him to be a man,
 50 Let him come when he will.
 MAUDLINE [to Tutor] How hard at first was learning to him!
 Truly, sir, I thought he would never a took the Latin tongue. How many accidences do you think he wore out ere he came to his grammar?
 55 TUTOR
 Some three or four.
 MAUDLINE Believe me, sir, some four-and-thirty.
 TIM Pish, I made haberdines of 'em in church porches.
 MAUDLINE He was eight years in his grammar, and stuck horribly at a foolish place there called ass in praesenti.
 TIM Pox, I have it here now. [He points to his forehead]
 60 MAUDLINE He so shamed me once before an honest gentleman that knew me when I was a maid.
 TIM These women must have all out!
 MAUDLINE 'Quid est grammatica?' says the gentleman to him—I shall remember by a sweet, sweet token—but 65 nothing could he answer.
 TUTOR How now, pupil, ha? Quid est grammatica?
 TIM Grammatica? Ha, ha, ha!
 MAUDLINE Nay, do not laugh, son, but let me hear you say it now: there was one word went so prettily off the 70 gentleman's tongue, I shall remember it the longest day of my life.
 TUTOR Come, quid est grammatica?
 TIM Are you not ashamed, tutor? Grammatica: why, recte scribendi atque loquendi ars, sir-reverence of my mother.
 75 MAUDLINE That was it, i'faith! Why now, son, I see you are a deep scholar. And, Master Tutor, a word I pray. [Aside to Tutor] Let us withdraw a little into my husband's chamber. I'll send in the North-Wales gentlewoman to

23-4 TUTOR 'So you contend: a fool is a man just as you and I are; a man is a rational creature, just so a fool is a rational creature'. (Middleton repeats the Latin to make sure his audience grasps the joke: Tim and the Tutor are fools.)
 27 matter issue
 32 I...now I pose the question to you (disputation term)
 33 one...wit a proverb that foreshadows the fate of the foolish Tim
 34 pretty i.e., a clever argument
 39 prove a fool (a) construct an argument proving fools rational; (b) turn out to be a fool oneself. (Tim is presumably oblivious to the second meaning.)
 41 honest chaste, faithful to one man
 49-50 tailor...man Tailors were frequently regarded as unmanly, probably because sewing was deemed 'feminine'; hence the proverb 'Nine tailors make but one man' and the nursery rhyme 'Four-and-twenty tailors | Went to kill a snail'.

 54 accidences books of rules for Latin inflexions

 59 ass in praesenti a phrase, meaning 'as in the present tense', occurring at the beginning of the 'verb' section of a famous Latin grammar text; the 'ass/arse' pun was frequent 62 knew...maid 'knew' was a biblical euphemism for 'had sex with'; 'maid' could mean either 'virgin' or 'unmarried woman'. Maudline's pronouncement seems unintentionally suggestive.
 63 must...out i.e., must tell everything; with a sexual suggestion
 64 Quid est grammatica what is grammar? (Latin)

 74 Are...ashamed i.e., 'aren't you ashamed to ask me such an easy question?', or (more likely, given his apology in the next sentence), 'Aren't you ashamed to ask me a question that will produce an answer like "arse"?'
 75 sir-reverence corruption of 'saving your reverence' or salve reverentia, a formula similar to the modern 'pardon my French'
 76 That was it i.e., the word 'ars' was the 'sweet, sweet token' or 'one word' that her gentleman friend used to say (cf. 4.1.70)

80 him, she looks for wooing. I'll put together both and lock the door.

TUTOR

I give great approbation to your conclusion.

Exeunt [Maudline and Tutor]

TIM I mar'l what this gentlewoman should be that I should have in marriage. She's a stranger to me.

85 I wonder what my parents mean, i'faith,
To match me with a stranger so,
A maid that's neither kith nor kin to me.
Life, do they think I have no more care of my body than to lie with one that I ne'er knew, a mere stranger, 90 one that ne'er went to school with me neither, nor ever play-fellows together?
They're mightily o'erseen in't, methinks.

They say she has mountains to her marriage;
She's full of cattle, some two thousand runts:
95 Now what the meaning of these runts should be,
My tutor cannot tell me.

I have looked in Rider's Dictionary for the letter R, and there I can hear no tidings of these runts neither; unless they should be Romford hogs, I know them not.

Methinks, i'faith, 'tis boldly done of her

She shall not say I'm so proud yet but I'll speak to her;

WELSH GENTLEWOMAN Rhyw gosyn a chwigyn ar ôl bod yn cerdedd am dro.

TIM [aside] By my faith, she's a good scholar, I see that already: She has the tongues plain; I hold my life she has travelled. What will folks say? 'There goes the learned couple!' Faith, if the truth were known she hath proceeded! 130

Tim's claim to be a 'homunculus' and the earlier emphasis on Sir Oliver's 'shortness' (3.3.98) may indicate the presence of boy actors from the Queen's Revels. A 'homunculus', in medical theory, was a fully-formed proto-human present in sperm; thus Tim's strained

Invisible but horrid;

His darts are so confounding,

But that he keeps their lips in play.

Fame sets her out with richer ornaments
215 Than you are pleased to boast of; 'tis done modestly:
I hear she's towards marriage.
- YELLOWHAMMER You hear truth, sir.
ALLWIT
And with a knight in town, Sir Walter Whorehound.
YELLOWHAMMER
The very same, sir.
ALLWIT I am the sorrier for't.
YELLOWHAMMER The sorrier? Why, cousin?
ALLWIT
220 'Tis not too far past, is't? It may yet be recalled?
YELLOWHAMMER Recalled? Why, good sir?
- ALLWIT
Resolve me in that point, ye shall hear from me.
YELLOWHAMMER
There's no contract passed.
ALLWIT I am very joyful, sir.
YELLOWHAMMER But he's the man must bed her.
ALLWIT
By no means, coz; she's quite undone then,
225 And you'll curse the time that e'er you made the match;
He's an arrant whoremaster, consumes his time and state,
[]
Whom in my knowledge he hath kept this seven years;
Nay, coz, another man's wife too.
YELLOWHAMMER O, abominable! 230
ALLWIT
Maintains the whole house, apparels the husband, Pays servants' wages, not so much but []
YELLOWHAMMER
Worse and worse! And doth the husband know this?
ALLWIT
Knows? Ay, and glad he may, too, 'tis his living, 235 As other trades thrive—butchers by selling flesh,
Poulters by vending conies, or the like, coz.
YELLOWHAMMER
What an incomparable wittol's this!
ALLWIT
Tush, what cares he for that? Believe me, coz,
No more than I do.
YELLOWHAMMER What a base slave is that!
ALLWIT
All's one to him; he feeds and takes his ease,
240 Was ne'er the man that ever broke his sleep
To get a child yet, by his own confession,
And yet his wife has seven.
YELLOWHAMMER What, by Sir Walter?
ALLWIT
Sir Walter's like to keep 'em and maintain 'em
In excellent fashion; he dares do no less, sir. 245
YELLOWHAMMER
Life, has he children too?

197 peals o' life life imagined as ringing like a bell with pulsating sexuality
198 strange unknown
199 more...sake Allwit pretends to be Yellowhammer's distant cousin.
203 Abingdon actually the county town of Berkshire, five miles south of Oxford 204 best Yellowhammers The boasting about the name may reflect the fact that two medieval Yellowhammers were Lord Mayors of London.
205 thence there citizen member of the London middle classes, including merchants, shopkeepers, well-off craftsmen, and some others (a fluid category)

211 for her on her behalf
212 confirmed firmly established
213 plaguy troublesome
216 towards marriage about to be married
220 recalled called off
222 Resolve...me i.e., satisfy me on that question and then I'll continue
223 contract marriage agreement; it was legally very difficult to get out of such an agreement once formalized
225 coz familiar form of 'cousin'

228 [] A line seems to be missing here, the gist of which may be something like 'with a woman in this neighbourhood'.
232 another truncated and perhaps censored part-line, represented (as elsewhere) by a long dash in COTES 236 Poulters poulterers (poultry dealers), with suggestion of 'pimps'; another reference to the sale of women as food to be consumed.
vending conies selling rabbits, with suggestion of whores

ALLWIT	Children! Boys thus high, In their Cato and Corderius.	No matter, so the whore he keeps be wholesome— My daughter takes no hurt then. So let them wed; I'll have him sweat well ere they go to bed.	270
YELLOWHAMMER	What? You jest, sir!	Enter Maudline
ALLWIT	Why, one can make a verse And is now at Eton College.	MAUDLINE O, husband, husband!
YELLOWHAMMER	O, this news has cut into my heart, coz.	YELLOWHAMMER How now, Maudline?
250 ALLWIT	It had eaten nearer, if it had not been prevented: One Allwit's wife.	MAUDLINE We are all undone! She's gone, she's gone!
YELLOWHAMMER	Allwit? Foot, I have heard of him; He had a girl kersened lately?	YELLOWHAMMER Again? Death! Which way?
ALLWIT	Ay, that work Did cost the knight above a hundred mark.	MAUDLINE Over the houses. Lay the waterside; she's gone for ever, else.
YELLOWHAMMER	I'll mark him for a knave and villain for't. A thousand thanks and blessings! I have done with him.	YELLOWHAMMER O vent'rous baggage!	Exeunt 275
ALLWIT [aside]	Ha, ha, ha! This knight will stick by my ribs still; I shall not lose him yet; no wife will come; Where'er he woos, I find him still at home. Ha, ha!	Enter Tim and Tutor	4.2
255 YELLOWHAMMER	Well, grant all this, say now his deeds are black, Pray, what serves marriage but to call him back? I have kept a whore myself, and had a bastard By Mistress Anne, in anno []	TIM Thieves, thieves! My sister's stol'n! Some thief hath got her: O, how miraculously did my father's plate 'scape! 'Twas all left out, tutor.
260 ALLWIT	I care not who knows it; he's now a jolly fellow, He's been twice warden. So may his fruit be; They were but base begot, and so was he. The knight is rich, he shall be my son-in-law.	TUTOR Is't possible?
265 YELLOWHAMMER		TIM Besides three chains of pearl and a box of coral. My sister's gone. Let's look at Trig Stairs for her. My mother's gone to lay the common stairs At Puddle Wharf; and at the dock below Stands my poor silly father. Run, sweet tutor, run!	5 Exeunt
		Enter both the Touchwoods	4.3
		TOUCHWOOD SENIOR I had been taken, brother, by eight sergeants,

247 Cato and Corderius authors of two popular moralizing schoolbooks favoured by Puritans

249 Eton College school patronized by the gentle classes, 23 miles west of London; composing Latin verses was a common school exercise. Allwit seems to be lying about this son, who is nowhere else mentioned.

251 prevented anticipated

252 Foot short for 'Christ's foot' (oath)

254 the knight i.e., Sir Walter above more than hundred mark over 66 pounds

257 stick . . . ribs i.e., stay very close

261 what . . . marriage what is marriage good for. The idea that the love of a good woman could reform the wildest of men was current in Middleton's time.

call him back reform him

263 anno in the year (Latin)

[] The date may have been left blank for the actor to fill in the date the play was performed.

264 he's i.e., the bastard son

265 warden (a) member of the governing body of a city trade guild; (b) a kind of pear, hence the play on 'fruit'

his fruit Yellowhammer's bastard's offspring

266 They . . . he i.e., Yellowhammer's bastard son's children will prove to be illegitimately sired, like their father

267 knight is rich a reminder that positing a marital exchange of bourgeois money for the prestige of a gentleman's title is too simple; Touchwood Junior is a gentleman, but that is not enough—Yellowhammer wants gentility and money.

268 wholesome free of the pox

270 sweat be treated in a steam tub for venereal disease

273 Over the houses i.e., across the rooftops

274 Lay set watch on

275 vent'rous baggage bold girl

4.2.2 plate silver-plated ornaments. Tim's automatic placing of his sister in the same category as the family silver is another instance of daughters' being considered material property; but that such attitudes are attributed to a complete fool suggests that they are being satirized rather than unthinkingly accepted.

5-7 Trig Stairs . . . dock below embarkation points on the Thames; since 'trig' also meant coxcomb, the association with Tim is suitable

6 common public

7 Puddle Wharf originally so called because a man called Puddle kept a wharf there, but later because horses watered there and created puddles on the wharf; ties in with other urine imagery in the play below downstream, perhaps at Dung Wharf, where the city refuse was loaded on to barges

8 silly innocent

4.3.1 had been taken would have been arrested sergeants sheriff's officers

- But for the honest watermen; I am bound to them;
They are the most requiteful'st people living,
For as they get their means by gentlemen,
They are still the forwardest to help gentlemen.
5 You heard how one 'scaped out of the Blackfriars,
But a while since, from two or three varlets
Came into the house with all their rapiers drawn,
As if they'd dance the sword-dance on the stage,
10 With candles in their hands, like chandlers' ghosts,
Whilst the poor gentleman so pursued and bandied
Was by an honest pair of oars safely landed.
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
I love them with my heart for't.
Enter three or four Watermen
FIRST WATERMAN Your first man, sir.
SECOND WATERMAN
Shall I carry you gentlemen with a pair of oars?
15 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR These be the honest fellows.
Take one pair and leave the rest for her.
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
Barn Elms.
TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
No more, brother.
FIRST WATERMAN Your first man.
SECOND WATERMAN Shall I carry your worship?
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
Go. [Exit Touchwood Senior with First Waterman]
And you honest watermen that stay,
20 Here's a French crown for you: [He gives him money]
There comes a maid with all speed to take water,
Row her lustily to Barn Elms after me.
- SECOND WATERMAN
To Barn Elms, good, sir.—Make ready the boat, Sam;
We'll wait below. Exeunt [Watermen]
Enter Moll
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
What made you stay so long?
MOLL
I found the way more dangerous than I looked for. 25
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
Away, quick! There's a boat waits for you;
And I'll take water at Paul's-wharf and overtake you.
MOLL
Good sir, do; we cannot be too safe. [Exeunt]
Enter Sir Walter, Yellowhammer, Tim, and Tutor 4.4
SIR WALTER
Life! Call you this close keeping?
YELLOWHAMMER She was kept
Under a double lock.
SIR WALTER A double devil!
TIM
That's a buff sergeant, tutor; he'll ne'er wear out.
YELLOWHAMMER How would you have women locked?
TIM
With padlocks, father; the Venetian uses it; 5
My tutor reads it.
SIR WALTER
Heart, if she were so locked up, how got she out?
YELLOWHAMMER
There was a little hole looked into the gutter;
But who would have dreamed of that?
SIR WALTER A wiser man would.

2 watermen boatmen, running a taxi service on the Thames
3 requiteful'st most eager to return favours. The praise lavished on watermen reflects the symbiotic relationship between them and Bankside theatres. Early in 1614, John Taylor the watermen's poet and advocate emphasized the importance of water taxis to bankside theatres. When in 1614 the watermen petitioned the Privy Council to limit theatrical activity on the near side of the river so as to maintain their business on the bankside, His Majesty's Players' counter-petition declared, 'We might as justly remove the Exchange . . . to the Bank-side', the comparison with the Royal Exchange underlining the fact that theatre was big business, every bit as implicated in the money game as any of Chaste Maid's grasping commercialists.
6 Blackfriars indoor, candle-lit private theatre, used by the King's Men 1608–42; it stood by a landing-stage on the Thames, close to Touchwood Junior's embarkation point, west of Puddle Wharf. The episode has not been traced, but to report it on the stage of the Swan was to denigrate a rival theatre, on the wrong side of the river in the watermen's view, as a rowdy, dangerous place.

7 But a while since not long ago
varlets low rascals
9 sword-dance ancient fertility-promoting dance, still practised in Middleton's time, mainly in the countryside
10 candles the ruffians carry candles to pursue a victim in the dark theatre chandlers candle-makers. Since stage ghosts often carried distinctive symbols, chandlers' ghosts would carry candles.
12 pair of oars i.e., a waterman landed brought to shore.
13 Your first man the waterman's trade cry, meaning 'I'm first in the queue'
17 Barn Elms a favourite lovers' resort
No more i.e., farewell
20 French crown French silver coin accepted as equivalent to the English five-shilling piece
21 take water to embark on the river, with possible suggestion of water as semen, as in 2.1.180 22 lustily vigorously, with possible sexual innuendo

27 Paul's-wharf between Puddle Wharf and Trig Stairs
28 we . . . safe It seems odd that Moll and Touchstone Junior should part now; they seem to think this will render them less liable to detection.
4.4.1 close keeping locking (Moll) up securely
2 double devil i.e., it took a double devil to escape from double locks—a reference to Moll, or perhaps Touchwood Junior
3 buff sergeant arresting officer, whose doggedness was often compared to his jerkin's durable ox-hide ('buff') leather. Tim may be saying that a buff sergeant is as hard-wearing as a double lock, or as persistent as a double devil.
5 With padlocks . . . Venetian Venetians were believed to keep control of women by chastity belts; many contemporary writings portray Italian women as closely locked up compared to freer English women.
6 reads has read about, or advises
8 looked that opened

- 10 TIM He says true, father; a wise man for love will seek every hole; my tutor knows it.
TUTOR Verum poeta dicit.
TIM Dicit Virgilius, father.
- 15 YELLOWHAMMER Prithée, talk of thy jills somewhere else, she's played the jill with me. Where's your wise mother now?
TIM Run mad, I think; I thought she would have drowned herself. She would not stay for oars but took a smelt-boat; sure, I think she be gone a-fishing for her!
- 20 YELLOWHAMMER She'll catch a goodly dish of gudgeons now, Will serve us all to supper.
Enter Maudline drawing Moll by the hair, [wet] and Watermen
- MAUDLINE I'll tug thee home by the hair.
FIRST WATERMAN Good mistress, spare her!
MAUDLINE Tend your own business.
SECOND WATERMAN You are a cruel mother.
Exeunt [Watermen]
- MOLL O, my heart dies!
MAUDLINE I'll make thee an example for all the neighbours' daughters.
- 25 MOLL Farewell, life!
MAUDLINE You that have tricks can counterfeit.
YELLOWHAMMER Hold, hold, Maudline.
MAUDLINE I have brought your jewel by the hair.
YELLOWHAMMER She's here, knight.
SIR WALTER Forbear, or I'll grow worse.
TIM Look on her, tutor; she hath brought her from the water like a mermaid; she's but half my sister now, as
- far as the flesh goes, the rest may be sold to fishwives.
MAUDLINE Dissembling, cunning baggage!
YELLOWHAMMER Impudent strumpet!
SIR WALTER Either give over, both, or I'll give over!—
[To Moll] Why have you used me thus, unkind mistress?
Wherein have I deserved?
YELLOWHAMMER You talk too fondly, sir: 35
We'll take another course and prevent all;
We might have done't long since; we'll lose no time now,
Nor trust to't any longer. Tomorrow morn,
As early as sunrise we'll have you joined.
- MOLL O, bring me death tonight, love-pitying fates; 40
Let me not see tomorrow up upon the world.
YELLOWHAMMER Are you content, sir? Till then she shall be watched!
MAUDLINE Baggage, you shall! Exit [with Moll]
TIM Why, father, my tutor and I will both watch in armour. [Exit Yellowhammer] 45
TUTOR How shall we do for weapons?
TIM Take you no care for that. If need be I can send for conquering metal, tutor, ne'er lost day yet. 'Tis but at Westminster; I am acquainted with him that keeps the monuments; I can borrow Harry the Fifth's sword. 50
'Twill serve us both to watch with. Exit [with Tutor]
- SIR WALTER I never was so near my wish as this chance Makes me: ere tomorrow noon
I shall receive two thousand pound in gold
And a sweet maidenhead worth forty. 55
Enter Touchwood Junior with a Waterman
TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR O, thy news splits me!

10–11 seek every hole with bawdy innuendo; perhaps a lewd paraphrase of Ovid's Ars Amatoria, II.243–6. Tim comically misattributes it to lofty Virgil.
12 Verum . . . dicit the poet speaks the truth (Latin)
13 Dicit Virgilius Virgil says so (Latin)
14 jills loose women. Ignorant of Latin, Yellowhammer takes 'Virgilius' for a reference to 'jills'.
15 played the jill played a nasty trick; variation of 'play the Jack'
18 stay wait
18–19 smelt-boat a boat for fishing smelt, a small fish—poor folks' fare; a notably undignified mode of pursuit
20 gudgeons small fish used as bait; 'to gape for a gudgeon' meant to be deceived or be gullible 21 serve . . . to supper i.e., Maudline's behaviour will make them all look foolish; 'to' means 'for'

23 Tend mind
26 You . . . counterfeit i.e., you who are cunning can easily feign despair
27 jewel i.e., daughter
28 Forbear . . . worse i.e., stop pulling her by the hair or I'll feel even worse than I do 29–30 from the water Presumably Maudline has dragged Moll overboard from her water taxi into the smelt boat.
30 mermaid with overtones of the word's slang meaning, 'whore'
31 fishwives female fish-sellers, with overtones of the word's slang meaning, 'pimps'
33 give over . . . give over i.e., stop berating your daughter or I'll back out of the marriage
35 fondly foolishly
38 trust to't i.e., trust Moll's obedience to their wishes

39 joined married
44–5 watch in armour an absurdly misplaced reference to the chivalric custom of an armed knight keeping a solitary all-night vigil in a chapel as spiritual preparation for a quest; 'in armour' also meant 'emboldened by drinking'
47 Take . . . for don't worry about
48 ne'er . . . yet that never yet lost a battle
49 Westminster Westminster Abbey
49–50 him . . . monuments master of the monuments, official guide to the tombs of famous English kings and queens in Westminster Abbey
50 Harry the Fifth's sword an error or an idle boast: Henry V's armour had been stolen
55 forty i.e., forty thousand (one hopes)
56 splits tears apart

Act 4 Scene 4

A Chaff Mayd in Cheape-side.

WATERMAN
 Half drowned! She cruelly tugged her by the hair, Forced her disgracefully, not like a mother.
 TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR Enough! Leave me, like my joys.
 Exit Waterman

60 Sir, saw you not a wretched maid pass this way?
 Heart, villain, is it thou?
 SIR WALTER Yes, slave, 'tis I!
 Both draw and fight

TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 I must break through thee, then; there is no stop
 That checks my tongue and all my hopeful fortunes,
 That breast excepted, and I must have way.

SIR WALTER
 65 Sir, I believe 'twill hold your life in play.
 [He wounds Touchwood Junior]

TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR [recovering and fighting again]
 Sir, you'll gain the heart in my breast at first?

SIR WALTER
 There is no dealing, then? Think on the dowry
 For two thousand pounds.

TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR O, now 'tis quit, sir.
 [He wounds Sir Walter]

SIR WALTER
 And being of even hand, I'll play no longer.

TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
 No longer, slave?

70 SIR WALTER I have certain things to think on Before I dare go further. [Exit]

TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR But one bout?
 I'll follow thee to death, but ha't out. Exit

Finis Actus Quartus

⊗

5.I [Incipit] Actus Quintus
 Enter Allwit, his Wife, and Davy Dahumma

WIFE
 A misery of a house!

ALLWIT What shall become of us?

DAVY
 I think his wound be mortal.

ALLWIT Think'st thou so, Davy?
 Then am I mortal too, but a dead man, Davy.

This is no world for me whene'er he goes;
 I must e'en truss up all and after him, Davy—
 A sheet with two knots, and away!
 Enter Sir Walter, led in hurt [by two of his Servants]

DAVY O, see, sir,
 How faint he goes! Two of my fellows lead him.

WIFE [swooning] O me!

ALLWIT
 Heyday, my wife's laid down too! Here's like to be A good house kept, when we are altogether down.
 10 Take pains with her, good Davy, cheer her up there.
 Let me come to his worship, let me come.
 [Exeunt two Servants]

SIR WALTER
 Touch me not, villain! My wound aches at thee,
 Thou poison to my heart!

ALLWIT [aside] He raves already,
 His senses are quite gone, he knows me not.— 15 [To him] Look up, an't like your worship; heave those eyes,
 Call me to mind; is your remembrance left?
 Look in my face: who am I, an't like your worship?

SIR WALTER
 If anything be worse than slave or villain,
 Thou art the man!

ALLWIT Alas, his poor worship's weakness!
 He will begin to know me by little and little.

SIR WALTER
 No devil can be like thee.

ALLWIT Ah, poor gentleman,
 Methinks the pain that thou endurest—

SIR WALTER
 Thou know'st me to be wicked, for thy baseness
 Kept the eyes open still on all my sins;
 25 None knew the dear account my soul stood charged with
 So well as thou, yet, like hell's flattering angel, Wouldst never tell me on't, let'st me go on,
 And join with death in sleep; that if I had not waked
 Now by chance, even by a stranger's pity,
 30 I had everlastingly slept out all hope
 Of grace and mercy.

ALLWIT Now he is worse and worse.

57 by the hair Modest, chaste women wore their hair bound up, a symbol of bodily containment; wearing the hair loose on-stage conventionally represented recent rape or mental derangement, which is one reason Maudline's dragging Moll by the hair is so shocking to bystanders. The stage picture prepares the audience for Moll's seeming mental distraction in 5.2.
 62 stop impediment
 63 checks my tongue i.e., robs me of the power to make my marriage vows 64 That...excepted i.e., except Sir Walter have way triumph over him

 65 'twill...play i.e., the desire to win Moll away from me will mean working hard to defend your life
 66 at first at once
 67 dealing coming to terms (Sir Walter is offering to share the dowry)
 68 quit paid back (wound for wound)
 69 even hand on equal terms (a gaming term)
 70 certain...on possible anticipation of his religious qualms
 72 ha't out see this through to a conclusion

5.1.2 his Sir Walter's
 3 but nothing but 5 truss up wrap in a shroud after go after 6 sheet...knots i.e., a shroud, knotted at head and foot
 16 an't like if it pleases
 17 is...left is your memory intact?
 25 Kept...open The play's blindness/sight imagery culminates in this scene.
still always
 26 dear costly
 27 hell's...angel Satan

- [Allwit's Wife revives from her swoon] Wife, to him, wife; thou wast wont to do good on him.
- WIFE
How is't with you, sir?
- SIR WALTER Not as with you,
35 Thou loathsome strumpet! Some good pitying man
Remove my sins out of my sight a little;
I tremble to behold her, she keeps back
All comfort while she stays. Is this a time,
Unconscionable woman, to see thee?
40 Art thou so cruel to the peace of man
Not to give liberty now? The devil himself
Shows a far fairer reverence and respect
To goodness than thyself; he dares not do this,
But parts in time of penitence, hides his face;
45 When man withdraws from him, he leaves the place.
Hast thou less manners and more impudence
Than thy instructor? Prithce show thy modesty,
If the least grain be left, and get thee from me.
Thou shouldst be rather locked many rooms hence
50 From the poor miserable sight of me,
If either love or grace had part in thee.
- WIFE [weeping]
He is lost for ever!
- ALLWIT Run, sweet Davy, quickly,
And fetch the children hither; sight of them
Will make him cheerful straight. [Exit Davy]
- SIR WALTER [to Allwit's Wife] O death! Is this 55 A place for you to weep? What tears are those?
Get you away with them! I shall fare the worse
As long as they are a-weeping. They work against me;
There's nothing but thy appetite in that sorrow—
Thou weep'st for lust. I feel it in the slackness 60 Of comforts coming toward me.
I was well till thou began'st to undo me.
This shows like the fruitless sorrow of a careless
mother
That brings her son with dalliance to the gallows
And then stands by and weeps to see him suffer.
Enter Davy with the children [Nick, Wat, and the baby girl]
- DAVY
65 There are the children, sir; an't like your worship,
Your last fine girl—in troth, she smiles.
Look, look, in faith, sir.
- SIR WALTER
O, my vengeance! Let me for ever hide my cursed face
From sight of those that darkens all my hopes,
And stands between me and the sight of heaven! 70
Who sees me now, her too and those so near me,
May rightly say I am o'ergrown with sin.
O, how my offences wrestle with my repentance!
It hath scarce breath;
Still my adulterous guilt hovers aloft, 75
And with her black wings beats down all my prayers
Ere they be halfway up. What's he knows now
How long I have to live? O, what comes then?
My taste grows bitter; the round world all gall now;
Her pleasing pleasures now hath poisoned me, 80
Which I exchanged my soul for.
Make way a hundred sighs at once for me!
- ALLWIT
Speak to him, Nick.
- NICK I dare not, I am afraid.
- ALLWIT
Tell him he hurts his wounds, Wat, with making moan.
- SIR WALTER Wretched, death of seven. 85
- ALLWIT
Come, let's be talking somewhat to keep him alive.
Ah, sirrah Wat, and did my lord bestow that jewel on thee
For an epistle thou mad'st in Latin?
Thou art a good forward boy, there's great joy on thee.
- SIR WALTER
O sorrow!
- ALLWIT [aside]
Heart, will nothing comfort him? 90
If he be so far gone, 'tis time to moan.
[To him] Here's pen and ink and paper, and all things ready;
Will't please your worship for to make your will?
- SIR WALTER
My will? Yes, yes, what else? Who writes apace now?
- ALLWIT
That can your man Davy, an't like your worship, 95
A fair, fast, legible hand.
- SIR WALTER Set it down then:
[Davy writes]
Imprimis, I bequeath to yonder wittol

33 do good on (a) have a beneficial effect on; (b) copulate with 36 sins Allwit's wife has come to embody for him all his sins.
39 Unconscionable without conscience
47 instructor i.e., Satan
58–9 There's... for lust i.e., you are crying only because my death will leave you sexually frustrated 61 I... me Though true repentance meant self knowledge and acceptance of personal responsibility for sin, he blames his misconduct solely on the Allwits.

63 with dalliance through over-indulgence. This image, a parody of the Virgin Mary weeping at the foot of the cross, grants the son no responsibility for his own crime, as Sir Walter himself accepts no responsibility.
68 my vengeance the children represent God's vengeance
77 halfway up i.e., to heaven
What's he who is he who 79 gall bitter substance

82 Make way prepare
85 death of seven Sir Walter's children by Allwit's wife. His death will leave them unprovided for.
86 somewhat a little
87 my lord 'My lord' is an inappropriate form of address for a knight like Sir Walter; Allwit may mean some dignitary at a ceremonial occasion at Wat's school.
89 forward high-achieving
94 apace quickly

- Three times his weight in curses.
 ALLWIT
 How!
 SIR WALTER
 All plagues of body and mind.
 ALLWIT
 Write them not down, Davy.
 100 DAVY It is his will; I must.
 SIR WALTER Together also
 With such a sickness ten days ere his death.
 ALLWIT [aside]
 There's a sweet legacy! I am almost choked with't.
 SIR WALTER
 105 Next I bequeath to that foul whore his wife
 All barrenness of joy, a drought of virtue,
 And dearth of all repentance; for her end,
 The common misery of an English strumpet,
 In French and Dutch; beholding ere she dies
 Confusion of her brats before her eyes,
 And never shed a tear for it.
 Enter a Servant [of Sir Walter's]
 110 FIRST SERVANT Where's the knight?
 O sir, the gentleman you wounded is newly departed!
 SIR WALTER Dead? Lift, lift! Who helps me?
 ALLWIT
 Let the law lift you now, that must have all;
 I have done lifting on you, and my wife too.
 FIRST SERVANT [to Sir Walter]
 You were best lock yourself close.
 115 ALLWIT [to Sir Walter] Not in my house, sir,
 I'll harbour no such persons as men-slayers;
 Lock yourself where you will.
 SIR WALTER What's this?
 WIFE Why, husband!
 ALLWIT
 I know what I do, wife.
 WIFE [aside to Allwit] You cannot tell yet;
 For having killed the man in his defence,
 120 Neither his life nor estate will be touched, husband.
 ALLWIT
 Away, wife! Hear a fool! His lands will hang him.
- SIR WALTER
 Am I denied a chamber?—[To Mistress Allwit] What say you, forsooth?
 WIFE
 Alas, sir, I am one that would have all well
 But must obey my husband.—[To Allwit] Prithce, love,
 Let the poor gentleman stay, being so sore wounded: 125
 There's a close chamber at one end of the garret
 We never use; let him have that I prithce.
 ALLWIT
 We never use? You forget sickness then,
 And physic times; is't not a place of easement?
 Enter a [second] Servant [of Sir Walter's]
 SIR WALTER
 130 O death! Do I hear this with part
 Of former life in me?—What's the news now?
 SECOND SERVANT
 Troth, worse and worse; you're like to lose your land,
 If the law save your life, sir, or the surgeon.
 ALLWIT [aside to Allwit's Wife]
 Hark you there, wife.
 SIR WALTER Why, how, sir?
 SECOND SERVANT
 Sir Oliver Kix's wife is new quickened; 135
 That child undoes you sir.
 SIR WALTER All ill at once!
 ALLWIT
 I wonder what he makes here with his consorts?
 Cannot our house be private to ourselves
 But we must have such guests? [To Servants] I pray, depart, sirs,
 140 And take your murderer along with you.
 Good he were apprehended ere he go,
 He's killed some honest gentleman. Send for officers!
 SIR WALTER
 I'll soon save you that labour.
 ALLWIT I must tell you, sir,
 You have been somewhat bolder in my house
 Than I could well like of; I suffered you 145
 Till it stuck here at my heart; I tell you truly
 I thought you had been familiar with my wife once.
 WIFE
 With me? I'll see him hanged first. I defy him,

108 French and Dutch venereal diseases.

Syphilis was called 'the French pox'; a 'Dutch widow' was a prostitute.

109 Confusion i.e., incestuous intercourse112–13 Lift... lift Sir Walter means 'lift me up' (physically); Allwit means 'arrest'.113 law... all i.e., the law will seize Sir Walter's possessions since he has killed Touchstone Junior114 lifting (a) helping; (b) robbing; (c) (in the case of Allwit's wife) arousing sexually

on of

115 were best had better close tightly, in hiding121 Hear a fool i.e., listen to the fool talkingHis... him i.e., since Sir Walter's lands will be forfeited to the Crown if he is convicted, the Crown will be sure to find him guilty and hang him126 close chamber privy129 physic times times of illnessplace of easement privy135 new quickened newly pregnant136 undoes you i.e., a Kix heir will do Sir Walter out of the inheritance ill evil, bad luck137 makes doesconsorts companions (i.e., Davy and the two servants)142 officers officers of the watch143 save... labour i.e., by dying147 been familiar had sexual relations with, or at least flirted with

And all such gentlemen in the like extremity.
 SIR WALTER
 150 If ever eyes were open, these are they.
 Gamesters, farewell, I have nothing left to play.
Exit [with his two Servants]

ALLWIT
 And therefore get you gone, sir.
 DAVY Of all wittols
 Be thou the head!—[To Allwit's Wife] Thou, the grand whore of spittles!
Exit

ALLWIT
 So, since he's like now to be rid of all,
 155 I am right glad I am so well rid of him.
 WIFE
 I knew he durst not stay when you named officers.
 ALLWIT That stopped his spirits straight.
 What shall we do now, wife?
 WIFE As we were wont to do.
 ALLWIT
 We are richly furnished wife, with household stuff.
 160 WIFE Let's let out lodgings then,
 And take a house in the Strand.
 ALLWIT In troth, a match, wench!
 We are simply stocked with cloth-of-tissue cushions
 To furnish out bay-windows; pish, what not that's quaint
 And costly, from the top to the bottom?
 165 Life, for furniture, we may lodge a countess!
 There's a close-stool of tawny velvet too,
 Now I think on't, wife.
 WIFE There's that should be, sir;

Your nose must be in everything!
 ALLWIT I have done, wench;
 And let this stand in every gallant's chamber:
 'There's no gamester like a politic sinner,
 170 For whoe'er games, the box is sure a winner.'

Enter Yellowhammer and his wife [Maudline] 5.2
 MAUDLINE
 O husband, husband, she will die, she will die!
 There is no sign but death.
 YELLOWHAMMER 'Twill be our shame then.
 MAUDLINE
 O, how she's changed in compass of an hour!
 YELLOWHAMMER
 Ah, my poor girl! Good faith, thou wert too cruel
 To drag her by the hair.
 MAUDLINE You would have done as much, sir, 5
 To curb her of her humour.
 YELLOWHAMMER
 'Tis curbed sweetly! She caught her bane o'th' water.
Enter Tim
 MAUDLINE How now, Tim?
 TIM
 Faith, busy, mother, about an epitaph
 Upon my sister's death.
 MAUDLINE Death! She is not dead, I hope? 10
 TIM
 No, but she means to be, and that's as good,
 And when a thing's done, 'tis done; you taught me that, mother.
 YELLOWHAMMER What is your tutor doing?

149 extremity degree

150 If... they Sir Walter's devastated shock when Allwit's wife defies him shows up an oddly credulous and sentimental streak: he has been buying her sexual favours, but seems to have believed her protestations of affection.

151 Gamesters (a) gamblers; (b) lechers. Sir Walter's final abandonment of his sexual and financial games echoes Touchwood's Senior's impulse (at 2.1.41) to give up the card game of sex.

153 spittles hospitals; suggests a whore's connection with disease

156 durst dared

158 were wont to used to

160 let out rent out their present lodgings

161 Strand A fashionable residential area, but (in the oddly-assorted mix typical of early modern London) also notorious for courtesans. The conversation about a well-furnished house, following the Allwit's agreement that they will now support themselves as they used to (presumably before Sir Walter's advent), suggests that they are planning to establish a fashionable brothel. In one of the play's many surprise turns, not only is a seemingly-respectable citizen an amateur brothel-keeper to his wife, but the couple were formerly professional brothel-keepers—another link between bourgeois marriage and prostitution. a match formula for concluding an agreement

162 simply absolutely cloth-of-tissue fabric with gold and silver thread

163 bay-windows jutting-out windows, good for advertising wares, such as prostitutes in the new Allwit brothel. The bay window was theatrical short-hand for a brothel.

quaint costly, fashionable, with a possible suggestion of 'queinte' or pudendum

164 from...bottom with bawdy innuendo

165 lodge a countess perhaps another reference to the Countess of Salisbury, with a possible suggestion of 'cuntess'

166 close-stool commode, chamber pot

167 There's...be i.e., there's everything one could wish

168 nose...everything A man who took too much interest in household matters (sometimes called a 'cotqueen') was an object of scorn; here the image of a man putting his nose in a chamber pot is even more unflattering.

169 let...chamber i.e., let this saying appear in the male customers' rooms in the brothel

170 politic crafty

171 games plays games, including sexual ones

box the percentage taken by the house. In a reversal of the initial impression that Allwit is being ignominiously used by Sir Walter, Allwit now sees himself as proprietor of a gaming house, and 'the house' always has a better chance of winning than any individual gambler like Sir Walter; his image recalls Sir Walter's last words earlier in the scene—those of a defeated gambler.

5.2.1 she Moll

3 in compass of in the space of

6 curb...humour i.e., prevent her from eloping

7 bane death (cf. the modern expression 'catch one's death of a cold')

9 epitaph It was customary to decorate the hearse and later the tomb with a few words about the dead person.

11 means intends

- TIM
Making one too, in principal pure Latin
Culled out of Ovid his de Tristibus.
- 15 YELLOWHAMMER
How does your sister look? Is she not changed?
- TIM
Changed? Gold into white money was never so changed
As is my sister's colour into paleness.
Enter Moll
- YELLOWHAMMER
O, here she's brought; see how she looks like death!
- 20 TIM
Looks she like death, and ne'er a word made yet?
I must go beat my brains against a bed-post
And get before my tutor. [Exit]
- YELLOWHAMMER [to Moll] Speak, how dost thou?
- MOLL
I hope I shall be well, for I am as sick at heart
As I can be.
- YELLOWHAMMER
'Las my poor girl!
- 25 The doctor's making a most sovereign drink for thee,
The worst ingredients dissolved pearl and amber;
We spare no cost, girl.
- MOLL Your love comes too late,
Yet timely thanks reward it. What is comfort,
When the poor patient's heart is past relief?
- 30 It is no doctor's art can cure my grief.
- YELLOWHAMMER All is cast away then.
Prithee look upon me cheerfully.
- MAUDLINE [to Moll]
Sing but a strain or two, thou wilt not think How 'twill revive thy spirits: strive with thy fit,
- 35 Prithee, sweet Moll.
- MOLL You shall have my good will, Mother.
- MAUDLINE Why, well said, wench.
The Song
- MOLL
Weep eyes, break heart,
My love and I must part.
- 40 Cruel fates true love do soonest sever:
O, I shall see thee never, never, never!
- O, happy is the maid whose life takes end
Ere it knows parent's frown or loss of friend.
Weep eyes, break heart,
My love and I must part.
Enter Touchwood Senior with a letter
- 45 MAUDLINE
O, I could die with music!—Well sung, girl.
- MOLL If you call it so, it was.
- YELLOWHAMMER
She plays the swan and sings herself to death.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR By your leave, sir.
- YELLOWHAMMER
What are you, sir? Or what's your business, pray?
- 50 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
I may be now admitted, though the brother
Of him your hate pursued; it spreads no further.
Your malice sets in death, does it not, sir?
- YELLOWHAMMER
In death?
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
He's dead: 'twas a dear love to him,
It cost him but his life, that was all, sir;
He paid enough, poor gentleman, for his love.
- 55 YELLOWHAMMER [aside]
There's all our ill removed, if she were well now.—
[To Touchwood Senior] Impute not, sir, his end to any hate
That sprung from us; he had a fair wound brought that.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
That helped him forward, I must needs confess;
But the restraint of love, and your unkindness,
Those were the wounds that from his heart drew blood;
But being past help, let words forget it too.
Scarcely three minutes ere his eye-lids closed
And took eternal leave of this world's light,
- 60 He wrote this letter, which by oath he bound me
To give to her own hands; that's all my business.
- 65 YELLOWHAMMER
You may perform it then; there she sits.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
O, with a following look!
- YELLOWHAMMER Ay, trust me, sir,

14 principal choice15 Ovid his Ovid's*de Tristibus* a collection of dolorous poetry, popular as a textbook in grammar schools17 white silver20 ne'er . . . yet i.e., not a word of her epitaph yet composed21 beat my brains concentrate hard. (Tim's adding 'against a bed-post' makes the cliché comically literal.)22 get beget (an epitaph)23 well possible allusion to the proverb 'the dead are well'25 sovereign drink potent remedy26 worst least expensivepearl and amber costly ingredients often used in restorative medicines30 grief (a) sickness; (b) distress31 All . . . then i.e., I have wasted my money on the pearl and amber medicine33-4 Sing . . . spirits Music was considered therapeutic.34 strive . . . fit (a) struggle against your condition ('fit' as a symptom of illness); (b) put up a fight by singing a strain ('fit' as part of a song)36 You . . . will i.e., I'll do my best37.1 The Song Laments by and about dying virgins or betrothed young women were popular in contemporary ballads; cf. also Ophelia's death in Hamlet. For a musical setting see Companion, p. 145.48 swan . . . death The swan proverbially sang before death; possible reference to Swan playhouse in which Chaste Maid was acted, which was shortly to close.53 sets goes down like the sun54 dear expensive57 ill trouble69 following i.e., she seems about to follow Touchwood Junior in death

- I think she'll follow him quickly.
 70 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR Here's some gold
 He willed me to distribute faithfully
 Amongst your servants.
 [He gives money to servants]
 YELLOWHAMMER 'Las, what doth he mean, sir?
 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR [to Moll]
 How cheer you, mistress?
 MOLL I must learn of you, sir.
 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR [giving letter to Moll]
 Here's a letter from a friend of yours;
 75 And where that fails in satisfaction,
 I have a sad tongue ready to supply.
 MOLL How does he, ere I look on't?
 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 Seldom better; he's a contented health now.
 MOLL
 I am most glad on't.
 [She reads]
 MAUDLINE [to Touchwood Senior]
 Dead, sir?
 YELLOWHAMMER
 80 He is. [Aside] Now, wife, let's but get the girl
 Upon her legs again, and to church roundly with her.
 MOLL
 O, sick to death he tells me! How does he after this?
 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 Faith, feels no pain at all: he's dead, sweet mistress.
 MOLL [swooning]
 Peace close mine eyes!
 YELLOWHAMMER The girl! Look to the girl, wife!
 MAUDLINE
 85 Moll, daughter, sweet girl, speak! Look but once up,
 Thou shalt have all the wishes of thy heart
 That wealth can purchase!
 YELLOWHAMMER
 O, she's gone for ever! That letter broke her heart.
 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 As good now, then, as let her lie in torment
- And then break it.
 Enter Susan
 MAUDLINE
 O Susan, she thou loved'st so dear is gone!
 SUSAN
 O sweet maid!
 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 This is she that helped her still.—
 I've a reward here for thee.
 [He gives Susan money]
 YELLOWHAMMER Take her in,
 Remove her from our sight, our shame and sorrow.
 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
 Stay, let me help thee; 'tis the last cold kindness
 I can perform for my sweet brother's sake. 95 [Exeunt Touchwood Senior, Susan, and Servants, carrying Moll]
 YELLOWHAMMER
 All the whole street will hate us, and the world
 Point me out cruel. It is our best course, wife,
 After we have given order for the funeral,
 To absent ourselves till she be laid in ground. 100
 MAUDLINE Where shall we spend that time?
 YELLOWHAMMER
 I'll tell thee where, wench: go to some private church
 And marry Tim to the rich Brecknock gentlewoman.
 MAUDLINE Mass, a match!
 We'll not lose all at once, somewhat we'll catch. 105
 Exeunt
 Enter Sir Oliver and [four] Servants 5.3
 SIR OLIVER
 Ho, my wife's quickened; I am a man for ever!
 I think I have bestirred my stumps, i'faith.
 Run, get your fellows all together instantly,
 Then to the parish church and ring the bells.
 FIRST SERVANT
 It shall be done, sir. [Exit]
- 73 How . . . you i.e., how do you feel?
 I . . . you i.e., I won't know how I feel until you give me the letter (and perhaps tell me more of Touchwood Junior) 77 How does he how is he? Since Moll was onstage when Touchwood Senior announced 'He's dead' (5.2.54), her asking after his health may indicate distracted wits, or a state of what grief therapists now call denial.
 78 he's . . . now a common phrase meaning
 'he is well because he is in Heaven'
 79 glad on't happy to hear it
 81 to church to marry Sir Walter
 81 roundly promptly
 92 still always
 93 reward payment for helping with Moll's attempted elopement, or perhaps money up front to ensure Susan's help with the present plan
- 96.1–2 Exeunt . . . Moll The hand is quicker than the eye: what seems the carrying of a dead body off the stage is actually the third attempt to steal Moll from her parents.
 102 private church a secluded church, or perhaps a private chapel where licensed marriages could be celebrated without the publicity of a parish church 103 marry . . . gentlewoman The Yellowhammers plan to cash in on Sir Walter's half of their business arrangement—the Welsh heiress—even though he has been cut out of their half—Moll and the dowry.
 104 a match (a) formula for concluding an agreement; (b) a marriage. Agreeing to this scheme for salvaging something after Moll's death, Maudline uses exactly the words with which Allwit, in the last scene, assented to his wife's scheme for cutting their losses after jettisoning Sir
 Walter: 'A match' (5.1.161).
 105 somewhat at least a little 5.3.2 bestirred my stumps bustled about on my legs, with bawdy innuendo
 3 fellows fellow servants
 4–7 ring . . . night Churchbells were rung and bonfires lit to announce important events; as the servant's response shows, this would have been a monstrously inflated reaction to begetting a baby. As Stow records, the London poor used to be treated with food and drink by the rich at summer festival 'bonfires', but this custom had lapsed by Middleton's time.
 Invoking this old symbol of charitable neighbourliness highlights the grasping selfishness of the present.

- Was fully glorious? Beauty set in goodness
Speaks what she was that jewel so infixed,
There was no want of anything of life
20 To make these virtuous precedents man and wife.
- ALLWIT
Great pity of their deaths!
- ALL Ne'er more pity!
- LADY
It makes a hundred weeping eyes, sweet gossip.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
I cannot think there's anyone amongst you
In this full fair assembly, maid, man, or wife, Whose heart would not have sprung with joy and 25 gladness
To have seen their marriage day.
- ALL
It would have made a thousand joyful hearts.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR [to Touchwood Junior and Moll]
Up, then, apace and take your fortunes,
Make these joyful hearts; here's none but friends.
[Moll and Touchwood Junior rise out of their coffins]
- ALL
30 Alive, sir? O sweet, dear couple!
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Nay, do not hinder 'em now, stand from about 'em.
If she be caught again, and lose this time,
I'll ne'er plot further for 'em, nor this honest cham-bermaid
That helped all at a push.
- TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR [to Parson]
Good sir, apace!
- PARSON
Hands join now, but hearts for ever,
Which no parents' mood shall sever:
[To Touchwood Junior] You shall forsake all widows, wives, and maids;
[To Moll] You, lords, knights, gentlemen, and men of trades;
And if in haste any article misses,
Go interline it with a brace of kisses.
- 40 TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Here's a thing trolled nimbly.—Give you joy, brother!
Were't not better thou shouldst have her
Than the maid should die?
- WIFE
To you, sweet mistress bride.
- ALL Joy, joy to you both.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR Here be your wedding sheets you 45 brought along with you; you may both go to bed when you please to.
- TOUCHWOOD JUNIOR
My joy wants utterance.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR Utter all at night then, brother.
- MOLL I am silent with delight.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
50 Sister, delight will silence any woman,
But you'll find your tongue again among maidservants,
Now you keep house, sister.
- ALL
Never was hour so filled with joy and wonder.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
To tell you the full story of this chambermaid,
And of her kindness in this business to us,
55 'Twould ask an hour's discourse; in brief, 'twas she

18 Speaks shows
19 infixed firmly fixed
20 want lack
21 virtuous precedents exemplars of virtue
22 gossip The word recalls the christening party, suggesting a counterposing of two rites of passage, christening and funeral, one welcoming new life, the other commemorating death.
24 full fair very handsome; a slightly archaic turn of phrase suggesting chivalric romance
28 apace quickly
29.1-2 Moll...coffins If (as many think) this 'resurrection' is parodic, there was plenty to parody: R. S. Forsythe lists no fewer than 132 English Renaissance plays which include the 'resurrection' of a character supposed dead. Resurrection from coffins for marriage was a staple of the commedia dell' arte.
31 from about away from 33-4 I'll...push This revelation reminds us that it was Touchwood Senior and Susan who carried Moll off after her swoon in 5.2, thus retroactively raising the possibility that the swoon and even her desperate illness were a trick, belonging to that female strategy common in Renaissance writing, feigned illness.

34 at a push when things were most critical; 'push' also meant 'copulate'
35 Hands join cf. 3.1.13-17. This verse bears no resemblance to an actual marriage service, but it was impermissible to enact a church ceremony on stage.
36 mood anger
37 widows, wives, and maids the traditional three estates of womankind
38 You...trades Since 'forsake' implies giving up what one has possessed, the line suggests that the 'chaste maid' has in the past enjoyed lord, knights, gentlemen, and men of trades—hardly an orthodox pronouncement for a clergyman performing a wedding.
39 article legally binding part of the ceremony misses The diction implies that the clergyman has hastily fired a volley of legal articles at the couple, hoping some will hit their target—again, the ceremony hardly has an aura of sanctity.

40 interline write in (legal term)
41 trolled uttered rapidly
44 To...bride The occasion's holiness is further eroded by the toast to the bride's being offered by that travesty of wifeliness, Allwit's wife.
45 wedding sheets the coffin shrouds; light-hearted reversal of a common trope identifying wedding sheets with shrouds. Fascinated by similarity of symbols in the rituals closing tragedy (funerals) and comedy (weddings), Renaissance writers anticipated Arnold Van Gennep's thesis that all rites of passage share one repertoire of symbols.
48 wants craves
Utter (a) speak; (b) ejaculate sexually; (c) pass counterfeit money
51 find...maidservants i.e., once among your maidservants you will gossip a good deal. (Reflects the stereotype of women's talkativeness, especially with other women.)
52 keep house are the mistress of your own household 56 ask require

- That wrought it to this purpose cunningly.
- ALL
We shall all love her for't.
Enter Yellowhammer and his wife, [Maudline]
- ALLWIT
See who comes here now!
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
A storm, a storm, but we are sheltered for it.
- YELLOWHAMMER
60 I will prevent you all and mock you thus,
You and your expectations: I stand happy
Both in your lives and your hearts' combination!
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Here's a strange day again!
- YELLOWHAMMER
The knight's proved villain—
All's come out now—his niece an arrant baggage.
- 65 My poor boy Tim is cast away this morning,
Even before breakfast, married a whore
Next to his heart.
- ALL
A whore?
- YELLOWHAMMER
His 'niece', forsooth!
- ALLWIT [aside to his wife]
I think we rid our hands in good time of him.
- WIFE
I knew he was past the best when I gave him over.
[To Yellowhammer] What is become of him, pray, sir?
- 70 YELLOWHAMMER
Who, the knight?
He lies i'th' knight's ward. [To Lady Kix] Now your belly, lady,
Begins to blossom, there's no peace for him,
His creditors are so greedy.
- SIR OLIVER [to Touchwood Senior]
Master Touchwood, hear'st thou this news?
- 75 I am so endeared to thee for my wife's fruitfulness
That I charge you both, your wife and thee,
To live no more asunder for the world's frowns.
I have purse, and bed, and board for you.
Be not afraid to go to your business roundly;
- Get children, and I'll keep them.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Say you so, sir? 80
- SIR OLIVER
Prove me with three at a birth, an thou dar'st now.
- TOUCHWOOD SENIOR
Take heed how you dare a man, while you live, sir,
That has good skill at his weapon.
Enter Tim and Welsh Gentlewoman, [and Tutor]
- SIR OLIVER
Foot, I dare you, sir!
- YELLOWHAMMER
Look, gentlemen, if ever you say the picture
Of the unfortunate marriage, yonder 'tis. 85
- WELSH GENTLEWOMAN
Nay, good sweet Tim—
- TIM
Come from the university
To marry a whore in London, with my tutor too!
O tempora! O mors!
- TUTOR Prithce, Tim, be patient!
- TIM I bought a jade at Cambridge; 90
I'll let her out to execution, tutor,
For eighteen pence a day, or Brentford horse-races,
She'll serve to carry seven miles out of town well.
Where be these mountains? I was promised mountains,
But there's such a mist, I can see none of 'em. 95
What are become of those two thousand runts?
Let's have a bout with them in the mean time;
A vengeance runt thee!
- MAUDLINE
Good, sweet Tim, have patience.
- TIM
Flectere si nequeo superos, Acheronta movebo, mother.
- MAUDLINE
I think you have married her in logic, Tim. 100
You told me once by logic you would prove
A whore an honest woman; prove her so, Tim,
And take her for thy labour.
- TIM
Troth, I thank you:
- 57 wrought... purpose brought about this successful conclusion
- 58.1 Enter Yellowhammer The Yellowhammers' entrance jolts us into realizing why the clergyman was rushing: despite the crowd onstage, this is an elopement—Moll has finally been spirited away from her parents. That Yellowhammer betrays no surprise that the lovers are alive is in keeping with the play's self-consciously unrealistic mode—he appears suddenly and blusters every time the couple is about to elope, like the Demon King in a pantomime.
- 60 prevent anticipate. He at first speaks in the old blustering manner, but soon reveals that he means to explode not the lovers' expectations of marriage but everyone's expectations that he will go on playing the heavy father.
- 63 The knight's Sir Walter's
- 64 his niece the Welsh Gentlewoman
- 67 Next... heart (a) closest to his affections;
- (b) on an empty stomach
- 71 knight's ward second-class accommodation in a London debtor's prison
- 79 roundly thoroughly, with a suggestion of pregnancy
- 80 Get... keep them Sir Oliver means that Touchwood Senior should beget children upon Touchwood Senior's wife, but the audience is bound to suspect that Lady Kix will be involved as well; the closing scenario with the Touchwoods and Kixes disarmingly resembles the earlier scenario with the Allwits and Sir Walter.
- 81 Prove test an if
- 84-5 Look... 'tis With the outwitting of the social-climbing Yellowhammers, city scheming comes full cycle: citizens' aspirations to gentlemanly status expose them to predation by sharpers like themselves.

Two Possible Sexual Dissidents:

1. As a young university graduate, Tim might conceivably be played by a boy, in which case these are the doubling possibilities: nurse; midwife, Wat or Nick or Touchwood Senior's wife or Wench; Kix maid or dry nurse or wet nurse.
2. R. B. Parker suggests that Sir Oliver Kix might have been played by a boy, citing a reference to his short stature; I might add that Oliver's sexual impotence could have suggested casting him as a boy rather than a man, for the sake of the high voice, etc. If Sir Oliver were played by a boy, here are the doubling possibilities: nurse; midwife; Wat or Nick or Touchwood Senior's wife; dry nurse or wet nurse or any of the gossips; nurse (or gossip).

THE MANNER OF HIS LORDSHIP'S ENTERTAINMENT

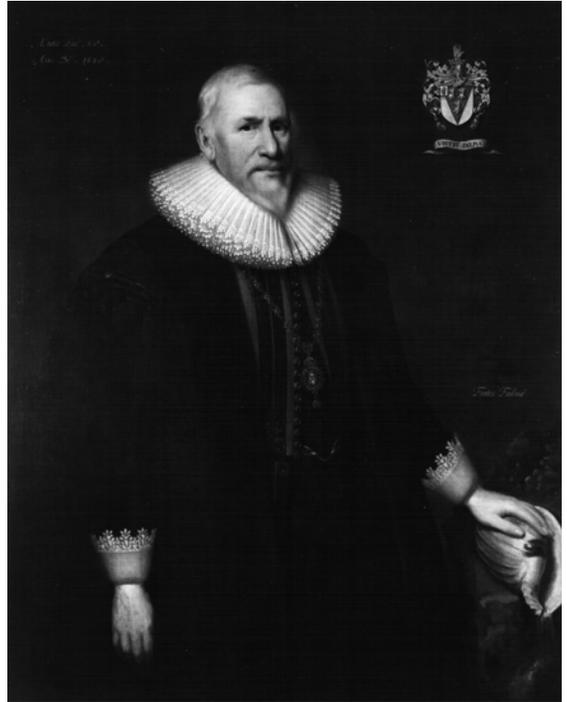

Edited by David M. Bergeron

THE speaker instructs the 'clerk of the work': 'reach me the book to show | How many arts from such a labour flow' (63-4). Although referring to the successful completion of the New River, the speaker could just as readily be referring to Middleton's 1613 'book', the one that contains, in its expanded issue, the texts of both The Triumphs of Truth and The Manner of his Lordship's Entertainment on Michaelmas Day... At that most Famous and Admired Work of the Running Stream. That book reveals the arts that flowed from Middleton's dramatic efforts in behalf of civic occasions in 1613. Although the two texts stand alone bibliographically, they both come from Middleton's pen, they praise two other men named Middleton (Myddelton), and they celebrate events held within a month of each other.

The New River was a forty-mile-long canal that brought water from Chadwell and the Amwell spring north of London to Islington. For the official opening, Middleton wrote this brief entertainment to honour Sir Hugh Myddelton, Goldsmith. On Michaelmas Day 1613, the day on which Sir Hugh's brother Thomas was officially elected the new mayor, some aldermen and other authorities of the city gathered at the cistern in Islington into which the river emptied. Today a statue of Hugh Myddelton, dating from 1862, stands on Islington Green in London to celebrate the New River project.

Several things stand out about this brief pageant. First, a dramatist might be called upon to offer entertainments for a surprising array of events. This New River pageant, clearly not a Lord Mayor's show, nevertheless responds to a civic occasion associated with the city. Second, Middleton knows how he is supposed to respond; he knows how to please the city fathers.

Middleton uses the word 'perfection' three times in the opening thirty-two lines of the text; he defines it as 'the crown of all inventions' (12). The speaker, who represents all the labourers who have worked on the project, says: 'Long have we laboured, long desired and prayed | For this great work's perfection' (35-6). Middleton intends 'perfection' to mean both successful 'completion' of the project and this project's 'flawless, faultless' character. Perfection 'makes the conquest' (22), Middleton writes earlier. The speaker later asserts: 'perfection draws | Favour from princes' (53-4). Middleton might have added that perfection, as in this pageant entertainment, draws favour from the citizenry as well. This pageant 'perfects' the New River because it becomes the last event to complete the celebration of a new era in the city's life: a desirable and ample source of water.

Sir Hugh Myddelton

With the early twenty-first century convenience of running water in most homes in developed countries, we have to remind ourselves of the difficulty of obtaining a ready supply of fresh, safe water in Middleton's London. With largely unfettered growth, London faced mounting problems of sanitation, pestilence, and danger of fire. Finding an inexpensive and reliable source of water became increasingly crucial. All across Europe cities struggled with this problem, knowing that their safety and future development depended on water.

Just how crucial water might be in the city's life may be revealed by the organization of John Stow's Survey of London (1598). When he begins to describe London, Stow starts with the wall around the city. But he next moves to the sources of fresh water that serve the city: the fountains, wells, springs, conduits, and the River Thames. A city, no matter how securely situated within a wall, cannot survive without water. At some length, then, Stow recounts the various sources of water and how those sources have changed over the centuries. The city's water supply had evolved over the course of some four hundred years. The water brought in from springs in the surrounding areas by means of leaded pipes had become inadequate. Water from the Thames had to be pumped into the city, and it became polluted because of sewage dumped into the river. Time and again Stow emphasizes the unparalleled importance of water.

The idea of bringing water into London from the northern outreaches dates back to the Elizabethan period. After many futile starts Hugh Myddelton finally stepped forward to rescue what seemed to be a doomed project. He signed the first agreement with the city on 21 April 1609 and a new one on 28 March 1611. Work had begun in earnest in 1609. Dozens of people became actively involved in the project, and a number made financial investments. But eventually it took the efforts of James I to save the project from its financial problems. On 2 May 1612 representatives of the King and Myddelton drew up a formal indenture. The basic agreement called for James to contribute half the expenditure, past as well as future. Probably the pageant speaker has this in mind when he says: "That every week" the labourers "had their royal pay" (78). In any event, many people, including the King and Myddelton, bore the cost for the new river.

The text's portrait of Hugh Myddelton combines a certain amount of fiction with an accurate view of his involvement in the project. The title-page asserts that the project was 'the sole invention, cost, and industry of that worthy Master Hugh Myddelton . . . for the general good of the city' (9-11). The speaker says that the project, 'a work so rare, | Only by one man's industry, cost, and care | Is brought to blest effect' (43-5). No warranted stretch of imagination could lead one to conclude that Hugh Myddelton's sole cost and effort led to the successful completion of the New River. Indeed, the speaker in the pageant embodies all the workers who have actually constructed the canal. That speaker also claims: 'His only aim the city's general good' (46). Doubtless Sir Hugh intended to meet one of the city's needs, but he also sought to make money.

Early in the text the poet refers to 'the warlike music of drums and trumpets' on this festive occasion and makes the analogy: 'there is no labour that man undertakes but hath a war within itself' (22-3). 'Onsets of malice, calumnies, and slanders' help define the battle that Hugh Myddelton faced. The speaker cites the five years' expense, 'the infinite ways | Of malice, envy, false suggestions' (40-1), and the 'many unjust complaints' (47) that have 'oft caused restraints' (48). The historical record confirms that Myddelton faced considerable opposition from landowners and some members of Parliament. Their warlike opposition cost the project a work stoppage of twenty-two months at one point. Middleton the poet puts a rough and realistic edge on what otherwise functions as an idealized celebration.

Later seventeenth-century reports somewhat muddy the waters of the New River. In his Brief Lives John Aubrey (1626-97) offers a bleak portrait of Hugh Myddelton, as one who stole ideas from others and profited from them. Aubrey credits William Ingelbert with being 'the first Inventor or Projector of bringing the water from Ware to London'. But Sir Hugh 'got the profit and also the Credit of that most useful Invention, for which there ought to have been erected a Statue for the memory of this poor-man from the City of London'. Instead, Sir Hugh's picture hangs in Goldsmiths' Hall, and Ingelbert has been reduced to one 'in a poor Rug-gown like an Alms-man'. What an appalling and journalistically appealing story Aubrey provides. Unfortunately for his sake, it has little basis in fact. True, Ingelbert did enter negotiations with the city, but he dropped out of the picture early on and therefore made no contribution to the successful completion of the project. Aubrey's perspective confirms continuing slander about Hugh Myddelton. Thomas Fuller in The Worthies of England (1662) offers an assessment that more nearly resembles Thomas Middleton's: 'how meritorious a work did this worthy man perform, who, to quench the thirst of thousands in the populous city of London fetched water on his own cost, more than twenty-four miles, encountering all the way with an army of oppositions'. All evidence to the contrary, writers insist on giving Sir Hugh sole credit for financing the new river. Somehow this must appeal to an entrepreneurial spirit that they wish to foster; perhaps it reflects ideas of emerging capitalism with its emphasis on individual risk. In any event, sometimes truth apparently takes a back seat to fiction-making.

One of the finest contemporary accounts appears in Anthony Munday's continuation (1618) of Stow's Survey of London. Munday insists on firsthand knowledge: 'I myself (by favour of the Gentlemen) did divers times ride to see it, and diligently observed, that admirable Art, pains and industry were bestowed for the passage of it.' Munday repeats the by now familiar story of the river's completion 'by the only care, cost and liberal expences of one Worthy Man, master Hugh Myddelton'. And he rehearses the story of the opposition that Myddelton overcame. Munday has gone to some trouble to include this four-page account in the Survey. At the bottom of the first page appears this printed note: 'Let this halfe sheete be plac'd betweene Folio 20. and 21.' This account seems to be a later addition after the pagination had already been worked out: this section has its own signature designation.

Munday's report of the New River also includes Middleton's pageant. Munday faithfully provides the events on Michaelmas Day, such as the gathering at the cistern in Islington, and includes the speech. With only two slight word changes Munday repeats the speech as found in Middleton's text. Munday writes, without revealing his source: 'The Speech at the Cistern, according as it was delivered to me.' Given the accuracy of this printing of the speech, one has to assume that Munday has his eye on Middleton's text. In any event, the 1618 Survey breathes new life into the New River entertainment; the final edition of the Survey (1633) also contains the story and speech of Middleton's entertainment.

The Manner of his Lordships Entertainment

Middleton's speaker argues that Hugh Myddelton's example may give 'Courage to some that may hereafter live | To practise deeds of goodness and of fame, | And cheerfully light their actions by his name' (60-2). But not only does this example offer courage to future virtuous action; it also instructs and informs the poet's view of himself. Middleton admires this Sir Hugh who has survived the onslaughts of 'malice, calumnies, and slanders'. Middleton would write in the Epistle Dedicatory of The Triumphs of Truth that he himself had suffered 'oppositions of malice, ignorance, and envy'. The poet therefore forges a link between himself and the successful Hugh Myddelton, just as he would closely identify himself with the mayor Thomas Myddelton in the other pageant text in the 1613 book. The writer hopes that his 'invention' will participate in the perfection of the New River, as he also in his self-fashioning identifies with political and financial leaders who have overcome adversity.

The Manner of his Lordship's Entertainment

The manner of his Lordship's Entertainment on Michaelmas day last, being the day of his honourable election, together with the worthy Sir John Swinnerton, Knight, then Lord Mayor, the learned and judicious, Sir Henry Montagu, Master Recorder, and many of the right worshipful the Aldermen of the City of London.

At that most famous and admired work of the running stream from Amwell Head, into the cistern near Islington, being the sole invention, cost, and industry of that worthy Master Hugh Myddelton of London, Goldsmith, for the general good of the city.

Perfection, which is the crown of all inventions, swelling now high with happy welcomes to all the glad well-wishers of her admired maturity, the father and master of this famous work, expressing thereby both his thankfulness to heaven and his zeal to the City of London, in true joy of heart to see his time, travails, and expenses so successively greeted, thus gives entertainment to that honourable assembly.

At their first appearing, the warlike music of drums and trumpets liberally beats the air, sounds as proper as in battle, for there is no labour that man undertakes but hath a war within itself, and perfection makes the conquest; and no few or mean onsets of malice, calumnies, and slanders, hath this resolved gentleman borne off, before his labours were invested with victory, as in this following speech to those honourable auditors then placed upon the mount is more at large related.

A troop of labourers, to the number of threescore or upwards, all in green caps alike, bearing in their hands the symbols of their several employments in so great a business, with drums before them, marching twice or thrice about the cistern, orderly present themselves before the mount, and after their obeisance:

THE SPEECH

*Long have we laboured, long desired and prayed
For this great work's perfection, and by th'aid
Of heaven and good men's wishes 'tis at length
Happily conquered by cost, art, and strength.
And after five years' dear expense in days,
Travail, and pains, besides the infinite ways
Of malice, envy, false suggestions,
Able to daunt the spirits of mighty ones
In wealth and courage, this, a work so rare,
Only by one man's industry, cost, and care
Is brought to blest effect, so much withstood,
His only aim the city's general good;
And where before many unjust complaints,
Enviously seated, hath oft caused restraints,
Stops, and great crosses, to our master's charge
And the work's hindrance; favour now at large Spreads itself open to him, and commends
To admiration both his pains and ends,*

The manner of his Lordships Entertainment

55 *The king's most gracious love: perfection draws Favour from princes, and from all applause.
 Then, worthy magistrates, to whose content,
 Next to the state, all this great care was bent,
 And for the public good, which grace requires,
 Your loves and furtherance chiefly he desires,
 To cherish these proceedings, which may give 60 Courage to some that may hereafter live
 To practise deeds of goodness and of fame,
 And cheerfully light their actions by his name.
 Clerk of the work, reach me the book to show
 How many arts from such a labour flow.*

65 These lines following are read in the clerk's book:
*First, here's the overseer, this tried man
 An ancient soldier and an artisan;
 The clerk; next him mathematician;
 The master of the timber-work takes place
 70 Next after these; the measurer in like case;*

*Bricklayer and engineer; and after those
 The borer and the pavior; then it shows
 The labourers next; keeper of Amwell-head;
 The walkers last: so all their names are read;
 Yet these but parcels of six hundred more
 75 That at one time have been employed before;
 Yet these in sight and all the rest will say,
 That every week they had their royal pay.*

The speech goes on.

*Now for the fruits then: flow forth precious spring, 80 So long and dearly sought for, and now bring Comfort to all that love thee; loudly sing,
 And with thy crystal murmurs struck together,
 Bid all thy true well-wishers welcome hither.*

At which words the flood-gate opens, the stream let in 85 into the cistern, drums and trumpets giving it triumphant welcomes; and, for the close of this their honourable entertainment, a peal of chambers.

THE TRIUMPHS OF TRUTH

Edited by David M. Bergeron

WHY do so many critics, even at the beginning of the twenty-first century, typically cross to the other side of the street when they see a civic pageant approaching? Possibly because they share the assumptions implied or stated by a number of writers spanning several centuries who seem to have taken seriously Prospero's reference to 'insubstantial pageants'. For example, George Chapman in the Epistle Dedicatory, addressed to Robert Carr, of the translation of Homer's Odyssey (1614) refers specifically and unkindly to Middleton's first Lord Mayor's show, The Triumphs of Truth, when he writes: 'Why then is Fiction, to this end, so hateful to our true Ignorants? Or why should a poor Chronicler of a Lord Mayor's naked Truth, (that peradventure will last his year) include more worth with our modern wizards, than Homer for his naked Ulysses, clad in eternal Fiction?' Chapman continues by sneering at those writers who 'ride the ambling Muse' and 'Whose Raptures are in every Pageant seen'.

Chapman, the poet who has translated Homer, disdains those who dabble in pageants, for those with 'popular' taste. He refers disparagingly to Middleton as a 'poor chronicler'—as opposed to a true poet, one assumes. He contrasts the 'eternal fiction' of Homer with the ephemeral nature of a Lord Mayor's show—that peradventure will last a year. Ironically, Chapman helps confer permanence on Middleton's effort by this very reference, which appears unaltered again in the 1616 edition of Chapman's Homer. Chapman voices his contempt for the 'true Ignorants' and 'modern wizards' who do not share his superior judgement. More than two centuries after Chapman, J. B. Heath in a history of the Grocers' guild, who sponsored the 1613 pageant, writes that the pageants 'seem to have afforded great delight to the rude and uncultivated understandings of those for whose entertainment they were intended'. Even as Chapman and Heath register their uncomprehending annoyance that pageants have captured the public imagination, they inadvertently testify to the impact of such street entertainments.

In a generally sympathetic article on Middleton's pageants R. C. Bald nevertheless writes in the 1930s that any 'serious achievement in these shows was prevented not merely by the prescribed themes but by the fact that it was impossible to regard the show as a whole'. This bleak assessment depends upon unduly confident assumptions. Bald presumes—what cannot be proven—that someone 'prescribed' the themes for pageant writers, and that 'serious' artistic achievement is incompatible with 'prescribed themes'. This position embraces a romantic ideology about the relationship of patron and artist. When Bald complains about the difficulty of being able to regard 'the show as a whole', he raises the familiar argument of unity. Ideas about unity, derived in part from the totalizing concepts of New Criticism, do not fit pageants. In any case, we can 'regard the show as a whole' through the texts that survive. The event may be scattered, but the text is bound.

With any dramatic text of this early period we ponder its possible relationship to actual performance. Speeches and stage directions provide clues but not the whole event. Middleton's pageant texts do not pretend to give us only the dramatic event itself; instead, we encounter a textual performance that extends in several directions beyond mere representation of theatrical performance. Looking at the three extant texts of Elizabethan Lord Mayor's shows by George Peele (1585, 1591) and Thomas Nelson (1590), we perceive them as models of simplicity. They contain only the speeches and a few stage directions, but no prefatory material, no elaboration, no description, no marginalia—nothing else. By contrast, the Jacobean texts pursue copiousness, starting with Anthony Munday's The Triumphs of Reunited Britannia (1605) and certainly including Thomas Dekker's Troia-Nova Triumphans (1612). Middleton builds on the expanding pageant text. Clearly he intends his texts for readers; they become commemorative books that both capture the event and add to it. They assume an expository and narrative function that sets them apart from the typical dramatic text. Middleton's 1613 text also includes the musical score for the song sung early in the inaugural morning, the first time that a pageant text has contained such musical notation. The music appears at the end of the text, clearly intended for a reader and not trying to duplicate its place in the performance. As readers, we must abandon an overly narrow concern for unity and instead succumb to the pleasures of digressions, descriptions, and discourses on sometimes arcane topics. We experience the pageant text as an event itself, resembling but differing from the show.

Middleton begins the text of The Triumphs of Truth with a formal dedication to the new mayor, as he does all of his pageant texts. (Before Middleton only Dekker's 1612 text has such prefatory matter.) Not yet commonplace in dramatic texts, these dedications add to the sense of this document as a book. The 1613 dedication to the new mayor, also named Thomas Middleton (Myddelton), is Middleton's longest; he refers to the mayor's earlier life and notes their common name. A decidedly religious tone permeates this dedication; this tone may reflect Sir Thomas Myddelton's avowed Puritanism. In the text proper Middleton begins by discussing the quality of the mayor's reception into London and then moves to comment on his own experience with the Grocers, 'the wardens and committees, men of much understanding, industry, and carefulness, little weighing the greatness of expense, so the cost might purchase perfection' (72-5). Middleton adds: 'If any shall imagine that I set fairer colours upon their deserts than they upon themselves, let them but read and conceive' (78-80).

The personal pronouns 'I' and 'you' that recur in Truth and in Middleton's other pageant texts imply a dialogue with a reader, not an attempt to reproduce only the event. Describing the procession to St Paul's Churchyard, Middleton points to the appearance of five islands, 'those dumb glories that I spake of before upon the water' (391-2). Earlier he instructs the reader: 'If you hearken to Zeal... after his holy anger is passed against Error and his crew, he will give it you in better terms' (338-40). In the text of Triumphs of Truth, Middleton assumes the persona of a writer who speaks the truth. If we think that he exaggerates the virtue of the guild, then we need only 'read and conceive'—a wonderfully disingenuous position for Middleton, who in fact provides the principal means by which to judge his accuracy.

Middleton pauses at the end to recognize the contributions of Humphrey Nichols, John Grinkin, and Anthony Munday—the first such acknowledgements in a pageant text. Again, this information takes us beyond a report of the dramatic show. He adds: 'I now conclude, holding it a more learned discretion to cease of myself than to have Time cut me off rudely: and now let him strike at his pleasure' (790-4). No longer a conversation with a reader, this statement suggests Middleton's having a conversation with himself. In and through the text he now participates in the allegorical fiction that he had created for the pageant. Regularly Middleton reminds us that pageant texts exist as a special breed: dramatic texts that fulfil a wide array of functions, including but not restricted to providing the speeches and other apparatus of dramatic performance.

More than his Jacobean counterparts, Middleton uses his texts also to defend his 'art'. In the Epistle Dedicatory, Middleton suggests that he has overcome 'all oppositions of malice, ignorance, and envy' (37) and can now 'do service' to the mayor's fame: 'and my pen only to be employed in these bounteous and honourable triumphs, being but shadows to those eternal glories that stand ready for deservers' (40-3). In the opening lines of the text proper, Middleton hopes that 'the streams of art... equal those of bounty' (60-1). He laments the failure of 'the impudent common writer' to achieve such artistic desires: 'it would heartily grieve any understanding spirit to behold many times so glorious a fire in bounty and goodness offering to match itself with freezing art' (63-7). Whatever specific writers or events Middleton may allude to (and the criticism is deliberately, functionally, ambiguous), he has staked his own claim on the fire of art. This art must match the 'state and magnificence' of the Lord Mayor's inauguration. At the end of the text, he returns to the subject, referring to the 'art' of Nichols and the 'proper beauties' of workmanship, 'most artfully and faithfully performed by John Grinkin' (783-6). The artisans match the high artistic standards that Middleton has set for himself even as they construct the 'body' of the pageant. 'Art' as a word can be applied, comfortably, both to literary works of a poet and to the work of the city's trades and craftsmen.

Before the text, came the event it describes; and before that event, came the institution of mayoralty in London and the development of pageant entertainments to honour the new mayor. King John allowed the establishment of the elective office of mayor in London; Henry fitz Ailwin, who had been appointed mayor in 1189, became the first elected mayor in 1208. As part of the arrangements for this new office the King insisted that the new mayor annually take his oath of office, administered by one of the king's officials, at the Exchequer in the royal government offices in Westminster. The mayor came from the ranks of the aldermen; and they typically derived from one of the twelve principal, or livery, companies of London, which by 1538 had settled into a fixed order of prestige: Mercers, Grocers, Drapers, Fishmongers, Goldsmiths, Skinners, Merchant Taylors, Haberdashers, Salters, Ironmongers, Vintners, and Clothworkers.

The section on 'Temporal Government' in John Stow's The Survey of London (1598) provides a contemporary account of the procedures for electing the mayor and a guide to the ritual of his inauguration. Formally elected on Michaelmas Day (29 September), the new mayor took the oath of office on 29 October, the day after St Simon and St Jude's Day. Stow notes that the aldermen greet the new mayor at eight o'clock in the morning and escort him to the Guildhall, the seat of city government. From there the entourage goes to the river and takes barges upriver to Westminster where the mayor takes the oath. Entertainment may occur on this river journey. The party then returns downstream to the City of London. In the 1613 text, Middleton shows the procession beginning from the Guildhall, going by river to Westminster, then returning to London at Baynard's Castle, moving by land to St Paul's Cathedral, on to Cheapside, through St Lawrence Lane to the Guildhall, back to St Paul's for religious services, and finally to the mayor's home. Abbreviated versions of this traditional route govern all of Middleton's pageants. Unlike the great London royal entry pageants for Elizabeth I and James I which moved from the Tower westward through the City toward Westminster, the mayoral procession moved west to east. The mayor encountered tableaux and speeches along the way; indeed, as in the 1613 pageant, some of the devices followed the mayor in procession. The report from the Russian ambassador Aleksei Ziuzin, who was present for this pageant, underscores the importance of this ceremony, saying at one point: 'except for the King's coronation there is no other such great ceremony in England'. (Ziuzin's complete account is printed in this edition following the text of the pageant.) Not only did the mayor's representatives urge the ambassador's attendance, so did James I, according to the account. The ambassadorial dispatch (printed in this edition following the pageant's text) captures much of the spectacle, including the river procession, and emphasizes the participation by many different groups in the entertainment, including children who carried various constructed animals. The whole city, according to the ambassador, watched the festivities.

A mayor, a day, and a festive occasion do not inevitably lead to drama. By the beginning of the fifteenth century the London guilds became responsible for setting the Midsummer Watch on 24 and 29 June. By 1504, the pageant entertainment included a procession and dramatic representations mainly of biblical and religious subjects. But these shows decline because the guilds' attention shifts to the inaugural day of the new mayor. Henry Machyn provides in 1553 the first report of a Lord Mayor's show, although guild records indicate a pageant as early as 1535. Guild records in 1561 provide the first speeches for a Lord Mayor's Show; the first surviving printed text preserves George Peele's pageant of 1585 and also underscores the growing involvement of well-known writers and dramatists with these pageants. Peele's Descensus Astraeae (1591), although the last extant text of an Elizabethan mayoral show, is the first to have a distinct, specific title. In the hands of Munday, Dekker, and Middleton the Jacobean Lord Mayor's show gains a complexity unknown in the previous reign.

How do these dramatists fit into the guilds' plans and negotiations? As with medieval drama, the guilds assessed their membership in order to finance street pageants; therefore, an unbroken line of guild support of drama runs from the fourteenth century to the end of the seventeenth. Fortunately, guild records provide sufficient documentation for the planning and expenditures. The Grocers' Court Books reveal unusually early deliberations on 5 February 1613 about preparations for a mayoral pageant, surveying the need for banners, streamers, and other ornaments 'set in readiness in convenient time in honour of the next worthy Magistrate that shall be chosen out of this Company'. (The Grocers had not sponsored a pageant for a mayor from their ranks since 1598.) Also in February the Master, Wardens, and others gave consideration to a 'Device or project in writing set down' by Anthony Munday. Not unlike dramatists submitting plots to Henslowe for plays in public theatres, Munday, Middleton, and others offered a proposal to be considered by the appropriate authorities in the guild. If chosen, the dramatist would then negotiate the specific services that he would perform. Records in 1613 indicate that Munday received the gross sum of £149 for his 'device', providing apparel, securing players, and arranging transportation. Middleton got £40 'for the ordering overseeing and writing of the whole Device'.

Other records from March, June, and July 1613 reveal the workings of various committees planning the pageant. The records of April 1614 tally the various expenditures, including £4 to the printer Nicholas Okes for printing the text, probably the usual run of 500 copies for pageants as shown in other guild records. John Grinkin, the artificer, received £310 for the construction of all the pageant devices—the ship, chariots, five islands, and all the carpentry work, painting, and fireworks. The total cost of nearly £1,300 makes this show the most expensive such pageant; the average cost, based on available records, of a Lord Mayor's show in the early Stuart period comes to slightly over £700. The exceptionally early planning and generous expenditure suggest that the Grocers intended to outstrip recent pageants; this zeal may lay behind Middleton's criticism of the 'freezing art' of his predecessors.

Thus The Triumphs of Truth came into existence. Defying Chapman's assessment, it has lasted beyond its year. Whenever critics discuss mayoral pageants, they inevitably focus on Truth, as evident in the work of Gail Kern Paster, Muriel Bradbrook, Sheila Williams, Glynn Wickham, Theodore Leinwand, and David Bergeron. A. A. Bromham indeed explores the topical, political context of 1613 and its relevance to the pageant. Unlike other mayoral pageants, it even has a performance history. The Lord Mayor's celebration of 1913 purported to be a reproduction of Middleton's show; but in fact it did not resemble the earlier pageant, although it included representations of Thomas Myddelton (the new mayor) and Hugh Myddelton

(his brother). A giant also represented the New River. On 2 May 1988, the Corporation of London presented 'The Lord Mayor of London's Jacobean Thames Pageant', consisting of several barges that moved along the Thames, all inspired by Middleton's Triumphs of Truth. Reflecting late twentieth-century reality, this 1988 show occurred 'in association with Thames Television' and served as a charity event for the 1988 ITV Telethon. A media and charity occasion, it had no real connection to the office of mayor or other traditional civic events; it became an excuse for spectacle. Nevertheless, the planners of this pageant did pay attention to Middleton's text and presented many of the figures from the 1613 show, such as London, Truth, Time, Truth's Angel, and Zeal. (Of course, they also added Roman soldiers and Roman handmaidens, possibly because they look good from barges.)

The artistic achievement of this pageant derives from Middleton's successful solution to the problem of how to represent the struggle between truth and error. Middleton approaches this conflict from several directions, relying on an implicit system of correspondences that enables the poet to connect moral ideas and historical persons to his fiction. The created characters make manifest the ideas that Middleton seeks to convey. Middleton also through the construction of his text underscores the battle between truth and error. For example, in the opening thirty-six lines of the text proper he twice makes rhetorical moves that hinge on this conflict. He first establishes the idea that no place receives a new mayor in such state and magnificence as London does: 'This being then infallible' (54). Error opposes this certainty by providing inadequate art for such an occasion, offering instead 'miserable want' and 'freezing art, sitting in darkness'—the place of error (62–7). Middleton begins line 69: 'But to speak truth'. If any imagine that the dramatist exaggerates the spectacle, 'their own understandings will light them to the acknowledgement of their errors' (80–2). Such rhetorical conflict makes sense, of course, only to a reader.

The representation of London in the performance heightens the tension between truth and error. Middleton presents the figure as a woman, 'a reverend mother', with long white hair and wearing 'on her head a model of steeples and turrets' (119–21). Middleton deliberately emphasizes the feminine gender so that he may pursue the metaphor of the city as caring mother. A female London links immediately to Truth, which always appears as feminine. Had he wanted, the dramatist might have named the pageant 'The Triumphs of London', reflecting the prominence of this character who speaks significantly more lines than any other. London exists in at least two ways in the pageant: as present reality and as representation. Middleton exploits this fiction–reality axis, common in most civic pageants. That is, London appears as a fictionalized, female character and as an obvious reality in the very streets where the performance takes place. Spectators looking at London also see London around them. The representation functions as a synecdoche of the city itself, resembling but obviously differing from the actual city.

In the opening speech London emphasizes her maternal connection to the mayor: 'I am thy mother' (131). Since she addresses the real mayor Thomas Myddelton, she thereby underscores the blurred boundary between fiction and reality. This speech (ll. 126–94) strikes us immediately because much of it forgoes the familiar rhymed couplets used by most pageant dramatists. In moral terms London sketches the difference between truth and error, as the speech moves from past actions to present and future imperatives. London asserts that the mayor's soul contains 'The sacred lights of divine fear and knowledge' (134), gained from this caring mother who has 'Set wholesome and religious laws' (142) before him and who has cheered his youth with 'the faith, the love, the zealous fires' (154). London boldly says: 'thou'st all from me' (159). These virtues derive from and embody truth. But error also exists in 'sons' who have been disobedient, who refrain 'from doing grace and service' (168) to London, a city that may also contain 'pollution, | Sin, and uncleanness' (188–9), the result of error. London closes with this benediction: 'My blessing be upon thee, son and lord, | And on my sons all that obey my word' (193–4). To obey London's 'word' means in effect to obey the Word of Truth. The words of London reinforce a moral struggle between truth and error; London joins this war as the pageant allegorizes a battle for the mayor's soul. This battle gains specific visual representation at London's Triumphant Mount, the last major device, located near the Little Conduit in Cheapside. London, surrounded by allegorical virtues, drives away the shroud that covers the mount, a darkness caused by Error.

Middleton dramatizes the Truth–Error conflict by choosing to personify such figures and to provide a 'naïve allegory' of their struggle. A psychomachian battle takes place simultaneously in the streets and in the mind of the mayor, who participates both in the fiction and in the real world of his inauguration. The representation of Truth and Error as characters depends on an allegorical frame of mind and on emblematic and iconographical techniques. Such techniques can be found in emblem books, which emerged on the European continent in the sixteenth century. Andrea Alciati's Emblematum (1531) and Cesare Ripa's Iconologia (1593) became particularly influential, existing in several editions and translations. Two important English emblem books depend on the Italian models: Geoffrey Whitney's A Choice of Emblemes (1586), the first English emblem book, and Henry Peacham's Minerva Britannia (1612). Whether the dramatist knew these books directly matters less than his appropriation of their methods. Emblems typically contain three parts: motto, picture, and verses that pull the parts together. The tableaux that constitute The Triumphs of Truth resemble movable emblems, ones the audience could recognize.

Emblems participate in iconographical traditions, received ways in which certain mythological and allegorical figures should be represented. Middleton adapts and re-hearses that which he inherited. Therefore he describes Truth who sits in a chariot 'in a close garment of white satin, which makes her appear thin and naked' (324–5), a dove over her head and serpents under her feet 'in that she treads down all subtlety and fraud' (331–2), a 'sun in her right hand' (335), 'on her breast a pure round crystal, showing the brightness of her thoughts and actions' (333–5). Zeal, the speaker, says: 'Nor by the naked plainness of her weeds | Judge thou her worth, no burnished gloss Truth needs' (348–9). But Zeal continues to offer a 'burnished gloss' for the benefit of the spectators, just as Middleton's text assists the reader in comprehending the symbolic value of Truth's properties. With slight variation Middleton's Truth could have walked off the pages of Peacham's Minerva Britanna and into the pageant. On page 134 of the emblem book Truth appears, naked, holding a sunburst in her right hand and a palm branch in her left and also a book, while her right foot rests on a globe—details that Peacham probably took from Ripa. Serpents form the decorative border for the emblem. Clearly Peacham's picture represents the 'triumphs of truth'. The verses interpret the symbolism of the emblem, much as Zeal's speech does in the pageant.

Middleton represents the quality Error in vivid terms as he sits in a chariot near St Paul's, 'his garment of ash-colour silk, his head rolled in a cloud, over which stands an owl, a mole on one shoulder, a bat on the other, all symbols of blind ignorance and darkness, mists hanging at his eyes' (245–9). This emblematic representation heightens the contrast with Truth. Envy accompanies Error, 'eating of a human heart, . . . attired in red silk, . . . her left pap bare, where a snake fastens' (250–2). This gruesome image could derive from a similar portrait in Whitney's and other emblem books or from Dekker's representation in the 1612 pageant. Interestingly, in Middleton's allegory the mayor and his retinue encounter Error before Truth, which may reflect Middleton's view of the post-lapsarian world. Such a sequence also underscores the importance of the figure London as the initial embodiment of truth.

For sheer seductive power nothing surpasses Error's first speech (255–318). If Error cannot look very attractive, he can certainly sound enticing. In effect, Error turns upside down the world articulated by London earlier in the pageant, at first by a kind of poetic imitation of London's speech. Like London, Error first avoids the typical pattern of rhymed couplets. If representation depends in part on resemblance, then Error first resembles London, but with a profound difference. If we heard only the opening few lines of Error's speech, we would hear a seemingly benign voice, like London's. Error says: 'Art come? O welcome, my triumphant lord, | My glory's sweetheart! how many millions | Of happy wishes hath my love told out | For this desired minute' (255–8). Error does not sound so bad.

But this disingenuous quality gives way to Error's true intent: to be false. The son of darkness adopts the imagery of light. With the mayor's arrival, Error claims now to be

'all of light, | Of fire, of joy, pleasure runs nimbly through me' (261–2). 'Power' becomes the operative word for Error as he adumbrates a programme for exercising power and gaining wealth, the seductive charms of high office. By line 270, 'And let thy will and appetite sway the sword', there can be no doubt about Error's purpose. The final movement of Error's speech concentrates on the 'evils' of Truth, her narrow, single, austere way of life, while Error offers pleasure and delight. Error notes that 'e'en in this throng' (302) of spectators he could find many 'children'. With some irony Error makes his final assertion: 'This of thy life I'll make the golden year' (317). But 'golden' for Error can only refer to material accumulation, whereas London has earlier urged, 'disdain all titles | Purchased with coin' (177–8). Middleton has succeeded in giving Error considerable dramatic interest.

The representation of truth and error takes another twist in the appearance of a King of Moors, his queen, and attendants. Moors had appeared in early sixteenth-century Midsummer Shows and in the 1585 Lord Mayor's show. The pageant's sponsoring guild, the Grocers, had joined with the East India Company to expand their trade—hence another reason to include the Moor. The Moorish king confronts directly the issue of his colour: 'does my complexion draw | So many Christian eyes that never saw | A king so black before?' (413–14). He connects his appearance with assumptions made about him: 'I being a Moor, then, in opinion's lightness, | As far from sanctity as my face from whiteness' (423–4). Beneath that dark exterior resides a transformed soul: 'Truth in my soul sets up the light of grace' (430). Having once pursued error in false religion ('And though in days of error I did run', 431), the king through the work of English merchants has been 'brought to the true Christian faith' (440). The power of truth, embodied in the English traders, had 'power to convert infidels' (442). Even the ship on which he has allegedly travelled and which has no pilot has safely brought him to the streets of London, 'Only by Truth steered, as our souls must be' (454). Dismayed at this show of piety, Error cries out: 'What, have my sweet-faced devils forsook me too?' (464). Error forsaken and Truth embraced: the pageant's essential programme for salvation.

Symbolic landscape functions also to represent the pageant's essential battle. The power of Error shrouds London's Triumphant Mount only to have it transformed again by Truth. This alteration occurs several times, suggesting, as Truth herself points out, the necessity of vigilance. Finally, Zeal, 'his head circled with strange fires' (769), seeks permission from Truth to destroy Error's chariot. He cries out: 'Then here's to the destruction of that seat; | There's nothing seen of thee but fire shall eat' (777–8). The text describes what then happens: 'At which a flame shoots from the head of Zeal, which, fastening upon that chariot of Error, sets it on fire, and all the beasts that are joined to it' (779–81). What a spectacular finish to the conflict between Truth and Error. But it is more than spectacle: Error's burned chariot 'being a figure or type of his lordship's justice on all wicked offenders in the time of his government' (789–90).

Sir Thomas Myddelton the mayor must have been justly pleased by the art of Mr Thomas Middleton the poet. From the playwright's pen has come this entertainment that pales only if compared to 'those eternal glories that stand ready for deservers'. The bounty of the Grocers has met its match in Middleton's art, which has produced not 'idle relish' but rather 'bounteous and honourable triumphs'. The glowing ashes of Error's chariot testify to the complete victory of Truth and to the imaginative zeal by which the poet has approached his task: no freezing art here. In 1613 Thomas Middleton helped set the standard by which to judge Lord Mayor's shows.

The Epistle Dedicatory

To the great expectation of virtue and goodness, and most worthy of all those costs and honours which the noble Fellowship and Society of Grocers and general love of the 20 whole City in full-heaped bounties bestow upon him, the truly generous and judicious Sir Thomas Myddelton, Knight, Lord Mayor of the honourable City of London

As often as we shall fix our thoughts upon the Almighty
Providence, so often they return to our capacities laden 25 with admiration, either from the divine works of his mercy or those incomprehensible of his justice. But here to instance only his omnipotent mercy, it being the health and preservation of all his works, and first, not only in raising, but also in preserving your lordship from many great and incident dangers, especially in foreign countries in the time of your youth and travels; and 30 now, with safety, love, and triumph, to establish you in this year's honour, crowning the perfection of your days, and the gravity of your life, with power, respect, and reverence. Next, in that myself, though unworthy, 35 being of one name with your lordship, notwithstanding all oppositions of malice, ignorance, and envy, should thus happily live, protected by part of that mercy—as if one fate did prosperously cleave to one name—now to do service to your fame and worthiness, and my pen 40 only to be employed in these bounteous and honourable triumphs, being but shadows to those eternal glories that stand ready for deservers; to which I commend the deserts of your justice, remaining ever,

To your lordship, in the best of my observance, of bounty; a knowledge that may take the true height of such an honourable solemnity; the miserable want of both which, in the impudent common writer, hath often forced from me much pity and sorrow; and it would heartily 65 grieve any understanding spirit to behold many times so glorious a fire in bounty and goodness offering to match itself with freezing art, sitting in darkness, with the candle out, looking like the picture of Black Monday.

But to speak truth, which many beside myself can affirm
 70 upon knowledge, a care that hath been seldom equalled and not easily imitated hath been faithfully shown in the whole course of this business, both by the wardens and committees, men of much understanding, industry, and carefulness, little weighing the greatness of expense, so the
 75 cost might purchase perfection, so fervent hath been their desire to excel in that, which is a learned and virtuous ambition, and so unfeignedly pure the loves and affections of the whole company to his lordship. If any shall imagine that I set fairer colours upon their deserts than they upon 80 themselves, let them but read and conceive, and their own understandings will light them to the acknowledgement of their errors. First, they may here behold love and bounty opening with the morning, earlier than some of former years, ready at the first appearing of his lordship to give his ear a taste of the day's succeeding glory; and thus the 85 form of it presents itself.

At Soper-Lane end a senate-house erected, upon which musicians sit playing, and more to quicken time, a sweet voice married to these words:

 Think not the glass too slowly runs
 That in Time's hand is set,
 Because thy worthy son appears not yet:
 Lady, be pleased, the hour grows on,

 Thou shalt behold
 The man enrolled
 In honour's books, whom virtue raises;
 Love-circled round,
 100 His triumphs crowned
 With all good wishes, prayers, and praises.*

*What greater comfort to a mother's heart,
 Than to behold her son's desert
 Go hand in hand with love,

 It is of power all griefs to kill,
 And with a flood of joy to fill
 Thy aged eyes,
 To see him rise*

 My words the less 'cause I a woman speak,
 A woman's counsel is not always weak. 130
 I am thy mother; at that name I know
 Thy heart does reverence to me, as becomes
 A son of honour, in whose soul burns clear
 The sacred lights of divine fear and knowledge;
 I know that at this instant all the works 135
 Of motherly love in me, shown to thy youth,
 When it was soft and helpless, are summed up
 In thy most grateful mind: thou well rememb'rest
 All my dear pains and care; with what affection
 I cherish thee in my bosom, watchful still 140
 Over thy ways;
 Set wholesome and religious laws before
 The footsteps of thy youth; showed thee the way
 That led thee to the glory of this day.
 To which, with tears of the most fruitful joy 145
 That ever mother shed, I welcome thee.
 O, I could be content to take my part
 Out of felicity only in weeping,
 Thy presence and this day is so dear to me.
 Look on my age, my honourable son, 150
 And then begin to think upon thy office;
 See how on each side of me hang the cares
 Which I bestowed on thee, in silver hairs;
 And now the faith, the love, the zealous fires
 With which I cheered thy youth, my age requires. 155
 The duty of a mother I have shown,
 Through all the rites of pure affection,
 In care, in government, in wealth, in honour,*

Mother . . . sons i.e., London
 115 Guildhall civic hall for the governing bodies of the City of London

The Triumphes of Truth.

160 Brought thee to what thou art, thou'st all from me;
 Then what thou shouldst be I expect from thee.
 Now to thy charge, thy government, thy cares,
 Thy mother in her age submits her years:
 And though—to my abundant grief I speak it,
 Which now o'erflows my joy—some sons I have 165 Thankless, unkind, and disobedient,
 Rewarding all my bounties with neglect,
 And will of purpose wilfully retire
 Themselves from doing grace and service to me,
 When they've got all they can, or hope for, from me,
 170 The thankfulness in which thy life doth move
 Did ever promise fairer fruits of love,
 And now they show themselves; yet they have all
 My blessing with them, so the world shall see
 'Tis their unkindness, no defect in me.
 175 But go thou forward, my thrice-honoured son,
 In ways of goodness; glory is best won
 When merit brings it home; disdain all titles
 Purchased with coin, of honour take thou hold
 By thy desert; let others buy't with gold;
 180 Fix thy most serious thought upon the weight
 Thou go'st to undergo, 'tis the just government
 Of this famed city, me, whom nations call
 Their brightest eye; then with what care and fear
 Ought I to be o'erseen, to be kept clear?
 185 Spots in deformed faces are scarce noted,
 Fair cheeks are stained if ne'er so little blotted.
 Seest thou this key of gold? It shows thy charge.
 This place is the king's chamber; all pollution,
 Sin, and uncleanness must be locked out here,
 190 And be kept sweet with sanctity, faith, and fear:
 I see grace takes effect: heaven's joy upon her.
 'Tis rare when virtue opes the gate to honour.
 My blessing be upon thee, son and lord,
 And on my sons all that obey my word.

195 Then making her honour, as before, the waits of the city there in service, his lordship and the worthy company are led forward toward the waterside, where you shall find the river decked in the richest glory to receive him; upon whose crystal bosom stand five islands, artfully garnished 200 with all manner of Indian fruit trees, drugs, spiceries, and the like; the middle island with a fair castle especially beautified.

But making haste to return to the city again, where triumph waits in more splendour and magnificence, the 205 first then that attends to receive his lordship off the water at Baynard's Castle is Truth's Angel on horseback, his raiment of white silk powdered with stars of gold, on his head a crown of gold, a trumpeter before him on horseback, and Zeal, the champion of Truth, in a garment of flame-coloured silk, with a bright hair on his head, 210 from which shoot fire-beams, following close after him, mounted alike, his right hand holding a flaming scourge, intimating thereby that as he is the manifester of Truth,

 he is likewise the chastiser of Ignorance and Error.

THE SALUTATION OF THE ANGEL

I have within mine eye my blessed charge: 215
 Hail, friend of Truth; safety and joy attends thee.
 I am Truth's Angel, by my mistress sent
 To guard and guide thee. When thou took'st thy oath,
 I stood on thy right hand, though to thy eye
 220 In visible form I did not then appear;
 Ask but thy soul, 'twill tell thee I stood near;
 And 'twas a time to take care of thee then,
 At such a marriage before heaven and men,
 Thy faith being wed to honour; close behind thee
 225 Stood Error's minister that still sought to blind thee,
 And wrap his subtle mists about thy oath,
 To hide it from the nakedness of troth,
 Which is Truth's purest glory; but my light,
 Still as it shone, expelled her blackest spite;
 230 His mists fled by, yet all I could devise
 Could hardly keep them from some people's eyes,
 But thine they flew from: thy care's but begun,
 Wake on, the victory is not half yet won;
 Thou wilt be still assaulted, thou shalt meet
 235 With many dangers that in voice seem sweet,
 And ways most pleasant to a worldling's eye;
 My mistress has but one, but that leads high.
 To yon triumphant city follow me,
 Keep thou to Truth, eternity keeps to thee.

ZEAL

On boldly, man of honour; thou shalt win. 240
 I am Truth's champion, Zeal, the scourge of sin.

The trumpet then sounding, the Angel and Zeal rank themselves just before his lordship and conduct him to Paul's-Chain, where in the south yard Error in a chariot 245 with his infernal ministers attends to assault him, his garment of ash-colour silk, his head rolled in a cloud, over which stands an owl, a mole on one shoulder, a bat on the other, all symbols of blind ignorance and darkness, mists hanging at his eyes. Close before him rides Envy, 250 his champion, eating of a human heart, mounted on a rhinoceros, attired in red silk, suitable to the bloodiness of her manners; her left pap bare, where a snake fastens; her arms half naked, holding in her right hand a dart tinted in blood.

The Triumphs of Truth.

For this desirèd minute. I was dead
 Till I enjoyed thy presence; I saw nothing,
 260 A blindness thicker than idolatry
 Clove to my eyeballs; now I am all of light,
 Of fire, of joy, pleasure runs nimbly through me;
 Let's join together both in state and triumph,
 And down with beggarly and friendless virtue,
 265 That hath so long impoverished this fair city;
 My beasts shall trample on her naked breast,
 Under my chariot wheels her bones lie pressed,
 She ne'er shall rise again. Great power this day
 Is given into thy hand; make use on't, lord, 270 And let thy will and appetite sway the sword;
 Down with them all now whom thy heart envies,
 Let not thy conscience come into thine eyes
 This twelvemonth, if thou lov'st revenge or gain;
 I'll teach thee to cast mists to blind the plain 275 And simple eye of man; he shall not know't,
 Nor see thy wrath when 'tis upon his throat;
 All shall be carried with such art and wit,
 That what thy lust acts shall be counted fit:
 Then for attendants that may best observe thee,
 280 I'll pick out sergeants of my band to serve thee;
 Here's Gluttony and Sloth, two precious slaves,
 Will tell thee more than a whole herd of knaves;
 The worth of every office to a hair,
 And who bids most, and how the markets are,
 285 Let them alone to smell; and, for a need,
 They'll bring thee in bribes for measures and light bread;
 Keep thy eye winking and thy hand wide ope,
 Then thou shalt know what wealth is, and the scope
 Of rich authority; ho, 'tis sweet and dear.
 290 Make use of time then, thou'st but one poor year,
 And that will quickly slide, then be not nice:
 Both power and profit cleaves to my advice;
 And what's he locks his ear from those sweet charms,
 Or runs not to meet gain with wide-stretched arms?
 295 There is a poor, thin, threadbare thing called Truth,
 I give thee warning of her; if she speak,
 Stop both thine ears close; most professions break
 That ever dealt with her; an unlucky thing,
 She's almost sworn to nothing. I can bring 300 A thousand of our parish, besides queans,
 That ne'er knew what Truth meant, nor ever means.
 Some I could cull out here, e'en in this throng,
 If I would show my children, and how strong
 I were in faction. 'Las, poor simple stray.
 305 She's all her lifetime finding out one way;
 Sh'as but one foolish way, straight on, right forward,
 And yet she makes a toil on't, and goes on
 With care and fear, forsooth, when I can run
 Over a hundred with delight and pleasure,
 310 Back-ways and by-ways, and fetch in my treasure

After the wishes of my heart, by shifts,
 Deceits, and sleights: and I'll give thee those gifts;
 I'll show thee all my corners yet untold,
 The very nooks where beldams hide their gold,
 315 In hollow walls and chimneys, where the sun
 Never yet shone, nor Truth came ever near:
 This of thy life I'll make the golden year;
 Follow me then.

ENVY

Learn now to scorn thy inferiors, those most love thee,
 And wish to eat their hearts that sit above thee. 320

Zeal, stirred up with divine indignation at the impudence of these hell-hounds, both forceth their retirement and makes way for the chariot wherein Truth his mistress sits in a close garment of white satin, which makes her appear thin and naked, figuring thereby her simplicity 325 and nearness of heart to those that embrace her; a robe of white silk cast over it, filled with the eyes of eagles, showing her deep insight and height of wisdom; over her thrice-sanctified head a milk-white dove, and on each shoulder one, the sacred emblems of purity, meekness, 330 and innocency; under her feet serpents, in that she treads down all subtlety and fraud; her forehead empaled with a diadem of stars, the witness of her eternal descent; on her breast a pure round crystal, showing the brightness of her thoughts and actions; a sun in her right hand, than which 335 nothing is truer; a fan, filled all with stars, in her left, with which she parts darkness and strikes away the vapours of ignorance. If you hearken to Zeal, her champion, after his holy anger is passed against Error and his crew, he will give it you in better terms, or at least more smoothly and 340 pleasingly.

THE SPEECH OF ZEAL

Bold furies, back, or with this scourge of fire,
 Whence sparkles out religious chaste desire,
 I'll whip you down to darkness: this a place
 Worthy my mistress; her eternal grace 345
 Be the full object to feast all these eyes,
 But thine the first; he that feeds here is wise.
 Nor by the naked plainness of her weeds
 Judge thou her worth, no burnished gloss Truth needs;
 That crown of stars shows her descent from heaven;
 350 That robe of white, filled all with eagles' eyes,
 Her piercing sight through hidden mysteries;
 Those milk-white doves her spotless innocence;
 Those serpents at her feet her victory shows
 Over deceit and guile, her rankest foes; 355
 And by that crystal mirror at her breast
 The clearness of her conscience is expressed;
 And showing that her deeds all darkness shun,
 Her right hand holds Truth's symbol, the bright sun;
 A fan of stars she in the other twists, 360

And now she makes to thee her so even grace,
For to her rich and poor look with one face.

THE WORDS OF TRUTH

365 Man, raised by faith and love, upon whose head
Honour sits fresh, let not thy heart be led,
In ignorant ways of insolence and pride,
From her that to this day hath been thy guide;
I never showed thee yet more paths than one,
370 And thou hast found sufficient that alone
To bring thee hither; then go forward still,
And having most power, first subject thy will;
Give the first fruits of justice to thyself.
Then dost thou wisely govern, though that elf
Of sin and darkness, still opposing me,
375 Counsels thy appetite to master thee.
But call to mind what brought thee to this day.
Was falsehood, cruelty, or revenge the way?
Thy lust or pleasures? people's curse or hate?
These were no ways could raise thee to this state,

The ignorant must acknowledge; if then from me,
Which no ill dare deny or sin control,
Forsake me not, that can advance thy soul:
I see a blessed yielding in thy eye;
Thou'rt mine; lead on, thy name shall never die.

380

385 These words ended, they all set forward, this chariot of Truth and her celestial handmaids, the Graces and Virtues, taking place next before his lordship; Zeal and the Angel before that, the chariot of Error following as near as it can get; all passing on till they come into Paul's Churchyard, where stand ready the five islands, 390 those dumb glories that I spake of before upon the water: upon the height of these five islands sit five persons, representing the Five Senses: Visus, Auditus, Tactus, Gustus, Olfactus, or Seeing, Hearing, Touching,
Tasting, Smelling; at their feet their proper emblems:
395 aquila, cervus, araneus, simia, canis; an eagle, a hart, a spider, an ape, a dog.

400 that which may raise greater astonishment, it having neither sailor nor pilot, only upon a white silk streamer these two words set in letters of gold, Veritate gubernor:
I am steered by Truth. The persons that are contained within this little vessel are only four: a king of the Moors, 405 his queen, and two attendants of their own colour; the rest of their followers people the castle that stands in the middle island, of which company two or three on the top appears to sight. This king seeming much astonished at the many eyes of such a multitude, utters his thoughts in 410 these words.

THE SPEECH OF THAT KING

*I see amazement set upon the faces
Of these white people, wond'ring and strange gazes;
Is it at me? does my complexion draw
So many Christian eyes that never saw 415 A king so black before? no, now I see
Their entire object, they're all meant to thee,
Grave city-governor, my queen and I
Well honoured with the glances that pass by.
I must confess many wild thoughts may rise,
420 Opinions, common murmurs, and fixed eyes,
At my so strange arrival in a land
Where true religion and her temples stand.
I being a Moor, then, in opinion's lightness,
As far from sanctity as my face from whiteness;
425 But I forgive the judgings of th'unwise,
Whose censures ever quicken in their eyes,
Only begot of outward form and show.
And I think meet to let such censurers know,
However darkness dwells upon my face,
430 Truth in my soul sets up the light of grace;
And though in days of error I did run
To give all adoration to the sun,
The moon, and stars, nay, creatures base and poor,
Now only their Creator I adore.
435 My queen and people all, at one time won
By the religious conversation
Of English merchants, factors, travellers,
Whose truth did with our spirits hold commerce,
As their affairs with us; following their path,
440 We all were brought to the true Christian faith.
Such benefit in good example dwells,
It oft hath power to convert infidels;
Nor could our desires rest till we were led Unto this place, where those good spirits were bred;
445 And see how we arrived in blessed time
To do that mistress service, in the prime
Of these her spotless triumphs, and t'attend
That honourable man, her late-sworn friend.
If any wonder at the safe arrive*

404 Moors Presumably Middleton refers to residents of the East Indies, especially given the Grocers' connection to the East India company.

437 factors one who buys or sells on behalf of another; also, one of the third class of

461 St Paul St Paul's Cathedral

484.n St Paul's Cross located on north side of St Paul's, a platform from which sermons were delivered

*Of this small vessel, which all weathers drive
According to their rages, where appears
Nor mariner nor pilot, armed 'gainst fears,
Know this came hither from man's guidance free,
Only by Truth steered, as our souls must be.
And see where one of her fair temples stands;
455 Do reverence, Moors, bow low, and kiss your hands:
Behold, our queen.*

QUEEN

*Her goodnesses are such,
We cannot honour her and her house too much.*

All in the ship and those in the castle bowing their bodies to the temple of St Paul; but Error smiling, betwixt scorn and anger to see such a devout humility take hold of that complexion, breaks into these.

ERROR

*What, have my sweet-faced devils forsook me too?
Nay, then, my charms will have enough to do.*

But Time, sitting by the frame of Truth his daughter's chariot, attired agreeable to his condition, with his hour-glass, wings, and scythe, knowing best himself when it is fittest to speak, goes forward in this manner.

TIME

*This Time hath brought t'effect, for on thy day
Nothing but Truth and Virtue shall display
Their virgin ensigns; Infidelity,
Barbarism, and Guile, shall in deep darkness lie.
O, I could ever stand still thus and gaze;
Never turn glass again, wish no more days,
475 So this might ever last; pity the light
Of this rich glory must be cased in night.
But Time must on; I go; 'tis so decreed,
To bless my daughter Truth and all her seed
With joys immortal, triumphs never-ending.
480 And as her hand lifts me, to thy ascending
May it be always ready, worthy son,
To hasten which my hours shall quickly run.
Seest thou yon place? thither I'll weekly bring thee,
Where Truth's celestial harmony thou shalt hear;
To which I charge thee bend a serious ear.
Lead on, Time's swift attendants.*

Then the five islands pass along into Cheapside, the ship next after them; the chariot of Truth still before his lordship, and that of Error still chased before it, where their eyes meet with another more subtle object, planting itself close by the Little Conduit, which may bear this character: the true form and fashion of a mount triumphant, but the beauty and glory thereof overspread with a thick, sulphurous darkness, it being a fog or mist raised from Error, enviously to blemish that place

488 Cheapside chief commercial street in the City of London running east from St Paul's 500 which bears the title of London's Triumphant Mount, the chief grace and lustre of the whole triumph. At the four corners sit four monsters, Error's disciples, on whom hangs part of the mist for their clothing, holding in their hands little thick clubs, coloured like their garments; the names of these four monsters, Barbarism, Ignorance, Impudence, Falsehood; who, at the near approaching of Truth's chariot, are seen a little to tremble, whilst her deity gives life to these words.

TRUTH

510 *What's here? the mist of Error? dare his spite
Stain this Triumphant Mount, where our delight
Hath been divinely fixed so many ages?
Dare darkness now breathe forth her insolent rages,
And hang in pois'nous vapours o'er the place
From whence we received love, and returned grace?
I see if Truth a while but turn her eyes,
Thick are the mists that o'er fair cities rise:
We did expect to receive welcome here
515 From no deformed shapes, but divine and clear;
Instead of monsters that this place attends,
To meet with goodness and her glorious friends;
Nor can they so forget me to be far.
I know there stands no other envious bar
520 But that foul cloud to darken this bright day,
Which with this fan of stars I'll chase away.
Vanish, infectious fog, that I may see
This city's grace, that takes her light from me.
Vanish, give way.*

525 At this her powerful command, the cloud suddenly rises and changes into a bright-spreading canopy, stuck thick with stars and beams of gold shooting forth round about it, the mount appearing then most rich in beauty and glory, the four monsters falling flat at the foot of the hill, that grave, feminine shape, figuring London, sitting in greatest honour. Next above her, in the most eminent place, sits Religion, the model of a fair temple on her head and a burning lamp in her hand, the proper emblems of her sanctity, watchfulness, and zeal; on her right hand sits Liberality, her head circled with a wreath of gold, in her hand a cornucopia, or horn of abundance, out of which rusheth a seeming flood of gold, but no way flowing to prodigality; for, as the sea is governed by the moon, so is that wealthy river by her eye, for bounty must be led by judgement; and hence is artfully derived the only difference between prodigality and bounty: the one deals her gifts with open eyes, the other blindfold: on her left side sits Perfect Love, his proper seat being nearest the heart, wearing upon his head a wreath of white and red roses mingled together, the ancient witness of peace, love, and union, wherein consists the happiness of this land, his right hand holding a sphere, where in a circle of gold is contained all the twelve companies' arms, and therefore called the Sphere of True Brotherhood, or Annulus Amoris, the Ring of Love. Upon his left hand stand two billing turtles, expressing thereby the happy condition of mutual love and society: on either side of this mount are displayed the charitable and religious works of London—especially the worthy company of Grocers—in giving maintenance to scholars, soldiers, widows, orphans, and the like, where are placed one of each number: and on the two heights sit Knowledge and Modesty, Knowledge wearing a crown of stars, in her hand a perspective glass, betokening both her high judgement and deep insight; the brow of Modesty circled with a wreath all of red roses, expressing her bashfulness and blushings, in her hand a crimson banner filled with silver stars, figuring the white purity of her shamefastness; her cheeks not red with shame or guilt but with virgin fear and honour. At the back of this Triumphant Mount, Chastity, Fame, Simplicity, Meekness, have their seats; Chastity wearing on her head a garland of white roses, in her hand a white silk banner filled with stars of gold, expressing the eternity of her unspotted pureness: Fame next under her, on her head a crown of silver, and a silver trumpet in her hand, showing both her brightness and shrillness: Simplicity with a milk-white dove upon her head; and Meekness with a garland of mingled flowers, in her hand a white silk banner with a red cross, a lamb at her feet, by which both their conditions are sufficiently expressed. The mount thus made glorious by the power of Truth, and the mist expelled, London thus speaks.

LONDON

530 *Thick scales of darkness in a moment's space
Are fell from both mine eyes; I see the face
Of all my friends about me now most clearly,
Religion's sisters, whom I honour dearly.
O, I behold the work; it comes from thee,
Illustrious patroness, thou that mad'st me see
In days of blindness ignorance; when this light
Was e'en extinguished, thou redeem'st my sight.
535 Then to thy charge, with reverence, I commend
That worthy son of mine, thy virtuous friend,
Whom on my love and blessing I require
To observe thee faithfully, and his desire
To imitate thy will, and there lie bounded;
540 For power's a dangerous sea, which must be sounded
With truth and justice, or man soon runs on
'Gainst rocks and shelves to dissolution.
Then, that thou mayst the difference ever know
'Twixt Truth and Error, a few words shall show:
545 The many ways that to blind Error slide
Are in the entrance broad, hell-mouth is wide;
But when man enters far, he finds it then
Close, dark, and straight, for hell returns no men:
But the one sacred way which Truth directs,
600 Only at entrance man's affection checks,*

The Triumphs of Truth.

And is there strict alone; to which place throngs
 All world's afflictions, calumnies, and wrongs.
 But having passed those, then thou find'st a way
 605 In breadth whole heaven, in length eternal day;
 Then, following Truth, she brings thee to that way:
 But first observe what works she here requires,
 Religion, knowledge, sanctity, chaste desires;
 Then charity, which bounty must express
 610 To scholars, soldiers, widows, fatherless:
 These have been still my works, they must be thine;
 Honour and action must together shine,
 Or the best part's eclipsed: behold but this,
 Thy very crest shows bounty, here 'tis put;
 615 Thou giv'st the open hand, keep it not shut,
 But to the needy or deserving spirit
 Let it spread wide, and heaven enrols that merit.
 Do these and prove my hopeful, worthy son;
 Yet nothing's spoke but needfully must be done:
 620 And so lead forward.

At which words the whole triumph moves, in his richest glory, toward the Cross in Cheap; at which place Error, full of wrath and malice to see his mist so chased away, falls into this fury.

ERROR

625 Heart of all the fiends in hell!
 Could her beggarly power expel
 Such a thick and poisonous mist
 Which I set Envy's snakes to twist.
 Up, monsters; was her feeble frown
 630 Of force to strike my officers down?
 Barbarism, Impudence, Lies, Ignorance,
 All your hell-bred heads advance,
 And once again with rotten darkness shroud
 This Mount Triumphant: drop down, sulphurous cloud.

635 At which the mist falls again and hangs over all the beauty of the mount, not a person of glory seen, only the four monsters gather courage again and take their seats, advancing their clubs above their heads; which no sooner perceived, but Truth in her chariot, making near 640 to the place, willing still to rescue her friends and servants from the powers of Ignorance and Darkness, makes use of these words.

TRUTH

645 Dare yet the works of ugliness appear
 'Gainst this day's brightness, and see us so near?
 How bold is sin and hell, that yet it dare Rise against us; but know, perdition's heir,
 'Tis idle to contend against our power.
 Vanish again, foul mist, from honour's bower.

650 Then the cloud dispersing itself again, and all the mount appearing glorious, it passeth so on to the Standard, about which place, by elaborate action from Error, it falls again, and goes so darkened till it comes to St Lawrence Lane end, where, by the former words by Truth uttered being again chased away, London thus gratefully requites her goodness. 655

LONDON

Eternity's bright sister, by whose light
 Error's infectious works still fly my sight,
 Receive thy servant's thanks. Now, Perfect Love,
 Whose right hand holds a sphere wherein do move
 Twelve blest societies, whose beloved increase 660
 Styles it the ring of brotherhood, faith, and peace,
 From thy harmonious lips let them all taste
 The golden counsel that makes health long last.

Perfect Love then standing up, holding in his right hand a sphere, on the other, two billing turtles, gives these words. 665

PERFECT LOVE

First, then, I banish from this feast of joy
 All excess, epicurism, both which destroy
 The healths of soul and body; no such guest
 Ought to be welcome to this reverend feast,
 Where Truth is mistress; who's admitted here 670
 Must come for virtue's love more than for cheer.
 These two white turtles may example give
 How perfect joy and brotherhood should live;
 And they from whom grave order is expected,
 Of rude excess must never be detected. 675
 This is the counsel which that lady calls
 Golden advice, for by it no man falls:
 He that desires days healthful, sound, and blest,
 Let moderate judgement serve him at his feast.
 And so lead on; may perfect brotherhood shine 680
 Still in this sphere, and honour still in thine.

This speech so ended, his lordship and the companies pass on to Guildhall; and at their returning back, these triumphs attend to bring his lordship toward St Paul's church, there to perform those yearly ceremonial rites which ancient and grave order hath determined; Error by the way still busy and in action to draw darkness often upon that Mount of Triumph, which by Truth is as often and brightness, this mount and the chariot of Truth both placed near to the entrance of his lordship's gate near Leadenhall, London, the lady of that mount, first gives utterance to these words. 690

The Triumphs of Truth.

Nor can we call this night, if our eyes count
 The glorious beams that dance about this mount;
 700 Sure, did not custom guide 'em, men would say
 Two noons were seen together in one day,
 The splendour is so piercing: Triumph seems
 As if it sparkled, and to men's esteems
 705 Threw forth his thanks, wrapped up in golden flames,
 As if he would give light to read their names,
 That were at cost this day to make him shine,
 And be as free in thanks as they in coin.
 But see, Time checks me, and his scythe stands ready
 To cut all off; no state on earth is steady;
 710 Therefore, grave son, the time that is to come
 Bestow on Truth; and so thou'rt welcome home.

Time, standing up in Truth's chariot, seeming to make an offer with his scythe to cut off the glories of the day, growing near now to the season of rest and sleep, his 715 daughter Truth thus meekly stays his hand.

TRUTH
 Father, desist a while, till I send forth
 A few words to our friend, that man of worth.
 The power that heaven, love, and the city's choice,
 720 Have all conferred on thee with mutual voice,
 As it is great, reverend, and honourable,
 Meet it with equal goodness, strive t'excel
 Thy former self; as thy command exceeds
 Thy last year's state, so let new acts, old deeds;
 725 And as great men in riches and in birth,
 Heightning their bloods and joining earth to earth,
 Bestow their best hours and most serious cares
 In choosing out fit matches for their heirs,
 So never give thou over day or hour,
 Till with a virtue thou hast matched this power;
 730 For what is greatness if not joined with grace?
 Like one of high blood that hath married base.
 Who seeks authority with an ignorant eye,
 Is like a man seeks out his enemy;
 735 For where before his follies were not spread,
 Or his corruptions, then they're clearly read
 E'en by the eyes of all men; 'tis so pure
 A crystal of itself, it will endure
 No poison of oppression, bribes, hired law,
 740 But 'twill appear soon in some crack or flaw:
 Howe'er men soothe their hopes with popular breath,
 If not in life, they'll find that crack in death.
 I was not made to fawn or stroke sin smooth;
 Be wise and hear me, then, that cannot soothe:
 745 I have set thee high now; be so in example,
 Made thee a pinnacle in honour's temple,
 Fixing ten thousand eyes upon thy brow.
 There is no hiding of thy actions now,

They must abide the light and imitate me,
 Or be thrown down to fire where errors be.
 750 Nor only with these words thy ear I feed,
 But give those part that shall in time succeed,
 To thee in present, and to them to come,
 That Truth may bring you all with honour home
 To these your gates, and to those, after these, 755 Of which your own good actions keep the keys.
 Then, as the loves of thy society
 Hath flowed in bounties on this day and thee,
 Counting all cost too little for true art,
 Doubling rewards there where they found desert,
 760 In thankfulness, justice, and virtuous care,
 Perfect their hopes; those thy requitals are.
 With fatherly respect embrace 'em all,
 Faith in thy heart and plenty in thy hall,
 Love in thy walks, but justice in thy state,
 765 Zeal in thy chamber, bounty at thy gate:
 And so to thee and these a blessed night;
 To thee, fair City, peace, my grace and light.

Trumpets sounding triumphantly, Zeal, the champion of Truth, on horseback, his head circled with strange fires, appears to his mistress, and thus speaks. 770

ZEAL
 See yonder, lady, Error's chariot stands,
 Braving the power of your incensed commands,
 Emboldened by the privilege of night
 775 And her black faction; yet to crown his spite,
 Which I'll confound, I burn in divine wrath.

TRUTH
 Strike, then; I give thee leave to shoot it forth.

ZEAL
 Then here's to the destruction of that seat;
 There's nothing seen of thee but fire shall eat.

At which a flame shoots from the head of Zeal, which, fastening upon that chariot of Error, sets it on fire, and all 780 the beasts that are joined to it.

The firework being made by master Humphrey Nichols, a man excellent in his art; and the whole work and body of the triumph, with all the proper beauties of the workmanship, most artfully and faithfully performed 785 by John Grinkin; and those furnished with apparel and porters by Anthony Munday, gentleman.

This proud seat of Error lying now only glowing in embers—being a figure or type of his lordship's justice on all wicked offenders in the time of his government—I now 790 conclude, holding it a more learned discretion to cease of myself than to have Time cut me off rudely: and now let him strike at his pleasure.

An Account by Aleksei Ziuzin

Text edited by Maija Jansson and Nikolai Rogozhin, and translated by Paul Bushkovitch

And the ambassador [Ziuzin] said to Sir Lewis: 'We hear the royal order that you have for us that your Sovereign King, James, shows his fraternal love and friendship to our Great Sovereign Tsar and Grand Duke Mikhail Fyodorovich, Autocrat of all Russia, to his Tsar's Majesty, that he wants to come to London for us soon. And at this we, seeing fraternal love and strong friendship between them, the Great Sovereigns, rejoice and expect to see the royal eyes. And in so far as your sovereign King James has ordered, showing his favour to us, that you ask about our health and food, we are grateful for his royal favour and until now we are in honour with him, your sovereign, and satisfied about everything. And in so far as Sir Thomas, the son of Thomas Smith, has come to us according to the royal command, and with him the King's gentlemen, and has told us the same thing as the royal order that we now hear from you, that we are to go to see your ceremony according to the royal command, the installation of the Lord Mayor, we have told Sir Thomas that until we have been with your sovereign King James, until we have seen his eyes, it is not possible for us to go to see your ceremony. And we tell you the same thing, Sir Lewis, that to the honour of his royal Majesty we will be with him, your sovereign, and we will see his eyes before [we see] your City and country ceremonies. This is our first business.'

And Sir Lewis said to the ambassadors: 'For your Great Sovereign, his Tsar's Majesty our Sovereign King James, wanting to see his Tsar's fraternal love and friendship to himself, and showing his favour to you, the ambassadors, even though he was not finished with his royal affairs, and leaving them, he is coming to London for you and wants to see you soon and to receive you honourably. And he has ordered you with care that you should see what happens in this state because another such ceremony will not happen while you are here. And you are not to disobey our sovereign nor to anger him, but to go and watch.' And having said this Sir Lewis left the ambassadors.

On October 29th, at the first hour of the day, conductor Sir Thomas, the son of Thomas, and his brother, Sir Richard, and four royal gentlemen and the merchants John Merrick and William Russell, (that William [who] comes to the Moscow state with John) came to the ambassadors at their lodgings. And Sir Thomas and his associates said to the ambassadors: 'So that you might obey the order of our sovereign, King James, and see the royal ceremony, the installation of the Lord Mayor, the royal coaches are with us ready for you, and it is time for you to go. And I am telling you this, taking care of the Sovereign's affairs, so that you should definitely not disobey the royal order and by this anger our sovereign, and so that you should not make any interference in his measures of state.'

And John Merrick said to the ambassadors properly: 'Just as is the case of his direct service to the Great Sovereign, his Tsar's Majesty, I tell you that our sovereign

The newly elected Tsar Michael of Russia, the first of the Romanovs, sought to increase political ties to England and to gain financial assistance. Therefore, he decided to send an ambassador to England in 1613, hoping thereby also to secure his legitimacy in the eyes of other European sovereigns. Ambassador Aleksei Ivanovich Ziuzin left Russia in August 1613, accompanied by another ship of English merchants. They finally reached England after an agonizing two months at sea. They arrived in London on 26 October but did not gain audience with King James until 7 November (he had been hunting at Royston in Hertfordshire). The Ambassador returned to Russia in early summer 1614 and filed this report then. The text comes from England and the North: The Russian Embassy of 1613-1614, edited by Maija Jansson and Nikolai Rogozhin, translated by Paul Bushkovitch (Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1994), pp. 161-164.

Sir Thomas Smith explained to the Russian entourage on 28 October what they might expect to see at the Lord Mayor's Show the next day: the mayor 'is to ride from his house to the royal palace and, having been in the palace for a while as the ceremony requires, he is to ride back home through the city on horseback and by water on the river Thames in ships and boats. And there is a great salute from muskets and from all sorts of artillery. And the previous Lord Mayor who sat out his year before him rides with him, and the old Lord Mayors who were judges beforehand. And now those people, knights and aldermen, elected people who will in the future be Lord Mayors, and many other people of various ranks, accompany him; and the whole City watches. And except for the King's coronation there is no other such great ceremony in England' (p. 159).

- 1 Sir Lewis Lewis Lewkenor, first to be appointed to the newly created office of Master of Ceremonies
- 14 Sir Thomas Thomas Smith, member of the Haberdashers and Skinners, governor of the East India Company; had been sent by King James to Boris Godunov in June 1604.
- 42 John Merrick Merchant who had travelled to Russia earlier and sailed back to England in a ship that accompanied the Russian Ambassador's ship; in June 1614 James made Merrick the English Ambassador to Russia.
William Russell Member of the East India Company; in 1612, director of the Company of Merchants of London, also a member of the Muscovy Company. He, too, went to Russia and travelled back to England in 1613.
- 47 royal ceremony As is often the case in the Russian Ambassador's report, there is some confusion about titles and protocol.

King James, the son of Andrew, orders you with care and you should definitely not disobey in this matter.’

And the ambassadors did not dare to disobey the King’s orders and, so that they would not by that harm the affairs of his Tsar’s Majesty and not anger the King, they went to see their ceremony. And the ambassadors sat in the coaches in the great place and on the sides in the coach with Aleksei Ivanovich [Ziuzin], at the door, sat the conductor, Sir Thomas, and the royal gentlemen, and the merchant John Merrick. And with the Secretary with Aleksei in the coach near the doors sat Sir Richard, and the gentlemen, and the merchant William Russell. And the undersecretary and the translator sat in a separate coach. And the ambassadors’ servants also rode in coaches, and when the ambassadors came to the yard and entered the building, at that time there were no people at the yard besides the conductors who came with the ambassadors and a few local servants in the rooms to arrange things. And they placed for the ambassadors fine places, chairs and tables, they honoured the ambassadors. And at the same time the Lord Mayor went up the river Thames to the royal palace and he sat in a ship, and it was a decorated ship, small, painted in all sorts of various colours. And it was rowed by oars. Under the ship were made boats, and on the ship, as is the case with a straight ship, the lower decks had windows and in these windows were rowers on both sides. And with him sat the previous Lord Mayor who had been Lord Mayor for the year before, and other people of rank. And before the ship and behind and on the sides, over the whole river, sailed on many boats, the King’s gentlemen, and knights, and aldermen, and merchants, and traders, and the bodyguard of the King’s court, and all sorts of people of the land in bright costume. And there were banners and great decorated royal flags and many others. And the King’s trumpeters trumpeted, and they beat the drums and they played on litavra and there were all sorts of various instruments. And they fired a great salute from the ship in which the Lord Mayor sailed and from other ships which were there and from big boats and from the City wall. And from all the small boats there was a great shooting of muskets.

And when the Lord Mayor came to the royal palace where the King lives with the Queen and the Prince, at that time there was a great salute at the royal palace. And when the Lord Mayor had been at the palace for a short time he went back through the City riding on stallions and argamaks. And before him walked the bodyguards of the King’s court, about one hundred and fifty men in bright clothes with gilded partisans, two by two, and after them walked the merchants and traders organized by livery companies and between them rode the King’s trumpeters and drummers in decorated dress on royal horses and trumpeted while riding and played the drums and litavri. And all sorts of players walked and carried big royal banners and flags, bright coloured, wide and long. And after them other men, walking, carried on themselves wooden [models of] towns, worked and painted. And in the [model] towns were churches and on the towers and along the wall were constructed guns, and on the steeples of the churches and on the city ladder sat old and young people and boys and girls in bright dresses. And on them were masks like human faces and like all sorts of animals. And they carried two [model] places from the royal coronation ceremony like a dais, or platform, with high decorated steps on four sides and on the top and on the places sat one person in each place as if from the royal ceremony, and around on all sides, above, and below, sat small girls and boys and here they carried a variety of great beasts: elephants, and unicorns, and lions and camels, and boars, and other animals. And each one was made as if it was real. And there was a small decorated ship and all the people who carried it were draped from all sides to the ground. And around them went people in masks with palms, and they carried palms with fireworks, and they threw from them sparkling fire on both sides because of the great press of people, that they might give way. And before them and behind them went soldiers, and on both sides, turning quickly and waving swords and sabres so that people would get out of the way. And after, rode many of the King’s gentlemen and behind them, last before the Lord Mayor, rode the knights who had been Lord Mayors before, in decorated clothing and wearing gold chains.

And with the Lord Mayor rode side by side, at his left hand, the Lord Mayor whom he was replacing, and behind them rode the aldermen, elected people who would be Lord

WIT AT SEVERAL WEAPONS

Edited by Michael Dobson

Wit at Several Weapons is the first play Middleton co-wrote with William Rowley, and its combination of fluent and inventive comic plotting with incisive and fantastical dialogue makes it abundantly clear that from its inception the partnership brought out the best in both playwrights. Its status as the first fruit of this celebrated collaboration, however, has been obscured for most of four centuries by the circumstances of its publication: the play was not printed until 1647, when it appeared in the Royalist publisher Humphrey Moseley's grand folio volume of plays attributed to Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher, and from then until the late nineteenth century it was read and reprinted as part of the Beaumont and Fletcher canon. Only with the advent of sophisticated and reliable statistical tests for authorship in the later twentieth century (which have decisively confirmed the instincts of several Victorian scholars of the play) has Wit at Several Weapons been definitively re-established as the work of Middleton and Rowley.

It is possible that the play was published in the Beaumont and Fletcher folio because Middleton and Rowley were rewriting a play first composed by Fletcher, but if this is the case their revision was so thorough as to relegate this hypothetical Fletcherian first draft to the status of a mere source (the only specific source conjectured or known for the play). Its two central plots, on both of which the two writers worked closely together, are very much in the mode of the city comedy at which Middleton was already supremely accomplished. Both deal with the perilous intersections of family and money, one with an inheritance and the other with a marriage settlement. In the first, the Old Knight, Sir Perfidious Oldcraft—a rich city businessman whose career (by his own proud testimony) has progressed from pimping through the defrauding of orphans to the proposed embezzlement of two-thirds of his niece's dowry—threatens to disinherit his son Wittypate on the grounds that Wittypate must likewise rise in the world by his own 'wit', only to find himself made the next victim of the ruthless catalogue of frauds upon which Wittypate is in fact already embarked. In the interlocking counterpart to this plot, the Old Knight's unnamed Niece, at first jokingly presented by her uncle with the malcontented wit Cunninggame by way of 'antemasque' to her real intended husband (his brainless but wealthy patron Sir Gregory Fop), falls in love with the penniless Cunninggame, and each camouflages a passion for the other (and tests the seriousness of the other's interest) by flirting successively with a whole progression of bewildered rivals before arranging, with Wittypate's assistance, an elopement from a masque.

Whether these two dramatic situations were invented by Middleton and Rowley or derived from an idea by Fletcher, their elaboration in Wit at Several Weapons as it stands bears the unmistakable marks of both Middleton and Rowley at their most characteristic, and its cast list includes some of their most distinctive creations. The impoverished Lady Ruinous Gentry, for example (a rueful and reluctant assistant in Wittypate's Oedipal swindles), granted the bitter self-knowledge of a tragic heroine even while accepting a farcical cross-dressed role in a bogus highway robbery, is sheer Middleton, from our first glimpse of her onwards:

SERVANT

Nay, Lady—

LADY

Put me not in mind on't, prithee;

You cannot do a greater wrong to women;
For in our wants 'tis the most chief affliction
To have that name remembered; 'tis a title
That misery mocks us by, and the world's malice.
Scorn and contempt has not wherewith to work
On humble callings: they are safe, and lie
Level with pity still, and pale distress
Is no great stranger to 'em; but when Fortune
Looks with a stormy face on our conditions,
We find affliction work, and envy pastime,
And our worst enemy then, that most abuses us,
Is that we are called by, 'Lady'. [Exit Servant]

O my spirit,

Will nothing make thee humble? I am well,
methinks,

And can live quiet with my fate sometimes,
Until I look into the world again . . . (2.1.1–16)

Similarly, at the opposite end of the play's social and generic spectrum is a part every bit as characteristic of Rowley: the Clown, 'Pompey Doodle, a clown, Sir Gregory's man, a piece of puff-paste, like his master', as the List of Persons added to the play in 1679 aptly describes him. This character is easily recognizable as one of an illustrious succession of fat and fatuous fools written by Rowley for performance by himself—not least by his endearingly imaginative stupidity. Sent into raptures of garbled courtly love when the Niece makes feigned advances to him in order to excite Cunninggame's jealousy, the Clown exchanges his servant's livery for the gaudy costume of a gallant, and he spends much of the second half of the play loitering on the northern fringes of London entertaining ever more picturesque delusions of grandeur:

...but now you talk of fobbing, I wonder the lady sends not for me, according to promise? I ha' kept out o' town these two days, o' purpose to be sent for; I'm almost starved with walking... Pray, do me the part and office of a gentleman; if you chance to meet a footman by the way, in orange-tawny ribbons, running before an empty coach, with a buzzard i'th' poop on't, direct him and his horses toward the New River by Islington; there they shall have me, looking upon the pipes and whistling. (4.1.345-8, 357-62)

Quite apart from its comedy, the Clown's plaintive and topical interest in the New River water-supply project (shared at some level by much of the play, which abounds in references to the area affected by its construction—Islington, Clerkenwell, St Pancras, Highgate) incidentally provides some of our best evidence for the dating of Wit at Several Weapons, which almost certainly belongs to 1613, the year of the New River's completion; Middleton, of course, celebrated this event in The Manner of his Lordship's Entertainment, and the Clown's at times disparaging comments may represent a quiet in-joke by Rowley. In any case this dating of the play, coupled with Rowley's likely creation of the role of the Clown in its first production, makes it probable that Wit at Several Weapons was originally written for Prince Charles's Men, with whom Rowley was closely associated as player, poet, and manager; the same company would stage Middleton and Rowley's next extant collaboration, A Fair Quarrel, some two or three years later.

Beyond this plausible assignation of the play to Prince Charles's Men, however, tantalizingly little is known of its stage history before the closing of the theatres in 1642. It was certainly popular enough to be still in the live repertory some six or seven years after its première, when its title (albeit abbreviated by later damage) appears at the top of a fragmentary list of plays jotted down on scrap paper by the Master of the Revels (a list which also includes two subsequent Middleton and Rowley comedies, A Fair Quarrel and The Old Law); but whether this note either recorded or resulted in a performance of the play at Court is not known. After this the play vanishes from the written record until its misattributed publication in 1647. It would not be performed again until 1709, when the actor/playwright (and later Poet Laureate) Colley Cibber updated its diction for early eighteenth-century consumption and produced it at Drury Lane under the title The Rival Fools: or, Wit, at several Weapons. Largely negligible as a response to the play, this wholly prose adaptation offered few of the attractions of its original save the presence of an actor/writer particularly skilled in 'puff-paste' roles, Cibber himself, in the role of the Clown (here rechristened Samuel Simple, a symptomatic come-down from Rowley's preposterous Pompey Doodle): it ran for five nights in 1709, scraped a bare two when Cibber revived it in 1722, and was last seen abbreviated to an after-piece for a solitary performance at the Haymarket in 1774. Since then, although regularly praised in the nineteenth century as containing some of the most striking passages in the Beaumont and Fletcher canon (featuring extensively, for example, in Horace Guilford's 1834 anthology of Beauties of Beaumont and Fletcher), Wit at Several Weapons has been generally neglected except by attribution specialists, its theatrical and critical history alike a story of spectacularly missed opportunity.

The kinds of authorship-preoccupied scrutiny to which the play has been subjected, however, have revealed much which can enhance an appreciation of its often unsettling comic procedures; in particular, by highlighting the patterns of substitution and redoubling around which Middleton and Rowley built their respective and answering shares of the text. The three most exhaustive and trustworthy authorship studies to date (by Cyrus Hoy, David Lake, and MacDonald P. Jackson) are in full agreement as to which playwright was primarily responsible for which sections of the text, and their conclusions amply support a reading of the play as a virtuoso fantasia on exchange and displacement, with Middleton and Rowley both collaborating and vying with one another to produce ever more comic and extreme variations on the themes of the two plots introduced in its first scene.

The mainsprings of both plots (the father-son conflict between the Old Knight and Wittypate, and the initially triangular love intrigue between the Niece, Cunningame, and Sir Gregory Fop) are wound in Middleton's 1.1, which not only introduces the play's chief lines of intrigue but establishes the characteristic pattern of inventive excess by which both will be elaborated. By the end of 1.1, for example, Middleton has not only set up the play's love triangle but has already begun to extend it, adding a fourth player when Cunningame opens his fraudulent courtship of the Niece's Guardianess. Rowley's 1.2 develops a corresponding variation on the inheritance plot, with Wittypate's outcast wit doubled and redoubled by his accomplice Priscian's impersonation of a starving scholar and their colleague Sir Ruinous Gentry's performance as an impoverished veteran ('what, arms and arts both go a-begging?', exclaims the deceived Old Knight, 1.2.119-20). It finishes with Wittypate electing a scapegoat to undergo his father's displeasure, as the three cheats plan their elaborate mischief against Wittypate's unworldly cousin, the Cambridge cleric Credulous. Middleton's haunting 2.1 furthers these plans, introducing Lady Ruinous Gentry, before Rowley's 2.2 and 2.3 complicate the love-plot to a still greater degree by introducing another suitor for the Niece in Sir Gregory's servant the Clown, and another niece to compete for Cunningame in the person of the Guardianess's ward Mirabell. Once Rowley's 2.4 has dramatized the fake highway robbery in which Wittypate embroils Credulous, Middleton takes over the writing for the whole of the third and fourth acts, where the substitutions and swappings of both plots extend to take in a whole catalogue of objects; false money exchanged for real as the Old Knight is compelled to buy Credulous out of his fictitious arrest, love-tokens exchanged between the Niece and Cunningame using Sir Gregory as an unwitting go-between, and, at the extreme of the process in 4.3, a dressmaker's dummy substituted for Mirabell and courted by Cunningame in a final bid to expose the Niece's jealousy and thus her affection. The writing of Act 5 is principally Rowley's (although it includes many 'composite' passages in which Middleton's participation is visible), and in resolving both plots it pushes their preoccupations still further. In 5.1 parts of two bodies are hilariously interchanged as Sir Gregory's hands undergo a betrothal ceremony with Mirabell from beneath Cunningame's gown, and 5.2 disguises and exchanges practically the entire cast in a masked dance at Lady Ruinous's mansion, from which the Niece and Cunningame elope while the Old Knight is detained to pay a musicians' bill for a hundred pounds from that 'consort of thieves' (5.2.128), Priscian and Sir Ruinous.

From this brilliantly and energetically pursued exercise in high farce, however, a surprisingly dark and disturbing play emerges. With characteristic Middletonian irony, the struggle between the Old Knight and his son proves to have no ethical dimension whatsoever—at its conclusion Wittypate's viciously unfilial extortions are rewarded as evidence of his proper filial loyalty to a merciless economic individualism—and even the play's romance plot functions on the purely predatory rationale expounded in the Old Knight's shocking introductory lecture. Cunningame and the Niece alike manoeuvre ruthlessly for the position of cheat and just as ruthlessly nominate others for the position of dupe, their affinity founded on a shared willingness to exploit the emotions of others in their own interests; the discourse of romantic love is in this play reserved for the Clown, a mock-heroic loser who arrives back from the New River for the play's conclusion too late to be paired off with anybody. Such gulls, apparently, exist solely to provide meals for the play's knaves, often in a virtually cannibalistic sense. When Sir Gregory sees Priscian and Sir Ruinous in their roles as overqualified beggars, his first impulse is to eat them so as to acquire their qualities (1.2.137–42), but it is he who is ultimately fed as a lucratively nourishing broth by Cunningame to Mirabell (4.1.194–9); Wittypate practically salivates as he describes to Credulous how naïve university graduates are eaten for breakfast by London wits as if they were poached eggs (4.1.124–36). When not reduced to the status of food, the play's victims are perpetually metamorphosing into other inanimate objects: the Niece's first response to Sir Gregory is to liken him to a puppet (1.1.189), and as far as Cunningame is concerned, as he cynically plans to marry him off to another character who proves interchangeable with a lifeless effigy, both he and Mirabell are so much cast-off millinery (4.1.227), Sir Gregory the offspring of mere fabric:

Some petticoat begot him, I'll be whipped else,
Engend'ring with an old pair of paned hose
Lying in some hot chamber o'er the kitchen;
Very steam bred him . . . (4.1.288–91)

With people being taken for clothes and clothes for people on all sides (a dummy turned into a woman by the addition of Mirabell's hat and the Niece's scarf, a false beard creating fictitious identities for Wittypate, Priscian, and Sir Ruinous in turn, a male costume depriving the dispossessed Lady Ruinous even of her Ladyship), Wit at Several Weapons depicts a world which for all its comedy can look very alarming indeed, where the distinctions not just between people but between people and their possessions are perpetually under threat, and where the 'wit weapons' of the play's title may materialize, as they do at 5.2.92, as all too literal pistols. While it is true that this sinister side of the play is more often visible in Middleton's predominantly verse scenes than in Rowley's largely prose ones, the overwhelming impression given by the play is of a comedy whose components, however varied, work according to the same symbolic logic. Like much farce, Wit at Several Weapons touches not only on the comic results of economic exchange slipping over into affective relations but on the blind, remorseless solipsism of desire itself (as in the beautiful serenade at the centre of the play, 3.1.46–60, praising the superiority of erotic dreams to any waking reality), and the play's culminating dramatic image, appropriately, in the substantially composite 5.2, is the change of partners at a masked ball, danced in the house of a ruined lady to the music of a consort of thieves.

SIR RUINOUS Gentry, a decayed knight

MIRABELL, the Guardianess's niece

I. I Enter Sir Perfidious Oldcraft, an old knight, and Wittypate, his son

WITTYPATE

Sir, I'm no boy, I'm deep in one-and-twenty,
The second year's approaching.

OLD KNIGHT

A fine time

For a youth to live by his wits, then, I should think,
If e'er he mean to make account of any.

5 WITTYPATE Wits, sir?

OLD KNIGHT

Ay, wits, sir; if it be so strange to thee,
I'm sorry I spent that time to get a fool,
I might have employed my pains a great deal better.
Thou know'st all that I have I ha' got by my wits,
10 And yet to see how urgent thou art too;
It grieves me thou art so degenerate
To trouble me for means; I never offered it
My parents from a schoolboy; past nineteen once (See what these times are grown to!), before twenty 15 I rushed into the world, which is indeed
Much like the art of swimming; he that will attain to't
Must fall plump, and duck himself at first,
And that will make him hardy and adventurous,

And not stand putting in one foot, and shiver,
And then draw t'other after, like a quake-buttock; 20

Well he may make a paddler i' the world,
From hand to mouth, but never a brave swimmer,

Borne up by th' chin, as I bore up myself
With my strong industry that never failed me;

For he that lies borne up with patrimonies 25

Looks like a long great ass that swims with bladders:
Come but one prick of adverse fortune to him

He sinks, because he never tried to swim,
When wit plays with the billows that choked him.

WITTYPATE

Why, is it not a fashion for a father, sir, 30

Out of his yearly thousands to allow
His only son a competent brace of hundreds,
Or such a toy?

OLD KNIGHT

Yes, if he mean to spoil him
Or mar his wits he may, but never I. 35

This is my humour, sir, which you'll find constant;
I love wit so well, because I lived by't,

That I'll give no man power out of my means to hurt
it,
And that's a kind of gratitude to my raiser,

Which great ones oft forget. I admire much
 This age's dullness. When I scarce writ man,
 The first degree that e'er I took in thriving,
 I lay intelligencer close for wenching,
 Could give this lord or knight a true certificate
 Of all the maidenheads extant; how many lay
 'Mongst chambermaids, how many 'mongst Exchange
 45 wenches
 (Though never many there, I must confess,
 They have a trick to utter ware so fast);
 I knew which lady had a mind to fall,
 Which gentlewoman new divorced, which tradesman breaking,
 50 The price of every sinner to a hair,
 And where to raise each price; which were the termers
 That would give velvet petticoats, tissue gowns,
 Which pieces, angels, suppers, and half-crowns:
 I knew how to match and make my market,
 55 Could give intelligence where the pox lay ledger,
 And then to see the lechers shift a point,
 'Twas sport and profit too; how they would shun
 Their adored mistress' chambers, and run fearfully
 Like rats from burning houses! So brought I 60 My clients o' the game still safe together,
 And noble gamesters loved me, and I felt it:
 Give me a man that lives by his wits, say I,
 And never left a groat, there's the true gallant.
 When I grew somewhat pursy, I grew then 65 In men's opinions too, and confidences;
 They put things called executorships upon me,
 The charge of orphans, little senseless creatures,
 Whom in their childhoods I bound forth to feltmakers,
 To make 'em lose and work away their gentry,
 70 Disguise their tender natures with hard custom,
 So wrought 'em out in time: there I risse ungently;
 Nor do I fear to discourse this unto thee,
 I'm armed at all points against treachery.
 I hold my humour firm; if I can see thee thrive by thy 75 wits while I live, I shall have the more courage to trust thee with my lands when I die; if not, the next best wit I can hear of carries 'em: for since in my time and knowledge so many rich children of the City conclude in beggary, I'd rather make a wise stranger my executor than a foolish son my heir, and to have my lands called 80 after my wit, thou after my name; and that's my nature.

WITTYPATE [aside]
 'Tis a strange harsh one; must I still shift then?
 I come, brave cheats, once to my trade again,
 And I'll ply't harder now than e'er I did for't—
 You'll part with nothing then, sir?

OLD KNIGHT Not a jot, sir. 85

WITTYPATE
 If I should ask you blessing ere I go, sir,
 I think you would not give't me.

OLD KNIGHT
 Let me but hear thou liv'st by thy wits once,
 Thou shalt have anything; thou'rt none of mine else,
 Then why should I take care for thee?

WITTYPATE Thank your bounty. 90
Exit

OLD KNIGHT
 So wealth love me, and long life, I beseech it,
 As I do love the man that lives by his wits,
 He comes so near my nature. I'm grown old now,
 And e'en arrived at my last cheat, I fear me,
 95 But 'twill make shift to bury me, by daylight too,
 And discharge all my legacies, 'tis so wealthy,
 And never trouble any interest money.
 I've yet a niece to wed, over whose steps
 I have placed a trusty watchful guardianess
 For fear some poor earl steal her ('t has been 100 threatened)
 To redeem mortgaged land, but he shall miss on't;
 To prevent which, I have sought out a match for her;
 Fop of Fop Hall he writes himself (I take it,
 The ancient'st Fop in England), with whom I'm privately
 105 Compounded for the third part of her portion.
Enter Sir Gregory and Cunningame
 An she seems pleased, so—two parts rest with me.
 He's come.—Sir Gregory, welcome; what's he, sir?

SIR GREGORY
 Young Cunningame, a Norfolk gentleman,

45 Exchange wenches shopgirls employed in the boutiques of the Royal Exchange, the bourse at Cornhill in the City

47 utter sell

49 breaking going bankrupt

51 termers visitors in London to transact legal affairs (during the four law terms, when the courts were in session)

52 tissue the most expensive and prestigious dress fabric then available

53 pieces gold coins worth £1 angels coins, first minted in 1465, worth around ten shillings each in 1613

55 lay ledger was in residence or conducting a siege

56 shift a point A point was a lace used for attaching the codpiece, and the doublet, to the hose: hence 'to truss one's points' was the Jacobean equivalent of 'to do up one's flies'. 'Point', however, could also mean the tip of the penis, so this phrase might best be paraphrased as 'get their codpieces out of there'.

63 groat silver coin worth fourpence

64 pursy wealthy (having a full purse), with a secondary sense of 'plump'

68 bound forth apprenticed

71 risse rose

82 shift make do with living by tricks

95 make shift manage by daylight Although nocturnal funerals were becoming fashionable in the 1610s, the practice was still chiefly associated with paupers and lazars.

97 interest money capital the Old Knight has loaned out at interest as a usurer (a practice regarded as sinful and unclean)

104-5 with whom . . . portion with whom I have privately negotiated to pay only a third of her dowry

105.1 Cunningame The name of the character described by the cast list as 'a discreet gentleman, Sir Gregory's comrade and supplanter' obviously puns on 'cunning game', but it is worth noting that this was a perfectly ordinary contemporary spelling of the surname now rendered as 'Cunningham'.

106 An If

- 110 One that has lived upon the Fops, my kindred,
Ever since my remembrance; he's a wit indeed,
And we all strive to have him—nay, 'tis certain
Some of our name has gone to law for him;
Now 'tis my turn to keep him, and indeed
He's plaguy chargeable, as all your wits are,
115 But I will give him over when I list,
I ha' used wits so before.
- OLD KNIGHT I hope when you're married, sir, you'll shake him off.
- SIR GREGORY Why, what do you take me to be, old father-120 i'-law that shall be? Do you think I'll have any of the wits hang upon me after I am married once? None of my kindred ever had before me. But where's this niece?
Is't a fashion in London to marry a woman and never see her?
- OLD KNIGHT
- 125 Excuse the niceness, sir; that care's your friend;
Perhaps had she been seen, you had never seen her;
There's many a spent thing called 'An't like your honour'
That lies in wait for her; at first snap, she's a countess,
Drawn with six mares through Fleet Street, and a coachman
130 Sitting bare-headed to their Flanders buttocks.
[Aside] This whets him on.
- SIR GREGORY Pray, let's clap up the business, sir.
I long to see her; are you sure you have her?
Is she not there already? Hark, O hark!
- OLD KNIGHT
- How now, what's that, sir?
- SIR GREGORY Every caroach goes by Goes e'en to th' heart of me.
- 135 OLD KNIGHT I'll have that doubt eased, sir,
- Instantly eased, Sir Gregory: and now I think on't,
A toy comes i' my mind, seeing your friend there;
We'll have a little sport, give you but way to't,
And put a trick upon her. I love wit preciousely!
You shall not be seen yet: we'll stale your friend first,
140 If't please but him to stand for the antemasque.
- SIR GREGORY
Puh, he shall stand for anything: why, his supper
Lies i' my breeches here; I'll make him fast else.
- OLD KNIGHT
Then come you forth more unexpectedly,
145 The masque itself, a thousand-a-year jointure:
The cloud, your friend, will be then drawn away,
And only you the beauty of the play.
- SIR GREGORY
For red and black I'll put down all your fullers;
Let but your niece bring white, and we have three colours.
- Exit
- OLD KNIGHT
I'm given to understand you are a wit, sir. 150
- CUNNINGGAME
I'm one that fortune shows small favour to, sir.
- OLD KNIGHT
Why, there you conclude it, whether you will or no,
sir;
To tell you truth, I'm taken with a wit.
- CUNNINGGAME
Fowlers catch woodcocks so; let not them know so much.
- OLD KNIGHT [aside]
A pestilence mazzard, a Duke Humphrey spark, 155
He'd rather lose his dinner than his jest—
I say, I love a wit the best of all things.

- 114 chargeable expensive, with a pun on legal charge, referring back to l. 112
- 119–20 father-i'-law used loosely but appropriately, since the Old Knight exercises paternal control over the Niece as her legal guardian
- 120–2 Do you think . . . before me. Literally Sir Gregory is assuring the Old Knight that, like other members of his family before him, he will not support 'wits' such as Cunninggame as members of his household after his marriage, but his words carry a punning sense of which he is unaware, namely that he, in the traditional manner of Fops, will be witless as a husband.
- 127 spent ruined, bankrupt
'An't like your honour' if it pleases your honour, a phrase regarded as characteristic of the flattery given to aristocrats by their servants
- 129 six mares a coach and six would of course have been an ostentatious luxury, appropriate to a newly-ennobled bride
Fleet Street the chief thoroughfare
- from the mercantile City to the socially superior West End
- 130 Flanders at the time celebrated for its expensive horses
- 134 caroach carriage, luxury coach for urban use
- 137 toy fancy, whim
- 140 stale use as a lure or decoy
- 141 antemasque grotesque, burlesque interlude to precede and set off the main action of a Court masque
- 143 i' my breeches i.e. in my pocket
- 145 jointure marriage arrangement by which property would be held for the joint use of husband and wife for life (and generally entailed for the wife in the event of widowhood)
- 146 cloud . . . away divine revelations from behind mechanical clouds were a commonplace motif in contemporary masques
- 148–9 For . . . colours 'an obscure passage . . . Perhaps Sir Gregory is . . . dressed in a red and black suit of clothes. The white probably symbolizes sexual purity . . .
- Perhaps too some reference back to masques, or some specific masque drawing its effect from the striking use of colours, is intended' (Sharp)
- 148 fullers workers in the textile industry who beat or trod cloth so as to clean or thicken it
- 153 taken with (a) fond of (as the Old Knight intends) (b) duped by (as Cunninggame punningly takes it)
- 155 A pestilence mazzard a plaguy head, i.e. this man's brain is a nuisance
Duke Humphrey spark Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester was mistakenly believed to be buried in the promenade of St Paul's, known as Duke Humphrey's Walk, where penurious gallants and wits ('sparks') would take shelter and loiter while their more fortunate fellow-citizens dined: hence the phrase 'to dine with Duke Humphrey', to which the Old Knight alludes, meaning to go hungry. Oldcraft thus labels Cunninggame as penniless, a wit and a malcontent.

- CUNNINGGAME
Always except yourself.
- 160 OLD KNIGHT [aside] He's gi'n't me twice now,
All with a breath, I thank him! But that I love a wit
I should be heartily angry.
Enter Niece and Guardians
Cuds, my niece!—
You know the business with her?
- CUNNINGGAME With a woman?
'Tis e'en the very same it was, I'm sure,
Five thousand years ago; no fool can miss it.
- OLD KNIGHT
This is the gentleman I promised, niece,
To present to your affection.
- 165 CUNNINGGAME [aside] 'Ware that arrow!
OLD KNIGHT
Deliver me the truth now of your liking.
- CUNNINGGAME [aside]
I'm spoiled already; that such poor lean game
Should be found out as I am!
- OLD KNIGHT Go, set to her, sir. [Aside] Ha, ha, ha!
- CUNNINGGAME
How noble is this virtue in you, lady;
170 Your eye may seem to commit thousand slaughters
On your dull servants, which, truly tasted,
Conclude all in comforts.
- OLD KNIGHT [aside] Puh.
- NIECE
It rather shows what a true worth can make,
Such as yours is.
- OLD KNIGHT [aside]
And that's not worth a groat.—
How like you him, niece?
- 175 NIECE It shall appear how well, sir.
I humbly thank you for him. [Kisses Cunninggame]
- OLD KNIGHT [aside]
Ha? ha, good gullery! he does it well, i'faith;
'Light, as if he meant to purchase lip-land there.—
Hold, hold! Bear off, I say! 'Slid, your part hangs too long.
- CUNNINGGAME [aside] My joys are mockeries. 180
- NIECE
You've both expressed a worthy care and love, sir:
Had mine own eye been set at liberty
To make a public choice (believe my truth, sir),
It could not ha' done better for my heart
Than your good providence has.
- OLD KNIGHT You will say so, then? 185
Alas, sweet niece, all this is but the scabbard;
Now I draw forth the weapon.
- NIECE How?
OLD KNIGHT Sir Gregory,
Approach, thou lad of thousands!
Enter Sir Gregory
- SIR GREGORY Who calls me?
NIECE [aside]
What motion's this? the model of Nineveh?
- OLD KNIGHT
Accost her daintily now, let me advise thee. 190
- SIR GREGORY
I was advised to bestow dainty cost on you.
- NIECE
You were ill advised; back, and take better counsel.
You may have good for an angel: the least cost
You can bestow upon a woman, sir,
195 Trebles ten counsellors' fees; in lady-ware
You're over head and ears ere you be aware.
Faith, keep a bachelor still, and go to bowls, sir,
Follow your mistress there, and prick and save, sir,
For other mistresses will make you a slave, sir.

158 He's gi'n't He has given it

160 Cuds one of Middleton's favourite exclamations, a contraction of 'God save
me'

165 'Ware beware of. 'Cunninggame might refer here to Cupid's arrow, but his next two speeches take up the idea of the Niece's gaze shooting down her suitors.
Presumably, then, the arrow darts from the Niece's eye rather than from Eros's bow' (Sharp)

167 poor lean game referring both to his defencelessness against the Niece's attractions and his position of impoverished powerlessness in relation to the Old Knight and Sir Gregory, of whose practical joke he has already become a victim (with a pun on his name)

169-72 How... comforts 'The Niece is more willing to be approached than her initial glare might indicate' (Sharp). The 'virtue' on which Cunninggame remarks might equally be a friendly approach towards him by the Niece

173-4 It... yours is this behaviour simply reflects my sense of your genuine merits

178 'Light a mild oath (God's light)

lip-land playing on 'Lapland'

179 'Slid another mild oath (God's lid) your part hangs too long you are taking your role too far (with a pun on sexual excitement)

188 lad of thousands (a) lad out of thousands (compare 'one in a million') (b) lad worth thousands of pounds

189 motion's puppet's (perhaps also with the sense of 'proposal')

the model of Nineveh a popular fairground puppet-show telling the story of Jonah and the whale, mentioned by Jonson in Every Man out of His Humour (1599) and Bartholomew Fair (1615); generically, a bathetic contrast to the masque in which Sir Gregory imagines himself to be starring. The Niece may cite this puppet-play in particular for the sake of the pun on 'ninny'

190-1 Accost... on you Sir Gregory fails to understand the word 'accost'; compare Shakespeare's Sir Andrew Aguecheek,
Twelfth Night, 1.3.46-56

193-6 You... aware You might just be worth an angel (ten shillings), but the least amount you would have to give a woman [in order to compensate her for your personal deficiencies] would be the equivalent of thirty lawyers' fees; you are already head over heels in debt when it comes to the things desired by women before you even know it.

198 mistress... save The mistress is the small white ball at which bowls are aimed (the modern 'jack'); 'prick' and 'save' are also terms from bowls, meaning to deflect and to block. Middleton puns on the same three terms in *No Wit/
Help like a Woman's*, 6.82-3.

SIR GREGORY
200 So, so, I have my liripoop already.

OLD KNIGHT
Why, how now, niece? This is the man, I tell you.

NIECE
He? Hang him, sir! I know you do but mock;
This is the man, you would say.

OLD KNIGHT [aside]
The devil rides, I think.

CUNNINGGAME [aside] I must use cunning here.

OLD KNIGHT
205 Make me not mad; use him with all respect;
This is the man, I swear.

NIECE [aside] Would you could persuade me to that!—
Alas, you cannot go beyond me, Uncle!
You carry a jest well, I must confess,
For a man of your years, but—

OLD KNIGHT I'm wrought beside myself.

CUNNINGGAME [to the Guardianess]
210 I never beheld comeliness till this minute.

GUARDIANESS
O good sweet sir, pray, offer not these words
To an old gentlewoman.

NIECE Sir!

CUNNINGGAME Away, fifteen!
Here's fifty-one exceeds thee.

NIECE What's the business?

CUNNINGGAME
215 Give me these motherly creatures! Come, ne'er smother it;
I know you are a teeming woman yet.

GUARDIANESS
Troth, a young gentleman might do much, I think,
sir,

CUNNINGGAME Go to, then!

GUARDIANESS
And I should play my part, or I were ingrateful.

NIECE
Can you so soon neglect me?

CUNNINGGAME Hence, I'm busy.

OLD KNIGHT [aside]
220 This cross point came in luckily.—Impudent baggage,
Hang from the gentleman; art thou not ashamed

To be a widow's hindrance?

CUNNINGGAME Are you angry, sir?

OLD KNIGHT
You're welcome; pray, court on. I shall desire Your honest wise acquaintance. [To Niece] Vex me not,
After my care and pains to find a match for thee, 225
Lest I confine thy life to some out-chamber,
Where thou shalt waste the sweetness of thy youth
Like a consuming light in her own socket,
And not allowed a male creature about thee;
A very monkey thy necessity 230
Shall prize at a thousand pound, a chimney-sweeper
At fifteen hundred.

NIECE But are you serious, uncle?

OLD KNIGHT
Serious.

NIECE
Pray, let me look upon the gentleman
With more heed; then I did but hum him over, 235
In haste, good faith, as lawyers chancery sheets;
Beshrew my blood, a tolerable man,
Now I distinctly read him.

SIR GREGORY [hums] Hum, hum, hum.

NIECE
Say he be black, he's of a very good pitch;
Well ankled; two good confident calves; they look 240
As if they would not shrink at the ninth child;
The redness i'th' face, why, that's in fashion,
Most of your high bloods have it, sign of greatness,
marry;
'Tis to be taken down, too, with May butter,
I'll send to my lady Spend-tail for her medicine. 245

SIR GREGORY [hums]
Lum te dum, dum, dum, de dum.

NIECE
He's qualified too, believe me.

SIR GREGORY
Lum te dum, de dum, de dum.

NIECE
Where was my judgement?

SIR GREGORY
Lum te dum, dum, dum, te dum, te dum. 250

200 liripoop lesson or part to be learned by heart; Sir Gregory has both received his sermon and been assigned his role

204 The devil rides from the proverb 'the devil rides upon a fiddlestick', meaning 'here's a fine commotion'

215 teeming fertile

220 cross point dance step in the contrary direction

226 out-chamber outhouse (away from all the other members of the household)

228 socket of a candlestick

235 hum him over glance quickly and superficially over him

236 chancery sheets briefs for the Lord Chancellor's court

239 pitch punningly suggesting Sir Gregory has an unappealingly pitch-dark complexion while ostensibly praising his height or build

240 two...calves 'From Cunninggame's later remarks at 3.1.285-7 which cite Sir Gregory as an example of "thin gentlemen" with "small trapstick legs" it would seem that the Niece's flattery is heavily ironic' (Sharp)

243 high bloods (a) those of aristocratic birth (b) those exhibiting sexual arousal

244 May butter Sharp quotes the 1637 edition of Gervase Markham's English Housewife, 199: 'If during the month of May before you salt your butter you save a lump thereof, and put it into a vessel, and so set it into the sun the space of that month, you shall find it exceeding sovereign and medicinable for wounds, strains, aches and suchlike grievances'

245 Spend-tail the name implies promiscuity, following on from the sexual innuendo of 'high bloods' being 'taken down'

- NIECE
Perfection's covered mess!
- SIR GREGORY
Lum te dum, te dum, te dum.
- NIECE [aside]
It smokes apparently.—Pardon, sweet sir,
The error of my sex.
- 255 OLD KNIGHT Why, well said, niece.
Upon submission, you must pardon her now, sir.
- SIR GREGORY
I'll do't by course; do you think I'm an ass, knight?
Here's first my hand; now't goes to the seal office.
[Kisses her].
- OLD KNIGHT
Formally finished. [To Cunninggame and Guardianess]
How goes this suit forward?
- CUNNINGGAME
I'm taking measure of the widow's mind, sir;
I hope to fit her heart.
- 260 GUARDIANESS Who would have dreamt
Of a young morsel now? Things come in minutes.
- SIR GREGORY
Trust him not, widow, he's a younger brother,
He'll swear and lie; believe me, he's worth nothing.
- GUARDIANESS
He brings more content to a woman with that nothing
- 265 THAN he that brings his thousands without any thing,
We have precedents for that amongst great ladies.
- OLD KNIGHT
Come, come; no language now shall be in fashion
- But your love-phrase, the bell to procreation. Exeunt
- Enter Sir Ruinous, Wittypate, and Priscian, [sharing out money] I.2
- WITTYPATE POX, there's nothing puts me besides my wits, but this fourth, this lay illiterate share, there's no conscience in't.
- SIR RUINOUS Sir, it has ever been so where I have practised, and must be still where I am; nor has it been undeserved at the year's end, and shuffle the almanac together, vacations and term-times one with another—though I say't, my wife is a woman of a good spirit—then it is no lay share. 5
- PRISCIAN Faith, for this five year, ego possum probare, I have had a hungry penurious share with 'em, and she has had as much as I always. 10
- WITTYPATE Present or not present?
- PRISCIAN Residens aut non residens, per fidem.
- WITTYPATE And what precedent's this for me? Because your hic et haec turpis and qui mihi discipulus brains (that never got anything but by accident and uncertainty) did allow it, therefore I must, that have grounded conclusions of wit, hereditary rules from my father to get by? 15
- SIR RUINOUS Sir, be compendious; either take or refuse;
I will bate no token of my wife's share: make even the last reckonings, and either so unite or here divide company. 20
- PRISCIAN A good resolution, profecto: let every man beg his own way, and happy man be his dole. 25

251 Perfection's covered mess a covered mess was a 'made dish' served under a cover as one of the high points of a feast, hence the phrase means something like 'a delicious masterpiece'

253 It smokes apparently my deception is obviously working

259–60 I'm . . . heart punning on the Old Knight's use of the term 'suit'

265 thing with a sexual quibble

268 bell perhaps with the additional sense of 'mating call', as used of stags

1.2 Composed primarily by Rowley

0.1 Sir Ruinous . . . Priscian Sir Ruinous and Priscian are described as 'two sharking companions' by the cast list, i.e. predatory rogues, cony-catchers. Priscian is named after the author (fl. c.AD 500) of the important Latin grammar Institutiones Grammaticae, probably via the phrase 'to break Priscian's head', meaning 'to use incorrect Latin'.

2 fourth Sir Ruinous insists that the proceeds of the trio's previous exploit be split four ways, one share going to Lady Ruinous even though she did not participate in it.

lay non-practising

illiterate i.e. ignorant, non-speaking (and thus unearned)

6–7 shuffle . . . another i.e. average out the takings over the whole year to accommodate both the vacations and the (more lucrative) law terms (when London was full of wealthy litigants)

10 ego possum probare I can witness or demonstrate

14 Residens . . . fidem Present or absent, by my faith

15 precedent's playing on the sound of 'residens'

16 hic . . . discipulus approximately, 'this dishonest male and female' (referring to Sir Ruinous) and 'who to me would be a pupil' (referring to the pedantic Priscian): both phrases derive from the standard Latin primer used by Renaissance schoolboys, William Lilly and John Colet's A Short Introduction of Grammar (1549), which gives 'Hic & Haec Parens' as its first example of the two genders, and concludes with a poem,

'Ad suos discipulos' ('To his students'), the first words of which are 'Qui mihi discipulus'

17 accidence the aspect of Latin grammar concerned with inflexions, here used as a pun on 'accidents'

18 grounded securely based

19 conclusions Wittypate is again playing with the terminology of Latin grammar, choosing the word 'conclusions' because of its linguistic sense of 'word endings, inflexions': he uses the word 'rules' similarly later in the sentence

20 get i.e. obtain money

21 be compendious be brief, i.e. come to the point

22 bate deduct

22–3 make even the last reckonings (let's) settle up our outstanding accounts (on that basis, i.e. with a whole quarter share for Lady Ruinous)

25 profecto indeed

26 happy man be his dole proverbial phrase meaning, approximately, 'the best of luck to the winner'

- WITTYPATE Well, here's your double share and single brains. [Giving money to Sir Ruinous] Pol, aedepol, here's toward a castor, ecastor for you. [Giving money to Priscian] I will endure it a fortnight longer, but by these just five ends—
- 30 PRISCIAN Take heed, five's odd; put both hands together, or severally they are all odd unjust ends.
- WITTYPATE Medius fidius, hold your tongue! I depose you from half a share presently else; I will make you a participle, and decline you; now you understand me: be you a quiet conjunction amongst the undeclined; you and your Latin ends shall go shift, solus cum solo together, else; and then if ever they get ends of gold and silver enough to serve that gerundine maw of yours, that without do will end in di and dum instantly—
- 40 Enter Old Knight and Sir Gregory
- SIR RUINOUS Enough, enough, here comes company; we lose five shares in wrangling about one.
- WITTYPATE My father! Put on, Priscian. He has Latin fragments too, but I fear him not. I'll case my face with a little more hair, and relieve. [Retires, and puts on a false beard]
- 45 OLD KNIGHT
Tush, nephew! I'll call you so, for if there be No other obstacles than those you speak of, They are but powder charges without pellets; You may safely front 'em, and warrant your own danger.
- 50 SIR GREGORY No other that I can perceive, i'faith, sir, for I put her to't, and felt her as far as I could, and the strongest repulse was, she said she would have a little soldier in me, that, if need were, I should defend her reputation.
- 55
- OLD KNIGHT
And surely, sir, that is a principle
Amongst your principal ladies: they require Valour either in a friend or a husband.
- SIR GREGORY And I allow their requests, i'faith, as well as any woman's heart can desire: if I knew where to get valour, I would as willingly entertain it as any man that blows.
- 60 OLD KNIGHT 'Breathes', 'breathes', sir; that's the sweeter phrase.
- SIR GREGORY 'Blows' for a soldier, i'faith, sir; and I'm in practice that way.
- 65 OLD KNIGHT For a soldier, I grant it.
- SIR GREGORY 'Slid, I'll swallow some bullets, and good round ones too, but I'll have a little soldier in me.
- 70 SIR RUINOUS [aside to Priscian] Will you on and beg, or steal and be hanged?
- SIR GREGORY And some scholar she would have me besides.
- OLD KNIGHT Tush, that shall be no bar; 'tis a quality in a gentleman, but of the least question.
- 75 PRISCIAN Salvete, domini benignissimi, munificentissimi!
- OLD KNIGHT Salvete dicis ad nos? Jubeo te salvere. Nay, sir, we have Latin, and other metal in us too. [To Sir Gregory]
Sir, you shall see me talk with this fellow now.
- SIR GREGORY I could find in my heart to talk with him too, if I could understand him.
- 80 PRISCIAN Charissimi doctissimique domini, ex abundantia charitatis vestrae estote propitii in me juvenem miserum, pauperem, et omni consolatione exulem.
- OLD KNIGHT A pretty scholar, by my faith, sir: but I'll to him again.
- 85 SIR GREGORY Does he beg or steal in this language, can you tell, sir? He may take away my good name from me, and I ne'er the wiser.

28 Pol, aedepol another nickname for Priscian drawn from Lilly and Colet's Short Introduction of Grammar, taken from its section 'Of the Adverb': 'Some be of Swearing: as Pol, aedepol, hercle, medius fidius...'. The literal sense is 'Pollux, by Pollux'.

28-9 here's...you Castor, ecastor means 'Castor, by Castor', but the exact point of Wittypate's invocation of the other heavenly twin here, apart from its echoing of 'Pol, aedepol', has never been satisfactorily explained. Dyce rather dubiously records a friend's suggestion that it puns on the cant term 'caster', cloak, so that Wittypate is recommending that Priscian might spend his share on a cloak: Turner, on the strength of a 1565 translation of 'ecastor' as 'By my fay, used only of women' (in Thomas Cooper's Thesaurus Linguae Romanae & Britannicae), glosses the line as 'here's something toward the price of a woman for you', presumably on the assumption that any obscure joke must be bawdy. It seems unlikely that either explanation would persuade a modern director not to cut the line.

30-1 by...ends 'i.e. by the fingers of this hand, or, in the modern vernacular, "by this bunch of fives"' (Sharp)

32 odd 'i.e. an odd number. Some of the puns in this scene are rather desperate in quality' (Sharp)

33 severally separately

34 Medius fidius most certainly. Wittypate is again mocking Priscian by quoting A Short Introduction of Grammar at him: see note on l. 28, above

36-7 participle...undeclined a further battery of grammatical terms

38 ends word-endings, inflexions

solus cum solo literally 'alone with alone'

39-40 ends...silver 'i.e. broken pieces of gold and silver' (Dyce)

40 gerundine 'Possibly this might be a misprint...for "gerundive", but equally it might be a nonce word invented by Wittypate to imply "gerund-spouting" or

"gerund-loving"' (Sharp)

41 do...dum gerundive endings, perhaps once more from Lilly and Colet (who refer to 'certain voices called Gerunds ending in di, do, and dum'), with puns on 'do', 'die' and 'dumb'

43 five shares Sir Ruinous may be echoing 'five ends' at l. 30, but he surely means 'four': 'unless Wittypate also claims a double share, I do not understand Ruinous's arithmetic' (Sharp)

44 Put on Go to it

66 'Blows'...soldier punning on the pugilistic sense of 'blows'

76 Salvete...munificentissimi Greetings, most generous, most munificent sir

77 Salvete...salvere Are you speaking your greetings to us? I greet you in return

77-8 Nay...too punning on 'latten', an alloy resembling brass, and 'mettle'

82-4 Charissimi...exulem Most gracious and learned sir, from your state of charitable abundance look favourably on me, a young man in misery and poverty, exiled from all consolation

- 90 OLD KNIGHT He begs, he begs, sir.
PRISCIAN Ecce, ecce, in oculis lachrymarum flumen, in ore famias sitisque; ignis in vultu, pudor et impudentia; in omni parte necessitas et indigentia.
- 95 OLD KNIGHT Audi tu, bonus socius; tu es scholasticus, sic intelligo; ego faciam argumentum.—Mark now, sir, now I fetch him up.
SIR GREGORY I have been fetched up a hundred times for this, yet I could never learn half so much.
OLD KNIGHT Audi, et responde; hoc est argumentum: nomen est nomen; ergo, quod est tibi nomen? Responde nunc, responde argumentum meum.—Have I not put him to't, sir?
SIR GREGORY Yes, sir, I think so.
WITTPATE [aside to Sir Ruinous] Step in; the rascal is put out of his penned speech, and he can go no farther.
- 105 OLD KNIGHT Cur non respondes?
PRISCIAN O domine, tanta mea est miseria—
WITTPATE So, he's almost in again.
PRISCIAN —ut nocte mecum pernoctet egestas, luce quotidie paupertas habitet.
- 110 OLD KNIGHT Sed quod est tibi nomen, et quis dedit? Responde argumentum.
PRISCIAN Hem, hem.
WITTPATE He's dry, he hems; on, quickly!
SIR RUINOUS [coming forward] Courteous gentlemen, if the
- 115 brow of a military face may not be offensive to your generous eyeballs, let his wounds speak better than his words for some branch or small sprig of charity to be planted upon this poor barren soil of a soldier.
OLD KNIGHT How now! What, arms and arts both go
- 120 a-begging?
SIR RUINOUS Such is the post-progress of cold Charity nowadays, who, for heat to her frigid limbs, passes in
- so swift a motion that two at the least had need be to stay her.
SIR GREGORY Sir, let's reward 'em, I pray you, and be gone. If any quarrel should arise amongst us, I am able to answer neither of them; his iron and steel tongue is as hard as the t'other's Latin one.
OLD KNIGHT Stay, stay, sir; I will talk a little with him first. Let me alone with both; I will try whether they live by their wits or no, for such a man I love.—And what, you both beg together, then?
PRISCIAN Coniunctis manibus profecto, domine.
SIR RUINOUS With equal fortunes, equal distribution; there's not the breadth of a sword's point uneven in our division.
SIR GREGORY What two qualities are here cast away upon two poor fellows! If a man had 'em that could maintain 'em, what a double man were that! If these two fellows might be bought, and sodden, and boiled to a jelly, and eaten fasting every morning, I do not think but a man should find strange things in his stomach.
OLD KNIGHT Come, sir, join your charity with mine, and we'll make up a couple of pence betwixt us.
SIR GREGORY If a man could have a pennyworth for his penny, I would bestow more money with 'em.
WITTPATE [coming forward] Save you, gentlemen! how now? What, are you encountered here? What fellows are these?
OLD KNIGHT Faith, sir, here's Mars and Mercury, a pair of poor planets, it seems, that Jupiter has turned out to live by their wits; and we are e'en about a little spark of charity to kindle 'em a new fire.
WITTPATE Stay, pray you, stay, sir; you may abuse your charity, nay, make that goodness in you no better than a vice: so many deceivers walk in these shadows

- 91–3 Ecce ... indigentia Behold, behold, in my eyes a river of tears, in my mouth hunger and thirst; in my countenance a fire of shame at my shamelessness [in begging]; in every part of me necessity and indigence. (Throughout this scene, Priscian's Latin is as clumsy as Wittypate's taunts from A Short Introduction of Grammar might lead us to expect, and proves to have been learned parrot-fashion from a prepared script: see I.I.I.105.1–I.I.I.106).
- 94–5 Audi ... argumentum Listen, good friend; you are a scholar, so I understand; I will set you an argument. (The Old Knight's Latin, however, is even more basic than Priscian's.)
- 99–101 Audi ... meum Listen and reply; this is the argument: a name is a name; and so, what is your name? Reply now, reply to my argument
- 105 Cur ... respondes? Why do you not reply?
- 106 O ... miseria O sir, such is my distress ... (In response to the Old Knight's interrogation, Priscian is only able to
- revert to his pre-rehearsed begging routine.)
- 108–9 ut ... habitet ... that through the hours of darkness destitution lodges with me, and through the hours of light every day poverty stays with me
- 110–11 Sed ... argumentum But what is your name, and who will vouchsafe it? Reply to the argument
- 112 Hem, hem conventional sound of throat-clearing, by which Priscian may be deliberately signalling to his colleagues that he has 'dried'
- 116–17 his wounds ... his words The wounds are those about to be claimed by Sir Ruinous in his character of a veteran soldier, the words those which Priscian has already spoken in his character of a poor scholar. Sir Ruinous adopts the elaborately figured, slightly bombastic language regarded as proper to a Renaissance soldier.
- 121 post-progress hurried movement or procession
- 124 stay detain, stop
- 128 Latin punning once more on 'latten': see ll. 77–8
- 133 Coniunctis ... domine With hands united, indeed, sir
- 138 maintain afford to support
- 141 fasting on an empty stomach
- 142 stomach Sir Gregory is presumably thinking in particular of Sir Ruinous's assumed military virtues here, since the stomach was thought to be the seat of courage
- 145 pennyworth of Priscian's learning and Sir Ruinous's valour
- 148 are you encountered here? have you been accosted here?
- 150 Mercury appropriately, a deity associated with trickery as well as with study
- 151–2 Jupiter ... wits 'We need not search for this incident in classical mythology. The Old Knight makes of Jupiter, chief of the gods, exactly the same sort of harsh, but wit-loving head of household as himself' (Sharp)
- 156 shadows disguises, stage costumes

- nowadays that certainly your bounties were better spilt than reserved to so lewd and vicious uses.—Which is he that professes the soldier?
- 160 SIR RUINOUS He that professes his own profession, sir, and the dangerous life he hath led in it this pair of half-score years.
- WITTYPATE In what services have you been, sir?
- 165 SIR RUINOUS The first that fleshed me a soldier, sir, was that great battle of Alcazar in Barbary, where the noble English Stukeley fell, and where that royal Portugal, Sebastian, ended his untimely days.
- WITTYPATE Are you sure Sebastian died there?
- 170 SIR RUINOUS Faith, sir, there was some other rumour hopped amongst us that he, wounded, escaped, and touched on his native shore again, where, finding his country at home more distressed by the invasion of the Spaniard than his loss abroad, forsook it, still supporting a miserable and unfortunate life, which where he ended is yet uncertain.
- 175 WITTYPATE By my faith, sir, he speaks the nearest fame of truth in this.
- SIR RUINOUS Since, sir, I served in France, the Low Countries, lastly at that memorable skirmish at Nieuport; where the forward and bold Scot there spent his life so freely, that from every single heart that there fell came home from his resolution a double honour to his country.
- 180 WITTYPATE This should be no counterfeit, sir.
- 185 OLD KNIGHT I do not think he is, sir.
- WITTYPATE But, sir, methinks you do not show the marks of a soldier: could you so freely scape, that you brought home no scars to be your chronicle?
- SIR RUINOUS Sir, I have wounds, and many; but in those parts where nature and humanity bids me shame to publish.
- WITTYPATE A good soldier cannot want those badges.
- SIR GREGORY Now am not I of your mind in that; for I hold him the best soldier that scapes best: always at a cock-fencing I give him the best that has the fewest 195 knocks.
- WITTYPATE Nay, I'll have a bout with your scholar too.—To ask you why you should be poor, yet richly learned, were no question, at least you can easily answer it; but whether you have learning enough to deserve to be poor or no (since poverty is commonly the meed of learning), is yet to be tried. You have the languages? I mean the chief, as the Hebrew, Syriac, Greek, Latin, et caetera?
- 200 PRISCIAN Aliquantulum, non totaliter, domine.
- OLD KNIGHT The Latin I have sufficiently tried him in, and I promise you, sir, he is very well grounded.
- WITTYPATE I will prove him in some of the rest.—Tois miois fatherois iste coxcomboy?
- 205 PRISCIAN Kay yonkeron nigitton oy fouleroi asinisooy.
- WITTYPATE Cheateron ton biton?
- PRISCIAN Tous pollous strikerous, angelo to peeso.
- WITTYPATE Certainly, sir, a very excellent scholar in the Greek.
- OLD KNIGHT I do note a wondrous readiness in him.
- 210 SIR GREGORY I do wonder how the Trojans could hold out ten years' siege, as 'tis reported, against the Greeks; if Achilles spoke but this tongue, I do not think but he might have shaken down the walls in a seventh-night, and ne'er troubled the wooden horse.
- 215 WITTYPATE I will try him so far as I can in the Syriac.—Kircom bragmen, shag a dou ma dell mathou.

161 pair of half-score elaborate military banter for 'a score', i.e. twenty

164–7 The first... days Sir Ruinous's recollections of his fictitious military career are of a distinctly hackneyed variety: the famous battle in which king Sebastian of Portugal perished in his attempt to win Morocco for Christianity, fought in 1578, was well known to playgoers from George Peele's drama The Battle of Alcazar (1594), while the career of the notorious English pirate and adventurer Thomas Stukeley, who also died there, had been made the subject of the anonymous play Captain Thomas Stukeley (1596; printed 1605).

169–75 Faith... uncertain Sebastian left no legal heir, and after his death at Alcazar Philip II of Spain was able to take control of Portugal, although rumours of Sebastian's survival persisted throughout Europe for many years

179 skirmish at Nieuport perhaps the most famous encounter of the Dutch civil wars, the Battle of Nieuport (2 Jul. 1600), in which Protestant forces under Prince Maurice of Nassau, assisted by

English and Scots troops commanded by Sir Edward Cecil and Sir Francis Vere, defeated Prince Albert of Spain

180–3 the forward... country The Scottish vanguard at Nieuport was cut off by the Spanish from the remainder of the army and massacred, achieving legendary status as a result. The story of this rare Protestant victory was so well-known in England that Sir Ruinous's ability to recount it constitutes a remarkably slender proof of his military experience, making Wittypate's success in persuading the Old Knight otherwise especially comic.

189–91 Sir... publish with an innuendo on the marks of venereal disease, taken up covertly by Wittypate's response

194 scapes escapes

195 cock-fencing cockfight. Sir Gregory obtusely fails to see that Sir Ruinous's lack of visible wounds actually does invalidate his story 201 meed reward. The learned have always been spectacularly underpaid, especially in England.

203 Syriac Cyrillic, i.e. Russian. It is probable that the dialogue from here through l. 227–8 was contributed to the scene by Middleton, who delighted in such scenes of fraudulent linguistic expertise.

205 Aliquantulum... domine Somewhat, not completely, sir

208–12 Tois... peeso The 'Greek' spoken by Wittypate and Priscian is magnificently spurious, consisting largely of English words given vaguely Greek-sounding endings: it is just possible to discern the sense of the conversation as, approximately, 'Is my father a coxcomb?... (?)... fool, ass (?)—Shall we cheat him, bite him (in the cant sense of "cheat")?... (?)... we can strike (coin) angels and pieces (from him)'. Compare the fraudulent Greek spoken by Idle in Puritan (4.2.108).

215 wondrous readiness due, as the Old Knight fails to realize, to careful rehearsal

219 seventh-night week

222–6 Kircom... nagothi this 'Syriac' is of course every bit as bogus as the preceding Greek

- PRISCIAN Hashagath rabgabash shobos onoriadka.
 WITTYPATE Colpack rubasca, gnawerthem shigshag.
 225 PRISCIAN Napshamothem ribshe bongomosh lashemech nagothi.
 WITTYPATE Gentlemen, I have done: any man that can, go further; I confess myself at a nonplus.
 SIR GREGORY Faith, not I, sir; I was at my farthest in my 230 natural language; I was never double-tongued, I thank my hard fortune.
 WITTYPATE Well, gentlemen, 'tis pity,—[*To Priscian and Sir
 Ruinous*] Walk further off a little, my friends—I say, 'tis 235 pity such fellows, so endowed, so qualified with the gifts of nature and arts, yet should have such a scarcity of Fortune's benefits: we must blame our iron-hearted age for it.
 OLD KNIGHT 'Tis pity, indeed, and our pity shall speak a little for 'em: come, sir; here's my groat.
 240 WITTYPATE A groat, sir? O, fie! Give nothing rather! 'Twere better you railed on 'em for begging, and so quit yourself. I am a poor gentleman, that have little but my wits to live on—
 OLD KNIGHT Troth, and I love you the better, sir.
 245 WITTYPATE —yet I'll begin a better example than so. [To Priscian and Sir Ruinous, throwing them a purse] Here, fellows, there's between you! Take purse and all, and I would it were heavier for your sakes! There's a pair of angels to guide you to your lodgings, a poor 250 gentleman's good will.
 PRISCIAN Gratias, maximas gratias, benignissime domine!
 OLD KNIGHT This is an ill example for us, sir; I would this bountiful gentleman had not come this way today!
 SIR GREGORY Pox, we must not shame ourselves now, sir.
 255 I'll give as much as that gentleman, though I never be soldier or scholar while I live.—Here, friends, [throwing a gold coin to Sir Ruinous and Priscian] there's a piece that if he were divided would make a pair of angels for me too, in the love I bear to the sword and the tongues.
 260 OLD KNIGHT My largess shall be equal too, [throwing them another gold coin] and much good do you!—[Aside] This bounty is a little abatement of my wit, though, I feel that.
 SIR RUINOUS May soldiers ever defend such charities!
- PRISCIAN And scholars pray for their increase! 265
 OLD KNIGHT [to Wittypate] Fare you well, sir: these fellows may pray for you; you have made the scholar's commons exceed today. And a word with you, sir; you said you lived by your wits; if you use this bounty, you'll 270 beggar your wits, believe it.
 WITTYPATE O, sir, I hope to increase 'em by it; this seed never wants his harvest. Fare you well, sir. Exit SIR GREGORY [aside] I think a man were as good meet with a reasonable thief as an unreasonable beggar sometimes;
 I could find in my heart to beg half mine back again. 275
 [To Priscian and Sir Ruinous]—Can you change my piece, my friends?
 PRISCIAN Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis.
 SIR GREGORY My gold is turned into Latin.
Re-enter Wittypate
 WITTYPATE Look you, good fellows, here's one round 280 shilling more, that lay concealed.
 OLD KNIGHT Sir, away! We shall be drawn farther into damage else.
 SIR GREGORY A pox of the fool! He live by his wits? If his wits leave him any money but what he begs or steals 285 very shortly, I'll be hanged for him.
Exeunt Old Knight and Sir Gregory
 SIR RUINOUS This breakfast-parcel was well fetched off,
 i'faith.
 WITTYPATE Tush, a by-blow for mirth; we must have better purchase. We want a fourth for another project that I 290 have ripened.
 SIR RUINOUS My wife; she shares, and can deserve it.
 WITTYPATE She can change her shape, and be masculine?
 SIR RUINOUS 'Tis one of the freest conditions: she fears not the crack of a pistol; she dares say 'Stand!' to a grazier. 295 PRISCIAN Probatum fuit profecto, domine.
 WITTYPATE Good: then you, sir, [To Priscian] Bacchus Apollo, shall be dispatched with her share and some counters to meet us tomorrow, at a certain place and time appointed, in the masculine gender. My father 300 has a nephew, and I an own cousin, coming up from the university, whom he loves most indulgently—easy Master Credulous Oldcraft (for you know what your mere academic is). Your carrier never misses his hour.
 been proven, sir
 297–8 Bacchus Apollo Wittypate again calls
 Priscian by a nickname drawn from A Short Introduction of Grammar, this time from Lilly's poem 'Carmen de nominum generibus', the second line of which includes the phrase 'Ut sunt divorum, Mars, Bacchus, Apollo'.
 302 easy gullible
 304 Your...hour The punctuality of the Cambridge university carrier Thomas
 Hobson (c.1544–1631), who ferried students and baggage to and from London, was legendary; see Milton's two facetious epitaphs, printed in Poems (1645).
- 230 double-tongued bilingual
 249 pair of angels The two coins Wittypate claims are in the purse would together be worth about £1, a sum sixty times larger than the groat initially offered by the Old Knight.
 251 Gratias...domine Thanks, the greatest thanks, most generous sir 257 piece coin worth £1, twice as much as an angel
 267–8 scholar's commons daily allowance of food provided for university students
 (generally bread and cheese)
 271 seed Wittypate's apparent investment in Priscian and Sir Ruinous has of course been precisely that, seed money, which has already reaped its harvest
- 278 Tempora...illis Times change and we change with them: perhaps the most clichéd of all Latin tags
 279 Latin another pun on 'latten': Sir Gregory's gold has been alchemically transformed into base metal 287 breakfast-parcel sum of money with which to pay for breakfast
 289 by-blow trifling achievement
 294 'Tis i.e. she is (or has) 295 'Stand!' stereotypical command of a highwayman to his prey grazier one who fattens cattle and brings them to market, a proverbial target for highwaymen and footpads when on the way home with the proceeds
 296 Probatum...domine This has indeed

305 He must not be robbed, because he has but little to lose, but he must join with us in a device that I have, that shall rob my father of a hundred pieces, and thank me to be rid on't. For there's the ambition of my wit: to live upon his professed wit, that has turned me out to 310 live by my wits.

PRISCIAN Cum hirundinis alis tibi regraturor.

WITTYPATE A male habit, a bag of a hundred weight, though it be counters (for my alchemy shall turn 'em into gold of my father's); the hour, the place, the action 315 shall be at large set down: and, father, you shall know that I put my portion to use, that you have given me to live by;

And, to confirm yourself in me renate,
I hope you'll find my wit's legitimate. Exeunt

2.1 Enter Lady Ruinous and Servant

SERVANT

Nay, Lady—

LADY Put me not in mind on't, prithee;
You cannot do a greater wrong to women;
For in our wants 'tis the most chief affliction
To have that name remembered; 'tis a title
5 That misery mocks us by, and the world's malice.
Scorn and contempt has not wherewith to work
On humble callings: they are safe, and lie
Level with pity still, and pale distress
Is no great stranger to 'em; but when Fortune
10 Looks with a stormy face on our conditions,
We find affliction work, and envy pastime,
And our worst enemy then, that most abuses us,
Is that we are called by, 'Lady'. [Exit Servant]

O my spirit,

Will nothing make thee humble? I am well, methinks,
15 And can live quiet with my fate sometimes,
Until I look into the world again:
Then I begin to rave at my stars' bitterness,
To see how many muckhills placed above me,
Peasants and droils, caroches full of dunghills,
20 Whose very birth stinks in a generous nostril, Glistering by night like glow-worms through the high-streets,
Hurried by torchlight in the footmen's hands,
That show like running fire-drakes through the city:

And earn my supper manfully ere I get it;
Many a meal I have purchased at that rate,
Enter Priscian [disguised with a beard]

Fed with a wound upon me, stamped at midnight.
Ha! what are you?

PRISCIAN (pulls off his beard)

Now you may tell yourself, lady.

LADY O, Master Priscian; what's the project? 30

For you ne'er come without one.

PRISCIAN First, your husband,
Sir Ruinous Gentry, greets you with best wishes,
And here has sent you your full share by me
In five cheats and two robberies.

LADY And what comes it to?

PRISCIAN

Near upon thirteen pound.

LADY A goodly share! 35

'Twill put a lady scarce in philip-and-cheyney
With three small bugle laces, like a chambermaid:
Here's precious lifting!

PRISCIAN 'Las, you must consider, lady,
'Tis but young term; attorneys ha' small doings yet;
Then highway-lawyers, they must needs ha' little. 40

We've had no great good luck, to speak troth, beauty,
Since your stout ladyship parted from's at Highgate:
But there's a fair hope now for a present hundred;
Here's man's apparel; your horse stands at door.

LADY

And what's the virtuous plot now?

PRISCIAN Marry, lady, 45

You, like a brave young gallant, must be robbed.

LADY

I robbed?

PRISCIAN Nay, then—

LADY Well, well, go on; let's hear, sir.

PRISCIAN

Here's a sealed bag of a hundred, which indeed
Are counters all, only some sixteen groats
Of white money i'the mouth on't.

LADY So: what saddle have I? 50

PRISCIAN

Monsieur Laroon's, the Frenchman's.

LADY That again!

You know so well it is not for my stride,

open countryside provided a suitable venue for highway robberies 49-50 sixteen...white money 'white money' meant silver coins (such as the groat)

and some badinage about the comparative sexual capacities of Frenchmen and Scots[men] definitely seems intended...'

Act 2 Scene 1

Wit at feverall Weapons.

How oft have I complained on't?
 PRISCIAN
 You may have Jockey's then, the little Scotch one.
 You must dispatch.
 55 LADY I'll soon be ready, sir,
 Before you ha' shifted saddles. Exit Priscian
 Many women
 Have their wealth flow to 'em; I was made, I see,
 To help my fortune, not my fortune me. Exit

2.2 Enter Cunninggame
 CUNNINGGAME
 My ways are goblin-led, and the night-elf
 Still draws me from my home, yet I follow;
 Sure 'tis not altogether fabulous,
 Such hags do get dominion of our tongues,
 5 So soon as we speak, the enchantment binds.
 I have dissembled such a trouble on me
 As my best wits can hardly clear again.
 Piping through this old reed, the guardianess,
 With purpose that my harmony shall reach
 10 And please the lady's ear, she stops below
 And echoes back my love unto my lips,
 Persuaded by most violent arguments
 Of self-love in herself, I am so self-fool
 To dote upon her hundred-wrinkled face.
 15 I could beggar her to accept the gifts
 She would throw upon me; 'twere charity;
 But for pity's sake I will be a niggard
 And undo her, refusing to take from her.
Enter Guardianess
 I'm haunted again: if it take not now,
 I'll break the spell.
 20 GUARDIANESS Sweet Cunninggame, welcome!
 What, a whole day absent? Birds that build nests
 Have care to keep 'em.
 CUNNINGGAME That's granted,
 But not continually to sit upon 'em,
 'Less in the youngling season; else they desire 25 To fly abroad and recreate their labours,
 Then they return with fresher appetite
 To work again.
 GUARDIANESS Well, well, you have built a nest
 That will stand all storms; you need not mistrust
 A weather-wrack; and one day it may be 30 The youngling season, too; then, I hope,
 You'll ne'er fly out of sight.
 CUNNINGGAME [aside] There will be pains,

I see, to shake this burr off.—And, sweetest,
 Prithee, how fares thy charge? Has my good friend
 Sir Gregory the countenance of a lover?
 GUARDIANESS
 No, by my troth, not in my mind; methinks,
 35 Setting his worship aside, he looks like a fool.
 CUNNINGGAME
 Nay, i'faith, ne'er divide his worship from him
 For that small matter; fool and worship are No such strangers nowadays. But my meaning is,
 Has he thy lady's countenance of love?
 40 Looks she like a welcome on him? Plainly,
 Have they as good hope of one another
 As, Cupid bless us, we have?
 GUARDIANESS Troth, I know not;
 I can perceive no forwardness in my charge;
 45 But I protest I wish the knight the better
 For your sake, bird.
 CUNNINGGAME
 Why, thanks, sweet bird, and with my heart I wish
 That he had as strong and likely hope of her
 As thou hast of me.
 GUARDIANESS Well, he's like to speed
 Ne'er the worse for that good wish, and I'll tell you,
 50 bird,
 (For secrets are not to be kept betwixt us two),
 My charge thinks well of you.
 CUNNINGGAME Of me? For what?
 GUARDIANESS
 For my sake, I mean so; I have heard her
 A hundred times say, since her uncle gave her
 The first bob about you, that she'd do somewhat 55 For my sake, if things went well together:
 We have spoke of doors and bolts, and things, and things—
 Go to, I'll tell you all! But you'll find some Advancement for my sake, I do believe.
 CUNNINGGAME
 Faith, be not sparing, tell me.
 GUARDIANESS By my lady,
 60 You shall pardon me for that; 'twere a shame
 If men should hear all that women speak behind
 Their backs sometimes.
 CUNNINGGAME You must give me leave yet
 At least to give her thanks.
 GUARDIANESS Nor that neither;
 She must not take a notice of my blabbing.
 65 It is sufficient you shall give me thanks,

 58 Go... all! i.e. get away, I'll be betraying all my secrets to you at this rate

For 'tis for my sake if she be bountiful:
 She loves me, and loves you too for my sake.
 CUNNINGGAME
 How shall I, knowing this, but be ingrate
 70 Not to repay her with my dearest duty?
 GUARDIANESS
 Ay, but you must not know it; if you tell
 All that I open to you, you'll shame us both:
 Afar off you may kiss your hand, blush, or so,
 But I'll allow no nearer conference.
 CUNNINGGAME
 Whoop! you'll be jealous, I perceive now.
 75 GUARDIANESS Jealous?
 Why, there is no true love without it, bird,
 I must be jealous of thee; but for her
 (Were it within my duty to my master),
 I durst trust her with the strongest tempter,
 80 And I dare swear her now as pure a virgin
 As e'er was welcomed to a marriage bed:
 If thoughts may be untainted, hers are so.
 CUNNINGGAME
 And where's the cause of your fear, then?
 GUARDIANESS Well, well,
 85 When things are past and the wedding torches
 Lighted at matches, to kindle better fire,
 Then I'll tell you more.
 CUNNINGGAME Come, come, I see further
 That if we were married, you'd be jealous.
 GUARDIANESS
 I protest, I should a little, but not of her:
 It is the married woman (if you mark it),
 90 And not the maid, that longs; the appetite
 Follows the first taste; when we have relished
 We wish cloying; the taste once pleased before,
 Then our desire is whetted on to more.
 But I reveal too much to you, i'faith, bird.
 CUNNINGGAME
 95 Not a whit, faith, bird, betwixt you and I;
 I am beholding for bettering of my knowledge.
 GUARDIANESS
 Nay, you shall know more of me, if you'll be ruled;
 But make not things common.
Enter Niece and Clown [the latter giving her a ruff]
 CUNNINGGAME Ud'so, your lady.

GUARDIANESS
 Ay, 'tis no matter, she'll like well of this;
 Our familiarity is her content. 100
 NIECE This present from Sir Gregory?
 CLOWN From my master, the worshipful right Sir Gregory Fop.
 NIECE
 A ruff? And what might be his high conceit
 In sending of a ruff? 105
 CLOWN I think he had two conceits in it, forsooth, too high, too low; ruff-high, because as the ruff does embrace your neck all day, so does he desire to throw his knightly arms.
 NIECE
 But then I leave him off o' nights. 110
 CLOWN Why, then he is ruff-low, a ruffian, a bold adventurous errant to do any rough service for his lady.
 NIECE
 A witty and unhappy conceit! (Toward Cunninggame)—
 Does he mean
 As he seems to say unto that reverence?
 He does woo her, sure. 115
 CLOWN To tell you truth, lady, his conceit was far better than I have blazed it yet.
 NIECE Do you think so, sir?
 CLOWN Nay, I know it, forsooth, for it was two days ere he compassed it, to find a fitting present for your ladyship:
 120 he was sending once a very fine puppy to you.
 NIECE And that he would have brought himself.
 CLOWN So he would, indeed, but then he altered his device, and sent this ruff, requesting withal, that whensoever it is foul, you with your own hands would bestow the starching of it. 125
 NIECE (toward Cunninggame)
 Else she woos him: now his eyes shoot this way.—
 And what was the reason for that, sir?
 CLOWN There lies his main conceit, lady; 'For', says he, 'in so doing she cannot choose but in the starching to clap 130 it often between her hands, and so she gives a great liking and applause to my present; whereas if I should send a puppy she ever calls it to her with "hist, hiss, hiss", which is a fearful disgrace.' He drew the device from a play at the Bull t'other day. 135
 NIECE
 Ay, marry, sir, this was a rich conceit, indeed.

85 fire with its secondary sense of 'passion'

96 beholding beholden to you

98.1 Clown The Clown, Pompey Doodle, is described by the cast list as 'a piece of puff-paste [puff pastry], like his master', so it may be that there is something foppish about his clothes even before his transformation into a gallant later in the play.

98 Ud'so contraction of 'God save me'

104 conceit conception, fanciful underlying idea

106-7 too high, too low an expression which has greatly puzzled editors, although Sharp and Turner are in general agreement that of Sir Gregory's two conceits the first is 'too high' (in the sense of excited, the ruff about the neck signifying an embrace) and the second too low (too vulgar)

107-12 ruff-high...lady The puzzlement continues here, with some editors following Weber in suspecting an obscure pun derived from cardplaying (since 'ruff' could mean 'trump'), and Turner opting squarely for obscenity, pointing out that 'ruff' could mean 'pudendum' and 'rob the ruffian' could mean 'copulate'. That the 'lower' of the conceits is salacious, ll. 110-12, seems certain.

CLOWN
And far-fetched; therefore good for you, lady.

GUARDIANESS How now, which way look you, bird?

CUNNINGGAME At the fool, bird; shall I not look at the fool?

140 GUARDIANESS At the fool, and I here? What need that?
Pray, look this way.

NIECE [aside]
I'll fit him aptly; either I'll awake
His wits (if he have any) or force him
To appear (as yet I cannot think him)
145 Without any.—Sirrah, tell me one thing true
That I shall ask you now: was this device
Your master's own? I doubt his wit in it;
He's not so ingenious.

CLOWN His own, I assure you, madam.

150 NIECE Nay, you must not lie.

CLOWN Not with a lady? I'd rather lie with you than lie with my master, by your leave, in such a case as this.

GUARDIANESS
Yet again your eye?

CUNNINGGAME The fool makes mirth, i'faith,
I would hear some.

GUARDIANESS Come, you shall hear none but me.

NIECE
155 Come hither, friend; nay, come nearer me; did
Thy master send thee to me? He may be wise,
But did not show it much in that; men sometimes May wrong themselves unawares, when they least think on't:
Was Vulcan ever so unwise to send Mars
160 To be his spokesman, when he went a-wooing?
Send thee! Heigh-ho, a pretty rolling eye—

CLOWN I can turn up the white and the black too, an need be, forsooth.

NIECE Why, here's an amorous nose.

165 CLOWN You see the worst of my nose, forsooth.

NIECE A cheek!
How I could pat it now in dalliance!
A pair of lips—O, that we were uneyed!—
I could suck sugar from 'em. What a beard's here!
170 When will the knight thy master have such a stamp
Of manhood on his face? Nay, do not blush.

CLOWN
'Tis nothing but my flesh and blood that rises so.

CUNNINGGAME Death, she courts the fool!

GUARDIANESS
Away, away! 'Tis sport; do not mind it.

NIECE
Give me thy hand; come, be familiar: 175
Ay, here's a promising palm; what a soft Handful of pleasure's here! Here's down compared With flocks and quilted straw; thy knight's fingers
Are lean mattress-rubbers to these feathers:
I prithee, let me lean my cheek upon't; 180
What a soft pillow's here!

CLOWN Hum, umh, hu, hum!

NIECE
Why, there's a courage in that lively passion.
Measure thee all o'er, there's not a limb
But has his full proportion: it is my voice,
There's no compare betwixt the knight and thee; 185
The goodlier man by hall,
At once, now I see thee all over.

CLOWN If you had seen me swim t'other day on my back, you would have said you had seen: there was two chambermaids that saw me, and my legs by chance were tangled in the flags, and when they saw how I was hanged, they cried out, 'O, help the man for fear he be drowned!'

NIECE
They could do no less in pity. Come, thine arm;
We'll walk together. 195

CUNNINGGAME
Blindness of love and women! why, she dotes
Upon the fool.

GUARDIANESS What's that to you? Mind her not.

CUNNINGGAME
Away, you burr!

GUARDIANESS How's that?

CUNNINGGAME
Hang off, flesh-hook! Fasten thine itchy clasp
On some dry toadstool, that will kindle with thee, 200
And burn together.

GUARDIANESS O, abominable!
Why, do you not love me?

CUNNINGGAME No; never did.
I took thee down a little way to enforce
A vomit from my offended stomach; now

137 far-fetched alluding to the proverb 'far-fetched and dear bought is good for ladies' (i.e. women like exotic and expensive gifts)

151–2 I'd...this with a sexual quibble
159–60 Was...a-wooing Venus was of course unfaithful to her husband Vulcan with Mars

162–3 I...forsooth The Clown misunderstands the Niece's praise of his 'rolling' (i.e. sensually languorous) eye, boasting that he can perform the childish trick of rolling up his pupils until they become invisible.

165 You... forsooth The compliment to the Clown's nose might be received with similar ineptitude if he were to wipe it apologetically on this line.

179 mattress-rubbers rough mattress covers
191 flags irises

192 hanged The Clown ostensibly means 'suspended', but with a punning boast of his sexual endowment (compare the modern colloquialism 'well hung').

199 flesh-hook literally, a utensil for lifting meat from a stewpot: Cunninggame's insult thus implies that the Guardianess belongs in the kitchen, as well as accusing her of excessive carnality

200 dry toadstool At this date the word 'toadstool' could be used to refer to mushrooms in general (rather than simply inedible or poisonous varieties), so Cunninggame may well be continuing the stew metaphor he begins with 'flesh-hook', suggesting that the wrinkled flesh of an old, dry mushroom would be more appropriate for the Guardianess to draw out of the pot than his own.
kindle with thee take fire from you (i.e. from your inordinate sexual heat)

- 205 Thou'rt up again, I loathe thee filthily.
 GUARDIANESS
 O, villain!
 CUNNINGGAME
 Why, dost thou not see a sight
 Would make a man abjure the sight of women?
 NIECE Ha, ha, ha! He's vexed. Ha, ha, ha!
 CLOWN Ha, ha, ha!
- 210 NIECE Why dost thou laugh?
 CLOWN Because thou laugh'st; nothing else, i'faith.
 CUNNINGGAME [aside]
 She has but mocked my folly; else she finds not
 The bosom of my purpose: some other way Must make me know. I'll try her, and may chance quit
- 215 The fine dexterity of her lady-wit. Exit
 NIECE
 Yes, in troth, I laughed to think of thy master;
 Now, what would he think if he knew this?
 CLOWN By my troth, I laugh at him too: faith, sirrah, he's but a fool, to say the truth, though I say't that should not say't.
- 220 NIECE
 Yes, thou shouldst say truth, and I believe thee.
 Well, for this time we'll part: you perceive something;
 Our tongues betray our hearts, there's our weakness,
 But pray be silent.
 CLOWN
 As mouse in cheese, or goose in hay, i'faith.
 [Guardianess approaches them]
- 225 NIECE Look, we are cut off: there's my hand where my lips would be.
 CLOWN I'll wink, and think 'em thy lips. Farewell. Exit
 NIECE
 Now, guardianess, I need not ask where you have been.
 GUARDIANESS
 O, lady, never was woman so abused.
 [Re-enter Clown]
- 230 CLOWN Dost thou hear, lady sweetheart? I had forgot to tell thee: if you will, I will come back in the evening.
 NIECE
 By no means; come not till I send for you.
 CLOWN If there be any need (you may think of things when 235 I am gone), I may be conveyed into your chamber. I'll
- lie under the bed while midnight or so, or you shall put me up in one of your little boxes; I can creep in at a small hole.
 NIECE These are things I dare not venture; I charge you on my love, never come till I send for you. 240 CLOWN Verbum insipienti; 'tis enough to the wise: nor I think it is not fit the knight should know anything yet.
 NIECE
 By no means; pray you, go now; we are suspected.
 CLOWN For the things that are past, let us use our secrets.
 NIECE
 Now I'll make a firm trial of your love;
 As you love me, not a word more at this time, 245
 Not a syllable; 'tis the seal of love; take heed.
 CLOWN Hum, hum, hum, hum—
Exit, humming 'Loath to depart'
- NIECE
 So, this pleasant trouble's gone.—Now, guardianess;
 What, your eyes easing your heart? The cause, woman? 250
 GUARDIANESS
 The cause is false man, madam: O, lady,
 I have been gulled in a shining carbuncle,
 A very glow-worm, that I thought had fire in't,
 And 'tis as cold as ice.
 NIECE And justly served;
 Wouldst thou once think that such an early spring 255
 Would dote upon thine autumn?
 GUARDIANESS O, had you heard him
 But protest!
 NIECE I would not have believed him.
 Thou might'st have perceived how I mocked thy folly
 In wanton imitation with the fool.
 Go, weep the sin of thy credulity, 260
 Not of thy loss, for it was never thine,
 And it is gain to miss it. Wert thou so dull?
 Nay, yet thou'rt stupid and incapable:
 Why, thou wert but the bait to fish with, not
 The prey; the stale to catch another bird with. 265
 GUARDIANESS
 Indeed, he called me 'bird'.
 NIECE Yet thou perceiv'st not:
 It is your niece he loves; wouldst thou be made
 A stalking jade? 'Tis she, examine it.
 [Aside] I'll hurry all awry, and tread my path

- GUARDIANESS My niece? She the rival of my abuse?
275 My flesh and blood wrong me? I'll aunt her for't.
Enter Mirabell
O, opportunity, thou blestest me!—
Now, gentlewoman, are you parted so soon?
Where's your friend, I pray? your Cunninggame?
- MIRABELL
What say you, aunt?
GUARDIANESS Come, come, your Cunninggame.
280 I am not blind with age yet, nor deaf.
MIRABELL [aside]
Dumb I am sure you are not.—What, ail you, aunt?
Are you not well?
- GUARDIANESS
No, nor sick, nor mad, nor in my wits, nor sleeping,
Nor waking, nor nothing, nor anything:
285 I know not what I am, nor what I am not.
MIRABELL
Mercy cover us! What do you mean, aunt?
GUARDIANESS
I mean to be revenged.
MIRABELL On whom?
GUARDIANESS On thee,
Baggage!
MIRABELL
Revenge should follow injury,
Which never reached so far as thought in me
Towards you, aunt.
- 290 GUARDIANESS Your cunning, minion,
Nor your Cunninggame, can either blind me:
The gentle beggar loves you.
MIRABELL Beseech you,
Let me stay your error. I begin to hear,
And shake off my amazement: if you think 295 That ever any passage treating love
Hath been betwixt us yet commenced, any Silent eye-glance that might but sparkle fire,
So much as brother and sister might meet with,
The lip-salute so much as strangers might 300 Take a farewell with, the commixèd hands,
Nay, but the least thought of the least of these,
In troth, you wrong your bosom: by that truth
Which I think yet you durst be bail for in me
If it were offered ye, I am as free
- As all this protestation.
GUARDIANESS May I believe this? 305
MIRABELL
If ever you'll believe truth. Why, I thought
He had spake love to you; and if his heart
Prompted his tongue, sure I did hear so much.
GUARDIANESS
O, falsest man! Ixion's plague fell on me:
Never by woman such a masculine cloud, 310
So airy and so subtle, was embraced.
MIRABELL
By no cause in me, by my life, dear aunt.
GUARDIANESS
I believe you: then help in my revenge,
And you shall do't, or lose my love forever.
I'll have him quitted at his equal weapon: 315
Thou art young; follow him, bait his desires
With all the engines of a woman's wit,
Stretch modesty even to the highest pitch;
He cannot freeze at such a flaming beauty;
And when thou hast him by the amorous gills, 320
Think on my vengeance, choke up his desires,
Then let his banquetings be Tantalism:
Let thy disdain spurn the dissembler out.
O, I should climb my stars, and sit above,
To see him burn to ashes in his love. 325
MIRABELL
This will be a strange task, aunt, and an unwilling labour;
Yet, in your injunction, I am a servant to't.
GUARDIANESS Thou'lt undertake't?
MIRABELL
Yes; let the success commend itself hereafter.
GUARDIANESS
Effect it, girl; my substance is thy store; 330
Nothing but want of will makes woman poor. Exeunt
- Enter Sir Gregory and Clown* 2.3
- SIR GREGORY
Why, Pompey, thou art not stark mad, art thou?
Wilt thou not tell me how my lady does?
CLOWN Your lady?
SIR GREGORY Did she receive the thing that I sent her kindly, or no? 5
CLOWN The thing that you sent her, knight, by the thing that you sent, was for the thing's sake that was sent to carry the thing that you sent, very kindly received. First,

271-3 Rare...eminence 'Another cryptic utterance... She would appear to mean that although a rare thing (such as Cunninggame) comes infrequently, its unusual excellence makes it of elevated importance' (Sharp)

with her accusations' (Sharp)
309 Ixion's plague In Greek legend Ixion fell in love with Hera, but his attempt to seduce her was frustrated when she substituted a cloud for herself
315 quitted requited
317 engines inventions, devices
322 Tantalism Tantalus was punished in Hades for betraying the secrets of the Greek gods by being stood up to his neck in water which receded each time he bent to drink it, beneath branches of fruit which withdrew each time he reached up to harvest them.

327 injunction 'authoritative order. Presumably Mirabell is the Guardianess's legal ward' (Sharp)

10 there is your indenture, [handing over a paper] now go seek you a servant; secondly, you are a knight; thirdly and lastly, I am mine own man; and fourthly, fare you well.

SIR GREGORY

Why, Pompey, prithee, let me speak with thee.

[Aside] I'll lay my life some hare has crossed him.

15 CLOWN Knight, if you be a knight, so keep you; as for the lady, who shall say that she is not a fair lady, a sweet lady, an honest and a virtuous lady, I will say he is a base fellow, a blab of his tongue, and I will make him eat these fingers' ends.

20 SIR GREGORY Why, here's nobody says so, Pompey.

CLOWN Whatsoever things have passed between the lady and the other party, whom I will not name at this time, I say she is virtuous and honest, and I will maintain it as long as I can maintain myself with bread and water.

25 SIR GREGORY Why, I know nobody thinks otherwise.

CLOWN Any man that does but think it in my hearing, I will make him think on't while he has a thought in his bosom; shall we say that kindnesses from ladies are common, or that favours and protestations are things of no moment betwixt parties and parties? I say still, whatsoever has been betwixt the lady and the party which I will not name, that she is honest, and shall be honest, whatsoever she does by day or by night, by light or by darkness, with cut and long tail.

35 SIR GREGORY Why, I say she is honest.

CLOWN Is she honest? In what sense do you say she is honest, knight?

SIR GREGORY If I could not find in my heart to throw my dagger at thy head, hilts and all, I'm an ass, and no gentleman!

40 CLOWN Throw your dagger at me! Do not, knight, I give you fair warning; 'tis but cast away if you do, for you shall have no other words of me. The lady is an honest lady, whatsoever reports may go of sports and toys, and thoughts, and words, and deeds, betwixt her and the party which I will not name. This I give you to understand: that another man may have as good an eye, as amorous a nose, as fair a stamped beard, and be as proper a man as a knight (I name no parties);

50 a servingman may be as good as a Sir, a Pompey as a Gregory, a Doodle as a Fop; so servingman Pompey Doodle may be respected as well with ladies (though I name no parties) as Sir Gregory Fop; so farewell. Exit

SIR GREGORY If the fellow be not out of his wits, then will I never have any more wit while I live; either the sight of the lady has gastered him, or else he's drunk, or else he walks in his sleep, or else he's a fool, or a knave, or both; one of the three I'm sure 'tis. Yet, now I think on't, she has not used me so kindly as her uncle promised me she should: but that's all one, he says I shall have her, and I dare take his word for the best horse I have, and that's a weightier thing than a lady, I'm sure on't. Exit

Enter Lady Ruinous (as a man, [with a money-bag]), with Wittypate, Sir Ruinous, Priscian and Credulous [all with their faces disguised by scarves], who are binding and robbing her; Credulous finds the bag

2.4.

LADY

Nay, I am your own, 'tis in your pleasure
How you'll deal with me; yet I would entreat
You will not make that which is bad enough
Worse than it need be, by a second ill,
When it can render you no second profit;
If it be coin you seek, you have your prey,
All my store, I vow (and it weighs a hundred);
My life, or any hurt you give my body,
Can enrich you no more.

5

WITTYPATE

You may pursue.

LADY

As I am a gentleman, I never will—10

WITTYPATE

Only, we'll bind you to quiet behaviour
Till you call out for bail, and on th'other
Side of the hedge leave you; but keep the peace
Till we be out of hearing, for by that
We shall be out of danger; if we come back,
We come with a mischief.

15

LADY

You need not fear me.

PRISCIAN Come, we'll bestow you then.

Exeunt Priscian and Sir Ruinous, with Lady Ruinous

2.3.9 indenture the legal contract binding the Clown to his master, which he seems to think he can cancel simply by thus handing back his copy

14 some hare has crossed him 'A hare crossing a person's way was supposed to disorder his senses' (Dyce)

19 these fingers' ends these knuckles, i.e. my fist

34 cut and long tail from the proverbial phrase 'come cut and long tail', referring to all the varieties of horses or dogs (those with docked and those with uncut tails) and meaning 'no matter who or what is concerned', here with bawdy innuendoes on 'cut' (female genitalia) and 'tail' (male genitalia)

48 stamped beard as Sharp points out, the Clown's inaccurate recollection of the Niece's flattery ('such a stamp | Of manhood', 2.2.170-1)

56 gastered shocked out of his wits, flabbergasted

2.4.11-12 Only...bail Wittypate puns on the legal sense of 'bind', and imagines Lady Ruinous's cries to be released as requests for bail from imprisonment

- WITTYPATE Why, law you, sir, is not this a swifter revenue 20 than sic probos, ergos and igiturs can bring in? Why, is not this one of your syllogisms in Barbara, Omne utile est honestum?
- CRECULOUS
 Well, sir, a little more of this acquaintance
 Will make me know you fully: I protest
 You have (at first sight) made me conscious
 25 Of such a deed my dreams ne'er prompted; yet
 I could almost have wished rather ye'd robbed me
 Of my cloak (for my purse, 'tis a scholar's)
 Than to have made me a robber; I had rather
 Have answered three difficult questions
 30 Than this one, as easy as yet it seems.
- WITTYPATE
 Tush, you shall never come to further answer for't;
 Can you confess your penurious uncle,
 In his full face of love, to be so strict
 A niggard to your commons that you are fain
 35 To size your belly out with shoulder fees,
 With rumps and kidneys, and cues of single beer,
 And yet make dainty to feed more daintily
 At this easier rate? Fie, Master Credulous,
 I blush for you.
- CRECULOUS This is a truth undeniable.
- WITTYPATE
 40 Why, go to, then; I hope I know your uncle;
 How does he use his son, nearer than you?
- CRECULOUS
 Faith, like his jade, upon the bare commons,
 Turned out to pick his living as he can get it.
- WITTYPATE
 45 He would have been glad to have shared in such
 A purchase, and thanked his good fortune too;
Re-enter Sir Ruinous and Priscian
 But mum, no more.—Is all safe, bullies?
- SIR RUINOUS Secure.
 The gentleman thinks him most happy in his loss,
- With his safe life and limbs, and redoubles
 His first vow, as he is a gentleman,
 Never to pursue us.
- WITTYPATE Well, away then;
 50 Disperse, you with master Credulous, who still Shall bear the purchase; Priscian and I
 Will take some other course. You know our meeting;
 At the Three Cups in Saint Giles, with this proviso
 (For 'tis a law with us), that nothing be opened 55 Till all be present. The loser says a hundred,
 And it can weigh no less.
- SIR RUINOUS Come, sir, we'll be your guide.
 CRECULOUS
 My honesty, which till now was never forfeited,
 All shall be close till our meeting.
Exeunt Credulous and Sir Ruinous
- WITTYPATE Tush, I believe't,
 And then all shall out. Where's the thief that's 60 robbed?
Enter Lady Ruinous
- LADY
 Here, Master Oldcraft; all follows now.
- WITTYPATE
 'Twas neatly done, wench; now to turn that bag
 Of counterfeits to current pieces, et actum est.
- LADY
 65 You are the chemist; we'll blow the fire still,
 If you can mingle the ingredients.
- WITTYPATE
 I will not miss a cause, a quantity, a dram.
 You know the place?
- PRISCIAN I have told her that, sir.
- WITTYPATE
 Good. Turn Ruinous to be a constable
 (I'm sure we want not beards of all sorts, from The worshipful magistrate to the under-watchman).
 70 Because we must have no danger of life,
 But a cleanly cheat, attach Credulous

18–59 As Turner points out, Credulous's subsequent recollections at 4.1.111–12 suggest that Wittypate ought perhaps to light up a pipe during this dialogue.

18 law you, sir a favourite interjection of Middleton's, possibly signalling his collaboration in a scene otherwise dominated by Rowley

19 sic...igiturs terms from the Latin rhetoric and logic by which contemporary university syllabi were dominated, literally "Thus-I-proves, therefore and thens"

20 Barbara the first word of a mnemonic by which scholars remembered the different figures and moods of the syllogism ('Barbara, celarent, darii, ferioque prioris')

20–1 Omne...honestum All that is profitable is virtuous (which is of course not actually a syllogism at all, but simply a single proposition)

32 penurious miserly, grudging

34 commons see note on 1.2.266–8

35 size your belly out fill your belly up (with a pun on 'sizing', a Cambridge term for a helping of drink or food from the buttery)
shoulder fees shoulder bones of beef from which the meat had already been removed, good only for broth

36 cues minuscule servings (another university word, from the 'q' entered in college accounts for a quarter-farthing's worth of beer or bread)

single beer small beer, the wateriest grade

37 make dainty show fastidiousness

42 jade old horse bare commons thin communal pasture, with a pun on the university sense employed at l. 34

46 bullies a bluff term for 'good fellows'

54 Three Cups in Saint Giles 'The Three Cups' was a common tavern sign, perhaps chosen here in allusion to the street game in which the operator, usually dishonest, placed a pea or ball under one of three cups, switched them quickly about, and then invited spectators to gamble as to which of the three concealed it. This would sort well with the tavern's location, since the parish of Saint Giles (just north-west of Covent Garden) was a notorious haunt of beggars and thieves: perhaps appropriately it now contains Foyle's bookshop, the Centre Point office development and the guitar shops of Denmark Street.

58 My honesty i.e. by my honesty

63 et actum est and it is done

64 chemist alchemist

66 cause chemical agent

dram small measurement of liquid

72 attach arrest

(The cause is plain, the theft found about him),
 Then fall I in, in his own cousin's shape
 75 By mere accident, where, finding him distressed,
 I with some difficulty must fetch him off
 With promise that his uncle shall shut up all
 With double restitution. Master constable Ruinous
 His mouth shall be stopped; you, Mistress Rob-thief,
 Shall have your share of what we can gull my father 80 of;
 Is't plain enough?

LADY

As plain a cozenage as can be, faith.

WITTYPATE

Father, I come again; and again when this is Past, too, father; one will beget another;
 85 I'd be loath to leave your posterity barren:
 You were best to come to composition, father,
 Two hundred pieces yearly allow me yet,
 It will be cheaper, father, than my wit;
 For I will cheat none but you, dear father. Exeunt

3.1 Enter Old Knight and Sir Gregory

OLD KNIGHT

Why, now you take the course, Sir Gregory Fop:
 I could enforce her an I list, but love
 That's gently won is a man's own for ever.
 Have you prepared good music?

SIR GREGORY As fine a noise, uncle,
As heart can wish.

5 OLD KNIGHT Why, that's done like a suitor;
 They must be wooed a hundred several ways,
 Before you obtain the right way in a woman:
 'Tis an odd creature, full of creeks and windings,
 The serpent has not more; for sh'as all his,
 10 And then her own beside came in by her mother.

SIR GREGORY

A fearful portion for a man to venture on.

OLD KNIGHT

But the way found once by the wits of men,
 There is no creature lies so tame again.

SIR GREGORY

I promise you, not a house-rabbit, sir.

OLD KNIGHT

No sucker on 'em all.

SIR GREGORY

What a thing's that?

They're pretty fools, I warrant, when they're tame
 As a man can lay his lips to.

OLD KNIGHT

How were you bred, sir?

Did you never make a fool of a tenant's daughter?

SIR GREGORY

Never, i'faith; they ha' made some fools for me,
 And brought 'em many a time under their aprons.

OLD KNIGHT

They could not show you the way plainlier, I think,
 To make a fool again.

SIR GREGORY

There's fools enough, sir,

'Less they were wiser.

OLD KNIGHT

This is wondrous rare!

Come you to London with a maidenhead, knight?

A gentleman of your rank ride with a cloak-bag?

Never an hostess by the way to leave it with,

Nor tapster's sister, nor head ostler's wife?

What, nobody?

SIR GREGORY

Well mocked, old wit-monger:

I keep it for your niece.

OLD KNIGHT

Do not say so, for shame, she'll laugh at thee;

A wife ne'er looks for't; 'tis a bachelor's penny,

He may give't to a beggar-wench i'th' progress time,

And never called to account for't. Exit

SIR GREGORY

Would I'd known so much,

I could ha' stopped a beggar's mouth by th' way,

Enter Boy

That railed upon me 'cause I'd give her nothing.—

What, are they come?

BOY

And placed directly, sir,

Under her window.

SIR GREGORY

What may I call you, gentleman?

BOY

A poor servant to the viol; I'm the voice, sir.

SIR GREGORY

In good time, Master Voice.

78–9 Ruinous | His Ruinous's86 composition compromise on which he comments in his next speech. Colley Cibber's 1709 adaptation

The Rival Fools solves this problem by simply altering Sir Gregory's line to 'O, dear! ah! I warrant 'em they're pretty soft Fools when their Clothes are off.'18 make a fool of (a) seduce (b) beget a bastard ('fool') upon19 fools sweet puddings made of stewed fruit puréed with cream22 make a fool in the sense of 'conceive a bastard'25 cloak-bag an encumbrance which someone of Sir Gregory's status would normally get rid of to one of his servants (like, the Old Knight suggests, his virginity)

27 tapster's tavern servant employed to serve drinksostler's stableman32 progress time when crowds gathered to watch a royal procession34 could...mouth with an obscene quibble of which Sir Gregory is probably unconscious36 they the (offstage) musicians who accompany the Boy's song38 viol the six-stringed ancestor of the violin39 Master Voice Sir Gregory mistakes the Boy's description of his part in the music for a surname

Act 3 Scene 1

Wit at feverall Weapons.

BOY
 40 Indeed, good time does get the mastery.
 SIR GREGORY What countryman, Master Voice?
 BOY
 Sir, born at Ely; we all set up in E-la,
 But our house commonly breaks in Rutlandshire.
 SIR GREGORY
 A shrewd place, by my faith, it may well break your voice,
 It breaks many a man's back. Come, set to your 45 business.
 BOY (sings)
 Fain would I wake you, sweet, but fear
 I should invite you to worse cheer;
 In your dreams you cannot fare
 Meaner than music; no compare;
 50 None of your slumbers are compiled
 Under the pleasure makes a child;
 Your day-delights so well compact,
 That what you think turns all to act:
 I'd wish my life no better play,
 55 Your dream by night, your thought by day.
 Wake gently, wake,
 Part softly from your dreams;
 The morning flies
 To your fair eyes,
 60 To take her special beams.
 SIR GREGORY
 I hear her up; here, Master Voice,
 Pay you the instruments; save what you can Enter Niece, above
 To keep you when you're cracked. Exit Boy
 NIECE Who should this be
 That I'm so much beholding to for sweetness?
 [Aside] Pray Heaven it happens right.
 65 SIR GREGORY Good morrow, mistress.
 NIECE
 An ill day and a thousand come upon thee!
 SIR GREGORY
 'Light, that's six hundred more than any almanac has.
 NIECE
 Comes it from thee? It is the mangiest music
 That ever woman heard.

SIR GREGORY Nay, say not so, lady,
 There's not an itch about 'em.
 NIECE I could curse 70
 My attentive powers for giving entrance to't;
 There is no boldness like the impudence
 That's locked in a fool's blood; how durst you do this?
 In conscience, I abused you as sufficiently
 As woman could a man; insatiate coxcomb, 75
 The mocks and spiteful language I have given thee
 Would, o' my life, ha' served ten reasonable men,
 And rise contented too, and left enough for their friends.
 You glutton at abuses, never satisfied!
 I am persuaded thou devour'st more flouts 80
 Than all thy body's worth, and still a-hungred!
 A mischief of that maw; prithee, seek elsewhere;
 In troth, I am weary of abusing thee;
 Get thee a fresh mistress, thou't make work enough;
 I do not think there's scorn enough in town 85
 To serve thy turn; take the court-ladies in,
 And all their women to 'em, that exceed 'em.
 SIR GREGORY
 Is this in earnest, lady?
 NIECE O, unsatiable!
 Dost thou count all this but an earnest yet?
 I'd thought I'd paid thee all the whole sum, trust me; 90
 Thou't beggar my derision utterly
 If thou stay'st longer; I shall want a laugh:
 If I knew where to borrow a contempt
 Would hold thee tack, stay and be hanged thou should'st then;
 But thou'st no conscience now to extort hate from me 95
 When one has spent all she can make upon thee.
 Must I begin to pay thee hire again
 After I've rid thee twice? Faith, 'tis unreasonable.
 SIR GREGORY
 Say you so? I'll know that presently. Exit
 NIECE Now he runs 100
 To fetch my uncle to this musty bargain;
 But I have better ware always at hand,
 And lay by this still when he comes to cheapen.
Enter Cunninggame [below]
 CUNNINGGAME

105 What entertainment he received from her.
 NIECE [aside]
 There's somebody set already, I must to't, I see.—
 Well, well, Sir Gregory,
 CUNNINGAME [aside] Ha, Sir Gregory?
 NIECE
 Where'er you come you may well boast your conquest.
 CUNNINGAME [aside]
 She's lost, i'faith; enough; has Fortune then 110 Remembered her great boy? She seldom fails 'em.
 NIECE
 He was the unlikeliest man at first, methought,
 To have my love; we never met but wrangled.
 CUNNINGAME [aside]
 A pox upon that wrangling, say I still,
 I never knew it fail yet, where'er't came;
 115 It never comes but, like a storm of hail,
 'Tis sure to bring fine weather at the tail on't;
 There's not one match 'mongst twenty made without
 it;
 It fights i'th' tongue, but sure to agree i'th' haunches.
 NIECE
 That man that should ha' told me, when time was,
 120 I should ha' had him, had been laughed at piteously,
 But see how things will change!
 CUNNINGAME (aside) Here's a heart feels it!
 O the deceitful promises of love!
 What trust should a man put i'th' lip of woman?
 She kissed me with that strength, as if she'd meant 125 To ha' set the fair print of her soul upon me.
 NIECE
 I would ha' sworn 'twould ne'er ha' been a match
 once.
 CUNNINGAME [aside]
 I'll hear no more; I'm mad to hear so much.
 Why should I aim my thoughts at better fortunes Than younger brothers have? That's a maid with nothing,
 130 Or some old soap-boiler's widow, without teeth;
 There waits my fortune for me; seek no farther. Exit
Enter Old Knight and Sir Gregory
 OLD KNIGHT
 You tell me things, Sir Gregory, that cannot be;
 She will not, nor she dares not.
 SIR GREGORY Would I were whipped, then.
 NIECE [above, as if to herself]
 I'll make as little show of love, Sir Gregory,
 135 As ever woman did; you shall not know
 You have my heart a good while.

OLD KNIGHT Heard you that?
 NIECE
 Man will insult so soon, 'tis his condition;
 'Tis good to keep him off as long as we can;
 I've much ado, I swear; and love i'th' end
 Will have his course. Let maids do what they can, 140 They are but frail things till they end in man.
 OLD KNIGHT
 What say you to this, sir?
 SIR GREGORY This is somewhat handsome.
 NIECE
 And by that little wrangling that I feigned,
 Now I shall try how constant his love is,
 Although't went sore against my heart to chide him. 145
 SIR GREGORY
 Alas, poor gentlewoman!
 OLD KNIGHT Now you're sure of truth,
 You hear her own thoughts speak.
 SIR GREGORY They speak, indeed.
 OLD KNIGHT
 Go, you're a brainless cox, a toy, a fop
 (I'll go no farther than your name, Sir Gregory, I'll right myself there); were you from this place
 150 You should perceive I'm heartily angry with you;
 Offer to sow strife 'twixt my niece and I?—
 Good morrow, niece, good morrow.
 NIECE Many fair ones to you, sir.
 OLD KNIGHT [aside, to Sir Gregory]
 Go, you're a coxcomb!—How dost, niece, this morning?— 155
 [Aside to Sir Gregory] An idle, shallow fool—Slept'st thou well, girl?—
 [Aside to Sir Gregory] Fortune may very well provide thee lordships,
 For honesty has left thee little manners.
 SIR GREGORY [aside]
 How am I banged o' both sides!
 OLD KNIGHT Abuse kindness!—
 Wilt take the air today, niece?
 NIECE When you please, sir, 160
 There stands the heir behind you I must take.
 [Aside] Which I'd as lieve take as take him, I swear.
 OLD KNIGHT [aside to Sir Gregory]
 La you, do you hear't continued to your teeth now?
 A pox of all such Gregories! what a hand
 Have I with you!
Niece lets fall her scarf
 SIR GREGORY No more, i'feck, I ha' done, sir.— 165
 Lady, your scarf's fall'n down.
 NIECE 'Tis but your luck, sir,

106 set stationed (as a spy). It is not clear here whether the Niece recognizes Cunningame and deliberately sets out to make him jealous, or whether she believes she is deceiving the Old Knight, via an informer, about her opinion of Sir Gregory.

110 great boy fool, simpleton

137 insult in the sense of 'exalt arrogantly over (a defeated adversary)'

148 cox simpleton

158 manners punning on 'manors'

161-2 There . . . swear 'Stated baldly, the Niece would as soon accept a fart from the Old Knight ("the air behind you") as Sir Gregory ("the heir behind you") (Sharp)

163 La you a meaningless interjection

165 i'feck in faith

And does presage the mistress must fall shortly;
 You may wear it, an you please.

170 OLD KNIGHT There's a trick for you.
 You're parlously beloved; you should complain!
 SIR GREGORY Yes, when I complain, sir,
 Then do your worst; there I'll deceive you, sir.

OLD KNIGHT
 You are a dolt; and so I leave you, sir. Exit

SIR GREGORY
 Ah, sirrah mistress, were you caught, i'faith?
 We overheard you all; I must not know
 175 I have your heart; take heed o' that, I pray.
 I knew some scarf would come.

NIECE [aside] He's quite gone, sure.—
 Ah, you base coxcomb, could'st thou come again?
 And so abused as thou wast?

SIR GREGORY How?
 NIECE 'Twould ha' killed
 A sensible man; he would ha' gone to his chamber
 And broke his heart by this time.

180 SIR GREGORY Thank you heartily.
 NIECE
 Or fixed a naked rapier in a wall,
 Like him that earned his knighthood ere he had it,
 And then, refused, upon't ran up to th'hilts.

SIR GREGORY
 Yes, let him run for me; I was never brought up to't, 185 I never professed running i' my life.

NIECE
 What art thou made on? Thou tough, villainous vermin,
 Will nothing destroy thee?

SIR GREGORY Yes, yes, assure yourself,
 Unkind words may do much.

NIECE Why, dost thou want 'em?
 I've e'en consumed my spleen to help thee to 'em;
 190 Tell me what sort of words they be would speed thee,
 I'll see what I can do yet.

SIR GREGORY I'm much beholding to you,
 You're willing to bestow huge pains upon me.

NIECE
 I should account nothing too much to rid thee.

SIR GREGORY
 I wonder you'd not offer to destroy me
 All the while your uncle was here. 195

NIECE
 Why, there thou betray'st thy house; we of the Oldcrafts
 Were born to more wit than so.

SIR GREGORY I wear your favour here.
 NIECE
 Would it might rot thy arm off. If thou knewst
 With what contempt thou hast it, what heart's bitterness,
 How many cunning curses came along with it,
 200 Thou'dst quake to handle it.

SIR GREGORY A pox, take't again then!
 [Aside] Who'd be thus plagued of all hands?

NIECE No, wear't still,
 But long, I hope, thou shalt not. 'Tis but cast
 Upon thee purposely to serve another
 That has more right to't, as in some countries they convey 205
 Their treasure upon asses to their friends;
 If mine be but so wise and apprehensive
 As my opinion gives him to my heart,
 It stays not long on thy desertless arm.
 I'll make thee ere I ha' done not dare to wear 210
 Any thing of mine, although I give't freely;
 Kiss it you may, and make what show you can,
 But sure you carry't to a worthier man.
 And so good morrow to you. [Exit]

SIR GREGORY Hu hum, ha hum.
 I ha'n't the spirit now to dash my brains out,
 215 Nor the audacity to kill myself,
 But I could cry my heart out, that's as good,
 For so't be out, no matter which way it comes.
 If I can die with a fillip, or depart
 At hot-cockles, what's that to any man,
 220 If there be so much death that serves my turn there?
 Everyone knows the state of his own body:
 No carrion kills a kite, but then again
 There's cheese will choke a daw. Time I were dead,
 i'faith,
 If I knew which way without hurt or danger. 225

169 parlously perilously (used here simply as an intensifier, akin to the modern colloquial usage of 'terribly')

176 scarf in the sense of some salving bandage or sling for his own wounded heart

181–3 Or... th'hilts If this is an allusion to a real incident, it has not been identified

190 speed dispatch, kill

193 rid get rid of, dismiss

196 house family, i.e. Sir Gregory is showing that he is a Fop

202 of all hands on all sides, by everybody

207 apprehensive perceptive

219 fillip flicking blow administered with one finger

220 hot-cockles a game resembling blind man's buff, in which a kneeling player with eyes covered tries to guess which other player is administering playful blows from behind

223 No... kite a proverbial phrase generally used in the sense 'a shameless person is invulnerable to shame', more common in the form 'No carrion poisons a crow.' The kite, a bird of prey now confined to a few valleys in Wales, was a common scavenger in the streets of Jacobean

London.

224 There's... daw apparently a contrary proverb, meaning 'everyone has some vulnerable point or Achilles' heel': for the notion of jackdaws as vulnerable to choking (with cheese?), cf. Shakespeare, Much Ado About Nothing, 2.3.241–3, 'just so much as you may take upon a knife's point and choke a daw withal'. This piece of obscure avian lore is additionally appropriate here since the jackdaw was regarded as a foolish bird, and hence 'daw' was slang for 'idiot'.

I am a maiden knight, and cannot look Upon a naked weapon with any modesty,
 Else 'twould go hard with me: and to complain
 To Sir Perfidious the old knight again
 Were to be more abused; perhaps he would beat me
 well,
 230 But ne'er believe me;
Enter Cunninggame
 And few men die o' beating, that were lost too.
 O, here's my friend, I'll make my moan to him.
 CUNNINGGAME
 I cannot tear her memory from my heart,
 235 That treads mine down. Was ever man so fooled
 That professed wit?
 SIR GREGORY O, Cunninggame.
 CUNNINGGAME Sir Gregory,
 The choice, the victor, the town's happy man!
 SIR GREGORY
 'Sniggs, what dost mean? Come I to thee for comfort
 And dost abuse me too?
 CUNNINGGAME Abuse you? How, sir?
 240 With justifying your fortune and your joys?
 SIR GREGORY
 Pray, hold your hand, sir, I've been bobbed enough:
 You come with a new way now, strike me merrily,
 But when a man's sore beaten o' both sides already,
 Then the least tap in jest goes to the guts on him.
 245 Wilt ha' the truth? I'm made the rankest ass
 That ere was born to lordships.
 CUNNINGGAME What? No, sir.
 SIR GREGORY
 I had not thought my body could 'a' yielded
 All those foul scurvy names that she has called me;
 I wonder whence she fetched 'em?
 CUNNINGGAME Is this credible?
 SIR GREGORY
 250 She pinned this scarf upon me afore her uncle,
 But, his back turned, she cursed me so for wearing
 on't,
 The very brawn of mine arm has ached ever since,
 Yet in a manner forced me to wear't still,
 But hoped I should not long; if good luck serve 255 I should meet one that has more wit and worth

Should take it from me; 'twas but lent to me,
 And sent to him for a token.
 CUNNINGGAME [aside] I conceit it.—
 I know the man
 That lies in wait for't: part with it, by all means,
 In any case; you are waylaid about it. 260
 SIR GREGORY
 How, sir, waylaid?
 CUNNINGGAME Pox of a scarf, say I,
 I prize my friend's life 'bove a million on 'em;
 You shall be ruled, sir, I know more than you.
 SIR GREGORY
 If you know more than I, let me be rid on't;
 'Las, 'tis not for my wearing, so she told me. 265
 CUNNINGGAME
 No, no, give me't; the knave shall miss his purpose,
 And you shall live.
 SIR GREGORY I would, as long as I could, sir.
 CUNNINGGAME
 No more replies, you shall, I'll prevent this;
 Pompey shall march without it.
 SIR GREGORY What, is't he?
 My man that was?
 CUNNINGGAME Call him your deadly enemy; 270
 You give him too fair a name, you deal too nobly,
 He bears a bloody mind; a cruel foe, sir,
 I care not if he heard me.
 SIR GREGORY But do you hear, sir?
 Can 't sound with reason she should affect him?
 CUNNINGGAME
 Do you talk of reason? I never thought to have heard 275
 Such a word come from you; reason in love?
 Would you give that no doctor could e'er give?
 Has not a deputy married his cook-maid?
 An alderman's widow one that was her turn-broach?
 Nay, has not a great lady brought her stable 280
 Into her chamber, lay with her horsekeeper?
 SIR GREGORY
 Did ever love play such jade's tricks, sir?
 CUNNINGGAME O, thousands, thousands.
 Beware a sturdy clown e'er while you live, sir.
 'Tis like a housewifery in most shires about us;
 You shall ha' farmers' widows wed thin gentlemen 285

226 maiden knight one who has never fought (with a pun on the sexual sense, too, which continues through the next line)
 232 that were lost too that would be wasted too (since the Old Knight's beating would not prove fatal)
 235 That treads mine down It is not clear whether 'mine' refers to Cunninggame's memory or his heart, or whether 'That' refers back to 'her memory' or 'my heart', but in any case Cunninggame feels trampled down by his perpetual recollection of the Niece.

238 'Sniggs God's nigs (a mild and meaningless oath)
 240 justifying proclaiming as just 241 bobbed both in the sense of 'mocked' and that of 'beaten'
 250 pinned used loosely in the sense of 'fastened' 257 conceit apprehend, get the idea of 260 you . . . it there is an ambush set for you on its account
 268 prevent intercept 278-81 Has not . . . horsekeeper? if these are specific allusions, rather than simply drawn from the general archive of folklore, they have never been conclusively identified 279 turn-broach kitchen servant employed to turn a spit

 282 jade's tricks punning on the equestrian nature of Cunninggame's last example, since the phrase could refer to wilful or perverse behaviour on the part of either women or horses
 283 clown peasant, rustic servant
 284 a housewifery a policy of domestic economy

Much like yourself, but put 'em to no stress,
 What work can they do with small trapstick legs?
 They keep clowns to stop gaps, and drive in pegs,
 A drudgery fit for hinds. E'en back again, sir,
 You're safest at returning.

290 SIR GREGORY Think you so, sir?
 CUNNINGAME
 But how came this clown to be called Pompey first?
 SIR GREGORY
 Pish, one goodman Caesar, a pump-maker, christened
 him;
 'Pompey' he writes himself, but his right name's
 'Pumpey',
 And stunk, too, when I had him; now he's crank.

295 CUNNINGAME
 I'm glad I know so much to quell his pride, sir;
 Walk you still that way. [Aside] I'll make use of this
 To resolve all my doubts, and place this favour
 On some new mistress, only for a try;
 And if it meet my thoughts, I'll swear 'tis I. Exit

SIR GREGORY
 300 Is Pompey grown so malapert? so frampold?
 The only cutter about ladies' honours,
Enter Old Knight
 And his blade soonest out?
 OLD KNIGHT Now, what's the news, sir?
 SIR GREGORY [aside]
 I dare not say but good.—O, excellent good, sir.
 OLD KNIGHT
 I hope now you're resolved she loves you, knight?
 SIR GREGORY
 305 Cuds me, what else, sir? That's not to do now.
 OLD KNIGHT
 You would not think how desperately you angered me
 When you belied her goodness; O, you vexed me
 Even to a palsy.
 SIR GREGORY What a thing was that, sir!
Enter Niece
 NIECE [aside] 'Tis, that 'tis!
 310 As I have hope of sweetness, the scarf's gone:
 Worthy wise friend, I dote upon thy cunning!
 We two shall be well matched; our issue male, sure,
 Will be born counsellors; is't possible?
 Thou shalt have another token out of hand for't;

Nay, since the way's found, pity thou should'st want,
 i'faith.—
 O, my best joy and dearest!
 OLD KNIGHT Well said, niece;
 So violent fore your uncle? What will you do
 In secret then?
 SIR GREGORY [aside]
 Marry, call me slave and rascal.
 NIECE
 Your scarf—the scarf I gave you—
 OLD KNIGHT Mass, that's true, niece,
 I ne'er thought upon that; the scarf she gave you, sir? 320
 What, dumb? No answer from you? The scarf!
 SIR GREGORY
 I was waylaid about it, my life threatened:
 Life's life, scarf's but a scarf, and so I parted from't.
 NIECE
 Unfortunate woman! My first favour too?
 OLD KNIGHT
 Will you be still an ass? No reconciliation 325
 'Twixt you and wit? Are you so far fallen out
 You'll never come together? I tell you true,
 I'm very lousily ashamed on you,
 That's the worst shame that can be.
 [Aside] Thus baiting on him, now his heart's hooked in, 330
 I'll make him, ere I ha' done, take her with nothing.
 I love a man that lives by his wits, o' life!—
 Nay, leave, sweet niece, 'tis but a scarf, let it go.
 NIECE
 The going of it never grieves me, sir.
 It is the manner, the manner— 335
 SIR GREGORY [aside]
 O, dissembling marmoset! If I durst speak,
 Or could be believed when I speak, what a tale
 Could I tell, to make hair stand upright now!
 NIECE
 Nay, sir, at your request you shall perceive, uncle,
 With what renewing love I forgive this.— 340 [Giving a ring to Sir Gregory] Here's a fair diamond, sir; I'll try how long
 You can keep that.
 SIR GREGORY [aside to Niece]
 Not very long, you know't too,
 Like a cunning witch as you are.

287 trapstick a stick about six inches long and two inches thick, tapering from the middle to both ends, used in the child's ball game of tip-cat (favoured by the Ward in Women Beware)

288 stop... pegs the sexual sense is obvious

289 hinds peasants, farm labourers

292 Caesar as incongruously illustrious a name as Pompey, and of course closely associated with it, since Julius Caesar briefly co-ruled the Roman empire with Pompey the Great before the outbreak of the civil wars between them which concluded with Caesar's victory at Pharsalus in 48 BC pump-maker Sharp glosses this term as meaning 'shoemaker', suggesting that the association of the Clown with footwear is appropriate since he is a footman, but the Clown is nowhere referred to as such, and the subsequent pun on 'crank' makes it more likely that goodman Caesar was genuinely a manufacturer of pumping equipment

294 And stunk 'The joke, such as it is, turns on pump as "to fart"' (Turner)

crank arrogant, cocky (with another pun on 'pump')

298 try trial

299 'tis I i.e. that I am the one she intends

300 malapert impertinent

frampold sour-tempered, peevish

301 cutter 'swaggerer, ruffler' (Dyce)

302 blade with a sexual pun for 'penis'

304 resolved convinced

332 o' life as my life

336 marmoset a type of small monkey considered to be lecherous

NIECE (aside to Sir Gregory)
 You're best let him ha' that too.
 SIR GREGORY [aside to Niece]
 So I were, I think, there were no living else,
 345 I thank you, as you have handled the matter.
 SIR GREGORY
 Why, this is musical now, and Tuesday next
 Shall tune your instruments; that's the day set.
 NIECE
 A match, good uncle.
 OLD KNIGHT Sir, you hear me too?
 SIR GREGORY O, very well; I'm for you.
 NIECE [to Sir Gregory]
 350 Whate'er you hear, you know my mind.
Exeunt Old Knight and Niece
 SIR GREGORY Ay, a pox on't, too well! If I do not wonder how we two shall come together, I'm a bear-whelp. He talks of Tuesday next as familiarly as if we loved one another, but 'tis as unlikely to me as 'twas seven year 355 before I saw her. I shall try his cunning: it may be he has a way was never yet thought on, and it had need to be such a one, for all that I can think on will never do't. I look to have this diamond taken from me very speedily; therefore I'll take it off o' my finger, for if it be 360 seen, I shall be waylaid for that too. Exit

4.1 Enter Old Knight and Wittypate

OLD KNIGHT
 O torture! torture! Thou carriest a sting i' thy tail;
 Thou never brought'st good news i' thy life yet,
 And that's an ill quality, leave it when thou wilt.
 WITTYPATE
 Why, you receive a blessing the wrong way, sir,
 5 Call you not this good news? To save at once, sir,
 Your credit and your kinsman's life together?
 Would it not vex your peace, and gall your worth,
 T'have one of your name hanged?
 OLD KNIGHT Peace, no such words, boy.

WITTYPATE
 Be thankful for the blessing of prevention, then.
 OLD KNIGHT Lemme see,
 10 There was none hanged out of our house since Brute,
 I ha' searched both Stow and Holinshed.
 WITTYPATE O, sir.
 OLD KNIGHT
 I'll see what Polychronicon says anon, too.
 WITTYPATE
 'Twas a miraculous fortune that I heard on't.
 OLD KNIGHT
 I would thou'dst never heard on't.
 WITTYPATE That's true too,
 15 So it had ne'er been done. To see the luck on't!
 He was e'en brought to Justice Aurum's threshold:
 There had flown forth a mittimus straight for Newgate,
 And note the fortune too; sessions o' Thursday,
 Jury culled out o' Friday, judgement o' Saturday,
 20 Dungeon o' Sunday, Tyburn o' Monday.
 Misery's quotidian ague, when't begins once,
 Every day pulls him, till he pull his last.
 OLD KNIGHT
 No more, I say, 'tis an ill theme. Where left you him?
 WITTYPATE
 He's i'th' constable's hands below i'th' hall, sir,
 25 Poor gentleman, and his accuser with him.
 OLD KNIGHT What's he?
 WITTYPATE
 A judge's son, 'tis thought; so much the worse, too,
 He'll hang his enemy, and't shall cost him nothing;
 That's a great privilege.
 OLD KNIGHT Within, there!
Enter Servant
 SERVANT Sir?
 OLD KNIGHT
 Call up the folks i'th' hall. [Exit Servant]
 30 I had such hope on him
 For a scholar too, a thing thou ne'er wast fit for,
 Therefore erected all my joys in him;

4.1 composed primarily, along with the remainder of act 4, by Middleton

11 Brute the legendary great-grandson of Aeneas supposed to have founded Britain

12 Stow the historian and geographer John Stow (c.1525–1605); the reference here is to his Annals, or a General Chronicle of England from Brute until the Present Year of Christ 1580 (1580)

Holinshed Raphael Holinshed, compiler of The Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1577, 1587)

13 Polychronicon a Latin history of the universe composed c.1360 by the English monk Ranulph Higden (who appears in Hengist), translated into English by John Trevisa in 1387 and most recently reprinted in 1527

17 Aurum's The name of course means 'gold', suggesting an amenability to bribes

18 mittimus warrant for someone's detention prior to trial
Newgate London's most important prison, on the site of the present-day Old Bailey

20 culled out picked out, chosen. Since Credulous's trial might begin on the first day of the sessions, the Thursday, however, it is possible that the first edition's 'cul'd' is an error for 'cal'd', i.e. 'called', and that Friday would be the day on which the jury considered their verdict rather than the day on which they were selected.

21 Tyburn London's chief gallows, situated at the meeting of the main westward road towards Oxford (now Oxford Street) and the Tyburn stream, the site of the present-day Marble Arch

22 quotidian ague disease from which the sufferer endured a fresh spasm every day
 23 pull his last takes his last breath

- Got a Welsh benefice in reversion for him,
Dean of Cardigan; has his grace already,
35 He can marry and bury, yet ne'er a hair on's face,
Enter Credulous, Sir Ruinous (as a constable) and Lady Ruinous (as a man)
Like a French vicar: and does he bring such fruits
To town with him? A thief at his first lighting?—
O, good e'en to you.
- WITTYPATE
Nay, sweet sir, you're so vexed now, you'll grieve
him,
And hurt yourself.
- 40 OLD KNIGHT Away! I'll hear no counsel.—
[To Credulous] Come you but once in seven year to your uncle,
And at that time must you be brought home too,
And by a constable?
- WITTYPATE O, speak low, sir,
Remember your own credit; you profess
45 You love a man o' wit; begin at home, sir,
Express it i' yourself.
- LADY Nay, master constable,
Show yourself a wise man, 'gainst your nature too.
- SIR RUINOUS
Sir, no dish-porridge; we have brought home
As good men as ye.
- 50 OLD KNIGHT [aside]
Out, a North Britain constable! That tongue
Will publish all, it speaks so broad already.—
Are you the gentleman?
- LADY The unfortunate one, sir,
That fell into the power of merciless thieves,
Whereof this fellow (whom I'd call your kinsman
55 As little as I could, for the fair reverence
I owe to fame and years) was the prime villain.
- OLD KNIGHT
A wicked prime.
- WITTYPATE Nay, not so loud, sweet father.
- LADY
The rest are fled, but I shall meet with 'em;
- Hang one of 'em I will certain, I ha' swore it,
And 'twas my luck to light upon this first. 60
- OLD KNIGHT
A Cambridge man for this? These your degrees, sir?
Nine years at university for this fellowship?
- WITTYPATE
Take your voice lower, dear sir.
- OLD KNIGHT What's your loss, sir?
- LADY
That which offends me to repeat; the money's whole,
sir,
'Tis i' the constable's hands there, a sealed hundred, 65
But I will not receive it.
- OLD KNIGHT No? Not the money, sir,
Having confessed 'tis all?
- LADY 'Tis all the money, sir,
But 'tis not all I lost, for when they bound me
They took a diamond hung at my shirt string
Which fear of life made me forget to hide, 70
It being the sparkling witness of a contract
'T'wixt a great lawyer's daughter and myself.
- WITTYPATE
I told you what he was.—What does the diamond Concern my cousin, sir?
- LADY No more did the money,
But he shall answer all now.
- 75 WITTYPATE There's your conscience,
It shows from whence you sprung.
- LADY Sprung? I had leapt a thief
Had I leapt some of your alliance.
- WITTYPATE Slave!
- LADY
You prevent me still.
- OLD KNIGHT 'Slid, son, are you mad?
- LADY Come, come; I'll take a legal course.
- OLD KNIGHT
Will you undo us all?—What's your demand, sir?— 80
Now we're in's danger too.
- LADY A hundred mark, sir,
I will not bate a doit.

33 Welsh benefice evidence of the Old Knight's stinginess even to his favourite, since Welsh benefices were notoriously unrewarding (indeed we later learn that this one is worth only £10 a year, at 5.2.322). 'For what it may be worth, playing cards for money was one of a number of unbecoming practices resorted to by Welsh clergymen to eke out a living' (Turner) in reversion for him reserved for him to take over on the death of the present incumbent 34 has his grace already has already been ordained
35–6 yet ne'er... French vicar Catholic clerics were encouraged to remain clean-shaven: the Anglican Credulous is so young that he has as yet no beard to shave

48 dish-porridge 'disparagement', pronounced in the Scots accent which is part of Sir Ruinous's disguise and with which the 'porridge' is deliberately in keeping
50 North Britain i.e. Scottish; a topical circumlocution given James I's continuing attempts to negotiate a complete political and legal union between Scotland and England
51 speaks so broad punning on the senses of speaking in a thick accent and speaking abroad, spreading tales at large
57 prime here in the sense of youth, the springtime of life
62 this fellowship the company of the constable, punning on the university sense of the term
71 contract engagement

76–7 I had... alliance 'Leapt' here means copulated with, i.e. married: Wittypate's insult to the ancestors of Credulous's 'victim' provokes 'him' to point out the undesirability of marrying into Wittypate's disgraced family
77 some of your alliance some to whom you are related 78 prevent anticipate
81 in's danger in his danger, at risk from him
A hundred mark A mark was worth two-thirds of a pound, i.e. 13s. 4d.; a hundred marks is equal to £66 13s. 4d. (rounded up by the Old Knight to £67 at l. 90).
82 bate go without, lower my price by doit the smallest and least valuable of all coins

When a man's fame's once poisoned. Fare thee well, lad.

Exeunt Credulous and Servant

145 This is the happiest cheat I e'er claimed share in:
It has a twofold fortune; gets me coin,
And puts him out of grace that stood between me,
My father's Cambridge jewel, much suspected
To be his heir; now there's a bar in's hopes.
Enter Sir Ruinous and Lady Ruinous, [with a purse]

SIR RUINOUS
It chinks, make haste!

150 LADY The Goat at Smithfield Pens.

WITTYPATE
Zo, zo, zufficient.

[Exeunt Sir Ruinous and Lady Ruinous]
Enter Cunninggame
Master Cunninggame!
I never have ill luck when I meet a wit.

CUNNINGGAME
A wit's better to meet than to follow then,
For I ha' none so good I can commend yet;
155 But commonly men unfortunate to themselves
Are luckiest to their friends, and so may I be.

WITTYPATE
I run o'er so much worth going but in haste from
you,
All my deliberate friendship cannot equal.

CUNNINGGAME
'Tis but to show that you can place sometimes 160 Your modesty atop of all your virtues.

Exit Wittypate

This gentleman may pleasure me yet again.
Enter Mirabell [behind]
I am so haunted with this broad-brimmed hat
Of the last progress block, with the young hatband,
Made for a sucking devil of two year old,
I know not where to turn myself.

MIRABELL Sir!

CUNNINGGAME More torture? 165

MIRABELL 'Tis rumoured that you love me.

CUNNINGGAME O' my troth, gentlewoman,
Rumour's as false a knave as ever pissed then,
Pray tell him so from me; I cannot feign
With a sweet gentlewoman, I must deal downright.

MIRABELL I heard, though, you dissembled with my aunt, sir, 170 And that makes me more confident.

CUNNINGGAME [aside] There's no falsehood
But pays us our own some way.—I confess
I feigned with her ('twas for a weightier purpose),
But not with thee, I swear.

MIRABELL Nor I with you, then,
175 Although my aunt enjoined me to dissemble
To right her spleen. I love you faithfully.

CUNNINGGAME [aside]
'Light, this is worse than 'twas.

MIRABELL I find such worth in you
I cannot, nay, I dare not dally with you
For fear the flame consume me.

CUNNINGGAME [aside] Here's fresh trouble,
180 This drives me to my conscience, for 'tis foul
To injure one that deals directly with me.

MIRABELL I crave but such a truth from your love, sir,
As mine brings you, and that's proportionable.

CUNNINGGAME [aside]
A good geometriean, 'shrew my heart.—
185 Why, are you out o' your wits, pretty plump gentlewoman,
You talk so desperately? 'Tis a great happiness
Love has made one on's wiser than another;
We should be both cast away else:
Yet I love gratitude; I must requite you,
I shall be sick else, but to give you me,
190 A thing you must not take, if you mean to live
(For, o' my troth, I hardly can myself),

147 between me i.e. between me and my father's fortune

150 The Goat a widespread tavern sign, perhaps selected because of the association between goats and devilry; no other reference to an inn bearing this name in Smithfield is recorded Smithfield Pens Smithfield Market, London's principal livestock market, whose taverns, full of money-laden buyers and sellers of horses and cattle, attracted pickpockets and cheats of all kinds: the area was popularly known as 'Ruffian's Hall'

151 Zo, zo, zufficient Wittypate jokingly imitates Sir Ruinous's fake Scots accent 151–61 Master Cunninggame... again This short passage of dialogue, which provides the first indication that Wittypate and Cunninggame are acquainted but otherwise does not materially assist the play's narrative, has clearly been added at a late stage of revision to join two previously unconnected scenes: until this point the setting has clearly been within the Old Knight's house, but from here to the end of the act it is apparently in a public street.

162–5 haunted... myself In this slightly confused passage Cunninggame for a second time associates the unwanted attentions of a woman with black magic (see 2.1.19), thinking of Mirabell at l. 162 as 'an evil spirit in a broad-brimmed hat' and at l. 164 as 'a currently harmless but potentially dangerous familiar' (Turner).

162–3 this broad-brimmed... block 'The block of a hat is the form upon which it is made, and hence the fashion of it in general. From the text it would seem that new fashions were frequently invented and sported at a progress of the monarch through the kingdom' (Weber). Broad-brimmed hats were regarded as 'mannish' wear for women, marking them as dangerously liable to take sexual initiatives (as Mirabell does here).

163 young hatband Turner points out that Mirabell appears to have given her out-of-fashion hat a new ('young') band to bring it up to date

164 sucking devil... old alluding to the proverb 'as innocent as a devil of two years old'

167 as false... pissed a familiar collocation, here, as Sharp observes, with a pun on the 'pst' sound of whispered gossip

176 To right her spleen to avenge her anger
183 proportionable commensurate

- 195 No wise physician will prescribe me for you.
Alas, your state is weak; you had need of cordials,
Some rich electuary, made of a son and heir,
An elder brother in a cullis, whole:
'Tmust be some wealthy Gregory, boiled to a jelly,
That must restore you to the state of new gowns,
French ruffs, and mutable headtires.
- MIRABELL But where is he, sir?
200 One that's so rich will ne'er wed me with nothing.
- CUNNINGGAME
Then see thy conscience and thy wit together;
Wouldst thou have me, then, that has nothing neither?
What say you to Fop Gregory the First yonder?
Will you acknowledge your time amply recompensed,
205 Full satisfaction upon love's record,
Without any more suit, if I combine you?
- MIRABELL
Yes, by this honest kiss. [Kisses him]
- CUNNINGGAME You're a wise client
To pay your fee beforehand; but all do so.
You know the worst already; that's the best too.
- MIRABELL
I know he's a fool.
- 210 CUNNINGGAME You're shrewdly hurt, then;
This is your comfort: your great wisest women
Pick their first husband still out of that house,
And some will have 'em to choose, if they bury twenty.
- MIRABELL
I'm of their minds that like him for a first husband,
215 To run youth's race with him, 'tis very pleasant,
But when I'm old I'd always wish a wiser.
- CUNNINGGAME
You may have me by that time. For this first business, Rest upon my performance.
- MIRABELL With all thankfulness.
- CUNNINGGAME
I have a project you must aid me in too.
- MIRABELL
220 You bind me to all lawful action, sir.
- CUNNINGGAME [giving the Niece's scarf]
Pray, wear this scarf about you.
- MIRABELL I conjecture now.
- CUNNINGGAME
There's a Court principle for't; one office must help another;
As, for example, for your cast o' manchets out o'th' pantry
I'll allow you a goose out o'th' kitchen.
- MIRABELL
'Tis very sociably done, sir. Farewell, Performance, 225 I shall be bold to call you so.
- CUNNINGGAME Do, sweet Confidence.
[Exit Mirabell]
If I can match my two broad-brimmed hats—
Enter Sir Gregory
'Tis he, I know the maggot by his head;
Now shall I learn news of him.—My precious chief!
- SIR GREGORY
230 I have been seeking for you i'th' bowling green, Enquired at Nettleton's and Anthony's ordinary,
'T has vexed me to the heart. Look, I've a diamond
here,
And it cannot find a master.
- CUNNINGGAME No? That's hard, i'faith.
- SIR GREGORY
It does belong to somebody: a pox on him,
I would he had it; does but trouble me,
235 And she that sent it is so waspish too
There's no returning to her till't be gone.
- CUNNINGGAME [aside]
O ho!—[Inspecting diamond] Ah, sirrah, are you come?
SIR GREGORY What's that, friend?
- CUNNINGGAME
Do you note that corner sparkle?
- SIR GREGORY Which? which? Which, sir?
- CUNNINGGAME
At the west end o' the collet.
- SIR GREGORY O, I see't now.
240
- CUNNINGGAME
'Tis an apparent mark: this is the stone, sir,
That so much blood is threatened to be shed for.
- SIR GREGORY
I pray?

194 cordials medicines

195 electuary paste made of a medicinal powder crushed in honey or syrup

196 cullis strong broth with which to nourish an invalid

199 French ruffs an expensive form of ruff, deeper and less starched than the usual English variety

mutable headtires changeable head-attire, ample millinery (in contrast to the monotony of Mirabell's apparently unique current hat)

203 Fop Gregory the First a play on 'Pope Gregory the First'

207-8 You're...beforehand spoken ironically. Cunninggame thinks it folly to pay in advance for services one has not yet received, although, as his next words acknowledge, the legal profession compels all its clients to do so.

210 shrewdly severely. 'In the context, "knowingly" seems also intended' (Sharp)

223 cast o' manchets serving of white bread rolls or small loaves

227-8 If...head 'This is the first reference in the text to Sir Gregory's wearing a broad-brimmed hat, but perhaps it is part of his foppish costume from his first entry in Act 1' (Sharp)

230 bowling green Given the play's numerous other references to the area just north-west of the City (St Pancras, Finsbury, Islington), this may be a reference to the popular bowling green at Clerkenwell, now commemorated in the name of Bowling Green Lane (EC1).

231 Nettleton's and Anthony's ordinary eating places now known only from this fleeting reference. An ordinary was a tavern or eating house serving a single 'dish of the day'

240 collet the part of a piece of jewellery's setting visible around the stone

Act 4 Scene 1

Wit at feverall Weapons.

CUNNINGGAME
 A tun, at least.
 SIR GREGORY They must not find't
 I' me, then; they must go where 'tis to be had.
 CUNNINGGAME
 245 'Tis well it came to my hands first, Sir Gregory;
 I know where this must go. [Pockets diamond]
 SIR GREGORY Am I discharged on't?
 CUNNINGGAME
 My life for yours now! (Draws)
 SIR GREGORY What now?
 CUNNINGGAME 'Tis discretion, sir;
 I'll stand upon my guard all the while I ha't.
 SIR GREGORY
 Troth, thou tak'st too much danger on thee still
 To preserve me alive.
 250 CUNNINGGAME 'Tis a friend's duty, sir:
 Nay, by a toy that I have late thought upon,
 I'll undertake to get your mistress for you.
 SIR GREGORY
 Thou wilt not! Wilt?
 CUNNINGGAME Contract her by a trick, sir,
 When she least thinks on't.
 SIR GREGORY There's the right way to't,
 255 For if she think on't once, she'll never do it.
 CUNNINGGAME
 She does abuse you still, then?
 SIR GREGORY A pox! Damnably,
 Every time worse than other: yet her uncle
 Thinks the day holds o' Tuesday; say it did, sir,
 She's so familiarly used to call me 'rascal',
 260 She'll quite forget to wed me by my own name,
 And then that marriage cannot hold in law, you know.
 CUNNINGGAME
 Will you leave all to me?
 SIR GREGORY Who should I leave it to?
 CUNNINGGAME
 'Tis our luck to love nieces; I love a niece too.
 SIR GREGORY
 I would you did, i'faith.
 CUNNINGGAME But mine's a kind wretch.
 SIR GREGORY
 265 Ay, marry, sir, I would mine were so too.
 CUNNINGGAME
 No 'rascal' comes in her mouth.
 SIR GREGORY Troth, and mine
 Has little else in hers.
 CUNNINGGAME Mine sends me tokens

All the world knows not on.
 SIR GREGORY Mine gives me tokens too,
 Very fine tokens, but I dare not wear 'em.
 CUNNINGGAME
 Mine's kind in secret.
 SIR GREGORY And there mine's a hell-cat. 270
 CUNNINGGAME
 We have a day set, too.
 SIR GREGORY 'Slid, so have we, man,
 But there's no sign of ever coming together.
 CUNNINGGAME
 Tell thee who 'tis; the old woman's niece.
 SIR GREGORY Is't she?
 CUNNINGGAME
 I would your luck had been no worse for mildness.
 But, mum, no words on't to your lady.
 SIR GREGORY Foh! 275
 CUNNINGGAME
 No blabbing, as you love me.
 SIR GREGORY None of our blood
 Were ever babblers.
 CUNNINGGAME [giving a letter]
 Prithce, convey this letter to her,
 But at any hand, let not your mistress see't.
 SIR GREGORY
 Yet again, sir?
 CUNNINGGAME There's a jewel in't;
 The very art would make her dote upon't.
 SIR GREGORY Say you so? 280
 [Aside] And she shall see't for that trick only.
 CUNNINGGAME
 Remember but your mistress, and all's well.
 SIR GREGORY
 Nay, if I do not, hang me. Exit
 CUNNINGGAME I believe you.
 This is the only way to return a token:
 I know he'll do't now, 'cause he's charged to'th'
 contrary. 285
 He's the nearest kin to a woman, of a thing
 Made without substance, that a man can find again.
 Some petticoat begot him, I'll be whipped else,
 Engend'ring with an old pair of paned hose
 Lying in some hot chamber o'er the kitchen; 290
 Very steam bred him.
 He never grew where rem in re e'er came;
 The generation of a hundred such
 Cannot make a man stand in a white sheet,
 For 'tis no act in law; nor can a constable 295
 Pick out a bawdy business for Bridewell in't.

243 tun a type of barrel
 244 I' me in me
 251 toy device, trick
 273 Tell thee I'll tell thee
 289 paned hose 'breeches made of different coloured strips or panels, old-fashioned by the early seventeenth century' (Turner)

292 rem in re literally 'with the thing in the other thing': legal Latin phrase for sexual penetration
 294 stand in a white sheet before the rest of the congregation, the ecclesiastical penance for fornication 296 Bridewell a prison mainly devoted to the punishment of female sexual offenders such as fornicators (and prostitutes): the original Bridewell was located at the mouth of the Fleet River close to Blackfriars, but by Middleton's time there were also two similar jails bearing the same name, one at Westminster and one at Clerkenwell

- A lamentable case.
 He's got with a man's urine, like a mandrake.
Enter Clown, as a gallant
 How now? Ha! What prodigious bravery's this?
 300 A most preposterous gallant; the doublet sits
 As if it mocked the breeches.
 CLOWN Save you, sir.
 CUNNINGGAME [aside]
 He's put his tongue in the fine suit of words too.
 CLOWN
 How does the party?
 CUNNINGGAME [aside] Takes me for a scrivener.—
 Which of the parties?
 CLOWN Hum! Simplicity betide thee!
 305 I would fain hear of the party; I would be loath to go Further with her; honour is not a thing to be dallied withal,
 No more is reputation, no, nor fame, I take it; I must not
 Have her wronged when I'm abroad; my party is not
 To be compelled with any party in an oblique way;
 310 'Tis very dangerous to deal with women;
 May prove a lady too, but shall be nameless,
 I'll bite my tongue out ere it prove a traitor.
 CUNNINGGAME
 Upon my life, I know her.
 CLOWN Not by me;
 Know what you can, talk a whole day with me,
 315 You're ne'er the wiser; she comes not from these lips.
 CUNNINGGAME The old knight's niece.
 CLOWN [aside]
 'Slid, he has got her! Pox of his heart that told him!
 Can nothing be kept secret?—Let me entreat you
 To use her name as little as you can, though.
 CUNNINGGAME
 320 'Twill be small pleasure, sir, to use her name.
 CLOWN
 I had intelligence, in my solemn walks
 'Twixt Paddington and Pancridge, of a scarf
 Sent for a token, and a jewel followed,
- But I acknowledge not the receipt of any;
 Howe'er 'tis carrièd, believe me, sir,
 325 Upon my reputation, I received none.
 CUNNINGGAME
 What, neither scarf nor jewel?
 CLOWN 'Twould be seen
 Somewhere about me, you may well think that;
 I have an arm for a scarf, as others have,
 330 An ear to hang a jewel, too, and that's more
 Than some men have, my betters a great deal.
 I must have restitution, where'er it lights.
 CUNNINGGAME
 And reason good.
 CLOWN For all these tokens, sir,
 Pass i' my name.
 CUNNINGGAME It cannot otherwise be.
 CLOWN
 'Sent to a worthy friend.'
 CUNNINGGAME Ay, that's to thee. 335
 CLOWN
 I'm wronged under that title.
 CUNNINGGAME I dare swear thou art:
 'Tis nothing but Sir Gregory's circumvention,
 His envious spite; when thou'rt at Paddington
 He meets the gifts at Pancridge.
 CLOWN Ah, false knight!
 False both to honour and the law of arms! 340
 CUNNINGGAME
 What wilt thou say if I be revenged for thee,
 Thou sit as witness?
 CLOWN I should laugh in state then.
 CUNNINGGAME I'll fob him; here's my hand.
 CLOWN I should be as glad as any man alive to see him well fobbed, sir; but now you talk of fobbing, I wonder 345 the lady sends not for me, according to promise? I ha' kept out o' town these two days, o' purpose to be sent for; I am almost starved with walking.
 CUNNINGGAME Walking gets men a stomach.
 CLOWN 'Tis most true, sir; I may speak it by experience, 350 for I ha' got a stomach six times, and lost it again, as 298 got with begotten by mandrake a poisonous, potentially narcotic plant whose man-shaped root inspired much folklore, of which this line provides, as Sharp observes, a comparatively tame example

 299 bravery's finery's
 300-1 doublet...breeches Although usually of a different material, the doublet was supposed to match the remainder of the costume: the Clown's evidently does not.
 303 scrivener clerk employed to transcribe or draw up legal documents 305-10 I...women The Clown's curious, semi-poetic utterance—appropriately couched in wildly irregular verse—garbles legal terminology with dim recollections of the chivalric code of courtly love.

 320 'Twill...name i.e. compared to the pleasure of using her person
 321 intelligence The source of the Clown's information is never explained, the transparency of the play's plotting in this regard perhaps providing a deliberate joke in itself.
 322 Paddington at this time a rural hamlet, three miles west and about one to the north of the City, not far beyond Tyburn Pancridge The large parish of St Pancras, around two miles east of Paddington, stretched as far north as Highgate and as far south as Gray's Inn, bordering on Islington to the east and Clerkenwell to the south-west: it was at this time sparsely populated and known as a haunt of thieves and other criminals, with a particular reputation as a venue for illicit marriages.

 339-40 Ah...arms further incongruous fragments of chivalry
 343 fob dupe
 344-5 The Clown's lapse back into prose at this point (the preceding dialogue being his only sustained verse in the play) probably signals that Rowley took over the writing from here to the Clown's exit at l. 361-2.

- often as a traveller from Chelsea shall lose the sight of Paul's and get it again.
- CUNNINGGAME Go to her, man.
- 355 CLOWN Not for a million. Infringe my oath? There's a toy called a vow has passed between us, a poor trifle, sir. Pray, do me the part and office of a gentleman; if you chance to meet a footman by the way, in orange-tawny ribbons, running before an empty coach, with a buzzard i'th' poop on't, direct him and his horses toward the New River by Islington; there they shall have me, looking upon the pipes and whistling.
- CUNNINGGAME
A very good note. Exit Clown
This love makes us all monkeys.
But to my work: scarf first! And now a diamond!
These
365 Should be sure signs of her affection's truth;
Yet I'll go forward with my surer proof. Exit
- 4.2 Enter Niece and Sir Gregory
- NIECE
Is't possible?
SIR GREGORY
Nay, here's his letter too;
There's a fine jewel in't, therefore I brought it to you.
- NIECE
You tedious mongrel! Is't not enough
To grace thee, to receive this from thy hand,
5 A thing that makes me almost sick to do,
But you must talk too?
- SIR GREGORY I ha' done.
NIECE Fall back;
Yet backer, backer yet: you unmannerly puppy,
Do you not see I'm going about to read it?
- SIR GREGORY [aside]
Nay, these are golden days, now I stay by't;
10 She was wont not to endure me in her sight at all.
The world mends, I see that.
- NIECE
What an ambiguous superscription's here,—
'To the best of nieces'.
Why, that title may be mine, and more than hers.
- Sure, I much wrong the neatness of his art;
'Tis certain sent to me, and, to requite
My cunning in the carriage of my tokens,
Used the same fop for his.
- SIR GREGORY [aside]
She nodded now to me; 'twill come in time.
- NIECE What's here?
An entire ruby, cut into a heart,
And this the word: Istud amoris opus.
- SIR GREGORY Yes, yes;
I've heard him say that love is the best stone-cutter.
- NIECE
Why, thou saucy issue of some travelling sow-gelder,
25 What makes love in thy mouth? Is it a thing
That ever will concern thee? I do wonder
How thou dar'st think on't. Hast thou ever hope
To come i'the same room where lovers are
And scape unbrained with one of their velvet slippers?
30
- SIR GREGORY [aside]
Love tricks break out, I see.—An you talk of slippers
once,
'Tis not far off to bedtime.
- NIECE Is it possible
Thou canst laugh yet? I would ha' undertook
To ha' killed a spider with less venom far
Than I have spit at thee.
- SIR GREGORY You must conceive,
35 A knight's another manner o' piece of flesh.
- NIECE
Back, owl's-face.
OLD KNIGHT (within)
Do, do.
- NIECE (aside) 'Tis my uncle's voice, that.—
Why keep you so far off, Sir Gregory?
Are you afraid, sir, to come near your mistress?
- SIR GREGORY [aside]
Is the proud heart come down? I looked for this still.
40
- NIECE [aside]
He comes not this way yet.—Away, you dog-whelp!
Would you offer to come near me, though I said so?
I'll make you understand my mind in time:
You run in greedily, like a hound to his breakfast,

352–3 Chelsea...Paul's Chelsea was at this time another separate village, a good four or five miles upriver from the West End proper. The old St Paul's Cathedral, considerably larger and taller than its post-Great Fire successor, was easily the most prominent building in the City (despite the destruction of its immense steeple by lightning in 1561), but would only be intermittently visible from the Chelsea road because of the meanderings of the Thames, which the route followed.

358–9 footman...ribbons 'Orange-tawny' was a particularly ostentatious colour for servants' liveries

359 buzzard at this time regarded as an ignoble, scavenging bird, little better than a kite: presumably a comic mistake on the Clown's part for a heraldic eagle 360 i'th' poop at the stern, on the back.

Whether the Clown is seriously expecting such an expensive messenger or confides these fantastical details with an air of mystery in the hopes of impressing Cunninggame is not clear

360–1 the New River by Islington The New River, constructed between 1609 and 1613, brought water nearly forty miles from Ware in Hertfordshire to a system of reservoirs in Islington (and finally the Round Pond, Clerkenwell), from which it was piped to the City: its inauguration is celebrated by His Lordship's Entertainment and Truth.

- 4.2.9 stay by't persevere
- 12 superscription's the address on the letter
- 14 hers i.e. Mirabell's
- 22 Istud amoris opus A labour of love, for you
- 24 I've...stone-cutter 'Sir Gregory's knowledge of Latin seems to have improved somewhat since 1.2' (Sharp)
- 25 sow-gelder punningly taking up Sir Gregory's 'stone-cutter'
- 26 What...mouth? i.e. what is the word 'love' doing in your talk?
- 31 An If

45 That chops in head and all, to beguile his fellows.
I'm to be eaten, sir, with grace and leisure, Behaviour and discourse, things that ne'er trouble
you:
After I have pelted you sufficiently
I trow you will learn more manners.

50 SIR GREGORY [aside] I'm wondering still
When we two shall come together; Tuesday's at hand,
But I'm as far off as I was at first, I swear.
Enter Guardianess
GUARDIANESS [aside]
Now, Cunninggame, I'll be revenged at large.—
Lady, what was but all this while suspicion
Is truth full blown now; my niece wears your scarf.

55 NIECE Ha!
GUARDIANESS
Do but follow me; I'll place you instantly
Where you shall see her courted by Cunninggame.
NIECE [aside]
I go with greediness: we long for things
That break our hearts sometimes; there's pleasure's misery.
Exeunt Niece and Guardianess

60 SIR GREGORY
Where are those gadflies going? To some junket now:
That same old humble-bee toles the young one forth
To sweetmeats after kind. Let 'em look to't
The thing you wot on be not missed or gone;
I bring a maidenhead, and I look for one. Exit

4.3 Enter Cunninggame, in discourse with a masked gentlewoman in a broad hat and scarfed, and Niece at another door
CUNNINGGAME
Yes, yes.
NIECE [aside]
Too manifest now; the scarf and all.
CUNNINGGAME
It cannot be: you're such a fearful soul.
NIECE [aside]
I'll give her cause of fear e'er I part from her.
CUNNINGGAME
Will you say so? Is't not your aunt's desire too?

NIECE [aside]
What a dissembling crone's that! She'll forswear't
now.
CUNNINGGAME [aside]
I see my project takes; yonder's the grace on't.
NIECE [aside]
Who would put confidence in wit again?
I'm plagued for my ambition, to desire
A wise man for a husband, and I see
Fate will not have us go beyond our stint;
We are allowed but one dish, and that's woodcock;
It keeps up wit to make us friends and servants of,
And thinks anything's good enough to make us husbands.
O, that whore's hat o' thine, o' the riding block,
A shade for lecherous kisses!
CUNNINGGAME Make you doubt on't?
Is not my love of force?
NIECE [coming forward] Yes, me it forces
To tear that sorcerous strumpet from th'embraces!
CUNNINGGAME
Lady?
NIECE
O, thou hast wronged the exquisit'st love—
CUNNINGGAME
What mean you, lady?
NIECE Mine; you'll answer for't.
CUNNINGGAME
Alas, what seek you?
NIECE Sir, mine own, with loss.
CUNNINGGAME
You shall.
NIECE I never made so hard a bargain.
CUNNINGGAME
Sweet lady!
NIECE Unjust man, let my wrath reach her,
As you owe virtue duty. [Cunninggame falls] Your cause trips you.
Now, minion, you shall feel what love's rage is,
Before you taste the pleasure.—Smile you, false sir?
CUNNINGGAME
How can I choose, to see what pains you take Upon a thing will never thank you for't?

45 chops in barges in beguile cheat (of their shares of the food) 47 Behaviour and discourse Politeness and conversation
60 gadflies biting insects which cause cattle to rush frenetically about: used here in a transferred sense, likening the two women's behaviour to that of gadflybitten cows (as in the expression 'to gad about', meaning to have a frantically busy social life)
junket a sweet pudding made from curds and whey; hence a feast or party 61 humble-bee bumblebee, presumably a reference to the Guardianess's shape as well as her figurative sweet tooth toles entices

62 sweetmeats after kind literally the sweet foods appropriate to their natures, but since 'kind' could also mean the urge to procreate the figurative sense is 'sexual pleasure'
63 The thing you wot on 'you know what',

in this case the Niece's hymen
4.3.11 woodcock a proverbially stupid edible bird, hence the term could simply mean
'a fool'
12 It Fate
friends and servants lovers and admirers
(after marriage)
14 o' the riding block see 4.1.163
17 th'embraces thy embraces 23 Your cause trips you i.e. the injustice of your cause trips you

Act 4 Scene 3

Wit at feverall Weapons.

NIECE
How?
[Cunninggame turns 'Mirabell', which proves to be a puppet so dressed]

CUNNINGGAME
See what things you women be, lady,
When clothes are taken for the best part of you!
This was to show you, when you think I love you
not,
How you're deceived still; there the moral lies.
'Twas a trap set to catch you, and the only bait
To take a lady nibbling is fine clothes.
Now I dare boldly thank you for your love;
I'm pretty well resolved in't by this fit,
For a jealous ague always ushers it.

NIECE
Now blessings still maintain this wit of thine,
And I've an excellent fortune coming in thee;
Bring nothing else, I charge thee.

CUNNINGGAME Not a groat, I warrant ye.

NIECE
Thou shalt be worthily welcome; take my faith for't,
Next opportunity shall make us one.

CUNNINGGAME
The old gentlewoman has fooled her revenge sweetly.

NIECE
'Las, 'tis her part; she knows her place so well yonder;
Always when women jump upon threescore,
Love shoves 'em from the chamber to the door.

CUNNINGGAME Thou art a precious she-wit. Exeunt

⦿

5.I Enter Cunninggame at one door; Wittypate, Sir Ruinous, Lady Ruinous, and Priscian at the other

CUNNINGGAME
Friend, met in the harvest of our designs;

Not a thought but's busy.

WITTYPATE I knew it, man,
And that made me provide these needful reapers,
Hooks, rakers, gleaners; we'll sing it home
With a melodious hornpipe. This is the bond:
That as we further in your great affair
You'll suffer us to glean, pick up for crumbs;
And if we snatch a handful from the sheaf
You will not look a churl on's.

CUNNINGGAME Friend, we'll share
The sheaves of gold; only the love-acre
Shall be peculiar.

WITTYPATE Much good do you, sir.
[To Sir Ruinous and Priscian] Away, you know your way and your stay; get you the music ready, while we prepare the dancers.

SIR RUINOUS We are a consort of ourselves.
PRISCIAN And can strike up lustily.

WITTYPATE You must bring Sir Fop.

CUNNINGGAME That's perfect enough.

SIR RUINOUS
Bring all the fops you can, the more the better fare,
So the proverb runs backwards.

Exeunt Sir Ruinous and Priscian

LADY I'll bring the ladies. Exit

WITTYPATE
Do so first, and then the fops will follow;
I must to my father; he must make one.
Enter two servants, with a banquet

CUNNINGGAME
While I dispatch a business with the knight,
And I go with you. Exit Wittypate
—Well said, I thank you.
This small banquet will furnish our few guests
With taste and state enough. One reach my gown;
The action craves it rather than the weather.
[Exit Second Servant]

28.2 puppet a life-sized lay figure (of a type used by dressmakers), masked to conceal anything of its wooden face not hidden beneath the broad brim of Mirabell's hat (which is probably introduced into the play solely for the purposes of this scene)
35 resolved in't convinced of it
44 jump upon arrive at or get near to
45 from the chamber... door with an allusion to the supposedly typical career trajectory of a prostitute, finishing her working life as a door-keeper or pander
5.I Act 5 is primarily Rowley's, but it is full of 'composite' writing in which verbal mannerisms of both playwrights are visible, and is probably the section of the play on which they collaborated most closely

4 Hooks reaping hooks
7 crumbs here meaning 'grains'
9 look a churl on's take a miserly attitude towards us, with a pun on 'churl' as 'rustic', appropriate to the agricultural context
10 the love-acre the field or sphere of love, i.e. the Niece (as opposed to the 'knave's acre', the field of cheating; 'to return by Knave's Acre' was a proverbial phrase meaning 'to return empty-handed, as if cheated on the way home')
11 peculiar private, reserved for a single owner
13 your stay where you are to wait
20 the proverb runs backwards The proverb in question is 'The more the merrier, the fewer the better fare'; the reverse is now the case, Sir Ruinous suggests, because the larger the number of victims who can be brought to their 'party' the better their fare (i.e. the larger their shares of the booty) will be.

22 make one be one of those present
22.1 Enter two servants, with a banquet In Renaissance usage, the banquet was a dessert course after supper, consisting of sweetmeats and fruit. It is not made clear whose servants these are: Cunninggame is too poor to have a household of his own, so presumably we are to infer that this scene takes place in a private room at a tavern.
24 Well said i.e. well done

- FIRST SERVANT
There's one stays to speak with you, sir.
- CUNNINGGAME
What is he?
- FIRST SERVANT
Faith, I know not what, sir; a fool, I think,
30 That some broker's shop has made half a gentleman;
Has the name of a Worthy, too.
- CUNNINGGAME
Pompey, is't not?
- FIRST SERVANT
That's he, sir.
- CUNNINGGAME
Alas, poor fellow. Prithce, enter him.
He will need too, he shall serve for a witness.
Enter Second Servant, with a gown
35 O, gramercy. If my friend Sir Gregory comes,
You know him, entertain him kindly.
[Exit Second Servant]
Enter Clown
O, Master Pompey, how is't, man?
- CLOWN 'Snails! I'm almost starved with love, and cold, 40 and one thing or other. Has not my lady sent for me yet?
- CUNNINGGAME
Not that I hear; sure some unfriendly messenger is employed betwixt you.
- CLOWN I was ne'er so cold in my life. In my conscience, I 45 have been seven mile in length, along the New River:
I have seen a hundred sticklebacks; I do not think but there's gudgeons, too; 'twill ne'er be a true water.
- CUNNINGGAME
Why think you so?
- CLOWN I warrant you, I told a thousand miller's thumbs in it.
50 I'll make a little bold with your sweetmeats.
- CUNNINGGAME
And welcome, Pompey.
- CLOWN 'Tis a strange thing, I have no taste in anything.
- CUNNINGGAME
O, that's love, that distastes anything but itself.
- 55 CLOWN 'Tis worse than cheese in that point. May not a man break his word with a lady? I could find in my heart and my hose too.
- CUNNINGGAME
By no means, sir; that breaks all the laws of love.
- CLOWN Well, I'll ne'er pass my word without my deed to 60 lady, while I live, again. I would fain recover my taste.
CUNNINGGAME Well, I have news to tell you.
CLOWN Good news, sir?
CUNNINGGAME Happy news: I help you away with a rival,
65 your master, bestowed—
CLOWN Where, for this plum's sake?
CUNNINGGAME Nay, listen me.
CLOWN I warrant you, sir, I have two ears to one mouth,
I hear more than I eat; I'd ne'er row by Queenhithe
70 while I lived else.
CUNNINGGAME I have a wife for him, and thou shalt witness the contract.
CLOWN The old one, I hope; 'tis not the lady?
CUNNINGGAME Choke him first! 'Tis one which thou shalt 75 see; see him, see him deceived, see the deceit; only the injunction is, you shall smile with modesty.
CLOWN I'll simper, i'faith, as cold as I am yet. The old one,
I hope!
Re-enter Second Servant
SECOND SERVANT Sir, here's Sir Gregory. [Exit]
80 CUNNINGGAME Ud'so, shelter, shelter; if you be seen, all's ravelled out again. Stand there private, and you'll find the very opportunity to call you forth, and place you at the table.—
[Clown withdraws]. Enter Sir Gregory
You are welcome, sir. This banquet will serve, when it 85 is crowned with such a dainty as you expect, and must have.
SIR GREGORY Tush, these sweetmeats are but sauce to that.
Well, if there be any honesty or true word in a dream, she's mine own, nay, and changed extremely, not the 90 same woman.
CUNNINGGAME Who? Not the lady?
SIR GREGORY No, not to me: the edge of her tongue is taken off, gives me very good words; turned upside-down to me, and we live as quietly as two tortoises, if she hold 95 on as she began in my dream.
CUNNINGGAME Nay, if love send forth such predictions, you are bound to believe 'em. (Soft music) There's the watch-

31 name of a Worthy the Nine Worthies were nine great men, three from the Bible, three from the classics and three from romance, supposed to be the greatest heroes of all time: see Heroes
34 He will need he will be needed
38 'Snails His nails (an oath referring to the nails used in the Crucifixion)
44 New River see 4.1.360-1
45 sticklebacks a species of small fish
46 gudgeons another species of small fish, easily caught and often used as live bait for perch or pike; hence, figuratively, either deceitful baits or gullible simpletons true i.e. fresh, drinkable, with a pun on the sense of 'honest'. The Clown's pessimism about the New River is in marked contrast to the attitude expressed in His Lordship's Entertainment, against which Rowley may be offering a deliberate in-joke here.

48 miller's thumbs small fishes about two inches long, their facetious name alluding to the proverbial dishonesty of millers, who were traditionally supposed to use their thumbs to depress the scales when weighing out the amount of flour to be handed over (so that the farmer received a smaller quantity of flour than he had brought of grain); hence the Clown's punning suspicion that the water will never be 'true'

50 I'll...sweetmeats The Clown eats diligently from this point until at least l. 145-6
53 distastes takes away the flavour of 60 without my deed i.e. before consummation
66 this plum's which presumably the Clown has just picked up to eat
69 Queenhithe a quay on the north side of the Thames between London Bridge and Blackfriars (directly opposite the Bank-side theatres), on which fishmongers cried their wares: the Clown would be detained there indefinitely if he ate all the food he heard about
73 The old one the Guardiansess

- word of her coming; to your practised part now; if you hit it, æquus Cupido nobis. (Both go into the gown)
- 100 SIR GREGORY I will warrant you, sir, I will give arms to your gentry; look you forward to your business, I am an eye behind you. Place her in that chair, and let me alone to grope her out.
[Clown comes forward, and sits at the banquet]
- CUNNINGGAME Silence!—
Enter Mirabell
- 105 Lady, your sweet presence illustrates This homely roof, and as coarse entertainment; But where affections are both host and guest They cannot meet unkindly. Please you sit; Your something long stay made me unmannerly
- 110 To place before you; you know this friend here, He's my guest, and more especially That this our meeting might not be too single, Without a witness to't.
- MIRABELL I came not unresolved, sir, And when our hands are clasped in that firm faith Which I expect from you, fame shall be bold To speak the loudest on't.
[Sir Gregory reaches out his hand from under the gown and clasps hers]
- O, you grasp me Somewhat too hard, friend.
- CUNNINGGAME That's love's eager will; I'll touch it gentlier. (Kisses her hand)
- MIRABELL That's too low in you, 'Less it be doubly recompensed in me. (She kisses [Sir Gregory's] hand)
- CLOWN [aside]
- 120 Puh, I must stop my mouth, I shall be choked else.
- CUNNINGGAME Come, we'll not play and trifle with delays; We met to join these hands, and willingly I cannot leave it till confirmation.
- MIRABELL One word first, how does your friend, kind Sir Gregory?
- CUNNINGGAME Why do you mention him? You love him not? 125
- MIRABELL I shall love you the less if you say so, sir; In troth, I love him, but 'tis you deceive him. This flattering hand of yours does rob him now, Now you steal his right from him; and I know I shall have hate for't, his hate extremely. 130
- CUNNINGGAME Why, I thought you had not come so weakly armed; Upon my life, the knight will love you for't, Exceedingly love you, forever love you.
- MIRABELL Ay, you'll persuade me so.
- CUNNINGGAME Why, he's my friend, And wishes me a fortune equal with him; I know, and dare speak it for him. 135
- MIRABELL O, this hand Betrays him. You might remember him in some Courtesy yet, at least.
- CUNNINGGAME I thank your help in't; Here's to his health, where'er he be. [Drinks]
- MIRABELL I'll pledge it, were it against my health. [Drinks]
- CLOWN [aside] O, o! 140
- My heart hops after twelve mile a day upon a good return. Now could I walk three hundred mile afoot, and laugh forwards and backwards.
- MIRABELL You'll take the knight's health, sir?
- CLOWN Yes, yes, forsooth.— [Aside] O, my sides! Such a banquet once a week would make me grow fat in a fortnight. 145
- CUNNINGGAME Well, now to close our meeting with the close Of mutual hands and hearts, thus I begin:
[Sir Gregory's hand takes Mirabell's again]
- Here in Heaven's eye, and all love's sacred powers (Which in my prayers stand propitious), 150 I knit this holy handfast, and with this hand The heart that owes this hand, ever binding

99 æquus Cupido nobis Cupid deals justly with us
Both go into the gown Sir Gregory must stand or half-crouch under the gown behind Cunninggame, who holds his arms concealed by his sides while Sir Gregory reaches his own around him and out through the sleeves. Previous editors have imagined Cunninggame sitting in Sir Gregory's lap, but this would make some of the remaining action in the scene extremely awkward.

100-1 arms to your gentry Sir Gregory puns that he is ennobling Cunninggame by lending him his arms (in the heraldic sense as well as the literal)

105 illustrates beautifies
110 To place before you to seat your fellow guest at the table before your arrival
114-16 And...on't A 'handfast' exchange of betrothal vows before one or more witnesses was regarded as legally binding; although the vows were more important in law than the clasping of hands which accompanied them, the custom provides the cue for the elaborate comic references to hands and comic pieces of stage business involving them which continue from here to l. 168.
119 'Less Unless
141 after twelve mile a day at a rate of twelve miles a day (an allusion, according to Turner, to the comedian Will Kemp's famous nine-days' jig from London to Norwich in 1600, which covered the ground at about this speed). The Clown's amusement has more than cured his earlier exhaustion from walking seven miles along the New River (5.1.43-4).

141-2 upon a good return for a good price (possibly, as Sharp suggests, such another jest as this)
143 forwards and backwards all the way and all the way back 152 owes owns

155 By force of this initiating contract
 Both heart and hand in love, faith, loyalty,
 Estate, or what to them belongs, in all the dues,
 Rights, and honours of a faithful husband;
 And this firm vow henceforth till death to stand
 Irrevocable, sealed both with heart and hand.

MIRABELL
 Which thus I second; but, O, Sir Gregory!

CUNNINGAME
 160 Again? This interposition's ill, believe me.

MIRABELL
 Here in Heaven's eye, and all love's sacred powers,
 I knit this holy handfast, and with this hand
 The heart that owes this hand, ever binding
 Both heart and hand in love, honour, loyalty,
 165 Estate, or what to them belongs, in all the dues,
 Rights, and duties of a true faithful wife;
 And this firm vow henceforth till death to stand
 Irrevocable, sealed both with heart and hand.

SIR GREGORY A full agreement on both parts.

CUNNINGAME Ay, here's witness of that.

SIR GREGORY [emerging from the gown] Nay, I have over-reached you, lady, and that's much, for any knight in England to overreach a lady.

MIRABELL
 I rejoice in my deceit; I am a lady now,
 I thank you, sir.

175 CLOWN Good morrow, Lady Pop.

SIR GREGORY 'Snails, I'm gulled, made a worshipful ass!
 This is not my lady.

CUNNINGAME
 But it is, sir, and true as your dream told you
 That your lady was become another woman.

180 SIR GREGORY I'll have another lady, sir, if there were no more ladies in London! Blind-man's buff is an unlawful game.

CUNNINGAME
 Come, down on your knees first, and thank your stars.

SIR GREGORY A fire of my stars! I may thank you, I think.

CUNNINGAME
 185 So you may pray for me, and honour me,
 That have preserved you from a lasting torment
 For a perpetual comfort; did you call me friend?

SIR GREGORY I pray pardon me for that; I did miscall you,
 I confess.

CUNNINGAME
 And should I, receiving such a thankful name,
 190 Abuse it in the act? Should I see my friend
 Baffled, disgraced, without any reverence
 To your title, to be called 'slave', 'rascal'?
 Nay, cursed to your face, fooled, scorned, beaten down
 With a woman's peevish hate, yet I should stand 195 And suffer you to be lost, cast away?
 I would have seen you buried quick first,
 Your spurs of knighthood to have wanted rowels
 And to be kicked from your heels. 'Slave', 'rascal'?
 Hear this tongue.

200 MIRABELL
 My dearest love, sweet knight, my lord, my husband.

CUNNINGAME
 So; this is not 'slave' and 'rascal', then.

MIRABELL
 What shall your eye command, but shall be done
 In all the duties of a loyal wife?

CUNNINGAME Good, good.

205 SIR GREGORY Are not curses fitter for you? Were't not better
 Your head were broke with the handle of a fan,
 Or your nose bored with a silver bodkin?

MIRABELL
 Why, I will be a servant in your lady.

CUNNINGAME
 Pox, but you shall not!—[To Sir Gregory] She's too good for you.—
 210 [To Mirabell] This contract shall be a nullity. I'll break't off,
 And see you better bestowed.

SIR GREGORY 'Slid, but you shall not, sir! She's mine own, and I am hers, and we are one another's lawfully, and let me see him that will take her away by the civil law.
 215 If you be my friend, keep you so; if you have done me a good turn, do not hit me i'th' teeth with't, that's not the part of a friend.

CUNNINGAME If you be content—

SIR GREGORY Content? I was never in better contention in 220 my life. I'll not change her for both the Exchanges, New or the Old.—Come, kiss me boldly.
 [Sir Gregory and Mirabell kiss]

CLOWN Give you joy, sir!

SIR GREGORY O sir, I thank you as much as though I 225 did. You are beloved of ladies; you see we are glad

153 initiating contract As Turner points out, the ceremony performed here constitutes a spousal de presenti, the beginning of the process of being married rather than its completion; at the conclusion of such a betrothal the parties still had to go through the marriage service in church and consummate before the marriage was fully established (although the parties here perform these last two stages in reverse order; see ll. 245–8). However, if after a spousal de presenti either party married someone else, that subsequent marriage would be dissolved as unlawful.

 166 duties In becoming a wife, Mirabell acquires 'duties' in contrast to her husband's 'honours', 156
 181–2 Blind-man's... game Sir Gregory recognizes that the betrothal is not legally binding due to his deception as to the identity of the bride
 197 quick alive
 198 rowels the spiked discs at the ends of a pair of spurs

214–15 we are... law Sir Gregory changes his mind about the legality of the proceedings
 220 contention 'Presumably a malapropism. Sir Gregory means "contentment"' (Sharp)
 221 both the Exchanges The Royal Exchange at Cornhill dated from 1567; its rival the New Exchange in the Strand had opened in 1609.
 225 we Sir Gregory grandly uses the royal first person plural of under-women.

CLOWN Ladies? Let not ladies be disgraced: you are as it were a married man, and have a family, and for the party's sake that was unnamed before, being peascod time, I am appeased; yet I would wish you make a ruler of your tongue.

230

CUNNINGGAME
Nay, no dissension here, I must bar that.
[To Sir Gregory] And this, friend, I entreat you, and be advised:

235 Let this private contract be yet concealed,
And still support a seeming face of love
Unto the lady. Mark how it avails you
And quits all her scorns: her uncle is now hot
In pursuit of the match, and will enforce her
Bend her proud stomach, that she shall proffer
240 Herself to you, which when you have flouted
And laughed your fill at, you shall scorn her off
With all your disgraces trebled upon her,
For there the pride of all her heart will bow,
When you shall foot her from you, not she you.

245 SIR GREGORY Good, i'faith, I'll continue it: I'd fain laugh at the old fellow too, for he has abused me as scurvily as his niece.—My knighthood's upon the spur: we'll go to bed, and then to church as fast as we can.

Exeunt Sir Gregory and Mirabell

CLOWN I do wonder I do not hear of the lady yet.

250 CUNNINGGAME The good minute may come sooner than you are aware of; I do not think but 'twill ere night yet, as near as 'tis.

CLOWN Well, I will go walk by the New River in that meditation; I am o'er shoes, I'm sure, upon the dry 255 bank. This gullery of my master will keep me company this two hours too; if love were not an enemy to laughter I should drive away the time well enough.
You know my walk, sir: if she sends, I shall be found angling, for I will try what I can catch for luck sake, I 260 will fish fair for't.
O knight, that thou should'st be gulled so! Ha, ha! it does me good at heart,
But O, lady, thou tak'st down my merry part. Exit
Enter Wittypate

WITTYPATE
Friend!

CUNNINGGAME
Here, friend.

WITTYPATE All's afoot, and will go smooth away;
The woman has conquered the women, they are 265 gone,
Which I have already complained to my father,

Suggesting that Sir Gregory is fall'n off
From his charge, for neglects and ill usage,
And that he is most violently bent
On Gentry's wife (whom I have called a widow), 270 And that without most sudden prevention
He will be married to her.

CUNNINGGAME Foot, all this is wrong!
This wings his pursuit, and will be before me;
I am lost for ever. [Leaving]

WITTYPATE No, stay, you shall not go
275 But with my father: on my wit let it lie;
You shall appear a friendly assistant
To help in all affairs, and in execution
Help yourself only.

CUNNINGGAME Would my belief were strong
In this assurance!

WITTYPATE You shall credit it,
280 And my wit shall be your slave if it deceive you.
Enter Old Knight
My father—

OLD KNIGHT
O sir, you are well met; where's the knight, your friend?

CUNNINGGAME Sir, I think your son has told you—

WITTYPATE
Shall I stand to tell't again? I tell you, he loves,
But not my kinswoman: her base usage,
285 And your slack performance, which he accuses most Indeed, has turned the knight's heart upside down.

OLD KNIGHT
I'll curb her for't: can he be but recovered
He shall have her, and she shall be dutiful,
And love him as a wife too.

CUNNINGGAME With that condition, sir,
290 I dare recall him were he entered the church,
So much interest of love I assure in him.

OLD KNIGHT
Sir, it shall be no loss to you if you do.

WITTYPATE
Ay, but these are words still; will not the deeds be wanting
At the recovery, if it should be again?
295

OLD KNIGHT
Why, here, fool, I am provided: [showing a purse] five hundred in earnest
Of the thousands in her dower. But were they married
once,
I'd cut him short enough; that's my agreement.

WITTYPATE
Ay, now I perceive some purpose in you, father.

227-8 as it were see note to l. 153 above 229-30 peascod...appeased clearly with a pun on 'peascod' and 'appeased'; the Clown is letting Sir Gregory off on the grounds either that it is literally the time of year when peas are harvested, or in the figurative sense that Sir Gregory is young

237 quits requites
247 My...upon the spur with a sexual quibble
247-8 we'll...can see note to l. 153 above 254-5 o'er shoes...dry bank alluding to the phrase 'over shoes in love'
272 Foot by Christ's foot

273 and will be before me i.e. and the Old Knight will get to the Niece before Cunninggame can
296-7 five hundred...dower The Old
Knight hopes to buy back Sir Gregory as a nephew-in-law by paying him an advance on the Niece's dowry

300 OLD KNIGHT But wherefore is she then stol'n out of doors
To him?
WITTYPATE To him? O, fie upon your error!
She has another object, believe it, sir.
OLD KNIGHT I never could perceive it.
CUNNINGGAME I did, sir, and to her shame I should speak it,
305 To my own sorrow I saw it; dalliance,
Nay, dotage, with a very clown, a fool.
OLD KNIGHT Wit and wantonness, nothing else, nothing else.
She love a fool? She'll sooner make a fool
Of a wise man.
CUNNINGGAME Ay, my friend complains so.
310 Sir Gregory says flatly she makes a fool of him,
And these bold circumstances are approved;
Favours have been sent by him, yet he ignorant
Whither to carry 'em; they have been understood
And taken from him; certain, sir, there is 315 An unsuspected fellow lies concealed,
What or where'er he is; these slight neglects
Could not be of a knight else.
OLD KNIGHT Well, sir, you
Have promised (if we recover him unmarried)
To salve all these old bruises?
CUNNINGGAME I'll do my best, sir.
OLD KNIGHT I shall thank you costly, sir, and kindly too.
320 WITTYPATE Will you talk away the time here, sir, and come Behind all your purposes?
OLD KNIGHT Away, good sir!
WITTYPATE Then stay a little, good sir, for my advice.
Why, father, are you broke, your wit beggared, 325 Or are you at your wit's end, or out of Love with wit? No trick of wit to surprise
Those designs, but with open hue and cry
For all the world to talk on? This is strange;
You were not wont to slubber a project so.
OLD KNIGHT Can you help at a pinch now, show yourself
330 My son? Go to, I leave this to your wit,
Because I'll make a proof on't.
WITTYPATE 'Tis thus, then:

I have had late intelligence they are now
Buxom as Bacchus' frows, revelling, dancing,
335 Telling the music's numbers with their feet,
Awaiting the meeting of premonished friends,
That's questionless, little dreading you.
Now, sir, with a dextrous trick indeed, sudden
And sufficient, were well to enter on 'em
As something like the abstract of a masque.
340 What though few persons? If best for our purpose
That commends the project.
OLD KNIGHT This takes up time.
WITTYPATE Not at all; I can presently furnish
With loose disguises that shall fit that scene.
OLD KNIGHT Why, what wants then?
WITTYPATE Nothing but charge of music;
345 That must be paid, you know.
OLD KNIGHT That shall be my charges; I'll pay the music,
Whate'er it cost.
WITTYPATE And that shall be all your charge.
Now on, I like it, there will be wit in't, father.
Exeunt Wittypate and Old Knight
CUNNINGGAME I will neither distrust his wit nor friendship;
350 Yet if his master-brain should be o'erthrown,
My resolution now shall seize mine own. Exit

Enter Niece, Lady Ruinous, Guardianess, Sir Ruinous, and Priscian, [the latter pair] with instruments, masked 5.2

LADY Nay, let's have music; let that sweet breath, at least,
Give us her airy welcome; 'twill be the best,
I fear, this ruined receptacle will yield,
But that most freely.
NIECE [aside to Lady Ruinous] My welcome follows me,
5 Else I am ill come hither; you assure me still Master Cunninggame will be here, and that it was His kind entreaty that wished me meet him?
LADY Else let me be that shame unto my sex
That all belief may fly 'em.
NIECE Continue still
10 The knight's name unto my guardianess,

307 wantonness sportiveness, playfulness
313 understood recognized through inside information
329 slubber spoil or bungle
334 Buxom merry, lively
Bacchus' frows 'Frow' is the English form of 'frau', a woman; 'Bacchus' frows' are thus Mænads or Bacchantes, the orgiastic priestesses of the wine-god Bacchus 335 Telling . . . feet The dancing party Wittypate describes takes place at the home of Sir and Lady Ruinous; see 5.2.1-4

336 premonished forewarned, tipped off
5.2 The opening passage of this scene, recognizably providing a glimpse of the Lady Ruinous of Middleton's 2.1, is probably Middleton's alone, although elsewhere Rowley seems to have done the bulk of the writing in this scene
0.3 instruments violins or viols; see l. 86, where the musicians are referred to as 'fiddlers'

1-4 Lady Ruinous's command is obeyed, and music plays throughout the ensuing dialogue (see l. 38), unless the 'musicians' busy themselves with setting or tuning up and do not start to play until after Sir Ruinous's speech at ll. 14-15 (which, however, he might perhaps deliver while playing). The actors playing Priscian and Sir Ruinous must be capable either of playing the violin or of miming to an offstage consort.

Act 5 Scene 2

Wit at feverall Weapons.

She expects no other.

LADY —He will, he will, assure you
 Lady, Sir Gregory will be here, and suddenly;
 This music fore-ran him; is't not so, consorts?

15 SIR RUINOUS Yes, lady; he stays on some device to bring along, such a labour he was busy in; some witty device.

NIECE 'Twill be long ere he come then, for wit's a great labour to him.

GUARDIANESS Well, well, you'll agree better one day.

NIECE Scarce two, I think.

GUARDIANESS

20 Such a mock-beggar suit of clothes as led me
 Into the fool's pair-o'-dice, with deuce ace,
 He that would make me Mistress Cun, Cun, Cunny
 (He's quite out of my mind, but I shall ne'er Forget him while I have a hole in my head),

25 Such a one I think would please you better, though
 He did abuse you.

LADY Fie, speak well of him now,
 Your niece has quitted him.

GUARDIANESS I hope she has,
 Else she loses me for ever; but for Sir Gregory,
 Would he were come; I shall ill answer this Unto your uncle else.

30 NIECE You know 'tis his pleasure
 I should keep him company.

GUARDIANESS Ay, and should be your own
 If you did well too. Lord, I do wonder
 At the niceness of you ladies nowadays.
 They must have husbands with so much wit, forsooth.

35 Worship and wealth were both wont to be in Better request, I'm sure; I cannot tell,
 But they get ne'er the wiser children, that I see.

LADY
 La, la, la, la, sol. This music breathes in vain:
 Methinks 'tis dull to let it move alone,
 40 Let's have a female motion; 'tis in private,
 And we'll grace't ourselves, however it deserves.

NIECE
 What say you, guardianess?

GUARDIANESS 'Las, I'm weary with the walk;
 My jaunting days are done.

LADY
 Come, come, we'll fetch her in by course, or else
 She shall pay the music. 45

GUARDIANESS
 Nay, I'll have a little for my money, then.
 [They put on masks, and] dance. A cornet sounds

LADY
 Hark! Upon my life, the knight. [Aside to Niece] 'Tis your friend,
 This was the warning-piece of his approach.
 Enter Old Knight, Wittypate and Cunninggame, masked, who take [the three women] to dance

LADY [to her partner, the Old Knight] Ha? No words but mum? Well then, we shall need no counsel-keeping. 50

NIECE [to her partner, Cunninggame] Cunninggame?

CUNNINGGAME Yes: fear nothing.

NIECE Fear? Why do you tell me of it?

CUNNINGGAME Your uncle's here.

NIECE Ay me! 55

CUNNINGGAME Peace!

OLD KNIGHT [aside to Wittypate] We have caught 'em.

WITTYPATE Thank my wit, father.

GUARDIANESS [aside to Niece] Which is the knight, think
 you? 60

NIECE
 I know not; he will be found when he speaks;
 No mask can disguise his tongue.

WITTYPATE [aside to Old Knight] Are you charged?

OLD KNIGHT Are you awake?

WITTYPATE I'm answered in a question. 65

CUNNINGGAME [to Niece]
 Next change we meet, we loose our hands no more.

NIECE
 Are you prepared to tie 'em?

CUNNINGGAME Yes.
 [To Guardianess, imitating Sir Gregory's voice] You must go with me.

GUARDIANESS Whither, sir? Not from my charge, believe
 70 me.

CUNNINGGAME She goes along.

NIECE [aside to Cunninggame] Will you venture, and my uncle here?

14 device witty and fanciful idea, conceit
 20 mock-beggar misleadingly wealthy-looking 21 pair-o'-dice hackneyed pun on 'paradise' deuce ace here, 'nothing'; worthless throw of the dice giving a two ('deuce') with one die and a one ('ace') with the other
 22-4 Cun, Cun...head the obvious obscen-eity of 'Cunny' is taken up by the 'hole' at l. 24; 'I shall never forget him while I have a hole in my head' ostensibly means 'I shall never forget him all my life (while I still have a mouth to breathe by)', but punningly suggests 'I shall be reminded of him whenever I think of a vagina'. Sharp suggests the player would pause lewdly after the word 'hole'.

 38 La...sol Lady Ruinous sings along with the music
 44 by course in due course
 46.1 cornet at this time, a wooden rather than brass instrument, with finger holes rather than valves
 50 counsel-keeping secrecy. 'In a masqued ball the identities of the dancers were meant to be kept secret until unmasking time. Often this involved conspiracy between participants who had, in fact, recognized each other' (Sharp) 63 charged supplied with money (akin to the modern slang usage of 'loaded') 66 Next change we meet Appropriately to the entire Niece-Cunninggame plot of the play, the dance involves the repeated exchange of partners. A 'change' is a finite phase or passage of a set dance.

75 CUNNINGAME His stay's prepared for.
Exeunt Cunningame and Niece
 GUARDIANESS 'Tis the knight, sure; I'll follow. Exit
[Music continues, then stops]
 OLD KNIGHT How now, the music tired before us?
 SIR RUINOUS Yes, sir, we must be paid now.
 WITTYPATE O, that's your charge, father.
 OLD KNIGHT
 80 But stay, where are our wanton ladies gone?
 Son, where are they?
 WITTYPATE Only changed the room in a change, that's all,
 sure.
 OLD KNIGHT
 I'll make 'em all sure else, and then return to you.
 SIR RUINOUS
 You must pay for your music first, sir.
 85 OLD KNIGHT Must?
 Are there musty fiddlers? Are beggars choosers now?
 Ha! Why, Wittypate, son, where am I?
 WITTYPATE
 You were dancing e'en now, in good measure, sir,
 Is your health miscarried since? What ail you, sir?
 OLD KNIGHT
 90 Death, I may be gulled to my face! Where's my niece?
 What are you?
 LADY [unmasking] None of your niece, sir.
[Sir Ruinous and Priscian produce pistols]
 OLD KNIGHT
 How now! Have you loud instruments too? I'll hear
 No more, I thank you. What have I done, trow, 95 To bring these fears about me? Son, where am I?
 WITTYPATE
 Not where you should be, sir; you should be paying
 For your music, and you are in a maze.
 OLD KNIGHT
 O, is't so? Put up, put up, I pray you;
 Here's a crown for you.
 LADY Pish, a crown?
 SIR RUINOUS and PRISCIAN Ha, ha, ha! A crown!
 OLD KNIGHT
 100 Which way do you laugh? I have seen a crown
 Has made a consort laugh heartily.
 WITTYPATE Father,
 To tell you truth, these are no ordinary Musicians; they expect a bounty
 Above their punctual desert.

OLD KNIGHT
 A pox on your punks, and their deserts too!
 Am I not cheated all this while, think you?
 Is not your pate in this?
 WITTYPATE If you be cheated,
 You are not to be indicted for your own goods:
 Here you trifle time, to market your bounty
 And make it base, when it must needs be free
 110 For aught I can perceive.
 OLD KNIGHT Will you know the lowest price, sir?
 WITTYPATE That I will, sir, with all my heart.
[Wittypate talks apart to Sir Ruinous, Lady Ruinous and Priscian]
 OLD KNIGHT
 Unless I was discovered, and they now fled
 Home again for fear, I am absolutely beguiled, 115 That's the best can be hoped for.
 WITTYPATE Faith, 'tis somewhat too dear yet, gentlemen.
 SIR RUINOUS There's not a denier to be bated, sir.
 OLD KNIGHT Now, sir, how dear is it?
 WITTYPATE Bate but the t'other ten pound?
 120 PRISCIAN Not a bawbee, sir.
 OLD KNIGHT How? Bate ten pound? What's the whole sum, then?
 WITTYPATE
 Faith, sir, a hundred pound; with much ado
 I got fifty bated, and faith, father, to say truth,
 125 'Tis reasonable for men of their fashion.
 OLD KNIGHT
 La, la, la, down a hundred pound? La, la, la!
 You are a consort of thieves, are you not?
 WITTYPATE
 No, musicians, sir, I told you before.
 OLD KNIGHT Fiddle faddle!
 130 Is't not a robbery? a plain robbery?
 WITTYPATE No,
 No, no, by no means, father; you have received
 For your money, nay, and that you cannot give back;
 'Tis somewhat dear, I confess, but who can help it?
 If they had been agreed with beforehand...
 135 'Twas ill forgotten.
 OLD KNIGHT
 And how many shares have you in this? I see
 My force; case up your instruments; I yield.
 Here, as robbed and taken from me, I deliver it. [Gives money]

75 His stay's prepared for i.e. arrangements have been made to detain him

 130 Fiddle faddle dismissive exclamation, appropriately chosen for its musical reference 135 If... beforehand if you had negotiated the price in advance

- WITTYPATE
140 No, sir; you have performed your promise now,
Which was to pay the charge of music; that's all.
- OLD KNIGHT
I have heard no music, I have received none, sir.
There's none to be found in me nor about me.
- WITTYPATE
Why, sir, here's witness against you; you have danced,
145 And he that dances acknowledges a receipt
Of music.
- OLD KNIGHT I deny that, sir, look you, I can dance without music, [dances] do you see, sir? and I can sing without it too: [sings] You are a consort of thieves!—Do you 150 hear what I do?
- WITTYPATE Pray you, take heed, sir; if you do move the music again it may cost you as much more.
- OLD KNIGHT Hold, hold, I'll depart quietly; I need not bid you farewell, I think now, so long as that hundred 155 pound lasts with you. [Aside] Ha, ha, am I snapped,
i'faith?
- Enter Guardianess*
- GUARDIANESS O, Sir Perfidious!
- OLD KNIGHT Ay, ay, some howling another while; music's too damnable dear.
- 160 GUARDIANESS O, sir, my heartstrings are broke! If I can but live to tell you the tale I care not: your niece, my charge, is—
- OLD KNIGHT What, is she sick?
- GUARDIANESS No, no, sir, she's lustily well married.
- 165 OLD KNIGHT To whom?
- GUARDIANESS O, to that cunning dissembler, Cunningame.
- OLD KNIGHT I'll hang the priest first! What was he?
- GUARDIANESS Your kinsman, sir, that has the Welsh benefice.
- 170 OLD KNIGHT I saved him from the gallows to that end!
Good! Is there any more?
- GUARDIANESS And Sir Gregory is married too.
- OLD KNIGHT To my niece too, I hope, and then I may hang her.
- 175 GUARDIANESS No, sir, to my niece, thank Cupid, and that's all that's likely to recover me; she's Lady Fop now, and I am one of her aunts, I thank my promotion.
- Enter Credulous, Cunningame, Niece, Sir Gregory and Mirabell*
- CREDULOUS I have performed your behest, sir.
- OLD KNIGHT What have you performed, sir?
- WITTYPATE Faith, sir, I must excuse my cousin in this 180 act, if you can excuse yourself for making him a priest (there's the most difficult answer): I put this practice on him as from your desire. A truth, a truth, father.
- CREDULOUS I protest, sir, he tells you truth; he moved me
to't in your name. 185
- OLD KNIGHT I protest, sir, he told you a lie in my name, and were you so easy, Master Credulous, to believe him?
- CREDULOUS If a man should not believe his cousin, sir, whom should he believe?
- OLD KNIGHT
Good-e'en to you, good Master Cousin Cunningame, 190
And your fair bride, my cousin Cunningame too!
And how do you, Sir Gregory, with your fair lady?
- SIR GREGORY A little better than you would have had me,
I thank you, sir: the days of 'puppy' and 'slave' and 'rascal' are pretty well blown over now. I know crabs 195 from verjuice, I have tried both: an thou'dst give me thy niece for nothing, I'd not have her.
- CUNNINGAME I think so, Sir Gregory, for my sake you would not.
- SIR GREGORY I would thou had'st scaped her too, and then 200
she had died of the green-sickness. Know this, that I did marry in spite, and I will kiss my lady in spite, and love her in spite, and beget children of her in spite, and when I die they shall have my lands in spite. This was 205 my resolution, and now 'tis out.
- NIECE
How spiteful are you now, Sir Gregory!
Why, look you, I can love my dearest husband
With all the honours, duties, sweet embraces,
That can be thrown upon a loving man.
- SIR GREGORY Pox, this is afore your uncle's face, but behind 210 his back, in private, you'll show him another tale.
- CUNNINGAME You see, sir, now the irrecoverable state of all these things before you. Come out of your muse: they have been but wit weapons; you were wont to love the 215 play.
- Enter Clown*
- OLD KNIGHT Let me alone in my muse a little, sir; I will wake to you anon.
- CUNNINGAME [to Niece] Ud'so, your friend Pompey: how will you answer him?
- NIECE Very well, if you'll but second it and help me. 220
- CLOWN I do hear strange stories; are ladies things obnoxious?
NIECE
O, the dissembling, falsest wretch is come!

151 move i.e. to start playing again
153-5 I need not . . . with you i.e. since they will fare extremely well on all this money, while it lasts
155 snapped snapped up, caught, cheated
158 some howling another while i.e. let's have some howling for a change 173-4 hang her for bigamy, which had been made a capital offence in 1603

182 practice 'artful contrivance, stratagem'
(Dyce)
190 Master Cousin Cunningame 'Cousin' is here used in its general sense of 'kinsman' (in this instance, 'nephew-in-law'), and with a pun on Cunningame's mastery of cozenage 195-6 crabs from verjuice Crabs are small, bitter apples, used for making a sweet purée called verjuice.

young women, supposedly caused by unfulfilled sexual desire and curable by of the title of the play in which he is appearing

- CUNNINGGAME How now, lady?
NIECE
225 Let me come to him, and instead of love
Let me have revenge!
WITTYPATE Pray you now, will you first examine whether he be guilty or no?
NIECE He cannot be excused.—
230 How many messengers, thou perjured man,
Hast thou returned with vows and oaths that thou
Wouldst follow, and never till this unhappy hour
Could I set eye of thee, since thy false eye
Drew my heart to it? O, I could tear thee now, 235 Instead of soft embraces, pray give me leave—WITTYPATE Faith, this was ill done of you sir, if you promised otherwise.
CLOWN By this hand, never any messenger came at me since the first time I came into her company; that a 240 man should be wronged thus!
NIECE
Did not I send thee scarves and diamonds?
And thou returned'st me letters, one with a false heart in't.
WITTYPATE
O, fie! To receive favours, return falsehoods,
And hold a lady in hand—
245 CLOWN Will you believe me, sir? If ever I received diamonds or scarf, or sent any letter to her, would this sword might ne'er go through me.
WITTYPATE Some bad messengers have gone between you,
then.
NIECE
250 Take him from my sight, if I shall see tomorrow.
WITTYPATE
Pray you, forbear the place; this discontent
May impair her health much.
CLOWN Foot, if a man had been in any fault, 'twould ne'er have grieved him, sir, if you'll believe.
WITTYPATE
255 Nay, nay, protest no more, I do believe you,
But you see how the lady is wronged by't:
She has cast away herself, it is to be feared,
Against her uncle's will, nay, any consent,
But out of a mere neglect and spite to herself,
260 Married suddenly without any advice.
CLOWN Why, who can help it? If she be cast away she may thank herself; she might have gone further and fared worse; I could do no more than I could do. 'Twas her own pleasure to command me that I should not come 265 till I was sent for, I had been with her every minute of an hour else.
- WITTYPATE Truly, I believe you.
CLOWN Night and day she might have commanded me, and that she knew well enough; I said as much to her, between her and I; yet I protest she's as honest a lady 270 for my part, that I'd say if she would see me hanged.
If she be cast away I cannot help it; she might have stayed to have spoke with a man.
WITTYPATE Well, 'twas a hard miss on both parts.
CLOWN So 'twas; I was within one of her, for all this cross 275 luck; I was sure I was between the knight and home.
NIECE Not gone yet? O, my heart! None regard my health?
WITTYPATE Good sir, forbear her sight a while, you hear how ill she brooks it.
CLOWN Foolish woman, to overthrow her fortunes so; I 280 shall think the worse of a lady's wit while I live for't.
Pox, I could almost cry for anger. If she should miscarry now 'twould touch my conscience a little, and who knows what love and conceit may do? What would people say as I go along? 'There goes he that the lady 285 died for love on'. I am sure to hear on't i'th' streets.
I shall weep beforehand; foolish woman, I do grieve more for thee now than I did love thee before. Well, go thy ways, wouldst thou spare thy husband's head and break thine own heart, if thou hadst any wit? I would 290 some other had been the cause of thy undoing; I shall be twitted i'th' teeth with't, I'm sure of that, foolish lady. Exit
NIECE
So, so, this trouble's well shook off.—Uncle, how d'ee?
There's a dowry due, sir.
CUNNINGGAME We have agreed it, sweetest, 295
And find your uncle fully recovered, kind
To both of us.
NIECE To all the rest, I hope.
OLD KNIGHT
Never to thee,—nor thee, easy cousin Credulous.
Was your wit so raw?
CREDULOUS Faith, yours, sir, so long seasoned, 300
Has been faulty too and very much to blame,
Speaking it with reverence, uncle.
SIR GREGORY Yes, faith, sir; you have paid as dear for your time as any man here.
WITTYPATE Ay, sir, and I'll reckon it to him. Imprimis, the first preface-cheat of a pair of pieces to the beggars; 305 you remember that? I was the example to your bounty there; I spake Greek and Syriac, sir; you understand me
now. Next, the robbery put upon your indulgent cousin:
which indeed was no robbery, no constable, no justice, no thief, but all cheaters; there was a hundred mark, 310 mark you that. Lastly, this memorable hundred pounds' worth of music: this was but cheats and wit too, and for the assistance of this gentleman to my cousin (for which I am to have a fee). That was a little practice of my wit, too, father. Will you come to composition yet, father?

315 CUNNINGGAME Yes, faith, sir, do; two hundred a year will be easier than so much weekly. I do not think he's barren, if he should be put to't again.

OLD KNIGHT

320 Why, this was the day I looked for; thou shalt have't, And the next cheat makes it up three hundred. [To Credulous] Live thou upon thy ten pound vicarage, Thou get'st not a penny more; here's thy full Hire now.

CREDULOUS

I thank you, sir.

WITTYPATE

325 Why, there was the sum of all my wit, father: To shove him out of your favour, which I feared Would have disinherited me.

OLD KNIGHT

Most certain it had, Had not thy wit recovered it. Is there any here That had a hand with thee?

WITTYPATE

Yes, all these, sir.

OLD KNIGHT

330 Nephew, part a hundred pound amongst 'em, I'll repay it. Wealth love me as I love wit! When I die I'll build an almshouse for decayèd wits.

SIR GREGORY I'll entertain one in my lifetime. [To Priscian] Scholar, you shall be my chaplain: I have the gift of twenty benefices, simple as I am here. 335

PRISCIAN Thanks, my great patron.

CUNNINGGAME [to Sir Ruinous] Sir, your gentry and your name shall both be raised as high as my fortunes can reach 'em, for your friend's sake. 340

WITTYPATE Something will be in my present power, the future more. You shall share with me.

SIR RUINOUS and LADY Thanks, worthy gentlemen.

NIECE [to Sir Gregory] Sir, I would beg one thing of you.

SIR GREGORY You can beg nothing of me. 345

WITTYPATE O sir, if she begs, there's your power over her.

SIR GREGORY She has begged me for a fool already, but 'tis no matter; I have begged her for a lady that she might have been; that's one for another.

WITTYPATE Nay, but if she beg— 350

SIR GREGORY Let her beg again, then.

NIECE That your man Pompey's coat may come over his ears back again; I would not he should be lost for my sake.

SIR GREGORY Well, 'tis not granted, for mine own sake. 355

MIRABELL I'll entreat it, sir.

SIR GREGORY

Why, then, 'tis granted for your sake.

OLD KNIGHT

Come, come, Down with all weapons now, 'tis music time, So it be purchased at an easy rate. Some have received the knocks, some given the hits; 360 An all concludes in love, there's happy wits. Exeunt

MASQUE OF CUPIDS

Introduced by M. T. Jones-Davies and Ton Hoenselaars, text edited and annotated by John Jowett

MIDDLETON'S Masque of Cupids is not extant, except for two songs that have been plausibly identified as parts of the lost text. Modified versions of one song appear in More Dissemblers Besides Women (1.4) and A Chaste Maid in Cheapside (4.1), and an alternative version of part of the other song appears in The Witch (2.1). The symbolic, spectacular effects in Women, Beware Women, with its several pages acting as destructive Cupids in the concluding masque, would also appear to reflect the influence of Middleton's earlier Masque of Cupids.

Occasion

Masque of Cupids was written and performed as part of the festivities organized around the wedding on 26 December 1613 of James I's favourite Robert Carr (or Ker, in Scottish), Earl of Somerset, and Frances Howard (daughter of Thomas Howard, Earl of Suffolk). This wedding had been preceded by most unorthodox divorce proceedings, and the events of the 1613/14 Christmas season excited no less interest.

With the king's mediation, Frances Howard had married Robert Devereux, third Earl of Essex, in 1606. The marriage was an attempt to reconcile the Devereux family with the Howard family, which had been instrumental in bringing the second Earl of Essex to the block in 1601. The bride was only thirteen years old, the bridegroom fourteen. The marriage was not consummated. Following the wedding Essex left for the Continent, while Howard went to live at court. Frances Howard grew up to become not only a great beauty but also a flirtatious young woman who may have tried, in vain, to become Prince Henry's mistress. Her great-uncle Henry Howard, Earl of Northampton, probably brought her and Carr together. The pro-Catholic Howards found themselves jeopardized by a court faction with strong puritan leanings, including Sir Thomas Egerton (Lord Ellesmere), Archbishop George Abbot, and William Herbert, third Earl of Pembroke; under the circumstances, it would certainly have suited the Earl of Northampton, a formidable politician, to have the king's favourite develop, through Frances, an attachment to the Howards. Carr succumbed to the temptations of the young Countess, who relied on Dr Simon Forman's sorcery. Private meetings between the lovers were arranged through Mrs Anne Turner, who had introduced the fashion of yellow starch in England—to which Middleton alludes in The Widow (5.1.54). Mrs Turner had premises for the lovers in Paternoster Row and at Hammersmith. The Court turned a blind eye. To write to Howard, Carr relied on his unofficial mentor Sir Thomas Overbury (the character writer, and former Oxford classmate of Middleton). Although Overbury belonged to the anti-Howard faction, he assisted his influential friend Carr in composing love letters to Frances Howard.

In December 1609, Essex back from the Continent claimed his rights as a husband. Only when compelled by her father did the Countess agree to live with Essex at Chartley. For three years, she tried to keep him from intercourse with her, calling on Dr Forman for drugs to secure her husband's impotence.

Carr's influence was growing. He had been knighted and made Gentleman of the Bedchamber in 1607. A year later, he had received Sir Walter Raleigh's Sherborne Estate, to which in 1610 were added the estates of Lord Maxwell. On 25 March 1611 he became Viscount Rochester, and the first Scot in the English House of Lords. He was soon made a Knight of the Garter. When Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, died in May 1612, Carr joined the Privy Council. He became, with each new honour, an ever more desirable match.

By the end of 1612, a divorce was sought on the grounds of nullity. The annulment was supported by both Frances Howard and her husband. Northampton and Carr approached the king on the divorce, and found a willing ear. As the news spread, so did speculation about the adulterous ties between Howard and Carr. In February of the following year, it was rumoured that Howard had used the services of one Mary Woods to kill Essex, and in April, this 'scandal and slander' as John Chamberlain put it, led Frances Howard's father to consider stopping the divorce proceedings (I, 444-45). Overbury urged Carr to leave Howard and wrote The Wife as a marriage guide. His tactful advice soon gave way to open resentment, and with a quarrel in the Privy Gallery at Whitehall, during which Overbury called the Countess a 'base' woman, the friendship came to an end.

On 21 April 1613, Overbury, having repeatedly refused several foreign embassies, was committed to the Tower. Carr's role in this imprisonment remains unclear. To obtain easy access to the prisoner, Northampton had Sir Gervase Elwes appointed Lieutenant of the Tower on 6 May. Meanwhile, Howard plotted to have Richard Weston, her old postillion d'amour, made keeper of Overbury. Through him, she schemed, assisted by Mrs Turner, to poison the prisoner.

On 16 May, James assigned a number of Commissioners to try the divorce case in preparation of the marriage of Howard and Carr. The aim was to establish the Earl's impotence and Howard's virginity. Essex claimed that he had not slept with his wife. Still, he was unwilling to admit total impotence, as this would deprive him of any hope ever to marry again. He admitted that he was ‘maleficiatus only ad illam’, or, in the words of Thomas Howard, that he ‘had no ink in his pen’ only where Howard was concerned. Her virginity had to be tried: as Chamberlain reports, ‘ancient Ladies and midwives expert in those matters’ inspected her. Since the Countess wore a veil on the occasion, rumour had it that her cousin Katherine Fines, or a daughter of Sir Thomas Monson, had substituted for her. The proceedings became a topic for gossip as did the rumours about the affair between Frances Howard and Carr. On 10 June, John Chamberlain wrote to Sir Ralph Winwood that he was stupefied that the Countess should have seen Carr ‘three hours together within these two days’. Several weeks later, he wrote that ‘The world speaks liberally that my Lord of Rochester and she be in love one with another.’

The Commissioners reached a stalemate in July 1613. The question arose if Essex had been bewitched. Archbishop Abbot told the king that maleficium could not be proved in the Church Fathers, but James, with his own Daemonology in hand, considered it a valid reason to grant the divorce. As it became evident that the Commissioners were equally divided in opinion, an impatient James appointed two additional members—the Bishops of Winchester and Rochester—who, as expected, swayed the balance. On 25 September, the Essex marriage was declared void, and at James’s command the verdict was pronounced without any arguments or reasons. The news that on 14 September Sir Thomas Overbury had died in the Tower went nearly unnoticed.

The marriage took place on St Stephen’s Day, 1613. For those who, like Chamberlain, remembered Howard’s union with Essex in 1606, this was an intriguing event. The king was present on both occasions, and the venue was the same, the Chapel Royal. Moreover, Dr Montague, Bishop of Bath and Wells, who officiated in 1613, had also married Howard to Essex in 1606.

Epithalamiaists

Many material presents were bestowed on the new couple, but also poems, epithalamiums and masques. The marriage, which was thoroughly unpopular in the public eye, proved a delicate rhetorical subject to which each writer responded with more or less appropriate tactics.

George Chapman’s mythological fable of Perseus and Andromeda, a virgin tied to a rock and miraculously released from a monster—drawn from Natale Conti—is an allegory of the Earl of Somerset’s ‘rescue’ of Frances Howard from her ill-fated marriage with Essex. Andromeda Liberata starts as a warning to the Earl of Somerset and the Countess against scandal and gossip. The quotation from Petronius on the title-page leaves one in little doubt: ‘Nihil a veritate nec virtute remotius quam vulgaris opinio’ [‘Nothing is more remote from truth and virtue than common opinion’]. To the happy couple is promised ‘so renowned a progeny | As earth shall envy’, and that ‘to the last times of the world’ (ll. 532–7). The song of praise ends on a cosmic vision when bridegroom and bride will be rapt to heaven and transformed into constellations.

Yet a few tactless allusions in Andromeda Liberata got Chapman into trouble. His observations that Andromeda was ‘Bound to a barren rock’ (l. 143), and that ‘he no less a homicide is held, | That man to be born lets’ (ll. 491–2), read like thinly veiled allusions to Essex’s impotence. No wonder Chapman was to find himself in disgrace with the Essex faction.

John Donne was confronted with the same paradoxical circumstances as the other poets. But he was also under financial pressure to compose an epithalamium to procure Somerset’s patronage. The poet’s wit attempts to reconcile the claims of sexuality with social conventions, perhaps nowhere better than in lines 87–90:

Our little Cupid hath sued Livery,
And is no more in his minority,
He is admitted now into that breast
Where the King’s counsels and his secrets rest.

Here, Cupid is the wise god of adult love. Thus, indirectly, the respectability of the newly-married couple is defended, since they are not the victims of Venus’ childish son who shoots his darts at random. This is an allusion to Howard’s former union with Essex, which had been a marriage of children. Donne cleverly interweaves compliments and criticisms. The refrains referring to the lovers’ inflaming eyes, while insisting on their indivisible union, also allude to their illicit passion. And the pattern of the poem, made up of eleven stanzas, each consisting of eleven lines, stresses its ambiguity, with the pervasive presence of sin, as shown by Augustine in The City of God: ‘the number eleven, passing ten as it does, stands for trespassing against the law, and consequently for sin’ (IV, 535).

When Donne brings his nuptial song to the Court, he is full of the ‘common’ joy (l. 232). In the masques, this sense of community is increased. Thomas Campion’s Masque of Squires, which was danced in the Banqueting Room at Whitehall on 26 December 1613, offers the royal family ‘The fruit of Peace and Joy [...] in a perpetual spring’. Here ‘false opinion’ also interferes as Error with her fiendish associates, Rumour, Curiosity, and Credulity, provoke the confusion of a storm, an antimasque that may have been inspired by the Ballet of the Winds (Florence, 1608). Peace and Joy can only be restored by the benevolence of Bel-Anna, who will dissolve the evil charms. Thus Campion, with his diplomatic compliment to the Queen (who had originally expressed her disagreement with the Somerset/Howard match), aims at shifting attention to the royal family as the object of praise. The masque is a tribute to the King, the Queen, and Prince Charles, their ‘triple majesty’.

As part of the season’s festivities, the king would have a masque ‘performed by some gentlemen of his own servants that are good dancers’. This was Ben Jonson’s Irish Masque at Court, a gentlemen’s masque that Chamberlain described as ‘a medley mask of five English and five Scots (which are called the high dancers)⁷. Jonson's contribution reads like a parody of Campion's masque in the Anglo-Irish jargon that, like all dialect imitation, would normally be expected to raise a laugh. Four Irish footmen arriving at the English court will speak to King 'Yamish'. But 'the villanous vild Irish sheas' have destroyed their fine clothes and they dance the main dance in Irish mantles (ll. 73-4). Only through the king's wonderful intervention could they be transformed into new-born creatures—a tale of metamorphosis like Campion's masque.

Jonson's Challenge at Tilt spread over two nights. The Challenge was offered on 27 December 1613, and the answering Tilt was played on 1 January 1614. The device presented in Challenge at Tilt is of special interest in connection with Middleton's Masque of Cupids. Jonson's is also a masque about Cupids—two rival Cupids acting as pages. One of these is the husband's page, who is slightly taller than the wife's. Yet each claims precedence, asserting that he is the true Cupid. The wife's page unashamedly hints at his service as he waited on the bride into 'the nuptial chamber', transforming her into 'the throne of love', with roses on her cheeks and kisses on her lips, and mentions Venus' girdle about her that the bridegroom was to untie (ll. 42-44). The husband's page summarizes, not without a few smutty allusions, what in an epithalamium like Donne's was referred to as 'the bridegroom's coming'. Jonson here stresses the communal sense of sexual license that, within the privileged society to which The Tilt was addressed, tended to make the newly-weds not morally abnormal, but rather socially normative. The public character of the celebration is stressed as the second Cupid, who now enters first, descending from his chariot, addresses the ladies in the audience, threatening to chastise them by 'whipping [their] rebellious farthingales, with [his] bow-string' (ll. 108-9). After the spectacle of the two Cupids' champions—ten against ten—has ended the contention, a new kind of tilting is recommended: 'to meet lips for lances' and 'crack kisses instead of staves' (ll. 184-85). Hymen then expounds the myth of Eros and his brother Anteros, whose quarrel is not 'who is the true love', but 'who loves most' (ll. 215-16). This is symbolized by a palm that the two Cupids will divide between them. Hymen is the victory of reciprocal affection.

For a conclusion of the Christmas festivities and of the solemnities and magnificences in honour of the Somerset marriage, the Masque of Flowers (prepared in three weeks) was presented by some gentlemen of Gray's Inn at the Court of Whitehall in the Banqueting House on Twelfth Night 1614, eleven nights after the wedding. As a joint masque of the four Inns of Court could not be arranged, Sir Francis Bacon encouraged the 'Grayans' to offer a most sumptuous spectacle—paying all expenses himself—which, as Chamberlain remarks, stood him 'in above £2000'. It may have been an opportunity for Bacon to express his gratitude to the king and to Somerset, who in October 1613 had been instrumental in promoting him to the Attorney-Generalship.

Thus, from Chapman's poem to Bacon's masque we can see diverse strategies at work: advice to protect the newly-weds against envy and gossip (Chapman); excuses for the poet's absence from court (Donne); a shift of attention to the royal family (Campion); vindication of the couple (Challenge at Tilt); and, finally, with Bacon's discretion, no reference at all to the moral implications of the marriage.

Considering the different tactics adopted by contemporary poets, how might Middleton have tried to respond to the delicate moral problem that also faced him when he was commissioned at short notice to write a masque for the same occasion? As he demonstrated in his civic pageantry, Middleton was capable of celebrating idealized virtues, and of overlooking the weaknesses of the human individuals who should have embodied those virtues. If he experienced some ambivalence regarding the morality of the Somerset wedding, he might have resolved it as an ironist who saw the harmony of love threatened by the wanton pranks of his antemasque Eros. Was not Ironia for him, as it is described in The World Tossed at Tennis, like a needle 'That with one eye looks two ways at once' (l. 125)? Just such an irony informs the two Middleton songs.

Masque of Cupids

The Masque of Cupids was performed at the Merchant Taylors' Hall, Threadneedle Street, on Tuesday, 4 January 1614. On 31 December 1613, 'The Lord Mayor was sent to by the King, to entertain this new married couple, with their friends and followers; but he making an excuse that his house was too little to receive them, it was not accepted, but word sent back that he might command the biggest hall in the town: whereupon calling a council, it was resolved,' says Chamberlain, 'to do it at the charge of the City in the Merchant Taylors' Hall upon four days' warning'. On the last day of the year, therefore, a meeting of knights and aldermen was called to 'advise and consider how and in what manner the entertainment [was to be] given, and what solemnities, sports, and triumphs [...] prepared for the great honour of the feast; and to give speedy direction for the effecting thereof' (Nichols, III, 731). Sir Thomas Myddelton, the Lord Mayor, was well known to the dramatist who had written The Triumphs of Truth on the occasion of Sir Thomas's inauguration two months before, and also another entertainment that autumn in honour of the Lord Mayor's brother Hugh. This association may explain the choice of our Middleton to write his Masque of Cupids.

As Chamberlain put it, the ceremony preceding the feast at the Merchant Taylors' Hall was itself already tantamount to a pageant: 'thither they went yesternight about six o'clock, through Cheapside all by torchlight, accompanied by the father and mother of the bride, and all the lords and ladies about the court. The men were well mounted and richly arrayed, making a goodly show; the women, all in coaches'. At the Hall, 'the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, in their scarlet robes, entertained them with hearty welcome, and feasted them with all magnificence'. Following speeches and music, 'all the meat was served to the table by choice citizens of comeliest personage, in their gowns of rich foins, selected out of the twelve honourable companies'. After supper and a wassail followed 'two several pleasant masques, and a play', 'other pleasant dances' and a 'princely banquet'. There remains no trace of these other elements of the evening's entertainment; the poet was paid for other shows, which could include speeches and songs, like those later collected in Honourable Entertainments. The guests did not return to Whitehall until 3 o'clock in the morning (Nichols, II, 732).

Evidence for the involvement of 'Thomas Middleton, gent.' (also called 'Mr. Middleton, Poet') is provided by the proceedings of the Court of Aldermen. That document also establishes the title: although modern scholars usually describe the entertainment as a 'Masque of Cupid', the last word is clearly plural in the original manuscript.

That plural makes it likely that Masque of Cupids was directly inspired by Jonson's The Challenge at Tilt of 27 December 1613, with its first introduction into the English masque tradition of two Cupids named Eros and Anteros. This would not be the only instance of conscious intertextuality in the Somerset wedding masques: Campion's Masque of Squires, performed on 26 December 1613, was mocked three days later by Jonson in The Irish Masque.

The Common Hall of the Merchant Taylors was ideally suited for theatrical production. It had seen performances by the Westminster boys in the mid-sixteenth century, and when the Company opened the Merchant Taylors' School in 1561, its first headmaster Richard Mulcaster perpetuated the tradition with his pupils, until boys' plays there were stopped in 1574 (Chambers, II, 75). Later Stuart performances included 'A military show and sham battle by the gentlemen of the Artillery Garden' in October 1619 (Chambers, IV, 112), and, on 13 February 1634, James Shirley's The Triumph of Peace (Bentley, V, 1157-58).

The physical Hall was, according to a contemporary account, 'of stone, and of such bigness that it passes all the Halls in London for beauty and comeliness' (Clode). The Common Hall was approximately 82 feet in length, 43 feet in width, and 43 feet in height. Although in 1614 the sumptuous Common Hall had not yet been tiled, it was glazed. Its extravagance and size excepted, the interior of the Hall was of a traditional kind, having its dais at one end (east), facing the screen with a door on either side and a Minstrel's Gallery over it. Like the dais, the sides of the Hall were matted and boarded, leaving the centre or 'Marsh' for 'the display of pageants'. On public occasions, like the annual festival of the Merchant Taylors' patron saint, St John, nine vast pieces of arras, presumably representing the life of the saint, served to conceal and adorn the bare walls, excepting the screen. If the nine tapestries, with their total surface of 230 square yards (covering the three walls to a height of twelve feet) were indeed taken from their protective bagging to adorn the walls on 4 January 1614, the Christian subject matter provided an intriguing blend (if not altogether unfamiliar in Middleton's other work) with the classical mythology to which the title of the masque alludes. Given the evidence of Shirley's The Triumph of Peace, flying machinery may well have been available at the Hall in the 1610s. If Middleton used it for the Masque of Cupids, this would make it likely that he incorporated elements of the wedding entertainment into More Dissemblers Besides Women.

Cupid and Cupids

In John Fletcher's The Elder Brother (1625?), Eustace asks for a masque to celebrate his marriage, to which Egremont acquiesces with the remark: 'Tis not half an hour's work; | A Cupid and a fiddle, and the thing's done' (2.2). His words indicate the proverbial status of Cupid in a wedding masque. In court entertainments, the god of love continued the glorious career he had known in Renaissance poetry, whether in Petrarch's Triumphus Cupidinis or in Spenser's Faerie Queene, whose 'mask of Cupid' exhibited 'the winged god himself [...] riding on a lion ravenous' (III.xii.22). With his Masque of Cupids, Middleton followed the widespread custom, which made of Cupid(s) the central persona (or personae) of such aristocratic triumphs.

The nature and attributes of this figure of love owe much to the popularity of Plato in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Plato's Pausanias speaks of two Aphrodites, the celestial Ourania and the popular Pandemos; and as there are two Aphrodites, there must be two figures of Eros. Plato's two Aphrodites became the twin Venuses of the Neoplatonists: the celestial Venus and the terrestrial Venus. Each was attended by a corresponding Eros or Amor: Amor divinus and Amor vulgaris.

Henceforth, the poets would play with the two loves, Eros and his brother Anteros, and the rivalry between Amor profano and Amor sacro. Whereas the classical Anteros had stood for mutual love (anti = in return), they would sometimes choose the other sense (anti = against), implying an idea of contention. In A Challenge at Tilt (1614), as in Love's Welcome at Bolsover (1634), Jonson enhances the tradition by introducing Eros and his rival brother Anteros, and Middleton is likely to have adopted or perhaps mocked this device in the Masque of Cupids.

It is true that this neoplatonic ideology is more obviously present in Jonson's erudite entertainment than in the works of Middleton, which remain much closer to the native literary tradition. And yet, neoplatonism was part of the intellectual context in which both authors worked. And that Middleton should toy with the two figures of Eros and Anteros as they had just appeared in A Challenge at Tilt seems no impossibility; but his artistic approach would reveal a different stance from Jonson's, a stance on the side of irony, and even raillery.

Alternatively, Middleton's Masque of Cupids may have represented several Cupids. As early as 1594, in The Tragedy of Dido, Queen of Carthage by Marlowe and Nashe, Dido evokes 'ten thousand Cupids [that] hover in the air | And fan it in Aeneas' lovely face'. And there were the multiple decorative putti in baroque art. Multiple Cupids appear in Hymenæi where 'a thousand several-coloured loves [...] hop about the nuptial-room' (370). In Jonson's Masque of Beauty (1608), the ascent to the throne of harmony was covered with 'a multitude of Cupids', and in Campion's Lords' Masque (1612/13), in order not to 'wrong the Night | Of her Hymenæan right; | A thousand Cupids call away, | Fearing the approaching day'.

Cupid is a literary and theatrical as well as a visual figure, eliciting a wide variety of responses. Thus in The Tragedy of Dido, Cupid obeys his mother Venus, who orders him to turn to Ascanius's shape. In what is here printed as the first song, Cupid is described with his mother Venus. This is a Renaissance commonplace—witness the 1615 inventory of the Earl of Somerset, listing large panels representing Venus and Cupid. It suggests that Venus could well have been a character in Masque of Cupids.

Ladies are mentioned three times in one Middleton song, and women once in the other; this strongly suggests the presence of women, and probably specifically ladies, in the masque. And in fact, Middleton likes to have Cupid introduce masques of ladies—as happens in the second scene of Timon of Athens (a Middleton scene), at the time of the banquet, and in The Nice Valour where the Cupid character, a Lady disguised, leads in six ladies as masquers (2.1). That Cupid is mentioned again in the epilogue as 'Cupid in's petticoat'. In A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, More Dissemblers Besides Women, and The Witch, the altered versions of the two songs are sung by a woman. In More Dissemblers, Cupid also addresses several ladies referred to as 'fair beauties' (1.3.86). And we do not forget that Middleton's later Inns-of-Court Masque of Heroes was again to be presented 'as an entertainment for many worthy ladies'.

Whether or not Venus and other ladies were characters in the masque, Cupid certainly was. Cupid had different genealogies with the Neoplatonists, but his functions and attributes seldom change. In the first song, Cupid is a waggish boy, the exemplary archer who 'doth bend with his bow and enamour[s] with his arrow', as Richard Mulcaster describes him in his Positions (ch. 26, 101). The playful tone of the song recalls an extant fragment of The Hunting of Cupid by George Peele:

What thing is love? for (well I wot) love is a thing.
It is a prick; it is a sting;
It is a pretty pretty thing;
It is a fire; it is a coal
Whose flame creeps in at ev'ry hole.

The initial question of the song's second stanza—'Why should not Venus chide her son?'—is reminiscent of Titian's 'Education of Cupid': here it seems that blind Cupid will not be permitted to cause any more mischief with his bow and arrows. Middleton's quick rhythm, with the repetition of echoing words ('wanton boy', 'A very very wanton boy', 'wanton pranks'; 'fiery darts | his darts'), and the repeated last two lines of each stanza, with a quibble on 'lips' (labia) and the allusion to the cuckold's horn ('men's crests'), intensify the satirical tone that fits the antimasque or foil preceding the main masque. The pun on 'crests' with the sense of 'blazons' could have been an allusion to Somerset's newly acquired earldom. This also explains the line that follows, with its self-conscious 'I mean', intended to cancel any ambiguous reading. Yet, the reading that remains could easily refer to Essex's cuckoldry. This thesis can only be upheld if the song belonged to the antimasque—or 'antemasque', as Middleton would write—and was followed by the main masque in which any seedy detail would be resolved into an image of mutual love.

The second song opens on a cynical note, associating Cupid with commerce. Its next stanza looks back nostalgically to the days when lust between men and women was natural. The attitude to Cupid here recalls the song in Sir Philip Sidney's Old Arcadia sung by the love-hating shepherd named Dicus:

Poor painters oft with silly poets join
To fill the world with strange but vain conceits,
One brings the stuff, the other stamps the coin,
Which breeds naught else but glosses of deceits.
Thus painters Cupid paint, thus poets do,
A naked god, blind, young, with arrows two. (58)

Read in this way, the first and the second song are one another's counterparts. In the first, Cupid is an extremely bawdy presence, though also cynical like Shakespeare's Pandarus. The second song evokes the unspoiled time when the dart was made of flesh, and men did not disguise their sexual appetites with the fiction that Cupid made them do it. We cannot be certain if this contrast corresponds to the structure of the original masque, or tries to capture something of the scandal around the wedding for which it was produced.

Love is a 'speaking picture' in the collections of emblems, from Andrea Alciati to the representatives of the genre in England: Geoffrey Whitney or Henry Peacham. Different emblems show Cupid carrying a torch (for the ardour of love) or thunder (a sign of power), taming lions or holding a fish in one hand and a flower in the other to show that he has power 'on sea and land' (Alciati, Whitney). He is stung by bees to signify that we often 'pluck a nettle for a rose' (Whitney). For Peacham he is stronger than Hercules, and Cupid dwells 'where he lists | Be it a palace or a simple shed'. To the influence on masques of the emblematisers' imagery was added that of the Italian humanist Piero Valeriano's hieroglyphs: a good instance is 'the palm tree', which in Jonson's Love's Triumph through Callipolis (1631) is the hieroglyph of marriage (l. 211).

The major sources of dramatists and masque inventors were provided by the Italian mythographers and their compendia dealing with the ancient gods. Boccaccio's Genealogia deorum gentilium had been known in England since the fifteenth century, and is still quoted by Robert Burton when, in his Anatomy of Melancholy, he discusses the origins of love. There were three other great Italian manuals. In Lilio Gregorio Giraldi's De deis gentium varia et multiplex historia (1548), Cupid is multiple 'because loves of things are diverse'. Vincenzo Cartari's Le Imagine colla Spozione degli dei (1556) depicts Cupid as a single god and then as the personification of mere human desires (multiplices cupidines). He also pictures the struggle of naked Eros and Anteros for the palm. Natale Conti's Mythologiae sive Explicationis fabularum libri decem (1568), distinguishes between the abuse of Cupid and Cupid himself, 'whose force is the primal attraction that fashioned the Universe from Chaos' (an idea later developed by Bacon). These manuals were used by scholars, poets, and painters alike. And, at the end of the sixteenth century, Cesare Ripa's Iconologia—'Opera [...] non meno utile che necessaria a Poeti, Pittori, Scultori, & altri per rappresentare le Virtù, Vitti, Affetti et Passioni humane'—was published in Italy. It is an immense repertoire of Renaissance symbolism which was to become a mine of information for the masque inventors. Like Jonson, Middleton, though less erudite, would turn to Ripa's work for his symbolic characters as well as Valeriano's Hieroglyphica or Alciati's commentaries, and the humanists' compendia.

Cupid being the most frequently represented character in masques, many legends, roles, and anecdotes associated with him will colour his many-faceted figure. Eros appears accompanied by Desire (Masque of Beauty), with Games, Laughter, Sports and Delights (Time Vindicated). He is the run-away after whom Aphrodite raises the hue and cry (Masque of Haddington). Eros is bound captive (Love Freed from Ignorance and Folly), or he is the blind archer, with his 'bewitching philters' and 'alluring baits' that will be banished by Diana in Robert White's Cupid's Banishment (1617), where the victory of Chastity repeats Petrarch's Triumphus Pudicitiae that follows his Triumphus Cupidinis. Elsewhere we watch him in contest with Plutus, the god of money, who is also painted blind, Impostor Mammon, 'who has stolen Love's ensigns' (Jonson's Love Restored, ll. 174–75). We note an allusion to the myth of Pores and Penia: 'The father Plenty is; the mother, Want' (Love's Triumph through Callipolis, l. 58). 'Rebellious he' disobeys Venus, who punishes him by forcing his arms away (Chloridia), which explains why Inigo Jones's design of Cupid is inscribed 'without bow or quiver' (Jones-Davies). Cupid is above all such an efficient dramatic figure that Venus would 'let him out for the week to the King's players': 'they have need of him'—one more tribute to his invaluable favour with the public (Jonson's Christmas His Masque, 1616, 441–42). The wanton boy of Middleton's bawdy song is also Venus' wanton son of Lovers Made Men (1617), 'fashioned to tilt with ladies' lips', and reappears in Philip Massinger's The Bondman (1.1.50–52):

a raw young fellow,
One never trained in arms, but rather fashioned
To tilt with ladies' lips than crack a lance.

Since Cupid could not be represented naked in English plays and masques, he nearly always appeared disguised as a page. Alternatively, the illusion of nakedness was suggested by sartorial means, as in Francis Beaumont's Masque of the Inner Temple and Gray's Inn (1613), where a stage direction reads: 'Enter foure Cupids from each side of the Boscage [= grove], attired in flame coloured Taffita close to their bodie like naked Boyes' (132). Middleton elsewhere had a preference for the former solution, most notably in More Dissemblers Besides Women where the revised version of the song is sung by a woman disguised as a page. However, in the more private setting of the Masque of Cupids performance, the pretence of nudity would have been appropriate to the more sexually adventurous culture of the Jacobean court. And Thomas Carew's Coelum Britannicum (1634), a masque praising the moral reformation that Charles I had brought about, seems to imply that Cupid had been performed naked in the Jacobean court. Among the sanctions that Jove will impose on his own kingdom, in imitation of Charles, is that 'Cupid must go no more so scandalously naked, but is enjoined to make him breeches, though of his mother's petticoats' (159).

The scandalous future of the marriage so royally celebrated at the Merchant Taylors' Hall on 1 January 1614 is narrated elsewhere in this volume. (See the Critical Introduction to The Witch, 1124.) Given the scandals before and scandals after the Somerset wedding, it may be no accident that the full text of Middleton's Masque of Cupids was never printed, no accident that Middleton cannibalized and recycled elsewhere anything that seemed theatrically salvageable. Even Jonson, when he came to include his Irish Masque in the 1616 edition of his Works, removed any mention of the occasion for which it was written. However happy Middleton may have been to receive a commission from his new patrons in the London government, he may have felt no great desire to publicize his part in this business.

Two Songs from 'Masque of Cupids'

I	[First] Song	[Second Song]	2
	Cupid is Venus' only joy,	Cupid is an idle toy.
	But he is a wanton boy,	Never was there such a boy.
	A very, very wanton boy.	If there were, let any show
	He shoots at ladies' naked breasts;	Or his quiver or his bow
5	He is the cause of most men's crests—	Or a wound by him they got	5
	I mean upon the forehead,	Or a broken arrow-shot.
	Invisible but horrid.	Money, money makes us bow.
	'Twas he first thought upon the way	There is no other Cupid now.
	To keep a lady's lips in play.
10	Why should not Venus chide her son	Whilst the world continued good
	For the tricks that he hath done,	People loved for flesh and blood.	10
	The wanton tricks that he hath done?	Men about them bore the dart
	He shoots his fiery darts so thick	That would catch a woman's heart.
	They wound poor ladies to the quick,	Women likewise, great and small,
15	Ay me, with cruel wounding.	With a pretty thing they call
	His darts are so confounding	Cunny, cunny, won the men,	15
	That life and strength would soon decay,	And this was all the Cupid then.
	But that it keeps their lips in play.

These songs are likely to have been taken from the lost Masque of Cupids. They survive in later music manuscripts. The first of them is the basis for songs in Chaste Maid, at 4.1.167–93, and Dissemblers, at 1.4.89–99.

1.1 only joy as said of a parent's sole child, Cupid being the son of Venus, but with a sexual equivocation

2 wanton lewd, skittish, unrestrained

4 He shoots Refers to the traditional depiction of Cupid with a bow and arrow.

ladies' naked breasts Perhaps refers to the fashion for court ladies to wear diaphanous or transparent coverings over their breasts, as exemplified in court masques, some of which represented Cupids.

breasts The non-erotic sense is 'hearts'.

5 crests (a) the cuckold's horns

(b) erections (the sense denied)

9 lips with a quibble on the labia of the vulva

13–18 He...play There is a sustained undercurrent of allusion to sexual penetration.

15–16 wounding...confounding Compare Pandarus's bawdy song in Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida (3.1) with its rhyme on 'wound' and 'confound'.

17 strength more often an attribute of male sexual performance, here transferred to the female

18 it refers back to 'wounding'

2.1 idle foolish

toy primarily 'piece of nonsense, joke', the claim being that Cupid doesn't exist.

Also knick-knack, friskiness, sexual caress, (female) sexual organ. Perhaps also 'frivolous tune', referring to the song of Cupid itself.

4 Or either quiver the case for Cupid's arrows, but also, equivocally, 'vagina'

bow equivocally, 'penis'

5 wound Refers to the wound of Cupid's arrow, the penetrated vagina, and loss of chastity or good reputation

6 arrow-shot Probably 'arrow-shaft', altered for rhyme. Otherwise the flight of an arrow, 'broken' in that it has hit its target, hence the wound of broken flesh.

9–10 Whilst...blood A provocative variation of the Christian idea of prelapsarian innocence, combined with the classical myth of the Golden Age, in which there were no metals, money, or violence.

11–12 the dart...heart i.e. (a) Cupid's arrow, (b) the penis

15 Cunny cunt

MORE DISSEMBLERS BESIDES WOMEN

Edited by John Jowett

More Dissemblers takes a quizzical look at the persistence of desire in a court world where romantic and sexual love have been subordinated to religion. It explores the inexorable clash between love and religion as manifested in two views of life, two styles of speech and behaviour. For the godly the heart of the state is defined as a religious cloister. The libidinous seek to redefine it as a sexual market-place.

The play belonged to the repertoire of the King's Men. Though the date of first performance has variously been conjectured as 1614, c.1615, or 1619, the earliest year is perhaps in balance more likely. Subsequently, on 17 October 1623, Sir Henry Herbert, the new Master of the Revels, issued a new licence. The King's Men, having presumably revived the play at the Blackfriars theatre, staged it at court on 6 January 1624, as we know from Herbert's note in his office-book: 'Upon Twelfth Night, the masque being put off, More Dissemblers Besides Women, by the King's company, the Prince only being there. At Whitehall.' The masque in question, Jonson's Neptune's Triumph, had been designed to celebrate as a triumph of Protestant diplomacy Prince Charles's and the Duke of Buckingham's return to London empty-handed after the negotiations in Madrid for a betrothal between Charles and the Spanish Infanta had broken down. Neptune's Triumph had to be 'put off' to avoid a diplomatic wrangle involving the Spanish ambassador. As a substitute More Dissemblers is perhaps not anodyne. The Gypsy scene, in which a fool has his palm read and is tricked of his money, might now have served to recall another Jonson masque, The Gypsies Metamorphosed (1621), in which Buckingham played the 'Patrico', or First Gypsy, who read King James's palm. The Gypsy scene as a whole can scarcely have been introduced for the court performance, as it is intrinsic to the rest of the play's action and so cannot have been a late addition, but it could possibly have been revised for the court performance. Whether revised or not, the scene could scarcely have failed to be topical to the court occasion. The play as a whole could have acquired further new significance because it deals with the fortunate breakdown of a match that involves a head of state (as Charles was destined to become) and is based on a compromising infatuation (such as Charles initially conceived towards the Infanta). At the revival, the final affirmation of the Duchess's celibacy might well have acquired new political overtones of national independence and uncompromised Protestant virtue. Middleton was shortly to write his strongly anti-Spanish Game at Chess.

Herbert's note adds the first recorded criticism of More Dissemblers: 'The worst play that e'er I saw'. Such denunciations of plays were not uncommon in the seventeenth century. As similar comments in the diary of Samuel Pepys suggest, they can reflect on the production or on the social occasion, and in this case there may have been disgruntlement over the cancelled masque. More Dissemblers held its place in the King's Men's repertoire, for as late as 1641 it was protected along with other of the company's plays against unauthorized publication, and in 1669 it was one of the plays allotted to Thomas Killigrew as 'formerly acted at the Blackfriars and now allowed of to his Majesty's Servants at the New Theatre'. The Restoration apparently lost interest, except in the Gypsy scenes, which were plagiarized in John Leaner's comedy The Rambling Justice, acted at Drury Lane in 1678. More Dissemblers is not known to have been revived until a student production at the University of Toronto in 1970.

The play first reached a reading public in 1657, a year before Oliver Cromwell's death. Humphrey Moseley, a major Interregnum publisher of pre-1642 drama, brought the play out in an octavo volume with Women, Beware Women, under the joint title Two New Plays. He probably regarded the pair and No Wit/Help like a Woman's, which he published in the same year, as a coherent group. The collocated titles, setting forth a common theme in women, characterize them as witty, dissembling, and dangerous, and so suggest ways in which women might compensate for their traditionally subordinate role. Each title marks out a distinct stage between male approval and apprehension.

The title-page declares More Dissemblers a comedy, thus complementing the tragedy Women, Beware Women. Despite the obvious differences in tone and genre, there are some points of contact between these plays. Both develop the theme of sexual betrayal in an Italianate setting. They share the figure of a moralizing Cardinal (though the temporizing hypocrisy of the churchman in More Dissemblers largely disappears in Women, Beware Women). There are similarities too of dramatic technique. In particular, each play has a set-piece scene in which a woman, standing at a window, is led towards sexual involvement with the man at the centre of a state procession over the main stage below; each makes ironic use of a Cupid or Cupids in its masque scene; and each of these scenes is unusually elaborate in its staging. The Duchess in More Dissemblers attempts but fails to use her ducal authority to obtain sexual gratification; the Duke in Women, Beware Women by threatening violence succeeds in such a project. And there seem to be glances at the title of More Dissemblers in Women, Beware Women at 4.2.157–8 and 184–5.

More Dissemblers itself glances back to John Webster's tragedy The Duchess of Malfi, which similarly concerns the dilemma of a widowed Italian duchess who has to choose between chastity and the urgings of the heart. Middleton may also have encountered Hans Holbein's striking portrait of Christina, Duchess of Milan, a young widow whom Henry VIII briefly contemplated as a bride. The portrait was commissioned to give Henry an idea of Christina's appearance; the potentially lecherous gaze of Henry and Merry England is answered with calm reserve and self-assurance. The play's Duchess of Milan is likewise a young widow who considers coming out of mourning to remarry but finally remains in widowhood. The portrait constitutes a possible visual 'source' for some of the play's materials. It is especially tantalizing in the absence of any known full narrative or dramatic source, though the theme of the widow who cannot uphold her vows against remarriage goes back at least as far as Petronius.

In early modern England, a widow inheriting her husband's estate might find herself in a position of unusual power and autonomy, and yet discover that she was hemmed in by the advice or imperatives of the men best placed to substitute for her dead husband's authority. When the widow inherits nothing less than a duchy, the stability of the state itself is at issue. Middleton's Duchess is a figure of compromised political power and endangered moral authority. A Protestant audience might have mistrusted the principle that a widow should maintain vows of chastity for being too close to the Catholic ideals of celibate priesthood and conventual chastity. To Calvin, vows of continence were wrong, and to the English Protestant reformer William Tyndale they might even be blasphemous. The Duchess's resolution is at first upheld by a Cardinal whose addiction to ritual and inclination to sanctify the Duchess might seem analogous to Catholic traits. And his principles collapse on their first and only test. On the other hand both Moll in Roaring Girl and the White Queen's Pawn in Game at Chess demand approbation when they finally affirm their celibacy, and the Pawn's preserved chastity is a victory for the Protestant cause. Lisa Geller (1991) notes of the Duchess that 'Her self-imposed vow—subject to the approval of neither father nor husband—has a stature and a validity that her earlier vow could not command.'

The Cardinal's scheme to fortify the Duchess's heroic chastity by exposing her to the temptations of man is riddled with folly and self-interest. The Duchess is brought into contact with subjects who are volatile and divided, and she becomes the social high-point in a circle of sexual pursuit. Most of the links in this circle are set in place during the early scenes. The play begins with Lactantio hearing an off-stage song from the Duchess's lodgings in praise of her celibate widowhood. This opening might be thought of as a window-scene without a visible female window-character: the song marks out her absence both as an object of display and as a participant in the social world. It is soon confirmed that the Duchess and Lactantio stand for the play's opposed principles of chastity and lust. In 1.2, the character disguised as an unnamed Page reveals herself as Lactantio's pregnant former mistress, who, like Aurelia, seeks to claim him as her husband. Then Aurelia's father, after exploding her brief disguise as a man, hands her over to his choice of a prospective husband. The latter, the Governor of the Fort, acts in his official role by imprisoning her. Such is the world of convoluted and unifying sexual relationships that the Duchess enters when, accepting the Cardinal's challenge, she abandons her cloistered isolation so as to wage a 'harder fight' in the sight of men.

The military imagery is appropriate, for her first public act is to grace with her presence the triumphal return of General Andrugio from the wars—and her private response is to fall in love with him. The now tangled plot is given a formal and emblematic summary as the action, with gratuitously assured indifference to plausibility, becomes masque-like. Necessarily, and as elsewhere in Middleton, the socially cohesive Platonic harmonies of the masque are inverted. The spectacle is split into a series of separate sub-actions played out on the main stage (the procession), the upper acting space (the Duchess's window, where she now appears in public view), and in flight (a descent from the 'heavens' of a 'Cupid', who was probably played by the singing boy-actor who also appeared as the 'Page'). Even the events on the main stage are radically divided between the General's public welcome and his private dismay at returning to find his beloved Aurelia lost to him. In the mean time, the Duchess's feelings, like Andrugio's, are running counter to her official role in the welcome. The fragmented staging provides a visual metaphor for these emotional disparities as the figure of Cupid, suspended from above as in flight, mischievously appropriates the formal procession to his own ends. Love is victor over both War and Chastity, and the state occasion becomes a masque of Cupid.

In another emblematic piece of theatre in 2.1 the Duchess attempts to recuperate the vows made to her dying husband, re-enacting them with the Cardinal playing her husband. But their force has been lost; at the crucial moment she interposes: 'I can go no further'. If this seems to be a break from a pious artificial self that is no longer tenable, it paradoxically marks her entry into another state of dissembling. She guesses that self-interest will prevail over the Cardinal's moral dismay, and so she pretends love for his nephew Lactantio. Her guess is right; in 2.2, the Cardinal admits, 'I love his good as dearly as her vow', with disconcertingly rapid slippage on the words love, good, and dearly. When the Duchess sees Lactantio in private (3.2) the mutual seduction he anticipates rapidly turns to convoluted intrigue, as the Duchess persuades Lactantio to write a bawdy and self-defaming letter of seduction supposedly from Andrugio to her. In this passage the pen becomes explicitly phallic. More precisely, the penis is rewritten as the pen, seen as an instrument of duplicitous trickery and sexual wordplay. Sexual punning, like duplicity, is endemic to the play, and seeks to underwrite every utterance with the language of the body. In practice, however, consummation is repeatedly deferred, and the sexual humour remains based on sexual frustration. In a play where the intrigue will lead nowhere, the forged bawdy epistle is a summary emblem of the language-splitting intrinsic to punning and dissembling. Obscenity and disguise are driven by sexual impulse; but in the event the object of desire, like the pun's object of signification, proves elusive.

Andrugio is arrested by Lactantio so that Lactantio can deliver him into the Duchess's hands, but Andrugio maintains his loyalty to Aurelia. This prompts the Duchess to realize her error and renew her vows of chastity. The complexities of the plot entail slight movements, and are easily if arbitrarily resolved. But the play's strength lies elsewhere, in the witty continuities it threads between morality, authority, and language. These ideas are given dramatic articulation in two highly theatrical episodes towards the end of the play.

Aurelia's literal imprisonment by her father's choice of husband, the Governor of the Fort, offers an extreme and scathingly humorous image of patriarchal authority, but the outcome is a turn towards carnival. When she escapes, Aurelia seeks out a roving Gypsy band that seems to promise anarchic liberty. Lactantio's servant Dondolo takes the same course, to evade the humiliations of service. There is a glance here at the alleged 'conversion' of English rogues to Gypsyism, as described, for example in William Harrison's Description of Britain (1577), and as targeted in an Act of Parliament of 1596 that made vagabonds of those 'wandering and pretending themselves to be Egyptians' (see Dale B. J. Randall, 1975). But Aurelia and Dondolo seek an alternative commonwealth rather than a guise for villainy.

In Chapter 8 of English Villainies Discovered by Lantern and Candlelight (1608) Thomas Dekker describes Gypsies as dissolute vagabonds, whilst admitting into his account an element of the comic grotesque:

They are a people more scattered than Jews and more hated—beggarly in apparel, barbarous in condition, beastly in behaviour, and bloody if they meet advantage... Their apparel is odd and fantastic, though it be never so full of rents. The men wear scarfs of calico or any other base stuff, hanging their bodies like morris-dancers with bells and other toys... The woman as ridiculously attire themselves and, like one that plays the rogue on a stage, wear rags and patched filthy mantles uppermost when the under-garments are handsome and in fashion... These barns are the beds of incests, whoredoms, adulteries and of all other black and deadly damned impieties... Upon days of pastime and liberty they spread themselves in small companies amongst the villages and, when young maids and bachelors—yea, sometimes old doting fools that should be beaten to this world of villainies and forewarn others—do flock about them, they then profess skill in palmistry and forsooth can tell fortunes. Which for the most part are infallibly true, by reason that they work upon rules which are grounded upon certainty: for one of them will tell you that you shall shortly have some evil luck fall upon you and, within half an hour after, you shall find your pocket picked or your purse cut.

Middleton's version of Gypsydom is more tolerant. Yet he was surely familiar with Dekker's hostile account, for Lantern and Candlelight appears to have informed the play's Gypsy language. The cant, or rather the sprinkling of cant upon sheer nonsense, stands at a further stage than the pun in the disintegration of lawful and determinate language, and so contributes to Middleton's almost celebratory treatment of the Gypsies. More Dissemblers anticipates The Gypsies Metamorphosed in playing down the criminality attributed to Gypsies to the extent that thefts, drunkenness, and libertinism are presented as reprehensible but gamesome fun. The spirit is not far removed from that found in the broadside ballad 'The Brave English Gypsy' (printed and published before 1626), in which 'English Gypsies all live free, | And love and live most jovially', boasting that 'Wheresoe'er we come, we find, | For one that hates, an hundred kind'.

Any prospect of utopian linguistic and moral anarchy is, however, short-lived. Though they offer an existence outside the law, the Gypsies reproduce, in caricature, the ritual, discipline, and authority of church and state. A comic ceremony of anointing Dondolo's face with pig-fat and soot parodies the Catholic ritual of marking the forehead with ash on Ash Wednesday (fittingly, as the play identifies Gypsies with Egyptians, and Protestant polemic identified Old-Testament Egyptians with Roman Catholics). Dondolo's and Aurelia's expectations of a libertarian convert's life amongst the Gypsies remain unfulfilled. Dondolo is robbed; Aurelia finds herself the 'doxy' to the inanely un-Gypsyfied Dondolo.

That is one parabola by which the play reaches towards its conclusion. Despite the shift back from the antithetical Gypsy highway to the thetic and enclosed court, there is a logic whereby the Gypsy episode leads coherently to the penultimate scene, in which the secretly pregnant 'Page' is unmasked. Here is another route, sadistic and farcical, by which the wayward individual returns to social reality. The 'Page', whom the audience has yet to see dressed as a woman, finds herself pushed into vocal gymnastics by her music teacher, then forced by her dancing master to practise leaping dance movements. These stresses send her into labour. In Castiglione's The Courtier there is a cautionary remark against women indulging in 'manly exercises' such as 'swift and violent tricks' in dancing or singing, or playing music with 'hard and often divisions'. Sexual identity itself is threatened by such activities. In More Dissemblers the extremes of the exercises are supposed to train the 'Page' into manhood, but the effeminacy of the teachers suggests rather that singing and dancing are androgynous arts. The attempt to make the 'Page' more manly, or at least more pagely, achieves the opposite. Middleton was probably familiar with a case related by Montaigne in his essay 'Of the Force of Imagination' of an erstwhile woman who, 'upon a time, leaping, and straining himself to overleap another, he wot not how, but where before he was a woman, he suddenly felt the instrument of a man to come out of him', and thereafter remained a man. In contrast with this woman turned man, Middleton's effeminate 'man' produces a baby. As so often in Middleton, the physical body reproves and betrays the person's moral failings. But the return to a safely gendered and moralized reality is only achieved by passing through a dizzying collapse of apparent gender identity. This scene offers a startling example of the darker, almost manic edge to the play's humour.

There can be no true reconciliation between the defining, contrasted, but oddly contiguous obsessions of chastity and lust. Chastity yields no ground; the Duchess finally turns her back on Andrugio and renews her vows. Marriage, where it proceeds, has more to do with punishment than reward, and, most of all, is the instrument of social and moral regulation. Aurelia and then Lactantio are both 'plagued justly' by being denied their first choice of partner. These are uneasy resolutions for a play advertised as a comedy. What logic is at work? On the one hand, a cloistered spiritual and secular élite has been threatened with a loss of its identity and sense of merit. On the other hand, a self-sufficient world of frivolous behaviour finally accepts without reverence or surprise the consequences exacted by law and nature. These are potentially autonomous worlds forced into reluctant but necessary mutual recognition. The Duchess comes to acknowledge her own propensity to lust and her overdependence on the Cardinal's and the Lords' dissembling piety; she comes to know at first hand the consanguinity of duchess, cardinal, and knave. In the last scene she exercises government over her people for the first time, and with a directness that was not before possible. Yet she is addressing only the men that have threatened her state of chastity and the women whose chastity they have taken; she is about to retreat from all this. The state of moral siege will resume, and the end of the play is the end of a communication that had scarcely begun. Some things have been shaken out during the action; others remain hidden in a text that seems intriguingly burdened with its political and apolitical unconscious.

I.2 Enter two or three Lords, and [they discover] the Lord Cardinal in his closet, [seated with his books]

LORD CARDINAL
 My lords, I have work for you. When you have hours
 Free from the cares of state, bestow your eyes
 Upon those abstracts of the Duchess' virtues,
 My study's ornaments. I make her constancy
 5 The holy mistress of my contemplation.
 Whole volumes have I writ in zealous praise
 Of her eternal vow. I have no power
 To suffer virtue to go thinly clad,
 I that have ever been in youth an old man
 10 To pleasures and to women,
 And could never love but pity 'em
 And all their momentary frantic follies.
 [Rising] Here I stand up in admiration,
 And bow to the chaste health of our great Duchess,
 15 Kissing her constant name. O my fair lords,
 When we find grace confirmed, especially
 In a creature that's so doubtful as a woman,
 We're spirit-ravished; men of our probation
 Feel the spheres' music playing in their souls.
 20 So long, unto the eternizing of her sex,
 She's kept her vow, so strictly, and as chaste
 As everlasting life is kept for virtue
 E'en from the sight of men; to make her oath
 As uncorrupt as th'honour of a virgin,
 25 That must be strict in thought, or else that title,
 Like one of frailty's ruins, shrinks to dust;
 No longer she's a virgin than she's just.

FIRST LORD
 Chaste, sir? The truth and justice of her vow
 To her deceased lord's able to make poor

Man's treasury of praises. But, methinks,
 She that has no temptation set before her,
 Her virtue has no conquest. Then would her constancy
 Shine in the brightest goodness of her glory
 If she would give admittance, see and be seen,
 And yet resist and conquer. There were argument
 35 For angels; 'twould outreach the life of praise
 Set in mortality's shortness. [Aside] I speak this
 Not for religion, but for love of her
 Whom I wish less religious and more loving;
 But I fear she's too constant, that's her fault.
 40 But 'tis so rare few of her sex are took with't,
 And that makes some amends.

LORD CARDINAL
 You have put my zeal into a way, my lord,
 I shall not be at peace till I make perfect.
 I'll make her victory harder. 'Tis my crown
 45 When I bring grace to great'st perfection;
 And I dare trust that daughter with a world,
 None but her vow and she. I know she wears
 A constancy will not deceive my praises,
 A faith so noble. She that once knows heaven
 50 Need put in no security for her truth.
 I dare believe her face, use all the art,
 Temptation, witcheries, sleights, and subtleties
 You temporal lords and all your means can practise.

SECOND LORD
 My lord, not any, we.

LORD CARDINAL Her resolute goodness
 55 Shall as a rock stand firm, and send the sins
 That beat against it
 Into the bosom of the owners, weeping.

THIRD LORD
 We wish her virtues so.

LORD CARDINAL O, give me pardon,
 I have lost myself in her upon my friends.
 60 Your charitable censures I beseech.
 So dear her white fame is to my soul's love,
 'Tis an affliction but to hear it questioned.

SERVANT My lord.
LORD CARDINAL Call our nephew. [Exit Servant]
There's a work too
That for blood's sake I labour to make perfect,
And it comes on with joy. He's but a youth,
To speak of years, yet I dare venture him
80 To old men's goodnesses and gravities
For his strict manners, and win glory by him;
And for the chasteness of his continence,
Which is a rare grace in the spring of man,
He does excel the youth of all our time;
85 Which gift of his, more than affinity,
Draws my affection in great plenty to him.
The company of a woman is as fearful to him
As death to guilty men. I've seen him blush
When but a maid was named. I'm proud of him,
90 Heaven be not angry for't. He's near of kin
In disposition to me. I shall do much for him
In lifetime, but in death I shall do all.
There he will find my love. He's yet too young
In years to rise in state, but his good parts
Will bring him in the sooner.
Enter Lactantio with a book
95 Here he comes.—
What, at thy meditation? Half in heaven?
- LACTANTIO
The better half, my lord. My mind's there still;
And when the heart's above, the body walks here
But like an idle serving-man below,
Gaping and waiting for his master's coming. 100
- LORD CARDINAL
What man in age could bring forth graver thoughts?
- LACTANTIO
He that lives fourscore years is but like one
That stays here for a friend. When death comes, then Away he goes, and is ne'er seen again.
I wonder at the young men of our days,
105 That they can dote on pleasure, or what 'tis
They give that title to, unless in mockage.
There's nothing I can find upon the earth
Worthy the name of pleasure, unless't be
To laugh at folly, which indeed good charity
110 Should rather pity. But of all the frenzies
That follow flesh and blood, O reverend uncle,
The most ridiculous is to fawn on women.
There's no excuse for that. 'Tis such a madness
There is no cure set down for't. No physician 115 Ever spent hour about it, for they guessed
'Twas all in vain when they first loved themselves,
And never since durst practise. Cry 'Hei mihi',
That's all the help they have for't. I had rather meet
A witch far north than a fine fool in love;
120 The sight would less afflict me. But for modesty,
And your grave presence that learns men respect,
I should fall foul in words upon fond man
That can forget his excellence and honour—
His serious meditations being the end
125 Of his creation, to learn well to die—
And live a prisoner to a woman's eye.
Can there be greater thralldom, greater folly?
LORD CARDINAL [aside]
In making him my heir, I make good works,
And they give wealth a blessing; where, on the contrary,
130 What curses does he heap upon his soul
That leaves his riches to a riotous young man,
To be consumed on surfeits, pride, and harlots!
Peace be upon that spirit whose life provides
A quiet rest for mine.

A letter, sir, brought by a gentleman
That lately came from Rome.

There is the like already. I'm writ chaste

One lately come from Rome, my lord, in credit
With Lord Vincentio; so the letter speaks him.

LORD CARDINAL Admit him, my kind boy. [Exit Page]

LORD CARDINAL Welcome to Milan, sir. How is the health Of Lord Vincentio?

160 AURELIA May it please your grace,

I left it well and happy, and I hope
The same blest fortune keeps it.
LORD CARDINAL I hear you're near him.
AURELIA One of his chamber, my lord.
LACTANTIO [aside]
I'd ne'er wish one of her condition nearer 165 Than to be one of mine.

LORD CARDINAL Your news is pleasing.
Whilst you remain in Milan, I request you
To know the welcome of no house but ours.

AURELIA Thanks to your Grace.
LORD CARDINAL I'll leave you to confer.
I'll to the Duchess, and labour her perfection. Exit 170

LACTANTIO Then thus begins our conference: I arrest thee
In Cupid's name. Deliver up your weapon.
It is not for your wearing, Venus knows it.
Here's a fit thing indeed, nay, hangers and all!
Away with 'em, out upon 'em, things of trouble,
175 And out of use with you. Now you're my prisoner,
And till you swear you love me, all and only,
You part not from mine arms.

AURELIA I swear it willingly.
LACTANTIO
And that you do renounce the General's love
That heretofore laid claim to you.

AURELIA My heart bids me,
180 You need not teach me that. My eye ne'er knew
A perfect choice till it stood blest with you.
There's yet a rival whom you little dream of.
Tax me with him, and I'll swear too I hate him.
I'll thrust 'em both together in one oath,
185 And send 'em to some pair of waiting-women
To solder up their credits.

LACTANTIO Prithee, what's he?
Another yet? For laughter' sake, discover him.

AURELIA The Governor of the Fort.
LACTANTIO That old dried neat's-tongue?

Enter Lord Cardinal, [above]

LORD CARDINAL
 The blessing of perfection to your thoughts, lady,
 For I'm resolved they are good ones.

DUCHESS Honour of greatness,
 Friend to my vow, and father to my fame,
 Welcome, as peace to temples.

LORD CARDINAL I bring war.

DUCHESS How, sir?

LORD CARDINAL
 30 A harder fight. If now you conquer,
 You crown my praises double.

DUCHESS What's your aim, sir?

LORD CARDINAL
 To astonish sin and all her tempting evils,
 And make your goodness shine more glorious.
 When your fair noble vow showed you the way
 35 To excellence in virtue, to keep back
 The fears that might discourage you at first,
 Pitying your strength, it showed you not the worst.
 'Tis not enough for tapers to burn bright;
 But to be seen, so to lend others light,
 40 Yet not impair themselves, their flame as pure
 As when it shined in secret. So t'abide
 Temptations is the soul's flame truly tried.
 I have an ambition, but a virtuous one:
 I would have nothing want to your perfection.

DUCHESS
 45 Is there a doubt found yet? Is it so hard
 For woman to recover, with all diligence
 And a true fasting faith from sensual pleasure,
 What many of her sex has so long lost?
 Can you believe that any sight of man,
 50 Held he the worth of millions in one spirit,
 Had power to alter me?

LORD CARDINAL No; there's my hope,
 My credit, and my triumph.

DUCHESS I'll no more
 Keep strictly private, since the glory on't
 Is but a virtue questioned. I'll come forth
 55 And show myself to all. The world shall witness
 That, like the sun, my constancy can look

On earth's corruptions, and shine clear itself.

LORD CARDINAL
 Hold conquest now, and I have all my wishes.
Cornetts and a shout within

DUCHESS
 The meaning of that sudden shout, my lord?

LORD CARDINAL
 Signor Andrugio, general of the field,
 60 Successful in his fortunes, is arrived,
 And met by all the gallant hopes of Milan,
 Welcomed with laurel wreaths and hymns of praises.
 Vouchsafe but you to give him the first grace, madam,
 Of your so long hid presence, he has then 65 All honours that can bless victorious man.

DUCHESS
 You shall prevail, grave sir. [Exit Lord Cardinal]
*Enter Andrugio, attended with the nobility and state, [wreathed with bays] like a victor. [Amongst the nobility is Lactantio, in black and yellow.]
 [The Duchess and Celia stand in view above].
 Song, music*

ALL THE NOBILITY
 Laurel is a victor's due,
 I give it you,
 I give it you. 70
 Thy name with praise,
 Thy brow with bays,
 We circle round.
 All men rejoice
 With cheerful voice, 75
 To see thee like a conqueror crowned.
A [winged] Cupid, [with a bow,] descending, sings this

CUPID
 I am a little conqueror, too.
 For wreaths of bays
 There's arms of cross,
 80 And that's my due.
 I give the flaming heart,
 It is my crest,
 And by the mother's side
 The weeping eye,
 The sighing breast. 85
 It is not power in you, fair beauties.
 If I command love, 'tis your duties.

He ascends.

23-4 an... wall i.e. a musical instrument when it is in its case, hanging unused on the wall. With a glance at the bawdy senses of instrument and case as the female sex organs.
 25 comes... heart In the continued metaphor of a musical instrument, suggests (a) the moving qualities of music and (b) the playing of an instrument such as a lute, which is held close to the chest.
 27 Honour of greatness i.e. one who does honour to his power and eminence
 32 astonish stun, dismay

38-9 'Tis... light From Christ's parable (Matthew 5:15, Mark 4:21, Luke 8:16 and 11:33).
 40 Yet... themselves In contrast with the candle that proverbially 'lights others and consumes itself'.
 44 want to lack in
 52 credit belief
 56-7 like... itself From the proverb, 'The sun is never the worse for shining on a dunghill'.
 58 Hold conquest let conquest remain secure 58.1 Cornetts wind instruments capable of great brilliance

 62 hopes men in whom hope is placed
 64 Vouchsafe but you if only you deign
 67.2 state persons of rank
 76.1-2 A... this The Cupid would have been suspended aloft from the stage-roof (the 'heavens'). See Introduction.
 79 arms of cross crossed or folded arms (a posture indicating sadness)
 82 crest heraldic device above shield and helmet in a coat of arms
 83 by... side inherited from the mother

During these songs, Andrugio peruses a letter delivered him by a Lord, and then [the welcome] closes with this song below

ALL THE NOBILITY

Welcome, welcome, son of fame!
Honour triumphs in thy name.

Exeunt in state [Andrugio and all the nobility except the Lord who delivered the letter]

LORD

90 Alas, poor gentleman! I brought him news
That like a cloud spread over all his glories.
When he missed her whom his eye greedily sought for,

His welcome seemed so poor he took no joy in't;
But when he found her by her father forced 95 To the old Governor's love, and kept so strictly,
A coldness struck his heart. There is no state
So firmly happy but feels envy's might.
I know Lactantio, nephew to the Cardinal,
Hates him as deeply as a rich man death;
100 And yet his welcome showed as fair and friendly
As his that wore the truest love to him;
When in his wishes he could drink his blood,
And make his heart the sweetness of his food. Exit

CELIA Madam, madam!

DUCHESS

105 Beshrew thy heart, dost thou not see me busy?
You show your manners.

CELIA In the name of goodness,
What ails my lady?

DUCHESS I confess I'm mortal.

There's no defending on't. 'Tis cruel flattery
To make a lady believe otherways.
110 Is not this flesh? Can you drive heat from fire?
So may you love from this. For love and death
Are brothers in this kingdom; only death
Comes by the mother's side, and that's the surest.
That General is wondrous fortunate:
115 Has won another field since, and a victory
That credits all the rest. He may more boast on't
Than of a thousand conquests. I am lost,

95 kept confined102 he i.e. Lactantio110 flesh (proverbially frail)110-13 Can...surest The drift is that love can only be separated from the body by consigning it to death.110 Can...fire Proverbially, 'The fire is never without heat'.111-12 love...kingdom From the biblically-derived proverb 'Love is strong as death' (Song of Solomon 8:6).112 this kingdom i.e. the body112-13 only...side Alludes to Eve's primary responsibility for original sin and its consequence, death.113 that's the surest The mother's side is proverbially surest (as the father may not be known), but also death is proverbially sure.

To lose my seven years' victory at one sight! ExeuntEnter Dondolo and the Page, with a shirt

PAGE I prithee, Dondolo, take this shirt, and air it a little against my master rises. I'd rather do anything than do't, i'faith.

DONDOLO O monstrous, horrible, terrible, intolerable! Are not you big enough to air a shirt? Were it a smock now, you lickerish page, you'd be hanged ere you'd part from't. If thou dost not prove as arrant a smell-smock as any the town affords in a term-time, I'll lose my judgement in wenching.

DONDOLO It's no more but up and ride with you then? All my generation were beades and officers; and do you think I'm so easily entreated? You shall find a harder piece of work, boy, than you imagine, to get anything from my hands. I will not disgenerate so much from the nature of my kindred. You must bribe me one way or other if you look to have anything done, or else you may do't yourself. 'Twas just my father's humour when he bore office. You know my mind, page: the song, the song. I must either have the song you sung to my master last night when he went to bed, or I'll not do a stitch of service for you from one week's end to the other. As I am a gentleman, you shall brush cloaks, make clean spurs, pull off strait boots, although in the tugging you chance to fall and hazard the breaking of your little buttocks. I'll take no more pity of your marrowbones than a butcher's dog of a rump of beef.

London)

11 It's...ride Proverbial. Implies a casual or dismissive attitude in the Page; with a sexual innuendo.12 generation familybeades low-ranking parish constables15 disgenerate Dondolo's error for degenerate.20-30 I must...boots-haling The lines are riddled with variously specific homosexual innuendos. In particular, singing can refer to fellatio.23 As...gentleman Dondolo apparently is not.24 strait narrow, tight-fitting27 marrowbones i.e. large thigh bones (the top of which are under the buttocks)

30 Nay, ka me, ka thee. If you will ease the melancholy of my mind by singing, I will deliver you from the calamity of boots-haling.

PAGE Alas, you know I cannot sing.

DONDOLO Take heed; you may speak at such an hour that your voice may be clean taken away from you. I have known many a good gentlewoman say so much as you say now, and have presently gone to bed and lay speechless. 'Tis not good to jest, as old Chaucer was wont to say, that broad famous English poet. Cannot you sing, say you? O, that a boy should so keep cut with his mother and be given to dissembling!

PAGE

40 Faith, to your knowledge in't, ill may seem well; But as I hope in comforts, I've no skill.

DONDOLO A pox of skill; give me plain simple cunning. Why should not singing be as well got without skill as the getting of children? You shall have the arrant'st fool do as much there as the wisest coxcomb of 'em all, let 'em have all the help of doctors put to 'em, both the directions of physicians and the erections of pothecaries. You shall have a plain hobnailed country fellow marrying some dairy wench tumble out two of a year, and sometimes three, by'r Lady, as the crop falls out; and your nice puling physicking gentlefolks some one in nine years, and hardly then a whole one as it should be; the wanting of some apricock or something loses a member on him, or quite spoils it. Come, will you sing, that I may warm the shirt? By this light, he shall put it on cold for me else.

PAGE A song or two I learnt with hearing gentlewomen practise themselves.

DONDOLO Come, you are so modest, now, 'tis pity that thou wast ever bred to be thrust through a pair of canions; thou wouldst have made a pretty, foolish waiting-woman, but for one thing. Wilt sing?

PAGE As well as I can, Dondolo.

28 ka me, ka thee if you scratch my back, I'll scratch yours. Ka, a corruption of claw, was used only in this proverbial expression.

32-3 you... you Alludes to the voice breaking in male adolescence (particularly dangerous for boy actors).

34-5 much... now Presumably the Page has put on a hoarse voice.

36 jest (a) trifle (as Dondolo accuses the Page); (b) make jokes

38-9 keep cut with take after, assume the same shape as. Cut is 'style of clothing', and also, unintendedly, 'cunt' (implying that the boy has a girl's sexual organs).

41 comforts i.e. divine grace

44 arrant'st most out-and-out

45-6 the... all Perhaps glances at the French King Henri IV's description of King James as 'the wisest fool in Christendom'.

45 coxcomb fool (literally 'fool's hat')

47 erections Probably used only for the phallic quibble.

48 pothecaries apothecaries, druggists

49 tumble out i.e. cause children to tumble out of in 50 by'r Lady Short for 'by our Lady', an oath by the Virgin Mary.

50-1 falls out chances, happens

51 nice delicate puling (a) whining (b) sickly physicking medicine-taking

53 wanting lack foolish probably an endearment

62 thing euphemistic for male or female genitals

DONDOLO Give me the shirt then; I'll warm't as well I can, too.

[He takes it]

Why, look, you whoreson coxcomb, this is a smock.

PAGE

No, 'tis my master's shirt.

DONDOLO

Why, that's true too; Who knows not that? Why, 'tis the fashion, fool. All your young gallants here of late wear smocks, Those without beards especially.

PAGE Why, what's the reason, sir?

DONDOLO Marry, very great reason in't. A young gallant lying abed with his wench, if the constable should chance to come up and search, being both in smocks, they'd be taken for sisters, and I hope a constable dare go no further. And as for the knowing of their heads, that's well enough too; for I know many young gentlemen wear longer hair than their mistresses.

'Tis a hot world the whilst.

DONDOLO

Nay, that's most certain, and a most witty age of a bald one for all languages. You've many daughters so well brought up they speak French naturally at fifteen, and they are turned to the Spanish and Italian half a year after.

PAGE That's like learning the grammar first and the accidence after, they go backward so.

DONDOLO

The fitter for the Italian. Thou'st no wit, boy; Hadst had a tutor, he'd have taught thee that. Come, come, that I may be gone, boy.

To keep a lady's lips in play.

Enter Duchess and Celia
- DUCHESS
Seek out the lightest colours can be got,
The youthfull'st dressings; tawny is too sad.
I am not thirty yet, I have wronged my time
To go so long in black, like a petitioner.
5 See that the powder that I use about me
Be rich in cassia.
- CELIA [leaving] Here's a sudden change.
DUCHESS [aside]
O, I'm undone, in faith!—Stay, art thou certain Lactantio, nephew to the Cardinal, was present
In the late entertainment of the General?
- 10 CELIA
Upon my reputation with your excellence,
These eyes beheld him. He came foremost, madam.
'Twas he in black and yellow.
- DUCHESS
Nay, 'tis no matter, either for himself
Or for the affectation of his colours,
So you be sure he was there.
- 15 CELIA As sure as sight
- Can discern man from man, madam.
DUCHESS It suffices. Exit [Celia]
- O, an ill cause had need of many helps,
Much art, and many friends, ay, and those mighty,
Or else it sets in shame. A faith once lost
Requires great cunning ere't be entertained 20
Into the breast of a belief again.
There's no condition so unfortunate,
Poor, miserable, to any creature given,
As hers that breaks in vow; she breaks with heaven.
[She weeps.] Enter Lord Cardinal
- LORD CARDINAL
Increase of health, and a redoubled courage 25
To chastity's great soldier! What, so sad, madam?—
The memory of her seven years' deceased lord
Springs yet into her eyes, as fresh and full
As at the seventh hour after his departure.
What a perpetual fountain is her virtue!— 30
Too much to afflict yourself with ancient sorrow
Is not so strictly for your strength required.
Your vow is charge enough, believe me 'tis, madam;
You need no weightier task.
- DUCHESS Religious sir,
You heard the last words of my dying lord. 35
- LORD CARDINAL
Which I shall ne'er forget.
- DUCHESS May I entreat
Your goodness but to speak 'em over to me
As near as memory can befriend your utterance,
That I may think a while I stand in presence
Of my departing husband?
- LORD CARDINAL What's your meaning 40
In this, most virtuous madam?
- DUCHESS 'Tis a courtesy
I stand in need of, sir, at this time specially.
Urge it no further yet. As it proves to me,
You shall hear from me; only I desire it
Effectually from you, sir; that's my request. 45

I wonder, yet I'll spare to question farther.
You shall have your desire.
- DUCHESS I thank you, sir.

LORD CARDINAL
 'You see, my lords, what all earth's glory is,
 50 Rightly defined in me: uncertain breath,
 A dream of threescore years to the long sleeper,
 To most not half the time. Beware ambition;
 Heaven is not reached with pride, but with submission.
 And you, Lord Cardinal, labour to perfect
 55 Good purposes begun; be what you seem,
 Steadfast and uncorrupt, your actions noble,
 Your goodness simple, without gain of art,
 And not in vesture holier than in heart.—
 But 'tis a pain more than the pangs of death
 60 To think that we must part, fellows of life.
 Thou richness of my joys, kind and dear princess,
 Death had no sting but for our separation;
 'Twould come more calmer than an ev'ning's peace
 That brings on rest to labours. Thou art so precious 65 I should depart in everlasting envy
 Unto the man that ever should enjoy thee.
 O, a new torment strikes his force into me
 When I but think on't; I am racked and torn.
 Pity me in thy virtues.'

DUCHESS 'My loved lord,
 70 Let your confirmed opinion of my life,
 My love, my faithful love, seal an assurance
 Of quiet to your spirit, that no forgetfulness
 Can cast a sleep so deadly on my senses
 To draw my affections to a second liking.'

LORD CARDINAL
 75 'T 'as ever been thy promise, and the spring
 Of my great love to thee. For once to marry
 Is honourable in woman, and her ignorance
 Stands for a virtue, coming new and fresh.
 But second marriage shows desires in flesh;
 80 Thence lust and heat and common custom grows.
 But she's part virgin who but one man knows.
 I here expect a work of thy great faith
 At my last parting. I can crave no more,
 And with thy vow I rest myself for ever;
 85 My soul and it shall fly to heaven together.

Seal to my spirit that quiet satisfaction,
 And I go hence in peace.'

DUCHESS 'Then here I vow, never—'

LORD CARDINAL
 Why, madam!

DUCHESS I can go no further.

LORD CARDINAL What,
 Have you forgot your vow?

DUCHESS I have, too certainly.

LORD CARDINAL
 Your vow? That cannot be; it follows now
 90 Just where I left.

DUCHESS My frailty gets before it.
 Nothing prevails but ill.

LORD CARDINAL What, ail you, madam?

DUCHESS
 Sir, I'm in love.

LORD CARDINAL O all you powers of chastity,
 Look to this woman! Let her not faint now
 For honour of yourselves. If she be lost
 95 I know not where to seek my hope in woman.
 Madam, O madam!

DUCHESS My desires are sickened
 Beyond recovery of good counsel, sir.

LORD CARDINAL
 What mischief owed a malice to the sex,
 To work this spiteful ill? Better the man
 100 Had never known creation than to live
 Th'unlucky ruin of so fair a temple.
 Yet think upon your vow, revive in faith;
 Those are eternal things. What are all pleasures,
 Flatteries of men, and follies upon earth,
 105 To your most excellent goodness? O, she's dead,
 Stark cold to any virtuous claim within her.
 What now is heat is sin's. Have I approved
 Your constancy for this, called your faith noble,
 Writ volumes of your victories and virtues?
 110 I have undone my judgement, lost my praises,
 Blemished the truth of my opinion.
 Give me the man, that I may pour him out
 To all contempt and curses.

	DUCHESS	The man's innocent,	Allowed for natural argument. 'Tis she
115		Full of desert and grace; his name, Lactantio.	That loves my nephew, she that loves, loves first.
	LORD CARDINAL	How?	What cause have I to lay a blame on him then?	5
	DUCHESS	Your nephew.	He's in no fault in this. Say 'twas his fortune
	LORD CARDINAL	My nephew!	At the free entertainment of the General,

ANDRUGIO [aside]
I was about to call her, and she stays
20 Of her own gift, as if she knew my mind.
Certain she knows me not, not possible.

AURELIA [aside]
What if I left my token and my letter
With this strange fellow, so to be conveyed Without suspicion to Lactantio's servant?
25 Not so, I'll trust no freshman with such secrets.
His ignorance may mistake, and give't to one
That may belong to th' General, for I know
He sets some spies about me; but all he gets Shall not be worth his pains. I would Lactantio 30 Would seek some means to free me from this place.
'Tis prisonment enough to be a maid;
But to be mewed up too, that case is hard,
As if a toy were kept by a double guard.

ANDRUGIO [aside]
Away she steals again, not minding me.
'Twas not at me she offered.—Hark you, gentlewo-35 man.

AURELIA
With me, sir?

ANDRUGIO I could call you by your name,
But gentle's the best attribute to woman.

AURELIA
Andrugio! O, as welcome to my lips
As morning dew to roses! My first love!

ANDRUGIO
Why, have you more then?
AURELIA What a word was there!
40 More than thyself what woman could desire,
If reason had a part of her creation?
For loving you, you see, sir, I'm a prisoner;
There's all the cause they have against me, sir;
A happy persecution, I so count on't.
45 If anything be done to me for your sake,
'Tis pleasing to me.

ANDRUGIO Are you not abused,
Either through force or by your own consent?
Hold you your honour perfect and unstained?
Are you the same still that at my departure
50 My honest thoughts maintained you to my heart?

AURELIA
The same, most just.

ANDRUGIO Swear't.

AURELIA By my hope of fruitfulness,
Love, and agreement, the three joys of marriage.

ANDRUGIO
I am confirmed, and in requital on't
Ere long expect your freedom.

AURELIA O, you flatter me!

So suddenly upon affliction.

'Tis like a surfeit after a great feast.

To stir your care up to prevention—
Misfortunes must be told as well as blessings—
When I left all my friends in Mantua
For your love's sake alone, then with strange oaths
You promised present marriage.

15 LACTANTIO 'With strange oaths', quoth a?
They're not so strange to me. I have sworn the same things,
I am sure, forty times over; not so little.
I may be perfect in 'em, for my standing.

You see 'tis high time now, sir.

LACTANTIO Yes, yes, yes.

If I should marry all those I have promised, us.

Because she suckled the father. No ill course,

Now, Dondolo, the news?

DONDOLO The news?

LACTANTIO How does she?

DONDOLO
30 Soft, soft, sir, you think 'tis nothing to get news
Out o'th' castle? I was there.

LACTANTIO Well, sir?

DONDOLO As you know,
A merry fellow may pass anywhere.

LACTANTIO So, sir?

DONDOLO
35 Never in better fooling in my life.
LACTANTIO What's this to th' purpose?
DONDOLO Nay, 'twas nothing to th' purpose, that's certain.
LACTANTIO
How wretched this slave makes me! Didst not see her?

DONDOLO
I saw her.

LACTANTIO
Well, what said she, then?

DONDOLO Not a word, sir.

LACTANTIO
How, not a word?

DONDOLO Proves her the better maid,
For virgins should be seen more than they're heard.

LACTANTIO
Exceeding good, sir; you are no sweet villain.

DONDOLO
No, faith, sir, for you keep me in foul linen.

LACTANTIO
Turned scurvy rhymers, are you?

DONDOLO Not scurvy neither,
Though I be somewhat itchy in the profession.
If you could hear me out with patience,
I know her mind as well as if I were in her belly.

LACTANTIO
Thou saidst e'en now she never spake a word.

DONDOLO
But she gave certain signs, and that's as good.

LACTANTIO
Canst thou conceive by signs?

DONDOLO O, passing well, sir,
E'en from an infant; did you ne'er know that?
I was the happiest child in all our country;
I was born of a dumb woman.

LACTANTIO How?

DONDOLO Stark dumb, sir. My father had a rare bargain of her, a rich pennyworth. There would have been but too much money given for her. A Justice of Peace was about her, but my father, being then constable, carried her before him.

LACTANTIO
Well, since we are entered into these dumb-shows,
What were the signs she gave you?

DONDOLO Many and good, sir.

That I shall make two noddies of my keepers.'

There's no good quality in him. O' my conscience,
I think he scarce knows how to stride a horse.
I saw him with a little hunting nag
But thus high t'other day, and he was fain to lead

'Fool' to my face still! That's unreasonable.
I will be a knave one day for this trick, or it shall cost me a fall, though it be from a gibbet—
It has been many a proper man's last leap.
Nay, sure I'll be quite out of the precincts of a fool if I 105

I will turn Gypsy presently,
And that's the highway to the daintiest knave
That ever mother's son took journey to.
O, those dear Gypsies, 110
They live the merriest lives, eat sweet stol'n hens
Plucked over pales or hedges by a twitch;
They are ne'er without a plump and lovely goose,
Or beautiful sow-pig.
Those things I saw with mine own eyes today. 115
They call those vanities and trifling pilf'ries,
But if a privy search were made amongst 'em
They should find other manner of ware about 'em:
Cups, rings, and silver spoons, by'r Lady, bracelets,
Pearl necklaces, and chains of gold sometimes. 120

But e'en go look what I can steal now presently,

Enter Lord Cardinal

LORD CARDINAL
 What ails this pretty boy to weep so often?
 Tell me the cause, child. How his eyes stand full!
 Beshrew you, nephew, you're too bitter to him.
 135 He is so soft th'unkindness of a word
 Melts him into a woman. 'Las, poor boy,
 Thou shalt not serve him longer. 'Twere great pity
 That thou shouldst wait upon an angry master.
 I have promised thee to one will make much of thee,
 140 And hold thy weak youth in most dear respect.
 PAGE
 O, I beseech your grace, that I may serve
 No master else.
 LORD CARDINAL
 Thou shalt not. Mine's a mistress,
 The greatest mistress in all Milan, boy:
 The Duchess' self.
 PAGE
 Nor her, nor any.
 LORD CARDINAL
 Cease, boy,
 Thou knowest not thine own happiness, through 145 fondness,
 And therefore must be learnt. Go dry thine eyes.
 PAGE
 This rather is the way to make 'em moister. Exit
 LORD CARDINAL
 Now nephew, nephew.
 LACTANTIO
 O, you've snatched my spirit, sir,
 From the divinest meditation
 That ever made soul happy.
 150 LORD CARDINAL [aside] I am afraid
 I shall have as much toil to bring him on now
 As I had pains to keep her off from him.—
 I have thought it fit, nephew, considering
 The present barrenness of our name and house
 155 (The only famine of succeeding honour)
 To move the ripeness of your time to marriage.
 LACTANTIO
 How, sir, to marriage?
 LORD CARDINAL
 Yes, to a fruitful life.
 We must not all be strict; so generation
 Would lose her right. Thou'rt young; 'tis my desire 160 To see thee bestowed happily in my lifetime.

LACTANTIO
 Does your grace well remember who I am
 When you speak this?
 LORD CARDINAL
 Yes, very perfectly;
 You're a young man, full in the grace of life,
 And made to do love credit; proper, handsome,
 And for affection pregnant.
 LACTANTIO
 I beseech you, sir,
 165 Take off your praises rather than bestow 'em
 Upon so frail a use. Alas, you know, sir,
 I know not what love is, or what you speak of.
 If woman be amongst it, I shall swoon. Take her away,
 For contemplation's sake. Most serious uncle,
 170 Name no such thing to me.
 LORD CARDINAL
 Come, come, you're fond.
 Prove but so strict and obstinate in age,
 And you are well to pass. There's honest love
 Allowed you now for recreation.
 The years will come when all delights must leave you;
 175 Stick close to virtue then. In the mean time
 There's honourable joys to keep youth company;
 And if death take you there, dying no adulterer,
 You're out of his eternal reach, defy him.
 List hither, come to me, and with great thankfulness
 180 Welcome thy fortunes. 'Tis the Duchess loves thee.
 LACTANTIO
 The Duchess!
 LORD CARDINAL
 Dotes on thee, will die for thee
 Unless she may enjoy thee.
 LACTANTIO
 She must die then.
 LORD CARDINAL
 How?
 LACTANTIO
 Alas, do you think she ever means to do't, sir?
 I'll sooner believe all a woman speaks
 185 Than that she'll die for love. She has a vow, my lord,
 That will keep life in her.
 LORD CARDINAL
 Believe me, then,
 That should have bounteous interest in thy faith,
 She's thine, and not her vow's.
 LACTANTIO
 The more my sorrow,
 My toil, and my destruction. [Aside] My blood dances. 190

LORD CARDINAL And though that bashful maiden virtue in thee, That never held familiar league with woman, Binds fast all pity to her heart that loves thee, Let me prevail. My counsel stands up to thee; 195 Embrace it as the fullness of thy fortunes, As if all blessings upon earth were closed Within one happiness; for such another Whole life could never meet with. Go and present Your service and your love; but, on your hopes, 200 Do it religiously. [Aside] What need I doubt him, Whom chastity locks up? LACTANTIO [aside] O envy, Hadst thou no other means to come by virtue But by such treachery? The Duchess' love! Thou wouldst be sure to aim it high enough; 205 Thou knew'st full well 'twas no prevailing else.— Sir, what your will commands, mine shall fulfil. I'll teach my heart in all t'obey your will. LORD CARDINAL A thing you shall not lose by. Enter Lords Here come the lords. Go follow you the course that I advised you. 210 The comfort of thy presence is expected. Away with speed to court; she languishes For one dear sight of thee. For life's sake, haste. You lose my favour if you let her perish. LACTANTIO [aside] And art thou come, brave fortune, the reward 215 Of neat hypocrisy, that ever booked it, Or turned up transitory white o'th' eye After the feminine rapture? Duchess and I Were a fit match can be denied of no man: The best dissembler lights on the best woman. 220 'Twere sin to part us. Exit LORD CARDINAL You lights of state, truth's friends, much honoured lords, Faithful admirers of our Duchess' virtues, And firm believers: it appears as plain As knowledge to the eyes of industry 225 That neither private motion, which holds counsel Often with woman's frailty and her blood, Nor public sight, the lightning of temptations	Which from the eye strikes sparks into the bosom And sets whole hearts on fire, hath power to raise A heat in her 'bove that which feeds chaste life 230 And gives that cherishing means. She's the same still, And seems so seriously employed in soul As if she could not tend to cast an eye Upon deserts so low as those in man. It merits famous memory, I confess. 235 Yet many times, when I behold her youth And think upon the lost hopes of posterity, Succession, and the royal fruits of beauty, All by the rashness of one vow made desperate, It goes so near my heart I feel it painful, 240 And wakes me into pity oftentimes, When others sleep unmoved. FIRST LORD I speak it faithfully, For 'tis poor fame to boast of a disease: Your grace has not endured that pain alone; 'T 'as been a grief of mine; but where's the remedy? 245 LORD CARDINAL True, there your lordship spake enough in little. There's nothing to be hoped for but repulses. She's not to seek for armour against love That has bid battle to his powers so long. 250 He that should try her now had need come strong, And with more force than his own arguments, Or he may part disgraced, being put to flight. That soldier's tough has been in seven years' fight; Her vow's invincible. For you must grant this: 255 If those desires trained up in flesh and blood To war continually 'gainst good intents Prove all too weak for her, having advantage Both of her sex and her unskillfulness At a spiritual weapon, wanting knowledge 260 To manage resolution, and yet win, What force can a poor argument bring in? The books that I have published in her praise Commend her constancy, and that's fame-worthy; But if you read me o'er with eyes of enemies, 265 You cannot justly and with honour tax me That I dissuade her life from marriage there. Now heaven and fruitfulness forbid, not I. She may be constant there; and the hard war Of chastity is held a virtuous strife 270 As rare in marriage as in single life,

Nay, by some writers, rarer. Hear their reasons,
 And you'll approve 'em fairly. She that's single,
 Either in maid or widow, oftentimes
 The fear of shame more than the fear of heaven 275 Keeps chaste and constant. When the tempest comes
 She knows she has no shelter for her sin;
 It must endure the weathers of all censure.
 Nothing but sea and air that poor barque feels;
 When she in wedlock is like a safe vessel
 280 That lies at anchor. Come what weathers can,
 She has her harbour. At her great unlading
 Much may be stol'n, and little missed; the master Thinks himself rich enough with what he has,
 And holds content by that. How think you now, lords?
 285 If she that might offend safe does not err,
 What's chaste in others is most rare in her.

SECOND LORD
 What wisdom but approves it?

FIRST LORD But, my lord,
 This should be told to her it concerns most;
 Pity such good things should be spoke and lost.

LORD CARDINAL
 290 That were the way to lose 'em utterly.
 You quite forget her vow. Yet, now I think on't,
 What is that vow? 'Twas but a thing enforced,
 Was it not, lords?

FIRST LORD Merely compelled, indeed.

LORD CARDINAL
 Only to please the Duke; and forcèd virtue 295 Fails in her merit, there's no crown prepared for't.
 What have we done, my lords? I fear we have sinned
 In too much strictness to uphold her in't,
 In cherishing her will; for woman's goodness
 Takes counsel of that first, and then determines.
 300 She cannot truly be called constant now
 If she persèvere; rather obstinate,
 The vow appearing forcèd, as it proves
 Tried by our purer thoughts. The grace and triumph
 Of all her victories are but idle glories,
 305 She wilful, and we enemies to succession.
 I will not take rest till I tell her soul
 As freely as I talk to those I keep.

ALL LORDS
 And we'll all second you, my lord.

LORD CARDINAL Agreed.
 We'll knit such knots of arguments so fast
 310 All wit in her shall not undo in haste.

SECOND LORD
 Nay, sure, I think all we shall be too hard for her,

Else she's a huge wild creature.
 FIRST LORD [aside] If we win
 And she yield marriage, then will I strike in. Exeunt

3.2 DUCHESS
 Thou tell'st me happy things, if they be certain,
 To bring my wishes about wondrous strangely.
 Lactantio, nephew to the Cardinal,
 The General's secret enemy?

CELIA Most true, madam.
 I had it from a gentleman, my kinsman,
 That knows the best part of Lactantio's bosom.

DUCHESS
 It happens passing fortunately, to save
 Employment in another. He will 'come now
 A necessary property. He may thank
 The need and use we have of him for his welcome. 10
Knocks within
 Now who's that knocks?

CELIA Madam, 'tis he, with speed.
 I thought he had brought his horse to th' chamber door,
 He made such haste and noise.

DUCHESS Admit him, prithee,
 And have a care your heart be true and secret.

CELIA
 Take life away from't when it fails you, madam. 15

DUCHESS
 Enough, I know thee wise. Exit [Celia]
Enter Lactantio, [hastily]
 He comes with haste indeed.—Are you come now, sir?
 You should have stayed yet longer, and have found
 me
 Dead, to requite your haste.

LACTANTIO Love bless you better, madam.

DUCHESS
 Must I bid welcome to the man undoes me,
 20 The cause of my vow's breach, my honour's enemy,
 One that does all the mischief to my fame,
 And mocks my seven years' conquest with his name?
 This is a force of love was never felt.
 But I'll not grudge at fortune; I will take 25 Captivity cheerfully. Here, seize upon me;
 And if thy heart can be so pitiless
 To chain me up for ever in those arms,
 I'll take it mildly, ay, and thank my stars;
 For we're all subject to the chance of wars. 30

LACTANTIO
 We are so, yet take comfort, vanquished Duchess.

- I'll use you like an honourable prisoner;
You shall be entreated. Day shall be Free for all sports to you, the night for me.
35 That's all I challenge, all the rest is thine;
And, for your fare, 't shall be no worse than mine.
- DUCHESS
Nay, then I'm heartily pleasant, and as merry
As one that owes no malice, and that's well, sir.
You cannot say so much for your part, can you?
- LACTANTIO
40 Faith, all that I owe is to one man, madam,
And so can few men say. Marry, that malice
Wears no dead flesh about it, 'tis a stinger.
- DUCHESS
What is he that shall dare to be your enemy,
Having our friendship, if he be a servant
And subject to our law?
- 45 LACTANTIO Yes, trust me, madam.
Of a vile fellow, I hold him a true subject.
There's many arrant knaves that are good subjects,
Some for their livings' sakes, some for their lives',
That will, unseen, eat men, and drink their wives.
- DUCHESS
50 They are as much in fault that know such people
And yet conceal 'em from the whips of justice.
For love's sake give me in your foe betimes,
Before he vex you further. I will order him
To your heart's wishes, load him with disgraces,
55 That your revenge shall rather pity him
Than wish more weight upon him.
- LACTANTIO Say you so, madam?
[Aside] Here's a blest hour, that feeds both love and hate;
Then take thy time, brave malice.—Virtuous princess,
The only enemy that my vengeance points to Lives in Andrugio.
- 60 DUCHESS What, the General?
LACTANTIO That's the man, madam.
DUCHESS Are you serious, sir?
LACTANTIO As at my prayers.
DUCHESS We meet happily, then,
In both our wishes. He's the only man
My will has had a longing to disgrace,
65 For divers capital contempts. My memory
- Shall call 'em all together now. Nay, sir,
I'll bring his faith in war now into question,
And his late conference with th'enemy.
- LACTANTIO
By'r Lady, a shrewd business, and a dangerous.
[Aside] Signor, your neck's a-cracking.
- DUCHESS Stay, stay, sir. 70
Take pen and ink.
LACTANTIO Here's both, and paper, madam.
DUCHESS I'll take him in a fine trap.
LACTANTIO That were exc'llent.
DUCHESS A letter so writ would abuse him strangely.
LACTANTIO Good madam, let me understand your mind,
And then take you no care for his abusing; 75
I serve for nothing else. I can write fast and fair
Most true orthography, and observe my stops.
DUCHESS Stay, stay a while,
You do not know his hand?
LACTANTIO A bastard Roman,
Much like mine own. I could go near it, madam. 80
DUCHESS Marry, and shall.
LACTANTIO We were once great together,
And writ Spanish epistles one to another,
To exercise the language.
DUCHESS Did you so?
It shall be a bold letter of temptation
With his name to't, as writ and sent to me. 85
LACTANTIO Can be no better, lady. Stick there, madam,
And never seek further.
DUCHESS Begin thus: 'Fair Duchess', say.
We must use flattery if we imitate man;
'Twill ne'er be thought his pen else.
LACTANTIO 'Most fair Duchess'.
DUCHESS What need you have put in 'most'? Yet since 'tis in, 90
Let't e'en go on. Few women would find fault with't.
We all love to be best, but seldom mend.
Go on, sir.

 Now, Fortune, show thyself the friend of love.
 Make her way plain and safe; cast all their eyes

 Into a thicker blindness than thine own,
 Darker than ignorance or idolatry,

 And by her freedom set my comforts free.
 This is the place appointed for our meeting.
 Yet comes she not. I am covetous of her sight.
 That Gypsy habit alters her so far
 10 From knowledge that our purpose cannot err.
 She might have been here now by this time, largely,
 And much to spare. I would not miss her now
 In this plight for the loss of a year's joy.
 She's ignorant of this house, nor knows she where 15 Or which way to bestow herself, through fear.

Enter Aurelia, like a Gypsy

AURELIA

I'm happily escaped. Not one pursues me;
 This shape's too cunning for 'em. All the sport was
 The porter would needs know his fortune of me
 As I passed by him. 'Twas such a plunge to me,
 I knew not how to bear myself. At last
 I did resolve of somewhat: looked in's hand,
 Then shook my head, bade him make much on's eyes,
 He would lose his sight clean, long before he dies.
 And so away went I; he lost the sight of me quickly. I told him his fortune truer for nothing than some of my complexion that would have cozened him of his money.
 This is the place of meeting. Where's this man now
 That has took all this care and pains for nothing?
 The use of him is at the last cast now.
 Shall only bring me to my former face again,
 And see me somewhat cleaner, at his cost,
 And then farewell Andrugio. When I am handsome
 I'm for another straight. I wonder, troth,
 That he would miss me thus. I could have took
 Many occasions besides this to have left him.
 I'm not in want; he need not give me any.
 A woman's will has still enough to spare
 To help her friends, an need be. What, not yet?
 What will become of me in this shape then?
 If I know where to go I'm no dissembler;
 And I'll not lose my part in woman so,
 For such a trifle to forswear myself.
 But comes he not indeed?

Enter Dondolo

DONDOLO

O excellent! By this light, here's one of them.

I thank my stars. I learnt that phrase in the Half Moon Tavern.—By your leave, good Gypsy, I pray how far off

AURELIA [aside]

O happiness! This is the merry fellow
 My love Signor Lactantio takes delight in.
 I'll send him away speedily with the news
 Of my so strange and fortunate escape,
 And he'll provide my safety at an instant.—
 My friend, thou serv'st Signor Lactantio.

DONDOLO Who, I serve? Gypsy, I scorn your motion. An if the rest of your company give me no better words,
 I will hinder 'em the stealing of more pullen than fifty poulturers were ever worth, and prove a heavier enemy to all their pig booties; they shall travel like Jews, that hate swine's flesh, and never get a sow by th' ear all their lifetime. I serve Lactantio? I scorn to serve anybody, I am more Gypsy-minded than so. Though my face look of a Christian colour, if my belly were ripped up you shall find my heart as black as any patch about you. The truth is, I am as arrant a thief as the proudest of your company, I'll except none. I am run away from my master in the state of a fool, and till I be a perfect knave I never mean to return again.

AURELIA [aside]

I'm ne'er the happier for this fortune now.
 It did but mock me.

THIRD GYPSY
	We snort.
CAPTAIN	We sport in tents; Then rouse betimes, and steal our dinners. Our store is never taken
65	Without pigs, hens, or bacon, And that's good meat for sinners. At wakes and fairs we cozen Poor country folks by dozen. If one have money, he disburses; Whilst some tell fortunes, some pick purses.
70	Rather than be out of use, We'll steal garters, hose, or shoes, Boots, or spurs with jingling rowels, Shirts or napkins, smocks or towels.
75	Come live with us, come live with us, All you that love your eases. He that's a Gypsy May be drunk or tipsy At what hour he pleases.
ALL GYPSIES

- CAPTAIN
Stretch forth thy hand, coz. Art thou fortunate?
DONDOLO How, fortunate? Nay, I cannot tell that myself.
135 Wherefore do I come to you but to learn that? I have sometimes found money in old shoes, but if I had not stol'n more than I have found, I had had but a scurvy thin-cheeked fortune on't.
- CAPTAIN [studying Dondolo's palm] Here's a fair table.
140 DONDOLO Ay, so has many a man that has given over housekeeping: a fair table when there's neither cloth nor meat upon't.
- CAPTAIN
What a brave line of life's here, look you, Gypsies.
DONDOLO
I have known as brave a line end in a halter.
CAPTAIN [stealing Dondolo's money]
145 But thou art born to precious fortune.
DONDOLO The devil I am!
CAPTAIN Bette, Bucketto.
DONDOLO How, to beat bucks?
CAPTAIN Stealee Bacono.
150 DONDOLO O, to steal bacon, that's the better fortune o'th' two indeed.
- CAPTAIN
Thou wilt be shortly Captain of the Gypsies.
DONDOLO
I would you'd make me corporal i'th' mean time, Or standard-bearer to the women's regiment.
- CAPTAIN
Much may be done for love.
155 DONDOLO Nay, here's some money.
I know an office comes not all for love.—
A pox of your lime-twigs, you have't all already.
- CAPTAIN
It lies but here in cache for thine own use, boy.
DONDOLO Nay, an't lie there once I shall hardly come to the fing'ring on't in haste. Yet make me an apt scholar, and I care not. Teach me but so much Gypsy to steal as much more from another, and the devil do you good of that.
160
- CAPTAIN
Thou shalt have all thy heart requires.
First, here's a girl for thy desires. 165
[He presents Aurelia to Dondolo]
This doxy fresh, this new-come dell,
Shall lie by thy sweet side and swell.
Get me Gypsies brave and tawny,
With cheek full plump and hip full brawny.
Look you prove industrious dealers 170
To serve the commonwealth with stealers,
That th'unhoused race of fortune-tellers
May never fail to cheat town-dwellers,
Or to our universal grief
Leave country fairs without a thief. 175
This is all you have to do,
Save ev'ry hour a filch or two,
Be it money, cloth or pullen.
When the ev'ning's brow looks sullen,
Lose no time, for then 'tis precious. 180
Let your sleights be fine, facetious;
Which hoping you'll observe, to try thee,
With rusty bacon thus I Gypsify thee.
[He marks Dondolo's face with rusty bacon]
- DONDOLO
Do you use to do't with bacon?
CAPTAIN Evermore.
DONDOLO By this light, the rats will take me now for some hog's cheek, and eat up my face when I am asleep. I shall have ne'er a bit left by tomorrow morning; and lying open mouthed, as I use to do, I shall look for all the world like a mousetrap baited with bacon. 185
- CAPTAIN
Why, here's a face like thine, so done, Only grained in by the sun, and this, and these. 190
- DONDOLO Faith, then there's a company of bacon-faces of you, and I am one now to make up the number. We are a kind of conscionable people, and 'twere well thought upon for to steal bacon and black our faces with't: 'tis like one that commits sin, and writes his faults in his forehead. 195

CAPTAIN Wit, whither wilt thou?
 DONDOLO Marry, to the next pocket I can come at, and if 200 it be a gentleman's I wish a whole quarter's rent in't.
 Is this my 'in dock, out nettle'? What's Gypsy for her?
 CAPTAIN
 Your doxy she.
 DONDOLO O, right. Are you my doxy, sirrah?
 AURELIA
 I'll be thy doxy and thy dell.
 With thee I'll live, for thee I'll steal.
 205 From fair to fair, from wake to wake,
 I'll ramble still for thy sweet sake.
 DONDOLO O dainty fine doxy! She speaks the language as familiarly already as if she'd been begot of a canter. I pray, captain, what's Gypsy for the hind quarter of a 210 woman?
 CAPTAIN Nosario.
 DONDOLO Nosario. Why, what's Gypsy for my nose then?
 CAPTAIN Why, arsinio.
 DONDOLO Arsinio? Faith, methinks you might have devised 215 a sweeter word for't.
Enter Father and Governor
 CAPTAIN
 Stop, stop; fresh booties, gentlefolks,
Signoros, cavallario, folkadelio.
 SECOND GYPSY Lagnambrol a tumbrel.
 DONDOLO How? Give me one word amongst you, that I 220 may be doing too.
 AURELIA [aside]
 Yonder they are again. O guiltiness, Thou putt'st more trembling fear into a maid
 Than the first wedding night. Take courage, wench;
 Thy face cannot betray thee with a blush now.
 225 FATHER [to the Governor]
 Which way she took her flight, sir, none can guess,
 Or how she scaped.
 GOVERNOR Out at some window, certainly.
 FATHER
 O, 'tis a bold daring baggage!
 GOVERNOR See, good fortune, sir,
 The Gypsies; they're the cunning'st people living.
 FATHER
 230 They cunning? what a confidence have you, sir!
 No wise man's faith was ever set in fortunes.

GOVERNOR
 You are the wilful'st man against all learning still.
 I will be hanged now if I hear not news
 Of her amongst this company.
 FATHER
 You are a gentleman of the flatt'ring'st hopes
 That e'er lost woman yet.
 GOVERNOR [to Aurelia] Come hither, Gypsy. 235
 AURELIA [aside]
 Luck now, or I'm undone.—What says my master?
 Bless me with a silver cross,
 And I will tell you all your loss.
 GOVERNOR
 Lo you there, sir: 'all my loss', at first word too.
 There is no cunning in these Gypsies now? 240
 FATHER
 Sure I'll hear more of this.
 GOVERNOR [to Aurelia] Here's silver for you.
 AURELIA
 Now attend your fortune's story.
 You loved a maid.
 GOVERNOR Right.
 AURELIA She never loved you.
 You shall find my words are true.
 GOVERNOR
 Mass, I am afraid so.
 AURELIA You were about 245
 To keep her in, but could not do't.
 Alas the while, she would not stay.
 The cough o'th' lungs blew her away.
 And, which is worse, you'll be so crossed
 You'll never find the thing that's lost. 250
 Yet oftentimes your sight will fear her;
 She'll be near you, and yet you ne'er the nearer.
 Let her go, and be the gladder;
 She'd but shame you, if you had her.
 Ten counsellors could never school her. 255
 She's so wild, you could not rule her.
 GOVERNOR
 In troth I am of thy mind, yet I'd fain find her.
 AURELIA
 Soonest then, when you least mind her;
 But if you mean to take her tripping,
 Make but haste; she's now a-shipping. 260

198 Wit...thou Proverbial phrase addressed to someone talking too much or foolishly. Dondolo takes it literally.
 201 in dock, out nettle Originally chanted when a dock-leaf was rubbed on the skin to relieve nettle-sting. Proverbial for changeability, but here suggesting the 'in' and 'out' of both copulation and thieving. Dock is prompted by the word Dondolo is searching for, doxy.
 202 sirrah Often jocularly applied to women.
 203-6 I'll...sake In the manner of a reply to Marlowe's pastoral lyric "The Passionate Shepherd to his Love', which begins 'Come live with me, and be my love'. There were several imitations and replies.

 208 canter user of thieves' or Gypsies' cant; vagabond
 213 arsinio Quibbling on arse. An appropriate 'Gypsy' word as a recollection of Arsinoe, Queen of Egypt.
 215 sweeter sweeter-smelling
 217 cavallario (suggesting 'cavalier, gentleman') 218 Lagnambrol a tumbrel (perhaps disguising amble and tumble, 'act as decoy')

 227 baggage strumpet, good-for-nothing
 237 cross coin (with a cross stamped on it) 245 Mass by the Mass about busy, contriving
 248 cough o'th' lungs (a trait of old men such as the Governor)
 249 crossed thwarted
 252 ne'er the nearer Proverbial.
 260 a-shipping boarding ship (also, quibblingly, 'loading herself with freight', i.e. stealing)

We'll mar your voyage; you shall brook no sea.

Cheateroon, high gulleroon.

DONDOLO

265 I can say somewhat too.

ALL GYPSIES Excellent Gypsy, witty rare doxy.

DONDOLO I would not change my dell for a dozen of black bell-wethers.

CAPTAIN
Our wealth swells high, my boys.

DONDOLO

4.3 Enter Duchess, Lord Cardinal, and other Lords

LORD CARDINAL
That which is merely called a will in woman,
I cannot always title it with a virtue.

DUCHESS
O good sir, spare me.

LORD CARDINAL Spare yourself, good madam.
Extremest justice is not so severe

5 To great offenders as your own forced strictness
To beauty, youth and time. You'll answer for't.

DUCHESS
Sir, settle your own peace; let me make mine.

LORD CARDINAL
But here's a heart must pity it. When it thinks on't,
I find compassion, though the smart be yours.

FIRST LORD
None here but does the like.

10 SECOND LORD Believe it, madam,

You have much wronged your time.

FIRST LORD Nay, let your grace
But think upon the barrenness of succession.

SECOND LORD
Nay, more, a vow enforced.

DUCHESS
What, do you all
Forsake me then, and take part with yon man?
Not one friend have I left? Do they all fight 15 Under th'inglorious banner of his censure,
Serve under his opinion?

LORD CARDINAL
So will all, madam,
Whose judgements can but taste a rightful cause.
I look for more force yet; nay, your own women
Will shortly rise against you when they know
20 The war to be so just and honourable
As marriage is. You cannot name that woman
Will not come ready armed for such a cause.
Can chastity be any whit impaired
By that which makes it perfect? Answer, madam.
25 Do you profess constancy, and yet live alone?
How can that hold? You're constant, then, to none.
That's a dead virtue. Goodness must have practice,
Or else it ceases. Then is woman said
To be love-chaste knowing but one man's bed—
30 A mighty virtue. Beside, fruitfulness
Is part of the salvation of your sex;
And the true use of wedlock's time and space
Is woman's exercise for faith and grace.

DUCHESS
O, what have you done, my lord?

LORD CARDINAL Laid the way plain
35 To knowledge of yourself and your creation;
Unbound a forcèd vow that was but knit
By the strange jealousy of your dying lord,
Sinful i'th' fast'ning.

DUCHESS
All the powers of constancy
Will curse you for this deed.

LORD CARDINAL
You speak in pain, madam,
40 And so I take your words like one in sickness
That rails at his best friend. I know a change
Of disposition has a violent working
In all of us; 'tis fit it should have time
And counsel with itself. May you be fruitful, madam, 45 In all the blessings of an honoured love.

FIRST LORD
In all your wishes fortunate, [aside] and I
The chief of 'em myself.

LORD CARDINAL Peace be at your heart, lady.

261 I...much Dreams were supposed to be capable of showing distant or future events.
262 brook endure
263 gulleroon (based on guller, which is synonymous with cheater) 268 bell-wethers Castrated rams that led flocks of sheep, so-called because they carried a bell round their necks.

4.3-9 smart affliction
11 wronged your time (a) misspent your time; or (b) wronged your youth
19 force military forces
21-2 so...is See note to 2.1.76-7.
28-9 That's...ceases From the proverb 'Virtue must be practised, not praised'.

31-2 fruitfulness...sex (referring to the Protestant doctrine that motherhood was a woman's Christian duty)
34 exercise practice of virtue (perhaps also with reference to the sense 'military training')
36 your creation i.e. the specific nature and purpose of your being in the world

50 FIRST LORD And love, say I.
LORD CARDINAL
We'll leave good thoughts now to bring in themselves.
Exeunt Lord Cardinal and Lords

DUCHESS
O, there's no art like a religious cunning!
It carries away all things smooth before it.
How subtly has his wit dealt with the lords,
55 To fetch in their persuasions to a business
That stands in need of none, yields of itself,
As most we women do when we seem farthest!
But little thinks the Cardinal he's requited
After the same proportion of deceit
60 As he sets down for others.
Enter Page
O, here's the pretty boy he preferred to me.
I never saw a meeker, gentler youth
Yet made for man's beginning. How unfit
Was that poor fool to be Lactantio's page!
65 He would have spoiled him quite, in one year utterly;
There had been no hope of him. Come hither, child,
I have forgot thy name.

PAGE Antonio, madam.

DUCHESS Antonio! So thou told'st me. I must chide thee:
Why didst thou weep when thou cam'st first to serve
me?

PAGE At the distrust of mine own merits, madam,
70 Knowing I was not born to those deserts
To please so great a mistress.

DUCHESS 'Las, poor boy,
That's nothing in thee but thy modest fear,
Which makes amends faster than thou canst err.
75 It shall be my care to have him well brought up
As a youth apt for good things. Celia!
[Enter Celia]

CELIA Madam.

DUCHESS Has he bestowed his hour today for music?

CELIA Yes, he has, madam.

DUCHESS How do you find his voice?

CELIA A pretty, womanish, faint, sprawling voice, madam;
80 But 'twill grow strong in time if he take care
To keep it, when he has it, from fond exercises.

DUCHESS Give order to the dancing-schoolmaster
Observe an hour with him.

CELIA It shall be done, lady.
He is well made for dancing, thick i'th' chest, madam.
He will turn long and strongly. 85

DUCHESS He shall not be behind a quality
That aptness in him or our cost can purchase;
And see he lose no time.

CELIA I'll take that order, madam.

PAGE [aside]
Singing and dancing! 'Las, my case is worse.
I rather need a midwife and a nurse. 90
Exeunt Celia and Page

DUCHESS Lactantio, my procurer, not returned yet?
His malice I have fitted with an office
Which he takes pleasure to discharge with rigour.
Enter General [Andrugio], Lactantio, and the guard
He comes, and with him my heart's conqueror.
My pleasing thralldom's near.

ANDRUGIO [to Lactantio] Not know the cause? 95

LACTANTIO Yes, you shall soon do that now, to the ruin
Of your neck-part, or some nine years' imprisonment.
You meet with mercy an you scape with that—
Beside your lands all begged and seized upon—
That's admirable favour. Here's the Duchess. 100

DUCHESS [to Andrugio]
O sir, you're welcome.

LACTANTIO [aside] Marry, bless me still
From such a welcome.

DUCHESS You are hard to come by,
It seems, sir, by the guilt of your long stay.

ANDRUGIO My guilt, good madam?

DUCHESS Sure you'd much ado
To take him, had you not? Speak truth, Lactantio, 105 And leave all favour: were you not in danger?

LACTANTIO Faith, something near it, madam. He grew headstrong,
Furious and fierce; but 'tis not my condition
To speak the worst things of mine enemy, madam;
Therein I hold mine honour. But had fury
110 Burst into all the violent storms that ever

- Played over anger in tempestuous man,
I would have brought him to your grace's presence,
Dead or alive.
- 115 DUCHESS [to Andrugio]
You would not, sir?
- ANDRUGIO What pride
Of pampered blood has mounted up this puckfist?
If any way, uncounselled of my judgement,
My ignorance has stepped into some error,
Which I could heart'ly curse, and so brought on me
Your great displeasure, let me feel my sin
120 In the full weight of justice, virtuous madam,
And let it wake me throughly. But, chaste lady,
Out of the bounty of your grace, permit not
This perfumed parcel of curled powdered hair
To cast me in the poor relish of his censure.
- DUCHESS
125 It shall not need, good sir; we are ourself
Of power sufficient to judge you, ne'er doubt it, sir.—
Withdraw, Lactantio; carefully place your guard
I'th' next room.
- LACTANTIO [to Andrugio]
You'll but fare the worse.
You see your niceness spoils you. You'll go nigh now
To feel your sin indeed.
- 130 ANDRUGIO Hell-mouth be with thee!
Exeunt Lactantio and guard
Was ever malice seen yet to gape wider
For man's misfortunes?
- DUCHESS First, sir, I should think
You could not be so impudent to deny
What your own knowledge proves to you.
- 135 ANDRUGIO That were a sin, madam,
More gross than flattery spent upon a villain.
- DUCHESS
Your own confession dooms you, sir.
- ANDRUGIO Why, madam?
- DUCHESS
Do not you know I made a serious vow
At my lord's death never to marry more?
- 140 ANDRUGIO That's a truth, madam, I'm a witness to.
- DUCHESS
Is't so, sir? You'll be taken presently;
This man needs no accuser. Knowing so much,
How durst you then attempt so bold a business
As to solicit me, so strictly settled, 145 With tempting letters and loose lines of love?
- ANDRUGIO
Who, I do't, madam?
- DUCHESS Sure the man will shortly
Deny he lives, although he walk and breathe.
- ANDRUGIO
Better destruction snatch me quick from sight
Of human eyes than I should sin so boldly.
- DUCHESS
'Twas well I kept it then from rage or fire,
150 For my truth's credit. Look you, sir.
[She gives him the letter]
Read out.
You know the hand and name.
- ANDRUGIO Andrugio!
- DUCHESS
An if such things be fit the world shall judge.
- ANDRUGIO Madam—
- DUCHESS
Pish, that's not so; it begins otherwise. 155
Pray look again, sir. How you'd slight your knowledge!
- ANDRUGIO
By all the reputation I late won—
- DUCHESS
Nay, an you dare not read, sir, I am gone.
- ANDRUGIO
Read? 'Most fair Duchess!'
- DUCHESS O, have you found it now?
There's a sweet flatt'ring phrase for a beginning. 160
You thought, belike, that would o'ercome me.
- ANDRUGIO I, madam?
- DUCHESS Nay, on, sir; you are slothful.
- ANDRUGIO
'The report of your vow shall not fear me—'
- DUCHESS
No? Are you so resolute? 'Tis well for you, sir. 165
- ANDRUGIO
'I know you're but a woman—'
- DUCHESS Well, what then, sir?
- ANDRUGIO
'And what a woman is a wise man knows.'
- DUCHESS
Let him know what he can, he's glad to get us.
- ANDRUGIO
'Perhaps my condition may seem blunt to you—'
- DUCHESS
Well; we find no fault with your bluntness. 170
- ANDRUGIO 'But no man's love can be more sharp set—'
- DUCHESS Ay, there's good stuff now.
- ANDRUGIO 'And I know
Desires in both sexes have skill at that weapon.'
- DUCHESS 'Weapon'! You begin like a flatterer, and end like 175 a fencer.
Are these fit lines now to be sent to us?
- ANDRUGIO
Now by the honour of a man, his truth, madam,
My name's abused.
- DUCHESS Fie, fie, deny your hand?

180 I will not deny mine; here, take it freely, sir,
And with it my true constant heart for ever.
I never disgraced man that sought my favour.

ANDRUGIO
What mean you, madam?

DUCHESS To requite you, sir.
By courtesy I hold my reputation,
And you shall taste it. Sir, in as plain truth
185 As the old time walked in when love was simple
And knew no art nor guile, I affect you.
My heart has made her choice. I love you, sir,
Above my vow. The frown that met you first 190 Wore not the livery of anger, sir,
But of deep policy. I made your enemy
The instrument for all; there you may praise me,
And 'twill not be ill given.

ANDRUGIO [aside] Here's a strange language!
The constancy of love bless me from learning on't,
195 Although ambition would soon teach it others.—
Madam, the service of whole life is yours; but—

DUCHESS
Enough; thou'rt mine for ever.—Within there!
Enter Lactantio and the guard

LACTANTIO
Madam.

DUCHESS
Lay hands upon him; bear him hence;
See he be kept close prisoner in our palace.
[Aside to Andrugio] The time's not yet ripe for our 200 nuptial solace.

LACTANTIO
This you could clear yourself?

ANDRUGIO [aside] There's a voice that wearies me
More than mine own distractions.

LACTANTIO You are innocent?

ANDRUGIO [aside]
I have not a time idle enough from passion
To give this devil an answer. O, she's lost!
205 Cursed be that love by which a better's crossed!
There my heart's settled. [Exit with the guard]

184 courtesy common allowance (as distinct from inherent right)

185 taste (a) test (b) savour, enjoy (because her reputation will prove ill-founded)

186 the old time the distant past (idealized as a golden age without artifice)

187 affect love

195 others to other persons (or possibly 'otherwise')

200 solace comfort (also 'sport, entertainment')

202 distractions bewilderment

203 passion strong feeling, sorrow

205 a better's i.e. the love of someone more powerful is

206 There in that settled certain, resolved

5.1.0.3 Crotchet The music-teacher is named after the musical note; crotchet is also 'whimsical fancy'.

2 take learn (and see next note) prick-song song, performed from written music (with a quibble on prick as 'penis', pertinent as the Page secretly does not have one)

3 G sol-re-ut Crotchet's exclamation is, in his manner, a nonce-word based on the musical letter G and its equivalent in the hexachord system. The hexachord scale (ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la), used for teaching singing, could be based on ut as C, F, or G, making G sol, re, or ut.

6 caudle restorative warm drink of thin gruel with sweetened and spiced wine or ale

7 whos' whoso, whoever would who would

8-9 I...off Perhaps an absurd case of food-craving during pregnancy, and/or an allusion to a Court brawl of 1613 in which a piece of nose was reportedly bitten off. The nose is also phallic; only a sex-change could save the Page. Crotchet might wear a pointed stage nose.

10 lose my longing Proverbial.

15 gamut musical scale. Literally 'gamma' (G) and 'ut' (first note in any hexachord)

16 want lack

17 when (exclamation of impatience) stay await

18 Gam ut See note to l. 15. The expression is here used to indicate a particular musical note; Gam indicating the pitch and ut its position in the scale. Similarly with 'A re', etc.

LACTANTIO How is he disgraced,
And I advanced in love! Faith, he that can Wish more to his enemy is a spiteful man,
And worthy to be punished. Exit

Enter Page, [carrying music-books,] Celia, and Crotchet

CELIA [to Crotchet]
Sir, I'm of that opinion. Being kept hard to't,
In troth I think he'll take his prick-song well.

CROTCHET
G sol-re-ut! You guess not right, i'faith.
Mistress, you'll find you're in an error straight.—
Come on, sir, lay the books down. [To Celia] You shall see now.
[Crotchet and Celia talk apart]

PAGE [aside]
Would I'd an honest caudle next my heart!
Let whos' would 'sol fa'; I'd give them my part.
In troth, methinks I have a great longing in me
To bite a piece of the musician's nose off.
But I'll rather lose my longing 10
Than spoil the poor man's singing.
The very tip will serve my turn, methinks.
If I could get it, that he might well spare;
His nose is of the longest. [Laying down the books] O, my back!

CROTCHET [to Celia]
You shall hear that.—Rehearse your gamut, boy. 15

PAGE [aside]
Who'd be thus toiled for love, and want the joy?

CROTCHET
Why, when? Begin, sir. I must stay your leisure?

PAGE [singing]
Gam ut, A re, B mi, C fa, D sol—

CROTCHET
E la: aloft, above the clouds, my boy.

- PAGE
20 It must be a better note than 'E la', sir,
That brings musicians thither; they're too hasty,
The most part of 'em, to take such a journey,
And must needs fall by th' way.
- CROTCHET How many clefs be there?
PAGE
One clef, sir.
- CROTCHET O intolerable heretic
25 To voice and music! Do you know but one clef?
PAGE
No more, indeed, one, sir; [aside] and at this time
I know too much of that.
- CROTCHET How many notes be there?
PAGE
Eight, sir. [Aside] I fear me I shall find nine shortly,
To my great shame and sorrow. O, my stomach!
- CROTCHET
30 Will you repeat your notes, then? I must sol-fa you.
Why, when, sir?
PAGE A large, a long, a breve, a semibreve, a minim, a crotchet, a quaver, a semiquaver.
- CROTCHET
O, have you found the way?
PAGE Never trust me
35 If I have not lost my wind with naming of 'em.
- CROTCHET
Come, boy, your mind's upon some other thing now.
Set to your song.
- PAGE [aside] Was ever wench so punished?
CROTCHET
Ut. Come, begin.
PAGE [singing] Ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la.
Here the Page and Crotchet sing prick-song
- CROTCHET Keep time, you foolish boy!
[They sing again]
40 How like you this, madonna?
CELIA Pretty.
He will do well in time, being kept under.
- CROTCHET I'll make his ears sore and his knuckles ache else.
CELIA
And that's the way to bring a boy to goodness, sir.
- CROTCHET
There's many now waxed proper gentlemen Whom I have nipped i'th' ear, wench, that's my comfort.—
Come, sing me over the last song I taught you.
You're perfect in that, sure. Look you keep time well,
[He offers to beat the Page]
Or here I'll notch your faults up. Sol, sol, begin, boy.
Music. Song [sung by the Page]
- CELIA [to Crotchet] So, you've done well, sir. 45
Enter Cinquepace the dancer
Here comes the dancing-master now; you're discharged.
- CINQUEPACE
O, Signor Crotchet, O!
CROTCHET A minim rest,
Two clefs, and a semibreve! In the name
Of Alamire, what's the matter, sir?
- CINQUEPACE
The horriblemst disaster that ever disgraced 55
The lofty cunning of a dancer.
- CROTCHET B fa, B mi!
Heaven forbid, man!
- CINQUEPACE O, oo, the most cruel fortune!
CROTCHET
That semiquaver is no friend to you,
That I must tell you. 'Tis not for a dancer
To put his voice so hard to't; every workman Must use his own tools, sir. D la-sol, man, dilate
The matter to me. 60
- CINQUEPACE Faith, riding upon my foot-cloth, as I use to do, coming through a crowd, by chance I let fall my fiddle. 65
- CROTCHET D sol-re! Your fiddle, sir?
CINQUEPACE O, that such an instrument should be made to betray a poor gentleman! Nay, which is more lamentable, whose luck should it be to take up this unfortunate

20 note Puns on the senses 'characteristic feature', 'way of doing things' (as in change one's note), and 'reputation'; with a probable quibble on the circle and upright stem of a written musical note as suggesting the male sex organs.

21-3 they're... way The sexual double entendre is that musicians are hasty lovers who detumescence (fall by th' way) too soon.

23 clefs In her answer, the Page puns on clefs, in the sense 'vulvas'.

27 notes musical notes. But the ninth of l. 28 is (a) the cries of the expected baby (b) attention, stigma, notoriety.

31 when (as in l. 17)

32-3 A... semiquaver The notes seem to retain a phallic connotation. The original sense of breve was 'brief'. Quaver suggests 'tremble, quiver'.

49 Or...up a threat of corporal punishment

56 cunning skill

B fa, B mi B flat: fa on the F hexachord, and B natural, mi on the G hexachord; here used as a nonsense exclamation

58 That semiquaver i.e. Cinquepace's 'O, oo' (punning on quaver as 'tremulousness')

60-1 every... tools Varies the proverb 'What is a workman without his tools?'

61 D la-sol D as on the F and G hexachords

dilate tell at length

63 foot-cloth richly ornamented cloth laid over a horse's back and hanging to the ground (a mark of dignity and state)

use to habitually

65 fiddle Cinquepace's foot-cloth implies higher rank than appropriate; in contrast the fiddle might suggest a humble itinerant musician. There is also a phallic innuendo, as in Roaring Girl 4.20-4.

66 sol-re re: D on the C hexachord

Seeing me upon my foot-cloth, the mannerly coxcomb could say no less. But away rid I, sir, put my horse to a coranto pace, and left my fiddle behind me.

75 CROTCHET D la-sol-re!
CINQUEPACE Ay; was't not a strange fortune? An excellent treble viol, by my troth, 'twas my master's when I was but a pumper—that is, a puller-on of gentlemen's pumps.

80 CROTCHET C, C sol-fa. I knew you then, sir.
CINQUEPACE But I make no question but I shall hear on't shortly at one broker's or another, for I know the barber will scorse it away for some old cithern.

85 CROTCHET E la-mi, my life for yours on that, sir. I must to my other scholars, my hour calls me away. I leave you to your practise. Fa-sol-la. Fare you well, sir.
CINQUEPACE The lavoltas of a merry heart be with you, sir; and a merry heart makes a good singing man.

90 Exit [Crotchet with his books]
A man may love to hear himself talk when he carries pith in's mouth.—Metereza Celia!
CELIA Signor Cinquepace, the welcom'st gentleman alive of a dancer!
This is the youth. He can do little yet;
95 His prick-song very poorly. He is one Must have it put into him; somewhat dull, sir.
CINQUEPACE
As you are all at first. You know 'twas long Ere you could learn your doubles.
CELIA Ay, that's true, sir,
But I can tickle't now. [Dancing] Fa-la-la (etc.)
100 Lo you, how like you me now, sir?
CINQUEPACE Marry, pray for the founder; here he stands. Long may he live to receive quartr'ages, go brave, and pay his mercer wondrous duly—ay, and his jealous laundress, that for the love she bears him starches yellow, poor soul; my own flesh knows I wrong her not. Come, Metereza, once more shake your great hips and your little heels, since you begin to fall in of yourself, and dance over the end of the coranto I taught you last night.

CELIA The tune's clear out of my head, sir.
CINQUEPACE A pox of my little usher! How long he stays, too, with the second part of the former fiddle! Come, I'll sol-fa it i'th' mean time. Fa-la-la-la (etc.)
[Celia dances]
Perfectly excellent. I will make you fit to dance with the best Christian gentleman in Europe, and keep time with him for his heart, ere I give you over.

CELIA Nay, I know I shall do well, sir, and I am somewhat proud on't; but 'twas my mother's fault when she danced with the Duke of Florence.

CINQUEPACE Why, you'll never dance well, while you live, if you be not proud. I know that by myself. I may teach my heart out if you have not the grace to follow me.

CELIA I warrant you for that, sir.
CINQUEPACE
Gentlewomen that are good scholars will come As near their masters as they can. I have known some Lie with 'em for their better understanding. I speak not this to draw you on, forsooth. Use your pleasure. If you come you're welcome; You shall see a fine lodging, a dish of comfits, Music, and sweet linen.

A fitter time for this; I must not talk
Too long of women's matters before boys.
140 He's very raw. You must take pains with him;
It is the Duchess' mind it should be so.
She loves him well, I tell you. Exit
- CINQUEPACE How, love him?
He's too little for any woman's love i'th' town, by three handfuls. I wonder of a great woman she's no more 145 wit, i'faith. One of my pitch were somewhat tolerable.
Enter Usher, [with a viol]
O, are you come? Who would be thus plagued with a dandiprat usher? How many kicks do you deserve, in conscience?
- USHER
Your horse is safe, sir.
- CINQUEPACE Now I talked of kicking,
150 'Twas well remembered. Is not the footcloth stol'n yet?
- USHER
More by good hap than any cunning, sir.
Would any gentleman but you get a tailor's son to walk his horse, in this dear time of black velvet?
- CINQUEPACE
Troth, thou say'st true. Thy care has got thy pardon.
155 I'll venture so no more. [To the Page] Come, my young scholar,
I am ready for you now.
- PAGE [aside] Alas, 'twill kill me!
I'm even as full of qualms as heart can bear.
How shall I do to hold up?—Alas, sir,
I can dance nothing but, ill-favouredly,
160 A strain or two of passemeasures galliard.
- CINQUEPACE
Marry, you're forwarder than I conceived you.
A toward stripling. Enter him, Nicholao,

195 me come to him. I shall get more disgrace by this little monkey now than by all the ladies that ever I taught.
 [The Usher plays the viol]
 [To the Page] Come on, sir, now; cast thy leg out from thee, lift it up aloft, boy. A pox, his knees are soldered together, they're sewed together. Canst not stride? O, I could eat thee up, I could eat thee up, and begin upon thy hinder quarter, thy hinder quarter. I shall never teach this boy without a screw; his knees must be opened with a vice, or there's no good to be done upon him.—Who taught you to dance, boy?

PAGE
 205 It is but little, sir, that I can do.
 CINQUEPACE No; I'll be sworn for you.
 PAGE
 And that Signor Lactantio taught me, sir.
 CINQUEPACE
 Signor Lactantio was an arrant coxcomb, And fit to teach none but white-baker's children To knead their knees together. You can turn above 210 ground, boy?
 PAGE
 Not I, sir. [Aside] My turn's rather underground.
 CINQUEPACE
 We'll see what you can do. I love to try What's in my scholars, the first hour I teach them. Show him a close trick now, Nicholao.
 [The Usher makes a leaping turn]
 Ha, dainty stripling! Come, boy.

215 PAGE 'Las, not I, sir.
 I am not for lofty tricks, indeed I am not, sir.
 CINQUEPACE
 How! Such another word, down goes your hose, boy.
 PAGE [aside]
 Alas, 'tis time for me to do anything then.
 [The Page offers to leap, and falls]
 CINQUEPACE
 Heyday, he's down! Is this your lofty trick, boy?
 USHER
 O master, the boy swoons. He's dead, I fear me.
 CINQUEPACE
 Dead! I ne'er knew one die with a lofty trick before.—
 Up, sirrah, up.
 PAGE A midwife, run for a midwife!
 CINQUEPACE
 A midwife? By this light, the boy's with child!
 A miracle! Some woman is the father.

The world's turned upside down. Sure if men breed Women must get; one never could do both yet. No marv'l you danced close-knee'd the cinquepace. Put up my fiddle; here's a stranger case.
 Exit Cinquepace, [supporting the] Page

USHER
 That 'tis, I'll swear; 'twill make the Duchess wonder. I fear me 'twill bring dancing out of request, And hinder our profession for a time. Your women that are closely got with child Will put themselves clean out of exercise, And will not venture now for fear of meeting Their shames in a coranto, specially 230 If they be near their time. Well, in my knowledge, If that should happen we are sure to lose Many a good waiting-woman that's now over-shoes. Alas the while! Exit

Enter the Duchess and Celia 5.2

DUCHESS
 Thou tell'st me things are enemies to reason. I cannot get my faith to entertain 'em, And I hope ne'er shall.
 CELIA 'Tis too true, madam.
 DUCHESS
 I say 'tis false. 'Twere better thou'dst been dumb Than spoke a truth s'unpleasing; thou shalt get 5 But little praise by't. He whom we affect To place his love upon so base a creature?
 CELIA
 Nay, ugliness itself—you'd say so, madam, If you but saw her once—a strolling Gypsy. No Christian that is born a hind could love her;
 10 She's the sun's masterpiece for tawinness; Yet have I seen Andrugio's arms about her, Perceived his hollow whisp'rings in her ear, His joys at meeting her.
 DUCHESS What joy could that be?
 CELIA
 Such, madam, I have seldom seen it equalled. He kissed her with that greediness of affection As if her lips had been as red as yours. I looked still when he would be black in mouth, Like boys with eating hedgeberries. Nay, more, madam;
 He bribed one of his keepers with ten ducats
 20 To find her out amongst a flight of Gypsies.

Of such gross folly; has an eye of judgement,
And that will overlook him. This wench fails

In beauty and discretion.
Enter Celia, and Aurelia, [like a Gypsy]
Who hast brought there?
- CELIA
This is she, madam.
- DUCHESS Youth and whiteness bless me!
It is not possible. He talked sensibly Within this hour; this cannot be. How does he?
35 I fear me my restraint has made him mad.
- CELIA
His health is perfect, madam.
- DUCHESS You are perfect
In falsehood still; he's certainly distracted.
Though I'd be loath to foul my words upon her,
She looks so beastly, yet I'll ask the question.
40 Are you beloved, sweet face, of Andrugio?
- AURELIA
Yes, showrly, mistress, he done love me
'Bove all the girls that shine above me.
Full often has he sweetly kissed me,
And wept as often when he missed me;
45 Swore he was to marry none
But me alone.
- DUCHESS
Out on thee, marry thee?—Away with her.
Clear mine eyes of her.—
A curate that has got his place by simony,
50 Is not half black enough to marry thee. Exit Aurelia
Surely the man's far spent, howe'er he carries it.
He's without question mad; but I ne'er knew
Man bear it better before company.
The love of woman wears so thick a blindness
55 It sees no fault but only man's unkindness;
And that's so gross it may be felt. Here, Celia,
[She gives Celia a token of her warrant]
Take this; with speed command Andrugio to us,
And his guard from him.
- CELIA
It shall straight be done, madam. Exit
- DUCHESS
I'll look into his carriage more judiciously
When I next get him. A wrong done to beauty
60 Is greater than an injury done to love,
And we'll less pardon it; for had it been
A creature whose perfection had outshined me,
It had been honourable judgement in him,
And to my peace a noble satisfaction;
65 But as it is, 'tis monstrous above folly!
Look he be mad indeed, and throughly gone,
Or he pays dearly for't. 'Tis not
The ordinary madness of a gentleman
That shall excuse him here. He'd better lose 70 His wits eternally than lose my grace.
So strange is the condition of his fall,
He's safe in nothing but in loss of all.
Enter Andrugio [and Celia]
He comes. Now by the fruits of all my hopes,
75 A man that has his wits cannot look better.
It likes me well enough. There's life in's eye,
And civil health in's cheek; he stands with judgement,
And bears his body well. What ails this man?
Sure I durst venture him 'mongst a thousand ladies,
Let 'em shoot all their scoffs—which makes none
80 laugh
But their own waiting-women, and they dare do no otherwise.
Come nearer, sir. I pray keep further off,
Now I remember you.
- ANDRUGIO What new trick's in this now?
- DUCHESS
How long have you been mad, sir?
- ANDRUGIO Mad? A great time, lady:
85 Since I first knew I should not sin, yet sinned;
That's now some thirty years, by'r Lady, upwards.
- DUCHESS [aside]
This man speaks reason wondrous feelingly,
Enough to teach the rudest soul good manners.—
You cannot be excused with lightness now,
90 Or frantic fits; you're able to instruct, sir,
And be a light to men. If you have errors
They be not ignorant in you, but wilful,
And in that state I seize on 'em. Did I
Bring thee acquainted lately with my heart?
95 And when thou thought'st a storm of anger took thee,
It in a moment cleared up all to love,
To the abusing of thy spiteful enemy

 And couldst thou so requite me?
 ANDRUGIO How, good madam?
 DUCHESS
 100 To wrong all worth in man, to deal so basely
 Upon contempt itself, disdain, and loathsomeness—
 A thing whose face through ugliness frights children,
 A stragling Gypsy!
 ANDRUGIO See how you may err, madam,
 Through wrongful information. By my hopes
 105 Of truth and mercy, there is no such love
 Bestowed upon a creature so unworthy.
 DUCHESS
 No? Then you cannot fly me.—Fetch her back;
 [Exit Celia]
 And though the sight of her displease mine eye
 Worse than th'offensiv'st object earth and nature
 110 Can present to us, yet, for truth's probation,
 We will endure't contentfully.
 Enter Celia, and Aurelia, [like herself]
 What now,
 Art thou returned without her?
 ANDRUGIO
 No, madam. This is she my peace dwells in.
 If here be either baseness of descent,
 115 Rudeness of manners, or deformity
 In face or fashion, I have lost, I'll yield it.
 Tax me severely, madam.
 DUCHESS [to Celia] How thou stand'st,
 As dumb as the salt-pillar! Where's this Gypsy?
 [Celia brings Aurelia forward, and shows the Gypsy clothes Aurelia was wearing]
 120 What, no! I cannot blame thee then for silence.
 Now I'm confounded too, and take part with thee.
 AURELIA [kneeling]
 Your pardon and your pity, virtuous madam.
 Cruel restraint, joined with the power of love,
 Taught me that art; in that disguise I scaped
 The hardness of my fortunes. You that see 125 What love's force is, good madam, pity me.
 ANDRUGIO [kneeling]
 Your grace has ever been the friend of truth;
 And here 'tis set before you.
 DUCHESS I confess
 I have no wrong at all; she's younger, fairer.
 He has not now dishonoured me in choice.
 130 I much commend his noble care and judgement.
 'Twas a just cross, led in by a temptation,
 For offering but to part from my dear vow,
 And I'll embrace it cheerfully.—Rise both.
 The joys of faithful marriage bless your souls.
 I will not part you.
 ANDRUGIO [rising] Virtue's crown be yours, madam. 135
 Enter Lactantio
 AURELIA [aside]
 O, there appears the life of all my wishes.—
 Is your grace pleased, out of your bounteous goodness
 To a poor virgin's comforts, I shall freely
 Enjoy whom my heart loves?
 DUCHESS Our word is past,
 Enjoy without disturbance.
 AURELIA [rising] There, Lactantio. 140
 Spread thy arms open wide, to welcome her
 That has wrought all this means to rest in thee.
 ANDRUGIO Death of my joys! How's this?
 LACTANTIO
 Prithee away, fond fool. Hast no shame in thee?
 Thou'rt bold and ignorant, whate'er thou art. 145
 AURELIA
 Whate'er I am? Do not you know me then?
 LACTANTIO
 Yes, for some waiting-vessel; but the times
 Are changed with me, if you'd the grace to know 'em.
 I looked for more respect; I am not spoke withal
 After this rate, I tell you. Learn hereafter 150
 To know what belongs to me. You shall see
 All the court teach you shortly. Farewell, Manners.
 DUCHESS [aside]
 I'll mark the event of this.
 [She whispers to Celia. Exit Celia]
 AURELIA [aside] I've undone myself
 Two ways at once: lost a great deal of time,
 And now I am like to lose more. O my fortune! 155
 I was nineteen yesterday, and partly vowed
 To have a child by twenty, if not twain.
 To see how maids are crossed! But I'm plagued justly;
 And she that makes a fool of her first love,
 Let her ne'er look to prosper. [To Andrugio] Sir.
 ANDRUGIO O falsehood! 160

 Than of a maid that never yet offended.

There are worse things for women to make men.

- ANDRUGIO
I'll once believe a woman, be it but to strengthen 170 Weak faith in other men. I have a love
That covers all thy faults.
Enter Lord Cardinal and the Lords
LORD CARDINAL [aside to Lactantio]
Nephew, prepare thyself
With meekness and thanksgiving to receive Thy reverend fortune. Amongst all the lords,
Her close affection now makes choice of thee.
- LACTANTIO [aside]
175 Alas, I'm not to learn to know that now.
Where could she make choice here if I were missing?
'Twould trouble the whole state, and puzzle 'em all,
To find out such another.
- LORD CARDINAL 'Tis high time, madam,
If your grace please, to make election now.
Behold, they are all assembled.
- 180 DUCHESS What election?
You speak things strange to me, sir.
- LORD CARDINAL How, good madam?
DUCHESS
Give me your meaning plainly, like a father.
You are too religious, sir, to deal in riddles.
- LORD CARDINAL
Is there a plainer way than leads to marriage,
madam,
And the man set before you?
- 185 DUCHESS O blasphemy
To sanctimonious faith! Comes it from you, sir?—
An ill example. Know you what you speak,
Or who you are? Is not my vow in place?
How dare you be so bold, sir! Say a woman
190 Were tempt with a temptation, must you presently Take all th'advantage on't?
- LORD CARDINAL Is this in earnest, madam?
DUCHESS
Heaven pardon you if you do not think so, sir;
You've much to answer for. But I will leave you;
Return I humbly now from whence I fell.
195 All you blest powers that register the vows
Of virgins and chaste matrons, look on me
With eyes of mercy; seal forgiveness to me
By signs of inward peace; and, to be surer
- That I will never fail your good hopes of me,
I bind myself more strictly. All my riches
I'll speedily commend to holy uses,
This temple unto some religious sanctuary,
Where all my time to come I will allow
For fruitful thoughts; so knit I up my vow.
- LACTANTIO
This 'tis to hawk at eagles. Pox of pride;
It lays a man i'th' mire still, like a jade
That has too many tricks and ne'er a good one.
I must gape high! I'm in a sweet case now.
I was sure of one, and now I have lost her too.
- DUCHESS [to the Lord Cardinal]
I know, my lord, all that great studious care 210 Is for your kinsman; he's provided for According to his merits.
- LORD CARDINAL How's that, good madam?
DUCHESS
Upon the firmness of my faith, it's true, sir.
[Enter Celia, and the former Page, like herself, with an infant]
See, here's the gentlewoman; the match was made
Near forty weeks ago. He knows the time, sir,
215 Better than I can tell him, and the poor gentlewoman Better than he. But being religious, sir, and fearing
you,
He durst not own her for his wife till now,
Only contracted with her in man's apparel,
For the more modesty, because he was bashful,
220 And never could endure the sight of woman
For fear that you should see her. This was he Chose for my love; this page preferred to me.
- LACTANTIO
I'm paid with mine own money.
- LORD CARDINAL Dare hypocrisy,
For fear of vengeance, sit so close to virtue?
225 Steal'st thou a holy vestment from religion,
To clothe forbidden lust with? Th'open villain
Goes before thee to mercy, and his penitency
Is blest with a more sweet and quick return.
I utterly disclaim all blood in thee.
230 I'll sooner make a parricide my heir
Than such a monster.—O forgive me, madam!
Th'apprehension of the wrong to you
Has a sin's weight at it. I forget all charity
When I but think upon him.

me by a Gypsy seven years ago; she said then I should be the spoil of many a maid, and at seven years' end and true.

DUCHESS [to the Lord Cardinal]
 We all have faults; look not so much on his.
 Who lives i'th' world that never did amiss?—
 For you, Aurelia, I commend your choice. 260
 You've one after our heart. And though your father
 Be not in presence, we'll assure his voice.

THE WIDOW

Text edited and introduced by Gary Taylor, annotated by Michael Warren and Gary Taylor

‘To make you gay’, the prologue says of this play, ‘Is all th’ambition ’t has’. The title-page of the first edition, printed in 1652, describes the text as ‘A COMEDY’, and our responses to the particulars of The Widow are inevitably entangled in our attitudes to Comedy generally. But in limiting the play’s artistic ambition to merrymaking, its prologue implicitly rejects the classical critical standard most famously articulated by Horace: Omne tulit punctum, qui miscuit utile dulci—that is (as Ben Jonson translated it), the best poems offer readers ‘Sweet mixed with sour’, combining ‘doctrine and delight’. From Horace to Freud, from formalism to feminism, critics of comedy have sought to find in it a significance beyond pleasure.

Pleasure The Widow has supplied. The play was, its title-page asserts, ‘acted with great applause’ by the King’s Men at the Blackfriars Theatre; apparently revived in the 1630s, it was the first of Middleton’s plays separately published, with his name under the title, after the closing of the theatres; the actor Alexander Gough, who had probably played one of the women’s parts in the 1630s, in his preface favourably compared ‘this lively piece’ to the great dead works of antiquity; after the Restoration, it was often revived, attracting the attendance of Samuel Pepys, John Evelyn, and Charles II; the popular song at 3.1.22–37 was recycled in at least two other plays. In the eighteenth century The Widow was selected for Robert Dodsley’s first anthology of Old Plays, and remained one of the few works of Middleton regularly reprinted and available before Dyce’s edition of 1840; late in the nineteenth century, Swinburne celebrated the ‘fluency and facility’ of ‘this brilliant play’, and Havelock Ellis included it among the ten plays selected for the popular Mermaid edition—which did not find room for Michaelmas Term, A Mad World, My Masters, or A Game at Chess.

In the twentieth century, by contrast, The Widow became almost invisible—never anthologized; often ignored even in books devoted to Middleton; rarely mentioned in critical essays, and then only in the indifferent haste of surveys of some topic, like Paula Berggren’s of cross-dressing.

This invisibility belongs, in part, to the more general neglect of what Inga-Stina Ewbank calls ‘The Middle of Middleton’. But The Widow has also suffered, more particularly, from the expectation that Middleton’s comedies should always be city comedies. Within the literary canon, ‘minor’ writers supplement ‘major’ writers by providing specimens of a particular tone or manner: ‘Fletcherian tragicomedy’, ‘Lylyean court comedy’, ‘Jonsonian humours comedy’. Likewise, Middleton’s career has been falsely divided into two tones—early ‘city comedy’ and late ‘Jacobean tragedy’—which define the protocols for reading him; critics have not known how to read texts which do not fit those protocols.

The Widow is not a city comedy, though its sources gave it every encouragement to become one. In the second tale of the second day of Boccaccio’s Decameron, a man is robbed and stripped by his travelling companions; like Ansaldo, he walks to the home of a ‘beautiful and comely’ ‘young lady’, who is immediately attracted to him; within twenty-four hours, the man is married. But in Boccaccio the victim is ‘a merchant’, travelling with other ‘merchants like himself’, and the young lady lives in a walled town. Middleton’s Ansaldo, by contrast, is no merchant, and the house which receives him is located in the woods. In the third tale of the third day, a gentlewoman, like Philippa, communicates her erotic interest in a handsome young man by complaining to a third party of the gentleman’s (entirely fictitious) unwelcome advances; the third party rebukes the gentleman, who in turn correctly interprets the woman’s indirect instructions. But in Boccaccio this story takes place ‘in our own city (more full of craft and deceit, than love or faithful dealing)’, and the gentlewoman, though ‘descended of very great parentage’, is ‘married to an artisan, a clothier or draper’, whom she disdained ‘because he was a tradesman’. By contrast, Middleton’s Philippa is married to a country Justice of the Peace, urban class rivalries play no part in her attempted liaison with Francisco, and the whole play takes place, not in ‘our own city’ but on the Adriatic coast near Istria.

As the thief Latrocinio says, ‘Hang him that has but one way to his trade!’ (4.2.29). Middleton knew more than one way to write comedy, and here he deliberately avoided the sharp tonality and relentless speed of a young man’s city comedy; here, instead, a mature virtuoso is using the entire keyboard. Ellis described The Widow as a play ‘always bright and alert, with no jarring discord to spoil its joyous humanity’, written in Middleton’s ‘most delightful style of romantic comedy’; its ‘unalloyed cheerfulness’ gives us a ‘glimpse of a large and sunny world’.

If that does not sound much like the Middleton of modern criticism, it is because modern criticism has tended to celebrate the satire but ignore the romance in Middleton’s work (Sousa). Ellis goes to the opposite extreme; but he does point to something pertinent about the play’s tone. In Boccaccio, the robbed merchant is abandoned by his own servant; the woman who welcomes him is a nobleman’s kept mistress; the gentlewoman in the other tale adulterously satisfies, in the end, her ‘sensual appetite’. In

The Widow, by contrast, no infidelity is consummated, no woman is reduced to a sexual property, no servant betrays a master. No one is married off to a whore, or stripped of all their possessions, or taken away to be whipped. Even the commedia dell'arte thieves are full of music, pity, and wit. The worst wished on anyone in this play is to 'be stoned to death with pipkins' (5.1.137).

Likewise, the character for whom the play is named differs strikingly from the standard widows of city comedy and misogynist satire. As Jennifer Panek observes, Middleton was more interested in widows than any playwright of his time, and he 'offers an alternative to the common and degrading belief that a woman's passion controlled her reason.' Unlike her namesake in John Dickenson's tale Fair Valeria of London (1598), Middleton's Valeria does not keep a stable of young male whores to service her lust. She does not remarry with indecent haste; she has no children from her first marriage, to suffer in her second; the estate she has inherited seems not to be the fruit of immoral profiteering. Like Moll in The Roaring Girl, Valeria is a smart, capable, experienced woman who knows her own mind, is determined not to be dominated, and can see through the men around her. But unlike Moll, Valeria has a plausible and honest economic basis for her independence—the only basis for real independence most women could have hoped for. In early modern London, as Vivien Brodsky has demonstrated, 'more than half of all marriages lasted ten years or less'. Middleton's own grandmother, mother, sister, and wife all outlived a husband. Most widows were poor, but one like Valeria—a 'rich widow', and relatively young—was uniquely positioned to control her own destiny.

Also unlike Moll, Valeria—like most women, and even most widows, in Middleton's time and ours—wants a mate. Because this is a comedy, she gets the mate she wants. Ricardo is, physically and theatrically, the most attractive man around. Admittedly, from the outset he is interested in Valeria's wealth. When 'a young gentleman' is 'spent', he naturally seeks 'to have a rich widow set him up again' (1.2.2-4). Middleton announces from the outset the conventionality of the Valeria/Ricardo plot; indeed, the very title would have promised Jacobean playgoers a story in which a prodigal young man courts and conquers a well-endowed widow. Elizabeth Hanson argues that the popularity of this plot reflected a changing attitude toward the acquisition of wealth, which was often allegorized as a woman: regina Pecunia, Lady Money, Lady Treasure, Lady Lucre, Middleton's own Lady Goldenfleece, the rich widow in No Wit. Such plays hover between allegory and realism, and their male protagonists embody capitalism's new ethic of acquisition, what Hanson calls 'a desire for money that could be neither satisfied by nor subordinated to sanctioned social roles'. Ricardo is a man on the make, a distant but still recognizable ancestor of the Horatio Alger hero, Ragged Dick, who starts the play with nothing and ends with everything. What gets Ricardo everything is sheer determination, masculine energy, opportunism,

'wit'. In this new psychological model, which created and/or reflected the new economy, desire for money and desire for a woman were really the same thing. Desire is desire is desire. Ricardo leaves us in no doubt of his physical desire for the 'sweet' widow, and her cunning resistance only captivates him the more: 'I have a greater mind to her now than e'er I had' (2.2.46-7). In the play's final speech he declares 'I'm as hungry of my widow | As you can be upon your maid', just before he exits to enjoy 'My widow and my meat'.

Money and meat are not very romantic accessories for a mate. But Middleton insists that romance can only be real, that comedy can only be convincing, by remaining practical. Raphael Seligmann has called attention to the fact that Capo d'Istria sits at the very edge, then as now, of the Western European world, geographically close to the setting of Twelfth Night—but imaginatively we are a long way from Shakespeare's Illyria. Lyly, Shakespeare, and Fletcher use the distant geography of romance to legitimate a marvellous suspension of the rules of daily life: comedy is made possible by the problem-dissolving powers of identical twins, gods and goddesses, magic potions, and resurrections from the dead. Middleton instead translates the proper names of romance back into the vernacular common places of an 'all here' (5.1.453) in a lucid 'now at this present' (3.2.108).

Consequently, the play is consistently unsentimental about the economic and sexual realities of marriage. For the First Suitor, 'Marrying for love' is a recipe for filling the commonwealth with 'beggars'; for the Second, it guarantees a life of violent misery ('He'll give her a black eye within these three days, | Beat half her teeth out by Allhallowtide'); Valeria herself acknowledges that 'Want on both sides makes all affection cold' (5.1.340-63). If lack of funds can cripple a marriage, so can lack of fun. Valeria's sister-in-law Philippa is so anxious to commit adultery precisely because her eighty-year-old husband cannot satisfy her physically.

Evelyn described The Widow as 'a lewd play'. Certainly, its characters are lewd enough. Everyone's language is frank and physical, and Ricardo claims to have had a thousand women—half of them other men's wives. Francisco begins the action trying to commit adultery with a woman married to a man of his own father's generation, who was his father's good friend; the appeal of this illicit union is, in part, incestuous, and its consummation is prevented, at the last moment, when Francisco thinks he sees the ghost of his dead father blocking his entrance to Philippa's gate. Philippa herself, having solicited Francisco unsuccessfully, immediately transfers her erotic attention to Ansaldo. She first sees him dressed in her husband's clothes, and finds the conjunction particularly arousing: 'here's my husband young again!' (3.3.69). Later, she disguises Ansaldo as a woman, and fantasizes about having him, dressed as her waiting woman, 'lay night by night with her in way of comfort' (5.1.88-93). The Second Suitor, too old for sex, now enjoys instead 'no other ventry but vexation' (4.1.25).

In all these conjugations, desire is inscribed in a grammar of substitution and transgression. Ricardo, trying to teach his friend Francisco how to seduce a woman, gives Francisco the woman's part; Ricardo then becomes so engrossed in the game of overcoming Francisco's feminine resistance that, in the end, he assaults her/him physically, using kisses 'to stop all your mouths', and has to be pulled off by a third man, who wakes him from his 'fairest dream' (1.2.115-48). Desire is aroused, not by biological genitalia, but by the mere performance of gender. Gender is theatre. Hence, when Ansaldo is dressed as a woman, he not only attracts Philippa, who imagines having sex with a man dressed in her husband's or her woman's clothes; he also attracts Francisco, who believes he is a real woman. Philippa finds this vengefully amusing, and urges Ansaldo to play the woman's part for all it's worth, in order to maximize the embarrassment of Francisco: the joke culminates in 'one man married to another!' (5.1.409).

But Middleton, finally, takes the joke even further than Philippa intended. Ansaldo, it turns out, actually is a woman, Marcia—a discovery apparently meant to be as surprising to the audience as to Philippa and Violetta. Middleton was not the first dramatist to conceal so long a character's gender from the audience: Ben Jonson had done so, at least for Latinless spectators, in Epicœne. But in Jonson that last-minute discovery is the result of a cruel practical joke, a discovery which dissolves a marriage and strips away theatrical pretence, showing us that a supposedly 'female' character is actually being played by a boy actor. In Middleton's play, Jonson's world is turned upside down: the discovery undoes a cruel practical joke, it enables a marriage, and it insists upon pretence, by revealing that a supposedly male character is 'actually' female. Of course, since even 'actual' females were played by male actors, Middleton's conclusion remains ambiguous, as Jonson's does not; spectators can leave a performance still arguing and asking about Ansaldo's 'real' gender. The play can leave us feeling that, like Ricardo in his 'dream', we cannot really tell the difference between men and women—that, indeed, there may be no essential difference, beyond performance. 'I can do that', Ansaldo declares (5.1.249), realizing and relishing his own potential: a deceptively simple but deliciously comic moment, as the 2001 Georgia Shakespeare Festival public reading of the play demonstrated.

Middleton's play celebrates what Jonson's play fears, the collapse of sexual distinction in a merry-go-round of substitutions. The Widow tears down the walls of gender, showing that those walls are made, mostly, of mere clothes, or of actions which can be put on and off as easily as clothes. We are initiated, here, into a world of absolute play. Francisco begins the action by pretending to want a warrant; Philippa pretends to receive a letter and pretends to be outraged by it; Ricardo turns a pretended exchange of vows into a binding contract. The pretences and disguises of lovers and suitors are doubled by those of the thieves. Indeed, the thieves may have been doubled by the same players who played the male romantic leads. 'How round the world goes', the robbers/lovers/players sing, 'And everything that's in it' (3.1.114-15).

This playground of lawless egalitarian circulation is, of course, the world of festival, the font of Rabelaisian comedy (according to Mikhail Bakhtin) and of Shakespearean comedy too (according to C. L. Barber and François Laroque). Its prologue calls The Widow 'a sport only for Christmas', and whether or not the play was written for performance at Christmas, the comparison itself reveals something about the tone of the play. The twelve days of Christmas were celebrated with songs (like the five in The Widow, and the four sung between its acts), feasts (like that which waits off-stage in the final scene), and plays (like The Widow itself). The longest and merriest of the holidays combined birth and death, looking backward at the grotesque old year (Brandino, Martino, the two suitors) and forward to the erotic young year (Francisco, Ricardo, Ansaldo, Violetta). And in the most outrageous of transgressive substitutions, it exalted a Lord of Misrule or Christmas Prince, replacing reverence with ridicule. At a time when Justices of the Peace were 'the most influential class of men in England' (G. M. Trevelyan) and 'rulers of the countryside' (J. H. Gleason), Brandino is a venerable wealthy JP, but he has his pocket picked, his eyes washed with urine, his robes of office mocked, stolen, and cut up into a hundred pieces; his opinions oscillate with all the dignified integrity of a teetertotter; he unwittingly delivers instructions for his own cuckolding. Martino, his loyal pet clerk, begins the play dreaming of buttocks, and is later farcically relieved of teeth and purse simultaneously.

Of course, Christmas takes place in a winter world, and so does The Widow, both literally (1.1.173, etc.) and figuratively. There are 'few portmanteaus stirring' (4.2.22); business, of every kind, is at an ebb. There is real physical pain here: 'I that feel it think it somewhat', Brandino insists (4.2.191). Real emotional pain too: Violetta reminds Philippa that 'I have grief enough of mine own to tend, mistress' (5.1.40). The Second Suitor viciously compounds complacency ('I have enough') and capriciousness ('and I will have my humour'). Philippa ends the play, as she began it, trapped in an unsatisfying marriage with an impotent old buffoon; Violetta, having offered herself and her inheritance to Ricardo, is publicly rejected; our jolly band of thieves and impostors is in jail.

Nevertheless, out of such materials The Widow constructs the possibility of celebration. Like Christmas, like Christianity more generally, the play offers believers a comedy about love, about true and false cures, about the forgiveness of debts, about the inadequacy of law. Brandino is a judge; the play begins with the writing of an arrest warrant, ends with the arrest of thieves, and in between is saturated with legal language and practice, with a sense of the complicated exploitive process of judicature (Taylor 1994). Even lovers are put on 'trial': Philippa tests Francisco and Ansaldo, Valeria tests Ricardo and the other suitors. And while the characters are judging each other, we are judging them. They (we) are all imperfect: 'The best have their mistakings' (4.2.205). As C. John Sommerville has noted, this sense that inadequacy is not an individual failing, but a universal condition, was the foundation of Puritan humour, a new 'facetiousness' characterized above all by 'self-mockery' and 'self-effacement'.

No one here deserves to be saved. But they are saved, nevertheless: Ricardo by 'a strange miraculous courtesy' (2.2.104), Francisco 'most miraculously' (3.2.101). As Lancelot Andrewes observed, 'there is no joy in the world to the joy of a man saved'. The comic principle behind The Widow is not poetic justice, but poetic grace. John Donne's Christmas sermons are more helpful in understanding such a comedy than Horace or Jonson—not because Donne's sermons influenced Middleton, but because they articulate widely shared beliefs about the grounds for celebration in a fallen world. We might think, looking at Ricardo the practised or Francisco the novice adulterer, 'that it is impossible God should have mercy upon such a man' (Donne, iv.297). But they are saved from their own bad intentions 'quia complacuit, merely in the good pleasure of God' (iv.291). This is the flip side of Calvinism: if damnation is arbitrarily predestined, so is salvation. Only grace can save us, but grace can save any of us. God has enough, and God will have his humour.

Preachers encouraged their congregations 'to call to mind God's occasional mercies to them—such mercies as a regenerate man will call mercies, though a natural man would call them accidents, or occurrences, or contingencies' (vi.171). Aristotle and Horace had banished improbable accidents from the drama, but no one could banish them from life, and The Widow is unembarrassed, indeed insistent, about the importance of mere chance to comedy. The word luck is echoed three times within the first twelve lines of dialogue, and fourteen times in the play as a whole; fortune, misfortune, and unfortunate are spoken 33 times; both sets of words occur in The Widow more often than in any other work in the Middleton canon. In the play's language and structure, happiness is something that happens by happenstance, haply. This is a rags-to-riches story in which no one earns anything: rich happens.

Early modern Protestants were fascinated by accidents, seeing in them, not evidence of chaos, but what Thomas Beard called The Theatre of God's Judgements. In Middleton's theatre, at the very centre of his play, in its longest speech, Francisco sees Ansaldo stripped to his shirt, and mistakes him for the ghost of his own father (3.2.85–119). By this improbable accident or occurrence or contingency, Francisco is diverted from adultery, and can later declare 'I wear no guilty blush upon my cheek | For a sin stamped last midnight' (5.1.127–8). Francisco's encounter is what Thomas Wilson, in his Christian Dictionary (1612), would have called Fortune or Chance, words used for 'such things as, in regard of our foresight, happen accidentally to us', or which 'fall out beside our purpose, and whereof we can give no reason'. But Wilson reminded his readers that 'in respect of God, who knoweth all things, and ordereth them most wisely to just and due ends, there is no chance nor fortune'. Likewise, Donne tells his audience of 'The adulterer, whose eye waits for the twilight, goes forth, and casts his eyes upon forbidden houses, and would enter', but then he 'sees a Lord have mercy upon us upon the door; this is an occasional mercy', because by this sign God reminds the adulterer that 'his lustful loins' will carry him 'to everlasting perdition' (vi.171).

This moment of apparently accidental revelation is, by Donne's definition, Christmas itself: 'every manifestation of Christ to the world, to the Church, to a particular soul, is an Epiphany, a Christmas-day' (vii.279). Whereas Barber sees festive comedy moving 'through release to clarification', Donne and Middleton trace a movement from clarification to release.

The play encourages an attention to the effects of chance, the limits of will, the interplay of fortune and nature, but it does not force Calvinism upon us, any more than it forces us to interpret the Ricardo/Valeria plot as an allegory of capitalism. Herbert Jack Heller rightly insists that Francisco's crisis of conscience dramatically enacts a classic conversion narrative familiar to every early modern Christian. But we may also see Francisco's pivotal retreat as yet another comic example of how easily this would-be lover is discouraged—which no doubt explains why, to the amazement of his neighbours, 'he has his maidenhead yet' (5.1.242). Middleton's ambidextrous sport is epitomized in a sentence of Valeria's first speech:

He that likes me not now, as heaven made me,
I will never hazard hell to do him a pleasure,
Nor lie every night like a woodcock in paste
To please some gaudy goose i'th' morning.
(2.1.15–18)

Divine and mundane explanations, hell and geese, stand shoulder to shoulder, and the action makes sense whichever we privilege. Christmas is a secular as well as a sacred festival, and in early modern Europe it was observed, not as a time when small impacted families retreat into private domesticity, but as the most openly communal occasion of the year, celebrating a togetherness of friendship, kinship and sinship, an imperfect but possible human warmth against the world's chill. So—in the community of a theatre—does this play. 'I hope 'twill make you laugh.'

Incipit Actus 1

Table and standish. Enter Signor Martino (an old justice's clerk) and Francisco [a young gentleman]

FRANCISCO Martino?

MARTINO Signor Francisco? You're the luckiest gentleman to meet or see first in a morning; I never saw you yet but I was sure of money within less than half an hour.

I. I

This commentary pays particular attention to 'complex' words: idioms, sometimes apparently simple, which carried a central or compound significance in early modern culture. See for instance 'gentleman' (1.1.0.3). An index to the complex words appears on p. 1123.

Prologue.1 sport here (a) a pleasant pastime; recreation; diversion; but also elsewhere (b) sexual pleasure. The first, innocent sense obtains also at 5.1.246 and 5.1.364. However, the word is used more ambiguously at Prologue.6, 5.1.176, and 5.1.410, and with a specific sense of sexual pleasure by Francisco at 2.2.3 and by Violetta at 3.2.46.

2 hour occasion

3-4 fullest aim ... name the furthest extent of its aim, having your smiles as the target aimed at, is to gain itself fame (the metaphor 'bent' is from archery)

5 edge sword's sharpness; by extension ardour, liking, appetite taken off blunted; carried away, removed

6 sports festive pastimes, especially associated with the Christmas season; but the preceding words suggest that the audience may be weary from sexual activity

1.1.0.2 standish a stand containing inks, pens, and other writing materials and accessories

Martino Italian: 'Martino, taken for a man's bum or arse' (Florio). The name encourages an emphasis on buttocks in the actor's appearance or performance.

0.3 gentleman a person of a distinct social rank; Francisco is the social superior of Martino, who is described later as looking 'half like a gentleman' (5.1.187). In the rural hierarchy, within which this play takes place, gentlemen were members of the gentry, ranked below knights and esquires but above yeomen; their wealth was based on land, the cultivation of their estates, and profitable marriage. As gentry they sought to maintain their way of life and to advance socially by increasing their family power and wealth. Early modern society was complicated by the overlapping and competition of two systems of hierarchy, a status system based on birth (epitomized by 'gentlemen'), and a class system based on wealth (which might be accumulated by persons who had inherited no status at all). Young gentry were notorious for wasting their patrimony: the 'poor indebted gentleman' (1.2.49) Ricardo has sold his land and plans to restore his fortune by marrying a rich widow (1.2.14-25). However, older gentlemen pursued wealth similarly: the two suitors who are Ricardo's rivals for Valeria withdraw their interest in her when she declares that she has given all she has to her brother-in-law (5.1.298-332); Brandino regards himself as cheated when Valeria destroys the 'deed of gift' (5.1.379-86). Marcia has run away because her father wanted to marry her to an old 'wealthy gentleman' (2.1.165); he accepts Francisco as a prospective husband for her since he comes 'of a noble family', although he regards him as 'somewhat spent' (5.1.421-2); Brandino describes Francisco to her as 'worth ten thousand dollars' (5.1.174).

5 FRANCISCO I bring you the same luck still.
 MARTINO What? You do not! I hope, sir, you are not come for another warrant?
 FRANCISCO Yes, faith, for another warrant.
 10 MARTINO Why, there's my dream come out then. I never dreamed of a buttock but I was sure to have money for a warrant. It is the luckiest part of all the body to me. Let every man speak as he finds. Now your usurer is of opinion that to dream of the devil is your wealthier dream, and I think if a man dream of that part that brings many to the devil, 'tis as good, and has all one smatch indeed. For if one be the flesh, th'other's the broth. So 'tis in all his members, an we mark it. If gluttony be the meat, lechery is the porridge: they're both boiled together, and we clerks will have our modicum too, though it conclude in the twopenny chop.
 [Francisco does not mark Martino's speech]
 Why, sir, Signor Francisco?
 FRANCISCO [aside] 'Twas her voice sure,
 Or my soul takes delight to think it was,
 And makes a sound like hers.
 MARTINO Sir, I beseech you.
 FRANCISCO
 25 It is the prettiest contrived building, this.
 What posy's that, I prithee?
 MARTINO Which, sir? that
 Under the great brass squirt?

FRANCISCO Ay, that, sir, that.
 MARTINO 'From fire, from water, and all things amiss Deliver the house of an honest justice.'
 FRANCISCO There's like to be a good house kept then, when fire and water's forbidden to come into the kitchen. [Aside] Not yet a sight of her? This hour's unfortunate.— And what's that yonder, prithee?—[Aside] O love's famine,
 There's no affliction like thee.—Ay, I hear you, sir.
 MARTINO You're quicker-eared than I then: you hear me Before I heard myself. 35
 FRANCISCO A gift in friendship;
 Some call it an instinct.
 MARTINO It may be;
 Th'other's the sweeter phrase though. Look you, sir: Mine own wit this, and 'tis as true as turtle.
 'A goose quill and a clerk,
 a constable and a lantern 40
 Brings many a bawd from coach to cart, and many a thief to one turn.'
 FRANCISCO That 'one turn' helped you well.
 MARTINO It's helped me to money indeed for many a warrant. I am forty dollars the better for that one turn; an 'twould come off quicker, 'twere ne'er a whit the worse for me. But indeed when thieves are taken, and break away twice or thrice one after another, there's 45

- 5 luck On the concept of chance, see the Introduction, and notes on will (I.I.79), happy (I.I.133), and fortune (I.I.185, I.2.4, 34).
- 7 warrant a writ or order issued by some executive authority, empowering an officer to make an arrest, seizure, etc.
- 10 have money Martino must charge Francisco for the legal document.
- 11 luckiest...body See I.I.2.
- 12 your a (hypothetical use)
- 13-14 usurer...wealthier dream Since usury is considered sinful, to dream of the devil would be considered profitable by the usurer.
- 15 part...devil usually the genitals, but Martino is more interested in the buttock than the crotch
- 16-17 one...flesh, th'other's...broth if the devil is the flesh, then the buttock is the prepared extract or reduced form of the devil
- 16 smatch taste, smack, flavour
- 17 members parts of the body
- 18 porridge pottage or soup made by stirring vegetables, herbs, or meat, often thickened with pot-barley or other farinaceous addition; possibly a pun on 'partridge', meaning 'whore'
- 20 modicum small quantity or portion of food or the like, but also used of a person, especially a woman (compare 'piece, bit')
- 20-1 twopenny chop chopped meat in broth; the context of gluttony is pervasive, and 'twopenny chop' may be an extension of modicum in once more presenting a sexual reference: chop = 'a fissure, cleft, or crack'
- 22 'Twas...sure (The audience may or may not hear Philippa's voice offstage.)
- 24 And makes...hers His soul responds in harmony with hers.
- 25 contrived ingeniously or artfully planned
- 26 posy a motto or short inscription (often metrical, and usually in patterned or formal language)
- 27 squirt a tubular instrument by which water may be squirted, used as a fire extinguisher
- 32 unfortunate not favoured by fortune; inopportune; compare Martino's emphasis on luck (I.I.2-4)
- 36-7 A gift...instinct Francisco explains his anticipation in conversation as an instance of telepathy among friends rather than his distraction by the thought of Philippa.
- 37 instinct innate propensity (in animate or inanimate things)
- 38 Th'other's the phrase 'A gift in friendship', which sounds sweeter than instinct (which includes the word 'stink').
sweeter The word sweet, -er, -est appears 49 times in the play; it is the common adjective of approval and is used regularly in compliments before nouns
- referring to persons (widow, gentleman, etc.). Among the favourite adjectives in verse of the period.
- 39 turtle turtle-dove, a bird proverbial for its fidelity
- 42 Brings The singular verb with plural subject is not uncommon; see also I.I.49, where the phenomenon is not noted.
coach to cart prosperity to punishment. In the Jacobean period luxury coaches became increasingly popular among the well-to-do. They also offered opportunities for illicit sexual assignations: in Owl (1618) they are described as 'running bawdy-houses' (361). Carts were used for conveying convicts to the gallows, and for the public exposure and chastisement of offenders, esp. lewd women.
- 43 thief initiating a disquisition on thieves, which has no connection to the play's plot until much later: see 3.I.O.3.
- turn hanging. (Stealing thirteen pence or more was punishable by hanging.)
- 44 helped you well (by giving you a rhyme for your poem)
- 46 dollars The English name for the German thaler, a large silver coin; in the succeeding lines Martino wishes for more frequent hangings, but speaks happily of gains from thieves' escapes which lead him to issue more warrants and so bring in money.

50 my gains; then goes out more warrants to fetch 'em again. One fine nimble villain may be worth a man ten dollars in and out, o' that fashion. I love such a one with my heart; ay, and will help him to 'scape, too, an I can. Hear you me that? I'll have him in at all times at a month's warning. Nay, say I let him run like a summer nag all the vacation—see you these blanks? I'll send him but one of these bridles, and bring him in at Michaelmas with a vengeance. Nothing kills my heart, but when one of 'em dies, sir. Then there's no hope of more money. I had rather lose at all times two of my best kindred than an excellent thief; for he's a gentleman I'm more beholden to.

FRANCISCO

You betray your mystery too much, sir. [Aside] Yet no

comfort?

'Tis but her sight that I waste precious time for,
For more I cannot hope for, she's so strict;
Yet that I cannot have.

MARTINO

I'm ready now, signor.

Here are blank warrants of all dispositions.
Give me but the name and nature of your malefactor, and I'll bestow him according to his merits.

FRANCISCO [aside]

This only is th'excuse that bears me out
And keeps off impudency and suspicion
From my too frequent coming. What name now
Shall I think on, and not to wrong the house?
This coxcomb will be prating.—One Astilio;
His offence, wilful murder.

63 mystery occupation, skill, craft, trade, art. The word derives from Medieval Latin misterium—a form of ministerium (service, employment)—by confusion with mysterium (mystery)—a word associated with both religious truth and hidden or secret secular truth; it was probably also confused with maistrīe (mastery). Thus the mystery was not just a trade or skill but rather a special province of protected knowledge. It is that which Francisco conceives Martino as betraying.

comfort a favourite Middleton word. Here it means only 'relief from mental torment', the pleasure it would give Francisco to see Philippa, whose presence he anxiously anticipates. It can also indicate more literal physical relief (like that which Latrocinio promises his patients in 4.2) or explicitly sexual satisfaction (like that which a bedmate provides at 5.1.91). But comfort can also mean 'spiritual solace', as at Solomon 3.12 ('Heaven is their haven, comfort their reward') and Two Gates 48.1c ('for the comfort of sinners'). Much of the play's action turns upon the confused relation between the sexual and spiritual senses of the word—as in Ricardo's ambiguous oath, 'let me never hope for comfort' (2.1.42).

65 strict virtuous, proper, stern in matters of conscience or morality

66 I'm ready now (to respond to Francisco's request of 1.1.6–8)

67 dispositions (a) kinds, characters (b) legal decisions (c) the act of disposing of a person (as to custody by a warrant); (d) the mental constitution or temperament of an individual, a sense associated with nature in the next line68 nature the character or essential quality of a person, here with the sense of the criminal quality, thus leading to the idea of his merits determining where he shall be bestowd. Nature is a word with such multiple uses that it underlies all areas of human culture, primarily as that which is prior to or unaffected by subsequent cultural modification. In Christian thought concerning the quality of the human being it implies the state existing before the advent of God's grace (without which humans are not capable of acts of goodness), defined by Thomas Wilson as (a) 'our state by birth, being born into the world corrupt and sinful' and (b) 'sensuality'. Thus although Martino's use here may be commonplace, it reflects in its connection with malefactor the play's sense of the essentially depraved actions of humans that are socially regulated by legal institutions and spiritually brought to good ends by a force outside them, specifically at Christmas (Prologue.1).

69 bestow place, dispose of

70 bears me out gives me justification

74 coxcomb conceited fool (after the name for the cap worn by a professional fool, which was like a cock's comb in shape and colour)
prating chattering

Astilio Francisco's invention of this name is confusing in the light of the presence in the play of a character named Attilio.

75–80 wilful... Are you wilful? Martino's question is apparently addressed to the supposed murderer, whose warrant he is writing; but it is also relevant to Francisco. The root noun will can refer to determination and to sexual desire: Francisco lustfully pursues Philippa, despite worldly obstacles and spiritual sanctions.

Likewise, the struggle between Ricardo and Valeria turns upon the meanings of the repeated 'will' in 2.1.63–93 ('an you will', 'have your will', 'wilful'); the validity of the contract—contested because of the 'wilful' stubbornness of both parties—depends upon whether she vowed willingly (voluntate, 4.1.12). All these senses are united by conscious intention and premeditated desire, which Protestant theologians found troubling, because it was difficult to reconcile predestination with personal volition. The resulting theological debates presupposed a binary distinction between 'God's will' and 'man's will', which virtually ensured that 'man's will' was characterized negatively. 'Simply to will anything is of nature, but to will well is of grace—our will being free in respect of sinful acts, but bound in respect of good works, till it be set free by Christ' (Wilson). In the play, wilfulness characterizes murder, sexual desire, legal wrangling, and theft. Here, it is a disembodied 'wilfulness' which (comically) incenses Martino. For those who believed that the human will, as a faculty of mind, was almost inevitably misguided, salvation depended upon an acceptance of the unexpected and unwilled—what the play characterizes as 'fortune' or 'luck'. Nevertheless, a person's response to such moments of grace might be characterized as an act of will, and a will to godliness might itself be a sign of God's grace. Hence William Perkins, for instance, asked 'how far forth the will worketh in the receiving of grace?' The Calvinist preoccupation with 'will' made it a central category for understanding, not only the fate of persons [narrative], but the organization of souls [character]. Thus, Brandino has no will of his own, being easily persuaded to change his opinion; the Second Sutor, by contrast, refuses to be dissuaded from his 'humour' (see 2.1.175).

MARTINO Wilful murder? O, I love o' life to have such a fellow come under my fingers. Like a beggar that's long a-taking leave of a fat louse, I'm loath to part with him; I must look upon him over and over first. Are you willful? P'faith, I'll be as wilful as you then.
 80 Enter Philippa and Violetta at a window

PHILIPPA Martino!
 MARTINO Mistress?

PHILIPPA Make haste; your master's going.
 MARTINO I'm but about a wilful murder, forsooth. I'll dispatch that presently.
 [Martino writes]

PHILIPPA [to Francisco] Good morrow, sir. [Aside] O that I durst say more.
 [Exeunt Philippa and Violetta from the window]

FRANCISCO [aside] 'Tis gone again, since. Such are all life's pleasures—
 85 No sooner known, but lost; he that enjoys 'em
 The length of life has but a longer dream;
 He wakes to this i'th' end, and sees all nothing.
 [Enter Philippa above]

PHILIPPA He cannot see me now. I'll mark him better 90 Before I be too rash. Sweetly composed he is.
 Now as he stands, he's worth a woman's love
 That loves only for shape, as most on's do.
 But I must have him wise as well as proper.
 He comes not in my books else, and indeed

95 I have thought upon a course to try his wit. Violetta!
 [Enter Violetta above]

VIOLETTA Mistress?

PHILIPPA Yonder's the gentleman again.
 VIOLETTA O, sweet mistress,
 Pray give me leave to see him.
 PHILIPPA Nay, take heed.
 Open not the window, an you love me. 100

VIOLETTA No, I've the view of his whole body here, mistress,
 At this poor little slit. O, enough, enough.
 In troth, 'tis a fine outside.

PHILIPPA I see that.
 VIOLETTA He's curled his hair most judiciously well.
 PHILIPPA Ay, there's thy love now: it begins in barbarism. 105
 She buys a goose with feathers, that loves a gentleman
 for's hair; she may be cozened to her face, wench.
 Away, he takes his leave. Reach me that letter hither.
 Quick, quick, wench!
 [Violetta hands the letter to Philippa, who drops it as the men talk below]

MARTINO [to Francisco] Nay, look upon't, and spare not. 110
 Everyone cannot get that kind of warrant from me, signor. Do you see this prick i'th' bottom? It betokens power and speed. It is a privy mark, that runs betwixt the constables and my master. Those that cannot read, when they see this, know 'tis for lechery or murder; 115 and this being away, the warrant comes gelded and insufficient.

FRANCISCO I thank you, sir.
 MARTINO Look you, all these are nihils,
 They want the punction.

FRANCISCO Yes, I see they do, sir.
 There's for thy pains.—[Aside] Mine must go unrewarded. 120

When applied to persons, both try and trial posit an interior reality which a misleading surface may conceal; the trial is a procedure for determining the true nature of a thing (a metallic ore, for instance) or a person. Philippa tries Francisco, and later Ansaldo; Francisco claims to have made 'friendly trial' of Philippa (1.2.233); Ricardo tries Francisco's performance of 'ladyship' (1.2.114); Valeria promises to 'make great trial' of any man she would marry (2.1.22), and when in distress tries the First Suitor's 'goodness' (2.1.152), etc. In Christian theology, God similarly 'tries' persons, in order to reveal their true nature. See 'prove' (3.3.52, 5.1.382).

wit intelligence and ingenuity. Although the word wit derives from Old English wit or gewit (mind, reason, intelligence—thus the five wits and the capacity to lose one's wits; see 3.3.11, 17), it develops early a capacity to stand for the distinctive quality of an individual mind. Just as important is the development of the sense associated with cleverness, ability, and ingenuity. Philippa here is testing not just Francisco's intelligence but the sprightliness of his invention in a challenging situation. See also 3.1.59, 3.3.3, 8, 47, 75.
 95.1 above See 1.1.88.1.
 100 Open . . . window The scene is conceived as Philippa and Violetta looking through a window, either partially opened or with a shutter; note at 102 'this poor little slit', a narrow opening.

 104 judiciously prudently (an arch or affected use)
 105 barbarism (a) unsophisticated behaviour (Philippa criticizes Violetta's praise of Francisco), but also (b) a pun, 'the work of the barber' 112 prick (a) a dot or hole, but also (b) a penis; sexual puns are frequent in the rest of Martino's speech.
betokens denotes, signifies 113 privy secret
 116 away absent
gelded castrated (an image often used of authoritative texts that had been altered illegitimately). It refers explicitly to removal of the testicles, the source of male seed; here, a document that has been 'gelded' is 'insufficient' for 'lechery'.
 118 nihils nothings (Latin), powerless things; 'thing' = sexual organ, thus 'no-things' = geldings
 119 punction the act of pricking
 120-1 unrewarded . . . regarded a rhyme

- The better love, the worse by fate regarded. Exit
 MARTINO Well, go thy ways for the sweetest customer that ever penman was blessed withal.—Now will he come for another tomorrow again. If he hold on this 125 course, he will leave never a knave i'th' town within this twelvemonth. No matter, I shall be rich enough by that time.
 PHILIPPA [above] Martino!
 MARTINO Say you, forsooth?
 PHILIPPA
 130 What paper's that the gentleman let fall there?
 MARTINO Paper? [Aside] 'Tis the warrant, I hope. If it be, I'll hide it, and make him pay for't again. No, pox; 'tis not so happy.
 PHILIPPA What is't, sirrah?
 135 MARTINO 'Tis nothing but a letter, forsooth.
 PHILIPPA Is that nothing?
 MARTINO Nothing in respect of a warrant, mistress.
 PHILIPPA A letter? Why, it's been many a man's undoing,
 sir.
 140 MARTINO So has a warrant, an you go to that, mistress.
 PHILIPPA
 Read but the superscription, and away with't.
 Alas, it may concern the gentleman nearly.
 MARTINO
 Why, mistress, this letter is at home already.
 PHILIPPA
 At home? How mean you, sir?
 MARTINO You shall hear, mistress.
 145 [Reads] 'To the deserving'st of all her sex, and most worthy of his best respect and love, Mrs Philippa
 Brandino.'
 [He gives her the letter]
 PHILIPPA How, sir, to me?
 MARTINO To you, mistress.
 PHILIPPA
 Run, as thou lov'st my honour and thy life. 150
 Call him again. I'll not endure this injury.
 But stay; stay, now I think on't. 'Tis my credit.
 I'll have your master's counsel. Ah, base fellow,
 To leave his loose lines thus! 'Tis even as much
 As a poor honest gentlewoman's undoing, 155
 Had I not a grave wiseman to my husband—
 And thou, a vigilant varlet, to admit
 Thou car'st not whom.
 MARTINO 'Las, 'tis my office, mistress.
 You know you have a kirtle every year,
 And 'tis within two months of the time now. 160
 The velvet's coming over. Pray be milder.
 A man that has a place must take money of anybody.
 Please you to throw me down but half a dollar, and I'll make you a warrant for him now; that's all I care for
 him. 165
 PHILIPPA
 Well, look you be clear now from this foul conspiracy
 Against mine honour, or your master's love to you,
 That makes you stout, shall not maintain you here.
 It shall not; trust to't. Exit
 MARTINO This is strange to me now.
 Dare she do this, and but eight weeks to New Year's tide? 170

- 122 go thy ways for off you go, for you are customer client, but also slang for prostitute
 123 withal with 133 happy fortunate, lucky; the word derives from the idea of hap or good fortune, and not until the 16th century did it become associated with inner contentment (as at 1.2.225) and with fitness to circumstances, or an aptitude for getting done what the circumstances require (as at 5.1.94). It recurs frequently in The Widow, as do the related words fortune and luck. The play is notable for the characters' experience of chance and coincidence unrelated to their own apparent determinations and of reward unjustified by their actions; it has a 'happy' ending despite their wrong ambitions.
 (See Introduction.)
 137 in respect of in comparison with 138–40 letter . . . warrant (perhaps alluding to the fate of those involved in the scandalous Overbury murder trials of 1615–16)
 138 undoing cause of ruin

- 141 superscription the direction or head of a letter
away with't put it away
 142 nearly particularly, intimately 149–50 you . . . thou Martino addresses his mistress Philippa formally and politely as you, and she answers him, her subordinate, with the informal and familiar thou.
 151 injury insult, affront. From Latin iniuria (wrong, hurt, detriment), the word enters English as a wrong inflicted or suffered. It also encompasses hurtful language, slander, or calumny. The sense of physical injury was current but not primary. See also at 1.2.143; 5.1.45, and 5.1.194.
 152 credit honour, reputation
 154 loose (a) not tied up; (b) unchaste lines message, writing 155 honest virtuous, chaste, faithful in marriage. Philippa represents herself as a chaste wife, vulnerable to slander and fearful for her reputation. The word enters English from French honeste (Latin honestus, respectable, decent,

- honourable) and has the initial sense of 'held in honour, respectable'. But by Middleton's day its general sense
 'of good moral character, virtuous' had developed a specific application for women relating to sexual virtue, i.e., complete sexual abstinence or fidelity to a spouse. Throughout the play honest/honesty operates within this gendered context, except at 5.1.365 where the Second Suitor, challenging Valeria's
 'honesty', is testing the sincerity of her affection for Ricardo. See also honour as a gendered term at 3.2.94 and 3.3.48.
undoing cause of ruin
 156 wiseman (ironic) a simpleton
 157 varlet knave, rogue, rascal
 159 kirtle a woman's gown or skirt
 161 coming over from France, the source of such velvet; at this point the language assumes an English setting
 162 place a position of responsibility
 168 stout defiant, rebellious
 170 eight . . . tide Compare 1.1.160; Martino suggests that she is risking her New Year's present by attacking him.

- A man that had his blood as hot as hers now
Would fit her with French velvet. I'll go near it.
Enter Brandino (the justice) and Philippa
- PHILIPPA
If this be a wrong to modest reputation
Be you the censurer, sir, that are the master
Both of your fame and mine.
- 175 BRANDINO Signor Francisco?
I'll make him fly the land.
- MARTINO That will be hard, sir.
I think he be not so well feathered, master;
He's spent the best part of his patrimony.
- PHILIPPA
Hark of his bold confederate.
- BRANDINO There thou'rt bitter,
And I must chide thee now.
- 180 PHILIPPA What should I think, sir?
He comes to your man for warrants.
- BRANDINO There it goes then.—
Come hither, knave. Comes he to you for warrants?
- MARTINO Why, what of that, sir?
You know I give no warrants to make cuckolds.
- 185 That comes by fortune and by nature, sir.
- BRANDINO
True, that comes by fortune and by nature, wife.
Why dost thou wrong this man?
- MARTINO He needs no warrant, master, that goes about such business. A cuckold-maker carries always his warrant about him.
- 190 BRANDINO [to Philippa]
La, has he answered well now? to the full?
What cause hast thou t'abuse him?
- PHILIPPA Hear me out, I pray.
Through his admittance, he's had opportunity
To come into the house and court me bodily.
- BRANDINO [to Martino]
Sirrah, you're foul again methinks.
- MARTINO Who, I, sir?
- 195 BRANDINO
You gave this man admittance into th'house.
- MARTINO
That's true, sir. You never gave me any order yet
To write my warrants i'th' street.
- BRANDINO [to Philippa] Why, sure thou tak'st delight
To wrong this fellow, wife. Ha?—'cause I love him.
- PHILIPPA
Pray see the fruits, see what he's left behind here. 200
Be angry where you should be. There's few wives
Would do as I do.
- BRANDINO Nay, I'll say that for thee.
I ne'er found thee but honest.
- PHILIPPA She's a beast
- 171 blood...hot violence of passion. The blood was one of the four 'cardinal humours' of the human body, fluids that determined mental and physical health (see humour 2.1.175); its predominance in the human constitution maintained a 'sanguine' disposition. Here it is used in the sense of the seat of emotion and passion in humans, and particularly in association with anger and sexual desire, both of which are relevant here (hot...blood). Martino perceives Philippa as angry, but speaks about male revenge against her in terms of sexual violence, thus combining the concepts of lust and anger; he is, however, unaware of the sexual desire that is Philippa's motivation.
- 172 fit...velvet provide her with the velvet that is 'coming over' (1.1.161) from France; however the context suggests sexual humour, and 'French' is frequently associated with nouns to do with syphilis.
I'll go near it I'll consider it; I'll hint at it.
- 172.1 Brandino Italian, 'brandire, to brandish a sword. Also to smug or trim up' (Florio); an ironic name for an eighty-year-old husband of a young wife. He is also apparently quite fat (4.2.103-4) and moves very slowly (2.2.119-20).
- 174 censurer judge; Philippa is assuring Brandino that he has charge of her reputation as well as his own.
- 176 fly the land go into exile
- 177 well feathered prosperous; Martino is picking up on the metaphor of flying
- 178 patrimony inheritance
- 180 chide scold, rebuke severely
- 185 by fortune and by nature the two sources of gifts to humans, the first of benefits granted during life, the second of qualities born in the individual. Fortune and Nature are usually contrasted (as in the debate at As You Like It 1.2.30-53); Martino's phrasing suggests that the two are in some sense not opposed but identical, and in Calvinist theology they were easily conflated, since God was thought to be the source of both, and the apparent accidents which occur during a life were just as predetermined as the characteristics inherited at birth. Moreover, cuckoldry is not usually considered a benefit; it would normally be attributed to 'misfortune' or 'ill fortune', and the idea that it comes 'by fortune' implies that great wealth (another sense of 'fortune') inevitably leads to cuckoldry. In city comedy, successful merchants are often cuckolds, as though there were an inverse relation between economic and sexual potency; more generally, wealth has often enabled older men to acquire pretty young wives, and in comic tradition such wives are almost invariably unfaithful. Their unfaithfulness comes 'by nature' either (ideologically) because women are regarded as naturally lecherous, or
- (literally) because 'nature' is slang for the genitals.
- 189 business Martino puns on two senses of business: (a) legal or commercial activity, and (b) sexual intercourse. The two senses are fused in much of the action of the play, since the wooing of Valeria by Ricardo and the two suitors is dominated by concern for financial profit, and Francisco's pursuit of Philippa is conducted under the guise of legal activity. Though the word is occasionally used in the first sense alone in the play, it frequently appears in sexual puns; see 2.1.103, 2.2.18, 38, 40, 101, and especially Francisco's uses at 3.2.62, 74, and 94.
- 190 warrant in commenting on the 'illegality' of cuckoldry, Martino gives warrant a double meaning: (a) instrument of authority, and (b) penis.
- 191 to the full completely, satisfactorily (with double entendre: 'all the way' or 'all the way in')
- 193 his...he's Martino's...Francisco is
- 194 bodily in person, but with the physical association
- 195 foul wicked
- 200 fruits consequences; the word has a moral charge as the inevitable consequence of the quality of life or actions: see Matthew 7:18-19, and Two Gates 35.II.c ('idolatry and the fruits thereof')
- 203 honest truthful, but also chaste; see 1.1.155

- That ever was found otherways.
- 205 BRANDINO Read, Martino.
Mine eyes are sore already, and such business
Would put 'em out quite.
- MARTINO [reads] 'Fair, dear and incomparable mistress—'
- BRANDINO
O, every letter draws a tooth, methinks.
- MARTINO [aside]
And it leads mine to wat'ring.
- PHILIPPA Here's no villainy?
- 210 MARTINO [reads] 'My love being so violent, and the opportunity so precious in your husband's absence tonight, who as I understand takes a journey this morning—'
- BRANDINO
O plot of villainy!
- PHILIPPA Am I honest, think you, sir?
- BRANDINO
Exactly honest, perfectly improved.—
- 215 On, on, Martino.
- MARTINO [reads] 'I will make bold, dear mistress, though your chastity has given me many a repulse, to wait the sweet blessings of this long desired opportunity at the back gate between nine and ten this night.'
- BRANDINO
- 220 I feel this Inns o' Court man in my temples.
- MARTINO [reads] 'Where if your affection be pleased to receive me, you receive the faithfulest that ever vowed service to woman: Francisco.'
- BRANDINO
I will make Francisco smart for't.
- PHILIPPA
Show him the letter. Let him know you know him; That will torment him. All your other courses Are nothing, sir, to that; that breaks his heart.
- BRANDINO
The strings shall not hold long then. Come, Martino.
Exeunt Brandino and Martino
- PHILIPPA
Now, if Francisco have any wit at all,
He comes at night; if not, he never shall. Exit 230
- Enter [three gentlemen:] Francisco and Ricardo and Attilio* 1.2
- RICARDO Nay, mark; mark it, Francisco. It was the naturalest courtesy that ever was ordained: a young gentleman being spent, to have a rich widow set him up again. To see how Fortune has provided for all mortality's ruins: your college for your old standing scholar, your hospital for your lame creeping soldier, your bawd for your mangled roarer, your open house for your beggar, and your widow for your gentleman. Ha, Francisco?
- FRANCISCO
Ay, sir, you may be merry; you're in hope
Of a rich widow. 10
- RICARDO And why shouldst not thou be in hope of another, if there were any spirit in thee? Thou art as likely a 204 was found He takes her to mean 'turned out to be' but she means 'was discovered to be'.

205 sore painful, inflamed

208 draws a tooth causes suffering

209 And... wat'ring makes him salivate with titillation

213 honest chaste

214 improved cultivated, cultured

217 chastity Philippa is a married woman, not a virgin, but chastity means 'an abstinence and forbearing, not from marriage, but from all strange and roving lusts about the desire of sex' (Wilson).

218–19 at the back gate (alluding, by double entendre, to anal intercourse)

220 Inns o' Court man law student temples The cuckold's horns grew from his temples; but there is also a pun on the names of two Inns of Court, the Inner Temple and the Middle Temple.

221 affection love

223 service (a) devotion to the beloved's wellbeing, but also (b) sexual activity as the male's performance for the female; the double sense suggests always the complexity of human desire. Here it is Philippa who uses the pun in the letter that she constructs to attract Francisco's desire to serve her. The word functions differently when Marcia/Ansaldò uses it to Philippa; s/he plays the naïve role of dedicated courtier to Philippa, who understands instead the complexity that she invests the term with in this first scene; see 3.3.100 and 3.3.111.

228 The strings his heartstrings

229 wit intelligence, ingenuity

230 at night tonight

1.2.2 courtesy courteous or generous act. In its broadest sense 'courtesy' is the elaborate code of behaviour that distinguishes the person of gentle rank; 'naturalest courtesy' is an oxymoron since by contrast to 'nature' it is the 'art' of conduct. It is 'courtesy' in the form of generosity that Ansaldò receives from Philippa, and in the form of gracious conduct that attracts Philippa to Ansaldò; see 3.3.61, 3.3.71, 3.3.92, 3.3.97, 3.3.119, and 3.3.126.

ordained arranged, destined

3 spent bankrupt (but also 'sexually emptied')

3–4 set him up (a) restore his financial credit (b) give him an erection

4 Fortune Early texts do not orthographically distinguish the abstract concept of chance from the personified 'deity' worshipped by sinners (Solomon 2.21) and pagans (Hengist 1.2.0.1), who emblematically 'Stood reeling on a rolling stone' (Ghost 296), carrying 'a silver wheel' (Industry 92) or 'a golden round full of lots' (Hengist 1.2.0.2). Fortune was always female, and her operations were often attributed to personal affection: 'Fortune dotes on me' (Chaste Maid 3.3.20). Ricardo associates Fortune with a rich widow, who will bestow her gifts on him; in an inverse economy, only those who have lost or given up their fortunes will be cared for by Fortune. In the plot, Ricardo's fortune, and his chance to regain the material fortune he has squandered, depend upon the affections of a rich widow.

5 standing perpetual (perhaps sexually erect)

7 bawd either madam (as financial provider) or pimp (as alternative profession)

mangled hacked, mutilated (perhaps castrated)

roarer a bully or reveller; a wild young man

15 fellow as any is in the company. I'll be hanged now if I do not hit the true cause of thy sadness—and confess truly, i'faith: thou hast some land unsold yet, I hold my life.

FRANCISCO Marry, I hope so, sir.

20 RICARDO A pox on't! Have I found it? 'Slight, away with't with all speed, man. I was never merry at heart while I had a foot. Why, man, Fortune never minds us till we are left alone to ourselves. For what need she take care for them that do nothing but take care for themselves? Why, dost think, if I had kept my lands still, I should ever have looked after a rich widow? Alas, I should have married some poor young maid, got five-and-twenty children, and undone myself.

25 FRANCISCO I protest, sir, I should not have the face, though, to come to a rich widow with nothing.

RICARDO

30 Why, art thou so simple as thou mak'st thyself? Dost think, i'faith, I come to a rich widow with no thing?

FRANCISCO

I mean, with state not answerable to hers.

RICARDO

35 Why, there's the fortune, man, that I talked on. She knows all this, and yet I am welcome to her.

FRANCISCO

Ay, that's strange, sir.

RICARDO Nay, more to pierce thy hard heart— And make thee sell thy land, if thou'st any grace: She has, 'mongst others, two substantial suitors. One (in good time be't spoke) I owe much money to; She knows this too, and yet I'm welcome to her.

Nor dares the unconscionable rascal trouble me. She's told him thus: those that profess love to her Shall have the liberty to come and go— Or else get him gone first. She knows not yet Where fortune may bestow her; she's her gift; Therefore to all will show a kind respect.

45 FRANCISCO

Why, this is like a woman. I ha' no luck in't.

RICARDO

And, as at a sheriff's table—O, blest custom!— A poor indebted gentleman may dine, Feed well, and without fear, and depart so, So to her lips fearless I come and go.

50 FRANCISCO

You may well boast; you're much the happier man, sir.

RICARDO

So you would be, an you would sell your land, sir.

FRANCISCO

I have heard the circumstance of your sweet fortunes; Prithee give ear to my unlucky tale now.

55 RICARDO

That's an ill hearing. But come on for once, sir.

FRANCISCO

I never yet loved but one woman.

RICARDO

Right, I begun so too, but I have loved A thousand since.

FRANCISCO

Pray, hear me, sir. But this is a man's wife.

60 RICARDO

So has five hundred of my thousand been.

- 14 the company our social circle (but also suggesting 'this band of actors'—the first of several theatrical allusions in this scene)
- 16 land unsold Ricardo suggests that Francisco is sad because property is a burdensome responsibility, and ties up cash.
- 18 Marry a mild interjection used by a broad range of characters in the play; originally an invocation of the name of the Virgin Mary, it had lost that significance by this time
- 19 'Slight by God's light (a strong oath). The oaths in this play show the observance of the Act to Restrain Abuses of Players (1606), which forbade actors to 'jestingly or prophanelly speak or use the holy Name of God or of Christ Jesus, or of the Holy Ghost or of the Trinity.' See also Ricardo's similar contracted oaths Life (2.1.93, 2.2.107), 'Od's light (2.2.62), Heart (2.2.95). The most frequent oath in the play is the mild faith/i'faith, which occurs on forty occasions. Note also heaven as an avoidance of the name of God at 2.1.12, 2.1.15, 2.1.21, 2.2.116, 5.1.195, 5.1.415, 5.1.430.
- 25 looked after sought out
- 27 undone myself ruined my life, not ruined my finances
- 28 face effrontery, nerve, gall
- 29 nothing no money
- 30 mak'st thyself appear to be
- 32 no thing Ricardo exposes Francisco's verbal innocence by joking on thing = penis.
- 33 state position in the world, especially in relation to prosperity in wealth or property
- answerable comparable or corresponding to
- 34 fortune good luck, blessing; although Ricardo has earlier spoken of Fortune in the sense of the goddess he here uses the word in its more commonplace sense of the consequences of her generosity. See 1.2.4.
- 35 She the widow
- 37 grace good sense; a word often with strong theological significance as God's gift that enables humans to do virtuous acts, but here reduced to a purely secular sense in the context of Ricardo's mockery of penitential language ('to pierce thy hard heart').
- 39 in good time by good fortune; or right away
- 45 her gift Fortune's gift; however, it could mean that she is her own to give in the context of what fortune brings.
- 46 kind natural, gracious. The word is of Old English origin, and the early senses of its noun form relate to birth and origin, to birthright and 'character or quality derived from birth or native constitution.' The adjective originally was used for 'natural, in various senses'—'in accordance with the nature of things, appropriate, by birth'—and was extended to further positive senses, such as 'well bred' (see 5.1.172 'came of a good kind') and, as usually in this play, 'naturally well disposed, having a benevolent nature, generous, courteous' (OED a. 5). (See also 'unkindly', 2.2.145.)
- 51 fearless without trepidation
- 52 happier more fortunate, more blessed. (The issue is not inner contentment but the benevolence of external forces.)
- 56 an ill hearing unpleasant to hear

- FRANCISCO
Nay, see an you'll regard me!
- RICARDO No? You see I do;
I bring you an example in for everything.
- FRANCISCO
This man's wife—
- RICARDO So you said.
- FRANCISCO Seems very strict.
- 65 RICARDO Ha!—hm.
- FRANCISCO
Do you laugh at that?
- RICARDO 'Seems very strict', you said.
I hear you, man. I'faith, you are so jealous still.
- FRANCISCO But why should that make you laugh?
- RICARDO
Because she seems so. You're such another!
- FRANCISCO
Nay, sir, I think she is.
- 70 RICARDO You cannot tell then?
- FRANCISCO
I dare not ask the question, I protest,
For fear of a repulse; which, yet not having,
My mind's the quieter, and I live in hope still.
- RICARDO Ha!—hm.
[To Attilio] This 'tis to be a landed man.—Come, I perceive
- 75 I must show you a little of my fortune, and instruct
you.
Not ask the question?
- FRANCISCO Methought still she frowned, sir.
- RICARDO
Why, that's the cause, fool, that she looked so scurvily.
- Come, come, make me your woman; you'll ne'er do't else.
I'll show you her condition presently. 80
I perceive you must begin like a young vaulter, and get up at horse-tail, before you get into the saddle. Have you the boldness to utter your mind to me now, being but in hose and doublet? I think if I should put on a farthingale, thou wouldst never have the heart to do't. 85
- FRANCISCO
Perhaps I should not then for laughing at you, sir.
- RICARDO In the mean time I fear I shall laugh at thee without one.
- FRANCISCO
Nay, you must think, friend, I dare speak to a woman.
- RICARDO You shall pardon me for that, friend; I will not think it, till I see't. 90
- FRANCISCO
Why, you shall, then. I shall be glad to learn, too,
Of one so deep as you are.
- RICARDO So you may, sir.
[To Attilio] Now 'tis my best course to look mildly; I Shall put him out at first, else.
- FRANCISCO A word, sweet lady. 95
- RICARDO [as a woman]
With me, sir? Say your pleasure.
- FRANCISCO O Ricardo,
Thou art too good to be a woman long.
- RICARDO
Do not find fault with this, for fear I prove Too scornful; be content when you're well used.
- FRANCISCO
You say well, sir.—Lady, I have loved you long. 100
- RICARDO [as a woman] 'Tis a good hearing, sir.

62 see...me look how you don't listen to me

64 strict virtuous, chaste

67 jealous fearful, doubtful

69 such another! such an innocent (see Dent A250)

70 tell discern, perceive

77 Not...question (don't tell me you) could not even speak to her directly

78 scurvily sourly

80 condition nature, character, quality. The word derives from French condicion after Latin condicion-em, 'an agreement or compact', but in Latin the word had already the senses 'situation, position, rank, circumstances, nature, manner'. In English it develops a complex of senses related to modes or states of being; here Ricardo protests that he will show (act out for) Francisco her true character as he understands it. See also the uses at 4.2.74 and 5.1.307 and 310. presently right now

81–2 vaulter...saddle the stages of mounting a horse, but here with sexual joke: leaping or vaulting into the saddle is an idiom for copulation

84 hose and doublet men's clothes

85 farthingale women's clothes; a hooped petticoat

87–8 laugh...one Seeing a male not in female clothes would not normally be laughable, but it might be so if the male in question normally cross-dressed. This is one of several moments in the scene which would make better sense if the actor playing Francisco had, until recently, played female roles: see 1.2.111.

92–3 I...are (like a young actor, taking lessons from a more experienced one)

93 deep learned, experienced

95 put him out disconcert him, put him off; specifically, make an actor forget his lines lady female equivalent of 'lord' (a word not used of any of the male characters), indicating a status usually higher than 'gentlewoman'. This is the first occurrence of the word in the play; it occurs eight times in 1.2.95–149, perhaps prompted by association with 'the scornful lady' (see note at 1.2.103).

96 Say your pleasure What do you want? The word pleasure always has a latent complexity. Used in phrases such as this it expresses the formal courteous sense of providing a person with what s/he wishes; however, there is the secondary risk that the respondent's desire may be of a kind that is beyond the courteous, and may be unwelcome or threatening. In the cross-gendered role-playing of this scene the formal phrase assumes a strong erotic potential. Note further uses at 1.1.85; 1.2.105; 2.2.1; 2.2.78; 2.2.109; and of pleasant at 3.2.108.

101 'Tis a good hearing That's good to hear

- [To Attilio] If he be not out now, I'll be hanged.
- FRANCISCO
You play a scornful woman? I perceive, Ricardo, you have not been used to 'em. Why, I'll come in at 105 my pleasure with you. Alas, 'tis nothing for a man to talk when a woman gives way to't. One shall seldom meet with a lady so kind as thou played'st her.
- RICARDO Not altogether, perhaps. He that draws their pictures must flatter 'em a little; they'll look he that 110 plays 'em should do't a great deal then.
- FRANCISCO
Come, come, I'll play the woman; that I'm used to.
I see you ne'er wore shoe that pinched you yet;
All your things comes on easy.
- RICARDO Say you so, sir?
I'll try your ladyship, faith.—Lady, well met.
- 115 FRANCISCO [as a woman] I do not think so, sir.
- RICARDO
A scornful gom!—and at the first dash, too.
My widow never gave me such an answer.
I'll to you again, sir.—
Fairest of creatures, I do love thee infinitely.
- 120 FRANCISCO [as a woman] There's nobody bids you, sir.
- RICARDO Pox on thee! Thou art the beastliest, crossset baggage that ever man met withal. But I'll see thee hanged, sweet lady, ere I be daunted with this. Why, thou'rt too awkward, sirrah.
- 125 FRANCISCO [as a woman] Hang thee, base fellow.
- RICARDO [To Attilio]
Now by this light, he thinks he does't indeed.
- Nay then, have at your plum-tree! Faith, I'll not be foiled.—
Though you seem to be careless, madam, as you have enough wherewithal to be, yet I do, must, and will love
you.
- FRANCISCO [as a woman] Sir, if you begin to be rude, I'll call my woman.
- RICARDO [to Attilio] What a pestilent quean's this! I shall have much ado with her, I see that.
—Tell me as you're a woman, lady, what 135 Serve kisses for? But to stop all your mouths.
- [He makes to kiss Francisco]
- FRANCISCO Hold, hold, Ricardo!
- RICARDO Disgrace me, widow?
[Ricardo throws Francisco down]
- FRANCISCO Art mad? I'm Francisco.
- ATTILIO Signor Ricardo, up, up!
140 [Attilio pulls Ricardo off Francisco]
- RICARDO Who is't? Francisco?
- FRANCISCO Francisco, quoth a! What, are you mad, sir?
- RICARDO A bots on thee! Thou dost not know what injury thou hast done me. I was i'th' fairest dream. This is your way now, an you can follow it.
- 145 FRANCISCO 'Tis a strange way, methinks.
- RICARDO
Learn you to play a woman not so scornfully, then,
For I am like the actor that you spoke on:
I must have the part that overcomes the lady.
I never like the play, else.—Now your friendship, 150 But to assist a subtle trick I ha' thought on,

103 scornful woman with 'scornful' at 99, perhaps alluding to Beaumont and Fletcher's most popular play, The Scornful Lady (1613); perhaps the actor playing Francisco originally played the part of the title character in that play.

104–5 come in at my pleasure visit as I please; but the erotic suggestion of sexual penetration and pleasure is present.

109 look exact

111 I'll...used to depending on whether there is a strong pause after 'woman', this could mean either (a) I'll act like the woman with whom I am familiar, or (b) I'll act the part of a woman; I'm accustomed to doing that. The first sense could refer to Philippa, or to a female role the actor now playing Francisco was famous for playing in the past ('the scornful lady'). The second sense would suggest that Francisco has never asserted himself in a manly fashion, or that the actor is a 'juvenile romantic lead' who has, until recently, played female roles for the company. Dick Robinson (formerly a boy actor playing women's parts) may have first performed the part of Francisco. Robinson seems to have played the 'young gallant' Wittipol in Jonson's The Devil is an Ass (probably first performed in late 1616); Jonson's play calls attention to Robinson's acting, and his transition from playing young women to playing young men.

play the woman (a) behave in an effeminate fashion (b) act the role of a woman in a play

112 shoe that pinched a woman's small shoe

113 things genitals, in this case female, rendering the previous line bawdy

116 gom godmother; an old woman at the first dash at the first stroke or blow (OED sb1.2), immediately

124 awkward perverse, disagreeable
sirrah ordinary form of address to inferiors, used to women as well as men

127 plum-tree female genitals. 'Have at your plumb-tree' in the same sense occurs in Thomas Nashe's Have with you to Saffron Walden (1596).

128 careless unconcerned, not caring

133 quean's a bold, impudent, or ill-behaved woman

134 much ado (perhaps alluding to Shakespeare's popular play Much Ado about Nothing, famous for Beatrice's scornful retorts to the young gallant Benedick—an allusion irresistible if the Ricardo-actor had played Benedick against the Francisco-actor's Beatrice)

136 all your mouths (a) the mouths of all women (b) all a woman's orifices

138 Disgrace treat me with disfavour, or dismiss from favour

143 A bots on thee an expression of execration; 'bots' is a disease of cattle

148 actor Francisco has not mentioned an actor, but the audience will easily assume an earlier unstaged part of their conversation; in any case, this is probably a reference (which the audience could be expected to recognize) to the kinds of roles normally played by the actor playing Ricardo; it also promises a happy ending.

149 part (a) role in the play; (b) sexual organ

150 play (a) playhouse performance; (b) sexual adventure
Now your friendship now let me have your support as a friend

- And the rich widow's mine within these three hours.
 ATTILIO and FRANCISCO
 We should be proud of that, sir.
 RICARDO List to me then.
 I'll place you two (I can do't handsomely, 155 I know the house so well) to hear the conference
 'Twixt her and I. She's a most affable one;
 Her words will give advantage, and I'll urge 'em
 To the kind proof, to catch her in a contract.
 Then shall you both step in as witnesses
 And take her in the snare.
 160 FRANCISCO But do you love her?
 And then 'twill prosper.
 RICARDO By this hand, I do—
 Not for her wealth, but for her person too.
 FRANCISCO
 It shall be done then.
 RICARDO But stay, stay, Francisco.
 Where shall we meet with thee some two hours hence
 now?
 FRANCISCO
 Why, hark you, sir.
 [He whispers to Ricardo]
 165 RICARDO Enough. Command my life;
 Get me the widow, I'll get thee the wife.
Exeunt Ricardo and Attilio
 FRANCISCO
 O that's now with me past hope. Yet I must love her.
 I would I could not do't.
Enter Brandino and Martino [aloof]
 MARTINO Yonder's the villain, master.
 170 BRANDINO Francisco? I am happy.
 MARTINO Let's both draw, master,
 For there's nobody with him.—Stay, stay, master.
 Do not you draw till I be ready too.
 Let's draw just both together, and keep e'en.
 BRANDINO
 175 What an we killed him now, before he saw us?
- MARTINO
 No, then he will hardly see to read the letter.
 BRANDINO
 That's true. Good counsel, marry.
 MARTINO Marry, thus much, sir:
 you may kill him lawfully, all the while he's a-reading on't, as an Anabaptist may lie with a brother's wife all 180 the while he's asleep.
 BRANDINO
 He turns, he looks.—Come on, sir, you, Francisco!
 I loved your father well, but you're a villain.
 He loved me well too, but you love my wife, sir.
 After whom take you that? I will not say
 Your mother played false.
 FRANCISCO No, sir, you were not best. 185
 BRANDINO
 But I will say, in spite of thee, my wife's honest.
 MARTINO
 And I, my mistress.
 FRANCISCO You may; I'll give you leave.
 BRANDINO
 Leave or leave not, there!
 [He gives Francisco the letter]
 She defies you, sir.
 Keep your adulterous sheet to wind you in,
 Or cover your forbidden parts at least,
 190 For fear you want one. Many a lecher may
 That sins in cambric now.
 MARTINO And in lawn too, master.
 BRANDINO [to Francisco] Nay, read and tremble, sir.
 [Brandino and Martino talk apart, while Francisco reads]
 MARTINO Now shall I do't, master? I see a piece of an open 195 seam in his shirt: shall I run him in there? for my sword has ne'er a point.
 BRANDINO No, let him foam awhile.
 MARTINO If your sword be no better than mine, we shall 200 not kill him by daylight; we had need have a lantern.

152 three hours (He expects to put his plan into practice immediately. But this reference may also be to actual playing time: literally, in less than three hours of performance, he will have won the widow)

156 'Twixt her and I 'The inflections of Personal Pronouns are frequently neglected or misused' (Abbott) affable civil and courteous in conversation

157 urge press forcibly

158 kind natural; see 1.2.46

proof good outcome or result contract legal agreement, here specifically to marry

160 snare an animal trap in the form of a noose

162 Not... too (contradictory, since 'too' acknowledges that her wealth is part of her attraction)

person her being, her self; Ricardo's use of the word protests that he loves her both as an individual moral being and as a physical body

167 O... her either (a) 'I have no hope of marrying her (because she's already married), but I must have sex with her' or (b) 'I have no hope of consummation, but I can't help desiring her'

170 happy fortunate

177 marry to be sure

179 Anabaptist an early term for 'Baptists', but loosely used of dissenters from the Church of England; as extremists in religion they were portrayed as unconventional in belief and sexual practice.

brother's co-religionist's (but also suggesting incest)

189 adulterous sheet 'lewd piece of paper', but suggesting 'sheet on a bed in which adultery has been committed'. No fornication has occurred, but adultery could mean 'all manner of uncleanness about desire of sex' (Wilson), including presumably masturbation associated with adulterous fantasy.

to wind you in to serve as a burial sheet 191 want lack may i.e., lack one in the future

192 cambric a fine white linen, originally made at Cambray in Flanders

193 lawn a kind of fine linen resembling cambric

197 ne'er a no

199–200 If your sword... daylight i.e., it will take a long time

200–2 lantern...lant-horns...horns The old form 'lanthorn' made possible a pun on the horns of the cuckold.

BRANDINO
Talk not of lant-horns. He's a sturdy lecher.
He would make the horns fly about my ears.

FRANCISCO [aside]
I apprehend thee. Admirable woman!
Which to love best I know not: thy wit or beauty.

BRANDINO [to Francisco]
205 Now sir, have you well viewed your bastard there,
Got of your lustful brain? Give you joy on't.

FRANCISCO
I thank you, sir, although you speak in jest.
I must confess I sent your wife this letter
And often courted her, tempted and urged her.

210 BRANDINO Did you so, sir?
Then first, before I kill thee, I forewarn thee my house.

MARTINO And I, before I kill thee, forewarn thee my office.
Die tomorrow next, thou never get'st warrant of me more, for love or money.

FRANCISCO
215 Remember but again from whence I came, sir,
And then I know you cannot think amiss of me.

BRANDINO
How's this?

MARTINO Pray hear him; it may grow to a peace.—
[Aside] For master, though we have carried the business nobly, we are not altogether so valiant as we should be.

BRANDINO [aside to Martino]
220 Peace. Thou sayst true in that.—What is't you'd say, sir?

FRANCISCO
Was not my father (quietness be with him)
And you sworn brothers?

BRANDINO Why, right, that's it urges me.

FRANCISCO
And could you have a thought that I could wrong
you
As far as the deed goes?

BRANDINO You took the course, sir.

FRANCISCO
225 To make you happy, an you rightly weighed it.

MARTINO [to Brandino]
Troth, I'll put up at all adventures, master.
It comes off very fair yet.

FRANCISCO [to Brandino] You, in years,
Married a young maid. What does the world judge, think you?

MARTINO [to Brandino] By'r Lady, master, knavishly enough, I warrant you.
I should do so myself.

FRANCISCO [to Brandino]
Now, to damp slander
And all her envious and suspicious brood,
I made this friendly trial of her constancy,
Being son to him you loved; that now confirmed,
I might advance my sword against the world
235 In her most fair defence, which joys my spirit.

MARTINO [to Brandino]
O master, let me weep, while you embrace him.

BRANDINO
Francisco, is thy father's soul in thee?
Lives he here still? What, will he show himself 240 In his male seed to me? Give me thy hand.
Methinks it feels now like thy father's to me.
Prithee forgive me.

MARTINO [to Francisco]
And me too, prithee.

BRANDINO [to Francisco]
Come to my house; thy father never missed it.

MARTINO [to Francisco]
Fetch now as many warrants as you please, sir,
And welcome too.

FRANCISCO To see how soon man's goodness
245 May be abused.

BRANDINO But now I know thy intent,
Welcome to all that I have.

FRANCISCO Sir, I take it.
A gift so given, hang him that would forsake it. Exit

BRANDINO
Martino, I applaud my fortune and thy counsel.

MARTINO
250 You never have ill fortune when you follow it.
Here was things carried now in the true nature of a quiet duello;
A great strife ended without the rough soldier or the punto bello.
And now you may take your journey.

BRANDINO Thou art my glee, Martino. Exeunt

Incipit Actus 2
Enter Valeria (the widow) and a servant 2.1

VALERIA
Servellio!

203 apprehend thee understand her trick; see 3.2.4
Admirable exciting wonder; the word was stronger than in modern use.

205 bastard the letter, regarded as the illegitimate issue of his brain, conceived in an 'adulterous sheet'; also a handwriting of mixed letter forms

211 forewarn prohibit, but here with the sense 'forbid to enter'

222 urges provokes to anger

224 deed sexual intercourse

226 put up put away his weapon at all adventures anyway, whatever the consequence

227 in years old

231 damp extinguish, stifle

243 missed it failed to visit it

251 duello duel

252 punto bello fine thrust. (These words of Italian fencing jargon are an editorial conjecture, to fill out the metre and supply the rhyme; at this point the quarto has a dash.)

254 glee joy

2.1.0.2 Valeria Italian, 'Valere...to be worth, to be of value, Also to be much or greatly esteemed...' (Florio)

- SERVANT Mistress?
 VALERIA If that fellow come again,
 Answer him without me. I'll not speak with him.
 SERVANT
 He in the nutmeg-coloured band, forsooth?
 VALERIA
 Ay, that spiced coxcomb, sir. [Exit Servant]
 Never may I marry again
 5 If his right worshipful idolatrous face
 Be not most fearfully painted; so hope comfort me,
 I might perceive it peel in many places,
 And under's eye lay a betraying foulness,
 10 As maids sweep dust o'th' house all to one corner.
 It showed me enough there, prodigious pride
 That cannot but fall scornfully. I'm a woman,
 Yet I praise heaven I never had th'ambition
 To go about to mend a better workman.
 She ever shames herself i'th' end that does it.
 15 He that likes me not now, as heaven made me,
 I will never hazard hell to do him a pleasure,
 Nor lie every night like a woodcock in paste
 To please some gaudy goose i'th' morning.
 20 A wise man likes that best that is itself,
 Not that which only seems, though it look fairer.
 Heaven send me one that loves me, and I'm happy—
 Of whom I'll make great trial ere I have him,
 Though I speak all men fair and promise sweetly.
 I learn that of my suitors; 'tis their own,
 25 Therefore injustice 'twere to keep it from 'em.
Enter Ricardo
 RICARDO And so, as I said, sweet widow—
 VALERIA Do you begin where you left, sir?
 RICARDO I always desire, when I come to a widow, to begin i'th' middle of a sentence, for I presume she has a bad memory of a woman that cannot remember what goes 30 before.
 VALERIA
 Stay, stay, sir. Let me look upon you well.
 Are not you painted too?
 RICARDO How, painted, widow?
 VALERIA
 Not 'painted widow'; I do not use it, trust me, sir.
 RICARDO
 That makes me love thee.
 VALERIA I mean 'painted gentleman', 35
 Or if you please to give him a greater style, sir.
 Blame me not, sir. It's a dangerous age, I tell you;
 Poor simple-dealing women had need look about 'em.
 RICARDO
 But is there such a fellow in the world, widow,
 As you are pleased to talk on?
 VALERIA Nay, here lately, sir. 40
 RICARDO Here? A pox! I think I smell him. 'Tis vermilion sure. Ha? Oil of ben! Do but show him me, widow, and let me never hope for comfort if I do not immediately geld him and grind his face upon one o'th' stones.
 VALERIA Suffices you've expressed me your love and valour 45 and manly hate against that unmanly pride. But sir, I'll save you that labour; he never comes within my door
 again.
 RICARDO I'll love your door the better while I know't, widow. A pair of such brothers were fitter for posts without-door indeed, to make a show at a new-chosen magistrate's gate, than to be used in a woman's cham- 50
 ber. No, sweet widow, having me, you've the truth of a man.
 All that you see of me is full mine own,
 55 And what you see, or not see, shall be yours.

3 band the neckband or collar of a shirt
 4 spiced delicate, over-refined; Valeria plays upon 'nutmeg'
 5 right worshipful a mocking acknowledgement of the unnamed suitor's rank idolatrous worshipping false beauty, i.e., his own
 6 fearfully inducing fear, but used as modern 'awfully', or 'terribly' painted wearing cosmetics; Valeria jests on the association of painted idols in 'idolatrous'
 10 prodigious monstrous
 11 scornfully in a way that will attract scorn
 13 mend...workman improve on the work of God, the 'better workman'

17 woodcock (a) a bird; (b) a gullible person, a fool
paste (a) a pastry shell in which a woodcock would be cooked; (b) almond paste, used for whitening the skin 18 gaudy glaringly showy goose a foolish person 24 their own i.e., the art of speaking fair and promising sweetly 30-1 what goes before (a) what happened in her former marriage; (b) what happened or was said at their last meeting; (c) a penis
 36 greater style more elevated title than 'gentleman' (such as 'knight', 'marquis', 'earl', etc.). Many Jacobean courtiers were 'painted', but it would be 'dangerous' for Valeria—or the actor, or playwright—to say so.

 38 simple-dealing honest, candid
 40 on of
 41 vermilion cinnabar or red crystalline mercuric sulphide used as a cosmetic
 42 Oil of ben oil obtained from the ben-nut
 (the winged seed of the horse-radish tree)
 43 comfort i.e., spiritual or sexual 44 stones testicles (imagined as grindstones, used for sharpening knives, etc.)
 49 door (a) house; (b) genitals
 50-1 posts without-door wooden posts that stood outside the doors of sheriffs or magistrates, and that were repainted with each new office-holder

I ever hated to be beholden to art, or to borrow anything but money.
Francisco and Attilio [enter and] stand unseen
 VALERIA
 True, and that you never use to pay again.
 60 RICARDO What matter is't? If you be pleased to do't for me, I hold it as good.
 VALERIA O, soft you, sir, I pray.
 RICARDO Why, i'faith, you may, an you will.
 VALERIA I know that, sir.
 65 RICARDO Troth, and I would have my will then, if I were as you. There's few women else but has.
 VALERIA
 But since I cannot have't in all, signor, I care not to have't in anything.
 RICARDO
 Why, you may have't in all, an you will, widow.
 VALERIA
 70 Pish! I would have one that loves me for myself, sir, Not for my wealth—and that I cannot have.
 RICARDO
 What say you to him that does the thing you wish for?
 VALERIA
 Why, here's my hand, I'll marry none but him then.
 RICARDO
 Your hand and faith?
 VALERIA My hand and faith.
 [They clasp hands]
 RICARDO 'Tis I, then.
 VALERIA
 75 I shall be glad on't, trust me; 'shrew my heart, else.
 RICARDO A match!
Francisco and Attilio [come forward]
 FRANCISCO
 Give you joy, sweet widow!

ATTILIO Joy to you both!
 VALERIA How?
 RICARDO
 Nay, there's no starting now. I have you fast, widow.—
 You're witness, gentlemen.
 FRANCISCO and ATTILIO We'll be deposed on't. 80
 VALERIA
 Am I betrayed to this then? Then I see 'Tis for my wealth. A woman's wealth's her traitor.
 RICARDO
 'Tis for love chiefly, I protest, sweet widow, I count wealth but a fiddle to make us merry.
 VALERIA
 Hence!
 RICARDO
 Why, thou'rt mine.
 VALERIA I do renounce it utterly. 85
 RICARDO
 Have I not hand and faith?
 VALERIA Sir, take your course.
 RICARDO
 With all my heart: ten courses, an you will, widow.
 VALERIA
 Sir, sir, I'm not so gamesome as you think me. I'll stand you out by law.
 RICARDO
 By law? O cruel merciless woman, 90
 To talk of law, and know I have no money.
 VALERIA
 I will consume myself to the last stamp Before thou get'st me.
 RICARDO Life, I'll be as wilful then too.
 I'll rob all the carriers in Christendom
 But I'll have thee, and find my lawyers money. 95
 I scorn to get thee under forma pauperis;

57 art artifice, modification of the 'natural'. The word appears in The Widow with three different meanings. Deriving from the Latin art-em, skill, it entered the English language with this meaning (as Latrocinio employs it at 4.2.51-3), and was used in education in the phrase the liberal arts, those modes of knowledge that make a free person. However, the nature of the skill and the attitude to that skill led to various specializations of meaning. Here it is used in the sense in which it is opposed to nature: art is the human skill in ornamenting or modifying nature (often, as here, with some sense of corrupting primal purity). At 3.1.42, where Latrocinio says to Ansaldò that 'Art should be rewarded. You must pay your music, sir', he is using the word as the distinctive term for music (belonging to that class of experiences that are now called art), but with a secondary meaning of cunning in crime, because he has just used his song to introduce the idea of robbery. At 4.2.62, 4.2.118, and 5.1.68 Latrocinio in his disguise is called the 'man of art'; the advertised sense is of wisdom and learning, specifically mysterious healing power, but the sense 'con artist' is also ironically present. (The same term is used of Subtle in Jonson's The Alchemist.) Valeria makes 'trial' (see 1.1.95) of men in order to distinguish their 'art' from their 'nature' (1.1.185).

 59 again back
 66 has i.e., has her will
 76 match by leading Valeria into offering him her 'hand and faith' in the presence of (unseen) witnesses, Ricardo has tricked her into a marriage contract (sponsalia per verba de praesenti)
 79 starting escaping (OED v.6) fast securely
 80 be deposed swear a deposition
 86 take your course (a) leave immediately; (b) pursue your legal suit

87 courses (a) courses of a meal; (b) sexual bouts
 88 gamesome merry, playful
 89 stand you out resist you, hold out against you
 90 law . . . merciless As in the commonplaces of Protestant doctrine, Ricardo opposes law (represented by the Old Testament, which condemns men to punishment for the sins they will inevitably commit) and mercy (represented by the New Testament, which promises them undeserved grace). Compare Two Gates Preface.35-8 ('that law was a curst judge and ready to condemn. But the King of heaven being as full of mercy as of justice, abated the edge of the axe').
 92 stamp coin
 96 forma pauperis in the form of a poor person, Latin legal term; 'one allowed, on account of poverty, to sue or defend in a court of law, without paying costs'

- I have too proud a heart, and love thee better.
 VALERIA [to Francisco and Attilio]
 As for you gentlemen, I'll take course against you.
 You came into my house without my leave;
 100 Your practices are cunning and deceitful;
 I know you not, and I hope law will right me.
 RICARDO
 It is sufficient that your husband knows 'em.
 'Tis not your business to know every man;
 An honest wife contents herself with one.
 VALERIA
 105 You know what you shall trust to. Pray depart, sir,
 And take your rude confederates along with you
 Or I will send for those shall force your absence.
 I'm glad I found your purpose out so soon.
 How quickly may poor women be undone!
 110 RICARDO Lose thee? By this hand, I'll see fifteen counsellors first, though I undo a hundred poor men for 'em, and I'll make 'em yaul one another deaf, but I'll have thee.
 VALERIA
 Me?
 RICARDO
 Thee.
 VALERIA Ay, fret thy heart out. Exit Ricardo
 FRANCISCO Were I he now
 I'd see thee starve for man before I had thee.
 VALERIA
 115 Pray counsel him to that, sir, and I'll pay you well.
 FRANCISCO Pay me? Pay your next husband.
 VALERIA
 Do not scorn't, gallant. A worse woman than I
 Has paid a better man than you.
 [Exeunt Francisco and Attilio]
Enter two old suitors
 FIRST SUITOR
 Why, how now, sweet widow?
 VALERIA Oh, kind gentlemen,
 120 I am so abused here.
 AMBO Abused?
- [The suitors draw their swords]
 VALERIA
 What will you do, sirs? Put up your weapons.
 SECOND SUITOR Nay, they're not so easily drawn, that I must tell you. Mine has not been out this three years.
 125 Marry, in your cause, widow, 'twould not be long a-drawing. Abused? By whom, widow?
 VALERIA Nay, by a beggar.
 SECOND SUITOR A beggar? I'll have him whipped then, and sent to the house of correction.
 VALERIA Ricardo, sir. 130
 SECOND SUITOR Ricardo? Nay, by th' mass, he's a gentleman beggar; he'll be hanged before he be whipped.
 Why, you'll give me leave to clap him up, I hope?
 VALERIA
 'Tis too good for him. That's the thing he would have;
 He would be clapped up whether I would or no,
 135 methinks.
 Placed two of his companions privately,
 Unknown to me, on purpose to entrap me
 In my kind answers, and at last stole from me
 That which I fear will put me to some trouble,
 A kind of verbal courtesy, which his witnesses
 And he forsooth call by the name of contract. 140
 FIRST SUITOR
 O politic villain!
 VALERIA But I am resolved, gentlemen,
 If the whole power of my estate can cast him,
 He never shall obtain me.
 SECOND SUITOR Hold you there, widow.
 Well fare your heart for that, i'faith.
 FIRST SUITOR Stay, stay, stay.— 145
 You broke no gold between you?
 VALERIA We broke nothing, sir.
 FIRST SUITOR
 Nor drunk to one another?
 VALERIA Not a drop, sir.
 FIRST SUITOR
 You're sure of this you speak?
 VALERIA Most certain, sir.

98 take course pursue legal action 103 know (a) be acquainted with (b) have sexual intercourse with 105 trust to put confidence in 108-9 soon...undone a rhyme
 111 undo ruin
 112 yaul shout 116 Pay your next husband (i.e. you will have to buy a husband)
 121 AMBO both
 122 weapons swords, but the Second Suitor puns on 'weapon' as 'penis' 129 house of correction a prison designed to reform its occupants
 132 hanged...whipped Ricardo's rank as a gentleman will protect him from whipping

133 clap him up imprison him with no delay
 135 clapped up married
 138 kind courteous, appropriately civil; see
 1.2.46
 140 courtesy gesture of respect, as in 'curtsy' (see 1.2.2), but here with a special legal sense: 'a tenure by which a husband, after his wife's death, holds certain kinds of property which she has inherited, the conditions varying with the nature of the property' (OED sb. 4) 141 contract a legal commitment of marriage as at 2.1.76; Valeria will challenge Ricardo's claim to her on the ground that her 'kind of verbal courtesy' was not an expression of a will to marry

142 politic crafty, cunning; the word enters the language in the 15th century in the sense of 'pertaining to a citizen' and thence to a state; but in the 16th century it develops a sinister sense and is associated with craft and deceit, the activities of a villain, particularly in the context of English perceptions of Machiavelli's thought.
 143 cast defeat in an action of law
 144 Hold you there Be steadfast in that 146 broke no gold to break gold was a pledge of constancy in betrothals and symbolized sharing wealth; see 2.1.155-nothing i.e. 'no maidenhead, either'

- FIRST SUITOR
 Be of good comfort, wench. I'll undertake then
 At mine own charge to overthrow him for thee.
- 150 VALERIA
 O do but that, sir, and you bind me to you.
 Here shall I try your goodness. I'm but a woman
 And, alas, ignorant in law businesses.
 I'll bear the charge most willingly.
- FIRST SUITOR Not a penny.
 Thy love will reward me.
- 155 VALERIA And where love must be,
 It is all but one purse, now I think on't.
- FIRST SUITOR
 All comes to one, sweet widow.
- SECOND SUITOR [aside] Are you so forward?
- FIRST SUITOR
 I know his mates, Attilio and Francisco.
 I'll get out process and attach 'em all.
 We'll begin first with them.
- 160 VALERIA I like that, strangely.
- FIRST SUITOR
 I have a daughter run away, I thank her;
 I'll be a scourge to all youth for her sake.
 Some of 'em has got her up.
- VALERIA Your daughter?
 What, sir? Marcia?
- FIRST SUITOR Ay, a shaker marry her!
 I would have wed her to a wealthy gentleman
 No older than myself; she was like to be Shrewdly hurt, widow.
- VALERIA It was too happy for her.
- FIRST SUITOR I'm of thy mind.
- 170 FAREWELL, sweet widow. I'll about this straight.
 I'll have 'em all three put into one writ,
- And so save charges.
- VALERIA How I love your providence!
Exit First Suitor
- SECOND SUITOR [aside]
 Is my nose bored? I'll cross ye both for this,
 Although it cost me as much o'th' other side.
 I have enough, and I will have my humour. 175
 I may get out of her what may undo her too.—
 Hark you, sweet widow. You must now take heed
 You be of a sure ground; he'll overthrow you else.
- VALERIA
 Marry, fair hope forbid!
- SECOND SUITOR That will he,
 Marry, lemme see, lemme see.—Pray, how far passed
 it 180
 Between you and Ricardo?
- VALERIA Farther, sir,
 Than I would now it had; but I hope well yet.
- SECOND SUITOR
 Pray, let me hear't. I've a shrewd guess o'th' law.
- VALERIA
 Faith, sir, I rashly gave my hand and faith
 To marry none but him.
- SECOND SUITOR Indeed?
- VALERIA Ay, trust me, sir. 185
- SECOND SUITOR
 I'm very glad on't. I'm another witness,
 And he shall have you now.
- VALERIA What said you, sir?
- SECOND SUITOR
 He shall not want money in an honest cause, widow.
 I know I have enough, and I will have my humour.
- VALERIA
 Are all the world betrayers?

149 wench a familiar form of address used to a wife, daughter, sweetheart, or servant (see also 3.2.6, 5.1.167, and 5.1.462)

151 bind me to you earn my gratitude and loyalty; but the First Suitor may understand a promise of marriage

152 try put to the test

159 process 'the mandate, summons, or writ by which a person or thing is brought into court for litigation' (OED sb. 7b)

attach arrest

160 strangely either (a) extremely or (b) strange to say

163 got her up (a) driven her from cover, as birds or animals in hunting; (b) (perhaps) made her pregnant

164 shaker (a) disreputable person (b) boaster (c) fever

167 Shrewdly hurt severely misused (spoken sarcastically)

168 happy fortunate

172 providence care, thrift

173 Is my nose bored? Am I being cheated?

cross thwart. 'Every grievous or painful thing sent by God, either to our minds or bodies... is the general cross common to all men' (Wilson). But such a cross is paradoxically a blessing in that it tests the virtue of the person. In the context of trial and proof in the play (see 1.1.95) the frustrations that characters such as Ricardo, Valeria, Francisco, and Marcia/Ansaldino undergo are fortunate in their outcomes. See 3.2.60, 66, 99, 3.3.60, and 5.1.66.

174 o'th' other side to work in opposition

175 have my humour have whatever I want. Humour is fancy, whim, caprice, impulse. The word comes into English via French from Latin umor or humor meaning dampness or moisture, but it develops a technical sense in medieval and early modern English in respect especially to the 'cardinal humours', 'the four chief fluids of the body (blood, phlegm, choler, and melancholy or black choler), by the relative proportions of which a person's physical or mental qualities and dispositions were held to be determined' (OED sb. 2b). The purely medical sense is present in 'hydropic humour' (4.2.91). From this technical use arose the sense of personal humour, the distinctive quality or temperament of the individual. However, by about 1550 it developed the sense employed by the Second Suitor repeatedly in this play: 'A particular disposition, inclination, or liking, esp. one having no apparent ground or reason' (OED sb. 6). Indeed, his repetition of the phrase itself constitutes a humour, and the First Suitor takes him at his word when he commands him to 'Follow your humour out' (2.2.167). This is the sense in the titles of Jonson's Every Man in His Humour and Every Man out of His Humour. In practice, a humour is clearly related to personal will and wilfulness (see 1.1.79–80), but its medical root emphasizes the purely material, fleshy origin of such behaviour.

190 SECOND SUITOR Pish, pish, widow.
 You've borne me in hand this three months, and now fobbed me.
 I've known the time when I could please a woman.
 I'll not be laughed at now. When I'm crossed, I'm a tiger.
 I have enough, and I will have my humour.

VALERIA
 195 This only shows your malice to me, sir.
 The world knows you ha' small reason to help him,
 So much in your debt already.

SECOND SUITOR Therefore I do't.
 I have no way but that to help myself.
 Though I lose you, I will not lose all, widow.
 200 He marrying you, as I will follow't for him,
 I'll make you pay his debts, or lie without him.

VALERIA
 I looked for this from you.

SECOND SUITOR I ha' not deceived you then.
Exit Valeria
 Fret, vex, and chafe; I'm obstinate where I take.
 I'll seek him out and cheer him up against her.
 205 I ha' no charge at all, no child of mine own
 But two I got once of a scouring woman,
 And they're both well provided for, they're i'th'
 Hospital.
 I have ten thousand pound to bury me,
 And I will have my humour. Exit

2.2 Enter Francisco

FRANCISCO
 A man must have a time to serve his pleasure
 As well as his dear friend. I'm forced to steal from 'em
 To get this night of sport for mine own use.
 What says her amiable witty letter here?
 5 "Twixt nine and ten". Now 'tis 'twixt six and seven.
 As fit as can be: he that follows lechery
 Leaves all at six and seven, and so do I methinks.
 Sun sets at eight; it's 'bove an hour high yet.
 Some fifteen mile have I before I reach her,
 10 But I've an excellent horse, and a good gallop
 Helps man as much as a provoking banquet.
Enter First Sutor with officers

FIRST SUITOR
 Here's one of 'em. Begin with him first, officers.

OFFICER [to Francisco]
 By virtue of this writ, we attach your body, sir.
 [Officers seize Francisco]

FRANCISCO
 My body? Life, for what?

FIRST SUITOR Hold him fast, officers.

OFFICER
 The least of us can do't, now his sword's off, sir. 15
 We have a trick of hanging upon gentlemen;
 We never lose a man.

FRANCISCO O treacherous fortune!
 Why, what's the cause?

FIRST SUITOR The widow's business, sir.
 I hope you know me?

FRANCISCO For a busy coxcomb
 This fifteen year, I take it.

FIRST SUITOR O you're mad, sir. 20
 Simple though you make me, I stand for the widow.

FRANCISCO
 She's simply stood for, then. What's this to me, sir,
 Or she, or you, or any of these flesh-hooks?

FIRST SUITOR
 You're like to find good bail before you leave us
 Or lie till the suit's tried.

FRANCISCO O my love's misery! 25

FIRST SUITOR
 I'm put in trust to follow't, and I'll do't
 With all severity. Build upon that, sir.
Enter Ricardo and Attilio [aloof]

FRANCISCO
 How I could curse myself!

RICARDO [to Attilio] Look, here's Francisco.
 Will you believe me, now you see his qualities?

ATTILIO
 'Tis strange to me.

RICARDO I tell you, 'tis his fashion. 30
 He never stole away in's life from me
 But still I found him in such scurvy company.
 [Ricardo and Attilio come forward]
 A pox on thee, Francisco! Wilt never leave thy old tricks?
 Are these lousy companions for thee?

FRANCISCO [warning them] Pish, pish, pish!

FIRST SUITOR

[Officers seize Ricardo and Attilio]

RICARDO What's this?

FRANCISCO

I gave you warning enough to make away.

I'm in for the widow's business; so are you now.

RICARDO What, all three in a noose? This is like a widow's 40 business indeed.

FIRST SUITOR

She's catched you, gentlemen, as you caught her.

[To Ricardo] The widow means now to begin with you,
sir.

RICARDO

I thank her heartily; she's taught me wit—

45 for had I been any but an ass, I should ha' begun with her indeed. By this light, the widow's a notable housewife, she bestirs herself. I have a greater mind to her now than e'er I had. I cannot go to prison for one
I love better, I protest; that's one good comfort.—

And what are you, I pray, sir, for a coxcomb?

FIRST SUITOR

50 It seems you know me by your anger, sir.

RICARDO

I've a near guess at you, sir.

FIRST SUITOR

Guess what you please, sir.

I'm he ordained to trounce you, and indeed

I am the man must carry her.

RICARDO

Ay, to me.

But I'll swear she's a beast, an she carry thee.

FIRST SUITOR

55 Come, where's your bail, sir? Quickly, or away.

RICARDO

Sir, I'm held wrongfully. My bail's taken already.

FIRST SUITOR Where is't, sir, where?

RICARDO

Here they be both. Pox on you, they were taken

Before I'd need of 'em.—An you be honest,

60 Officers, let's bail one another;

For by this hand, I do not know who will else.—

Enter Second Suitor

'Od's light, is he come too? I'm in for midnight then.

I shall never find the way out again.

My debts, my debts! I'm like to die i'th' Hole now.

FIRST SUITOR [to Second Suitor]

We have him fast, old signor, and his consorts.

Now you may lay action on action on him.

65

SECOND SUITOR

That may I, sir, i'faith.

FIRST SUITOR

And I'd not spare him, sir.

SECOND SUITOR

Know you me, officers?

OFFICER

Your bounteous worship, sir.

RICARDO [aside] I know the rascal so well, I dare not look upon him.

70

SECOND SUITOR [to officers]

Upon my worth, deliver me that gentleman.

FRANCISCO

Which gentleman?

SECOND SUITOR

Not you, sir; you're too hasty.—

[To Attilio] No, not you neither, sir; pray, stay your time.

RICARDO [aside]

There's all but I now, and I dare not think he means
me.

SECOND SUITOR [to officers]

Deliver me Ricardo.

RICARDO [aside]

O sure he lies,

Or else I do not hear well.

75

OFFICER

Signor Ricardo.

RICARDO

Well, what's the matter?

OFFICER

You may go. Who lets you?

It is his worship's pleasure, sir, to bail you.

RICARDO

Bail me?

SECOND SUITOR

I will. Ay, sir, look in my face, man.

Thou'st a good cause. Thou'lt pay me when thou'rt able?

80

RICARDO

Ay, every penny, as I am a gentleman.

SECOND SUITOR

No matter if thou dost not; then, I'll make thee,

And that's as good at all times.

FIRST SUITOR

But I pray, sir,

You go against the hair there.

37 make away escape

38 I'm in (custody)

for on account of

39 in a noose trapped

39-40 widow's business being trapped in marriage (but also implying that three men are needed to satisfy the sexual appetite of a widow)

44 begun initiated sexual intercourse

46 housewife a woman who manages her household with skill and thrift

49 what . . . coxcomb? what sort of a fool are

you?

52 trounce get the better of, defeat

53 carry win as a prize, but Ricardo's 'Ay, to me' takes it as 'convey'

54 carry bear his weight in sexual intercourse

56 taken Ricardo puns on the meanings

'received' and 'arrested' in respect of

'bail' as both money and the person

62 'Od's light by God's light providing the money

62 'Od's light until midnight; figuratively

'forever'

64 debts Ricardo is literally in debt, but his expectation of death in bondage may also have figurative meanings: sin 'is called a debt, because for sin we do owe unto the justice of God eternal death' (Wilson), and 'in [Christ] alone all debts are paid'

(Two Gates Preface.108-9).

Hole a prison cell, but also 'the name of one of the worst apartments in the Counter prison in Wood Street, London'

(OED sb. 2b)

66 lay action . . . on him bring multiple charges against him

73 stay your time remain for your allotted

time

77 lets prevents, obstructs

78 pleasure desire, but also the gracious act of the superior that needs no explanation, a secular grace

84 against the hair contrary to the natural way; against the grain

- 85 SECOND SUITOR Against the widow, you mean, sir.
Why, 'tis my purpose truly, and against you too.
I saw your politic combination;
I was thrust out between you. Here stands one Shall do as much for you, and he stands rightest.
90 His cause is strong and fair, nor shall he want
Money or means or friends, but he shall have her.
I've enough, and I will have my humour.
- FIRST SUITOR
Hang thee! I have a purse as good as thine.
- RICARDO [aside]
I think they're much alike; they're rich knaves both.—
95 'Heart, an I take you railing at my patron, sir,
I'll cramp your joints.
- SECOND SUITOR Let him alone, sweet honey.
I thank thee for thy love, though.
- RICARDO [aside] This is wonderful.
- FRANCISCO O Ricardo!
100 'Tis seven, struck in my pocket. I lose time now.
- RICARDO
What sayst, Francisco?
- FRANCISCO I ha' mighty business
That I ne'er thought on. Get me bailed; I'm spoiled else.
- RICARDO
Why, you know, 'tis such a strange miraculous courtesy
I dare not be too forward to ask more of him, 105 For fear he repent this and turn me in again.
- FRANCISCO
Do somewhat, an you love me.
- RICARDO I'll make trial, faith.—
May't please you, sir.—Life, if I should spoil all now!
- SECOND SUITOR
What sayst, Ricardo?
- RICARDO Only a thing by th' way, sir;
Use your own pleasure.
- SECOND SUITOR That I like well from thee.
- RICARDO
110 'Twere good, an those two gentlemen were bailed too;
They're both my witnesses.
- SECOND SUITOR They're well, they're well.
An they were bailed, we know not where to find 'em.
- Let 'em go to prison; they'll be forthcoming the better.
I have enough, and I will have my humour.
- RICARDO [aside]
I knew there was no more good to be done upon him. 115
'Tis well I've this; heav'n knows I never looked for't.
- FRANCISCO
What plaguy luck had I to be ensnared thus!
- OFFICER
O patience.
Enter Brandino and Martino
- FRANCISCO Pox o' your comfortable ignorance!
- BRANDINO
Martino, we ride slow.
- MARTINO But we ride sure, sir.
Your hasty riders often come short home, master. 120
- BRANDINO
Bless this fair company!
- FRANCISCO [aside] Here he's again too.
I am both shamed and crossed.
- BRANDINO Seest thou who's yonder,
Martino?
- MARTINO We ride slow, I'll be sworn now, master.
- BRANDINO
How now, Francisco! Art thou got before me?
- FRANCISCO
Yes, thank my fortune, I am got before you. 125
- BRANDINO
What? No! In hold?
- RICARDO Ay, o' my troth. Poor gentleman!
Your worship, sir, may do a good deed to bail him.
- BRANDINO Why do not you do't then?
- MARTINO [to Ricardo] La you, sir, now!
My master has that honesty 130
He's loath to take a good deed from you, sir.
- RICARDO
I'll tell you why: I cannot. Else I would, sir.
[Ricardo and Brandino talk apart]
- FRANCISCO [aside]
Luck, I beseech thee!—If he should be wrought
To bail me now, to go to his own wife,
'Twere happiness beyond expression. 135
- BRANDINO [to Ricardo]
A matter but of controversy?

87 politic crafty, cunning (see 2.1.142)

combination conspiracy

89 rightest with most justice

95 'Heart by God's heart

96 cramp your joints make your joints stiff and painful (by beating you) honey term of endearment—a characteristic verbal tic of the Second Suitor, who as his 'patron' has a relation to Ricardo comparable to James I's relations with his favourites Somerset and Buckingham, whom he addressed with similarly erotic pet-names and epithets.

100 struck in my pocket Francisco has a chiming watch in his pocket.

102 spoiled ruined

106 make trial try

faith in faith

109 Use your own pleasure if it please you; but Second Suitor interprets the phrase

as a sexual invitation

111 well all right

113 forthcoming available in the future

117 plaguy disagreeable

ensnared trapped

118 Pox o' a curse upon

119 slow . . . sure Martino plays on the proverb 'slow but sure'.

120 come short home (a) return without bringing back all that they need—their haste causing forgetfulness or inefficiency (b) ejaculate prematurely

124 Art thou got before me? Have you got ahead of me?

125 got before you brought before you (as an accused man before a judge)

126 In hold in custody

133 wrought persuaded, convinced

136 controversy civil dispute; Ricardo is assuring Brandino that Francisco is not arrested for a crime.

RICARDO That's all; trust me, sir. To cut the throat of slander and suspicion?
 BRANDINO Francisco shall ne'er lie for't. He's my friend And can you do too much for such a man? 160
 And I will bail him. Shall it be said I serve an ingrateful master?
 MARTINO He's your secret friend, master: BRANDINO Never, Martino. I will bail him now, Think upon that. An 'twere at my wife's suit.
 BRANDINO Give him his liberty, officers. FRANCISCO [aside] 'Tis like to be so.
 140 Upon my peril, he shall be forthcoming. MARTINO And I his friend, to follow your example, master.
 FRANCISCO How I am bound to you! FRANCISCO Precious Martino!
 FIRST SUITOR [to Brandino] FIRST SUITOR [to Brandino] You've done wondrous well, sir. 165
 'Tis at your sister's suit; be well advised, sir. Your sister shall give you thanks.
 BRANDINO How, at my sister's suit?—Take him again, then. RICARDO [to Second Sutor] This makes him mad, sir.
 BRANDINO Why, sir, do you refuse me? SECOND SUITOR We'll follow't now to th' proof.
 BRANDINO I'll not hear thee. FIRST SUITOR Follow your humour out.
 RICARDO This is unkindly done, sir. SECOND SUITOR The widow shall find friends.
 145 FIRST SUITOR 'Tis wisely done, sir. SECOND SUITOR And so shall he, sir, SECOND SUITOR Money and means.
 FIRST SUITOR Well shot, foul malice. RICARDO [to First Sutor] Hear you me that, old huddle?
 FIRST SUITOR Flattery stinks worse, sir. [Exit First Sutor, with officers]
 RICARDO You'll never leave till I make you stink as bad, sir. SECOND SUITOR Mind him not. Follow me, and I'll supply thee. 170
 FRANCISCO O Martino, have I this for my late kindness? Thou shalt give all thy lawyers double fees.
 MARTINO Alas, poor gentleman! Dost complain to me? I've buried money enough to bury me,
 Thou shalt not fare the worse for't.—Hark you, And I will have my humour.
 150 master. Exit [Second Sutor, with Ricardo and Attilio]
 Your sister's suit, said you? BRANDINO Fare thee well once again, my dear Francisco.
 BRANDINO Ay, sir, my wife's sister. I prithee, use my house.
 MARTINO And shall that daunt you, master? Think again. FRANCISCO It is my purpose, sir. 175
 Why, were't your mother's suit—your mother's suit, Exit
 Mark what I say—the dearest suit of all suits, BRANDINO Nay, you must do't then. Though I am old, I'm free.
 You're bound in conscience, sir, to bail this gentle- MARTINO And when you want a warrant, come to me. Exit 155 man. FRANCISCO That will be shortly now, within this few hours.
 BRANDINO Yea, am I so? How prov'st thou that, Martino? This fell out strangely happy. Now to horse.
 MARTINO Have you forgot so soon what he did lately? I shall be nighted, but an hour or two 180

- OCULTO
 Come, come, let's watch th'event on yonder hill.
 If he need help, we can relieve him suddenly.
- SILVIO
 Ay, and with safety too, the hill being watched, sir.
- OCULTO
 Have you the blue coats and the beards?
- SILVIO
 They're here, sir.
- OCULTO
 Come, come away, then. A fine cock-shoot evening.
Exit [Occulto, with other thieves]
- Enter Latrocinio (the chief thief) and Ansaldo*
- LATROCINIO [singing]
 Kuck before and kuck behind, etc.
- ANSALDO
 Troth, you're the merriest and delightful'st company,
 sir,
 That ever traveller was blessed withal.
 I praise my fortune that I overtook you, sir.
- LATROCINIO
 Pish, I've a hundred of 'em.
- 10 ANSALDO
 And believe me, sir,
 I'm infinitely taken with such things.
- LATROCINIO
 I see there's music in you. You kept time, methought, Pretty and handsomely with your little hand there.
- ANSALDO
 It only shows desire but, troth, no skill, sir.
- LATROCINIO
 Well, while our horses walk down yonder hill, sir,
 I'll have another for you.
- ANSALDO
 It rids way pleasantly.
- LATROCINIO
 Lemme see now. One confounds another, sir.
 You've heard this certainly: [sings] Come, my dainty doxies.
- ANSALDO
 O that's all the country over, sir.
 There's scarce a gentlewoman but has that pricked.
- 20 LATROCINIO
 Well, here comes one I'm sure you never heard then.
 [He sings a] song
 I keep my horse, I keep my whore,
 I take no rents, yet am not poor.
 I travel all the land about
 And yet was born to ne'er a foot.
- 25 With partridge plump, with woodcock fine,
 I do at midnight often dine,
 And if my whore be not in case
 My hostess' daughter takes her place.
 The maids sit up and watch their turns;
- 30 If I stay long the tapster mourns;
 The cook-maid has no mind to sin,
 Though tempted by the chamberl'in.
 But when I knock, O how they bustle!
 The ostler yawns, the geldings justle.

3.1.0.2 Occulto Italian, 'hidden, concealed, secret, close' (Florio)
Silvio 'of the woods' (from Latin silva, a wood; not in Florio)
 0.3 thieves People who make a living by stealing from others—like the thieves eulogized by Martino earlier (1.1.43–62)—permeate the play's social world: the miller is a thief (4.2.39–44), as is the tailor (4.2.40–5), and the play's medical practitioners are (literally) thieves (4.2). All economic activity can be understood as theft, in so far as it operates, not through fair exchange within carefully constructed rules (under the medieval guild system), but through improvisation and deception (increasingly, under emergent capitalism). The thief is therefore located at the centre of a system of circulation, 'the sequence of the world' (Five Gallants 3.1.135), which runs from usury to prostitution, innkeeping, farming, and the court (3.1.115–22). Moreover, theft is often associated with lechery, a woman's body being regarded as a man's possession, which another man may steal. Hence Tarquin for raping Lucrece is called 'a Roman thief' (Ghost 275), and when Moll elopes the Yellowhammers exclaim 'Some thief hath got her' (Chaste Maid 4.2.1); 'adulterous thefts' (Women Beware 4.3.36) and 'a stolen...kiss' (Hengist 1.2.13) may lead to the conception of a bastard child, who steals into the world illegitimately, 'the thief of nature' (Revenge 1.2.159). Combining larceny and lechery, theft epitomizes unregenerate humanity, from Adam and Eve's theft of the apple to the two thieves crucified on either side of Christ. Thus, when Middleton's characters think of the ten commandments, it is the seventh ('Thou shalt not steal') which comes to mind: Puritan 1.4.126–44, Five Gallants 3.4.109, Measure 1.2.10.

1 th'event the result
 2 relieve (a) provide comfort; (b) take his possessions
 3 the hill being watched (a) provided with watchers (themselves); (b) guarded by a watch
 4 blue coats... beards their disguise; blue coats were worn by servants
 5 cock-shoot a broad way or glade in a wood, through which woodcocks etc might dart or 'shoot' so as to be caught by nets stretched across the opening;

thus here a fine evening to catch foolish birds, i.e. unsuspecting travellers
 5.2 Latrocinio Italian, 'larceny, theft, stealing' (Florio)
 6 Kuck... behind a refrain from a (lost) song
Kuck void excrement (but also probably suggesting 'cock' = penis) before in front
 9 overtook caught up with 11 infinitely exceedingly
 16 rids way passes the time on the journey
 17 confounds becomes confused with 18 Come, my dainty doxies For the full text of this song, see Dissemblers 4.2.56–81. doxies whores, but also 'gypsy sweethearts'
 20 pricked noted down or marked; but also with sexual puns on 'country' and 'prick'
 22 I keep my horse For a musical setting, see Companion, p. 152.
 28 not in case not in good physical condition, i.e. menstruating; case = female genitals
 30 watch their turns take turns to be on duty (?)
 33 chamberl'in waiter

If maid but sleep, O how they curse her!
 And all this comes of 'Deliver your purse, sir!'
 [He draws a weapon]
 ANSALDO How, sir?
 LATROCINIO
 Few words. Quickly, come, deliver your purse, sir.
 ANSALDO
 40 You're not that kind of gentleman, I hope, sir,
 To sing me out of my money.
 LATROCINIO 'Tis most fit
 Art should be rewarded. You must pay your music,
 sir,
 Where'er you come.
 ANSALDO But not at your own carving.
 LATROCINIO
 Nor am I common in't. Come, come, your purse, sir.
 ANSALDO
 45 Say it should prove th'undoing of a gentleman?
 LATROCINIO Why, sir, do you look for more conscience in us than in usurers? Young gentleman, you've small reason for that, i'faith.
 ANSALDO [giving his purse]
 There 'tis, and all I have, and—so truth comfort me—
 All I know where to have.
 50 LATROCINIO Sir, that's not written
 In my belief yet. Search. 'Tis a fine evening;
 Your horse can take no harm. I must have more, sir.
 ANSALDO
 May my hopes perish if you have not all, sir,
 And more I know than your compassionate charity
 55 Would keep from me, if you but felt my wants.
 LATROCINIO
 Search, and that speedily. If I take you in hand, You'll find me rough. Methinks men should be ruled
 When they're so kindly spoke to. Fie upon't!
 ANSALDO [aside]
 Good fortune and my wit assist me then!
 60 A thing I took in haste, and never thought on't.—
 Look, sir, I've searched; here's all that I can find,
 [He shows a pistol]
 And you're so covetous, you will have all, you say,
 And I'm content you shall, being kindly spoke to.
 LATROCINIO
 A pox o' that young devil of a handful long!
 65 That's frayed many a tall thief from a rich purchase.

ANSALDO
 This and my money, sir, keeps company.
 Where one goes, th'other must. Assure your soul
 They vowed never to part.
 LATROCINIO Hold, I beseech you, sir.
 ANSALDO
 You rob a prisoner's box, an you rob me, sir.
 LATROCINIO [giving back the purse]
 There 'tis again.
 ANSALDO I knew 'twould never prosper with you. 70
 Fie, rob a younger brother? O take heed, sir.
 'Tis against nature, that. Perhaps your father
 Was one, sir, or your uncle; it should seem so
 By the small means was left you, and less manners.
 Go, keep you still before me. And do you hear me? 75
 To pass away the time to the next town,
 I charge you, sir, sing all your songs for nothing.
 LATROCINIO
 O horrible punishment!
 [He sings] a song
 Enter Stratio [disguised as a servant]
 STRATIO Honest gentleman—
 ANSALDO
 How now, what art thou?
 STRATIO Stand you in need of help?
 I made all haste I could. My master charged me, 80
 A knight of worship. He saw you first assaulted
 From top of yonder hill.
 ANSALDO Thanks, honest friend.
 LATROCINIO [aside]
 I taste this trick already. Exit
 STRATIO Look, he's gone, sir.
 Shall he be stopped? What is he?
 ANSALDO Let him go, sir.
 He can rejoice in nothing; that's the comfort. 85
 STRATIO
 You have your purse still then?
 ANSALDO Ay, thanks fair fortune
 And this grim handful.
 STRATIO We were all so 'fraid o' you.
 How my good lady cried, 'O help the gentleman!'
 'Tis a good woman, that. But you're too mild, sir.
 You should ha' marked him for a villain, faith, 90
 Before he'd gone, having so sound a means, too.

- ANSALDO
Why, there's the jest, man. He had once my purse—
STRATIO
O villain! Would you let him 'scape unmassacred?
ANSALDO
Nay, hear me, sir. I made him yield it straight again
95 And—so hope bless me!—with an uncharged pistol.
STRATIO
Troth, I should laugh at that.
ANSALDO It was discharged, sir,
Before I meddled with't.
STRATIO I'm glad to hear't.
[He threatens Ansaldo]
ANSALDO
Why, how now, what's your will?
STRATIO Ho! Latrocinio, Occulto, Silvio!
Enter Latrocinio and the rest: Occulto, Silvio,
Fiducio
LATROCINIO [to Ansaldo] What, are you caught, sir?
100 STRATIO The pistol cannot speak.
LATROCINIO He was too young.
I ever thought he could not, yet I feared him.
ANSALDO
You've found out ways too merciless to betray
Under the veil of friendship and of charity.
LATROCINIO
105 Away, sirs! Bear him in to th' next copse and strip
him.
STRATIO Brandino's copse, the Justice?
LATROCINIO Best of all, sir, a man of law. A spider lies unsuspected in the corner of a buckram bag, man.
ANSALDO
What seek you, sirs? Take all, and use no cruelty.
110 LATROCINIO You shall have songs enough.
- ALL THIEVES [singing a] song
How round the world goes
And everything that's in it.
The tides of gold and silver
Ebb and flow in a minute.
From the usurer to his sons,
115 There a current swiftly runs;
From the sons to queans in chief,
From the gallant to the thief,
From the thief unto his host,
From the host to husbandmen,
120 From the country to the court,
And so comes to use again.
How round the world goes
And everything that's in it.
The tides of gold and silver
Ebb and flow in a minute. Exeunt
Enter Philippa and Violetta above at the window 3.2
PHILIPPA
What time of night is't?
VIOLETTA Time of night do you call't?
It's so late, 'tis almost early, mistress.
PHILIPPA
Fie on him! There's no looking for him, then.
Why, sure this gentleman apprehends me not.
VIOLETTA
'Tis happy then you're rid of such a fool, mistress. 5
PHILIPPA
Nay sure, wench, if he find me not out in this,
Which were a beaten path to any wiseman,
I'll never trust him with my reputation.
Therefore I made this trial of his wit.
If he cannot conceive what's good for himself, 10

95 uncharged unloaded
97 meddled concerned myself
98.2 Fiducio Italian, 'Fiducia, trust, faith, confidence' (Florio)
108 buckram bag a lawyer's bag; buckram is a kind of coarse linen or cloth stiffened with gum or paste
111 round the world goes In the new Copernican astronomy, the earth was not fixed at the centre of the universe, but a globe which rotated on its axis, and revolved around the sun.
112 And... it An increasingly globalized economy brought commodities to London from the Americas, Africa, and Asia.
113–14 The tides... minute money comes and goes quickly and endlessly (like the tides on which ships left and returned to the port of London, on transoceanic commercial voyages).
114 minute A subdivision of time increasingly significant to urban Protestant populations: personal timepieces, though still expensive, became for the first time reasonably reliable, enabling a new discipline of business practices, scientific observation, and personal behaviour. Kepler declared, in Middleton's lifetime, that 'the universe... is similar to a clock'.

115 usurer moneylender (an increasingly important figure, in an emergent capitalist economy). The sons of men who had hoarded money in their lifetime were often portrayed as lecherous prodigals; the progress described here in 115–17 also occurs in Microcynicon.
117 queans whores (see also 1.2.133)
in chief in the chief or highest position
118 gallant fashionable woman (OED sb.1.b), but used here as a synonym for 'quean'.
120 husbandmen farmers (who would be paid by the host, for supplying him with produce for his inn or tavern, and who would in turn pay rents to the lord of their estates, thereby passing the money from 'country' to 'court')
122 use usury (thus completing the circle, returning to the usurer). The Jacobean court was heavily in debt; much of the money courtiers collected from their country estates went to pay off interest on loans. But 'use' also has less technical senses: money in circulation is being 'used', rather than sitting idle, and the particular economy imagined in this song involves, in part, sexual employment (also called 'use').

3.2.4 apprehends me not does not understand me, does not get the point of the letter. The word derives from Latin apprehendere, to seize. In English it is used both in the sense of physical seizing, as in arrests, and of mental grasping, as in learning. In the latter strain it includes the idea of understanding mentally, and also that of being sensible of something or somebody. Philippa here despairs (a) of Francisco's wit, although he has indeed understood her message perfectly (see 1.2.203); (b) of his attention, since he has not appeared, and (c) of being seized physically by him.
6 find... out (a) does not understand my intention; (b) does not discover what I'm like
7 a beaten path obvious

- Pox on 'em! Here's the length of one of their whittles.
 But one of my dear rascals I pursued so
 The jail has him, and he shall bring out's fellows.
 Had ever young man's love such crooked fortune?
 80 I'm glad I'm so near yet. The surgeon bade me too
 Have a great care. I shall never think of that now.
 ANSALDO [aside]
 One of the thieves come back again? I'll stand close.
 He dares not wrong me now, so near the house,
 And call in vain 'tis, till I see him offer't.
- FRANCISCO [aside]
 85 Life, what should that be? A prodigious thing
 Stands just as I should enter, in that shape too
 Which always appears terrible.
 Whate'er it be, it is made strong against me
 By my ill purpose. For 'tis man's own sin
 90 That puts an armour upon all his evils
 And gives them strength to strike him. Were it less Than what it is, my guilt would make it serve.
 A wicked man's own shadow has distracted him.
 Were this a business now to save an honour,
 95 As 'tis to spoil one, I would pass this then,
 Stuck all hell's horrors i' thee; now I dare not.
 Why may't not be the spirit of my father
 That loved this man so well, whom I make haste
 Now to abuse? And I have been crossed about it 100 Most fearfully hitherto, if I well think on't,
 'Scaped death but lately too, nay most miraculously.
 And what does fond man venture all these ills for,
 That may so sweetly rest in honest peace?
 For that which, being obtained, [ 105] is as he was
- To his own sense, but removed nearer still
 To death eternal. What delight has man
 Now at this present for his pleasant sin
 Of yesterday's committing? 'Las, 'tis vanished,
 110 And nothing but the sting remains within him.
 The kind man bailed me too. I will not do't now,
 An 'twere but only that. How blest were man,
 Might he but have his end appear still to him,
 That he might read his actions i'th' event?
 'Twould make him write true, though he never meant.
- Whose check soe'er thou art, father's or friend's Or enemy's, I thank thee. Peace requite thee.—
 Light, and the lighter mistress, both farewell.
 He keeps his promise best that breaks with hell. Exit
- ANSALDO
 He's gone to call the rest, and makes all speed.
 120 I'll knock, whate'er befalls, to please my fears,
 For no compassion can be less than theirs.
 [Ansaldo knocks]
- PHILIPPA
 He's come, he's come.—O, are you come at last, sir?
 Make little noise.—Away, he'll knock again else.
 [Exeunt above]
- ANSALDO
 I should have been at Istria, by daybreak too;
 125 Near to Valeria's house, the wealthy widow's,
 There waits one purposely to do me good.
 What will become of me?
 Enter Violetta [below]
- VIOLETTA
 O you're a sweet gallant. This, your hour?

- 76 whittles large knives; a reference to his wound(?)
- 77 dear rascals a pun on 'rascal', a young or inferior deer (OED sb.4.b)
- 78 bring out's produce his
- 80 yet nevertheless
- 82 close concealed
- 84 call in vain 'tis it would be pointless to call for help
- offer't offer wrong, attack or rob
- 85 prodigious ominous
- 86-7 that shape... terrible (Ansaldo out of doors at night dressed in just a shirt appears to Francisco to be an apparition.)
- 90 armour One meaning of armour was 'those strong and powerful lusts of sin, whereby Satan conquereth natural men, and holdeth them fast under his banner and dominion' (Wilson).
- 92 serve fulfil the function of an ominous warning, or simply overcome him
- 93 distracted him driven him insane
- 94-5 to save... one to preserve a woman's chastity as it is in fact to defile one
- 96 Stuck... i' thee even if all hell's horrors were bristling on you
- 98 loved... well Brandino was a great friend of Francisco's father (see 1.2.221-43)
- 99 crossed about it thwarted in pursuit of it
- 101 miraculously (In this crisis of conscience Francisco interprets all events as examples of miraculous intervention. See Introduction.)
- 102 fond (a) foolish (b) enamoured
- 104-5 There appears to be a gap in the text here. We can only guess at the missing words; perhaps something like 'favours the beggar | With a minute's dream; who, waked,'.
- 108 Now at this present right now, by contrast to yesterday when the sin was committed (but also implying 'at this moment, here in the theatre', as in Revenge 2.2.136-43, 157-8, etc.)
- pleasant that gives pleasure, in this context to be rejected as a false corrupt desire
- 110 sting the acute pain of guilty conscience
- 111 The kind man Brandino; kind = generous, natural (see 1.2.46); in his crisis of conscience Francisco has a new view of Brandino.
- 112 An... that if only for that reason (Brandino's bailing of him)
- 113 end death
- still always
- 114 read recognize the true nature of event outcome
- 115 'Twould... meant i.e., it would make him act honestly even if he had not set out to
- 116 check rebuke, corrective
- 118 Light... lighter mistress the light that Ansaldo saw (3.2.52); Philippa as unchaste (lighter)
- 119 breaks with breaks (his promise) to, breaks off (relations) with
- 125 Istria the sole reference in the text to the location of the action; Istria is a peninsula in the northern Adriatic, the northern part of which is now in Slovenia, the rest Croatia. It was governed at the time by Venice—hence the play's Italian names and idioms. Though the source stories in Boccaccio's Decameron, 2.2 and 3.3, apparently take place in Italy, there is no reference to a specific location.

130 Give me your hand. Come, come, sir, follow me.
I'll bring you to light presently. Softly, softly, sir.

Exeunt

3.3 Enter Philippa below

PHILIPPA

I should ha' given him up to all my thoughts
The dullest young man, if he had not found it.
So short of apprehension and so witless,
He were not fit for woman's fellowship.

5 I've been at cost too for a banquet for him.
Why, 'twould ha' killed my heart, and most especially
To think that man should ha' no more conceit.
I should ha' thought the worse on's wit forever,
And blamed mine own for too much forwardness.

Enter Violetta

VIOLETTA

O mistress, mistress!

10 PHILIPPA How now, what's the news?

VIOLETTA

O I was out of my wits for a minute and a half.

PHILIPPA Ha?

VIOLETTA They are scarce settled yet, mistress.

PHILIPPA What's the matter?

15 VIOLETTA Do you ask that seriously?

Did you not hear me squeak?

PHILIPPA How? Sure thou art

Out of thy wits indeed.

VIOLETTA O, I'm well now,

To what I was, mistress.

PHILIPPA Why, where's the gentleman?

VIOLETTA

The gentleman's forthcoming, and a lovely one,
But not Francisco.

20 PHILIPPA What sayst? not Francisco?

VIOLETTA

Pish, he's a coxcomb. Think not on him, mistress.

PHILIPPA What's all this?

VIOLETTA

I've often heard you say ye'd rather have
A wise man in his shirt than a fool feathered,
And now Fortune has sent you one, a sweet young gentleman,

25

Robbed e'en to nothing but what first he brought with
him.

The slaves had stripped him to th' very shirt, mistress.

I think it was a shirt; I know not well,

For gallants wear both nowadays.

PHILIPPA

This is strange.

VIOLETTA

But for a face, a hand, and as much skin

30

As I durst look upon, he's a most sweet one.

Francisco is a child of Egypt to him.

I could not but in pity to th' poor gentleman

Fetch him down one of my old master's suits.

PHILIPPA 'Twas charitably done.

35

VIOLETTA

You'd say, mistress, if you had seen him as I did.

Sweet youth! I'll be sworn, mistress, he's the loveliest,

Proper'st young gentleman, and so you'll say yourself,

If my master's clothes do not spoil him; that's all the fear now.

I would 't'ad been your luck to have seen him

40

Without 'em, but for scaring on you.

PHILIPPA

Go, prithee fetch him in whom thou commend'st so.

Exit Violetta

Since fortune sends him, surely we'll make much on
him;

And better he deserves our love and welcome

45

Than the disrespectful fellow 'twas prepared for.

Yet if he please mine eye never so happily

I will have trial of his wit and faith

Before I make him partner with my honour.

'Twas just Francisco's case, and he deceived me.

I'll take more heed o'th' next for't. Perhaps now

50

131 light Compare the light that guided Ansaldo to the house initially (3.2.52), and the beauty and 'lightness' of Philippa (3.2.118), who expects Ansaldo to be Francisco.

3.3.1 given . . . thoughts considered him

2 found it i.e., understood the implied message in the letter she sent to him through her husband

3 apprehension understanding; see 3.2.4.

witless (a) senseless, without ingenuity or prudence (b) without physical sensation—associated with possible sexual innuendoes in short (with a small penis), dullest (not easily aroused), and fit (just right for snug intercourse)

5 banquet either a sumptuous entertainment or an exquisite dessert; whichever, rich food was thought to stimulate sexual appetites

7 conceit understanding. The word derives from 'conceive' and initially has the sense of an idea or thought, something conceived; but it develops the sense of the capacity for having ideas or thoughts. The sense 'esteem' and 'self-esteem' were current at the time of the play, but here the word seems more to be associated with imaginative intelligence and capacity for judgement.

8 wit intelligence; Philippa desires acuteness of social perception and invention. See 3.3.3.

9 forwardness boldness

11, 17 out of . . . wits mad

11 minute See 3.1.114.

18 To compared with

21 Pish an exclamation of rejection or contempt

24 feathered fully dressed with an expensive feather in his hat, hence wealthy

26 what first . . . him an allusion to being born naked

29 both shirts and smocks (conventionally

men's and women's clothes respectively, but the second decade of the 17th century witnessed a brief flourishing of unisex fashions, with women wearing styles previously limited to men, and vice versa)

32 child of Egypt dark-complexioned like a gypsy or an Egyptian, and therefore less attractive within the conventional values of the time (but also, a sinner, contrasted with 'the chosen people, the elect' who escaped from Egypt into Israel)

38 Proper'st handsomest

41 but for scaring on you except that you would have been scared. (Violetta mocks Philippa's sexual interest in young men.)

45 respectless discourteous

46 if he . . . happily however attractive I happen to find him

47 wit intelligence; see 3.3.8

48 honour reputation for chastity

- To furnish his distress he will appear Full of fair promising courtship; but I'll prove him
then
For a next meeting, when he needs me not,
And see what he performs then when the storm
Of his so rude misfortunes is blown over
And he himself again. A distressed man's flatteries
Are like vows made in drink, or bonds in prison:
There's poor assurance in 'em. When he's from me
And in's own pow'r, then I shall see his love.
Enter Ansaldo [in Brandino's clothes] and Violetta
Mass, here he comes.
[Ansaldo and Violetta talk apart]
- 60 ANSALDO Never was star-crossed gentleman
More happy in a courteous virgin's love
Than I in yours.
- VIOLETTA I'm sorry they're no better for you.
I wished 'em handsomer and more in fashion,
But truly, sir, our house affords it not.
- 65 There is a suit of our clerk's hangs i'th' garret,
But that's far worse than this, if I may judge
With modesty of men's matters.
- ANSALDO I deserve not this,
Dear and kind gentlewoman. Is yon your mistress?
- PHILIPPA Why, trust me, here's my husband young again!—
70 It is no sin to welcome you, sweet gentleman.
- ANSALDO I am so much indebted, courteous lady,
To the unmatched charity of your house,
My thanks are such poor things they would but shame me.
[Philippa and Violetta talk apart]
- PHILIPPA Beshrew thy heart for bringing o' him! I fear me
75 I have found wit enough already in him.
If I could truly but resolve myself
My husband was thus handsome at nineteen,
Troth, I should think the better of him at fourscore
now.
- VIOLETTA Nay, mistress, what would he be, were he in fashion—
- A hempen curse on those that put him out on't!—
That now appears so handsome and so comely, in clothes
Able to make a man an unbeliever
And good for nothing but for shift or so
If a man chance to fall i'th' ditch with better?
This is the best that ever I marked in 'em.
A man may make him ready in such clothes
Without a candle.
- PHILIPPA Ay, for shame of himself, wench.
- VIOLETTA My master does it oft in winter mornings
And never sees himself till he be ready.
- PHILIPPA No, nor then neither, as he should do, wench.—
90 I am sorry, gentle sir, we cannot show you
A courtesy in all points answerable
To your undoubted worth. Your name I crave, sir.
- ANSALDO Ansaldo, lady.
- PHILIPPA 'Tis a noble name, sir.
- ANSALDO The most unfortunate now.
- VIOLETTA So do I think, truly,
95 As long as that suit's on.
- PHILIPPA The most unfitting
And unprovidest, sir, of all our courtesies,
I do presume, is that you've passed already.
Your pardon but for that, and we're encouraged.
- ANSALDO My faithful service, lady.
- PHILIPPA Please you, sir,
100 To taste the next, a poor slight banquet, for sure I think you were
Unluckily prevented of your supper, sir.
- ANSALDO My fortune makes me more than amends, lady,
In your sweet kindness, which (so nobly shown to
me)
It makes me bold to speak my occasions to you.
105 I am this morning, that with clearness now
So cheerfully hastens me, to meet a friend
Upon my state's establishing, and the place

- 110 Ten mile from hence. O I am forced unwillingly
To crave your leave for't; which done, I return
In service plentiful.
- PHILIPPA Is't so important?
ANSALDO
If I should fail, as much as my undoing.
PHILIPPA
I think too well of you to undo you, sir,
Upon this small acquaintance.
ANSALDO My great happiness.
PHILIPPA
115 But when should I be sure of you here again, sir?
ANSALDO
As fast as speed can possibly return me.
PHILIPPA You will not fail?
ANSALDO
May never wish go well with me then!
PHILIPPA [giving him money]
There's to bear charges, sir.
ANSALDO Courtesy dwells in you.
120 I brought my horse up with me from the woods;
That's all the good they left me, 'gainst their wills too.
May your kind breast never want comfort, lady,
But still supplied as liberally as you give.
PHILIPPA
Farewell, sir, and be faithful.
ANSALDO Time shall prove me. Exit
- PHILIPPA
125 In my opinion now, this young man's likeliest
To keep his word. He's modest, wise, and courteous.
He has the language of an honest soul in him.
A woman's reputation may lie safe there.
I'm much deceived else. H'as a faithful eye,
If it be well observed.
130 VIOLETTA [calling] Good speed be with thee, sir!—
He puts him to't, i'faith.
PHILIPPA Violetta.
VIOLETTA Mistress?
PHILIPPA
Alas, what have we done, wench?
VIOLETTA What's the matter, mistress?
PHILIPPA
Run, run, call him again. He must stay, tell him, Though it be upon's undoing. We're undone else.
- Your master's clothes, they're known the country over. 135
- VIOLETTA
Now by this light that's true, and well remembered.
But there's no calling of him; he's out of sight now.
PHILIPPA
O what will people think?
VIOLETTA What can they think, mistress?
The gentleman has the worst on't. Were I he now
I'd make this ten mile forty mile about 140
Before I'd ride through any market town with 'em.
PHILIPPA
Will he be careful, think'st?
VIOLETTA My life for yours, mistress.
PHILIPPA
I shall long mightily to see him again.
VIOLETTA
And so shall I; I shall ne'er laugh till then. Exeunt

- Incipit Actus 4*
Enter Ricardo and Second Suitor at one door, and Valeria and First Suitor at another door. [Ricardo and Second Suitor talk apart] 4.1
- RICARDO
It goes well hitherto, my sweet protector.
SECOND SUITOR
Ay, and shall still to th'end, to th'end, my honey.
Wherefore have I enough, but to have't go well, sir?
[Valeria and First Suitor talk apart]
FIRST SUITOR
My whole state on't: thou overthrow'st him, widow.
VALERIA
I hope well still, sir.
FIRST SUITOR Hope? Be certain, wench. 5
I make no question now but thou art mine,
As sure as if I had thee in thy night-gear.
VALERIA
By'r Lady, that I doubt, sir.
FIRST SUITOR O, 'tis clear, wench,
By one thing that I marked.
VALERIA What's that, good sweet sir?
FIRST SUITOR
A thing that never failed me.
VALERIA Good sir, what? 10

109 Ten mile Ansaldo presumably intends to keep his rendezvous at Istria, near Valeria's house (3.2.125-7). His sense of the distance may be vague: elsewhere, Francisco (soon after leaving Valeria's) speaks of being fifteen miles from Brandino's house (2.2.9), and Brandino speaks of Violetta riding fifteen miles for a meeting with Valeria and Ricardo (4.1.124). However, it is not clear exactly where 2.2 or 4.1 takes place. Brandino's house is a mile from town, and two miles from where the thieves attacked Francisco and Ansaldo (3.2.71-2). The play takes place in an area where everyone knows everyone else, with a small 'market town' (3.3.141), highways, and apparently isolated houses owned by wealthy gentry; it resembles an English county.

119 bear charges pay your expenses
122 kind naturally charitable
131 puts him to't rides his horse hard (which Violetta perceives as a sign of virility)
135 country countryside, county
143 mightily greatly
4.1.4 state estate
7 night-gear night clothes

- FIRST SUITOR
I heard our counsellor speak a word of comfort:
Invita voluntate. Ha! That's he, wench,
The word of words, the precious chief, i'faith.
- VALERIA
Invita voluntate. What's the meaning, sir?
- FIRST SUITOR
15 Nay, there I leave you. But assure you thus much,
I never heard him speak that word i' my life
But the cause went on's side; that I marked ever.
[Ricardo and Second Suitor talk apart]
- SECOND SUITOR
Do, do, and spare not! Thou wouldst talk with her?
- RICARDO
Yes, with your leave and liking.
- SECOND SUITOR
20 Do, my adoption,
My chosen child. An thou hold'st so obedient,
Sure thou wilt live, and cozen all my kindred.
- RICARDO
A child's part in your love, that's my ambition, sir.
- SECOND SUITOR
Go and deserve it then. Please me well now.
I love wrangling, o' life, boy; there's my delight.
25 I have no other venery but vexation;
That's all my honey now. Smartly now to her!
I've enough, and I will have my humour.
- RICARDO
This need not ha' been, widow.
- VALERIA
You say right, sir.
No, nor your treachery, your close conspiracy
30 Against me for my wealth need not ha' been neither.
- RICARDO
I had you fairly. I scorn treachery
To your woman that I never meant to marry,
Much more to you whom I reserved for wife.
- VALERIA How, wife?
- RICARDO
Ay, wife, wife, widow. Be not ashamed on't;
35 It's the best calling ever woman came to,
And all your grace indeed, brag as you list.
- SECOND SUITOR Ha ha!
- VALERIA
I grant you, sir—but not to be your wife.
- FIRST SUITOR
O O!
- RICARDO
Not mine? I think 'tis the best bargain
40 That e'er thou mad'st i' thy life, or ever shall again,
When my head's laid—but that's not yet this threescore year.
Let's talk of nearer matters.
- VALERIA
You're as near, sir,
As e'er you're like to be, if law can right me.
- RICARDO
Now, before conscience, you're a wilful housewife.
45 VALERIA How!
- RICARDO
Ay, and I fear you spend my goods lavishly.
- VALERIA
Your goods?
- RICARDO
I shall miss much, I doubt me,
When I come to look over the inventory.
- VALERIA
I'll give you my word you shall, sir.
- RICARDO
50 Look to't, widow.
A night may come will call you to account for't.
- VALERIA
O, if you had me now, sir, in this heat,
I do but think how you'd be revenged on me.
- RICARDO
Ay, may I perish else, if I would not get 55 Three children at a birth, an I could o' thee.

12 Invita voluntate with an unwilling willingness (Latin); at 4.1.15–17 the First Suitor is unable to explain to Valeria what the words mean, but they are explicitly relevant to the legal issue at hand, whether Valeria willingly entered into a contract with Ricardo.

15 there I leave you in that I can't help you
19 adoption Wilson defines adoption as "The purpose of God eternally decreeing to make some his children... to take him for a son, who was a child of wrath by nature". This theological sense connects divine election with the secular sense of a 'chosen child'.

20 hold'st remain

21 cozen all my kindred cheat his relations out of any inheritance (the First Suitor has just addressed him as 'my adoption | My chosen child?'), with pun on 'cozen/cousin'

22 A child's part... ambition (a) I would like to receive love from you as your child; (b) I would like to inherit a portion appropriate to a loved child.

24 wrangling contentious dispute
o' life dearly

25 venery sexual pleasure

26 honey sexual pleasure

29 close secret

31–3 I scorn... wife Ricardo declares his honourable approach to his wooing, asserting that he would not deceive the waiting woman in order to gain access to her, and especially would not deceive the woman he wishes to marry.

36 calling station in life. Although the word derives the sense of naming or appellation (OED sb 4) from the idea of the action of greeting, the word developed a special religious sense as the 'summons, invitation, or impulse of God to salvation or to his service', and by extension therefore the position, estate, or station in life to which God has called a person (OED cites 1 Corinthians 7:20 in this connection: 'Let every man abide in the calling wherein he was called'). Thus though the word can mean an occupation or trade, it nevertheless may retain an aspect of Godly sanction. Ricardo's use implies the sanctified nature of the wifely role.

37 all your grace the particular source of grace for women

42 When my head's laid when I die

43 nearer more personal, immediate matters (punning on 'genitals')

44 right me redress my injuries

45 wilful independent, determined to have her way housewife (a) a woman who manages a household (b) hussy, slut

51 account (punning on 'a cunt')

52 heat eagerness, (sexual) passion

- FIRST SUITOR [to Second Suitor]
Take off your youngster there.
- SECOND SUITOR Take off your widow first.
He shall have the last word; I pay for't dearly.—
To her again, sweet boy; that side's the weaker.
I have enough, and I will have my humour.
Enter Brandino and Martino. [Ricardo and Second Suitor stand apart]
- VALERIA
60 O brother, see, I'm up to th'ears in law here.
[She shows him many legal papers]
Look, copy upon copy.
- BRANDINO
'Twere grief enough if a man did but hear on't,
But I'm in pain to see't.
- VALERIA What, sore eyes still, brother?
BRANDINO Worse and worse, sister. The old woman's water Does me no good.
- 65 VALERIA Why, it's helped many, sir.
BRANDINO It helps not me, I'm sure.
MARTINO O! O!
VALERIA What, ails Martino too?
MARTINO O! O! the toothache, the toothache!
BRANDINO
70 Ah, poor worm! This he endures for me now.
There beats not a more mutual pulse of passion
In a kind husband when his wife breeds child
Than in Martino. I ha' marked it ever.
He breeds all my pains in's teeth still—and, to quite
me,
It is his eye-tooth too.
- 75 MARTINO Ay, ay, ay, ay!
VALERIA
Where did I hear late of a skilful fellow,
Good for all kind of maladies? True, true, sir,
His flag hangs out in town here, i'th' Cross Inn,
With admirable cures of all conditions.
80 It shows him a great travelling and learned empiric.
BRANDINO
We'll both to him, Martino.
VALERIA Hark you, brother.
Perhaps you may prevail, as one indifferent.
FIRST SUITOR
Ay, about that, sweet widow.
- VALERIA True. Speak low, sir.
BRANDINO Well, what's the business? Say, say.
VALERIA Marry, this, brother.
85 Call the young man aside, from the old wolf there,
And whisper in his ear 'a thousand dollars'—
If he will vanish, and let fall the suit,
And never put's to no more cost and trouble.
FIRST SUITOR
90 Say me those words, good sir; I'll make 'em worth
A chain of gold to you at your sister's wedding.
Enter Violetta
BRANDINO
I shall do much for that.
[Brandino whispers to Ricardo, apart]
VALERIA Welcome, sweetheart.
Thou com'st most happily. I'm bold to send for thee
To make a purpose good.
VIOLETTA I take delight forsooth
In any such employment.
FIRST SUITOR Good wench, trust me.
[Valeria and Second Suitor whisper to Violetta, apart]
RICARDO [to Brandino]
95 How, sir, let fall the suit? Life, I'll go naked first.
BRANDINO
A thousand dollars, sir: think upon them.
RICARDO
Why, they're but a thousand dollars, when they're thought on.
BRANDINO
A good round sum.
RICARDO A good round widow's better.
There's meat and money too. I have been bought 100 Out of my lands and yielded, but (sir) scorn
To be bought out of my affection.
BRANDINO
Why, here's e'en just my university spirit.
I prized a piece of red deer above gold then.
RICARDO [aside]
My patron would be mad, an he should hear on't.
MARTINO
I pray, what's good, sir, for a wicked tooth?
105 RICARDO
Hanged, drawn, and quart'ring. Is't a hollow one?

56 Take off lead or draw away64 old woman's 'wise woman's', healer's water curative liquid, perhaps urine, which was used as a remedy for sore eyes69 toothache since devoted husbands were believed to suffer toothache in sympathy with their wives' labour pains, Martino, the dedicated clerk, responds similarly to his master's distress74 still alwaysquite requite, match, correspond precisely with78 flag sign80 empiric physician; specifically one who 'relies solely upon observation and experiment'82 indifferent impartial88 never . . . no more the double negative is an emphatic negative, not a positive92 happily fortunately; the emphasis is on the benevolence of chance, not her or his pleasure93 make a purpose good bring a project to a successful conclusion95 suit Ricardo puns on the legal term andthe item of clothing to assert his financial investment in his success at law99 meat woman as sexual body102 university spirit undergraduate reckless-ness103 red deer female flesh105 wicked painful, harmful106 Hanged, drawn, and quart'ring the torture and death meted out to traitors are associated with the drawing of a tooth and its hanging on a thread after extraction

- MARTINO
Ay, 'tis a hollow one.
- RICARDO Then take the powder
Of a burnt warrant, mixed with oil of felon.
- MARTINO
Why, sure you mock me.
- RICARDO Troth, I think I do, sir.
- SECOND SUITOR
Come hither, honey. What's the news in whispers?
[Ricardo and Second Sutor whisper apart]
- BRANDINO [to Valeria]
He will not be bought out.
- VALERIA No? That's strange, brother.
Pray take a little pains about this project then,
And try what that effects.
- BRANDINO I like this better.
[Brandino approaches Ricardo and Second Sutor]
Look you, sweet gentles, see what I produce here
For amity's sake and peace, to end all controversy:
This gentlewoman—my charge, left by her friends,
Whom for her person and her portion
I could bestow most richly; but in pity
To her affection, which lies bent at you, sir,
I am content to yield to her desire.
- RICARDO
At me?
- BRANDINO
But for this jar, 't'ad ne'er been offered.
I bring you flesh and money, a rich heir
And a maid too—and that's a thing worth thanks,
sir;
Nay, one that has rid fifteen mile this morning
For your love only.
- SECOND SUITOR [to Ricardo]
Honey, hearken after her.
Being rich, I can have all my money there,
Ease my purse well, and never wage law further.
I have enough, yet I will have my humour.
- RICARDO [to Violetta]
Do you love me, forsooth?
- VIOLETTA O infinitely!
- RICARDO
I do not ask thee, that I meant to have thee,
But only to know what came in thy head to love me.
- VIOLETTA
My time was come, sir; that's all I can say.
- RICARDO
'Las, poor fool! Where didst thou love me first, prithee?
- VIOLETTA
In happy hour be't spoke, out at a window, sir.
- RICARDO
A window? Prithee clap it to, and call it in again. 135
What was I doing then, should make thee love me?
- VIOLETTA
Twirling your band-string—which, methought, became you
So generously well.
- RICARDO
'Twas a good quality to choose a husband for.
That love was likely to be tied in matrimony 140 that begun in a band-string. Yet I ha' known as much come to pass ere now upon a tassel. Fare you well, sister. I may be cozened in a maid; I cannot, in a widow.
- SECOND SUITOR
Art thou come home again? Stick'st thou there still?
I will defend thee still then.
- FIRST SUITOR Sir, your malice 145
Will have enough on't.
- SECOND SUITOR I will have my humour.
- FIRST SUITOR
Beggary will prove the sponge.
- SECOND SUITOR Sponge i' thy gaskins,
Thy galligaskins there!
- RICARDO Ha! Brave protector!
- BRANDINO
I thought 'twould come to open wars again.
Let 'em agree as they will. Two testy fops! 150
I'll have a care of mine eyes.
- MARTINO I, of my chops.
Exeunt [severally] 4.2
- Enter Latrocinio and Occulto*
- LATROCINIO
Away, out with the banner! Send's good luck today!
A banner of cures and diseases hung out
- OCULTO
I warrant you. Your name's spread, sir, for an empiric.
There's an old mason troubled with the stone
Has sent to you this morning for your counsel;
He would have ease, fain.

116 gentlewoman Violetta, whom Brandino offers to marry to Ricardo

117 portion dowry

121 jar discord, dispute

123 maid Brandino stresses her virginity

135 clap it to . . . it shut the window . . . love

137 band-string a string for fastening a collar or 'band'; at 4.1.141 Ricardo puns on the band/bond of marriage

142 tassel (a) a decorative ornament on clothing; (b) perhaps a pun on 'tussle'

143 sister this form of address disavows

sexual interest

144 come home again returned to where you started

147 Beggary . . . sponge poverty (as a result of losing the lawsuit) will dry up your capacity for indulging your whims; humour derives from the word for moisture (see note to 2.1.175)

gaskins breeches

148 galligaskins wide or loose breeches

Brave excellent, worthy

150 testy short-tempered fops fools

151 chops jaws, mouth

4.2.1 Away get on with it

2 Your name's spread (a) his reputation has been published; (b) his name is spread out on the banner empiric physician; see 4.1.80.

3 stone a kidney stone, with a pun on the mason's occupation

5 fain gladly

- 5 LATROCINIO Marry, I cannot blame him, sir.
But how he will come by't? There lies the question.
OCCULTO
You must do somewhat, sir, for he's swoll'n most piteously;
Has urine in him now was brewed last March.
LATROCINIO 'Twill be rich gear for dyers.
10 OCCULTO I would 'twere come to that, sir.
LATROCINIO Lemme see.
I'll send him a whole musketcharge of gunpowder.
OCCULTO
Gunpowder? What, sir, to break the stone?
LATROCINIO Ay, by my faith, sir.
It is the likeliest thing I know to do't.
15 I'm sure it breaks stone walls and castles down;
I see no reason, but 't should break the stone.
OCCULTO
Nay, use your pleasure, sir.
LATROCINIO Troth, if that do not
I ha' nothing else that will.
OCCULTO I know that too.
LATROCINIO
20 Why then thou'rt a coxcomb to make question on't.
Go call in all the rest. I have employment for them.
[Exit Occulto]
When the highways grow thin with travellers
And few portmanteaus stirring (as all trades
Have their dead time, we see—thievery poor takings,
And lechery cold doings, and so forwards still),
25 Then do I take my inn, and those curmudgeons
Whose purses I can never get abroad,
I take 'em at more ease here i' my chamber,
And make 'em come to me. It's more state-like too.
Hang him that has but one way to his trade!
30 He's like a mouth that eats but on one side
- And half-cozens his belly, 'specially
If he dine among shavers and both-handed feeders.
Stratio, Silvio, and Fiducio!
Enter all the rest [of the thieves]: Silvio, Stratio,
Fiducio
I will have none left out. There's parts for you.
SILVIO
For us? Pray, let's have 'em.
LATROCINIO Change yourselves 35
With all speed possible into several shapes
Far from your own, as: you, a farmer, sir;
A grazier, you; and you may be a miller.
FIDUCIO
O no, a miller comes too near a thief;
That may spoil all again.
LATROCINIO Some country tailor then. 40
FIDUCIO
That's near enough, by'r Lady; yet I'll venture that.
The miller's a white devil; he wears his theft
Like innocence in badges most apparently
Upon his nose, sometimes between his lips;
The tailor, modestly, between his legs. 45
LATROCINIO
Why, pray, do you present that modest thief then.
And hark you for the purpose.
SILVIO 'Twill improve you, sir.
LATROCINIO
50 'Twill get believers, believe that, my masters,
Repute and confidence, and make all things clearer.
When you see any come, repair you to me
As samples of my skill. There are few arts
But have their shadows, sirs, to set 'em off;
Then where the art itself is but a shadow,
What need is there, my friends? Make haste, away, sirs!

- Enter Occulto [disguised]*
- OCCULTO
Where are you, sir?
- 55 LATROCINIO Not far, man. What's the news?
- OCCULTO
The old Justice, sir, whom we robbed once by moonlight,
And bound his man and he in haycock time
With a rope made of horsemeat, and in pity
Left their mares by 'em, which I think ere midnight 60 Did eat their hay-bound masters both at liberty—
- LATROCINIO
Life, what of him, man?
- OCCULTO He's inquiring earnestly
For the great man of art—indeed, for you, sir.
Therefore withdraw, sweet sir. Make yourself dainty
now,
And that's three parts of any profession.
- LATROCINIO
I have enough on't. Exit
- Enter Ansaldo [in old Brandino's clothes]*
- 65 OCCULTO [aside] How now, what thing's this?
Now by this light, The Second Part o'th' Justice,
'Newly revived'—with never a hair on's face.
It should be the first rather, by his smoothness;
But I ha' known The First Part written last.
- 70 'Tis he, or let me perish—the young gentleman
We robbed and stripped! But I am far from knowledge now.
- ANSALDO
One word, I pray, sir.
- OCCULTO With me, gentle sir?
- ANSALDO
Was there not lately seen about these parts, sir,
A knot of fellows, whose conditions
Are privily suspected?
- 75 OCCULTO Why do you ask, sir?
- ANSALDO
There was a poor young gentleman robbed last night.
- OCCULTO
Robbed?
- ANSALDO
Stripped of all, i'faith.
- OCCULTO O beastly rascals!
'Las, what was he?
- ANSALDO Look o' me, and know him, sir.
- OCCULTO
Hard-hearted villains! Strip? Troth, when I saw you Methought those clothes were never made for you, sir. 80
- ANSALDO
Want made me glad o' 'em.
- OCCULTO Send you better fortunes, sir!—
[Aside] That we may have a bout with you once again.
- ANSALDO
I thank you for your wish of love, kind sir.
- OCCULTO
'Tis with my heart, i'faith. New store of coin
And better clothes be with you!
- ANSALDO There's some honest yet 85
And charitably minded. How, what's here to do?
(Reads) 'Here within this place is cured
All the griefs that were e'er endured.'—
Now there thou liest. I endured one last night Thou canst not cure this morning. A strange promiser.— 90
- 'Palsy, gout, hydropic humour,
Breath that stinks beyond perfumer,
Fistula in ano, ulcer, mægum,
Or what disease soe'er beleaf'r 'em,
Stone, rupture, squinancy, impostume, 95
Yet too dear it shall not cost 'em.'—
That's conscionably said, i'faith.—
'In brief, you cannot, I assure you,
Be unsound so fast as I can cure you.'—
By'r Lady, you shall pardon me; I'll not try't, sir. 100
- [Exit Occulto]*
- Enter Brandino and Martino [aloof]*
- BRANDINO
Martino, is not yon my hinder parts?
- MARTINO
Yes, and your fore parts too, sir.
- BRANDINO I trow so.

57 haycock time harvest time; a haycock is
'a conical heap of hay in a field' (OED)

58 rope . . . horsemeat The next two lines show that they were bound with ropes of hay, 'hay-bound'

62 man of art wise man (see 2.1.57)

63 dainty impressive in appearance

64 three parts three-quarters

65 have enough on't understand well

67 'Newly revived' (a cliché of theatrical advertising). Ansaldo appears like a theatrical sequel in the life of Brandino, whose clothes he wears; in his youthfulness
Ansaldo looks like a reborn Brandino

69 The First . . . last Occulto refers to new plays that present material anterior to the events portrayed in a prior work (‘prequels’); he suggests that Ansaldo’s youth creates such an experience.

71 But . . . knowledge now Occulto must pretend ignorance of Ansaldo’s identity.

74 knot group or band conditions behaviour, morals (see 1.2.80)

75 privily secretly

82 bout ‘go, turn’, contest, opportunity to overcome (with sexual suggestion)

88 griefs (a) misfortunes; (b) sicknesses

91 Palsy shaking hydropic humour condition of being swollen with retained fluid

93 Fistula a pipelike ulcer in ano in the anus (Latin)

mægum headache, migraine

94 beleaf'r surround, beset

95 Stone kidney stone

squinancy quinsy

impostume abscess

97 conscionably in good faith

99 unsound so fast so very unhealthy

101–2 hinder parts . . . fore parts they spot
Ansaldo wearing Brandino’s clothes; in 103–4, where the references are physical, Brandino’s failure to see his fore parts suggests that he has always been too fat to see his genitals

- I never saw my hind parts in my life else,
No, nor my fore ones neither.—What are you, sir?
Are you a justice, pray?
- 105 ANSALDO A justice? No, truly.
BRANDINO
How came this suit to you then?
ANSALDO How, this suit?
Why, must he needs be a Justice, sir, that wears it?
BRANDINO
You'll find it so. 'Twas made for nobody else.
I paid for't.
ANSALDO [aside]
O strange fortune! I have undone
The charitable woman.
110 BRANDINO He'll be gone.
Martino, hold him fast. I'll call for aid.
ANSALDO
Hold me? O curse of fate!
[Ansaldo strikes Martino on the face]
MARTINO O master, master!
BRANDINO
What ails, Martino?
MARTINO In my conscience
He's beat out the wrong tooth. I feel it now,
Three degrees off.
BRANDINO [to Ansaldo]
115 O slave! spoiled a fine penman.
ANSALDO
He lacked good manners, though. Lay hands o' me?
I scorn all the deserts that belong to't.
Enter Latrocínio [disguised as an empiric]
LATROCINIO
Why, how now? What's the broil?
BRANDINO The man of art
I take you, sir, to be.
LATROCINIO I'm the professer
120 Of those slight cures you read of in the banner.
BRANDINO
Our business was to you, most skilful sir,
But in the way to you, right worshipful,
I met a thief.
LATROCINIO A thief?
BRANDINO With my clothes on, sir.
Let but the hose be searched, I'll pawn my life
125 There's yet the tailor's bill in one o'th' pockets
And a white thimble that I found i' moonlight.—
Thou saw'st me when I put it in, Martino.
MARTINO Oy, oy.
BRANDINO
O, he's spoiled the worthiest clerk that e'er drew warrant here.
- LATROCINIO [to Ansaldo]
Sir, you're a stranger, but I must deal plain with you. 130
That suit of clothes must needs come oddly to you.
ANSALDO [aside]
I dare not say which way; that's my affliction.
LATROCINIO
Is not your worship's name Signor Brandino, sir?
BRANDINO
It has been so these threescore year and upwards.
LATROCINIO
I heard there was a robbery done last night 135
Near to your house.
ANSALDO You heard a truth then, sir,
And I the man was robbed.
LATROCINIO Ah, that's too gross.
Send him away for fear of farther mischief.
I do not like him; he's a cunning knave.
BRANDINO
I want but aid.
LATROCINIO Within there!
Enter [Oculto and] two or three servants
BRANDINO Seize upon 140
That impudent thief!
ANSALDO Then hear me speak.
BRANDINO Away!
I'll neither hear thee speak, nor wear those clothes
again.
To prison with the varlet!
ANSALDO How am I punished!
BRANDINO
I'll make thee bring out all before I leave thee.
Exit [servants] with Ansaldo
LATROCINIO
You've took an excellent course with this bold villain,
sir. 145
BRANDINO
I am sworn for service to the commonwealth, sir.
Enter Stratio, Silvio, and Fiducio [disguised as a farmer, a grazier, and a tailor]
What are these, learnèd sir?
LATROCINIO O, they're my patients.—
Good morrow, Gout, Rupture, and Palsy.
STRATIO
'Tis farewell gout almost, I thank your worship.
LATROCINIO
What? No, you cannot part so soon, I hope? 150
You came but lately to me.
STRATIO But most happily.
I can go near to leap, sir.
LATROCINIO What, you cannot?
[Stratio leaps]
Away, I say! Take heed. Be not too vent'rous, though.

103 else otherwise, under other circumstances117 deserts . . . to't the consequences of striking Martino (?), or the respect due to Martino's skill as a penman (?)118 broil disturbance128 Oy, oy cries of pain (?)132 affliction distress137 gross evident144 bring out produce, utter (OED bring, vb.21.c)

146 service as a Justice of the Peace150 part depart (because cured)151 happily fortunately, advantageously152 go near to almost

- I've had you but three days, remember that.
- 155 STRATIO Those three are better than three hundred, sir.
[Stratio leaps]
- LATROCINIO Yet again?
- STRATIO Ease takes pleasure to be known, sir.
[Exit]
- LATROCINIO [to Silvio]
You with the rupture there, hernia in scrotum,
Pray let me see your space this morning. Walk, sir.
[Silvio walks in a bow-legged manner]
I'll take your distance straight. 'Twas 'F.O.' yesterday.
- 160 Ah, sirrah, here's a simple alteration,
Secundo gradu, you're 'F.U.' already.
Here's a most happy change. Be of good comfort, sir.
Your knees are come within three inches now
Of one another; by tomorrow noon
I'll make 'em kiss and jostle.
- 165 SILVIO Bless your worship!
[Exit]
- BRANDINO You have a hundred pray'rs in a morning, sir.
- LATROCINIO Faith, we have a few to pass away the day with.—
Tailor, you had a stitch.
- FIDUCIO O, good your worship,
I have had none since Easter. Were I rid 170 But of this whoreson palsy, I were happy.
I cannot thread my needle.
- LATROCINIO No, that's hard.
I never marked so much.
- FIDUCIO It comes by fits, sir.
- LATROCINIO 'Las, poor man!—What would your worship say now
To see me help this fellow at an instant?
- BRANDINO And make him firm from shaking?
- 175 LATROCINIO As a steeple,
From the disease on't.
- BRANDINO 'Tis to me miraculous.
- LATROCINIO [to Fiducio]
You, with your whoremaster disease, come hither.
Here, take me this round glass, and hold it steadfast.
- Yet more, sir; yet, I say! So.
- BRANDINO Admirable!
- LATROCINIO Go, live, and thread thy needle. [Exit Fiducio]
- BRANDINO Here, Martino.— 180
'Las, poor fool, his mouth is full of praises
And cannot utter 'em.
- LATROCINIO No? What's the malady?
- BRANDINO The fury of a tooth.
- LATROCINIO A tooth? Ha ha!
I thought 't'ad been some gangrene, fistula,
Cancer, or ramex.
- BRANDINO No, it's enough as 'tis, sir. 185
- LATROCINIO My man shall ease that straight.—Sit you down there,
sir.
[Martino sits]
[To Occulto] Take the tooth, sirrah, daintily, insensibly.—
But what's your worship's malady? That's for me, sir.
- BRANDINO Marry, pray look you, sir: your worship's counsel
About mine eyes.
- LATROCINIO Sore eyes? That's nothing too, sir. 190
- BRANDINO By'r Lady, I that feel it think it somewhat.
- LATROCINIO Have you no convulsions? pricking achës, sir?
Ruptures or apostemates?
- BRANDINO No, by my faith, sir,
Nor do I desire to have 'em.
- LATROCINIO Those are cures;
There do I win my fame, sir.—Quickly, sirrah, 195 Reach me the eye-cup hither.—Do you make water well, sir?
- BRANDINO I'm all well there.
- LATROCINIO You feel no grief i'th' kidney?
- BRANDINO Sound, sound, sound, sir.
- LATROCINIO O, here's a breath, sir, I must talk withal 200
One of these mornings.
- BRANDINO There I think, i'faith,
I am to blame indeed, and my wife's words

 [Occulto draws a tooth from Martino]

MARTINO O, O! 'Tis not that, 'tis not that!
 It is the next beyond it: there, there, there.

OCCULTO
 205 The best have their mistakings. Now I'll fit you, sir.

BRANDINO [to Latrocinio]
 What's that, sweet sir, that comforts with his coolness?

LATROCINIO
 O, sovereign gear. Wink hard, and keep it in, sir.
 [While he applies the eye-cup, he picks Brandino's pocket]

MARTINO O, O, O!
 OCCULTO
 Nay, here he goes. One twitch more and he comes,
 sir.
 [While he draws a tooth, he picks Martino's pocket]

MARTINO
 Auh, ho.

210 OCCULTO Spit out. I told you he was gone, sir.

BRANDINO
 How cheers Martino?

MARTINO O, I can answer you now, master.
 I feel great ease, sir.

BRANDINO So do I, Martino.

MARTINO
 I'm rid of a sore burden, for my part, master,
 Of a scald little one.

LATROCINIO [to Brandino]
 Please but your worship now

215 To take three drops of the rich water with you,
 I'll undertake your man shall cure you, sir,
 At twice i' your own chamber.

BRANDINO Shall he so, sir?

LATROCINIO
 I will uphold him in't.

MARTINO Then will I do't, sir.

LATROCINIO
 How lively your man's now!

MARTINO O, I'm so light, methinks,
 Over what e'er I was!

BRANDINO [to Latrocinio]
 220 What is't contents your worship?

LATROCINIO
 E'en what your worship please. I am not mercenary.

BRANDINO
 My purse is gone, Martino!

LATROCINIO How, your purse, sir?

BRANDINO
 'Tis gone, i'faith. I've been among some rascals.
 MARTINO And that's a thing
 I ever gave you warning of, master. You care not 225
 What company you run into.

BRANDINO
 Lend me some money. Chide me anon, I prithee.
 A pox on 'em for vipers! They ha' sucked blood o' me.

MARTINO
 O master!

BRANDINO
 How now, man?

MARTINO My purse is gone too.

BRANDINO How?
 I'll never take warning more of thee while I live then. 230
 Thou art an hypocrite, and art not fit
 To give good counsel to thy master, that Canst not keep from ill company thyself.

LATROCINIO
 This is most strange, sir. Both your purses gone?

MARTINO
 Sir, I'd my hand on mine when I came in. 235

LATROCINIO
 Are you but sure of that? O would you were!

MARTINO
 As I'm of ease.

LATROCINIO Then they're both gone one way;
 Be that your comfort.

BRANDINO Ay, but what way's that, sir?

LATROCINIO
 That close knave in your clothes has got 'em both.
 'Tis well you've clapped him fast.

BRANDINO Why, that's impossible. 240

LATROCINIO
 O, tell not me, sir. I ha' known purses gone
 And the thief stand and look one full i'th' face,
 As I may do your worship and your man now.

MARTINO
 Nay, that's most certain, master.

BRANDINO I will make
 That rascal in my clothes answer all this then 245
 And all the robberies that have been done
 Since the moon changed. Get you home first, Martino,
 And know if any of my wife's things are missing,
 Or any more of mine. Tell her he's taken,
 And by that token he has took both our purses. 250
 [He gives Martino a token]

MARTINO
 That's an ill token, master.

BRANDINO That's all one, sir.

205 fit you treat you, sort you out

206 his its

207 sovereign excellent gear treatment, remedy

214 scald contemptible

215 rich of great worth

217 At twice on a second occasion, at a later time

218 uphold give him assistance

219 light (a) merry, but also (b) of little substance (since without his knowledge he has been robbed)

220 Over beyond what (OED prep. 9b)

227 anon later

237 of ease free from pain

240 clapped confined

250 token some object (unidentified) that appears to be distasteful or unsatisfactory; Martino calls it an ill token in the next line

- She must have that or nothing, for I'm sure
The rascal has left nothing else for a token.
Begone! Make haste again, and meet me part o'th'
way.
- 255 MARTINO I'll hang the villain
An 'twere for nothing but the souse he gave me.
- BRANDINO
Sir, I depart ashamed of my requital,
And leave this seal ring with you as a pledge
Of further thankfulness.
- LATROCINIO No, I beseech you, sir.
- BRANDINO
Indeed you shall, sir.
- 260 LATROCINIO O, your worship's word, sir.
[Brandino gives him the ring]
- BRANDINO
You shall have my word too, for a rare gentleman
As e'er I met withal.
- LATROCINIO Clear sight be with you, sir!
Exit Brandino
- If conduit-water and my hostess' milk,
That comes with the ninth child now, may afford it.
[Enter Stratio, Silvio, and Fiducio]
Life, I feared none but thee, my villainous toothdrawer.
- 265 OCCULTO
There was no fear of me. I've often told you
I was bound prentice to a barber once,
But ran away i'th' second year.
- LATROCINIO Ay, marry,
That made thee give a pull at the wrong tooth,
And me afraid of thee.—What have we there, sirs?
- 270 OCCULTO
Some threescore dollars i' the master's purse
And sixteen in the clerk's, a silver seal,
Two or three amber beads, and four blank warrants.
- LATROCINIO
Warrants? Where be they? The best news came yet.
Mass, here's his hand, and here's his seal, I thank
him.
- 275 This comes most luckily. One of our fellows
Was took last night; we'll set him first at liberty,
And other good boys after him—and if he
In th'old Justice's suit, whom we robbed lately,
- Will come off roundly, we'll set him free too.
- OCCULTO
That were a good deed, faith; we may in pity.
- LATROCINIO
There's nothing done merely for pity nowadays;
Money or ware must help too.
- Song in parts*
- THIEVES
Give me fortune, give me health,
Give me freedom, I'll get wealth. 285
Who complains his fate's amiss
When he has the wide world his?
He that has the devil in fee
Can have but all, and so have we.
Give us fortune, give us health, 290
Give us freedom, we'll get wealth.
In every hamlet, town and city,
He has lands, that was born witty. Exeunt
- 5.1
Incipit Actus 5
Enter Philippa and Violetta
- PHILIPPA
How well this gentleman keeps his promise too!
Sure there's no trust in man.
- VIOLETTA They're all Franciscos.
That's my opinion, mistress. Fools, or false ones.
He might have had the honesty yet, i'faith,
To send my master's clothes home.
- PHILIPPA Ay, those clothes. 5
- VIOLETTA
Colliers come by the door ev'ry day, mistress.
Nay, this is market-day too: poulterers, butchers,
They would have lain most daintily in a pannier
And kept veal from the wind.
- PHILIPPA Those clothes much trouble me.
- VIOLETTA
Faith, an he were a gentleman, as he seemed to be, 10
They would trouble him too, I think.
Methinks he should have small desire to keep 'em.
- PHILIPPA
Faith, and less pride to wear 'em, I should think,
wench,
Unless he kept 'em as a testimony
- 254 again back
256 souse heavy blow
257 requital (lack of) payment for services 263 conduit-water water from the conduit, the source of public supply; with the hostess' breast milk it made up the eye-wash 265 villainous devilishly skilled (ironic praise)
267 barber Barbers originally practised dentistry and surgery.
268 second year (a full apprenticeship lasted for seven)
- 273 amber beads Amber has various associations: it has been a symbol of immortality, and in the 17th century was advanced as a universal cure.
However, with respect to Martino it may be relevant that amber 'was used as an amulet to attract lovers' (OED sub.
4); 'beads made of amber preserved the wearer against rheumatism, toothache' and many other complaints (Budge), and Camillus Leonardus records among its other properties that 'it fastens teeth that are loosened' (Speculum Lapidum, 1502).
- 278 good boys fellow criminals
280 come off pay up
roundly promptly
282 merely just, solely 283.1 Song in parts a song for several voice-parts in simple harmony 288 devil in fee has retained the devil as his servant (or lawyer)
5.1.6 Colliers coal-merchants
8 They the clothes; Violetta says that they could have been returned by tradespeople, using them as rags

15 For after-times, to show what misery
 He passed in his young days, and then weep over 'em.
 VIOLETTA Weep, mistress?
 Nay, sure, methinks he should not weep for laughing.
Enter Martino
 PHILIPPA [aside to Violetta]
 Martino? O, we're spoiled, wench. Are they come then?
 20 MARTINO Mistress, be of good cheer. I have excellent news for you. Comfort your heart. What have you to breakfast, mistress?
 You shall have all again, I warrant you.
 PHILIPPA [aside]
 What says he, wench?
 VIOLETTA [aside] I'm loath to understand him.
 MARTINO
 25 Give me a note of all your things, sweet mistress.
 You shall not lose a hair. Take't of my word.
 We have him safe enough.
 PHILIPPA [aside] O 'las, sweet wench,
 This man talks fearfully.
 VIOLETTA [aside] And I know not what yet;
 That's the worst, mistress.
 MARTINO Can you tell me, pray,
 30 Whether the rascal has broke ope my desk or no?
 There's a fine little barrel of pome-citrons
 Would have served me this seven year—O, and my fig-cheese!
 The fig of everlasting obloquy
 Go with him if he have eat it! I'll make haste;
 35 He cannot eat it all yet. He was taken, mistress,
 Grossly and beastly—how do you think, i'faith?
 PHILIPPA
 I know not, sir.
 MARTINO Troth, in my master's clothes.
 Would any thief but a beast been taken so?
 PHILIPPA [aside] Wench, wench.
 VIOLETTA [aside]
 40 I have grief enough of mine own to tend, mistress.
 PHILIPPA [to Martino]
 Did he confess the robbery?
 MARTINO O no, no, mistress.
 He's a young cunning rascal; he confessed nothing.
 While we were examining on him, he took away

My master's purse and mine, but confessed nothing still.
 PHILIPPA [aside]
 That's but some slanderous injury raised against him.—
 45 Came not your master with you?
 MARTINO No, sweet mistress,
 I must make haste and meet him. Pray, dispatch me then.
 PHILIPPA
 I have looked over all with special heedfulness.
 There's nothing missed, I can assure you, sir,
 But that suit of your master's.
 MARTINO I'm right glad on't. 50
 That suit would hang him. Yet I would not have him
 Hanged in that suit, though; it will disgrace
 My master's fashion for ever, and make it as hateful
 As yellow bands. Exit
 PHILIPPA
 O, what shall's do, wench?
 VIOLETTA 'Tis no marvel, mistress, 55
 The poor young gentleman could not keep his promise.
 PHILIPPA
 Alas, sweet man, he's confessed nothing yet, wench.
 VIOLETTA
 That shows his constancy and love to you, mistress.
 But you must do't, of force; there is no help for't.
 The truth can neither shame nor hurt you much. 60
 Let 'em make what they can on't; 'twere sin and pity,
 i'faith,
 To cast away so sweet a gentleman
 For such a pair of infidel hose and doublet.
 I would not hang a Jew for a whole wardrobe on 'em.
 PHILIPPA
 Thou sayst true, wench.
Enter Ansaldo [in old Brandino's clothes]
 VIOLETTA O O, they're come again, mistress. 65
 PHILIPPA
 Signor Ansaldo?
 ANSALDO The same—mightily crossed, lady,
 But, past hope, freed again by a doctor's means,
 A man of art; I know not justly what, indeed,
 But pity and the fortunate gold you gave me
 Wrought my release between 'em.

20–2 Mistress...mistress? Martino does not mention Brandino's token; there could be silent theatrical business associated with it—for instance, he could deliver the distasteful object to Philippa, without explanation, while saying 'I have excellent news for you'.
 28 fearfully in a manner to excite fear; he appears crazy to them
 31 pome-citrons citrus fruit; lemons and limes were often covered by this category.
 32 fig-cheese a conserve of figs, having the consistency of cheese or the form of cheese

 33–4 The fig... | Go with a curse upon... (The fig was an abusive gesture made by putting the thumb between two closed fingers or into one's mouth.)
 34 have (subjunctive form)
 45 eat eaten; a form of the past participle now relatively rare, pronounced 'et'
 45 injury calumny
 54 yellow bands a fashion for collars and ruffs stiffened with yellow starch, reputedly introduced to the court by Mrs Anne Turner, who was ordered to wear them at her execution in 1615 for her part in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury 55 shall's must we

 59 of force of necessity
 64 Jew (here regarded as the most contemptible of persons; antisemitism was widespread, and officially encouraged)
 65 they're the doublet and hose
 66 crossed thwarted
 67 past hope beyond what one would hope
 68 art special skill in healing (see 2.1.57)
 68 doctor's a man of learning's

- 70 PHILIPPA Met you not
My husband's man?
ANSALDO I took such strange ways, lady,
I hardly met a creature.
PHILIPPA O, most welcome!
VIOLETTA
But how shall we bestow him now we have him, mistress?
PHILIPPA
Alas, that's true.
VIOLETTA Martino may come back again.
PHILIPPA
75 Step you into that little chamber—speedily, sir—
And dress him up in one of my gowns and headties.
His youth will well endure it.
VIOLETTA That will be admirable.
PHILIPPA
Nay, do't, do't quickly then, and cut that suit
Into a hundred pieces, that it may never be known again.
VIOLETTA
80 A hundred? Nay, ten thousand at the least, mistress,
For if there be a piece of that suit left as big as my nail, the deed will come out. 'Tis worse than a murder; I fear 'twill never be hid.
PHILIPPA
Away! Do your endeavour, and dispatch, wench.
Exeunt Violetta and Ansaldo
85 I've thought upon a way of certain safety,
And I may keep him while I have him too,
Without suspicion now. I've heard o'th' like.
A gentleman, that for a lady's love
Was thought six months her woman, tended on her 90 In her own garments, and (she being a widow)
Lay night by night with her in way of comfort;
Marry, in conclusion match they did together.
Would I'd a copy of the same conclusion.
Enter Brandino with a writing
He's come himself now. If thou be'st a happy wench,
95 Be fortunate in thy speed. I'll delay time
With all the means I can.—O, welcome sir.
BRANDINO
I'll speak to you anon, wife, and kiss you shortly.
I'm very busy yet.—[Reads] 'Cocksey-down, Memberry,
Her manor house at Welldun.'
- PHILIPPA What's that, good sir?
BRANDINO
The widow's, your sweet sister's, deed of gift. 100
She's made all her estate over to me, wench.
She'll be too hard for 'em all.—And now come buss
me.
Good luck after thieves' handsel.
PHILIPPA O, 'tis happy, sir,
You have him fast.
BRANDINO I ha' laid him safe enough, wench.
PHILIPPA
I was so lost in joy at the report on't 105
I quite forgot one thing to tell Martino.
BRANDINO
What's that, sweet blood?
PHILIPPA He and his villains, sir,
Robbed a sweet gentlewoman last night.
BRANDINO
A gentlewoman?
PHILIPPA Nay, most uncivilly,
And basely stripped her, sir.
BRANDINO O, barbarous slaves! 110
PHILIPPA
I was e'en fain—for womanhood's sake,
Alas, and charity's—to receive her in
And clothe her poor wants in a suit of mine.
BRANDINO
'Twas most religiously done. I long for her.
Who have I brought to see thee, think'st thou, woman? 115
PHILIPPA
Nay, sir, I know not.
BRANDINO Guess, I prithee heartily.
An enemy of thine.
PHILIPPA That I hope you have not, sir.
BRANDINO
But all was done in jest; he cries thee mercy.
Francisco, sirrah.
PHILIPPA O, I think not on him.
BRANDINO
That letter was but writ to try thy constancy. 120
He confessed all to me.
PHILIPPA Joy on him, sir.
Enter Francisco
So far am I from malice, look you, sir:—
Welcome, sweet signor. But I'll never trust you, sir.

76 headties headdresses77 His youth... endure it His youth will enable him to pass for a woman.80-3 Nay... hid (Proverbially, 'murder will out'.)82 nail finger-nail84 your endeavour all you can, your best92 match marry93 Would I'd... conclusion I wish I might enjoy the same conclusion.94-6 He's... can (perhaps stage-whispered to Violetta, offstage; or spoken aside, thinking of Violetta)

94-5 If... speed If you are favoured by fortune ('happy'), may you be fortunate in being quick; speed = (a) success, (b) quickness98-9 'Cocksey-down, Memberry... Welldun.' sexual puns: cock, member, well-fucked102 hard shrewd, odurate102 buss kiss103 after thieves' handsel after a first experience of thieves; handsel = first experience. Dent records a use in 1609 of the proverb 'Thieves handsell is alwaies naught' (Dent, T122.11).

107 sweet blood Brandino's endearment stresses Philippa's attractiveness and youthful health; he ignores the association of blood and sexual desire.111 fain obliged114 long for sympathize with118 cries thee mercy asks pardon of you

BRANDINO
Faith, I'm beholden to thee, wife, for this.

FRANCISCO [aside]
125 Methinks I enter now this house with joy,
Sweet peace, and quietness of conscience.
I wear no guilty blush upon my cheek
For a sin stamped last midnight; I can talk now
130 With that kind man, and not abuse him inwardly
With any scornful thought made of his shame.
What a sweet being is an honest mind.
It speaks peace to itself and all mankind.
Enter Martino

BRANDINO
Martino.

MARTINO
Master?

BRANDINO
There's another robbery done, sirrah,
By the same party.

MARTINO
What? Your worship mocks,
Under correction.

135 PHILIPPA
I forgot to tell thee
He robbed a lovely gentlewoman.

MARTINO
O pagan!
This fellow will be stoned to death with pipkins.
Your women in the suburbs will so maul him
With broken cruces and pitchers without ears
140 He will ne'er die alive; that's my opinion.
Enter Ansaldo [dressed as a gentlewoman], and Violetta

PHILIPPA
Look you, your judgements, gentlemen—yours especially,
Signor Francisco, whose mere object now
Is woman, at these years; that's the eye-saint, I know, Amongst young gallants.—Husband, you have a glimpse too;
145 You offer half an eye, as old as you are.

BRANDINO
By'r Lady, better, wench: an eye and a half, I trow.
I should be sorry else.

PHILIPPA
What think you now, sirs?

Is't not a goodly manly gentlewoman?
BRANDINO Beshrew my heart else, wife.—
Pray, soft a little, signor. You're but my guest, remember; 150
I'm master of the house; I'll have the first buss.

PHILIPPA
But husband, 'tis the courtesy of all places
To give a stranger ever the first bit.

BRANDINO In woodcock or so, but there's no heed to be taken in mutton; we commonly fall so roundly to that, 155
we forget ourselves.—
I'm sorry for thy fortune, but thou'rt welcome, lady.
[Brandino kisses Ansaldo]

MARTINO [aside]
My master kisses as I've heard a hackney man
Cheer up his mare: chap, chap.

BRANDINO [to Ansaldo] I have him fast, lady,
And he shall lie by't close.

ANSALDO
You cannot do me 160
A greater pleasure, sir.

BRANDINO
I'm happily glad on't.

FRANCISCO [aside]
Methinks there's somewhat whispers in my soul
This is the hour I must begin my acquaintance
With honest love, and banish all loose thoughts.
My fate speaks to me from the modest eye 165
Of yon sweet gentlewoman.
[Francisco kisses Ansaldo. Philippa and Violetta talk apart]

PHILIPPA Wench, wench!
VIOLETTA Pish, hold in your breath, mistress.
If you be seen to laugh, you spoil all presently.
I keep it in with all the might I have—puh! 170

ANSALDO [to Brandino]
Pray, what young gentleman's that, sir?

BRANDINO
An honest boy, i'faith,
And came of a good kind. Dost like him, lady?
I would thou hadst him, an thou be'st not promised;
He's worth ten thousand dollars.

VIOLETTA
By this light, mistress,
My master will go near to make a match anon. 175

128 stamped perpetrated; the metaphor is from striking an impression into something, as in minting a coin, and may be associated with conceiving a child (the 'sin').
129 inwardly in private thought
135 Under correction if you'll pardon my saying so; a deferential gesture after the possibly indiscreet remark that preceded it
137 pipkins small earthenware pots
138 women in the suburbs (including prostitutes; the 'suburbs' were the prime location of the brothels in London)

139 cruces small earthen vessels for liquids; pots, jars, or bottles ears handles
140 ne'er die alive he will be dead before he can be executed (unintentionally absurd)
142 mere sole
143 eye-saint object of the eye's veneration
148 manly independent, courageous; but the pun is obvious
150 signor addressed to Francisco, who has taken the initiative with regard to the 'gentlewoman'
153 bit morsel to eat
154-5 woodcock...mutton small birds...

joints of lamb; but Brandino is talking idiomatically: woodcock = fool, mutton = prostitutes, or at least women regarded as sexual beings
155 fall so roundly to eat so ravenously
159 him the thief, who is in fact Ansaldo, whom Brandino may at this moment still be holding 160 lie by't close lie securely in prison (but permitting an unintended sexual pun on 'lie beside Philippa in bed')
162 somewhat something
169 presently immediately
172 good kind good descent, good family

- Methinks I dream of admirable sport, mistress.
 PHILIPPA Peace, thou art a drab.
 BRANDINO Come hither now, Francisco.
 I've known the time I've had a better stomach;
 Now I can dine with looking upon meat.
 FRANCISCO [to Ansaldo]
 180 That face deserved a better fortune, lady,
 Than last night's rudeness showed.
 ANSALDO We cannot be
 Our choosers, sir, in our own destiny.
 FRANCISCO [aside]
 I return better pleased than when I went.
 MARTINO [to Ansaldo]
 And could that beastly imp rob you, forsooth?
 185 ANSALDO Most true, forsooth.
 I will not altogether, sir, disgrace you,
 Because you look half like a gentleman.
 MARTINO
 And that's the mother's half.
 ANSALDO There's my hand for you.
 MARTINO
 I swear you could not give me anything
 190 I love better. A hand gets me my living.
 O sweet lemon-peel!
 [Martino kisses Ansaldo's hand]
 FRANCISCO [to Ansaldo]
 May I request a modest word or two, lady,
 In private with you?
 ANSALDO With me, sir?
 FRANCISCO
 To make it sure from all suspect of injury
- Or unbecoming privacy, which heaven knows
 Is not my aim now, I'll entreat this gentleman
 For an ear-witness unto all our conference.
 ANSALDO
 Why, so, I am content, sir.
 BRANDINO So am I, lady.
 Exeunt Francisco and Ansaldo
 MARTINO O master, here's a rare bedfellow for my mistress tonight—for you know we must both out of town again. 200 BRANDINO That's true, Martino.
 MARTINO
 I do but think how they'll lie telling of tales together,
 The prettiliest.
 BRANDINO The prettiliest, indeed.
 MARTINO Their tongues will never 205
 Lin wagging, master.
 BRANDINO Never, Martino, never.
 Exeunt Brandino [at one door, following Francisco and Ansaldo], and Martino [at another door]
 PHILIPPA Take heed you be not heard.
 VIOLETTA I fear you most, mistress.
 PHILIPPA Me, fool?—Ha ha!
 VIOLETTA
 Why, look you, mistress; faith, you're faulty—ha ha! 210
 PHILIPPA
 Well said, i'faith. Where lies the fault now, gossip?
 VIOLETTA
 O for a husband! I shall burst with laughing else.
 This house is able to spoil any maid.
 PHILIPPA
 I'll be revenged now soundly of Francisco
 For failing me when time was.

- 176 admirable wonderful, surprising sport The innocent sense of jest and the sexual sense of intercourse are both present as Violetta contemplates what she believes to be Francisco's betrothal to a man; see also 5.1.410.
 177 drab prostitute, but here (by extension)
 a talkative person 178 stomach appetite (for food, but here with sexual association)
 182 destiny Ansaldo's response to Francisco may be an artful and diplomatic reply from a person in double disguise, but it also relates to Francisco's emphasis at their meeting on fate (165, 234), fortune (180), and ordained (233, 254), and to the workings of predestination in the resolution of the play.
 183 I...went I am happier returning to this house than I was leaving it (ironically connecting his happiness now with his distress in 3.3—both caused, without his realizing it, by the same person, Ansaldo)
 184 imp a child of the devil 188 mother's half proverbially, 'The mother's side is the surer side'. Martino

- affirms his rank while jesting about his paternity; specifically, he implies a liaison between an upper-class woman and a lower-class man.
 190-I hand...lemon-peel Martino praises a hand because he earns his living by his hand; he compares hers to lemon-peel because with his passion for lemons it is extravagant praise.
 194 suspect suspicion injury wrongful act
 195 unbecoming inappropriate
 196 this gentleman Brandino, who leaves the stage at 206.1; his exit is delayed by Martino, who presumably pulls him aside on his way out
 206 Lin cease
 208 fear you am afraid for you
 210 faulty to blame, naughty
 211 fault (a) sin (b) woman's genitals, considered as a crack or flaw in the body.
 The physical and moral senses often intertwine, as in 'love covers faults' (Trick
 2.1.51; Dissemblers 5.2.171). Ansaldo, as a man, would not have the 'fault' which Francisco expects. This sense also

- leads to Violetta's following wish for a husband: as Maud says in relation to the 'faults or cracks' of her daughter, 'tis a husband solders up all cracks' (Chaste Maid 1.1.30-8). Within this system of correspondences a woman's vagina and mouth were easily twinned: an infant daughter has 'the mother's mouth, up and down' (Chaste Maid 3.2.13), for instance, and Helkiah Crooke relates anecdotal evidence of the physiological interchangeability, in women, of the two orifices (p. 254). Volubility (an open mouth) could therefore be taken as a sign of sexual incontinence (an open 'fault'). Violetta must find a husband, or she will 'burst with laughing': a husband, by stopping up one orifice, will thereby enable greater control of the other.
 213 house perhaps in the secondary sense
 'playhouse': many contemporary critics alleged that a visit to the public theatres was 'able to spoil any maid'. See 3.3.64.
 214 revenged (by manipulating Francisco into marrying a man)

215 VIOLETTA Are you there, mistress?
I thought you would not forget that, however. A good turn disappointed is ever the last thing that a woman forgives. She'll scarce do't when she's speechless. Nay, though she hold up her whole hand for all other 220 injuries, she'll forgive that but with one finger.
PHILIPPA
I'll vex his heart as much as he mocked mine.
VIOLETTA
But that may mar your hopes too, if our gentlewoman
Be known to be a man.
PHILIPPA Not as I'll work it.
I would not lose this sweet revenge, methinks,
225 For a whole fortnight of the old man's absence,
Which is the sweetest benefit next to this.
Enter Ansaldo [dressed as a gentlewoman]
Why, how now, sir, what course take you for laughing?
We are undone for one.
ANSALDO Faith, with great pain
Stifle it and keep it in. I ha' no receipt for't.
230 But pray, in sadness say: what is the gentleman?
I never knew his like for tedious urgings.
He will receive no answer.
PHILIPPA Would he would not, sir.
ANSALDO
Says I'm ordained for him, merely for him,
And that his wiving fate speaks in me to him;
235 Will force on me a jointure speedily
Of some seven thousand dollars.
PHILIPPA Would thou hadst 'em, sir!
I know he can, an he will.
ANSALDO For wonder's pity,
What is this gentleman?
PHILIPPA Faith, shall I tell you, sir?
One that would make an excellent honest husband 240 For her that's a just maid at one-and-twenty,
For on my conscience he has his maidenhead yet.
ANSALDO
Fie, out upon him, beast!
PHILIPPA Sir, if you love me,
Give way but to one thing I shall request of you.

ANSALDO
Your courtesies, you know, may lay commands on me.
PHILIPPA
Then, at his next solicitings, let a consent
245 Seem to come from you. 'Twill make noble sport, sir.
We'll get jointure and all—but you must bear
Yourself most affable to all his purposes.
ANSALDO
I can do that.
PHILIPPA Ay, and take heed of laughing.
ANSALDO
I've bide the worst of that already, lady.
250 Enter Francisco
PHILIPPA
Peace, set your countenance then, for here he comes.
FRANCISCO
There is no middle continent in this passion.
I feel it since; it must be love or death;
It was ordained for one.
PHILIPPA [taking him aside]
Signor Francisco,
I'm sorry 'twas your fortune in my house, sir,
255 To have so violent a stroke come to you.
The gentlewoman's a stranger; pray be counselled,
sir,
Till you hear further of her friends and portion.
FRANCISCO
'Tis only but her love that I desire;
She comes most rich in that.
PHILIPPA But be advised, though.
260 I think she's a rich heir, but see the proof, sir,
Before you make her such a generous jointure.
FRANCISCO
'Tis mine, and I will do't.
PHILIPPA She shall be yours too,
If I may rule her then.
FRANCISCO You speak all sweetness.
PHILIPPA
265 She likes your person well; I tell you so much,
But take no note I said so.
FRANCISCO Not a word.
PHILIPPA [to Ansaldo]
Come, lady, come. The gentleman's desertful,

215 Are you there, mistress? Is that what you're thinking about?

216 however whatever happened in the mean time

216-17 A good turn a favour, but possibly also with a sexual sense: 'turn' = 'bout of sex'

218-20 speechless . . . finger Violetta refers to the practice of asking a speechless dying person to respond to questions by making hand signals; the 'injury' or insult of sexual disappointment produces the most grudging forgiveness.

227 course plan of action, remedy for laughing to prevent laughing

228 undone for in trouble for the lack of

229 receipt remedy

230 sadness seriousness

233 merely solely

235 jointure 'A sole estate limited to the wife, being "a competent livelihood of freehold for the wife of lands and tenements, to take upon the death of the husband for the life of the wife at least" (Coke upon Littleton, 36b)' (OED)

241 maidenhead used of male virginity as well as female

242 out upon a phrase of rejection

250 bide endured, survived

252 continent a containing area or space; Francisco protests that there are only extreme states available to him.

253 since from then till now

254 one a person

256 stroke blow (as a metaphor for love; but it could also be used as a metaphor for fornication, of the kind which Philippa had wanted Francisco to experience in her house)

258 portion dowry

259 only but solely

265 person appearance, physical presence

267 desertful deserving

- And, o' my conscience, honest.
- ANSALDO Blame me not.
I am a maid, and fearful.
- FRANCISCO Never truth
Came perfecter from man.
- 270 PHILIPPA Give her a lip-taste,
Enter Brandino
That she herself may praise it.
[Francisco kisses Ansaldo]
- BRANDINO Yea, a match, i'faith!
[Exeunt Francisco, Ansaldo, Philippa, and Violetta]
My house is lucky for 'em.
[Enter Martino]
Now, Martino?
- MARTINO Master, the widow has the day.
- BRANDINO The day?
- MARTINO She's overthrown my youngster.
- BRANDINO Precious tidings!
Clap down four woodcocks more.
- 275 MARTINO They're all at hand, sir.
- BRANDINO What, both her adversaries too?
- MARTINO They're come, sir.
- BRANDINO Go bid the cook serve in two geese in a dish.
- MARTINO I like your conceit, master, beyond utterance. [Exit]
Enter Valeria, Ricardo, and two Suitors
- BRANDINO Welcome, sweet sister. Which is the man must have
you?
I'd welcome nobody else.
- 280 FIRST SUITOR Come to me then, sir.
- BRANDINO Are you he, faith, my chain of gold? I'm glad on't.
- VALERIA [to Ricardo]
I wonder you can have the face to follow me,
That have so prosecuted things against me.
But I ha' resolved myself, 'tis done to spite me.
- RICARDO [tearing his hair]
O dearth of truth!
- 285 SECOND SUITOR Nay, do not spoil thy hair.
Hold, hold I say. I'll get thee a widow somewhere.
- RICARDO If hand and faith be nothing for a contract,
What shall man hope?
- SECOND SUITOR 'Twas wont to be enough, honey,
When there was honest meaning amongst widows;
But since your bribes came in, 'tis not allowed
A contract without gifts to bind it fast.
Everything now must have a feeling first.—
Do I come near you, widow?
- VALERIA No, indeed, sir,
Nor ever shall, I hope.—And for your comfort, sir,
That sought all means t'entrap me for my wealth,
Had law unfortunately put you upon me
You had lost your labour, all your aim and hopes, sir.
Here stands the honest gentleman my brother
To whom I've made a deed of gift of all.
- BRANDINO Ay, that she has, i'faith. I thank her, gentlemen.
Look you here, sirs.
[He shows a writing]
- VALERIA I must not look for pleasures
That give more grief, if they prove false or fail us,
Than ever they gave joy.
- FIRST SUITOR Ha' you served me so, widow?
- SECOND SUITOR [to Ricardo]
I'm glad thou hast her not. Laugh at him, honey. Ha
Ha!
- VALERIA I must take one that loves me for myself.
Here's an old gentleman looks not after wealth
But virtue, manners, and conditions.
- FIRST SUITOR Yes, by my faith. I must have lordships too, widow.
- VALERIA How, sir?
- FIRST SUITOR Your manners, virtue, and conditions, widow,
Are pretty things within doors; I like well on 'em.
But I must have somewhat without, 'lying or being
In the tenure, or occupation,
Of Master such-a-one'—ha? Those are fine things indeed.
- VALERIA Why, sir, you swore to me it was for love.
- FIRST SUITOR True, but there's two words to a bargain ever
All the world over, and if love be one
I'm sure money's the other. 'Tis no bargain else.
Pardon me, I must dine as well as sup, widow.
- VALERIA Cry mercy, I mistook you all this while, sir.
It was this ancient gentleman, indeed,

272 house perhaps in the secondary sense
'playhouse': marriages take place with great frequency in the theatre. See 3.3.64.

274 She's overthrown she is victorious over my youngster Ricardo (as at 4.1.56)

275 Clap down set [the table] with

278 conceit idea

281 chain of gold (promised by the First Suitor at 4.1.90)

282 face nerve, gall

290 bribes (see 4.2.28)

292 feeling material base

293 Do I come near you does what I say affect you

303 served treated

307 conditions qualities of character (see 1.2.80)

308 lordships estates

312-14 'lying... such-a-one' The First Suitor talks of land in the forms of hypothetical legal documents.

316 there's... bargain The proverb 'Two words to a bargain' suggests that agreement is the essence of a bargain, but the First Suitor thinks in terms of love and money in marriage.

- Whom I crave pardon on.
- SECOND SUITOR What of me, widow? 355
- VALERIA
Alas, I have wronged you, sir. 'Twas you that swore
You loved me for myself.
- SECOND SUITOR By my troth, but I did not.
325 Come, father not your lies upon me, widow.
I, love you for yourself?—Spit at me, gentlemen,
If ever I'd such a thought.—Fetch me in, widow;
You'll find your reach too short.
- VALERIA Why, you have enough, you say.
- 330 SECOND SUITOR Ay, but I will have
My humour too; you never think of that.
They're coach-horses; they go together still.
- VALERIA
Whom should a widow trust? I'll swear 'twas one of
you
That made me believe so.—Mass, think 'twas you, sir,
Now I remember me.
- 335 RICARDO I swore too much
To be believed so little.
- VALERIA Was it you then?
Beshrew my heart for wronging of you.
- RICARDO Welcome, blessing.
Are you mine faithfully now?
- VALERIA As love can make one.
- FIRST SUITOR
340 Why, this fills the commonwealth so full of beggars,
Marrying for love—which none of mine shall do.
- VALERIA [to Ricardo]
But now I think on't, we must part again, sir.
- RICARDO
Again?
- VALERIA
You're in debt; and I, in doubt of all,
Left myself nothing too. We must not hold;
Want on both sides makes all affection cold.
345 I shall not keep you from that gentleman.
You'll be his more than mine, an when he list
He'll make you lie from me in some sour prison.
Then let him take you now for altogether, sir,
For he that's mine shall be all mine, or nothing.
- RICARDO
350 I never felt the evil of my debts
Till this afflicting minute.
- SECOND SUITOR [aside] I'll be mad
Once in my days; I have enough to cure me,
And I will have my humour. They're now but
- Desperate debts again; I ne'er look for 'em,
And ever since I knew what malice was
I always held it sweeter to sow mischief 355
Than to reap money; 'tis the finer pleasure.
I'll give him in his bonds, as 'twere in pity,
To make the match, and bring 'em both to beggary.
Then will they ne'er agree; that's a sure point. 360
He'll give her a black eye within these three days,
Beat half her teeth out by Allhallowtide,
And break the little household-stuff they have
With throwing at one another. O sweet sport!—
Come, widow, come. I'll try your honesty. 365
Here to my honey you've made many proffers;
I fear they're all but tricks.—
[He shows writings]
Here are his debts, gentlemen.
How I came by 'em, I know best myself.—
Take him before us faithfully for your husband,
And he shall tear 'em all before your face, widow. 370
- VALERIA
Else may all faith refuse me.
- SECOND SUITOR [to Ricardo] Tear 'em, honey.
'Tis firm in law, a consideration given.
[Ricardo tears the papers]
What, with thy teeth? Thou'lt shortly tear her so.
That's all my hope. Thou'dst never had 'em else.
I've enough, and I will have my humour. 375
- RICARDO
I'm now at liberty, widow.
- VALERIA I'll be so too,
And then I come to thee.—Give me this from you,
brother.
[She takes the writing from Brandino]
- BRANDINO Hold, sister, sister!
- VALERIA [to Ricardo]
Look you, the deed of gift, sir. I'm as free.
He that has me, has all—and thou art he. 380
- BOTH SUITORS
How's that?
- VALERIA You're bobbed; 'twas but a deed in trust.—
And all to prove thee, whom I have found most just.
- BRANDINO
I'm bobbed among the rest too. I'd have sworn
'T'ad been a thing for me and my heirs for ever. 385
If I'd but got it up to the black box above
It had been past redemption.
- FIRST SUITOR How am I cheated!

If ever you be sure to laugh again,

VIOLETTA Ha ha ha!
BRANDINO Speak, speak!
VIOLETTA Ha! a marriage, a marriage—I cannot tell't for

- BRANDINO
405 A marriage? Do you make that a laughing matter?
VIOLETTA
Ha! Ay, and you'll make it so, when you know all.

Here they come!
Here they come, one man married to another!

To forbear laughing now; more's my hard fortune.

THE WITCH

Edited by Marion O'Connor

A Page, a Knight, a Viscount and an Earl
Did lately marry with an English girl—
A maid, a wife, a widow, and a whore.
Whoever saw so cross a match before?

THE solution to this Jacobean riddle, of which various versions were widely circulated in manuscript, is a notorious narrative. That narrative, and the form of the riddle itself, provide a solution to many of the more puzzling features of The Witch, Middleton's drama of a maid, a wife, a widow, and a whore—plus more than one witch.

Robert Carr began his courtly progress in Edinburgh, as page to the Earl of Dunbar. Having come to England and attracted the attention of King James I, Carr was knighted in 1607, made Viscount Rochester and then Knight of the Garter in 1611, and created Earl of Somerset in 1612. At the end of 1613 he married Frances Howard, who had been married to Robert Devereux, the Earl of Essex, early in 1606. Where royal utterance was the source of three of the four names assigned Carr in the riddle, legal pronouncements account for the same proportion of hers. Her claim to be called a maid had been upheld in June of 1613 after inspection by a panel of seven of her matronly peers and two midwives, their verdict of 'virgo incorrupta' being indispensable to secure the annulment of her marriage to Essex. Pronounced on 25 September 1613, the episcopal commissioners' judgement in favour of the plaintiff was closely preceded by an event whereof the outcome would bring her and her second husband to the dock as defendants in a murder case. On 14 September 1613 Sir Thomas Overbury, whose close association with Carr had soured over the royal favourite's liaison with Howard, died in the Tower after four months' imprisonment there. Within two years, Howard's great-uncle, Henry Howard, the Earl of Northampton, died; George Villiers displaced Somerset at the centre of James's attentions; and ugly rumours were actualized as due process of law. Somerset and his Countess were accused of having procured Overbury's poisoning and eventual murder. Trial was delayed by her pregnancy (their daughter, Anne, being born early in December of 1615), and by the legal necessity of securing the conviction of their agents before prosecuting the couple as accessories before the fact. At their respective trials late in May of 1616, she pleaded guilty, while he (in the teeth of royal attempts to get him to follow his wife's lead) insisted upon his innocence. Both were convicted and condemned to death, but neither followed their agents to the block, for both received royal pardons. Her pardon came within two months, but his was not sealed until 1624. For years, then, his status as a man attainted of a felony meant that he was 'civilliter mortuus'—dead in civil law—and she was thus, in legal fiction, a widow. In fact, she predeceased him, dying in 1632 while he survived until 1645. At the time of her death, when she was probably not quite forty years old, Frances Howard Devereux Carr had been labelled whore for half her lifetime. On this label the different versions of the riddle concur: where they vary is in the abusiveness of the terms enchainned to that conclusion. The line 'A maid, a wife, a widow and a whore' in one manuscript miscellany of verse appears in another as 'A maid, a wife, a countess and a whore' and in still another as 'A wife, a witch, a murderer and a whore'.

Frances Howard's name was linked with witchcraft long before she was tried for murder. In the spring of 1613, as rumours arose of her alienation from Devereux and her association with Carr, John Chamberlain reported the latest gossip:

There was speech of a divorce to be prosecuted this term 'twixt the earl of Essex and his lady . . . but there happened an accident that hath altered the case, for she having sought out a certain wise woman had much conference with her, and she after the nature of such creatures drawing much money from her, at last cozened her of a jewel of great value, for the which being apprehended and clapped up, she accuses the Lady of divers strange questions and projects, and in conclusion that she dealt with her for the making away of her Lord (as aiming at another mark) upon which scandal and slander the Lord Chamberlain [Frances Howard's father, Thomas, Earl of Suffolk] and his friends think it not fit to proceed with the divorce. (Letter to Sir Ralph Winwood, [6 May 1613])

A 'wise wo/man' or 'cunning wo/man' being deemed equivalent to a witch in orthodox Jacobean demonology, merely to consult such a person was risky. Being rumoured to have sought such murderous and adulterous assistance as Frances Howard was said to have asked was scandalous indeed. And when the nullity proceedings got under way, the question of witchcraft came up again. The grounds on which the annulment was eventually granted were 'that the Earl of Essex, for some secret, incurable, binding impediment, did never carnally know, or was or is able carnally to know the lady Frances Howard'. The reason proposed by the Earl for his selective impotence was simply that, having once loved her, he had ceased to do so. Treatises upon witchcraft, however, offered more exotic explanations: selective impotence could be ascribed to maleficium versus hanc, an evil spell affecting a man's sexual relations with one particular woman. It was as such that the Devereux/Howard conjugal relations were debated between George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury and an opponent of the annulment, and King James I, its prime mover as well as the author of a Demonologie (1597).

While the published records of the 1613 annulment bear no trace of speculation as to the human perpetrators of the maleficium hypothesized by the King, in the published records of the 1615–16 trials Frances Howard's name is linked with witchcraft upon various victims. It was claimed that (with her agent Anne Turner, a physician's widow) the Countess had often had resort to Simon Forman 'that by force of magic, he should procure the now Earl of Somerset, then Viscount Rochester, to love her'. Mrs Turner confessed 'that Dr Savories was used in succession after Forman and practised many sorceries upon the Earl of Essex's person'. Another agent, the apothecary and druggist James Franklin, confessed even more than he was charged with: not only had he provided the seven different poisons administered to Overbury, but 'then he wrought the love between Rochester and [the countess] . . . and was to have £200 to continue their loves until the[ir] marriage'. Franklin's confession implied an excuse beyond price: the Countess, he said, 'was able to bewitch any man'. With women, however, she had been less successfully bewitching, even when abetted by the professionals: a memorandum to the King concerning the charges against Somerset included the claim 'that the countess laboured Forman and Gresham, the conjurors, to enforce the queen by witchcraft to favour the countess'.

Between this narrative and all three plots of The Witch the correspondences are startling. Notably, in the first plot to be unfolded in the course of the play, Sebastian procures from the witch a spell rendering Antonio selectively impotent in relation to Isabella. For this first plot, The Atheist's Tragedy (1611), ascribed to Cyril Tourneur, is a likely, although not an absolutely certain, source. Where the Charlemont/Castabella/Rousard relationship in The Atheist's Tragedy diverges from the Sebastian/Isabella/Antonio relationship in The Witch, the differences go in the direction of the Carr/Howard/Devereux relationship and suggest that if Middleton was indeed reshaping a plot from Tourneur's play, he was recasting it in the mould of the contemporary scandal. The express desire of Isabella for maternity and the involvement of the bride's powerful uncle in her matrimonial ventures, for example, both correspond to matters well known in the Howard/Devereux marriage and its annulment. The second plot is dominated by a figure whose name (Francisca, homophonous with Frances Carr), age (sixteen, the age of the Countess when Essex returned from France and attempted to consummate their marriage), disposition, and sexual morals link her with the popular image of Frances Howard. Francisca has a brother whose angry intervention in his sister's sexual entanglements aligns with the public quarrel (which only royal intervention stopped short of a duel) between the Countess's brother Henry and Essex. Francisca is pregnant, as the Countess both actually was when the murder trials began in the autumn of 1615, and also was rumoured to be again at the end of the following year. For this second plot of The Witch, no literary source has been identified. There is, however, a marked correspondence between some stage business assigned to Francisca and a visual image circulated of Frances. At 2.3.31–7 the character's gratuitous comments upon her own appearance require her to be contemplating herself in a mirror, a gesture most easily achieved if her costume follows the Jacobean fashion of wearing a decorated mirror as an ornament: it is in such a pose and with such a bauble that the Countess was quite recognizably represented in a broadsheet entitled Mistress Turner's Farewell to All Women (reproduced above, p. 45). The third plot—the Duchess's revenge upon her consort and her attempt to dispose of her agent—probably derives from a narrative of early Lombardy as retold, from the chronicle of Paul the Deacon, by Niccolò Machiavelli in his Florentine History, of which an English translation had been published in 1595. This narrative of ultramontane sex and skulduggery was held to be instructively like the scandal around Overbury's death: both stories figure in a Jacobean preacher's 1616 catalogue of cases proving that 'if we mark the dealings of God with murderers, it will appear that very seldom, or never, they 'scape unpunished, but by one means or other, he finds them out and meets with them, though it be by suffering them to murder themselves' (Tuke). Here again, dramatizing this exemplum from the Florentine History as the third plot in The Witch, Middleton made adjustments which improve the fit between the narrative and contemporary facts. The Duchess's resort to a witch for poison, for example, is a point which does not appear in the source but was well publicized at the Countess's trials. Such, too, is the Duchess's insistence on her own sexual propriety even as she acknowledges herself to be a murderess:

Blood I am guilty of
But not adultery, not the breach of honour.
(5.3.102–3)

The Duke's final speech, fulsomely thanking heaven for such a wife,

Who though her intent sinned, yet she makes amends
With grief and honour, virtue's noblest ends
(5.3.131–3)

corresponds to the praise which the prosecution, in the person of the Attorney General, Sir Francis Bacon, accorded the Countess (pale, tearful, and very fetching in black) for her penitence, femininity, and ancestry. The conclusion of her trial was outrageous: Lord Ellesmere, acting as Lord High Steward, virtually assured the Countess of a royal pardon with the same breath—indeed, in the middle of the same grammatical sentence—as he pronounced legal sentence of death upon her. The conclusion of The Witch is analogously outrageous: to attempt to explain all the unexpected revelations and reversals solely as tragicomic conventions, or even yet as parodies of those conventions, is to overburden generic expectations.

The contemporary references in The Witch are altogether too insistent and too elaborate to be either accidental or incidental. Middleton's dispersal of them across three plots may have ensured that no single figure or configuration would run the risk of being cited as a representation of the crimes of his social superiors. That they are nonetheless to be seen, ensemble, as just such a representation is secured by the presence of the witch of the title. It is not that the witch brings the plots together in some formal unity of the sort that twentieth-century criticism so often, and inappropriately, foisted upon Renaissance dramaturgy. The witch has no direct involvement in one plot, the second, for neither Francisca nor her partner Aberzanes has any resort to her. In the other two plots Hecate is active but finally otiose. The love-charm which she gives Almachildes to use on the waiting woman Amoretta at first appears impressively powerful: having once served its limited dramatic purpose as the occasion of an entertaining turn (sexual attraction On/Off), however, the charm works only as a dupe, misleading both Almachildes about the waiting woman and also the audience about her mistress. The poisons which the witch gives the Duchess so that Almachildes may meet 'a sudden and a subtle' death (5.2.2) turn out in the next and last scene either not to have worked or perhaps not even to have been ingested: they have been forgotten. The spell which the witch puts on Antonio does the detumescent trick all right; but then, after having gone to such lengths to preserve Isabella's virginity for his own purposes, Sebastian turns squeamish about violating it with a rape. That he subsequently gets what he wants is no thanks to the witch but rather to 'a fearful, unexpected accident' (5.3.25).

In no plot of The Witch do the activities of the witch and her coven of companions determine the outcome nor even affect the actions of the human figures. The courtiers who consult her are neither her victims nor her converts but rather simply her clients. That they are neither harmed nor corrupted by their encounters with witchcraft is a flat violation of the rules of demonology as articulated in Elizabethan and Jacobean treatises on the subject. Almachildes, for example, should be shown as sexually subjugated to the witch: she has, she lustfully gloats, 'had him thrice in incubus already' (1.2.197), an anterior relationship which ought to ensure his enthrallment. Almachildes, however, is shown to be buying her charm-making services with marzipan, an exchange which occasions no more than a few sexually innuendoed lines (1.2.220-3) and some mildly ribald stage business with a wet handkerchief. Nor does Almachildes's acceptance of the dinner to which the witch invites him and which she conjures up, complete with Cat and Fiddle, put him in any greater jeopardy than a hungry hang-over. Conspicuously ineffectual in their plot relations to the courtiers, the witch and her colleagues appear almost innocent alongside them. For all her talk of incest and infanticide, the coven is not shown to be performing anything more noxious than their aerial song and dance routine. Within the fiction of The Witch, it is in the court that vices are enacted, and it is by the courtiers that crimes are committed, with ultimate impunity.

The witch, then, proves useless within the dramatic fiction, but she nevertheless serves to point up the contemporary significance of that fiction by bringing its several strands together around a single figure, Frances Howard. The name of the witch, a name emphasized from the first of the three scenes in which she appears, is Hecate. Although she is a mortal being with only three years left to run on her 120-year lifespan (1.2.64-71), the witch bears the name of a classical divinity. It is important to notice which one, for Hecate was no simple patroness of black arts. Basing their understanding mainly on literary texts of late classical antiquity, Renaissance mythographers of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries construed Hecate as part of a trinity and usually referred to her with epithets advertising her threesomeness. In Virgil's Aeneid, for example, Dido offers pyreside prayers to assorted underworld deities, including 'three-bodied Hecate, three faces of the virgin Diana [tergeminam . . . Hecaten, tria virginis ora Dianae]' (IV.511), a line cited by Ben Jonson in his note to the lines in which his Dame addresses Hecate as 'thou three-formed star . . . to whose triple name . . . Thus we incline, once, twice and thrice the same' (The Masque of Queens, 1609). In thus requiring his witches to bow three times to a tri-form deity, Jonson gets some theatrical mileage out of an epithet so recognizably familiar that no name need be attached to it. Jonson's understanding of Hecate was available in the standard Renaissance mythographies of Natalis Comes [Natale Conti] and Vincenzo Cartari and in their English-language derivatives:

She is also called Hecate. ἐχάτων signifieth an hundred: which simple & determinate number, is put for an infinite or great number: meaning, that the Moon hath many and infinite operations in and over these inferior bodies. She had three faces, called for that Trivia, Triformis, and Tergemina. For, in heaven she is called Luna, in the woods Diana, under the earth Hecate, or Proserpina. That of these three faces, which was on the right side, was the face and head of a horse, figuring the swiftness of the Moon in ending her revolution. The left was of a dog, noting that when she hideth herself from us she is then Proserpina with her hellish hound: the middle was of a boar, signifying her jurisdiction in fields and forests. (Fraunce)

Other mythographers were less interested in the zoology of Hecate's three heads than in their solid geometry. Spatial necessity requires a three-headed goddess to be imagined as facing in three different directions:

Two views of a bronze statuette of Hecate, made in Padua c.1520.

This Hecate the ancients worshipped and adored as she that had the guard and keeping of all crossways, and such lanes as in the end concurred and conjoined themselves in one, and for that cause they depicted her with three heads . . . And it is said, that Orpheus ascribed unto her such faces, meaning to declare thereby the divers and sundry aspects which we oftentimes may discern to be in the Moon, and that her virtues and effects are powerful and working, not only in the heavens where she is called Luna, and on the earth where she is known by the name of Diana, but also extend down even to the bowels of Erebus, where she is called Hecate and Proserpina. (Lynche)

The title character of The Witch, then, has been given the name of a multiform and multivalent deity. Diana/Artemis, Luna/Selene, and Proserpina/Hecate all constitute a single goddess. Like the string of apparently incompatible names in every version of the riddle, the divine names all designate a single 'she'. The presiding presence of Hecate in The Witch brings the contemporary references together as representations of that same 'she', Frances Howard Devereux Carr, and labels her not just witch but also whore. The pronunciation of the name 'Hecate' in The Witch is disyllabic and its mere utterance carries a sexual innuendo, 'cat' being early modern slang for 'whore'. The Countess had already been more immediately insulted with the feline epithet: in at least two of the sometimes astonishingly obtuse letters which Overbury sent from the Tower to Carr, she is cited as the 'Catopard'.

At the same time, moreover, the particular name by which this triform goddess is called invokes her as the patroness of a particular aspect of female sexuality—Diana/Artemis is associated with virginity, Luna/Selene with maternity, and Proserpina/Hecate with sterility. These phases correspond to the sexual/social placement of the principal female characters in The Witch: the youthful and nubile Francisca, the newly-wed Isabella, and the mature Duchess. (Amoretta is functionally a cipher—necessary, but necessary only in relation to another character, the Duchess, whose name she shares [2.2.106] and as whose woman she is designated by the original list of dramatis personae.) Francisca, Isabella, and the Duchess form a configuration which repeats the sequence in the first version of the riddle quoted above: a maid, a wife, a widow. However, none of these ladies actually meets the terms of sexual conduct defining the social category to which she is assigned. Francisca the sixteen-year-old mother is no maiden. Isabella, promised in marriage to one man and bound in an unconsummated marriage with another, is no wife. The Duchess, having (as only the final moments of the play make clear) failed to kill her husband, is no widow. And even when she thinks the Duke to be dead, the Duchess is no figure of mourning and abstinence but rather a sexual predator. In The Witch—again as in the riddle—the maid, the wife, and the widow exist merely by sleights of language. Indeed, among the female characters in the play, only Hecate and Florida are entitled to the names by which they are known—witch and whore.

The fact that the other female characters do not meet the job descriptions for their respective titles points to the play's preoccupation with the problem of determining a woman's moral worth and her social status solely with respect to her sexual relations with men. To Anglo-American sensibilities of the twenty-first century, this is perhaps above all an issue of equity. To earlier centuries it has sometimes, and in some places, been a question of epistemology. The epistemological problem lies in the unverifiability of those all-determining relations: what are the true and certain indicators of sexual experience in women? Even witchcraft, the Jacobean definition of which centred on so private and interior an event as a secret pact between human and devil, had its relatively sure signs. Such evidence was important because the issue of witchcraft in the period was a matter not just of theological disputation but also of legal procedure; and it was primarily to the latter that Reginald Scot objected in The Discoverie of Witchcraft (1584), Middleton's principal source for his witch scenes. The devil was believed to leave his marks upon his follower's body and/or to desensitize patches of it: once discovered and tested, such marks and patches constituted presumptive evidence of the diabolical pact hypothesized as their cause. But objective evidence of sexual activity was harder to secure. Sexual activity does not always leave its marks upon a female body; and even when it does, such marks can sometimes be concealed. Francisca manages to hide a pregnancy, and Frances Howard was thought to have faked a virginity test. Furthermore, and more unsettlingly, male observation of females for signs of sexual activity is subject to Heisenberg's uncertainty principle, the conditions of observation affecting the data. Faced with both Florida the experienced courtesan and Gaspero the obliging (nudge-wink) manservant, Sebastian evinces less confidence in his own accuracy as judge of the woman than of the man:

I know that face
To be a strumpet's, or mine eye is envious

And would fain wish it so where I would have it.
I fail if the condition of this fellow
Wears not about it a strong scent of baseness.
(3.2.15–19)

The Witch was probably written in the middle of 1616, after the convictions of Frances Howard and Robert Carr for their parts in the murder of Thomas Overbury and amid other coded outcries against the King's protection of the couple from the full penalty of the law. Middleton's text survives in a single manuscript which a professional scrivener prepared some imprecisely 'long' time after the play was presented in, conjecturally, the latter months of 1616 and some time before Middleton died in 1627. It was not printed during Middleton's lifetime, nor for another century and a half thereafter. So topical a dramatic text has a short theatrical shelf-life. The stage history of The Witch begins in a cloud of ambiguity and promptly disappears into a void. No professional production is known to have occurred subsequent to its first performance(s), of which tantalizingly little is known. The manuscript subtitles The Witch as having been 'long since acted by his Majesty's Servants at the Blackfriars'. The spectacular staging needs of the witch scenes would have been particularly well served by the theatrical resources which the King's Men commanded at the Blackfriars. Middleton's dedicatory epistle, however, clearly indicates that the play had in some sense failed: 'I have...recovered into my hands (though not without much difficulty) this (ignorantly-ill-fated) labour of mine.' The parentheses tease. What difficulty beset Middleton's recovery of his dramatic labour? It is unclear whether the ill fate was a matter of theatrical failure or of political suppression, and it is correspondingly unclear whether unappreciative audiences are being accused of ignorance or Middleton is (implausibly and belatedly) excusing himself on grounds of ignorance. His next sentence, however, hints at the latter alternatives: 'Witches are (ipso facto) by the law condemned, & that only (I think) hath made her lie so long in an imprisoned obscurity.' The organizing conceit of this dedication, the verbal elision between a text entitled The Witch and a woman labelled a witch, points the reader back to the realm of riddles.

Epistle *To the truly worthy and generously affected
Thomas Holmes, Esquire*

Noble Sir,

As a true testimony of my ready inclination to your service, I have (merely upon a taste of your desire) recovered into my hands (though not without much difficulty) this 5 (ignorantly ill-fated) labour of mine. Witches are (ipso facto) by the law condemned, and that only (I think) hath made her lie so long in an imprisoned obscurity. For your sake alone she hath thus far conjured herself abroad and bears no other charms about her but what may tend to 10 your recreation, nor no other spell but to possess you with a belief that as she, so he that first taught her to enchant, will always be

Your devoted Tho: Middleton.

[Incipit] Actus Primus
Enter Sebastian and Fernando

I.I

SEBASTIAN

My three years spent in war has now undone
My peace for ever.

FERNANDO Good, be patient, sir.

SEBASTIAN

She is my wife by contract before heaven
And all the angels, sir.

FERNANDO

I do believe you,
But where's the remedy now? You see she's gone:
5 Another has possession.

SEBASTIAN

There's the torment.

FERNANDO

This day, being the first of your return,
Unluckily proves the first too of her fast'ning.

This commentary devotes particular attention to Middleton's sources, especially in relation to witchcraft.

Epistle.5-6 Witches...condemned Under a 1563 statute (5 Eliz.I.c.16), first convictions of witchcraft carried the death penalty only when the criminal had caused another's death. However, a 1604 statute (1 Jac.I.c.12) both extended the definition of witchcraft to cover activities (such as graverobbing) ignored by the Elizabethan statute and also lowered the level of damage which carried the death penalty even for first convictions.

I.I.3-4 wife...angels Sebastian and Isabella have exchanged marriage vows without public ceremony and sacerdotal supervision. Such contracts were forbidden but also recognized as morally and legally binding. See 4.2.3-20, where it is also revealed that Fernando had been a witness to the lovers' exchange of vows.

Her uncle, sir, the Governor of Ravenna,
 Holding a good opinion of the bridegroom,
 As he's fair-spoken, sir, and wondrous mild—
 SEBASTIAN
 There goes the devil in a sheepskin!
 FERNANDO —with all speed
 Clapped it up suddenly. I cannot think, sure,
 That the maid over-loves him; though, being married 15 Perhaps (for her own credit) now she intends Performance of an honest duteous wife.
 SEBASTIAN
 Sir, I've a world of business. Question nothing:
 You will but lose your labour. 'Tis not fit
 For any—hardly mine own secrecy—
 20 To know what I intend. I take my leave, sir.
 I find such strange employments in myself
 That unless death pity me and lay me down,
 I shall not sleep these seven years: that's the least, sir.
 Exit
 FERNANDO
 That sorrow's dangerous can abide no counsel:
 'Tis like a wound past cure. Wrongs done to love Strike the heart deeply: none can truly judge on't
 But the poor sensible sufferer, whom it racks
 With unbelieved pains which men in health
 That enjoy love, not possibly can act—
 30 Nay, not so much as think. In troth I pity him!
 His sighs drink life blood in this time of feasting.
 [Noises off]
 A banquet towards too? Not yet hath riot Played out her last scene? At such entertainments still Forgetfulness obeys and surfeit governs.
 35 Here's marriage sweetly honoured in gorged stomachs
 And overflowing cups.
 Enter Gaspero and Servant
 GASPERO Where is she, sirrah?
 SERVANT Not far off.

Prithee, where? Go fetch her hither.
 [Exit Servant]
 [Aside] I'll rid him away straight. [To Fernando] The Duke's now risen, sir.
 FERNANDO
 I am a joyful man to hear it, sir.
 It seems he's drunk the less, though I think he
 That has the least, he's certainly enough. Exit 40
 GASPERO
 I have observed this fellow all the feast time.
 He hath not pledged one cup but looked most wickedly
 Upon good malaga, flies to the black jack still
 And sticks to small drink like a water rat. 45
 Enter Florida
 O, here she comes. Alas, the poor whore weeps!
 'Tis not for grace now: all the world must judge.
 It is for spleen and madness 'gainst this marriage.
 I do but think how she could beat the vicar now,
 Scratch the man horribly that gave the woman, 50
 The woman worst of all, if she durst do it.—
 Why, how now, mistress, this weeping needs not, for though
 My master marry for his reputation,
 He means to keep you too.
 FLORIDA How, sir?
 GASPERO He doth indeed.
 He swore't to me last night. Are you so simple 55
 —And have been five years traded—as to think
 One woman would serve him? Fie, not an empress!
 Why, he'll be sick o'th' wife within ten nights,
 Or never trust my judgement.
 FLORIDA Will he, think'st thou?
 GASPERO Will he?
 FLORIDA I find thee still so comfortable! 60
 Beshrew my heart, if I knew how to miss thee!

cue it and also heralds the approach of the wedding party.
 riot debauchery, extravagance
 34 surfeit excessive indulgence in food and drink
 36 sirrah term of address used to men or boys expressing contempt, reprimand or assumption of authority on the part of its speaker
 42 fellow Having swiftly realized his intention (announced at l. 38) to clear the scene of Fernando, Gaspero proceeds to refer to him, a social superior whom in person he addresses as 'Sir', as 'fellow'. The condescension of the reference continues Gaspero's self-characterization as manipulative and impudent.
 43 pledged toasted

for the southern port of Malaga, which exported it 45 black jack tarred leather jug for beer
 45 small weak, low in alcohol
 46-7 weeps... not for grace At her first entrance in tears of chagrin, Florida is mockingly contrasted with the New Testament woman of ill repute (Luke 7:36-50) whose tears were the visible signs of her repentance and divine grace.
 54 keep maintain for bedservice. The cost of maintaining Florida is given by Gaspero at 2.1.21.
 56 traded i.e., as a prostitute
 60 comfortable comforting, giving of solace. (The comfort which Florida here evokes, like the 'kindness' which she proceeds to invite in l. 61, is sexual.)

 shortly.
 They take but rooms for summer and away they

 And commonly they're well booted for all seasons.
Enter Almachildes and Amoretta
 But, peace! No more! The guests are coming in.
 ALMACHILDES
 The fates have blessed me: have I met you privately?
 AMORETTA
 Why, sir? Why, Almachildes?
 ALMACHILDES Not a kiss.
 AMORETTA
 I'll call aloud, i'faith.
 ALMACHILDES I'll stop your mouth.
 AMORETTA
 80 Upon my love to reputation,
 I'll tell the Duchess once more.

ALMACHILDES 'Tis the way
 To make her laugh a little.
 AMORETTA She'll not think
 That you dare use a maid of honour thus.
 ALMACHILDES

 And Geneva cast thee up again like she that sunk

 AMORETTA
 Ay, these are the holy fruits of the sweet vine, sir.

 ALMACHILDES
 Sweet venery be with thee, and I at the tail
 Of my wish! I am a little headstrong, and so
 Are most of the company. I will to the witches.
 90 They say they have charms and tricks to make
 A wench fall backwards, and lead a man herself
 To a country-house some mile out of the town,
 Like a fire-drake: there be such whoreson kind girls
 And such bawdy witches, and I'll try conclusions.

 Governor, Antonio, Isabella and Francisca [with

 DUKE
 A banquet yet? Why surely, my Lord Governor,
 Bacchus could never boast of a day till now

 66 ven'son venison, table meat from wild animal (usually deer) killed by hunting

 84–5 Amsterdam... Geneva centres of radical Protestantism, these Continental cities gave refuge to successive generations of English religious exiles 85–6 she that... Queenhithe Queen Elinor, wife of King Edward I. Legend held this to have been the punishment she brought upon herself by falsely swearing her innocence of a murder which she had committed. In linking the geography of this legend with Amsterdam and Geneva, Almachildes implies the usual anti-Puritan accusation of moral hypocrisy.

 88–9 Sweet... wish Almachildes wishes sexual pleasure for Amoretta, and then a share in that pleasure for himself.
 89 headstrong drunk
 90 I will to the witches The first mention of witches in the play both associates them with illicit sexual activity and also coincides with the first appearance of the court party.

 99–104 Sir, you've done nobly... 'tis rightly To the Duchess's interpretation of his magnificence as a compliment to his niece, the Lord Governor replies that it is to be construed as a tribute to goodness and to the Duchess herself. Their exchange of courtly compliments is harshly terminated by the Duke's mid-line announcement of his barbaric business with the skull-cup.

Act I Scene I

The witch

In honour of the bride, your virtuous niece.
 LORD GOVERNOR
 In love to goodness, and your presence, madam!
 So understood, 'tis rightly.
 DUKE Now will I
 Have a strange health after all these.
 105 LORD GOVERNOR What's that, my lord?
 DUKE A health in a strange cup; and't shall go round.
 LORD GOVERNOR
 Your grace need not doubt that, sir, having seen
 So many pledged already. This fair company Cannot shrink now for one, so it end there.
 DUKE
 It shall, for all ends here:
 [He produces a skull set as a cup]
 110 here's a full period.
 LORD GOVERNOR
 A skull, my lord?
 DUKE Call it a soldier's cup, man.
 LORD GOVERNOR
 Fie, how you fright the women!
 DUKE I have sworn
 It shall go round, excepting only you, sir,
 For your late sickness, and the bride herself,
 Whose health it is.
 [He drinks]
 115 ISABELLA Marry, I thank heaven for that.
 DUKE
 Our duchess, I know, will pledge too, though the cup
 Was once her father's head, which, as a trophy,
 We'll keep till death, in memory of that conquest.
 He was the greatest foe our steel e'er struck at,
 120 And he was bravely slain. Then took we thee
 Into our bosom's love. Thou madest the peace
 For all thy country, thou, that beauty did.
 We're dearer than a father, are we not?
 DUCHESS
 Yes, sir, by much.
 DUKE And we shall find that straight.
 ANTONIO
 125 That's an ill bride-cup for a marriage-day.
 I do not like the fate on't.

LORD GOVERNOR Good my lord,
 The duchess looks pale. Let her not pledge you there.
 DUKE Pale?
 DUCHESS
 Sir, not I!
 [She takes the cup and drinks]
 DUKE See how your lordship fails now.
 The rose's not fresher, nor the sun at rising
 More comfortably pleasing.
 DUCHESS [To Antonio] Sir, to you, 130
 The lord of this day's honour.
 [She presents cup to him]
 ANTONIO All first moving
 From your grace, madam, and the duke's great favour!
 [He drinks]
 Sister, it must.
 [He presents cup to Francisca]
 FRANCISCA [aside]
 This's the worst fright that could come
 To a concealed great belly. I'm with child,
 And this will bring it out, or make me come 135
 Some seven weeks sooner than we maidens reckon.
 [She drinks, then presents cup to Almachildes]
 DUCHESS [aside]
 Did ever cruel, barbarous act match this?
 Twice hath his surfeits brought my father's memory
 Thus spitefully and scornfully to mine eyes,
 And I'll endure't no more. 'Tis in my heart since: 140
 I'll be revenged, as far as death can lead me.
 ALMACHILDES
 Am I the last man, then? I may deserve
 To be first one day.
 [He drinks]
 LORD GOVERNOR Sir, it's gone round now.
 DUKE
 The round? An excellent way to train up soldiers.
 Where's bride and bridegroom?
 ANTONIO At your happy service. 145
 DUKE
 A boy tonight at least: I charge you look to't,
 Or I'll renounce you for industrious subjects.

1.2 Enter Hecate with properties and habits fitting [including a baby, serpents and snakes]

HECATE
Titty and Tiffin, Suckin
And Pidgin, Liard and Robin!
White spirits, black spirits, grey spirits, red spirits!
Devil-toad, devil-ram, devil-cat and devil-dam!
5 Why, Hoppo and Stadlin, Hellwain and Puckle?
STADLIN [within]
Here, sweating at the vessel.

HECATE Boil it well.

HOPPO [within]
It gallops now.

HECATE Are the flames blue enough
Or shall I use a little seeton more?

STADLIN [within]
The nips of fairies upon maids' white hips
Are not more perfect azure.

HECATE Tend it carefully.
Send Stadlin to me with a brazen dish
That I may fall to work upon these serpents
And squeeze 'em ready for the second hour.
Why, when?

[Enter Stadlin with brass dish]

STADLIN Here's Stadlin, and the dish.

HECATE [handing over baby]
There, take this unbaptized brat.

149 tossed pike brandished (a) weapon of the ordinary infantryman (b) penis. Silent since the middle of the scene, Gaspero closes it with a sneer at the military and sexual competence of his master Antonio, who has just complimented the Duke on the same points of machismo.

1.2.0.1 properties...fitting Some indication of what constituted 'properties and habits fitting' for witches on a Jacobean stage can be found in Ben Jonson's account of the anti-masque of eleven witches in his 1609 Masque of Queens. They were, he writes, 'all differently attired: some with rats on their head, some on their shoulders; others with ointment pots at their girdles; all with spindles, timbrels, rattles or other venefical instruments, making a confused noise, with strange gestures. The device of their attire was Master [Inigo] Jones his... Only I prescribed them their properties of vipers, snakes, bones, herbs, roots and other ensigns of their magic, out of the authority of ancient and late writers.'

0.2 [including...snakes] The dialogue requires Hecate, at this her first appearance in The Witch, to be equipped with serpents (l. 12) and a human infant (l. 15). The baby is quickly handed over to Stadlin and carried offstage (a transfer which anticipates the disposal of Aberzanes and Francisca's offspring at 2.3.1-4). The serpents are squeezed into the brazen dish which the dialogue requires Stadlin to bring on at l. 14 and Firestone to carry off at l. 101. (See Hecate's instructions to Firestone at ll. 63, 78, and 99.) Their skins remain onstage until Sebastian removes them at l. 178. Middleton's deft care in deploying these stage properties is a pointer to their importance. Within the iconographical language available to his dramaturgy, snakes and serpents tend to be encoded with wickedness. For important example, in Cesare Ripa's Iconologia (1593), the standard Renaissance handbook devoted to the iconography of moral concepts, snakes generally appear as the appurtenances of the more extreme moral evils—heresy, sin (in general), false religion, and enmity to God.

1-4 Titty...devil-dam Hecate's first lines in the play come from Chapter 33 of A Discourse of diuels and spirits which Reginald Scot appended to The Discoverie of Witchcraft (1584): 'Now, how Brian Darcy's he spirits and she spirits, Titty and Tiffin, Suckin and Pidgin, Liard and Robin, &c: his white spirits and black spirits, grey spirits and red spirits, devil toad and devil lamb, devil's cat and devil's dam... can stand consonant with the word of GOD... , let heaven and earth judge. In the mean time, let any man with good consideration peruse that book published by W.W....' The title of the book published by W.W. (in 1582) is A true and just Record of the Information, Examination and Confession of all the witches, taken at S. Oses in the county of Essex. This account, and the St Osyth witchhunt which it records, were principally the work of an Essex Justice of the Peace, Brian Darcy. Scot, who personally observed some of the St Osyth trials, evidently (and rightly) despised Darcy's investigative methods and juridical proceedings as grotesque violations of due process of law. The book published by W.W. parades detail after detail of Darcy's findings: particularly preoccupied with witches' familiars, he records the name, species, colour, sex, and maleficent activity of each familiar that he can discover, and finally he even tabulates the data by accused witch. Thus, 'Ursley Kemp had four spirits, their names Titty a he like a grey Cat, Jack a he like a black Cat, Pidgin a she, like a black Toad, and Tiffin a she, like a white Lamb. The he's were to plague to death and the she's to punish with bodily harm, and to destroy cattle.'

4 Devil-toad, devil-ram, devil-cat venefical familiars devil-dam proverbial (Tilley D225)

5 Hoppo and Stadlin Middleton's source for these names was probably another passage from The Discoverie of Witchcraft in which Scot contemptuously reports the findings of witch-hunters: 'It is constantly affirmed [by James Sprenger and Heinrich Kremer] in M[alleus] Mal[ificarum] [1486] that Stafus... had a disciple called Hoppo, who made Stadlin witch, and could all when they list invisibly transfer the third part of their neighbours' dung, hay, corn, etcetera, into their own ground, make hail, tempests, and floods, with thunder and lightning, and kill children, cattle, etcetera, reveal things hidden, and many other tricks' (xii, 5).

Hellwain and Puckle Both names appear in the incantation which Middleton fillets from Scot and assigns to Hecate at 1.2.102-6. (See note below.)

6 vessel cauldron

7 gallops boils (the earliest occurrence recorded for this sense by OED)

8 seeton This substance has yet to be identified.

13 the second hour the witching hour, when the moon rises and witches take to the sky. See also 1.2.34. With advance preparations for the witches' flight under way throughout this scene, audience expectations are thereby heightened for their next, and more spectacular, appearance onstage.

15-18 unbaptized...air In The Discoverie of Witchcraft (iii, 1), Scot summarizes demonologists' accounts of the susceptibility of unchristened babies to being snatched, alive or dead, by witches for use in transvection ointments: 'if there be any children unbaptized... then the

Of the thickest whereof they make ointments, whereby they ride in the aire.' The sixth of the eleven hags who comprise the coven in Jonson's Masque of Queens boasts of having 'Killed an infant to have his fat' (163).

- 20 pricks... stops small marks of punctuation
 23 leek like (archaic)
 24 russet reddish-brown
 25-8 we feast... enjoy him After the second of the recipes which are quoted below (note to I.2.37-42) from Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft (x, 8), comes an account of the effects perceived by users of transvection ointment: 'By this means... in a moonlight night they seem to be carried in the aire, to feasting, singing, dancing, kissing, culling, and other acts of venery, with such youths as they love and desire most'.
 26 coll hug, fondle in the arms use every thing (a) copulate with everything (b) engage in those 'other acts of venery' which Scot (as quoted above in the note to I.2.25-8) leaves to the imagination 28 incubus devil (or witch) disguised in a(nother) corporeal form in order to engage in sexual intercourse with a human being. Strict demonological usage distinguishes 'incubus' (disguise as male partner, assumed to be active and prone) from 'succubus' (disguise as female partner, assumed to be passive and supine). In Zacharie Jones's 1605 translation of part of Pierre Le Loyer's Livre des Spectres, incubi are defined as: 'a kind of Deuils, or Spirits, in the form of men, whose delight is in lasciviousness, and are as wanton and lecherous as Goats... And their nature is... to desire to ravish and force women, and in the night time to go into their bed, and to oppress them, striving to have carnal company with them. The like do those Spirits which are called Succubs, which are devils passive, as the former active, and taking the form of women, do seek to enjoy their pleasure of men.'

- 30 Whelpley's Denoting a south-east Wiltshire village which has vanished since the seventeenth century, the place-name still connotes both the contempt of the speaker and the age and inclinations of her victim.
 31 black cloak, lined with yellow The gratuitous precision of this detail of reported costume invites interpretation. While colour conventions (linking black to evil and yellow to love) provide one possibility, it is more probably a reference to Anne Turner. At her execution for the murder of Thomas Overbury, she wore black, as did the executioner; and both (at the macabre command of Lord Chief Justice Coke) also wore linen/lace treated with the yellow starch which she had made fashionable.
 33 mounting (a) aerially, in flight with the coven (b) sexually, as an incubus
 37-42 eleoselinum... oleum Save for the pungent reminder of the effects of soot, this list comes verbatim from two different recipes for transvection ointment which Scot reports in The Discoverie of Witchcraft (x, 8):

Rx. The fat of young children, and seeth it with water in a brazen vessel, reserving the thickest of that which remaineth boiled in the bottom, which they lay up and keep, until occasion serveth to use it. They put hereunto Eleoselinum, Aconitum, Frondes populeas, and Soot.

I knew him by his black cloak, lined with yellow.
 I think thou'st spoiled the youth: he's but seventeen.
 I'll have him the next mounting. Away, in!
 Go feed the vessel for the second hour.

- STADLIN Where be the magical herbs?
 HEcate They're down his throat, 35
 His mouth crammed full, his ears and nostrils stuffed.
 I thrust in eleoselinum lately,
Aconitum, frondes populeas, and soot—
 You may see that, he looks so black i'th' mouth—
 Then sium, acorum vulgare too, 40
Pentaphyllon, the blood of a flitter-mouse,
Solanum somniferum et oleum.

STADLIN Then there's all, Hecate?
 HEcate Is the heart of wax

Another recipe to the same purpose.

Rx. Sium, acorum vulgare, pentaphyllon, the blood of a flittermouse, solanum somniferum, & oleum. They stamp all these together, and then they rub all parts of their bodies exceedingly, till they look red, and be very hot, so as the pores may be opened, and their flesh soluble and loose. They join herewithal either fat, or oil instead thereof, that the force of the ointment may the rather pierce inwardly, and so be more effectual.

- 37 eleoselinum smallage, a wild species of parsley
 38 Aconitum genus of poison plant, of which the common European species is popularly known as 'wolfs bane' or 'monkshood'
frondes populeas poplar leaves 40 sium sion, an aquatic plant, formerly also known as 'bellrags' and 'laver' acorum vulgare a kind of reed, the root of which was used medicinally 41 Pentaphyllon cinquefoil, so called because the leaves of this genus of plant are composed of five leaflets flitter-mouse bat
 42 Solanum somniferum deadly (or sleeping) nightshade et oleum 'and oil': where the first of the recipes quoted above begins with the fat of young children, the second does not specify what sort of fat or oil is to be used to bind the ointment 43-4 heart of wax... needles In The Discoverie of Witchcraft (xii, 16) Scot gives various versions of 'A charme teaching how to hurt whom you list with images of wax, &c.' and tells of a recent Kentish case involving a fraudulent accusation, complete with fabricated evidence, of witchcraft wrought by means of a wax heart stuck full of needles.

Stuck full of magic needles?
 STADLIN 'Tis done, Hecate.
 HECCATE
 45 And is the farmer's picture, and his wife's,
 Laid down to th' fire yet?
 STADLIN They're a-roasting, both, too.
 [Exit Stadlin, with baby]
 HECCATE Good:
 Then their marrows are a-melting subtly
 And three months' sickness sucks up life in 'em.
 They denied me often flour, barm and milk,
 Goose-grease and tar, when I ne'er hurt their charm-
 50 ings,
 Their brewlocks, nor their batches, nor forespoke
 Any of their breedings.
 [Squeezing snakes and serpents into brass dish, she sets aside their skins]
 Now I'll be meet with 'em.
 Seven of their young pigs I've bewitched already
 Of the last litter, nine ducklings, thirteen goslings, 55 And a hog fell lame last Sunday after evensong too.
 And mark how their sheep prosper, or what sope
 Each milk-kine gives to th' pail. I'll send those snakes Shall milk 'em all beforehand: the dew'd-skirted dairy-
 wenches
 Shall stroke dry drugs for this, and go home cursing.
 60 I'll mar their syllabubs, and frothy feastings
 Under cows' bellies with the parish youths.
 Where's Firestone? Our son Firestone?
 Enter Firestone
 FIRESTONE Here am I, mother.
 HECCATE
 Take in this brazen dish full of dear ware.
 Thou shalt have all when I die, and that will be

E'en just at twelve o'clock at night, come three year. 65
 FIRESTONE And may you not have one o'clock into th' dozen, mother?
 HECCATE No.
 FIRESTONE Your spirits are then more unconscionable than 70 bakers. You'll have lived then, mother, six-score years to the hundred; and methinks after six-score years, the devil might give you a cast, for he's a fruiterer too, and has been from the beginning: the first apple that e'er was eaten came through his fingers. The 75 costermonger's, then, I hold to be the ancientest trade, though some would have the tailor pricked down before him.
 HECCATE
 Go, and take heed you shed not by the way!
 The hour must have her portion. 'Tis dear syrup:
 Each charmed drop is able to confound
 80 A family consisting of nineteen
 Or one-and-twenty feeders.
 FIRESTONE Marry, here's stuff indeed!
 [Aside] 'Dear syrup', call you it? A little thing
 Would make me give you a dram on't, in a posset,
 And cut you three years shorter.
 HECCATE Thou'rt now 85
 About some villainy?
 FIRESTONE Not I, forsooth.
 [Aside] Truly the devil's in her, I think! How one villainy smells out another straight! There's no knavery but is nosed like a dog, and can smell out a dog's meaning. [To Hecate] Mother, I pray give me leave to ramble abroad 90 tonight, with the nightmare, for I have a great mind to overlay a fat parson's daughter.
 HECCATE
 And who shall lie with me, then?

49–52 They denied . . . breedings Most of the lurid activities which Hecate claims for herself ultimately derive, via Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft, from Continental demonological treatises. The narrative of petty crime and retribution in this speech, however, is closer to contemporary English pamphlets reporting particular cases of witchcraft in provincial communities. Hecate bears a grudge because her begging for basic foodstuffs had been refused on a farm where she had not previously meddled with the butter-making, brewing, baking, and breeding. Essential to rural economy, these processes abounded in occasions of error: when things went wrong, accusations of witchcraft offered an explanation of natural disaster as well as a venting of emotions onto liminal figures whose survival depended on communal charity.
 49 barm yeast
 50 charmings variant form of 'churnings'
 51 brewlocks brewings. (The second syllable is a rare survival, one not noted in the OED, of an Anglo-Saxon suffix meaning 'activity'. More technical glosses have been suggested but context demands the general sense.)

 56 sope small amount of drink
 57 milk-kine milk-cow
 63 dear ware precious product—i.e., the venom or juice of those serpents upon which the speaker undertook (at 1.2.12–14) to 'fall to work . . . and squeeze 'em ready for the second hour'.
 69 unconscionable extortionate, harsh
 70 six-score 120: Hecate is therefore 117 years old. At 1.2.32 the Mayor of Whelpley's son was reported to have been 17, while at 2.1.121 it will be said that Francisca has not yet attained that age.
 71 to the hundred Firestone implies that Hecate has been living on borrowed time since her 100th birthday.
 72 cast chance, playing on faint homophony with 'cost[ard]' (apple)
 72–4 he's a fruiterer . . . fingers In the Old Testament (Genesis 2 and 3), a serpent successfully tempts Eve (and through her, Adam) to disobey God's command not to eat the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. Christian exegetical tradition has always construed the serpent as the devil; and iconographic convention has long represented the fruit as an apple.

 75 costermonger's a costermonger is a fruiterer or apple seller; often used contemptuously
 76 pricked down play on several senses of 'prick': (a) mark, tick (b) awl, bodkin (c) penis
 78 shed spill (the serpent venom imagined to be the contents of the brazen vessel)
 79 her portion the part allotted to it
 83–4 A little . . . make me It wouldn't take much to make me
 91 nightmare spirit or monster supposed to settle on people when they are asleep at night, and produce a sense of suffocation by its weight. Nightmare is to nocturnal terror as incubus or succubus is to nocturnal pleasure.

145 Blast vineyards, orchards, meadows, or in one night
Transport his dung, hay, corn, by ricks, whole stacks,
Into thine own ground.

SEBASTIAN This would come most richly now
To many a country grazier; but my envy
Lies not so low as cattle, corn or vines.
'Twill trouble your best powers to give me ease.

HECATE
150 Is it to starve up generation?
To strike a barrenness in man or woman?

SEBASTIAN Hah?

HECATE
'Hah?! Did you feel me there? I knew your grief.

SEBASTIAN
Can there be such things done?

HECATE Are these the skins
Of serpents? These of snakes?
[She produces them]

SEBASTIAN I see they are.

HECATE
155 So sure into what house these are conveyed,
Knit with these charmèd and retentive knots,
Neither the man begets nor woman breeds,
No, nor performs the least desires of wedlock
Being then a mutual duty. I could give thee 160 Chirocineta, adincantida,
Archimèdon, marmaritin, calicia,
Which I could sort to villainous barren ends
But this leads the same way. More I could instance—
As the same needles thrust into their pillows
165 That sews and socks up dead men in their sheets,
A privy gristle of a man that hangs
After sunset—good, excellent. Yet all's there, sir.
[She gives him the skins]

SEBASTIAN
You could not do a man that special kindness
To part 'em utterly now? Could you do that?

HECATE
No. Time must do't. We cannot disjoin wedlock: 170
'Tis of heaven's fast'ning. Well may we raise jars, Jealousies, strifes and heart-burning disagreements,
Like a thick scurf o'er life, as did our master
Upon that patient miracle; but the work itself
Our power cannot disjoint.

SEBASTIAN I depart happy 175
In what I have, then, being constrained to this,
And grant, you greater powers that dispose men,
That I may never need this hag again.

Exit [with skins]

HECATE
I know he loves me not, nor there's no hope on't. 180
'Tis for the love of mischief I do this;
And that we're sworn to—the first oath we take.
[Enter Firestone]

FIRESTONE
O, mother, mother!

HECATE What's the news with thee now?

FIRESTONE There's the bravest young gentleman within, and the finest drunk. I thought he would have fall'n 185 into the vessel! He stumbled at a pipkin of child's grease, reeled against Stadlin, overthrew her, and in the tumbling cast struck up old Puckle's heels with her clothes over her ears.

HECATE Hey-day!

FIRESTONE I was fain to throw the cat upon her to save her 190 honesty, and all little enough. I cried out still, 'I pray, be covered!'
See where he comes now, mother!
Enter Almachildes

ALMACHILDES Call you these witches?
They be tumblers, methinks, very flat tumblers.

HECATE [Aside]
'Tis Almachildes! Fresh blood stirs in me— 195
The man that I have lusted to enjoy!

147 grazier one who feeds cattle for the market

153-4 Are these...snakes? Here, as later with the Duchess at 5.2.13-32, Hecate dismisses doubts by posing a rhetorical question and then overwhelming her client with a parade of claims as extreme as they are derivative.

159-61 I could give thee...calicia The menu is a classical one derived from Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft (vi, 3): 'Pythagoras and Democritus give us the names of a great many magical herbs and stones, whereof now, both the virtue, and the things themselves also are unknown: as Marmaritin, whereby spirits might be raised: Archimèdon, which would make one bewray in his sleep, all the secrets in his heart: Adincantida, Calicia,...Chirocineta, &c: which had all their several virtues, or rather poisons. But all these now are worn out of knowledge: marry in their stead we have hog's turd and chervil, as the only thing whereby our witches worke miracles.'

163-7 More...sunset For this part of Hecate's self-advertisement to Sebastian and again for her exchange with Firestone at 1.2.205-10, Middleton uses items from a catalogue in Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft (vi, 7): 'The toys which are said to procure love... are these: the hair growing in the nethermost part of a wolf's tail, a wolf's yard [= penis], a little fish called Remora, the brain of a cat, of a newt, or of a lizard: the bone of a green frog, the flesh thereof being consumed with pismires or ants;... the garments of the dead, candles that burn before a dead corpse, and needles wherewith dead bodies are sewn or socked into their sheets: and diverse other things, which for the reverence of the reader, and in respect of the unclean speech to be used in the description thereof, I omit.'

173-4 Like...miracle alluding to one of the diabolically inflicted (but divinely authorized) sufferings of Job. In The Discoverie of Witchcraft (v, 8) Scot pays extended attention to this Old Testament narrative.

185 pipkin small earthenware pot or pan, used chiefly in cookery

185-6 child's grease See note to 1.2.5.

187 tumbling cast somersault

189 Hey-day an exclamation denoting gaiety

194 flat tumblers (a) incompetent acrobats (b) downright muddlers. There is a sexual innuendo on 'tumblers'.

- I have had him thrice in incubus already.
 ALMACHILDES
 Is your name Goody Hag?
 HECATE 'Tis anything.
 Call me the horrid'st and unhallowed'st things
 200 That life and nature trembles at, for thee
 I'll be the same. Thou com'st for a love-charm now?
 ALMACHILDES
 Why, thou'rt a witch, I think.
 HECATE Thou shalt have choice
 Of twenty, wet or dry.
 ALMACHILDES Nay, let's have dry ones.
 HECATE
 If thou wilt use't by way of cup and potion,
 205 I'll give thee a remora shall bewitch her straight.
 ALMACHILDES
 A remora? What's that?
 HECATE A little suckstone:
 Some call it a sea-lamprey, a small fish.
 ALMACHILDES And must't be buttered?
 HECATE
 The bones of a green frog, too—wondrous precious, 210 The flesh consumed by pismires.
 ALMACHILDES Pismires? Give me a chamber-pot.
 FIRESTONE [aside]
 You shall see him go nigh to be so unmannerly,
 He'll make water before my mother, anon.
 ALMACHILDES
 And now you talk of frogs, I have somewhat here.
 215 I come not empty-pocketed from a banquet:
 I learned that of my haberdasher's wife.
 [Pulling a wet handkerchief from his pocket, he unfolds it to reveal the contents]
 Look, Goody Witch, there's a toad in marzipan for
 you.
 HECATE
 O sir, you've fitted me!
 ALMACHILDES And here's a spawn or two
 Of the same paddock-brood too, for your son.
 FIRESTONE
 I thank your worship, sir. How comes your 220 handkerchief
- So sweetly thus berayed? Sure, 'tis wet sucket, sir!
 ALMACHILDES
 'Tis nothing but the syrup the toad spit.
 Take all, I pray thee.
 HECATE This was kindly done, sir,
 And you shall sup with me tonight for this.
 ALMACHILDES
 How? Sup with thee? Dost think I'll eat fried rats 225 And pickled spiders?
 HECATE No, I can command, sir,
 The best meat i'th' whole province for my friends,
 And reverently served in, too.
 ALMACHILDES How?
 HECATE In good fashion.
 ALMACHILDES
 Let me but see that, and I'll sup with you.
 She conjures, and enter [Malkin,] a Cat (*playing to the devil! Well, I'll even in and see how he eats, and I'll be hanged if I be not the fatter of the twain with

 To cause that discontent. I was wont to know all

 Without those parts of manhood—trust and service.
 ANTONIO
 I will not tell thee this.

198 Goody Goodwife. This polite title for a married woman of lower class forms an oxymoron when it is prefixed to 'Hag' or, as at 1.2.217, to 'Witch'.
anything Frequently named by the other witches and Firestone, Hecate remains anonymous to her human clients. Namelessness is next to godlessness in this play, as it is in Macbeth (4.1.64).
 205 remora sucking fish, also called 'echeneis'
 206 suckstone remora
 207 sea-lamprey lamprey eel, species of a genus of fish which resemble eels in shape and in lack of scales and which have sucker-like mouths. Hecate's identification of the remora as a lamprey may be a taxonomic error, but it establishes the sexual innuendo of the exchange. Compare John Webster's Duchess of Malfi: 'Women like that part which, like the lamprey, | Hath ne'er a bone in't' (1.1.336-7).

a small fish Scot is dismissive of the reported use of the remora as an aphrodisiac charm: see the quotation from The Discoverie of Witchcraft (v1, 7) in the note to 1.2.163-7 above. Elsewhere in The Discoverie of Witchcraft (xiii, 4), however, Scot is much less doubtful of claims that the remora—'a little fish being but half a foot long'—is able to halt any ship to which it attaches itself.

210 pismires ants. The inebriated Al-machildes hears only the first syllable. On the charm, see the note to 1.2.163-7 above.

wet sucket syrup: see note to 1.1.67

 For an East Indian voyage.

ISABELLA Alone, sister?

FRANCISCA [aside]
 65 No, there's another with me, though you see't not.
 [To Isabella] 'Morrow, sweet sister! How have you slept tonight?

ISABELLA
 More than I thought I should: I've had good rest.

FRANCISCA
 I'm glad to hear't.

ISABELLA
 70 Sister, methinks you are too long alone
 And lose much good time, sociable and honest.
 I'm for the married life: I must praise that now.

FRANCISCA
 I cannot blame you, sister, to commend it.
 You have happened well, no doubt, on a kind husband,
 And that's not every woman's fortune, sister.
 75 You know if he were any but my brother
 My praises should not leave him yet so soon.

ISABELLA
 I must acknowledge, sister, that my life
 Is happily blessed with him: he is no gamester
 That ever I could find or hear of yet, 80 Nor midnight surfeiter. He does intend
 To leave tobacco too.

FRANCISCA Why, here's a husband!

ISABELLA
 He saw it did offend me and swore freely
 He'd ne'er take pleasure in a toy again
 That should displease me: some knights' wives in town
 85 Will have great hope, upon his reformation,
 To bring their husbands' breaths into th'old fashion
 And make 'em kiss like Christians, not like pagans.

FRANCISCA
 I promise you, sister, 'twill be a worthy work
 To put down all these pipers: 'tis great pity

There should not be a statute against them
 As against fiddlers.

ISABELLA These good offices
 If you'd a husband, you might exercise
 To th' good o'th' commonwealth, and do much profit.
 Beside it is a comfort to a woman
 T'have children, sister—a great blessing certainly. 95

FRANCISCA
 They will come fast enough.

ISABELLA Not so fast neither,
 As they're still welcome to an honest woman.

FRANCISCA [aside]
 How near she comes to me! I protest she grates
 My very skin.

ISABELLA Were I conceived with child,
 Beshrew my heart, I should be so proud on't! 100

FRANCISCA
 That's natural: pride is a kind of swelling.
 [Aside] And yet I've small cause to be proud of mine.

ISABELLA
 You are no good companion for a wife.
 Get you a husband, prithee, sister, do,
 That I may ask your counsel now and then. 105

Not seventeen, for a yard of lawn!

FRANCISCA Not yet, sir.
ANTONIO [to Isabella] I told you so.
FRANCISCA [aside]
I would he'd laid a wager of old shirts rather!

125 I shall have more need of them shortly; and yet
A yard of lawn will serve for a christ'ning cloth.
I have use for everything, as my case stands.

ISABELLA
I care not if I try my voice this morning;
But I have got a cold, sir, by your means.

ANTONIO
I'll strive to mend that fault.

130 ISABELLA I thank you, sir.
Song
In a maiden time professed,
Then we say that life is best.
Tasting once the married life,
Then we only praise the wife.

135 There's but one state more to try
Which makes women laugh or cry:
Widow, widow, of these three,
The middle's best, and that give me.

ANTONIO [kissing her]
There's thy reward.

ISABELLA I will not grumble, sir,
140 Like some musician: if more come, 'tis welcome.

FRANCISCA [aside]
Such tricks has made me do all that I've done.
Your kissing married folks spoils all the maids
That ever live i'th' house with 'em.
Enter Aberzanes [with watermen carrying provisions]
O, here he comes

With his bags, and bottles: he was born
To lead poor watermen, and I. 145

ABERZANES
Go, fellows, into th' larder: let the bakemeats
Be sorted by themselves.

ANTONIO Why, sir!

ABERZANES
Look the canary bottles be well stopped:
The three of claret shall be drunk at dinner.
[Exeunt watermen]

ANTONIO
My good sir, you're too plenteous of these courtesies, 150
Indeed you are! Forbear 'em, I beseech ye!
I know no merit in me, but poor love,
And a true friend's well-wishing, that can cause
This kindness in excess. [Aside] I'th' state that I am
I shall go near to kick this fellow shortly 155
And send him downstairs with his bag and baggage.
Why comes he now I'm married? There's the point!
[To Aberzanes] I pray, forbear these things.

ABERZANES Alas, you know, sir,
These idle toys, which you call courtesies,
They cost me nothing but my servants' travail. 160
One office must be kind, sir, to another:
You know the fashion. What, the gentlewoman
Your sister's sad, methinks.

ANTONIO I know no cause she has.

FRANCISCA [aside]
Nor shall you, by my good will.
[Still aside, to Aberzanes]
What do you mean, sir?
165 Shall I stay here, to shame myself and you?
The time may be tonight, for aught you know.

ABERZANES
Peace, there's means wrought, I tell thee.

121 yard of lawn Lawn is a fine linen fabric resembling cambric. A single yard of it would be, like Francisca's age, no great length.

125 I shall...shortly Old shirts would be useful in childbirth because they can serve as absorbent and clean cloths.

126 christ'ning cloth chrism: a white head-cloth or garment put on a baby before its anointing in a Christian baptismal ceremony and customarily returned by the mother at her churching (see 3.2.114)

127 have use for everything (a) can put anything to good use (b) am sexually available to any man case (a) situation (b) vagina

129 got a cold...means Ostensibly apologizing for her singing voice and covertly complaining of sexual frustration, Isabella chides Antonio for both conditions.

131-8 In a maiden time...that give me Isabella's song is a metadramatic tally of the female figures at the centre of each of the three plots of The Witch.

In its immediate dramatic situation, it is both a covert rebuke to Antonio for his impotence and also an allusion to Frances Howard's divorce from Robert Devereux, in which her claim to virginity was crucial. And it may also be an echo from the celebrations surrounding her subsequent marriage. In two seventeenth-century song manuscripts, this song appears with a musical setting by John Wilson and two further (and bawdier) verses, reproduced in the Textual Notes and in this edition's text of Masque of Cupids; for the music, see Companion, p. 151.

143.1-2 with...provisions With such a display, Aberzanes at his first appearance in the play is visibly a figure of Gluttony.

143-9 here he comes...at dinner Aberzanes's arrival at Antonio's house recapitulates his visitations to Francisca as the 'friend' described at 2.1.46-53. On both occasions his baggage and behaviour are not appropriate for a guest, but, rather, suggest a customer at a Southwark brothel. Antonio's exclamation at l. 157—'Why comes he now I'm married? There's the point!'—implies the speaker's own experience of sexual transactions in which Aberzanes has figured.

145 To lead...and I Francisca draws audience attention both to what Aberzanes literally does (leading in a gaggle of heavily laden watermen) onstage as she speaks and to what he has figuratively done (leading her astray) on other occasions in which watermen have figured.

146 larder room in which meat and other provisions are stored bakemeats pies

147 sorted arranged

148 canary light sweet wine from the Canary Islands

160 travail labour

161 office (a) office-holder (b) service. Antonio's implication in an economy of courtly office was noted by Francisca at ll. 56-9.

Act 2 Scene 1

the Witch

FRANCISCA Ay, sir, when? That I shall ne'er endure't.
Enter Sebastian [in disguise] and Gentleman
 ANTONIO ABERZANES Perhaps, forsooth,
 How now? what's he? 'Tis not her meaning you shall live there long. 195
 ISABELLA O, this is the man, sir, I do not think but after a month or so
 I entertained this morning for my service: You'll be sent up again: that's my conceit.
 Please you to give your liking. However, let her have her will.
 170 ANTONIO ANTONIO Ay, good sir,
 Yes, he's welcome: Great reason 'tis she should.
 I like him not amiss.—Thou wouldst speak business, ISABELLA I am sorry, sister, Wouldst thou not? 'Tis our hard fortune, thus to part so soon. 200
 SEBASTIAN Yes, may it please you, sir. FRANCISCA
 There is a gentleman from the northern parts The sorrow will be mine.
 Hath brought a letter, as it seems, in haste. ANTONIO [to Gentleman] Please you walk in, sir,
 ANTONIO We'll have one health into those Northern parts
 From whom? [Aside] Though I be sick at heart.
 175 GENTLEMAN Your bonny lady mother, sir. ABERZANES Ay, sir, a deep one,
 [He presents letter] [To Francisca] Which you shall pledge too.
 ANTONIO Exeunt [Antonio, Isabella and Gentleman]
 You're kindly welcome, sir: how doth she? FRANCISCA You shall pardon me:
 GENTLEMAN I have pledged one too deep already, sir. 205
 I left her healt' varray well, sir. ABERZANES ANTONIO [reading letter aloud] 'I pray send your sister down Peace! All's provided for: thy wine's laid in, with all speed to me. I hope it will prove much for her Sugar and spice: the place not ten mile hence.

 sent, ready furnished, horse and man for her.' Exeunt [Aberzanes and Francisca]
 ABERZANES [aside, to Francisca] SEBASTIAN
 Now, have I thought upon you? It takes: he's no content. How well she bears it yet! 210
 FRANCISCA Peace, good sir! Hardly myself can find so much from her,
 You're worthy of a kindness another time. That am acquainted with the cold disease.
 ANTONIO O, honesty's a rare wealth in a woman:
 185 Her will shall be obeyed. Sister, prepare yourself. It knows no want—at least, will express none,
 You must down with all speed. Not in a look. Yet I'm not th'roughly happy: 215
 FRANCISCA [aside] I know down I must, His ill does me no good. Well may it keep me
 And good speed send me. From open rage and madness for a time, ANTONIO 'Tis our mother's pleasure. But I feel heart's grief in the same place, still.
 FRANCISCA What makes the greatest torment 'mongst lost souls?
 Good sir, write back again, and certify her 'Tis not so much the horror of their pains 220
 I'm at my heart's wish here. I'm with my friends (Though they be infinite) as the loss of joys.
 And can be but well: say. It is that deprivation is the mother
 190 ANTONIO You shall pardon me, sister: Of all the groans in hell; and here on earth
 I hold it no wise part to contradict her, Of all the red sighs in the hearts of lovers.
 Nor would I counsel you to't. Still she's not mine, that can be no man's else 225
 FRANCISCA 'Tis so uncouth Till I be nothing, if religion
 Living i'th' country, now I'm used to th' city, Have the same strength for me as 't has for others.

168 what's he? The question is fair, as well as dramaturgically useful: there has been no previous indication that Sebastian would disguise himself, let alone seek service in Antonio's household. The pseudonym 'Celio' will not be introduced until 4.2.112.

175 bonny 'The northern parts' from which the gentleman is said to have come are here signalled as northern Britain, not Italy. His message being false, the Scottish accent indicated for his two half-lines could be played as flagrantly phony. The more outrageous the accent sounds, the more it mocks the Scottish courtiers around King James I, notably Robert Carr.

177 healt' varray phonetic approximation of 'health very' in Jacobean stage Scottish.

178 down away from the capital, into the country

186 down...down double ellipsis: go down (into the country)...lie down (in childbirth)

188 certify assure

197 up back to the capital

conceit opinion

205 pledged (a) toasted (b) conceived

212 cold disease sexual starvation

219–21 What makes...loss of joys Christian teaching construes damnation as eternal separation from God.

224 red hot, burning

226 religion devotion, fidelity

	I'll make you eat your word. I'll make all split else.	[The charm falls from Amoretta's dress to the floor]
	Exit
AMORETTA	Nay, now I think on't better, I'm to blame too. There's not a sweeter gentleman in court, Nobly descended too, and dances well.	DUCHESS	I'm quite lost in this woman! What's that fell Out of her bosom now? Some love-token? [Duchess picks up the charm]
50	Beshrew my heart, I'll take him when there's time. He will be caught up quickly! The Duchess says She's some employment for him, and has sworn me To use my best art in't. Life of my joys, There were good stuff! I will not trust her with him.	AMORETTA	Nay, I'll say that for him: he's the uncivil'st gentle- man
55	I'll call him back again: he must not keep Out of my sight so long—I shall go mad then. Enter Duchess	DUCHESS	Who's that now She discommends so fast?
DUCHESS [aside]	He lives not now to see tomorrow spent, If this means take effect, as there's no hardness in't. Last night he played his horrid game again, 60 Came to my bedside at the full of midnight, And in his hand that fatal fearful cup, Waked me, and forced me pledge him, to my trem- bling And my dead father's scorn. That wounds my sight That his remembrance should be raised in spite; 65 But either his confusion, or mine, ends it.— O, Amoretta, hast thou met him yet? Speak, wench, hast done that for me?	AMORETTA	I could not love him, madam, Of any man in court!
DUCHESS	What's he now, prithee?	DUCHESS	What's he now, prithee?
AMORETTA	Who should it be but Almachildes, madam? I never hated man so deeply yet.	AMORETTA	Who should it be but Almachildes, madam? I never hated man so deeply yet.
60	Came to my bedside at the full of midnight, And in his hand that fatal fearful cup, Waked me, and forced me pledge him, to my trem- bling And my dead father's scorn. That wounds my sight That his remembrance should be raised in spite; 65 But either his confusion, or mine, ends it.— O, Amoretta, hast thou met him yet? Speak, wench, hast done that for me?	DUCHESS	As Almachildes? I am sick, good madam, When I but hear him named.
AMORETTA	What, good madam?	DUCHESS	How is this possible? But now thou saidst thou lov'dst him, and didst raise him 'Bove all the court, in praises.
DUCHESS	Destruction of my hopes, dost ask that now? Didst thou not swear to me, out of thy hate To Almachildes, thou'dst dissemble him A loving entertainment, and a meeting Where I should work my will?	AMORETTA	How great people May speak their pleasure, madam! But surely I Should think the worse of my tongue while I lived then.
70	A loving entertainment I do protest Myself to give him—[Aside] with all speed I can too!— But as I'm yet a maid, a perfect one, As the old time was wont to afford, when There was few tricks, and little cunning stirring, I can dissemble none that will serve your turn. He must have e'en a right one, and a plain one.	DUCHESS	No longer have I patience to forbear thee, Thou that retain'st an envious soul to goodness. He is a gentleman deserves as much As ever Fortune yet bestowed on man, The glory and prime lustre of our court. Nor can there any but ourself be worthy of him And take you notice of that now from me, Say you have warning on't: if you did love him, You must not now.
AMORETTA	Good madam, pardon me!	AMORETTA	Let your grace never fear it.
DUCHESS	Thou mak'st me doubt thy health: speak, art thou well?	DUCHESS	Thy name is Amoretta, as ours is: It's made me love and trust thee.
80	O, never better—[Aside] if he would make haste And come back quickly! He stays now too long.	AMORETTA	And my faithfulness Has appeared well i'th' proof still, has't not, madam?
		DUCHESS	But if't fail now, 'tis nothing.

58 hardness (a) cruelty (in the Duchess's purposed effect), or (b) difficulty (in the means adopted to secure that end)
65 confusion overthrow, destruction
76 the old time the Golden Age. Ostensibly Amoretta evokes a mythical time of strict sexual discipline, when maidens in name were in fact virgins intact. Her protestations, however, are remarkably resonant with the last verse of 'In a Maiden Time Professed', Isabella's song in the previous scene, as it survives in two seventeenth-century song manuscripts. As celebrated in that verse, the mythical past was a time of sexual liberty. See note to 2.1.131–8 and Textual Notes.

99–100 He is . . . on man an ambivalent assessment

102 ourself The Duchess occasionally affects the royal 'we': see 2.2.106, 3.1.26, 3.1.56.
106 as ours is Coming immediately after her praise of Almachildes at lines 99–105, the Duchess's announcement of her own Christian name makes it appear that the charm, which she holds and will carry offstage, has worked on her.

AMORETTA Then it shall not. 140
 I know he will not be long from flutt'ring
 About this place, now he's had a sight of me;
 And I'll perform in all that I vowed, madam, faithfully.

ALMACHILDES I'll consent to 'em
 And may thy sweet humility be a pattern
 For all proud women living.

AMORETTA They're beholding to you.
Exeunt

DUCHESS
 Then am I blessed both in revenge and love;
 And thou shalt taste the sweetness. Exit

AMORETTA What your aims be
 I list not to enquire: all I desire
 Is to preserve a competent honesty
 Both for mine own and his use that shall have me,
 Whose luck soe'er it be.
Enter Almachildes
 O, he's returned already!
 I knew he would not fail.

ALMACHILDES It works by this time,
 Or the devil's in't, I think: I'll never trust witch else,
 Nor sup with 'em this twelve month.

AMORETTA I must soothe him now,
 And 'tis great pain to do't against one's stomach.

ALMACHILDES
 Now, Amoretta?
 AMORETTA Now you're welcome, sir,
 If you'd come always thus.

ALMACHILDES O, am I so?
 Is the case altered since?

AMORETTA If you'd be ruled,
 And know your times, 'twere somewhat, a great comfort.
 'Las, I could be as loving and as venturous
 As any woman—we're all flesh and blood, man—
 If you could play the game out modestly
 And not betray your hand: I must have care, sir.
 You know I have a marriage time to come,
 And that's for life. Your best folks will be merry
 But look to the main chance—that's reputation—
 And then do what they list.

ALMACHILDES Wilt hear my oath?
 By the sweet health of youth, I will be careful
 And never prate on't, nor like a cunning snarer
 Make thy clipped name the bird to call in others.

AMORETTA
 Well, yielding then to such conditions
 As my poor bashfulness shall require from you,
 I shall yield shortly after.

ALMACHILDES
 O, well said!
 Art almost furnished? There's such a toil always
 To set a woman to horse, a mighty trouble.
 The letter came to your brother's hands, I know,
 On Thursday last by noon: you were expected there Yesterday night.

FRANCISCA It makes the better, sir.

116 competent suitable, adequate
 125 case (a) situation (b) vagina 132-3 Your best folks... reputation (possibly a reference to Frances Howard) 137 clipped name mutilated reputation.
 The metaphor is of a bird, its wing-feathers trimmed to render it incapable of flight, being used as decoy to trap other birds. Homophony between 'clipped' and 'cleped' [= called] is also in play.
 2.3.6 ballast burdened (by pregnancy)
 7 drab slut

9 scape bastard
 14 purse slang for both 'vagina' and
 'scrotum'
 18 rapier (sartorial sign of gentlemanly status)
 22 quick hand skill, dexterity convey... cleanly (a) manage smoothly
 (b) steal imperceptibly
 23 'Twill... day proverbial (Tilley M628) well said! The range of interpretations admitted by this bland half-line makes it a good example of the making of dramatic meaning in theatrical performance.

 The gloss 'fittingly spoken!' makes the exclamation Aberzanes's applause of his own utterance. The gloss 'well done!'
 could refer either to Aberzanes's contrivance or to Francisca's appearance. If the exclamation is addressed to her, it implies that her attire is noteworthy.
 25 set... to horse (a) get on horseback (for a journey) (b) ride in sexual intercourse

- ABERZANES
30 We must take heed we ride through all the puddles
'Twill this and that now, that your safeguard there May be most probably dabbled.
- FRANCISCA [looking at her reflection in mirror]
Alas, sir!
I never marked till now—I hate myself—
How monstrous thin I look.
- ABERZANES Not monstrous neither!
A little sharp i'th' nose, like a country woodcock.
- FRANCISCA
35 Fie, fie, how pale I am! I shall betray myself!
I would you'd box me well and handsomely
To get me into colour.
- ABERZANES Not I, pardon me.
That let a husband do, when he has married you.
A friend at court will never offer that.
- 40 Come, how much spice and sugar have you left now
At this poor one month's voyage?
- FRANCISCA Sure, not much, sir.
I think some quarter of a pound of sugar
And half an ounce of spice.
- ABERZANES Here's no sweet charge!
And there was thirty pound good weight and true, 45 Beside what my man stole when't was a-weighing—
And that was three pound more. I'll speak wi' th' least.
The Rhenish wine, is't all run out in caudels too?
- FRANCISCA
Do you ask that, sir? 'Tis of a week's departure!
You see what 'tis now, to get children, sir.
[Enter Stableboy]
- STABLEBOY
Your mares are ready, both, sir.
- 50 ABERZANES Come, we'll up then.
Youth, give my sister a straight wand: there's two pence.
- 30 safeguard overskirt worn to protect a woman's dress from mud
31 probably dabbled i.e., spattered with enough mud to suggest a journey down to London from 'Northern parts'
33-5 How monstrous... pale I am Contemplating her own reflection in a hand-mirror, an elaborately-dressed Francisca becomes a stage icon, an image that can be variously decoded by different texts. She is recognizably an analogue of the image of Frances Howard circulated in a broadsheet response to the Overbury trials (see 45). She is also (like that image titled 'Lady Pride') cast in the figure of Vanity. And in Ripa's Iconologia she meets the principal specifications for 'LASCIVIA... [LUST. A richly dressed young woman, she holds in her left hand a mirror in which she studies herself attentively (and) with the right she keeps beautifying her face...']
34 woodcock (a) long-billed bird which is easily snared, whence (b) simpleton, gull (c) prostitute (d) tailor
36 box slap (and thereby reddened) my face 43 sweet (a) saccharine (b) easy charge (a) weight (b) expense
46 speak wi' th' least estimate conservatively
47 Rhenish from the Rhineland caudels warm drinks which were mixed from gruel, wine, sugar and spice and used for invalids and women in childbed
3.1.1-2 How... To deceive men An abbreviated allusion to a misogynistic proverb ('Women naturally deceive, weep, and spin' [Tilley W716]) which is itself a translation from a medieval Latin jingle ('Fallere, flere, nere tria sunt haec in muliere').
3 finely cunningly handled made use of 13 birdlime viscous sticky substance made from bark of holly and used for catching small birds out finished 16 either die, or kill the Duke The options, and the bed-trick which enforces them, come from Bedingfield's translation of Machiavelli's Istorie fiorentine: 'Knowing that Almachilde (a valiant young gentleman of Lombardi) loved a maiden of hers, of whom he obtained to lie with her, and the Queen being privy to that consent, did herself tarry in the place of their meeting, which being without light, Almachilde came thither, and supposing to have lien with the maiden, enjoyed the Queen her mistress, which done, the Queen discovered herself and said unto him, that it was in his power to kill Alboino, and possess her with her kingdom forever; but if he refused so to do, she would procure that Alboino should kill him, as one that had abused his wife. To this motion... Almachilde consented.'
- STABLEBOY
I'll give her a fine whip, sir.
- ABERZANES No, no, no!
[Aside] Though we have both deserved it.
- STABLEBOY Here's a new one.
- ABERZANES
Prithee talk to us of no whips, good boy:
My heart aches when I see 'em. Let's away. Exeunt 55
Finis Actus Secundi
- [Incipit Actus Tertius 3.1
Enter Duchess, leading Almachildes blindfold [with scarves]]
- ALMACHILDES
This's you that was a maid? How are you born
To deceive men? I'd thought to have married you:
I had been finely handled, had I not?
I'll say that man is wise ever hereafter
That tries his wife beforehand: 'tis no marvel 5
You should profess such bashfulness, to blind one,
As if you durst not look a man i'th' face,
Your modesty would blush so. Why do you not run
And tell the Duchess now? Go! You should tell all!
Let her know this too—why, here's the plague
now!— 10
'Tis hard at first to win 'em: when they're gotten,
There's no way to be rid on 'em. They stick
To a man like birdlime. My oath's out:
Will you release me? I'll release myself else.
- DUCHESS
Nay, sure I'll bring you to your sight again. 15
[She removes his blindfold]
Say, thou must either die, or kill the Duke—
For one of them thou must do.
- ALMACHILDES How, good madam?

DUCHESS	DUCHESS [kissing him]	There's a pledge then	50
Thou hast thy choice, and to that purpose, sir,	Of a duchess' love for thee. And now trust me

25 Take but into thine actions, wit and courage:	ALMACHILDES And that I'll venture hard for.
That's all we ask of thee. But if through weakness	DUCHESS Good speed to thee. Exeunt [severally]

ALMACHILDES I see no choice in't, madam,	FLORIDA [seizing key]

How, madam?	I'll tell thee more anon. [Exit, pursuing Florida]
DUCHESS I'll do't religiously,	SEBASTIAN I know that face		15
45 Make thee my husband. May I lose all sense	To be a strumpet's, or mine eye is envious
Of pleasure in life else, and be more miserable	And would fain wish it so, where I would have it.
Than ever creature was: for nothing lives	I fail if the condition of this fellow
But has a joy in somewhat.	Wears not about it a strong scent of baseness.
ALMACHILDES Then by all	I saw her once before here, five days since 'tis,		20
The hopeful fortunes of a young man's rising	And the same wary panderous diligence
I will perform it, madam.	Was then bestowed on her. She came altered then,

10 here's the garden key No particular plot function is established either for this key, or for the key which Sebastian will give to Florida at 4.2.33–6, or for the one which Francisca will produce at 4.3.20. On all three occasions, possession of a key operates as a stage signal, a clear indication of access and thus a strong implication of intimacy.

- And more inclining to the city-tuck.
Whom should this piece of transformation visit
25 After the common courtesy of frailty
In our house here? Surely not any servant—
They are not kept so lusty, she so low.
I'm at a strange stand: love and luck assist me.
The truth I shall win from him by false play.
Enter Gaspero
30 He's now returned. Well, sir, as you were saying—
Go forward with your tale!
- GASPERO What? I know nothing.
SEBASTIAN The gentlewoman.
GASPERO She's gone out at backdoor now.
SEBASTIAN Then farewell she, and you, if that be all.
GASPERO Come, come: thou shalt have more. I have no power
To lock myself up from thee.
35 SEBASTIAN So methinks.
GASPERO You shall not think—trust me, sir—you shall not!
Your ear: she's one o'th' falling family,
A quean my master keeps. She lies at Rutney's.
SEBASTIAN Is't possible? I thought I had seen her somewhere.
GASPERO I tell you truth sincerely. She's been thrice here 40 By stealth within these ten days, and departed still
With pleasure and with thanks, sir, 'tis her luck.
Surely I think, if ever there were man
Bewitched in this world, 'tis my master, sirrah.
SEBASTIAN Think'st thou so, Gaspero?
45 GASPERO O, sir, too apparent!
SEBASTIAN [aside] This may prove happy. 'Tis the likeliest means
That Fortune yet e'er showed me.
Enter Isabella
ISABELLA You're both here now,
- And strangers newly lighted! Where's your attendance?
SEBASTIAN [aside] I know what makes you waspish. A pox on't—
She'll every day be angry now at nothing. 50
Exeunt [Gaspero and Sebastian]
ISABELLA I'll call her stranger ever in my heart!
She's killed the name of sister, through base lust,
And fled to shifts. O, how a brother's good thoughts
May be beguiled in woman! Here's a letter,
55 Found in her absence, reports strangely of her
And speaks her impudence. She's undone herself—
I could not hold from weeping when I read it!—
Abused her brother's house and his good confidence!
'Twas done not like herself: I blame her much,
60 But if she can but keep it from his knowledge
I will not grieve him first: it shall not come
By my means to his heart.
Enter Gaspero
Now, sir, the news?
GASPERO You called 'em strangers: 'tis my master's sister,
madam!
ISABELLA O, is't so? She's welcome. Who's come with her?
GASPERO I see none but Aberzanes. [Exit]
ISABELLA He's enough 65
To bring a woman to confusion
More than a wiser man, or a far greater.
A letter came last week to her brother's hands
To make way for her coming up again
After her shame was lightened; and she writ there, 70
The gentleman her mother wished her to,
Taking a violent surfeit at a wedding,
Died ere she came to see him. What strange cunning Sin helps a woman to!
Enter Aberzanes and Francisca
Here she comes now.
Sister, you're welcome home again.

23 city-tuck urban fashion

24 piece person in whom an activity is exemplified transformation metamorphosis, action of changing in form, shape or appearance. Both substantives in 'piece of transformation' carry insulting implications, 'piece' implying contempt and 'transformation' implying 'corruption'. Inasmuch as it is condemnatory, the phrase is also an inadvertent verdict on its speaker, Sebastian, who has himself assumed a disguise in order to alter his identity. In the wider context of early modern demonological literature, moreover, the phrase is heavily significant: venefical and diabolical shape-changing greatly interested the writers of such treatises and of their sources.

25 After . . . frailty in accordance with the conventions of prostitution

27 They . . . low They [the servants] are not so pleasurably maintained, nor is she [a courtesan] so far down the the social scale [as to service servants]

28 at a strange stand extremely perplexed

31 Go forward with your tale Even Gaspero deserves a better pun than this half-line.

37 one o'th' falling family a prostitute

38 Rutney's The establishment has not been identified and may be purely fictive, invented for the innuendo on 'rut' [= period of sexual excitement in male animals]

44 Bewitched (a) under a necromantic spell (b) sexually fascinated. The speaker uses the participle in its second, figurative sense. Unaware of Hecate's charm against Antonio, he is ignorant that the primary sense also obtains, let alone that his interlocutor has procured the spell. The irony of the line is compounded by its conclusion in a patronizing term of address: see note to I.I.36.

48 lighted alighted (from horseback), dismounted

49 waspish irascible

53 shifts (a) subterfuges, with quibble on (b) chemises, smocks

55 strangely surprisingly

56 impudence shamelessness

66 confusion ruin

72 surfeit sickness caused by intemperance

75 FRANCISCA Thanks, sweet sister. And better hope still kept me off from speaking.
 ISABELLA You've had good speed. Yet may you find a kind and peaceful sister of me,
 FRANCISCA [aside] What says she?—I have made Which you've more cause to do, than I to wish you. 105
 All the best speed I could. As truly as I bear a love to goodness, ISABELLA I well believe you.— Your brother knows not yet on't, nor shall ever
 Sir, we're all much beholding to your kindness. For my part, so you leave his company.
 ABERZANES But if I find you impudent in sinning, 110
 My service ever, madam, to a gentlewoman. I will not keep't an hour—nay, prove your enemy, 80 I took a bonny mare I keep and met her And you know who will aid me. As you've goodness,
 Some ten mile out of town—eleven, I think. You may make use of this:
 [He prompts Francisca] [She throws down the letter]
 'Twas at the stump I met you, I remember, I'll leave it with you. Exit
 At bottom of the hill. FRANCISCA
 FRANCISCA 'Twas thereabout, sir. Here's a sweet churching after a woman's labour, ABERZANES And a fine 'Give-you-joy'!
 Full eleven, then, by the rod, if they were measured. [She snatches up the letter]
 ISABELLA [To Francisca] Why, where the devil 115
 85 You look ill, methinks. Have you been sick of late?— Lay you to be found out? The sudden hurry
 'Troth, very bleak, doth she not? How think you, sir? Of hast'ning to prevent shame, brought shame forth.
 ABERZANES That's still the curse of all lascivious stuff:
 No, no, a little sharp with riding: she's rid sore. Misdeeds could never yet be wary enough!
 FRANCISCA Now must I stand in fear of every look— 120
 I ever look lean after a journey, sister. Nay, tremble at a whisper. She can keep it secret?
 One shall do, that has travailed, travailed hard. —That's very likely!—and a woman too?
 ABERZANES I'm sure I could not do't, and I am made 90 Till evening, I commend you to yourselves, ladies. Exit As well as she can be for any purpose.
 ISABELLA [Aside] 'Twould never stay with me two days—I've cast it— 125
 And that's best trusting to, if you were hanged.— The third would be a terrible sick day with me, You're well acquainted with his hand went out now? Not possible to bear it. Should I then FRANCISCA His hand? Trust to her strength in't, that lies every night
 ISABELLA I speak of nothing else. Whispering the day's news in a husband's ear?
 [She produces a letter] No, and I have thought upon the means. Blessed
 I think 'tis there. Fortune! 130
 95 Please you to look upon't, and when you've done, I must be quit with her in the same fashion
 If you did weep, it could not be amiss— Or else 'tis nothing. There's no way like it,
 A sign you could say grace after a full meal. To bring her honesty into question cunningly.
 You had not need look paler, yet you do. My brother will believe small likelihoods
 'Twas ill done to abuse yourself, and us, Coming from me, too. I, lying now i'th' house, 135
 To wrong so good a brother and the thoughts May work things to my will, beyond conceit too.
 That we both held of you. I did doubt you much Disgrace her first, her tale will ne'er be heard:
 100 Before our marriage day, but then my strangeness I learned that counsel first of a sound guard.
 I do suspect Gasper, my brother's squire there,
 Had some hand in this mischief, for he's cunning, 140

114 churching a woman's first public appearance at church after childbirth, for a ceremony of thanksgiving. Francisca's metaphor casts Isabella in the role of cleric praying over a recently delivered woman.

119 Misdeeds... enough Rhyme draws attention to this line and distinguishes it as a sententia, a rhetorical statement of proverbial wisdom.

125 cast tried, attempted

Act 3 Scene 2

to Witch

And I perhaps may fit him.
Enter Antonio
 ANTONIO Your sister told me
 You were come: thou'rt welcome.
 FRANCISCA
 Where is she?
 ANTONIO Who? My wife?
 FRANCISCA Ay, sir.
 ANTONIO Within.
 FRANCISCA
 Not within hearing, think you?
 ANTONIO Within hearing?
 145 What's thy conceit in that? Why shak'st thy head so?
 And look'st so pale and poorly?
 FRANCISCA I'm a fool indeed
 To take such grief for others—for your fortune, sir.
 ANTONIO
 My fortune? Worse things yet? Farewell life then!
 FRANCISCA
 I fear you're much deceived, sir, in this woman.
 ANTONIO
 150 Who? In my wife? Speak low. Come hither, softly, sister.
 FRANCISCA
 I love her as a woman you made choice of,
 But when she wrongs you, natural love is touched,
 brother,
 And that will speak, you know.
 ANTONIO I trust it will.
 FRANCISCA
 I held a shrewd suspicion of her lightness
 At first, when I went down, which made me haste the 155 sooner;
 But more, to make amends, at my return now
 I found apparent signs.
 ANTONIO Apparent, say'st thou?
 FRANCISCA
 Ay, and of base lust too: that makes th'affliction.
 [She holds up the letter]
 ANTONIO
 There has been villainy wrought upon me then:
 'Tis too plain now.
 160 FRANCISCA Happy are they, I say still,
 That have their sisters living i'th' house with 'em,
 Their mothers, or some kindred: a great comfort
 To all poor married men. It is not possible
 A young wife can abuse a husband then:
 165 'Tis found straight. But swear secrecy to this, brother.
 ANTONIO
 To this, and all thou wilt have.

FRANCISCA Then this follows, sir.
 [She whispers in his ear]
 ANTONIO
 I praise thy counsel well: I'll put't in use straight.
 See where she comes herself.
Enter Isabella
 [Exit Francisca]
 Kind, honest lady,
 I must now borrow a whole fortnight's leave of thee.
 ISABELLA How, sir? A fortnight?
 170 ANTONIO
 It may be but ten days: I know not yet.
 'Tis business for the state, and't must be done.
 ISABELLA
 I wish good speed to't then.
 ANTONIO Why, that was well spoke.
 I'll take but a footboy: I need no more.
 The rest I'll leave at home, to do you service.
 175 ISABELLA
 Use your own pleasure, sir.
 ANTONIO Till my return
 You'll be good company, my sister and you.
 ISABELLA
 We shall make shift, sir.
 ANTONIO I'm glad now she's come,
 And so the wishes of my love to both. Exit
 ISABELLA
 And our good prayers with you, sir.
Enter Sebastian
 SEBASTIAN [aside] Now my fortune.— 180
 By your kind favour, madam.
 ISABELLA With me, sir?
 SEBASTIAN
 The words shall not be many; but the faithfulness
 And true respect that is included in 'em
 Is worthy your attention and may put upon me
 The fair repute of a just, honest servant.
 185 ISABELLA
 What's here to do, sir, there's such great preparation toward?
 SEBASTIAN
 In brief, that goodness in you is abused, madam.
 You have the married life, but 'tis a strumpet
 That has the joy on't, and the fruitfulness:
 There goes away your comfort.
 ISABELLA How? A strumpet?
 190 SEBASTIAN
 Of five years' cost, and upwards: a dear mischief,
 As they are all of 'em. His fortnight's journey
 Is to that country, if it be not rudeness

141 fit require
 145 conceit meaning
 146 look'st so pale and poorly Offering yet another interpretation of Francisca's pallor and thinness, Antonio here instantiates the play's preoccupation with women's bodies as sets of signs which invite, but baffle, interpretation.

 152 natural familial, blood-related 154 shrewd ominous, coming near the truth lightness wantonness
 157 apparent manifest, palpable
 174 footboy boy-attendant, page-boy
 175 do you service (a) give you assistance

(b) pay you sexual attention
 189 fruitfulness fecundity, fertility in offspring
 191 Of... upwards maintained for over five years
 193 country punning (again) on 'cunt'

To speak the truth: I have found it all out, madam.
 ISABELLA
 195 Thou'st found out thine own ruin, for to my knowledge
 Thou dost belie him basely: I dare swear
 He's a gentleman as free from that folly
 As ever took religious life upon him.
 SEBASTIAN
 200 Be not too confident to your own abuse, madam:
 Since I have begun the truth, neither your frowns,
 The only curses that I have on earth
 (Because my means depends upon your service),
 Nor all the execration of man's fury
 205 Shall put me off. Though I be poor, I'm honest,
 And too just in this business. I perceive now,
 Too much respect and faithfulness to ladies
 May be a wrong to servants.
 ISABELLA Art thou yet
 So impudent to stand in't?
 SEBASTIAN Are you yet so cold, madam,
 210 In the belief on't? There my wonder's fixed.
 Having such blessed health and youth about you,
 Which makes the injury mighty.
 ISABELLA Why, I tell thee
 It were too great a fortune for thy lowness
 To find out such a thing: thou dost not look
 As if thou'rt made for't. By the precious sweets of 215 love,
 I would give half my wealth for such a bargain
 And think 'twere bought too cheap. Thou canst not guess
 Thy means, and happiness, should I find this true.
 First, I'd prefer thee to the lord my uncle.
 He's governor of Ravenna: all the advancements 220 I'th' kingdom flows from him. What need I boast that Which common fame can teach thee?
 SEBASTIAN Then thus, madam:
 Since I presume now on your height of spirit
 And your regard to your own youth, and fruitfulness,
 Which every woman naturally loves and covets,
 225 Accept but of my labour in directions.
 You shall both find your wrongs, which you may right
 At your own pleasure, yet not missed tonight
 Here in the house neither. None shall take notice
 Of any absence in you, as I have thought on't.

ISABELLA
 Do this, and take my praise and thanks for ever. 230
 SEBASTIAN
 As I deserve, I wish 'em, and will serve you. Exeunt

Enter Hecate, Hoppo and Stadlin [through one door] and Firestone [with basket, through the other, unnoticed] 3.3

HECATE
 The moon's a gallant: see how brisk she rides!
 STADLIN
 Here's a rich evening, Hecate.
 HECATE Ay, is't not, wenches,
 To take a journey of five thousand mile?
 HOPPO
 Ours will be more tonight.
 HECATE O, 'twill be precious.
 Heard you the owl yet?
 STADLIN Briefly in the copse, 5
 As we came through now.
 HECATE 'Tis high time for us then.
 STADLIN
 There was a bat hung at my lips three times
 As we came through the woods, and drank her fill.
 Old Puckle saw her.
 HECATE You are fortunate still.
 The very screech-owl lights upon your shoulder
 10 And woos you, like a pigeon. Are you furnished?
 Have you your ointments?
 STADLIN All.
 HECATE Prepare to flight then:
 I'll overtake you swiftly.
 STADLIN Hie thee, Hecate.
 We shall be up betimes.
 HECATE I'll reach you quickly.
 [Exeunt Stadlin and Hoppo]
 FIRESTONE [aside] They're all going a-birding tonight. They 15 talk of fowls i'th'air, that fly by day: I'm sure they'll be a company of foul sluts there tonight. If we have not mortality after it, I'll be hanged, for they are able to putrefy it, to infect a whole region. She spies me now.
 HECATE What, Firestone, our sweet son? 20
 FIRESTONE A little sweeter than some of you, or a dunghill were too good for me.
 HECATE
 How much hast here?
 FIRESTONE Nineteen, and all brave plump ones,

194 I have found it all out Antonio having announced his fortnight's journey only two dozen lines earlier, Sebastian's knowledge of his master's intentions has perplexed some editors. Perhaps Francisca has told the servants of Antonio's travel plans. The problem is unlikely to be perceived in performance.

219-20 all the advancements... from him Otiose within the dramatic fiction, the boast draws attention to familiar facts outside it: in the first half of James I's reign, Frances Howard's great-uncle had been the source of all advancements in the newly united kingdom.

- Besides six lizards and three serpentine eggs.
 25 HECATE
 Dear and sweet boy! What herbs hast thou?
 FIRESTONE
 I have some Mar Martin and mandragon.
 HECATE
Marmaritin, and mandragora, thou wouldst say.
 Here's panax too: I thank thee.
 FIRESTONE My pan aches, I am sure,
 With kneeling down to cut 'em.
 HECATE And selago!
 30 Hedge-hyssop too: how near he goes my cuttings!
 Were they all cropped by moonlight?
 FIRESTONE Every blade of 'em.
 Or I am a moon-calf, mother.
 HECATE Hie thee home with 'em.
 Look well to the house tonight: I am for aloft.
 FIRESTONE
 Aloft, quoth you? [Aside] I would you would break your neck once,
 35 That I might have all quickly!—Hark, hark, mother!
 They are above the steeple already, flying
 Over your head with a noise of musicians.
 HECATE
 They are there indeed: Help, help me! I'm too late

 VOICES [from off-stage or above]
 Come away, come away!
 40 Hecate, Hecate, O come away!
 HECATE
 I come, I come, I come, I come
 With all the speed I may,
 With all the speed I may.
- Where's Stadlin?
 VOICE [from off-stage or above]
 Here.
 HECATE Where's Puckle?
 VOICE [from off-stage or above] Here.
 And Hoppo too, and Hellwain too.
 We lack but you, we lack but you.
 Come away, make up the count.
 HECATE
 I will but 'noint, and then I mount.
A spirit like a cat descends
 VOICE [from off-stage or above]
 There's one comes down to fetch his dues:
 A kiss, a coll, a sip of blood—
 50 And why thou stay'st so long
 [CAT] I muse, I muse
 VOICE [from off-stage or above]
 Since the air's so sweet and good.
 HECATE [to Cat]
 O, art thou come?
 [CAT] What news, what news?
 [HECATE]
 All goes still to our delight:
 VOICE [from off-stage or above]
 Either come, or else
 [CAT] Refuse, refuse.
 55 HECATE
 Now I am furnished for the flight.
 FIRESTONE [aside] Hark, hark, the cat sings a brave treble in her own language.
 HECATE (going up [with Cat])
 Now I go, now I fly,
 Malkin, my sweet spirit, and I.
 60 O, what a dainty pleasure 'tis

- 27 Marmaritin See note to 1.2.159–61. Giving no other occurrence of the word, the OED links it to the Latin marmaritis. Lewis and Short define this as a plant that grows in marble quarries and identify it with Pliny's aglaophotis. The species thus appears to be known only to classical zoology. Its name here serves to occasion Firestone's recasting it as 'Mar Martin'. His mistake may allude to Mar Martine, a pamphlet published in the Martin Marprelate controversy of the 1580s.
mandragora mandrake, used as narcotic or soporific drug 28 panax genus of plants, to some of which medicinal virtues are attributed: hence, 'panacea'.
 pan head, skull (brain-pan)
 29 selago club-moss
 30 Hedge-hyssop species of figwort, formerly noted for medicinal qualities
 31 cropped by moonlight Firestone's horticultural habits come from Zacharie Jones's 1605 translation of part of Pierre Le Loyer's Livre des Spectres: 'Virgil doth recite... ceremonies which the Sorcerers

- used in gathering of their herbs... as to cut them in the night time by the light of the Moonshine with a hook of brass, which maketh me also to remember certain observations of the Magicians and Sorcerers in times past, in cutting of their herb Elleborus, Mandragoras, and the herb Panaceum... and those also of the Druids... who used, without any knife or iron, to pluck the herb which they called Selago.'
 32 moon-calf absent-minded person who gazes at the moon
 37 noise company, band
 38.1 Song In the MS of The Witch this song is distinguished by layout and an italic hand, but its distribution among singers is not very clear. Hecate's parts are headed 'Hec'; others are marked 'in y^e aire' (twice) or 'above'; and still others are not assigned at all. The song also survives in two manuscript copies of a setting believed to have been composed by Robert Johnson (c.1582–1633), a lutenist associated with the King's Men. These manuscripts do not divide

- the melody among different voices. See Textual Notes; for the music, see Companion, p. 153.
 57–8 the cat... own language If these lines are taken to refer to Malkin, the 'spirit like a cat' that has descended at l. 48, then Malkin must sing at least some of the unattributed lines. A feline miaow would suit the vowel sounds in 'muse', 'news' and 'refuse', and the effect would be exaggerated by the high notes by which these words are distinguished in Robert Johnson's setting of the song. Firestone's aside could, however, be made to refer to Hecate. The witch has sung the line immediately preceding her son's spoken comment on the singing; the pronominal reference of his aside more certainly applies to her than to Malkin, who is gendered masculine (see 1.2.95); and the disyllabic pronunciation of her name throughout the play brings it into homophony with 'the cat'. If the aside is taken to refer to Hecate, then her singing voice should be remarkable—perhaps for dissonance.

To ride in the air
 When the moon shines fair
 And sing and dance and toy and kiss!
 65 Over woods, high rocks and mountains,
 Over seas, our mistress' fountains,
 Over steeple towers and turrets,
 We fly by night 'mongst troops of spirits.
 [ALL] [from off-stage or above]
 70 No ring of bells, to our ears sounds;
 No howls of wolves, no yelps of hounds.
 No, not the noise of waters' breach
 Or cannon's throat, our height can reach.
 [Exeunt all but Firestone]
 FIRESTONE Well, mother, I thank your kindness: you must 75 be gamboling i'th'air, and leave me to walk here like a fool, and a mortal. Exit

 ALMACHILDES Though the Fates have endued me with a pretty kind of lightness, that I can laugh at the world in a corner on't, and can make myself merry on fasting-nights to rub out a supper (which were a 5 precious quality in a young formal student), yet let the world know there is some difference betwixt my jovial condition and the lunar state of madness. I am not quite out of my wits: I know a bawd from an aqua vitae shop, a strumpet from wildfire, and a 10 beadle from brimstone. Now shall I try the honesty of a great woman soundly: she reckoning the duke's made away, I'll be hanged if I be not the next now. If I trust her as she's a woman, let one of her long hairs wind about my heart and be the end of me (which were a piteous lamentable tragedy, and might be entitled A Fair Warning for all Hair-Bracelets).
 Already there's an insurrection
 Among the people: they are up in arms
 Not out of any reason but their wills,
 Which are in them their saints. Sweating and swear-
 20 ing
 (Out of their zeal to rudeness) that no stranger
 (As they term her) shall govern over them,
 They say they'll raise a duke among themselves first.
Enter Duchess
 DUCHESS
 O Almachildes, I perceive already
 Our loves are born to crosses! We're beset 25 By multitudes and—which is worse—I fear me
 Unfriended too of any. My chief care
 Is for thy sweet youth's safety.
 ALMACHILDES [aside] He that believes you not Goes the right way to heaven, o' my conscience.
 DUCHESS
 There is no trusting of 'em! They are all as barren
 30 In pity as in faith: he that puts confidence
 In them, dies openly to the sight of all men,
 Not with his friends and neighbours in peace private,
 But as his shame, so his cold farewell is,
 Public and full of noise. But keep you close, sir,

 Plain for your safety. I expect the coming
 Of the Lord Governor, whom I will flatter
 With fair entreaties to appease their wildness
 And before him take a great grief upon me
 40 For the Duke's death, his strange and sudden loss;
 And when a quiet comes, expect thy joys.

DUCHESS	This fellow lives too long after the deed! I'm weary of his sight: he must die quickly Or I've small hope of safety. My great aim's At the Lord Governor's love: he is a spirit Can sway and countenance. These obey and crouch. My guiltiness had need of such a master That with a beck can suppress multitudes And dim misdeeds with radiance of his glory, Not to be seen with dazzled popular eyes. And here behold him come. Enter Lord Governor [and Servant]	LORD GOVERNOR [aside] How she's betrayed her! May I breathe no longer Than to do virtue service, and bring forth The fruits of noble thoughts, honest and loyal. This will be worth th'observing, and I'll do't. Exit	85
50	LORD GOVERNOR [to Servant] Return back to 'em: Say we desire 'em to be friends of peace Till they hear farther from us. [Exit Servant]	DUCHESS What a sure happiness confirms joy to me Now, in the times of my most imminent dangers! I looked for ruin, and increase of honour Meets me auspiciously! But my hopes are clogged now With an unworthy weight: there's the misfortune. What course shall I take now with this young man, For he must be no hindrance? I have thought on't! I'll take some witch's counsel for his end— That will be sur'st! Mischief is mischief's friend. Exit	90 95
60	DUCHESS O my lord, I fly unto the pity of your nobleness, The grieved'st lady that was e'er beset With storms of sorrows or wild rage of people. Never was woman's grief for loss of lord Dearer than mine to me.	Enter Sebastian and Fernando	4.2
LORD GOVERNOR	There's no right done To him now, madam, by wrong done to yourself: Your own good wisdom may instruct you so far. And for the people's tumult (which oft grows From liberty or rankness of long peace), I'll labour to restrain, as I've begun, madam.	SEBASTIAN If ever you knew force of love in life, sir, Give to mine pity!
65	DUCHESS My thanks and pray'rs shall ne'er forget you, sir, And, in time to come, my love.	FERNANDO You do ill to doubt me.
LORD GOVERNOR	Your love, sweet madam! You make my joys too happy! I did covet To be the fortunate man that blessing visits, Which I'll esteem the crown and full reward Of service present and deserts to come. It is a happiness I'll be bold to sue for When I have set a calm upon these spirits That now are up for ruin.	SEBASTIAN I could make bold with no friend seemlier Than with yourself, because you were in presence At our vow-making.
70	DUCHESS Sir, my wishes Are so well met in yours, so fairly answered And nobly recompensed, it makes me suffer In those extremes that few have ever felt, To hold two passions in one heart at once Of gladness, and of sorrow.	FERNANDO I'm a witness to't.	5
LORD GOVERNOR	Then, as the olive Is the meek ensign of fair, fruitful peace, So is this kiss, of yours. [He kisses her]	SEBASTIAN Then you best understand of all men living This is no wrong I offer, no abuse Either to faith or friendship, for we're registered Husband and wife in heaven, though there wants that Which often keeps licentious man in awe From starting from their wedlocks—the knot public. 'Tis in our souls knit fast, and how more precious The soul is than the body, so much judge The sacred and celestial tie within us More than the outward form, which calls but witness Here upon earth to what is done in heaven. Though I must needs confess the least is honourable, As an ambassador sent from a king Has honour by the employment, yet there's greater Dwells in the king that sent him: so in this.	10 15
75	DUCHESS Love's power be with you, sir!	FERNANDO I approve all you speak and will appear to you A faithful, pitying friend. Enter Florida	20
LORD GOVERNOR	Then, as the olive Is the meek ensign of fair, fruitful peace, So is this kiss, of yours. [He kisses her]	SEBASTIAN [apart to Fernando] Look, there is she, sir— One good for nothing but to make use of,
80	LORD GOVERNOR Then, as the olive Is the meek ensign of fair, fruitful peace, So is this kiss, of yours. [He kisses her]
DUCHESS	Love's power be with you, sir!

And conferring his intent with the Queen, persuaded her to kill Almachilde , and take him for her husband: she accepted . . .	preparing a cup of wine poisoned, and with her one hand she offered the same to Almachilde . . . he having drunk half the wine, and . . . mistrusting the poison, enforced Rosmunda to drink the rest, whereof both the one and the other within few hours died, and Longino bereft of his expectation to become King.'	65 for as for 81-2 the olive . . . peace See Genesis 8:11. 91 clogged encumbered, obstructed 4.2.22-7 she . . . her Although they may confuse a reader, the pronominal references of these lines would not pose problems in performance. 22-4 she . . . Plain, easy and probable, for when she comes
And finds one here that claims him—[aside] as I've taught
Both this to do't and he to compound with her—
'Twill stir belief the more of such a business.

FERNANDO
I praise the carriage well.

30 SEBASTIAN [to Florida] Hark you, sweet mistress:
I shall do you a simple turn in this,
For, she disgraced thus, you are up in favour Forever with her husband.

FLORIDA That's my hope, sir.
I would not take the pains else. Have you the keys
Of the garden-side, that I may get betimes in,
Softly, and take her lodging?

35 SEBASTIAN Yes, I have thought upon you:
Here be the keys.

FLORIDA [seizing keys]
Marry, and thanks, sweet sir!
Set me a work so still.

SEBASTIAN [aside] Your joys are false ones.
You're like to lie alone. You'll be deceived
Of the bedfellow you look for, else my purpose
40 Were in an ill case. He's on his fortnight's journey:
You'll find cold comfort there. A dream will be Even the best market you can make tonight.
[To Florida] She'll not be long now. You may lose no time, neither.
If she but take you at the door, 'tis enough.
45 When a suspect doth catch once, it burns mainly.
There may you end your business, and as cunningly
As if you were i'th' chamber, if you please
To use but the same art.

FLORIDA What need you urge that
Which comes so naturally I cannot miss on't?
50 What makes the devil so greedy of a soul
But 'cause he's lost his own, to all joys lost?
So 'tis our trade to set snares for other women
'Cause we were once caught ourselves. [Exit]

SEBASTIAN A sweet allusion!
Hell and a whore, it seems, are partners then,
55 In one ambition. Yet thou'rt here deceived now:
Thou canst set none to hurt or wrong her honour.

It rather makes it perfect. [To Fernando] Best of friends
That ever love's extremities were blessed with,
I feed mine arms with thee and call my peace
The offspring of thy friendship. I will think 60
This night my wedding-night, and with a joy
As reverend as religion can make man's
I will embrace this blessing: honest actions
Are laws unto themselves, and that good fear
Which is on others forced, grows kindly there. 65

FERNANDO
Hark, hark! One knocks: away, sir! 'Tis she certainly.
It sounds much like a woman's jealous 'larum.
[Exit Sebastian through one door]
Enter Isabella [through the other door]

ISABELLA
By your leave, sir.

FERNANDO You're welcome, gentlewoman.

ISABELLA
Our ladyship then stands us in no stead now.
One word in private, sir—
[She whispers in his ear]

FERNANDO No, surely, forsooth! 70
There is no such here: you've mistook the house.

ISABELLA
O, sir, that have I not! Excuse me there,
I come not with such ignorance: think not so, sir.
'Twas told me at the ent'ring of your house here
By one that knows him too well.

FERNANDO Who should that be? 75

ISABELLA
Nay, sir, betraying is not my profession;
But here I know he is, and I presume
He would give me admittance, if he knew on't,
As one on's nearest friends.

FERNANDO You're not his wife, forsooth?

ISABELLA
Yes, by my faith, am I.

FERNANDO Cry you mercy then, lady! 80

ISABELLA
She goes here by the name on's wife: good stuff!
But the bold strumpet never told me that.

at a house belonging to Fernando.
Florida vacates her chamber here so her way out of Fernando's house, Florida is to encounter Isabella and let the lady

Who's that? Young mistress?
 FRANCISCA Ay! Up, up, sweet Gasper!
 My sister hath both knocked and called this hour,
 And not a maid will stir.
 GASPERO They'll stir enough sometimes.
 [Noises off]
 FRANCISCA Hark, hark again! Gasper! O, run, run, prithee!
 GASPERO Give me leave to clothe myself.
 30 FRANCISCA Stand'st upon clothing
 In an extremity?
 [Noises off]
 Hark, hark again!
 She may be dead ere thou com'st. O, in quickly!
 [Exit Gaspero]
 He's gone. He cannot choose but be took now
 Or met in his return: that will be enough.
 Enter Antonio [armed, above]
 Brother? Here, take this light.
 [She takes torch from wall and hands it to him]
 35 ANTONIO My careful sister!
 [Exit above]
 FRANCISCA [calling after him]
 Look first in his own lodging, ere you enter.
 [Enter Antonio below, torch in hand, to discover key on stage floor]
 ANTONIO O abused confidence! Here's nothing of him
 But what betrays him more.
 FRANCISCA Then 'tis too true, brother!
 ANTONIO I'll make base lust a terrible example:
 No villainy e'er paid dearer.
 [He draws his sword]
 40 FRANCISCA Help! Hold, sir!
 ANTONIO I'm deaf to all humanity! [Exit. Noises off]
 FRANCISCA List, list:
 A strange and sudden silence after all!
 I trust he's spoiled 'em both! Too dear a happiness!
 O, how I tremble between doubts and joys!
 [Enter Antonio below]
 45 ANTONIO There perish both! Down to the house of falsehood, Where perjurous wedlock weeps! O, perjurous woman!
 She'd took the innocence of sleep upon her
 At my approach, and would not see me come—
 As if she'd lain there, like a harmless soul
 50 And never dreamed of mischief. What's all this now?

I feel no ease: the burden's not yet off
 So long as th'abuse sticks in my knowledge.
 O, 'tis a pain of hell to know one's shame!
 Had it been hid, and done, it'd been done happy,
 For he that's ignorant lives long, and merry. 55
 FRANCISCA [Aside]
 I shall know all now.—Brother!
 ANTONIO Come down quickly,
 For I must kill thee too!
 FRANCISCA Me?
 ANTONIO Stay not long
 If thou desir'st to die with little pain.
 Make haste, I'd wish thee, and come willingly:
 If I be forced to come, I shall be cruel 60
 Above a man to thee.
 FRANCISCA Why, sir, my brother?
 ANTONIO Talk to thy soul, if thou wilt talk at all.
 To me thou'rt lost forever.
 FRANCISCA This is fearful in you
 Beyond all reason, brother. Would you thus Reward me for my care and truth shown to you? 65
 ANTONIO A curse upon 'em both, and thee for company!
 'Tis that too diligent thankless care of thine
 Makes me a murderer, and that ruinous truth
 That lights me to the knowledge of my shame.
 Hadst thou been secret, then had I been happy 70
 And had a hope (like man) of joys to come.
 Now here I stand, a stain to my creation
 And, which is heavier than all torments to me,
 Ha' understanding of this base adultery
 And that thou toldst me first, which thou deserv'st 75
 Death worthily for.
 FRANCISCA If that be the worst, hold, sir!
 Hold, brother! I can ease your knowledge straight.
 By my soul's hopes, I can! There's no such thing.
 ANTONIO How?
 FRANCISCA Bless me but with life, I'll tell you all.
 Your bed was never wronged.
 ANTONIO What, never wronged? 80
 FRANCISCA I ask but mercy, as I deal with truth now.
 'Twas only my deceit, my plot and cunning
 To bring disgrace upon her, by that means
 To keep mine own hid, which none knew but she.
 To speak troth: I'd a child by Aberzanes, sir. 85

For my delivery.

ANTONIO O, my wrath's redoubled!

FRANCISCA
At my return, she could speak all my folly
And blamed me with good counsel. I, for fear
It should be made known, thus rewarded her,
Wrought you into suspicion without cause
And at your coming raised up Gasper suddenly,
Sent him but in before you, by a falsehood,
Which (to your kindled jealousy) I knew
Would add enough. What's now confessed is true.

ANTONIO
The more I hear, the worse it fares with me.
I've killed 'em now for nothing: yet the shame
Follows my blood still. Once more, come down.
Look you, my sword goes up.
[He sheathes his sword]

Call Hermio to me,
Let the new man alone: he'll wake too soon
To find his mistress dead, and lose a service.
[Exit Francisca above]

Already the day breaks upon my guilt.
I must be brief and sudden. Hermio!
[Enter Hermio]

HERMIO
Sir.

ANTONIO
Run, knock up Aberzanes speedily.
Say I desire his company this morning:
To yonder horse-race, tell him. That will fetch him.
O, hark you, by the way—
[He whispers in his ear]

HERMIO Yes, sir.

ANTONIO Use speed now,
Or I will ne'er use thee more, and perhaps
I speak in a right hour. My grief o'erflows:
I must in private go and vent my woes.

[Enter Antonio and Aberzanes, [his clothing in disarray]]

ANTONIO
You are welcome, sir.

ABERZANES I think I'm worthy on't,
For look you, sir, I come untrussed, in troth.

ANTONIO [aside]
The more's the pity (honest men go to't!)
That slaves should 'scape it.—What blade have you got there?

ABERZANES Nay, I know not that, sir. I am not acquainted greatly with the blade. I am sure 'tis a good scabbard, and that satisfies me.

ANTONIO 'Tis long enough indeed, if that be good.

ABERZANES I love to wear a long weapon: 'tis a thing Commendable.

ANTONIO I pray draw it, sir.

ABERZANES It is not to be drawn.

ANTONIO Not to be drawn?

ABERZANES I do not care to see't. To tell you troth, sir,
'Tis only a holiday thing, to wear by a man's side.

ANTONIO Draw it, or I'll rip thee down from neck to navel,
Though there's small glory in't.

ABERZANES Are you in earnest, sir?

ANTONIO I'll tell thee that anon.

ABERZANES Why, what's the matter, sir?

ANTONIO
What a base misery is this in life now!
This slave had so much daring courage in him
To act a sin, would shame whole generations;
But hath not so much honest strength about him
To draw a sword, in way of satisfaction.
This shows thy great guilt, that thou dar'st not fight.

ABERZANES Yes, I dare fight, sir, in an honest cause.

ANTONIO Why, come then, slave! Thou'st made my sister a whore!

ABERZANES Prove that an honest cause and I'll be hanged.

ANTONIO So many starting-holes? Can I light no way?
Go to, you shall have your wish: all honest play.
Come forth, thou fruitful wickedness, thou seed
Of Shame and Murder.
[Enter Francisca]

Take to thee in wedlock
Baseness and Cowardice, a fit match for thee.
Come, sir, along with me.

 I would I had such another to bestow on you, sir.

 I tell you, you must weep hard if you do.

 Spread, subtle poison. Now my shame in her 55 Will die when I die: there's some comfort yet.
 I do but think how each man's punishment
 Proves still a kind of justice to himself.
 I was the man that told this innocent gentlewoman,
 Whom I did falsely wed and falsely kill,
 60 That he that was her husband first, by contract,
 Was slain i'th' field, and he's known yet to live.
 So did I cruelly beguile her heart—
 For which I'm well rewarded. So is Gasper,

 And falls most weighty.

 You're guilty of no death. They're only hurt,
 And that not mortally.
 ANTONIO Thou breath'st untruths.
 [Enter Gaspero, [wounded]]
 HERMIO
 Speak, Gasper, for me then.
 GASPERO Your unjust rage, sir
 70 Has hurt me without cause
 ANTONIO 'Tis changed to grief for't.
 How fares my wife?
 GASPERO No doubt, sir, she fares well,
 For she ne'er felt your fury. The poor sinner

 then?
 GASPERO
 Nay, ask not me, sir: your struck doe within Tells a strange tale of her.
 ANTONIO This is unsufferable.
 80 Never had man such means to make him mad!
 O, that the poison would but spare my life
 Till I had found her out!
 HERMIO Your wish is granted, sir.
 Upon the faithfulness of a pitying servant
 I gave you none at all. My heart was kinder.
 85 Let not conceit abuse you: you're as healthful—
 For any drug—as life yet ever found you.
 ANTONIO
 Why, here's a happiness, wipes off mighty sorrows!
 The benefit of ever-pleasing service

LORD GOVERNOR
False?

ANTONIO
Impudent, adulterous!

LORD GOVERNOR
You're too loud
95 And grow too bold too, with her virtuous meekness.
Enter Florida, [wounded]
Who dare accuse her?

FLORIDA
Here's one dare and can.
She lies this night with Celio, her own servant,
The place Fernando's house.

LORD GOVERNOR
Thou dost amaze us!

ANTONIO
Why, here's but lust translated from one baseness
100 Into another: here I thought to have caught 'em
But lighted wrong, by false intelligence,
And made me hurt the innocent. But now
I'll make my revenge dreadfuller than a tempest.
An army should not stop me, or a sea
Divide 'em from my revenge. Exit

LORD GOVERNOR
I'll not speak
To have her spared, if she be base and guilty.
If otherwise, heaven will not see her wronged:
I need not take care for her. Let that woman
Be carefully looked to, both for health, and sureness.
110 It is not that mistaken wound thou wear'st
Shall be thy privilege.

FLORIDA
You cannot torture me
Worse than the surgeon does, so long I care not.
[Exeunt Florida and Gaspero]

LORD GOVERNOR
If she be adulterous, I will never trust
Virtues in women: they're but veils for lust. Exit

HERMIO
115 To what a lasting ruin mischief runs!
I had thought I had well and happily ended all
In keeping back the poison, and new rage now Spreads a worse venom. My poor lady grieves me!
'Tis strange to me that her sweet seeming virtues
120 Should be so meanly overtook with Celio,
A servant. 'Tis not possible.
Enter Isabella and Sebastian

ISABELLA
Good morrow, Hermio!
My sister stirring yet?

HERMIO
How? Stirring, forsooth!
Here has been simple stirring. Are you not hurt,
Madam? Pray speak: we have a surgeon ready.

ISABELLA
How a surgeon?

125 HERMIO
Hath been at work these five hours.

ISABELLA
How he talks!

HERMIO
Did you not meet my master?

ISABELLA
How your master? Why, came he home tonight?

HERMIO
Then know you nothing. Madam, please you
But walk in, you shall hear strange business.

ISABELLA [to Sebastian]
I'm much beholding to your truth now, am I not? 130
You've served me fair: my credit's stained for ever.
Exeunt [Isabella and Hermio]

SEBASTIAN
This is the wicked'st fortune that e'er blew!
We're both undone, for nothing: there's no way
Flatters recovery now. The thing's so gross
Her disgrace grieves me more than a life's loss. Exit 135

Enter Duchess, Hecate, Firestone [with necromantic equipment, including a cauldron] 5.2

What death is't you desire for Almachildes?

DUCHESS

HECATE
Then I have fitted you.
Here lie the gifts of both sudden and subtle.
His picture, made in wax and gently molten
By a blue fire kindled with dead men's eyes,
Will waste him by degrees. 5

DUCHESS
In what time, prithee?

HECATE
Perhaps in a moon's progress.

DUCHESS
What, a month?
Out upon pictures, if they be so tedious!
Give me things with some life.

HECATE
Then seek no farther.

DUCHESS
This must be done with speed, dispatched this night 10
If it may possibly.

HECATE
I have it for you!
Here's that will do't. Stay but perfection's time,
And that's not five hours hence.

DUCHESS
Canst thou do this?

HECATE
Can I?

DUCHESS
I mean, so closely! 15

HECATE
So closely, do you mean too?

DUCHESS
So artfully, so cunningly!

HECATE
Worse and worse! Doubts and incredulities—
They make me mad! Let scrupulous greatness know:

109 sureness security
111 privilege protection from arrest
120 meanly basely
overtook caught
122 stirring awake, up and about

123 stirring commotion, uproar 134 Flatters recovery fosters hopes of recovery
5.2.2 fitted supplied, furnished
3 gifts powers

8 tedious dilatory, slow
12 perfection's completion's
15 closely quickly (an extension of sense, from spatial to temporal proximity)
19 scrupulous distrustful

20 Cum volui ripis ipsis mirantibus amnes
In fontes redieri suos concussaque sisto,
Stantia concutio, cantu freta nubila pello,
Nubilaque induco ventos, abigoque vocoque,
Viperias rumpo verbis, et carmine fauces
25 Vivaque saxa, sua convulsaque robora terra,
Et silvas moveo, jubeoque tremiscere montes
Et mugire solum, manesque exire sepulchris.
Teque luna traho. Can you doubt me then, daughter?
That can make mountains tremble, miles of woods walk,
30 Whole earth's foundation bellow, and the spirits
Of the entombed to burst out from their marbles,
Nay, draw yon moon to my involved designs?
FIRESTONE I know as well as can be when my mother's mad and our great cat angry, for one spits French then, 35 and th'other spits Latin.
DUCHESS
I did not doubt you, mother.
HECATE No? What did you?
My power's so firm, it is not to be questioned.
DUCHESS
Forgive what's past; and now I know th'offensiveness
That vexes art, I'll shun th'occasion ever.
HECATE
40 Leave all to me and my five sisters, daughter.
It shall be conveyed in at owlet time,
Take you no care. My spirits know their moments.
Raven or screech-owl never fly by th' door
But they call in, I thank 'em, and they lose not by't.
45 I give 'em barley soaked in infants' blood:
They shall have semina cum sanguine,
Their gorge crammed full, if they come once to our house.
We are no niggard. [Exit Duchess]
FIRESTONE They fare but too well when they come hither:
50 they eat up as much t'other night as would have made me a good conscionable pudding.

HECATE
Give me some lizard's brain, quickly, Firestone!
Where's Grannam Stadlin, and all the rest o'th' sisters?
FIRESTONE All at hand, forsooth.
HECATE
Give me marmaritin, some bear-breach. When?
FIRESTONE
Here's bear-breach and lizard's brain, forsooth.
HECATE Into the vessel.
And fetch three ounces of the red-haired girl
I killed last midnight.
FIRESTONE Whereabouts, sweet mother?
HECATE
Hip. Hip or flank. Where is the Acopus?
FIRESTONE
You shall have Acopus, forsooth.
HECATE
Stir, stir about, whilst I begin the charm.
A Charm Song: about a vessel
Black spirits and white, red spirits and grey,
Mingle, mingle, mingle, you that mingle may.
Titty, Tiffin, keep it stiff in.
65 Fire-drake, Pucky, make it lucky.
Liard, Robin, you must bob in.
Round, around, around, about, about,
All ill come running in, all good keep out.
[Enter Witches]
[STADLIN]
Here's the blood of a bat.
70
HECATE
Put in that, O put in that.
[HOPPO]
Here's libbard's bane.
HECATE
Put in again.
[STADLIN]
The juice of toad, the oil of adder.

20-8 Cum volui... luna traho In Book VII of Ovid's Metamorphoses, Medea, abandoned by Jason, speaks these lines within a vengeful prayer to the gods of the groves and the night. The Ovidian passage is quoted and translated in Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft (XII, 7), near the beginning of the first of a series of chapters on charms.
31 marbles sepulchres. (The word translates sepulchris of l. 27.)
32 involved (a) complicated (b) covert
34 spits French a jibe at French vowel sounds as resembling feline noises. Malkin's 'French' accent has been heard at 3.3.51, 3.3.53, and 3.3.55.
39 shun th'occasion avoid giving cause [for offence]
40 five sisters This line is the only indication of the size of Hecate's coven. However, with no other witches onstage to be tallied at this point, the line need not be construed as a firm census. Stadlin and Hoppo are the only 'sisters' required to speak, and to be spoken to.

46 semina cum sanguine grain with blood
51 conscionable fair
52 lizard's brain See the list of venefical aphrodisiacs quoted from Scot's Discoverie of Witchcraft (vi, 7) in the note to 1.2.163-7.
53 Grannam grandam, old woman
55 bear-breach species of herbaceous plant of the genus Acanthus. Its popular names—bear-breach, brank-ursine, bear's foot—are thought to refer to the shagginess and shape of the leaf.
60 Acopus Anagyros or bean trefoil, a bushy shrub used medicinally in childbirth
62 Stir, stir about Hecate's command suggests that Firestone stir the contents of the cauldron, at least initially. He may move away from it to find the ingredient which he produces at l. 77.
62.1 Charm Song Like the song at 3.3.39-55, this song is invoked, by title only, in the text of Macbeth as printed in the Shakespearean First Folio (1623). For this song, however, no musical setting is known to have survived, and it is possible that the charm was chanted. The final exchange between Hecate and Firestone at ll. 84-8 can be construed as evidence that music only begins there, at the end of the scene, with the witches' dance. (See note to 5.2.88.1.)

about a vessel The subtitle of the charm song requires its singer(s) to go around the cauldron.
63-7 Black spirits... Robin See notes to 1.2.1-5 and 1.2.105-1.2.106.1.
72 libbard's bane leopardsbane, a plant of the genus Doronicum. Among the witches in Jonson's Masque of Queens, Hag 9, the herbalist, 'ha' been plucking, plants among, | Hemlock, henbane, adder's tongue, | Nightshade, moonwort, libbard's bane' (ll. 174-77).

[HOPPO] Those will make the younker madder.
 75 HECATE Put in. There's all, and rid the stench.
 FIRESTONE Nay, here's three ounces of the red-haired wench.
 ALL Round, around, around, about, about,
 All ill come running in, all good keep out.
 [End Song]
 HECATE So, so, enough. Into the vessel with it:
 80 There, 't hath the true perfection. I am so light
 At any mischief! There's no villainy
 But is a tune, methinks.
 FIRESTONE [Aside] A tune! 'Tis to the tune of damnation 85 then, I warrant you, and that song hath a villainous burden.
 HECATE Come, my sweet sisters. Let the air strike our tune
 Whilst we show reverence to yon peeping moon.
Here they dance the Witches' Dance and exeunt
 5.3 Enter Lord Governor, Isabella, [Sebastian], Florida
[bandaged], Francisca, Aberzanes, Gaspero
[bandaged], [Servants]
 ISABELLA My lord, I have given you nothing but the truth
 Of a most plain and innocent intent.
 My wrongs being so apparent in this woman,
 A creature that robs wedlock of all comfort
 5 Where'er she fastens, I could do no less
 But seek means privately to shame his folly.
 No farther reached my malice, and it glads me
 That none but my base injurer is found
 To be my false accuser.
 LORD GOVERNOR This is strange
 10 That he should give the wrongs, yet seek revenge.
 [To Sebastian] But sirrah, you! You are accused here doubly:
 First, by your lady, for a false intelligence

That caused her absence, which much hurts her name
 Though her intents were blameless; next, by this woman
 For an adulterous design and plot
 Practised between you to entrap her honour
 15 Whilst she, for her hire, should enjoy her husband.
 Your answer!
 SEBASTIAN Part of this is truth, my lord,
 To which I'm guilty, in a rash intent,
 But clear in act, and she most clear in both,
 20 Not sanctity more spotless.
 [Enter Hermio]
 HERMIO O my Lord!
 LORD GOVERNOR What news breaks there?
 HERMIO Of strange destruction!
 Here stands the lady that within this hour
 Was made a widow.
 LORD GOVERNOR How?
 HERMIO Your niece, my lord!
 A fearful, unexpected accident
 25 Brought death to meet his fury; for my lord
 Ent'ring Fernando's house like a rash tempest
 Which nothing heeds but its own violent rage,
 Blinded with wrath and jealousy, which scorn guides,
 From a false trapdoor fell into a depth—
 30 Exceeds a temple's height—which takes into it
 Part of the dungeon that falls threescore fathom
 Under the castle.
 LORD GOVERNOR O you seed of lust,
 Wrongs and revenges wrongful, with what terrors
 You do present yourselves to wretched man
 35 When his soul least expects you!
 ISABELLA I forgive him
 All his wrongs now, and sign it with my pity.
 FLORIDA O my sweet servant!
 [She swoons]
 LORD GOVERNOR Look to yon light mistress.
 GASPERO She's in a swoon, my lord.

75 younker fashionable young man. The charm is to be used on Almachildes, who at 4.1.5 has characterized himself as young.
 85 that song i.e., 'damnation'
 86 burden (a) bass accompaniment to melodic line (b) refrain. If Firestone carries off the cauldron on this line, then there will be further wordplay on (c) weight, load.
 88.1 the Witches' Dance The veneficial anti-masque to Jonson's Masque of Queens was bracketed by dancing: his eleven hags danced immediately before they first spoke, and then again immediately before they disappeared. Jonson's account of their first dance pronounces it

'an usual ceremony at their convents, or meetings, where sometimes also they are visored and masked'. His account of the second dance is rather more helpful for a reconstruction of the Witches' Dance in Middleton's play. After casting spells for nearly 100 lines of Jonsonian verse, 'with a strange and sudden music they fell into a magical dance full of posterous change and gesticulation, but most applying to their property, who at their meetings do all things contrary to the custom of men, dancing back to back and hip to hip, their hands joined, and making their circles backward, to the left hand, with strange fantastic motions of their heads and bodies.' In a note to this account Jonson records that his hags were armed with brooms: Middleton's witches may also have been equipped with them. For the music, see Companion, p. 158.

 5.3.12 intelligence communication, information
 14 this woman Florida
 16-17 her...she...her...her Isabella's... Florida... Florida's... Isabella's
 20 clear innocent
 32 fathom unit of linear measure equivalent to 6 feet. That Fernando's house should include a shaft reaching a depth of 360 feet is sufficiently remarkable to invite an allegorical reading of this architectural feature as hell-mouth.

LORD GOVERNOR Convey her hence!
 40 It is a sight would grieve a modest eye
 To see a strumpet's soul sink into passion
 For him that was the husband of another.—
 [Exeunt Servants, supporting Florida]
 Yet all this clears not you.
 [Sebastian removes his disguise]
 SEBASTIAN Thanks to heaven
 That I am now of age to clear myself then!
 LORD GOVERNOR Sebastian?
 SEBASTIAN The same, much wronged, sir!
 45 ISABELLA Am I certain
 Of what mine eye takes joy to look upon?
 SEBASTIAN Your service cannot alter me from knowledge
 I am your servant ever.
 LORD GOVERNOR Welcome to life, sir!—
 Gasper, thou swor'st his death.
 GASPERO I did indeed, my lord,
 50 And have been since well paid for't: one forsworn mouth
 Hath got me two or three more here.
 SEBASTIAN I was dead, sir,
 Both to my joys and all men's understanding,
 Till this my hour of life: for 'twas my fortune
 To make the first of my return to Urbin
 55 A witness to that marriage—since which time
 I have walked beneath myself and all my comforts,
 Like one on earth whose joys are laid above;
 And though it had been offence small in me
 To enjoy mine own, I left her pure and free.
 LORD GOVERNOR
 60 The greater and more sacred is thy blessing,
 For where heaven's bounty holy groundwork finds,
 'Tis like a sea encompassing chaste minds.
 Enter Duchess
 HERMIO The Duchess comes, my lord.
 LORD GOVERNOR Be you then all witnesses
 Of an intent most horrid.
 DUCHESS [Aside] One poor night
 65 Ends Almachildes now.
 Better his meaner fortunes wept than ours
 That took the true height of a prince's spirit
 To match unto their greatness: such lives as his
 Were only meant to break the force of fate
 70 Ere it came at us, and receive the venom.
 'Tis but a usual friendship for a mistress

To lose some forty years' life in hopeful time
 And hazard an eternal soul for ever,
 As young as he has done, and more desertful.
 LORD GOVERNOR Madam. 75
 DUCHESS My lord.
 LORD GOVERNOR
 This is the hour that I've so long desired:
 The tumult's full appeased. Now may we both Exchange embraces with a fortunate arm
 And practise to make love knots, thus—
 [The body of the] Duke is discovered
 DUCHESS My lord! 80
 LORD GOVERNOR
 Thus, lustful woman and bold murd'ress, thus!
 Blessed powers, to make my loyalty and truth so happy!
 Look thee, thou shame of greatness! Stain of honour,
 Behold thy work, and weep before thy death
 If thou be'st blessed with sorrow and a conscience, 85
 Which is a gift from heaven and seldom knocks
 At any murderer's breast with sounds of comfort.
 See this, thy worthy and unequalled piece,
 A fair encouragement for another husband!
 DUCHESS
 Bestow me upon death, sir. I am guilty 90
 And of a cruelty above my cause.
 His injury was too low for my revenge.
 Perform a justice that may light all others
 To noble actions. Life is hateful to me,
 Beholding my dead lord. Make us an one 95
 In death, whom marriage made one of two living
 Till cursèd fury parted us. My lord,
 I covet to be like him.
 LORD GOVERNOR No, my sword
 Shall never stain the virgin brightness on't
 With blood of an adult'ress.
 DUCHESS There, my lord, 100
 I dare my accuser and defy the world,
 Death, shame and torment. Blood I am guilty of
 But not adultery, not the breach of honour.
 LORD GOVERNOR
 No? Come forth, Almachildes!
 Enter Almachildes
 DUCHESS Almachildes!
 105 Hath Time brought him about to save himself
 By my destruction? I am justly doomed.
 LORD GOVERNOR [to Almachildes] Do you know this woman?
 ALMACHILDES I have known her better, sir, than at this time.
 LORD GOVERNOR But she defies you there. 110

 54 Urbin Urbino. Having headed the play with 'The Scene Ravenna' (a city altogether distinct, although not very distant, from Urbino), the manuscript probably records an error here. In Bedingfield's translation of Machiavelli's Istorie fiorentine, Urbino is mentioned two pages after the narrative which was Middleton's source for the Duchess/Almachildes plot.

ALMACHILDES That's the common trick of them all.
DUCHESS
Nay, since I am touched so near, before my death,
then,
In right of honour's innocence, I am bold
To call heaven, and my woman here, to witness.
Enter Amoretta
115 My lord, let her speak truth, or may she perish.
AMORETTA
Then, sir, by all the hopes of a maid's comfort
Either in faithful service or blessed marriage,
The woman that his blinded folly knew
Was only a hired strumpet, a professor
120 Of lust and impudence, which here is ready
To approve what I have spoken.
ALMACHILDES A common strumpet!
This comes of scarves: I'll never more wear
An haberdasher's shop before mine eyes again.
LORD GOVERNOR
My sword is proud thou art lightened of that sin.
Die, then, a murd'ress only.
[Duke revives]
DUKE Live a duchess, 125
Better than ever loved, embraced and honoured!
DUCHESS
My lord?
DUKE Nay, since in honour thou canst justly rise,
Vanish all wrongs: thy former practice dies.
I thank thee, Almachildes, for my life;
This lord, for truth; and heaven, for such a wife, 130
Who, though her intent sinned, yet she makes amends
With grief and honour, virtue's noblest ends.
What grieved you then shall never more offend you:
Your father's skull with honour we'll inter
And give the peace due to the sepulchre. 135
And in all times, may this day ever prove
A day of triumph, joy and honest love. Exeunt

THE TRAGEDY OF MACBETH: A GENETIC TEXT

Text edited by Gary Taylor, introduced by Inga-Stina Ewbank

IN including The Tragedy of Macbeth in an edition of The Collected Works of Thomas Middleton the intention is not to dispute the fact that the greater part of this play, by far, was written by William Shakespeare. On the other hand, the consensus of editorial and critical opinion, since the Clarendon edition of 1869, is that there are non-Shakespearean interpolations in the first printed text of Macbeth, the 1623 Folio; and recent scholarship points unmistakably to Middleton as the author of these. The Folio text calls for the performance of two songs, referred to only by their opening phrases, 'Come away, come away, &c.' (3.5.36.1) and 'Blacke Spirits, &c.' (4.1.43.1), which can be found in full in Middleton's tragicomedy The Witch; the text of both is printed, with minor variants, in the 1674 edition of William Davenant's Macbeth, which is clearly based on a prompt copy of Shakespeare's play. Middleton's hand can also be seen in the Hecate material framing these songs, in 3.5 and 4.1. Gary Taylor concludes that Middleton wrote about eleven per cent of the adapted text, and Stephen Orgel notes that in performance the added songs 'would have been accompanied by dances, which means that in the theatre these scenes took a good deal longer than they do on the page'. Middleton may also be responsible for cutting one quarter or more of the original. The cuts cannot be recovered, of course, but this edition typographically distinguishes material probably altered or added by Middleton. Macbeth is presented here, then, as part of both the Shakespeare and the Middleton canon, to be read and seen if not at the intersection of the two canons at least at a point where one touches the other rather more than tangentially.

The interpolations have on the whole had a bad press: disapproved of by editors, ignored by critics, and almost invariably cut by modern theatre directors although, as Brooke points out, they 'form the core of the operatic development of the play which held the stage' until the twentieth century (53). In the Restoration, Davenant's staging of Macbeth delighted Samuel Pepys with its 'variety of dancing and music' (19 April 1667), and to eighteenth- and nineteenth-century audiences Macbeth was a play of spectacle and music—indeed Verdi's opera (1847) was based on, and not a far cry from, contemporary London stage versions. Twentieth-century distaste for the Hecate scenes is part of a more general purism, the theatrical equivalent of the scholarly search for authenticity, for the 'original' play. If Macbeth is seen as Shakespeare's play, with the stress on 'Shakespeare's' rather than on 'play', then it is also natural to see Middleton's additions as contaminating a text 'owned' by Shakespeare. For all our knowledge of Renaissance stage practice, we find it easier to approach a play text in terms of the imaginative coherence imposed on it by an individual mind than as the record of stage performances. We know that in the Elizabethan and Jacobean theatre the company, not the author, owned the text, and that in a play kept in active repertory cuts, revisions, and additions would be made to suit particular performances—at court, for example, or in the provinces—or to adapt the play to changing theatre conditions or popular taste. Title-pages of printed texts often proudly claim 'new additions'. We know that Shakespeare, as not only playwright but also actor and shareholder in his company, would have had more control than most authors over the performing texts of his plays, at least until he left the theatre, in or about 1613; but also that even at the height of his professional power he regarded collaboration as normal. So, of course, did Middleton, who wrote alone, in collaboration, and as an adapter, and for several companies, including the King's Men. Both would have been baffled by the terms, still fundamental to much thinking about Renaissance drama, in which Henrik Ibsen in 1883 defended his 'ownership' of a play that reviewers had found derivative, by insisting that 'that which makes a work of art the spiritual property of its originator is that he has imprinted on it the stamp of his own personality'.

In the playhouse the additions to Macbeth clearly proved their worth, and Heminges and Condell were proud to include in the Folio an augmented and altered text of Macbeth, although it could not possibly have been entirely Shakespeare's 'spiritual property' and may well have two personalities imprinted on it. A further comparison with Ibsen may be to the point. Once he had gained recognition as a playwright, Ibsen preserved the manuscript drafts of his plays with a care which suggests that he wanted posterity to see and study them as underlying the printed corpus, pointing the difference from, and the way to, the final, authoritative version in which each phrase and each structural unit had reached its definitive form. For Macbeth we have only the Folio text, and the way to it, through revisions, cuts, and additions, must remain conjectural. This is not the place to rehearse all the many conjectures that have been made, ever since Clark and Wright (1869) assigned 300 lines of Macbeth to Middleton. But R. V. Holdsworth's work on Middleton's collaboration with Shakespeare must be mentioned, as he has demonstrated remarkably convincing signs of Middleton's hand—the idiosyncratic stage direction 'Enter . . . meeting . . .' (1.2 and 3.5) and other verbal characteristics—not only in the Hecate passages but also at a number of other points in the text. It seems possible that Middleton was responsible both for cuts which produced the famous brevity and tightness of the extant text and for additions which either merely bridge such cuts or, as with the Hecate scenes, bring in his own material for reuse. Such recycling is a typically Middletonian practice. Thus, for example, he reuses a song from Masque of Cupids in More Dissemblers Besides Women, and a song from Dissemblers in The Widow; both plays were written in the period when he is most likely to have been revising Macbeth (about 1616).

In order to see how the text of Macbeth relates to Middleton's as well as Shakespeare's canon it is necessary to review briefly the relation between this play and The Witch, since the same songs appear in both plays and the Hecate passages are inextricably connected with the songs. Because Hecate shares responses with singers who have plot parts in The Witch, the songs are almost bound to have been originally written for that play. The likelihood on which the following discussion is built is that some time after Shakespeare's retirement from the theatre Middleton made additions to a text of Macbeth which already had the weird sisters and a cauldron scene (4.1); that he interpolated the two songs and a dance from the 'ignorantly-ill-fated' Witch which, probably written in 1616, had fallen foul of the censor; and that, in order to motivate the appearance of Hecate in these, he added the rest of what is now 3.5 and some lines in 4.1 (39-43; 143-50). The result was to give the play a new dimension of theatrical magic. Middleton may well have seen himself as both underscoring Shakespeare's intentions in the play and adding his own stamp by local subversions of those intentions.

To support and develop this point some re-tracing of the road to the Folio text is necessary. The play was first performed in 1606-7; and, whether or not its first performance was before James I, there is little doubt that the 'weird sisters' owe something to the King's interest in witchcraft. Ben Jonson capitalized on that interest in the spectacular antimasque of witches which he devised for his Masque of Queens, performed at court on 2 February

Three bearded witches meet the horseless Macbeth and Banquo; from a 1901 edition of Mary Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare

1609 and printed soon thereafter. It is possible that in a first version of Macbeth the weird sisters were nothing like the 'secret black and midnight hags' we now know. The creatures who Banquo thinks 'should be women | and yet your beards forbid me to interpret | that you are so' (1.3.42-4), summon up the gender ambivalence of an early modern play like The Roaring Girl or of a postmodern image like the Dutch artist Charlotte Schleichert's 'Bearded Women Make Great Leaders'. It does not seem to have anything in common with Simon Forman's account of the performance of Macbeth that he saw at the Globe on 20 April 1611, which refers to Macbeth's encounter with 'three women fairies or nymphs'. Holinshed, in telling of Macbeth, has the phrase 'some nymphs or fairies' as well as a woodcut representing three quite un-haglike ladies in medieval costume. Forman's own interest in the occult, as well as Holinshed's reference to Macbeth's later trust in the words of 'certain wizards' and the prophecies of 'a certain witch', makes it oddly significant that Forman's account has nothing corresponding to Macbeth 4.1, perhaps because as originally written the scene was much less impressive than it had become by 1623.

Yet Shakespeare's imagination was powerfully engaged with the 'charm of powerful trouble' that brews in 4.1.

There is some overlap of materia magica between Jonson's and Shakespeare's witches, but the Jonsonian hell-broth remains verbal only, whereas in Macbeth a cauldron is producing a real, nasty stew surreally compacted of social and moral evil:

finger of birth-strangled babe ditch-delivered by a drab make the gruel thick and slab

At the same time Shakespeare integrates the cauldron scene with Macbeth's descent into a hell of his own making. The king bursts in on the witches' ritual with his chaos-defying demand to know his future; and in response they stage for him a show that is so structured as to repeat in a different theatrical mode the ironies of the banquet scene (3.4). The banquet, intended to be a formal occasion in celebration of Macbeth's kingship, collapses into shambles because of the repeated appearance of the ghost of Banquo. The witches' show has its own far more spectacular formality. Macbeth is equivocally assured of his future in a perverse version of a royal entertainment. The witches act as choric presenters; and thunder substitutes for music. It is ironically appropriate that Macbeth should refer to his royal self, in this stage configuration, as 'our high-placed Macbeth' 4.1.115. It is ironic, too, that when the witches, directors of the show, want it to end on Macbeth's belief that he 'shall live the lease of nature, pay his breath | To time and mortal custom', it is his own insistence on being 'satisfied' that provokes the climax: the cauldron sinks and oboes announce 'A show of eight kings, the last with a glass in his hand'.

On stage, this looks like an inversion of the fundamental gesture of the Stuart court masque which lodges all past, present, and future virtue in the king. In The Masque of Queens the twelve witches of the antimasque threaten to bring chaos but vanish to a loud blast of music as the scene changes to the House of Fame displaying the twelve queens. Eleven of them are 'of times long gone'; the twelfth is 'Bel-Anna' (Queen Anne) who possesses all the virtues for which the others were famed but of course ultimately 'Confesseth all the lustre of her merit: | To you, most royal and most happy king' (407-8). In Macbeth the witches remain in charge; and in the procession of kings, staged to 'show his eyes and grieve his heart', Macbeth's past and present crimes are seen to control his future 'to th' crack of doom'. Judgement is passed on Macbeth from the point of view of the audience's present as the eighth king holds up the magic mirror in which Macbeth sees 'many more', some carrying 'twofold balls and treble sceptres'—as did the ninth Stuart monarch, James VI of Scotland, who was also James I of England and Wales.

The direction in which Shakespeare had taken Macbeth would have seemed congenial to Middleton who, from the beginning to the end of his career, excelled in the ironic use of conventional dramatic devices. He could write 'straight' pageants, but he could also use pageant and masque material to ironic ends, from Your Five Gallants to Women, Beware Women. As he added music, song, and dance to Macbeth, he resolutely introduced Hecate as a formal presenter of such material. Her two appearances are framed by self-reflexive references to the 'art' of the witch scenes. When she first enters, in a clap of thunder, it is to rebuke the three witches for trafficking with Macbeth without calling on her to 'show the glory of our art' (3.5.9)—a nudge to the text for not making enough, theatrically, of the witch world. With the 'Come away' scene the audience is then shown that 'glory'. In 4.1 her last few lines (assuming that they are meant to be hers) almost amount to putting quotation marks around the interpolated passages:

come sisters cheer we up his sprites and show the best of our delights
I'll charm the air to give a sound while you perform your antic round that this great king may kindly say our duties did his welcome pay (4.1.145-50)

Within the fiction of the play the idea of cheering Macbeth up in this fashion is as ironic as that of Dr Faustus taking pleasure in the pageant of the Seven Deadly Sins. Un-Shakespearean as these lines may seem, Middleton makes their irony structurally cohesive, for the 'welcome' for 'this great king' recalls the elaborate welcoming ceremony in the banquet scene, where the 'hearty welcome' that Macbeth offers his guests is only one of four uses of the word in some thirty lines (3.4.2, 5, 7, 34)—a ceremony interrupted first by the First Murderer and then by the first unwelcome visit of Banquo's ghost, whose second visit disrupts the Lords' drinking 'our duties and the pledge'. But the thrust of Hecate's lines goes beyond the dramatic fiction, to self-referential theatricality. As the ultimate irony, the last two lines could well be commemorating, as has been often suggested, an actual performance before James I—the king who could not make up his mind about witchcraft, but enjoyed 'shows'.

It has also often been suggested that the music and choreography of the witches' dance at 4.1.150 were those used in the antimasque of The Masque of Queens (Brooke; Cutts). If so, we have Jonson's account of how, to the sound of 'a strange and sudden music', the dance was executed, 'full of preposterous change, and gesticulation', the witches doing 'all things contrary to the custom of men, dancing back to back, hip to hip, their hands joined, and making their circles backward, to the left hand, with strange fantastic motions of their heads and bodies'; the dance ended when 'on the sudden was heard a sound of loud music, as if many instruments had given one blast', at which point 'the hags . . . quite vanished' (327-336). If there was a sameness, it would be lost on an audience at the Globe, though effective at a court performance. But whether transposed directly from Jonson's masque or from 5.2 of The Witch, in its Macbeth context the dance both completes the pattern of an un-royal entertainment for Macbeth and asserts the witches' freedom. Macbeth, whose 'society' (3.4.3) was seen to disintegrate in the banquet scene, here stands ‘amazedly’, utterly alone and frozen into immobility, while in glaring visual contrast the ‘sisters’ join hands to affirm their community in an ‘antic round’. There is a world elsewhere, to which Macbeth has no access, but which the theatre audience glimpses through the enactment of the witches’ literally marvellous freedom. The dancing witches in The Masque of Queens are routed as the scene changes to the main masque, and later they appear bound before the queens’ chariots. The witches in Macbeth dance and vanish freely, as in The Witch, leaving the stage to Macbeth for a speech which is the antithesis of the way the traditional masque ends, as for example in Oberon (361–68), with the wish that this glorious moment last forever: ‘Let this pernicious hour | Stand aye accursèd in the calendar’ (4.1.151–2).

What the introduction of the song and dance in 4.1 achieves, while building on the framework laid down by Shakespeare, is to make the scene less focused on the moral self-destruction of Macbeth and to shift the emphasis on to the witches as being in command, free and unbounded. In introducing the song ‘Black spirits and white’, headed in the manuscript of The Witch ‘A Charm Song: about a Vessel’, Middleton might be thought simply to be adding more of the same to the cauldron scene and the weird sisters’ ‘Round about the cauldron go’. But this is not so. The music for the song has not survived, but the text reads, as Brooke points out, ‘like a singing game such as children play, leading to a girl claiming her own choice of boy’ (229). Whether or not it draws on a traditional rhyme, or even ballad, the effect is to lift the scene towards gaiety as it moves from the three weird sisters’ oppressive rhythms—‘double double toil and trouble’—to a choric jingle, ‘Round around around about | all ill come running in all good keep out’, in which words like ‘good’ and ‘ill’ are merely counters. In The Witch, where this song follows a sinister visit to Hecate by the Duchess who wants a means to quickly do away with a tool villain, the lift into an a-moral world is identified by Hecate at the end of the song: ‘I am so light | At any mischief! There’s no villainy | But is a tune, methinks’ (5.2.81–3).

This ‘light’-ness, literally realized by flying machinery and mimetically rendered in song, is also a quality Middleton transposes from The Witch into the scene which became 3.5 of Macbeth. As plot goes, its only function is to prepare for the meeting ‘at the pit of Acheron’, but it must have been a theatrical highlight at the Globe or Blackfriars. The sudden shift, as we move from the oppressive ending of 3.4 and Macbeth’s descent into his ‘strange and self-abuse’, is not merely one of tone; it offers the audience the kind of contrast which only the theatre can produce: magic made ‘real’ as a way to an alternative, literally marvellous world. ‘Come away come away’ is not simply a song; it is a kind of proto-operatic scene in which Hecate, while anointing herself for transvection, engages in a sung dialogue with voices in the air and with a thoroughly embodied ‘spirit like a cat’ who descends and with whom she ascends. Rising, she sings to celebrate her freedom and the joys of flight ‘when the moon shines fair’, and the chorus of voices above repeat her triumphant last four lines:

no ring of bells to our ears sounds
no howls of wolves no yelps of hounds
no not the noise of waters breach
or cannons’ throat our height can reach (3.5.68–71)

These words evoke an ethos far from the weird sisters’ ‘fair is foul and foul is fair’, and a world opposed to Macbeth’s world of darkness, tolling bells and howling wolves. The words were probably set to music by Robert Johnson, who composed for the King’s Men as well as for court masques; and Raphael Seligmann who has analysed the score and the way it is adapted to the text finds in it ‘irreverent allusions to liturgical and courtly musical tradition’. Clearly, there is neither verbally nor musically anything grotesque or threatening about this song; the triumphant negatives that define ‘our height’ are a contrast to, not a deepening of, the evil in Macbeth’s world. In Shakespeare’s thematic structure the only such contrast is the loyal world of England under Edward the Confessor who—like James I—touches for King’s Evil (4.3.142–60). The ‘come away’ interlude is subversive in an un-Shakespearean way in so far as it enacts an alternative not of benevolent monarchy but of positive, joyful anarchy and so makes the play as a whole that much less royalist. It is as though Middleton should have dropped an Autolycus, or even a Falstaff, into the morally determined world of Macbeth—but then the analogy itself suggests that he might not have seen his interpolation as wholly un-Shakespearean.

Nor might he have seen himself as doing anything wholly untypical in terms of his own aesthetics. Incorporating into Macbeth parts of The Witch meant returning them to a play which had acted as a sounding board for The Witch. I use this image, rather than ‘source’, for while Jacobean plays are generally full of more or less conscious echoes of each other, Middleton has a way—particularly pronounced in the tragicomedies he was writing in this period—of using intertextuality with a difference: of drawing on audiences’ reminiscence of another play or plays (Ewbank, 1991). The manuscript of The Witch tells us that it had been ‘long since acted by His Majesty’s seruants at the Blackfriars’; Middleton wrote it to be performed by actors whom the audience would also have seen in Macbeth—an audience who could hardly help seeing one witch play as an alternative to the other. The Witch supplied a fictive world in which the words and deeds of ‘these juggling fiends’ can be both laughed and marvelled at, and where there is always a way out for the human characters. At the same time the play can be seen to be sceptical about its own tragicomic resolution, as Middleton questions the very conventions he uses. The bed-trick, for example, is shown up for what it is—a facile way of turning tragedy into comedy—by the bathetic moral drawn by Almachildes when the final scene reveals the last in the series of deceptions played on him, and on the audience: 'This comes of scarves: I'll never more wear | An haberdasher's shop before mine eyes again' (5.3.123-4). The plot twists of the denouement are so resolutely abrupt as to draw attention to their own artifice. Everything ends happily, but only as long as morality is brushed under the carpet—or covered by a scarf. The audience of The Witch was hardly allowed to forget the tragic alternative to the tragicomedy.

In Macbeth, for all that Macbeth implores 'seeling night' to 'scarf up the tender eye of pitiful day' (3.2.47-8), there is no way of blinding oneself to the logic of the deed and its consequences—of being 'the deed's creature' as Middleton was to call it in The Changeling. Middleton's interpolations do not turn the play into a tragicomedy or radically change its overall moral structure. The lightness of being of the witches in the interpolated passages introduces a note of subversive freedom; but in the end the logic of doom closes in on Macbeth all the more relentlessly for these glimpses of spirits who do not merely equivocate but simply don't care—who, unlike human beings, have access to a world elsewhere.

This is where the other function of Middleton's Hecate becomes operative. As we have seen, she is a meta-theatrical device, but she also represents, in her long speech in 3.5, an attempt to bridge two worlds. She is not the dramatic character of The Witch, with her libido and her son, Firestone—the play's chief comic part, who appears in all the witch scenes as a sneering deflater of magic and its accoutrements. Nor does she have the divinity or convey the universal horror implied in Macbeth's vision of evil when 'Witchcraft celebrates | Pale Hecate's offerings' (2.1.51-2). Middleton is not, in her speech, trying to write Shakespearean lines, as modern directors have been known to do. He is translating Hecate into his own theatre language. In a sense she becomes a figure who, like characters in his comedies or the Cardinal in Women, Beware Women, rises out of the turmoil of the action to moralize it; but the moral register and terms here are her own. This kind of translation—into a pragmatic syntax and a discourse relying on the literal force of a plain vocabulary—results in presenting Macbeth as 'a wayward son | spiteful and wrathful who as others do | loves for his own ends not for you'. Hecate's preview, then, of 4.1 where the spirits 'by the strength of their illusion | shall draw him on to his confusion', becomes:

he shall spurn fate scorn death and bear his hopes 'bove wisdom grace and fear

To anyone who treasures the metaphorical density of Macbeth (and who does not?) this may seem nugatory: verbally too thin, morally too simple. But if we see the lines in the full context of what Middleton was trying to do—making Hecate the presenter of a kind of Triumph of Truth more spectacular than anything the weird sisters were capable of—then they are not so much a loss as pointers to a new kind of gain: a dimension in which theatricality itself—the 'illusion' enacted by Hecate and her witches—adds a measure to Macbeth's tragedy.

Some forty lines into the cauldron scene, Hecate arrives to cheer the proceedings:

O well done I commend your pains and everyone shall share i'th'gains

The second of her lines has a meta-textual potential which points us back to what the additions meant in the playhouse. There is no account book to record payment to Middleton for 'additions in Macbeth'. What we can be sure of in reading the augmented Macbeth is that the 'gains' were those of the company and its sharers—as well as its audiences.

Adaptation. Passages apparently added or rewritten by Middleton are printed in bold type; passages apparently deleted or intended for deletion are printed in grey; transposed passages are printed in grey where Shakespeare probably placed them, and in bold where Middleton apparently moved them. For detailed explanations of the evidence for Middleton's alterations to Shakespeare's original, see 'Canon and Chronology', Companion 383.

Punctuation. This edition removes all punctuation and all capitalization at the beginning of sentences or verse lines. The punctuation in the text first printed in 1623 bears little, if any, relation to the authors' intentions; it reflects the preferences of different compositors and scribes. Neither playwright capitalized the beginnings of sentences or verse lines. This completely unpunctuated text lets readers decide for themselves how to interpret the words. For a more detailed discussion of the original text and the decision not to punctuate this edition, see 'Textual Introduction', Companion 690. For Middleton's punctuation, see A Game at Chesse: An Early Form.

Commentary. Glossarial commentaries, like punctuation, make interpretive choices about which meanings are appropriate and which are not. This commentary to Macbeth is limited to clarifying aspects of the process of adaptation signalled typographically in the text.

Title Blackfriars The indoor theatre (where the King's Men began performing in 1608 or 1609) certainly had machinery for elaborate 'flying' scenes, like 3.5, added by Middleton.

I. I. 0. I Sc. 1 Macbeth was originally written for the Globe, c.1606, where there were no act intervals. The text was adapted for the later theatrical convention of five acts separated by musical intervals.

0.4 witches Middleton's major adaptation was to transform into witches the three characters who are identified as 'weird sisters' in Shakespeare's chief historical source and in passages clearly written by Shakespeare.

- 7.1-1.1.8 a cat...anon probably added as part of the process of identifying Shakespeare's 'weird sisters' as witches
- 10 hover through This suggests that the witches are flying, a spectacular effect also used in 3.5; the sisters do not fly in Shakespeare's source. Shakespeare might have had the sisters 'drink the...air', as in Tempest 5.1.102 and Timon 1.84.
- 1.2 Middleton apparently abbreviated Shakespeare's more extended original battle sequence, transposing some material and providing transitional phrases of his own. The original battle sequence might have been much more extensively dramatized, like those in Troilus and Cressida, Antony and Cleopatra, or Coriolanus.

30 dancing For music that may have been used, see Companion, p. 158.

35.1 [on horseback] The 1611 spectator's account specifies that they entered this scene 'riding'. That may indicate dialogue (talking about horses offstage), but probably refers to the actual appearance of a horse or horses in the theatre, perhaps riding through the yard toward the stage. Alarum for London (1599?) and The Late Lancashire Witches (1634), both performed at the Globe, require a horse.

Indoor theatres did not attempt such effects. Removing the horse(s) probably also removed an unknown amount of dialogue.

38-45 so withered . . . are so A spectator at a performance of MacBeth at the Globe in 1611 described the weird sisters in this scene as 'three women fairies or nymphs', a characterization that fits their presentation as 'nymphs or fairies' in Shakespeare's historical sources. The original text might well have contained something like the phrase found in Shakespeare's source. The Middletonian words and phrases in this speech transform the three figures into sexually ambiguous figures who could be played by adult male actors, rather than boys.

42-3 chappy . . . skinny These negative adjectives might be Middleton's rather than Shakespeare's.

 than would make up his message
 LADY give him tending he brings great news exit messenger
 the raven himself is hoarse that croaks the fatal ent'rance of Duncan under my battlements come you spirits 40 that tend on mortal thoughts unsex me here and fill me from the crown to the toe topfull of direst cruelty make thick my blood stop up th'access and passage to remorse that no compunctious visitings of nature 45 shake my fell purpose nor keep peace between th'effect and it come to my woman's breasts and take my milk for gall you murd'ring ministers wherever in your sightless substances you wait on nature's mischief come thick night 50 and pall thee in the dunnest smoke of hell that my keen knife see not the wound it makes nor heaven peep through the blanket of the dark to cry hold hold must be provided for and you shall put this night's great business into my dispatch which shall to all our nights and days to come give solely sovereign sway and masterdom nimbly and sweetly recommends itself

 BANQUO this guest of summer the temple-haunting martlet does approve by his loved masonry that the heavens' breath

 where they must breed and haunt I have observed the air is delicate which still we thank as love herein I teach you how you shall bid God 'ield us for your pains and thank us for your trouble

 LADY all our service in every point twice done and then done double 15 were poor and single business to contend against those honours deep and broad wherewith your majesty loads our house for those of old and the late dignities heaped up to them we rest your hermits
 KING where's the thane of Cawdor
 20 we coursed him at the heels and had a purpose to be his purveyor but he rides well and his great love sharp as his spur hath hold him to his home before us fair and noble hostess
 we are your guest tonight
 LADY your servants ever
 25 have theirs themselves and what is theirs in count to make their audit at your highness' pleasure still to return your own

MACBETH when

LADY now

MACBETH as I descended

LADY ay

MACBETH hark who lies i'th' second chamber

LADY Donalbain

MACBETH this is a sorry sight

LADY a foolish thought to say a sorry sight

MACBETH there's one did laugh in's sleep and one cried murder that they did wake each other I stood and heard them but they did say their prayers and addressed them again to sleep

20

LADY there are two lodged together

MACBETH one cried God bless us and amen the other as they had seen me with these hangman's hands list'ning their fear I could not say amen
 when they did say God bless us

25

LADY consider it not so deeply

MACBETH but wherefore could not I pronounce amen
 I had most need of blessing and amen
 stuck in my throat

30

LADY these deeds must not be thought after these ways so it will make us mad

MACBETH methought I heard a voice cry sleep no more
 Macbeth does murder sleep the innocent sleep

35 sleep that knits up the ravelled sleeve of care the death of each day's life sore labour's bath balm of hurt minds great nature's second course chief nourisher in life's feast

LADY what do you mean

MACBETH still it cried sleep no more to all the house 40 Glamis hath murdered sleep and therefore Cawdor shall sleep no more Macbeth shall sleep no more

LADY who was it that thus cried why worthy thane you do unbend your noble strength to think so brain-sickly of things go get some water 45 and wash this filthy witness from your hand why did you bring these daggers from the place they must lie there go carry them and smear the sleepy grooms with blood

MACBETH I'll go no more
I am afraid to think what I have done look on't again I dare not

50 LADY infirm of purpose

40	here had we now our country's honour roofed were the graced person of our Banquo present who may I rather challenge for unkindness than pity for mischance	LADY my worthy lord your noble friends do lack you

3.5 A new scene, written entirely by Middleton, introducing Hecate and expanding the play's supernatural dimension. For the song see also The Witch 3.3.39-72; an edition of the music appears in the Companion, p. 153. For the theatrical and critical significance of this addition see Critical Introduction.

4.1.3a-aa FIRST where... come These lines fit the post-murder atmosphere of 4.1 better than the 'fairies and nymphs' of

1.3. Middleton might have moved them to the earlier scene in order to make room for Hecate, the charm song, and the apparitions here.

3ab-ac [SECOND]...[] A transitional passage appears to be lost, with lines spoken by one or two of the other weird sisters, or all three together (perhaps the choral 'Double, double...?')

38.1 the other three witches that is, the three singing witches in 3.5, presumably played by boy actors

78a-4.1.107 MACBETH ... APPARITION Middleton apparently added the apparitions, who speak prophecies originally spoken by the three weird sisters. This involved some transposition and rewriting of Shakespeare's lines. Macbeth's questions, promised in lines 68-78, were apparently cut as part of this addition. 81-5 pour...show probably transposed from its original position at 122a-e, introducing the show of eight kings 89a-e time...line Middleton used these lines in a soliloquy for Macbeth at the end of the scene.

128.2 and Banquo added by Middleton, linking this scene backward to 3.4
 135-6 what...sovereignty This passage probably referred originally to the grandfather of James I, the seventh Stuart king of Scotland, who was crowned when he was 'one year, five months, and ten days old'. Shakespeare's lines, written to refer to the Stuart lineage, might have been transferred to refer to the third apparition.

 143-4.1.150.1 HECATE... vanish The added

witches' dance may have been based on that in Ben Jonson's Masque of Queens; see Companion, p. 158.
 153-61 come...lord This exchange replaces the information reported in the passage apparently deleted from 3.6.

162-74 time...are This soliloquy—mostly Middleton's, but incorporating some Shakespearean lines apparently transferred from earlier in the scene—with the preceding dialogue gives the boy actors time for a costume change, to reappear as Macduff's wife and son.

4.2.39, 59 how wilt thou do for a father
The repetition of the same phrase by the same character, and the change from verse to prose, suggest that the intervening material has been added; stylistically the prose resembles Middleton, and the added material seems to allude to the Overbury scandal of 1616 (with its perjury, hangings of some but not all of the guilty, related accusations of treason, issues of remarriage, and survival of a mother/wife after her husband had been condemned to death). For the political context see Witch.

MALCOLM
let us seek out some desolate shade and there weep our sad bosoms empty MACDUFF let us rather hold fast the mortal sword and like good men bestride our downfall birthdom each new morn new widows howl new orphans cry new sorrows 5 strike heaven on the face that it resounds as if it felt with Scotland and yelled out like syllable of dolour

MALCOLM what I believe I'll wail
what know believe and what I can redress 10 as I shall find the time to friend I will what you have spoke it may be so perchance this tyrant whose sole name blisters our tongues was once thought honest you have loved him well he hath not touched you yet I am young but something
you may discern of him through me and wisdom 15 to offer up a weak poor innocent lamb t'appease an angry God
MACDUFF I am not treacherous MALCOLM but Macbeth is a good and virtuous nature may recoil 20 in an imperial charge but I shall crave your pardon that which you are my thoughts cannot transpose though all things foul would wear the brows of grace yet grace must still look so

MACDUFF I have lost my hopes
25 MALCOLM
perchance even there where I did find my doubts why in that rawness left you wife and child those precious motives those strong knots of love without leave-taking I pray you 30 let not my jealousies be your dishonours but mine own safeties you may be rightly just whatever I shall think MACDUFF bleed bleed poor country great tyranny lay thou thy basis sure for goodness dare not check thee wear thou thy wrongs
35 the title is affeered fare thee well lord
I would not be the villain that thou think'st for the whole space that's in the tyrant's grasp and the rich east to boot
MALCOLM be not offended
I speak not as in absolute fear of you 40 I think our country sinks beneath the yoke it weeps it bleeds and each new day a gash is added to her wounds I think withal there would be hands uplifted in my right and here from gracious England have I offer of goodly thousands but for all this 45 when I shall tread upon the tyrant's head or wear it on my sword yet my poor country shall have more vices than it had before more suffer and more sundry ways than ever by him that shall succeed

242a-ab come . . . day This is a rough, minimal, and conjectural reconstruction, using elements that Middleton may have re-used and transposed to other parts of the scene, of what might have been the climax of Shakespeare's scene, the appearance of the holy English king, blessing the Scots resistance and formally lending them his general and soldiers. King Edward's role may have been much larger in the original script. The 1611 observer referred to him as 'Edward the Confessor', which suggests that phrase was spoken in performance; otherwise, there were many English kings named 'Edward'. Shakespeare took the account of Young Siward's death from the account of the reign of Edward the Confessor in Holinshed's Chronicles, which also provided other information that Shakespeare might have used in material that Middleton cut. Something that would have interested Shakespeare's patron King James (an avid hunter) was the information that 'The pleasure that [King Edward] took chiefly in this world for refreshing of his wits, consisted only in hawking and hunting, which exercises he daily used'. Another point emphasized by Holinshed, and potentially relevant to the way Shakespeare typically dramatized history, was the fact that 'King Edward put away the Queen his wife' and 'forbore to have fleshly pleasure with her'. His rigorous control of his wife would have contrasted with Lady Macbeth's excessive influence over her husband. Other details are directly relevant to the action in this scene. As an explanation for appointing others to lead an army, Holinshed records, 'age would not give him leave to execute the same by his own hand and force of body'; elsewhere he notes that Edward had 'white hair, both head and beard'. This would have created an obvious parallel with Duncan. The costuming of Edward, in this or an earlier deleted scene, might have been suggested by Holinshed's note that 'In diet and apparel he was spare and nothing sumptuous'. Shakespeare and other Londoners could have seen the shrine of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey, 'which he had in his life time royally repaired, after such a stately sort as few churches in those days were like thereunto within this realm' (Holinshed); this information might have been used if Westminster Abbey were identified as the location of this conjectured lost scene, a setting which would have made it more interesting for London audiences. The same sentence that was the basis for Shakespeare's account of Edward's touching for the king's evil also records that 'As hath been thought he was inspired with the gift of prophecy'. Holinshed then gives a detailed account of his final prophecy, beginning 'Oh Lord God almighty, if this be not a vain fantastical illusion, but a true vision which I have seen, grant me space to utter the same unto these that stand here present'. The prophecy Holinshed records concerns the Norman invasion of England, which would hardly have suited Shakespeare's purposes; more relevant to Shakespeare and King James in 1606 would have been the fact that Edward, as King of England, was invited to intervene in Scotland (militarily and successfully) and that 'all the savage people of Wales [were] reduced into the form of good order under the subjection of King Edward' (Holinshed). Edward thus anticipated the uniting of the three kingdoms effected by James I, and in the play he might well have predicted a future peaceful and prosperous union. Like James, Edward 'abhorred wars and shedding of blood' (something that could have been mentioned parenthetically, by him or someone else), and it would be appropriate for him to predict that the unfortunately necessary warfare of the play's final scenes would lead, eventually, to the peace of James I, a future Scots King entering England to balance the English army about to enter the play's Scotland. Such a prophecy would have been politically topical, and welcomed by the patron of the King's Men, in 1606, when King James was again pressing his proposals for a full legal union of the two kingdoms; but those proposals were definitively rejected by Parliament in 1608, and therefore would have become increasingly problematic as the years passed (and especially after James terminated the abortive Parliament of 1614). Middleton may also have been uncomfortable with the celebration of a Catholic saint, especially if his appearance here were accompanied by any kind of religious ritual (which would have made the scene theatrically more compelling, but ideologically more objectionable). The Catholic polemicist Robert Parsons had called attention, in a pamphlet published in 1606, to the 'Obedience of King Edward the Confessor to the Popes of Rome in his time', and although Shakespeare probably would not have included that detail, it is the kind of thing that made Edward a problematic figure for many Protestants.

Parts The 1623 edition of Macbeth does not contain a list of dramatis personae, and we have not included an editorial list, for the same reason we have omitted a glossarial commentary. Every list of dramatis personae makes arbitrary choices about the sequence of persons and the description of each, and thus prejudices a reader's response to the playwrights' script. For a history of dramatis personae lists, see "The Order of Persons" (Companion, 31). We include this list of parts because it illuminates the process of adaptation. This list differs from those elsewhere in the edition by the use of bold font (to indicate roles that belong only to the adaptation) and grey font (to indicate parts that belong only to the original).

0.1 Adult Males The adaptation requires 10 named speaking adult males for the transition between 5.3 and 5.4 (Macbeth, Doctor, Seyton, Malcolm, Siward, Macduff, Young Siward, Menteith, Caithness, Angus) plus Macbeth's unnamed attendants (in 5.3) and the unnamed soldiers (in 5.4). If we assume two attendants and two soldiers, the total of 14 men is the same as that required for 4.1.

- 1 MACBETH was originally played by Richard Burbage, who was still acting at the probable time of the adaptation. The part was changed only in the cue for the first speech, in a few speeches and cues in 4.1, and a final silent entry.
- 10 ROSS is not named in stage directions between 4.3 and 5.11, though he would naturally belong to the army from England in 5.4 and 5.6; this suggests that the actor doubled the Scottish Doctor or Seyton.
- 14 BANQUO was altered in the adaptation only in the very first speech and in an added stage direction at the very end of the part. For addition of a mute final entrance by an existing character, compare Juliet in Measure for Measure.

- 17 KING The very beginning of Duncan's role may have been abridged; this is also true of other secondary Scottish lords.
- 21 LENNOX This part was adapted by rearrangement and cutting in 3.6 and an addition in 4.1; it may also have been affected by abridgement of the initial battle scene(s). It might have been played, in either version, by a hired man.
- 25 FIRST WITCH was originally the First Weird Sister, played in 1606 by a boy actor, who would no longer have been a boy in 1616. The adaptation made it an adult part, which therefore completely changed its doubling possibilities. (All this also applies to Second Witch and Third Witch.)
- 32 CAPTAIN This one-page part was apparently rewritten.
- 34 SIWARD The beginning of this part was probably cut.
- 46 ANGUS This role, probably played by a hired man, seems to have been abridged.

YOUNG SIWARD (7 lines): any but Menteith, Caithness, Angus, Malcolm, Siward, Macduff, Macbeth, [Scottish Doctor or Seyton]

SEYTON (5 lines): any but Macbeth, Scottish Doctor, messenger (5.5), [servant (5.3), Menteith, Caithness, Angus, Malcolm, Siward, Young Siward, Macduff]

LORD (one scene, 5 lines) any but Lennox or first three witches

ENGLISH DOCTOR (1 scene, 5 lines): any but Malcolm, Macduff, [Ross]

SERVANT (5.3: 3 lines): any but Macbeth, Scottish Doctor, [Seyton]

FIRST APPARITION (2 lines): any but Macbeth

KING EDWARD (one scene): any but Malcolm, Macduff, Ross, Siward, English Doctor

LADY (253 lines): wife or son; [Fleance]; any singing witch or Cat; Second Apparition or Third Apparition (or any singing witch); any weird sister

HECATE (88 lines): Fleance; Gentlewoman; wife or son

FIRST WEIRD SISTER (49 lines): Lady, Wife or Son, Gentlewoman, Fleance

WIFE (40 lines): any boy part but Son

THIRD WEIRD SISTER (32 lines): Lady, Wife or Son, Gentlewoman, Fleance

SECOND WEIRD SISTER (31 lines): Lady, Wife or Son, Gentlewoman, Fleance

GENTLEWOMAN (23 lines): any boy part but Lady

SON (20 lines): any boy part but Wife

FOURTH WITCH (11 lines): Lady; Fleance; Gentlewoman; wife or son

FIFTH WITCH (5 lines): Lady; Fleance; Gentlewoman; wife or son

THIRD APPARITION (5 lines): any but Hecate, singing witches

SECOND APPARITION (4 lines): any but Hecate, singing witches

CAT (3 lines): Lady; Fleance; Gentlewoman; Second Apparition or Third Apparition; wife or son

SIXTH WITCH (2 lines): Lady; Fleance; Gentlewoman; wife or son

FLEANCE (2 lines): any boy part but Lady (?)

Most crowded scene: 4.1 (6 boys, 5 adults, 9 adult mutes)

75 LORD This one-scene part originally was larger (21 lines), and could have been doubled with any adult male roles but Lennox and Macbeth.

77 ENGLISH DOCTOR His lines were originally probably spoken by Malcolm, later in the same scene (4.3).

85 KING EDWARD This deleted part may have been more substantial than the minimal reconstruction offered here.

86.1 Boys The adaptation requires at least six boys (in 4.1), including five with good singing voices (for 3.5), and it would have required eight or nine boys if the three Weird Sisters had not been transformed into bearded adult Witches. The original script apparently required only three speaking boys (and none who could sing); the three Weird Sisters could easily have doubled Wife,

Son, Gentlewoman, and Fleance, without requiring any doubling for Lady.

93 WIFE This one-scene part was expanded by 8 lines in the adaptation.

99 SON Half of the lines in this small one-scene part were added in the adaptation.

112 4.1 The original scene would probably have required 3 boys, 1 adult, 7 adult mutes, and 1 boy mute.

CIVITATIS AMOR

Edited by David M. Bergeron

MIDDLETON demonstrates in Civitas Amor that he can also write for a royal occasion, here the investiture of the sixteen-year-old Prince Charles as Prince of Wales. James I may have felt some urgency about endowing Charles with greater stature, especially if we consider the situation of the royal family in 1616. Prince Henry, the great hope of many Englishmen, especially militant Protestants, had died in November 1612 after a brief but rather gruesome illness (probably typhoid fever). In February 1613, Princess Elizabeth, the only royal daughter, married the German prince Frederick, Elector Palatine, and left England. When Middleton writes of Charles's 'rare proofs of promising heroical virtues' (22-3), he merely echoes what had been said of the popular Henry. In contrast to the glorious moment in 1610 when the entire royal family gathered for Henry's investiture, in 1616 only one of the three Stuart children remained, and only one of the two royal parents appeared. Queen Anne did not attend the public festivities in 1616 because the memory of Prince Henry remained too recent and painful for her, according to the letter-writer John Chamberlain. By contrast, in Howes's continuation of Stow's Chronicles (1631) we find a reference to the pageant's 'pleasant trophies and ingenious devices', more striking than 'ever was at any former Creation of any Prince of Wales'. But the Venetian Ambassador in London noted the diminished quality of the festivities.

Records of the Corporation of London indicate that the city spent £323 for the pageant entertainment on 31 October in a pattern of financial arrangements that resembles how the guilds sponsored Lord Mayor's shows. Middleton provided two scenes, one when the Prince and his party arrived by the river at Chelsea and the other at Whitehall. Both give prominence to the idea of peace: a reflection of James I's motto Beati pacifici, made clear again in the publication of his Works earlier in 1616.

Middleton creates an imaginative poetic encounter between allegorical figures and Prince Charles. At Chelsea a figure representing London, 'sitting upon a sea-unicorn with six Tritons sounding before her' (46-7), greets and speaks to Charles, as does the mythological figure Neptune. Mythology, allegory, and reality converge at Chelsea. Middleton personifies London; but she also appears in the persons of the mayor, aldermen, and others who fill barges brought along the Thames from the City of London. Mythologized, the River Thames obviously exists in fact. The whole entertainment, taking place on the river, underscores its importance in civic, commercial, and cultural life. Stow in his Survey of London (1603) calls the Thames 'the most famous river of this island', noting its origins in Oxfordshire and how it comes 'with a marvellous quiet course to London, and thence breaketh into the French ocean'. It serves the 'great commodity of Travellers, by which all kinds of Merchandise be easilly conveyed to London, the principal store house, and Staple of all commodities within this Realm'. Michael Drayton begins a sonnet in his Idea sequence: 'Our floods' queen, Thames, for ships and swans is crowned.' Middleton crowns the river with a royal entertainment. Neptune addresses Thamesis, noting her fame 'to all those | That must observe thy precious tides' (58-9). Waving his silver mace, Neptune calls for silence on the river. Middleton calls for recognition of the river and the occasion.

Style and theme account in part for Middleton's accomplishment in London's remarkable thirty-line speech, which begins: 'Treasure of hope, and jewel of mankind' (74). Interestingly, the allegorical figures never address Charles by name, in contrast to the 1610 investiture pageant, which regularly named Prince Henry. Middleton instead resorts to metaphors in London's speech: 'treasure of hope', 'glory of our days', 'hope of these', and 'joy of after ages'. These metaphors accumulate with a kind of biblical resonance, as they mystify the occasion and idealize the prince. Such discourse elevates the prince's status: 'lift our loves up with his fame' (102).

Middleton skillfully weaves into London's speech the twin themes of peace and hope. These ideas become allegorical figures in the Whitehall part of the pageant as it actualizes London's speech, making manifest what has been but an idea. London also indicates that she functions as synecdoche: 'The loves of many thousands speak in me' (77). On the banks of the Thames at Chelsea she gathers up the life of the city, embodying and representing it.

Stuart political ideology and mythology appear in London's speech in the emphasis on the peaceful succession and peaceful reign of James I. London connects England's current condition—'Richer no kingdom's peace did ever see' (75)—to the peacemaker king. London adds: 'What a fair glorious peace for many years, | Has sung her sweet calms to the hearts of men' (94-5). Convinced of Charles's virtue, London foresees the continuation of a peaceful dynasty. At this hour, peace 'begins her hymns again' (97). In 1616 the country might justly celebrate peace.

London, Neptune, and their companions move on to Whitehall where they encounter 'the figures of two sacred deities, Hope and Peace' (109). Middleton describes Hope as 'leaning her breast upon a silver anchor, attended with four virgins all in white, having silver oars in their hands' (115–17). In addressing the allegorical figures, London urges Hope to 'behold the fullness of thy good' (111) and Peace to see 'the glory of thy song' (114). These qualities appear in Prince Charles, but they have yet to be dramatically realized. Middleton anticipates such fulfillment in the Whitehall scene.

Hope's response takes the extraordinary form of a sonnet, the only one in Jacobean pageants. Hope begins: 'Fair and most famous city, thou hast waked me | From the sad slumber of disconsolate fear' (118–19). If we remove the word 'city', then we could be in the presence of innumerable sonnets that focus on the 'fair' qualities of the beloved, reflecting Petrarchan influence. Sonnet 81 of Spenser's Amoretti, for example, contains five lines that begin with the word 'fair', all pointing to the idea of beauty. In a pageant entitled Civitas Amor, we cannot be surprised to find Middleton's love sonnet, one in which the 'music' of London's 'voice' (120) awakens Hope. The idea of hope also runs as a constant thread through Elizabethan sonnet sequences. By the second quatrain Hope has moved from disconsolate fear to certainty: 'Now has my anchor her firm hold again' (122). As the procession of barges and the Prince has moved along the Thames, it has arrived securely at, first, Chelsea and then Whitehall. Coming to Whitehall, the royal palace, prompts Hope to assert: 'This is the place that I'll cast anchor in' (126). From city to court: the movement of the sonnet corresponds to the movement of the pageant. The couplet closes the sonnet with prayerful intention, as the speaker anticipates securing 'this happy shore' (130). The slightly irregular metre and the caesura in the last line add force to the idea: 'Till all be changed, never to alter more' (131). After long storms and tempests, the speaker in Spenser's Sonnet 63 of Amoretti has a vision: 'Fair soil it seems from far, and fraught with store.' Arriving at this happy shore, the poet asserts: 'All sorrows short that gain eternal bliss.' Middleton's Hope shares this view: till change be no more.

The city's love for Charles finds its final expression in the song of Peace, who sits 'on a dolphin, with her sacred choir' (132). Only 'such a prince, and such a day' (144) can satisfy expectations. Again, Charles exists in various metaphors: 'spring of joy and peace' (134), 'glory of life' (146). In a double metaphor Peace likens the spectators ('the many thousand faces', 137) to an 'amorous flood' (138) that becomes in turn 'like a moving wood, | Usurping all her crystal spaces' (139–40). 'Amorous flood' describes the pageant: movement along a river characterized by a loving display of entertainment. Middleton himself has usurped the blank spaces along the route at Chelsea and Whitehall and filled them with pageantry.

In an unusual development this entertainment of 31 October shared barges from the Lord Mayor's show, performed on 29 October, producing a wonderful mixture of royal and city interests. The Fishmongers sponsored the mayoral pageant, Chrysanaleia: The Golden Fishing, written by Anthony Munday. Their records for 11 November indicate that the Master of the King's Barges came and desired payment 'for the making . . . and furnishing of two barges for carrying of the mermen and mermaids by water and for barge hire at the Lord Mayor's presentment and at the meeting of the prince on the day of his instalment'. Munday's pageant included a fishing boat (in honour of the company) and barges for conveying a dolphin and mermen and mermaids. The boat Munday named the 'Fishmongers Esperanza, or Hope of London', making a connection between London and Hope that Middleton pursues two days later for Charles's arrival. Doubtless the close proximity of time for the two events (itself rare) and the city's involvement in both led to cooperation.

Two disproportionate parts make up the text of Civitas Amor, for which the title-page does not indicate an author. Instead, Middleton's name appears on l. 147, at the end of the show at Whitehall. This has led editors to doubt whether the remainder of the text—an extended description of the actual investiture of Charles—should be attributed to Middleton. The description derives from the anonymous The Order and Solemnity of the Creation of the High and Mighty Prince Henry . . . Prince of Wales (1610). Middleton or his publisher simply used this earlier text, changing the names to reflect the 1616 investiture. In 1610 two separate texts record the ceremonies: The Order and Solemnity and Anthony Munday's London's Love to Royal Prince Henry, which describes the pageant for which Munday received payment. Civitas Amor in effect collapses two texts into one: pageant and investiture, neatly packaged in one quarto.

Civitas Amor begins: 'His Majesty, as well to show the bounty of his affection towards his royal son, as to settle in the hearts of his loving subjects a lively impression of his kingly care for continuance of the happy and peaceable government of his land in his issue and posterity . . .' (14–18). Middleton capturing James I's love for Charles and the decision to have this ceremony? No: Middleton copying almost verbatim from the 1610 Order and Solemnity. The 1616 text describes the barges of London's guilds 'richly decked with banners, streamers, and ensigns, and sundry sorts of loud-sounding instruments aptly placed amongst them' (35–8). This does not necessarily describe the 1616 occasion because it comes verbatim from the 1610 text. One can multiply examples. All of this material appears before Middleton's name on l. 147. If Middleton can so easily and obviously adapt the 1610 text at this moment in his own, then he might well have been responsible for the rest of Civitas Amor, beyond the entertainment at Chelsea and Whitehall.

The remainder of Civitas Amor focuses on and recounts the ceremonies for the Knights of the Bath on Saturday, 2 November; the investiture service for Charles on Monday, 4 November; and the running at the ring on Wednesday, 6 November, by fourteen noblemen. The writer records the involvement of gentlemen of the Inns of Court in some of the festivities, 'whose names, for their worthiness, I commend to fame' (206–7). After a brief report of running at the ring, the text adds: 'I should have set a period, but that the Knights of the Bath, being a principal part and ornament of this sacred triumph, I cannot pass them over without some remembrance' (243-6). We might assume that the 'P' refers to Thomas Middleton, but even the 'P' comes from the 1610 Order and Solemnity. Because we do not know the identity of the author of the 1610 text, we find ourselves in the presence of a floating 'P', unattached to certain identity. The 'P' of Civitas Amor usurps the 'P'

of the 1610 text, just as Prince Charles usurps the place of Prince Henry in truth and in text. The 'author' erases one, creating a crystal space, and inscribes another.

Civitas Amor

The City's Love

An entertainment by water, at Chelsea, and Whitehall. At the joyful receiving of that illustrious hope of Great Britain, the High and Mighty Charles, to be created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earl of Chester, etc.

5 Together with the ample order and solemnity of his Highness' creation, as it was celebrated in his Majesty's palace of Whitehall on Monday, the fourth of November 1616.

10 As also the ceremonies of that ancient and honourable Order of the Knights of the Bath; and all the triumphs shown in honour of his Royal creation.

The Ample Order and Solemnity of Prince Charles his Creation

15 His Majesty, as well to show the bounty of his affection towards his royal son, as to settle in the hearts of his loving subjects a lively impression of his kingly care for continuance of the happy and peaceable government of his land in his issue and posterity, having determined to invest his princely Highness with those titles and solemnities which the former princes of this realm have usually 20 been adorned; it seemed fittest, both in regard of his Highness' years, showing the rare proofs of promising heroical virtues, and also that it would be a gladness most grateful and acceptable to the commonwealth, to have the solemnities thereof royally performed: to the effecting of which, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London, with the several companies, honourably furnished and appointed, and marshalled in fair and comely order, both 25 by the care and industry of Master Nicholas Leate, citizen and merchant of London, and one of the chief captains for the city; as also by the well-observed and deserving pains of Master Thomas Sparro, water-bailiff, made for that day marshal for the water-triumphs, were ready attending, with a great train and costly entertainment, to receive his Highness at Chelsea, their barges richly decked with banners, streamers, and ensigns, and sundry sorts of loud-sounding instruments aptly placed amongst them. And for his Grace's first entertainment, which was near Chelsea, a personage figuring London, sitting upon a sea-unicorn, with six Tritons sounding before her, accompanied both 35 with Neptune and the two rivers Thamesis and Dee, at his first appearing speaks as followeth.

The City's Love. The Entertainment by Water at Chelsea and Whitehall

At Chelsea

45 A personage figuring London, sitting upon a sea-unicorn, with six Tritons sounding before her, accompanied thither with Neptune, and the two rivers Thamesis and Dee, at the first appearing of the Prince speaks as followeth:

LONDON

*Neptune, since thou hast been at all this pains,
Not only with thy Tritons to supply me,
But art thyself come from thy utmost mains
To feast upon that joy that's now so nigh me,
To make our loves the better understood,
Silence thy wat'ry subject, this small flood.*

Neptune gives action toward Thamesis and speaks.

The Cities Love.

60 That make thee famous to all those
That must observe thy precious tides
That issue from our wealthy sides,
Not a murmur, not a sound,
That may this lady's voice confound.
And, Tritons, who by our commanding power
Attend upon the glory of this hour,
65 To do it service and the city grace,
Be silent till we wave our silver mace.

LONDON

And you, our honoured sons, whose loyalty,
Service, and zeal, shall be expressed of me,
Let not your loving, over-greedy noise
70 Beguile you of the sweetness of your joys.
My wish has took effect, for ne'er was known
A greater joy and a more silent one.

Then turning to the Prince, thus speaks.

75 Treasure of hope, and jewel of mankind,
Richer no kingdom's peace did ever see;
Adorned in titles, but much more in mind,
The loves of many thousands speak in me,
Who from that blessing of our peaceful store,
Thy royal father, hast received most free,
80 Honours that wooed thy virtues long before,
And ere thy time were capable of thee;
Thou whose most early goodness, fixed in youth,
Does promise comfort to the length of time;
As we on earth measure heaven's works by truth,
85 And things which natural reason cannot climb:
So, when we look into the virtuous aim
Of thy divine addiction, we may deem,
By rules of grace and principles of fame,
What worth will be, now in so high esteem,
90 And so betimes pursued; which thought upon,
Never more cause this land had to rejoice;
But chiefly I, the city, that has known
More of this good than any, and more choice.
What a fair glorious peace for many years,
95 Has sung her sweet calms to the hearts of men,
Enriched our homes, extinguished foreign fears,
And at this hour begins her hymns again.
Live long and happy, glory of our days,
And thy sweet time marked with all fair presages,
100 Since heaven is pleased in thy blest life to raise
The hope of these, and joy of after ages.
Sound, Tritons; lift our loves up with his fame,
Proclaimed as far as honour has a name.

105 The Entertainment at Whitehall
This personage, figuring London, with the six Tritons sounding before, Neptune, and the two rivers, being arrived at Whitehall, where attend the Prince's landing the figures of two sacred deities, Hope and Peace, thus speaks. 110

LONDON

Hope, now behold the fullness of thy good,
Which thy sick comforts have expected long.
And thou, sweet Peace, the harmony of this flood,
Look up, and see the glory of thy song.

Hope, leaning her breast upon a silver anchor, attended with four virgins all in white, having silver oars in their hands, thus answers. 115

HOPE

Fair and most famous city, thou hast waked me
From the sad slumber of disconsolate fear,
Which at the music of thy voice forsaked me, 120
And now begin to see my comforts clear.
Now has my anchor her firm hold again.
And in my blest and calm security
The expectations of all faithful men
Have their full fruits, being satisfied in me. 125
This is the place that I'll cast anchor in,
This, honour's haven, the king's royal court;
Here will I fasten all my joys again,
Where all deservers and deserts resort:
And may I never change this happy shore 130
Till all be changed, never to alter more.

Then Peace, sitting on a dolphin, with her sacred choir, sings this song following.

THE SONG OF PEACE

Welcome, O welcome, spring of joy and peace,
Born to be honoured and to give increase 135
To those that wait upon thy graces;
Behold the many thousand faces
That make this amorous flood
Look like a moving wood,
Usurping all her crystal spaces; 140
'Mongst which the City's love is first,
Whose expectation's sacred thirst
Nothing truly could allay
But such a prince, and such a day.
Welcome, O welcome, all fair joys attend thee, 145
Glory of life, to safety we commend thee.

Prince Charles his Creation

The day's triumph ended, to the great honour of the city and content of his Highness, who, out of the goodness of his love, gave the Lord Mayor and Aldermen many thanks. 150

On Monday following, the lords and peers of the realm being all assembled at Whitehall, his Highness then proceeded in this manner to his creation. 155

First went the trumpets, then the heralds and officers of arms in their rich coats; next followed the Knights of 160 the Bath, being six-and-twenty in number, apparelled in long robes of purple satin, lined with white taffeta; then Sir William Segar, knight, alias Garter principal King of Arms, bearing the letters patents; the Earl of Sussex the purple robes; the train borne by the Earl of Huntington, the sword by the Earl of Rutland, the ring by the Earl of Derby, the rod by the Earl of Shrewsbury, the cap and coronet by the Duke of Lennox, lord steward. His princely Highness, supported by the Earls of Suffolk and Nottingham, came bareheaded, and so entered the great hall, where the King was set in his royal throne, and the whole state of the realm in their order.

170 The Prince made low obeisance to his Majesty three times; and after the third time, when he was come near to the King, he kneeled down on a rich pillow or cushion, whilst Sir Ralph Winwood, principal secretary, read his letters patents: then his Majesty, at the reading of the words of investment, put the robes upon him, and girded on the sword, invested him with the rod and ring, and set the cap and coronet on his head. With which ceremony the creation being accomplished, the King arose, and went up to dinner; but the Prince, with his lords, dined in the hall, and was served with great state and magnificence, accompanied at his table with divers great lords, as the Earl of Suffolk, lord treasurer; the Earl of Arundel, lord marshal; the Earl of Nottingham, lord admiral; the Duke of Lennox, lord steward; the Earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain; the Earls of Shrewsbury, Derby, Rutland, and Sussex; the Prince sitting in a chair at the upper end, and the rest in distance about four yards from him, one over against another, in their degrees; all which were those that were employed in several offices of honour about his royal creation.

190 At another table, in the same room, on the left hand of the Prince, sat the Knights of the Bath, all on one side, and had likewise great service and attendance. About the midst of dinner, Sir William Segar, knight, alias Garter principal King of Arms, with the rest of the King's Heralds and Pursuivants of Arms, approached the Prince's table, and with a loud and audible voice proclaimed the King's style in Latin, French, and English, thrice; and the Prince's, in like manner, twice: then the trumpets sounding, the second course came in. And dinner done, that day's solemnity ceased.

200 At night, to crown it with more heroical honour, forty worthy gentlemen of the noble societies of Inns of Court, being ten of each house, every one appointed, in way of honourable combat, to break three staves, three swords, and exchange ten blows apiece, whose names, for their worthiness, I commend to fame, began thus each to encounter other. And not to wrong the sacred antiquity of any of the houses, their names are here set down in the same order as they were presented to his Majesty; viz. of the Middle Temple—Master Strowd, Master Izord. Gray's Inn—Master Courthop, Master Calton. Lincoln's Inn—Master Skinner, Master Windham. Inner Temple—Master Crow, Master Vernon. Middle Temple—Master Argent, Master Glascock. 230 On Wednesday, the sixth day of November, to give greater lustre and honour to this triumph and solemnity, in the presence of the King, Queen, Prince, and lords, fourteen right honourable and noble personages, whose names hereafter follow, graced this day's magnificence with running at the ring; viz. The Duke of Lennox, lord steward. Earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain. Earl of Rutland. Earl of Dorset. Earl of Montgomery. Viscount Villiers. Lord Clifford. Lord Walden. Lord Mordaunt. Sir Thomas Howard. Sir Robert Rich. Sir Gilbert Gerrard. Sir William Cavendish. Sir Henry Rich.

240 Having thus briefly described the manner of his Highness' creation, with the honourable service shown to the solemnity both by the lords and gentlemen of the Inns of Court, I should have set a period, but that the Knights of the Bath, being a principal part and ornament of this sacred triumph, I cannot pass them over without some remembrance: therefore thus much out of the note of directions, from some of the principal officers of arms, and some observation of credit concerning the order and ceremonies of the knighthood.

250 The lords and other that were to receive the honourable Order of the Bath repaired on Saturday, the second of November, to the Parliament House at Westminster, and there in the afternoon heard evening prayer, observing no other ceremony at that time, but only the heralds going before them in their ordinary habits from thence to King Henry the Seventh's chapel at Westminster, there to begin their warfare, as if they would employ their service for God especially; from whence, after service ended, they returned into the chamber they were to sup in. Their supper was prepared all at one table, and all sat upon one side of the same, every man having an escutcheon of his arms placed over his head, and certain of the King's officers being appointed to attend them. In this manner, having taken their repast, several beds were made ready for their lodging in another room hard by, after the same manner, all on one side; their beds were pallets with coverings, testers, or canopies of red say, but they used no curtains.

The Knights in the meanwhile were withdrawn into the bathing chamber, which was the next room to that which they supped in; where for each of them was provided a several bathing-tub, which was lined both within and without with white linen, and covered with red say; wherein, after they have said their prayers and commended themselves to God, they bathe themselves, that thereby they might be put in mind to be pure in body and soul from thenceforth; and after the bath, they betook themselves to their rest.

Early the next morning they were awakened with music, and at their uprising invested in their hermits' habits, which was a gown of grey cloth, girded close, and a hood of the same, and a linen coif underneath, and an handkerchief hanging at his girdle, cloth stockings soled with leather, but no shoes; and thus appavelled, their esquires governors, with the heralds wearing the coats of arms, and sundry sorts of wind instruments before them, they proceeded from their lodging, the meanest in order foremost, as the night before, until they came to the chapel, where, after service ended, their oath was ministered unto them by the Earl of Arundel, lord marshal, and the Earl of Pembroke, lord chamberlain, in a solemn and ceremonious manner, all of them standing forth before their stalls, and at their coming out making low reverence towards the altar, by which the commissioners sat. Then were they brought up by the heralds by two at once, the chiefest first, and so the rest, till all successively had received their oath, which in effect was this: that above all things they should seek the honour of God, and maintenance of true religion; love their sovereign; serve their country; help maidens, widows, and orphans; and, to the utmost of their power, cause equity and justice to be observed.

This day, whilst they were yet in the chapel, wine and sweetmeats were brought them, and they departed to their chamber to be disrobed of their hermits' weeds, and were vested in robes of crimson taffeta, implying they should be martial men, the robes lined with white sarsenet, in token of sincerity, having white hats on their heads with white feathers, white boots on their legs, and white gloves tied unto the strings of their mantles; all which performed, they mount on horseback, the saddle of black leather, the arson white, stirrup-leathers black gilt, the pectoral of black leather, with a cross pattee of silver thereon, and without a crupper, the bridle likewise black, with a cross pattee on the forehead or frontlet; each knight between his two esquires well appavelled, his footman attending, and his page riding before him, carrying his sword, with the hilts upward, in a white leather belt without buckles or studs, and his spurs hanging thereon.

In this order ranked, every man according to his degree, the best or chiefest first, they rode fair and softly towards the court, the trumpets sounding, and the heralds all the way riding before them. Being come to the King's hall, the Marshal meets them, who is to have their horses, or else 100 shillings in money for his fee: then, conducted by the heralds and others appointed for that purpose, his Majesty, sitting under his cloth of estate, gave to them their knighthood in this manner:

First, the principal lord that is to receive the order comes, led by his two esquires, and his page before him bearing his sword and spurs, and kneeleth down before his majesty; the lord chamberlain takes the sword of the page and delivers it to the King, who puts the belt over the neck of the knight, aslope his breast, placing the sword under his left arm; the second nobleman of the chief about the King puts on his spurs, the right spur first; and so is the ceremony performed. In this sort Lord Maltravers, son and heir to the Earl of Arundel, lord marshal, which was the principal of this number, being first created, the rest were all consequently knighted alike. And when the solemnity thereof was fully finished, they all returned in order as they came, saving some small difference, in that the youngest or meanest knight went now foremost, and their pages behind them.

Coming back to the Parliament House, their dinner was ready prepared, in the same room, and after the fashion as their supper was the night before; but being set, they were not to taste of anything that stood before them, but, with a modest carriage and graceful abstinence, to refrain; divers kinds of sweet music sounding the while; and after a convenient time of sitting, to arise and withdraw themselves, leaving the table so furnished to their esquires and pages.

About five of the clock in the afternoon they rode again to court, to hear service in the King's chapel, keeping the same order they did at their return from thence in the morning, every knight riding between his two esquires, and his page following him. At their entrance into the chapel, the heralds conducting them, they make a solemn reverence, the youngest knight beginning, the rest orderly ensuing; and so one after another take their standing before their stalls, where all being placed, the eldest knight maketh a second reverence, which is followed to the youngest; and then all ascend into their stalls, and take their accustomed places.

Service then beginneth, and is very solemnly celebrated with singing of divers anthems to the organs; and when the time of their offertory is come, the youngest knights are summoned forth of their stalls by the heralds, doing reverence first within their stalls, and again after they are descended, which is likewise imitated by all the rest; and being all thus come forth, standing before their stalls as at first, the two eldest knights, with their swords in their hands, are brought up by the heralds to the altar, where they offer their swords, and the dean receives them, of whom they presently redeem them with an angel in gold, and then come down to their former places, whilst two other are led up in like manner. The ceremony performed and service ended, they depart again in such order as they came, with accustomed reverence. At the chapel door, as they came forth, they were encountered by the King's master cook, who stood there with his white apron and sleeves, and a chopping knife in his hand, and challenged their spurs, which were likewise redeemed with a noble in money, threatening them, nevertheless, that if they proved not true and loyal to the King, his lord and master, it must be his office to hew them from their heels.

On Monday morning they all met together nigh at the court, where, in a private room appointed for them, they were clothed in long robes of purple satin, with hoods of the same, all lined and edged about with white taffeta; and thus apparelled, they gave their attendance upon the Prince at his creation, and dined that day in his presence, at a sideboard, as is already declared.

A FAIR QUARREL

Edited by Suzanne Gossett

A Fair Quarrel, though written collaboratively by Middleton and Rowley, built on three plots, and echoing other plays by Middleton and his contemporaries, is a cohesive, powerful, and original tragicomedy. The main theme is traditionally said to be honour, which for Captain Ager, disparagingly called ‘son of a whore’ by his Colonel, is embodied in his military standing and his family’s purity; for Jane Russell, secretly married and pregnant, is identified with female chastity; and for Chough, Jane’s foolish Cornish suitor, is the ‘reputation of gallantry’ earned by holding his own in ‘roaring’ contests with the riff-raff of London. Richard Levin and Roger Holdsworth have demonstrated how these parallels are carried into the structure, with each plot—if one includes the added scene between Chough and the Irish pander Captain Albo—constructed around a quarrel between men about a woman’s virtue. Yet the more general interest of A Fair Quarrel lies in its exploration of the morality of absolutes, and its sceptical view of both the duelling field and the field of male-female relations.

The story of Captain Ager was apparently invented by the authors, though it recalls Thomas Heywood’s A Woman Killed With Kindness, whose title plot concerns woman’s adultery and family honour and the second plot two friends who quarrel and duel to disastrous effect, until the rift is cured by the exchange of a sister. Captain Ager’s anguished uncertainty about the chastity of his mother resonates with Middleton’s repeated depiction of sexual distrust between the generations, seen as early as The Phoenix and at its most violent in The Revenger’s Tragedy.

Ager, barely twenty and still a ‘boy’ to his Colonel, with whom he has an intense bond both filial and homosocial, cannot bring himself to defend his mother’s honour without further reassurances about her fidelity. His insecurity is based not on her behaviour, which has been exemplary, but on profound psychological discomfort about male dependence upon women:

who lives
That can assure the truth of his conception,
More than a mother’s carriage makes it hopeful?
And is’t not miserable valour then
That man should hazard all upon things doubtful?
(2.I.I4–18)

It is his lack of faith, however, that corrupts his mother’s sincerity. Her immediate reaction when he probes for the truth of the phrase, ‘son of a whore’, is in straightforward contrast to his hesitations: striking him, she shouts, ‘Thou liest!’ (2.I.86). Her son has failed to respond to the Colonel’s insult by ‘giving the lie’, the usual procedure for clearing an accusation and provoking a challenge. Lady Ager has no such qualms until she realizes that she may lose her only child, perhaps after losing another—her brother says that ‘she has no daughter now. | It follows all the love must come to him [Ager]’ (1.I.34–5)—and so she invents an imaginary lapse, just enough to assure the ‘untruth’ of the Captain’s conception. She is thus the first of the play’s women to choose loyalty to another over self, abandoning an abstract commitment to truth for the immediate goal of saving her son. Selfishly, Ager ignores her feelings and concentrates on his own pain, petulantly asking: ‘O, were you so unhappy to be false, | Both to yourself and me? But to me chiefly’ (2.I.194–5). He nevertheless lacks the courage to refuse to go to the duelling field, and there he gives speeches against duelling—‘Why should man, | For a poor hasty syllable or two... Chain all the hopes and riches of his soul | To the revenge of that, die lost forever?' (3.1.81-5)—that ring hollow once his fury is unleashed by the Colonel's second accusation, of cowardice.

Despite requisite admiration for military prowess, A Fair Quarrel shares the anti-duelling attitudes of The Peacemaker, written not long after. Ager's seconds represent all that is wrong with private warfare. They prod him to the duel, use undignified language ('Pox on him, I could eat his buttock baked, methinks', 3.1.107), flaunt the shallowness of their knowledge ('An absolute punto, hey!' 'Twas a passado, sir', 3.1.155), and are indifferent to religious scruples. When Ager claims to come with 'Peace, constant amity, and calm forgiveness, | The weather of a Christian and a friend', one mutters, 'Give me a valiant Turk, though not worth tenpence, rather' (3.1.71-3). Only when Ager wounds the Colonel, apparently mortally, do they acknowledge that such slaughter might require justification. In contrast, the wound brings the Colonel to recognize that he has pursued his own ruin by following a code that drives men to fight regardless of the righteousness of their cause. In his repentance he, like Lady Ager, abandons his unwavering commitment to a principle found meaningless and inhumane.

Modern criticism of the play began with Charles Lamb, who in 1808 anthologized Ager's confrontation with his mother, as well as the duelling scene, and praised this plot's 'delicacy of perception in questions of right and wrong'. Subsequent analysis has concentrated on the moral quandaries facing Captain Ager and his mother. There are signs that Jacobean audiences, instead, particularly enjoyed the farcical scenes. The first edition exists in two issues, both published in 1617; the second contains an additional scene (4.4) in which Chough and his man Trimtram practise what they have learned in the roaring school (4.1). Apparently Rowley—who probably played Chough, one of his typical fat-clown roles, himself—prepared the extra scene in time for it to be inserted in the remaining copies of the original issue. The cancel title leaf tempts buyers with 'new additions of Mr. Chough's and Trimtram's Roaring, and the Bawd's Song'. In the additional material Meg, the bawd, praises the 'new play', where the 'finest players' use the 'handsomest narrow-mouthed names' for 'gentlewomen of our quality'. These 'names', absurd insults for women which the Cornishmen study methodically, remained popular enough to be quoted metatheatrically almost a decade later in Rowley and Webster's A Cure for a Cuckold (1624-5).

Once we notice the play's focus on female sexuality, the story of Jane Russell's secret marriage comes to seem increasingly central. Indeed, the history of Jane's trials forms less a sub-plot than a balancing point, an attainable ideal, between the 'roaring' about women at the heart of the plots on either side. (The similarity of these plots would be accentuated if, as the names suggest, the parts of Captain Ager the hero and Captain Albo the pander were doubled.) Throughout A Fair Quarrel women of all social classes are expected to yield to the desires of their male kin. Lady Ager has no authority to prevent her son from duelling; the Colonel's Sister is willed along with other gifts to the Captain; Jane Russell is to be wed at her father's bidding to a fool who thinks marriage is a form of wrestling; and Anne, the Physician's sister, describes herself as 'his creature' and excuses herself for abetting his sexual blackmail of Jane because 'Who lives commanded must obey his keeper' (3.2.147). These women are made subservient by law, social custom, economics, and biology.

A Fair Quarrel is unusually explicit in its depiction of power relations between brothers and sisters. Middleton and Rowley concentrate not on the psychosexual but on the social and economic consequences of the authority that, in the absence of fathers, brothers exercised over their unmarried sisters. This authority was conventionally demonstrated, as it is by the Colonel, through a brother's control of his sister's marriage. Much rarer on stage was a figure like Anne, for whom marriage is not mentioned, who was historically likely to be an ageing spinster economically dependent on her brother, and who, most surprising of all, openly articulates dislike of her sibling. Even widows like Lady Ager expected to take direction from their brothers, so it is not surprising that the play begins with a brief meeting between Russell and his sister the Lady (Gossett, 1992).

Both Lady Ager and the Colonel's Sister accept the patriarchal ideal that their responsibilities are to male relatives rather than to themselves. Faced with a dying brother's demand that she 'tender both herself and all these enfeoffments to... my late enemy, Captain Ager' (4.2.67-9), moved by an appeal that she not grudge peace to his soul, the Sister agrees to perform 'What by your will you have enjoined me to, | Though the world never show me joy again' (4.2.112-13). Similarly, Lady Ager willingly slanders her own honour to preserve her son. These decisions are made from a perspective that values personal relations more than general moral imperatives. Yet Middleton reminds us that women's choices are neither unconstrained nor reciprocated. The Colonel's plea to his sister includes reminders of his economic power and his misogyny—'Am I content, | Having much kindred, yet to give thee all... And canst thou prove so thankless to my bounty... O, wretched is the man | That builds the last hopes of his saving comforts | Upon a woman's charity!' (4.2.87-98). Lady Ager asserts that out of maternal affection she did something that 'were my own life's safety put upon't | I'd rather die than do't'. Nevertheless, she complains, her son still hazarded himself; 'Twas but unkindly done' (4.3.36-9). The pun on 'unkind', both inconsiderate and indifferent to the 'great tie of blood' (2.1.103), emphasizes the difference between male and female attitudes towards their mutual obligations.

Yet despite homilies of obedience and injunctions to silence, women in Middleton's London, a world of saltpetre men, unemployed soldiers, roaring boys and whores and materialistic fathers, were neither entirely helpless nor truly yielding. Russell himself half recognizes this. He attempts to soothe Jane by promising that her foolish suitor is:

A thing that will be ruled, and thou shalt rule.
Consider of your sex's general aim,
That domination is a woman's heaven. (2.2.195-7)

Jane never acknowledges such intentions, but she and the other women use wit and psychological pressure to contest male control. The story of a young woman blackmailed by the physician who has secretly delivered her baby is based on the fifth tale in the fourth decade of Giambattista Cinzio Giralaldi's Gli Ecatommiti (The Hundred Tales). Yet Jane Russell's character is much stronger than her Italian predecessor's, and her pregnancy is, surprisingly, less problematic.

The scene in which the Physician attempts to extract sexual favours from Jane is one of the play's most intense. Offered payment, he refuses monetary compensation because 'in our loving donatives to others | Man's virtue best consists'; instead he asks ambiguously for 'love', suggesting, no doubt with appropriate gestures, that 'our meanings are better understood | Than shifted to the tongue'. Only slowly does Jane fathom the Physician's intentions, but then she furiously accuses him, in an appropriately medical metaphor, of having 'Skinned o'er a green wound to breed an ulcer'. Unimpressed, he reminds her pointedly of woman's vulnerability and objectification by men: 'You've a good face now, but 'twill grow rugged; | Ere you grow old, old men will despise you' (3.2.126-7).

Jane, however, has two weapons of resistance. The first is female solidarity. Anne, sent to second her brother's demand for 'this act of woman' (3.2.148), vacillates briefly as she considers the Physician's power to destroy Jane's reputation, but ultimately 'speaks her soul' and urges the frightened and angry girl to resist. Later Anne will take revenge for her own oppression by testifying that her brother is mad. Jane is also assisted by a positive attitude towards fertility which, though in apparent conflict with the idealization of female chastity, frequently appears in the plays of Middleton and Rowley. The physical aspects of pregnancy may be carnivalesque, as they are in A Chaste Maid in Cheapside or More Dissemblers Besides Women, but they are seldom associated, as sometimes in Shakespeare, with death. The Physician himself, giving the baby to the Dutch nurse, asserts that children are 'above the quantity of price . . . we are made | Immortal one by other' (3.2.6-12). A similar attitude emerges in Russell's unperturbed reaction to news of Jane's motherhood:

Well, wipe thine eyes, I'm a grandfather then.
If all bastards were banished, the City would be thin
In the thickest term-time. (5.1.249-51)

While exaggerated, Russell's statement reflects the actualities of Jacobean life, when many brides were pregnant and, despite church disapproval, intercourse between betrothed couples was frequently tolerated. Jane, who tells Anne in her first confession that "'Tis no black swan I show you: these spots stick | Upon the face of many go for maids' (2.2.76-7), is not terrified by the threat of doing public penance in a sheet (5.1.28-30). She and Fitzallen have a de praesenti marriage, and penances in such cases were often reduced to confession before a group of fellow parishioners (Hayne).

The play's tragicomic tone is sustained by the seriousness of its events and the intensity of its central scenes. The Colonel's brush with death, the Captain's anguish, Lady Ager's dilemma, and Jane's confrontation with the Physician are all persuasively moving. Yet potential tragedy in A Fair Quarrel is kept in check as the plots repeatedly swerve away from personal disaster: the Colonel recovers, Captain Ager becomes instantly infatuated with the Colonel's Sister, Jane succeeds in resisting the Physician and her father and marrying Fitzallen. Tragedy is also contained by the joyous concatenation of languages: the Surgeon's jargon, the Nurse's mingled Dutch and English, the duellists' Italian, the whores' bawdy, and the nonsense of the roaring school. Finally, the clowns, Chough and his sidekick Trimtram, are a fully comic routine.

Yet even Chough's roaring scenes reiterate the contest for authority between the sexes. In 4.4 Priss warns Captain Albo of his 'penance' should he fail to defend them valiantly, and Meg reminds him of the painful consequences when 'I and my Amazons stripped you as naked as an Indian' (4.4.39-40). The key insults Chough and Trimtram learn are 'thy sister is a bronsterops', 'thy sister is a fructifer', and 'thy mother is a callicut, a panagron, a duplar and a sindicus' (4.1.112-31). The last parodies the Colonel's hollow accusation of Captain Ager; the other insults emphasize the commodification of sisters throughout. Chough is not pure fool when he asks Captain Albo, 'Is this thy sister? . . . I say she is a bronsterops, and this is a fucus' (4.4.65-8). The pimp determines the sexual and economic lives of Meg and Priss just as the Physician and Colonel do for their sisters; the difference between a 'fructifer' and a woman of status praised for her potential fruitfulness (5.1.432-3) quickly blurs. On all social levels, affection and family bonds easily reduce to sex and material dependence.

A Fair Quarrel was composed jointly by Middleton and Rowley, with Middleton writing 1.1.1-93, 1.1.394-425, 2.1, 3.1, 3.3, 4.2, 4.3, and 5.1.393-448. The attributions are uncertain only for the opening and closing of the first act and the end of the last, where there is not enough material to allow full statistical analysis of linguistic differences. Yet Middleton's participation in these scenes fits the general impression that the two authors worked closely together to create this intricately unified play. Middleton introduces Russell, Lady Ager, Captain Ager, and the Colonel, and writes the powerful scenes between Ager, his mother, and the Colonel; Rowley is responsible for Jane's history, the roaring scenes, and the confrontation between the Colonel and Captain Ager that builds to the provocative insult. If Rowley later wrote 4.4 alone, he nevertheless integrated it tightly into the rest of the play. In the overall structure the major plots are united by the sibling relationship between Russell and Lady Ager, which was neither artificial in early seventeenth-century London, where rich men's daughters were wives of choice among the impoverished nobility, nor arbitrary in a play which thematizes the relationship between brothers and sisters.

A Fair Quarrel demonstrates how shared attitudes and authorship may blur distinctions and create mutual influence between collaborators. Rowley's section of the first act recalls the final scene of The Patient Man and the Honest Whore. The treatment of sexuality in No Wit/Help like a Woman's—a play that includes a mother who lies to save her son, a foolish suitor encouraged for his money, a secretly married, pregnant young woman, a father consoled because he hopes 'to be a grandfather yet by 'em' (1.248), and Dutch characters—apparently lies behind Rowley's sections of A Fair Quarrel. On the other hand, the greatest scene in The Changeling, in which Beatrice-Joanna slowly realizes what compensation De Flores expects for murdering Alonzo de Piracquo, is modelled on the confrontation between Jane and the Physician. This time the model is by Rowley, the elaboration by Middleton.

The date of A Fair Quarrel lies between 1612, the year of Peter Lowe's A Discourse of the Whole Art of Surgery, which Middleton consulted for the professional jargon of the Surgeon, and the play's publication in 1617. The apparent influence of the roaring scenes in Jonson's Bartholomew Fair, performed in October 1614, narrows the time further. In all likelihood the play was composed in 1615–16, in which years roaring boys, the invasion of private property to search for saltpetre, and duels were all troublesome. Since the second issue, which includes the additional scene, is also dated 1617, the extra material must have been written within a year or two, perhaps for a revival. There is no obvious explanation for the prompt publication of this popular play: Rowley wrote the dedication to Robert Gray and was the leader of Prince Charles's Men, who first played it 'before the King and divers times publicly'.

A Fair Quarrel was probably performed at the Red Bull (Gurr), though if it appeared before 1617 it may have been first staged at the Hope on the Bankside (Bentley, Jacobean Stage). In 1979 it was revived for the first time since the Restoration at the National Theatre in London. An acute reviewer praised its 'revelation of the busy domestic actuality of London under James I' and its depiction of 'individuals stuffed with complex motives and unconscious hypocrisies' (Barber, 1979). If we add praise for its linguistic variety, its psychological acuteness, its sympathy for women, and its dramatic intensity, we explain its continuing appeal over the centuries.

Epistle To the nobly disposed, virtuous, and faithful-breasted Robert Grey Esquire, one of the grooms of his Highness's bedchamber, his poor well-willer wishes his best wishes.

Hic et supra.

Worthy sir, this is but a play, and a play is but a butt, against which many shoot many arrows of envy. 'Tis the weaker part, and how much more noble shall it be in you to defend it, yet if it be (as some philosophers have left 5 behind 'em) that this megacosm, this great world, is no more than a stage where everyone must act his part, you shall of necessity have many part-takers, some long, some short, some indifferent, all some, while indeed the players themselves have the least part of it. For I know few that 10 have lands, which are a part of the world, and therefore no grounded men. But howsoever they serve for mutes, happily they must wear good clothes for attendance. Yet all have exits and must all be stripped in the tiring-house (viz., the grave), for none must carry anything out of the 15 stock. You see, sir, I write as I speak, and I speak as I am, and that's excuse enough for me. I did not mean to write an epistle of praise to you, it looks so like a thing I know you love not, flattery, which you exceedingly hate actively, and unpleasingly accept passively. Indeed I 20 meant to tell you your own, that is, that this child of the muses is yours. Whoever begat it, 'tis laid to your charge, and for aught I know you must father and keep it too, if it please you. I hope you shall not be ashamed of it neither, for it has been seen, though I say it, in 25 good companies, and many have said it is a handsome, pretty-spoken infant. Now be your own judge, at your leisure look on it, at your pleasure laugh at it, and if you be sorry it is no better you may be glad it is no bigger.

Yours ever,
William Rowley.

He should have shifted as I did before him,
Lived on the freeborn portion of his wit. 5
But a daughter, and that an only one, O,
We cannot be too careful o'er, too tender;
'Tis such a brittle niceness, a mere cupboard of glasses,
The least shake breaks or cracks 'em. All my aim is
To cast her upon riches, that's the thing 10
We rich men call perfection, for the world
Can perfect naught without it. 'Tis not neatness,
Either in handsome wit or handsome outside,
With which one gentleman, far in debt, has courted
her,
Which boldness he shall rue. He thinks me blind 15
And ignorant; I have let him play a long time,
Seemed to believe his worth, which I know nothing.
He may perhaps laugh at my easy confidence,
Which closely I requite upon his fondness,
For this hour snaps him, and before his mistress, 20
His saint, forsooth, which he inscribes my girl,
He shall be rudely taken and disgraced.
The trick will prove an everlasting scarecrow
To fright poor gallants from our rich men's daughters.
Enter the Lady Ager with two servants
Sister! I've such a joy to make you a welcome of; 25
Better you never tasted.

LADY Good sir, spare it not.

160	CAPTAIN	I have had none, My blood has not yet rose to a quarrel, Nor have you had cause.	JANE	Sir, my voice Was long since given; since that I gave my hand.
	COLONEL	No cause of quarrel! Death, if my father should tell me so—	COLONEL	Would you had sealed too.
	RUSSELL	Again!	JANE (aside)	That wish comes too late, For I too soon fear my delivery.
	FITZALLEN	Good sir, for my sake—	[To the Colonel]	My father's hand sticks yet, sir, you may now	195
	COLONEL	Faith, I have done, coz.		Challenge a lawful interest in his.
165		You do too hastily believe mine anger, And yet to say diminuting valour In a soldier is no cause of quarrel—		He took your hand from your enraged blood And gave it freely to your opposite, My cousin Ager. Methinks you should claim from him,
	RUSSELL	Nay, then, I'll remove the cause to kill the effect. [To Ager] Kinsman, I'll press you to't, if either love Or consanguinity may move you to't, I must disarm you though you are a soldier. Pray grant me your weapon, it shall be safe At your regress from my house. 175	COLONEL	To show my will, sir, accept mine to you: As good not wear it as not dare to use it. [The Colonel gives Russell his sword]	FITZALLEN	Faith, sir, delays, which at the least are doubts. But here's a constant resolution fixed, Which we wish willingly he would accord to.
	COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND	Nay then, sir, we will be all exempl'd. We'll have no arms here now but lovers' arms. [Colonel's First Friend gives Russell his sword]	COLONEL	Tush, he shall do't, I will not be denied, He owes me so much in the recompense Of my reconcilment. 180	CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND	No seconds must begin a quarrel. Take mine, sir. [Captain's First Friend gives Russell his sword]	CAPTAIN	I shall do my best, sir, Two denials shall not repulse me. I love Your worthy kinsman and wish him mine, I know He doubts it not.	215
	RUSSELL	Why, law, what a fine sunshine's here! These clouds My breath has blown into another climate. I'll be your armourers, they are not pawn'd. [Aside] These were the fish that I did angle for; I have caught 'em finely. Now for my trick. My project's lusty and will hit the nick.	COLONEL	See, he's returned. Enter Russell and a Servant

ments here and at 2.2.86-7 and 5.1.369-71 reflect the complex state of Elizabethan marriage arrangements. By giving her voice Jane presumably agreed to a de futuro marriage; this became a de praesenti marriage by handfasting, creating the 'jugal knot' that heaven witnessed (2.2.86). The marriage has

RUSSELL Mine's yet a virgin earth: the worm hath not been
 One speaker may yet deliver. Say, say, seen
 I shall not dare to stand out against so many. To wriggle in her chaste bowels, and I'd be loath
 COLONEL A gunpowder fellow should deflower her now. 255
 Faith, sir, here's a brabbling matter hangs on demur,
 COLONEL Our suit is yet delayed by this means, sir.
 I make the motion for all without a fee.
 Pray you, let it be ended this term.
 RUSSELL Ha, ha, ha!
 (Aside) That's the rascal's cue, and he has missed it.
 [To the Colonel] What is it? What is it, sir?
 COLONEL Why sir, here's a man,
 And here's a woman; you're scholar good enough. 260
 Put 'em together and tell me what it spells.
 RUSSELL Ha, ha, ha!
 [Aside] There's his cue once again.
 Enter Servant
 O, he's come, humh.
 SERVANT [aside]
 My master laughs, that's his cue to mischief.
 COLONEL
 What say you, sir?
 SERVANT Sir—
 RUSSELL Ha? What say you, sir?
 SERVANT
 Sir, there's a couple desire speedily to speak with you. 235
 RUSSELL
 A couple, sir? Of what, hounds or horses?
 SERVANT
 Men, sir, gentlemen or yeomen, I know not which,
 But the one sure they are.
 RUSSELL
 Hast thou no other description of them?
 SERVANT They come with commission, they say, sir, to 240 taste of your earth; if they like it, they'll turn it into gunpowder.
 RUSSELL
 O, they are saltpetremen, before me,
 And they bring commission: the King's power indeed!
 They must have entrance, but the knaves will be 245 bribed.
 There's all the hope we have in officers.
 They were too dangerous in a commonwealth
 But that they will be very well corrupted.
 Necessary varlets.
 SERVANT
 Shall I enter in, sir?
 RUSSELL By all fair means, sir, 250
 And with all speed, sir, give 'em very good words
 To save my ground unravished, unbroke up.
 [Exit Servant]

Mine's yet a virgin earth: the worm hath not been

 A gunpowder fellow should deflower her now. 255
 COLONEL Our suit is yet delayed by this means, sir.
 RUSSELL Alas, I cannot help it. These fellows gone

 A few articles shall conclude your suit.
 Who? Master Fitzallen? The only man 260
 That my adoption aims at.
 COLONEL There's good hope then.
 Enter two Sergeants in disguise
 FIRST SERGEANT Save you, sir.
 RUSSELL
 You are welcome, sir, for aught I know yet.
 SECOND SERGEANT
 We come to take a view and taste of your ground, sir.
 RUSSELL
 I had rather feed you with better meat, 265
 Gentlemen, but do your pleasures, pray.
 FIRST SERGEANT
 This is our pleasures: [To Fitzallen] we arrest you, sir,
 In the King's name.
 FITZALLEN Ha! At whose suit?
 RUSSELL How's that?
 COLONEL
 Our weapons, good sir, furnish us.
 JANE Ay me!
 RUSSELL
 Stay, stay, gentlemen, let's inquire the cause. 270
 It may be but a trifle, a small debt
 Shall need no rescue here.
 SECOND SERGEANT Sir, betwixt three creditors, Master Leech, Master Swallow, and Master Bonesuck, the debts are a thousand pounds. 275
 RUSSELL
 A thousand pounds? Beshrew me, a good man's substance.
 COLONEL
 Good sir, our weapons! We'll teach these varlets
 To walk in their own parti-coloured coats,
 That they may be distinguished from honest men.
 FIRST SERGEANT
 Sir, attempt no rescue, he's our prisoner. 280
 You'll make the danger worse by violence.
 COLONEL
 A plague upon your gunpowder treason!
 Ye quick-damned varlets,

 disputed question awaits resolution;
 demur is from demurer, a legal objection.
 225-6 motion ... fee ... term The Colonel, applies for a decision during the present legal session.

237 gentlemen a man with financial independence from labour, though not a nobleman

yeomen a freeholder or farmer find saltpetre for the production of gunpowder. Saltpetremen had the right

285 Is this your saltpetre proving, your tasting earth?
 Would you might never feed better, nor none
 Of your catchpole tribe. [To Russell] Our weapons, good sir,
 We'll yet deliver him.

RUSSELL Pardon me, sir,
 I dare not suffer rescue here, at least
 Not be so great an accessory
 290 As to furnish you. Had you had your weapons,
 But to see the ill fate on't! [Aside] My fine trick, i'faith.
 Let beggars beware to love rich men's daughters,
 I'll teach 'em the new morris, I learned it Myself of another careful father.

FITZALLEN
 May I not be bailed?

295 SECOND SERGEANT Yes, but not with swords.

COLONEL
 Slaves, here are sufficient men.

FIRST SERGEANT Ay, i'th' field,
 But not in the city, sir. If this gentleman
 Will be one, we'll easily admit the second.

RUSSELL
 Who, I, sir? Pray pardon me, I am wronged, 300 Very much wronged in this, I must needs speak it.
 Sir, you have not dealt like an honest lover
 With me nor my child. Here you boast to me
 Of a great revenue, a large substance
 Wherein you would endow and state my daughter.
 305 Had I missed this, my opinion yet
 Thought you a frugal man, to understand
 The sure wards against all necessities,
 Boldly to defend your wife and family,
 To walk unmuffled, dreadless of these flesh-hooks,
 310 Even in the daringest streets through all the city.
 But now I find you a loose prodigal,
 A large unthrift. A whole thousand pound?
 Come from him, girl, his inside is not sound.

FITZALLEN
 Sir, I am wronged. These are malicious plots 315 Of some obscure enemies that I have.
 These debts are none of mine.

RUSSELL Ay, all say so.
 Perhaps you stand engaged for other men:
 If so you do, you must then call't your own.
 The like arrearage do I run into 320 Should I bail you. But I have vowed against it,
 And I will keep my vows, that's religious.

FITZALLEN
 All this is nothing so, sir.

RUSSELL Nothing so?
 By my faith it is, sir, my vows are firm.

FITZALLEN
 I neither owe these debts, nor engaged for others.

RUSSELL
 The easier is your liberty regained. 325
 These appear proofs to me.

COLONEL Liberty, sir?
 I hope you'll not see him go to prison.

RUSSELL
 I do not mean to bear him company
 So far, but I'll see him out of my doors.
 O sir, let him go to prison, 'tis a school 330
 To tame wild bloods. He'll be much better for't.

COLONEL
 Better for lying in prison?

RUSSELL In prison.
 Believe it, many an honest man lies in prison,
 Else all the keepers are knaves; they told me so themselves.

COLONEL
 Sir, I do now suspect you have betrayed him 335
 And us, to cause us to be weaponless.
 If it be so, you're a blood-sucking churl,
 One that was born in a great frost, when charity
 Could not stir a finger, and you shall die
 340 In heat of a burning fever i'th' dog-days,
 To begin your hell to you. I have said your grace for
 you,
 Now get you to supper as soon as you can.
 Pluto, the master of the house, is set already.

CAPTAIN
 Sir, you do wrong mine uncle.

COLONEL Pox on your uncle
 And all his kin, if my kinsman mingle 345
 No blood with him.

CAPTAIN You're a foul-mouthed fellow.

COLONEL
 Foul-mouthed I will be, thou'rt the son of a whore.

CAPTAIN
 Ha! Whore! Plagues and furies! I'll thrust that back
 Or pluck thy heart out after. Son of a whore?

COLONEL
 On thy life I'll prove it.

CAPTAIN Death, I am naked! 350
 Uncle, I'll give you my left hand for my sword
 To arm my right with. O, this fire will flame me Into present ashes.

COLONEL Sir, give us weapons.

 347 son of a whore the standard phrase used to provoke a challenge from the person insulted, normally understood to be without literal significance
 350 naked without a weapon

We ask our own, you will not rob us of them?
 355 RUSSELL No sir, but still restrain your furies here.
 At my door I'll give you them, nor, at this time,
 My nephew's. A time will better suit you,
 And I must tell you, sir, you have spoke swords,
 360 And 'gainst the law of arms poisoned the blades
 And with them wounded the reputation Of an unblemished woman. Would you were out of my doors!
 COLONEL
 Pox on your doors, and let it run all your house o'er!
 Give me my sword.
 CAPTAIN We shall meet, Colonel?
 COLONEL
 365 Yes, better provided. To spur thee more
 I do repeat my words, son of a whore!
Exit with his Friend
 CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND
 Come, sir, 'tis no worse than 'twas, you can do nothing now.
Exit Captain and his Friend
 RUSSELL
 No, I'll bar him now, away with that beggar. Exit
 JANE [giving money to First Sergeant]
 Good sir, let this persuade you for two minutes stay.
 At this price I know you can wait all day.
 370 FIRST SERGEANT
 You know the remora that stays our ship always.
 JANE
 Your ship sinks many when this hold lets go.
 O my Fitzallen, what is to be done?
 FITZALLEN
 To be still thine is all my part to be,
 Whether in freedom or captivity.
 375 JANE
 But art thou so engaged as this pretends?
 FITZALLEN
 By heav'n, sweet Jane, 'tis all a hellish plot.
 Your cruel-smiling father all this while
 Has candied o'er a bitter pill for me,
 Thinking by my remove to plant some other,
 And then let go his fangs.
 380 JANE
 Plant some other?
 Thou hast too firmly stamped me for thine own Ever to be rased out. I am not current
 In any other's hand; I fear too soon

I shall discover it.
 FITZALLEN Let come the worst,
 Bind but this knot with an unloosed line, 385
 I will be still thine own.
 JANE And I'll be thine.
 FIRST SERGEANT
 My watch has gone two minutes, master.
 FITZALLEN
 It shall not be renewed. I go, sir. Farewell.
 JANE
 Farewell. We both are prisoned, though not together,
 But here's the difference in our luckless chance: 390
 I fear mine own, wish thy deliverance.
 FITZALLEN
 Our hearts shall hourly visit, I'll send to thee.
 Then 'tis no prison where the mind is free.
Exit with Officers
Enter Russell
 RUSSELL
 So, let him go. Now wench, I bring thee joys,
 A fair sunshine after this angry storm. 395
 It was my policy to remove this beggar.
 What, shall rich men wed their only daughters
 To two fair suits of clothes, and perhaps yet
 The poor tailor is unpaid? No, no, my girl,
 I have a lad of thousands coming in. 400
 Suppose he have more wealth than wit to guide it,
 Why, there's thy gains, thou keep'st the keys of all,
 Disposest all, and, for generation,
 Man does most seldom stamp 'em from the brain:
 Wise men begets fools, and fools are the fathers 405
 To many wise children. Hysteron proteron,
 A great scholar may beget an idiot,
 And from the plough-tail may come a great scholar.
 Nay, they are frequent propagations.
 JANE
 I am not well, sir.
 410 RUSSELL Ha! Not well, my girl?
 Thou shalt have a physician then,
 The best that gold can fetch upon his footcloth.
 Thou know'st my tender pity to thee ever.
 Want nothing that thy wishes can instruct thee
 To call for. Fore me, and thou look'st half ill indeed. 415
 But I'll bring one within a day to thee
 Shall rouse thee up, for he's come up already:
 One Master Chough, a Cornish gentleman.
 H'as as much land of his own fee-simple

 And now I think on't, at the Crow at Aldgate
 His lodging is. He shall so stir thee up!
 Come, come, be cheered, think of thy preferment.
 Honour and attendance, these will bring thee health,
 425 And the way to 'em is to climb by wealth. Exeunt

Enter Captain Ager

CAPTAIN The son of a whore?
 There is not such another murd'ring piece
 In all the stock of calumny: it kills
 At one report two reputations,
 5 A mother's and a son's. If it were possible
 That souls could fight after the bodies fell,
 This were a quarrel for 'em. He should be one indeed
 That never heard of heaven's joys or hell's torments
 To fight this out. I am too full of conscience,
 10 Knowledge, and patience to give justice to't,
 So careful of my eternity, which consists Of upright actions, that unless I knew
 It were a truth I stood for, any coward
 Might make my breast his foot-pace. And who lives
 15 That can assure the truth of his conception
 More than a mother's carriage makes it hopeful?
 And is't not miserable valour then
 That man should hazard all upon things doubtful?
 O, there's the cruelty of my foe's advantage!
 20 Could but my soul resolve my cause were just,
 Earth's mountain nor sea's surge should hide him
 from me;
 E'en to hell's threshold would I follow him
 And see the slanderer in before I left him.
 But as it is it fears me, and I never 25 Appeared too conscionably just till now.
 My good opinion of her life and virtues
 Bids me go on, and fain would I be ruled by't;
 But when my judgement tells me she's but woman,
 Whose frailty let in death to all mankind,
 30 My valour shrinks at that. Certain she's good:
 There only wants but my assurance in't
 And all things then were perfect. How I thirst for't!
 Here comes the only she that could resolve,
 But 'tis too vile a question to demand indeed.

Enter the Lady Ager

LADY
 Son, I've a suit to you.
 35 CAPTAIN [aside] That may do well.

[To Lady Ager] To me, good madam? You're most sure to speed in't,
 Be't i'my power to grant it.

LADY 'Tis my love
 Makes the request, that you would never part
 From England more.
 CAPTAIN With all my heart 'tis granted;
 40 [Aside] I'm sure I'm i'th' way never to part from't.

LADY
 Where left you your dear friend, the Colonel?

CAPTAIN
 O, the dear Colonel, I should meet him soon.

LADY
 O, fail him not then, he's a gentleman
 The fame and reputation of your time
 Is much engaged to.

CAPTAIN Yes, and you knew all, mother. 45

LADY
 I thought I'd known so much of his fair goodness
 More could not have been looked for.

CAPTAIN O, yes, yes, madam,
 And this his last exceeded all the rest.

LADY
 For gratitude's sake let me know this, I prithee.

CAPTAIN
 Then thus, and I desire your censure freely 50
 Whether it appeared not a strange noble kindness in him.

LADY
 Trust me, I long to hear't.

CAPTAIN You know he's hasty,
 That by the way.

LADY So are the best conditions;
 Your father was the like.

CAPTAIN [aside] I begin now
 To doubt me more. Why am not I so too then? 55
 Blood follows blood through forty generations,
 And I've a slow-paced wrath. A shrewd dilemma!

LADY
 Well, as you were saying, sir.

CAPTAIN Marry thus, good madam.
 There was in company a foul-mouthed villain—stay,
 stay,
 60 Who should I liken him to that you have seen—
 He comes so near one that I would not match him
 with,
 Faith, just o' the Colonel's pitch. He's ne'er the worse
 man:

Usurers have been compared to magistrates,
 Extortioners to lawyers and the like,

But they all prove ne'er the worse men for that. 65

LADY
That's bad enough, they need not.

CAPTAIN
This rude fellow,
A shame to all humanity or manners,
Breathes from the rottenness of his gall and malice
The foulest stain that ever man's fame blemished,
70 Part of which fell upon your honour, madam,
Which heightened my affliction.

LADY
Mine? My honour, sir?

CAPTAIN
The Colonel soon enraged, as he's all touchwood, Takes fire before me, makes the quarrel his,
Appoints the field. My wrath could not be heard 75 His was so high-pitched, so gloriously mounted.
Now what's the friendly fear that fights within me:
Should his brave noble fury undertake
A cause that were unjust in our defence,
And so to lose him everlastingly
80 In that dark depth where all bad quarrels sink,
Never to rise again. What pity 'twere
First to die here and never to die there.

LADY
Why, what's the quarrel, speak, sir, that should raise
Such fearful doubt, my honour bearing part on't?
The words, whate'er they were.

85 CAPTAIN
Son of a whore.
LADY Thou liest!
She strikes him
And were my love ten thousand times more to thee,
Which is as much now as e'er mother's was,
So thou shouldst feel my anger. Dost thou call 90 That quarrel doubtful? Where are all my merits?
Not one stand up to tell this man his error?
Thou might'st as well bring the sun's truth in question
As thy birth or my honour.

CAPTAIN
Now blessings crown you for't,
It is the joyfullest blow that e'er flesh felt.

LADY
95 Nay stay, stay, sir, thou art not left so soon.
This is no question to be slighted off,
And at your pleasure closed up fair again
As though you'd never touched it. No, honour doubted
100 Is honour deeply wounded, and it rages
More than a common smart, being of thy making.
For thee to fear my truth, it kills my comfort.
Where should fame seek for her reward, when he
That is her own by the great tie of blood
Is farthest off in bounty? O poor goodness,
105 That only pay'st thyself with thy own works,
For nothing else looks towards thee. Tell me, pray,
Which of my loving cares dost thou requite

With this vile thought? Which of my prayers or wishes?
Many thou owest me for. This seven year hast thou known me
A widow, only married to my vow. 110
That's no small witness of my faith and love
To him that in life was thy honoured father,
And live I now to know that good mistrusted?

CAPTAIN
No, 't shall appear that my belief is cheerful,
For never was a mother's reputation 115
Noblier defended. 'Tis my joy and pride
I have a firm to bestow upon it.

LADY
What's that you said, sir?

CAPTAIN
'Twere too bold and soon yet
To crave forgiveness of you. I will earn it first;
Dead or alive, I know I shall enjoy it. 120

LADY
What's all this, sir?

CAPTAIN
My joy's beyond expression;
I do but think how wretched I had been
Were this another's quarrel and not mine.

LADY
Why, is it yours?

CAPTAIN
Mine! Think me not so miserable
Not to be mine. Then were I worse than abject, 125 More to be loathed than vileness or sin's dunghill.
Nor did I fear your goodness, faithful madam,
But came with greedy joy to be confirmed in't,
To give the nobler onset. Then shines valour,
And admiration from her fixed sphere draws,
130 When it comes burnished with a righteous cause,
Without which I'm ten fathoms under coward
That now am ten degrees above a man,
Which is but one of virtue's easiest wonders.

LADY
But pray, stay; all this while I understood you 135 The Colonel was the man.

CAPTAIN
Yes, he's the man,
The man of injury, reproach, and slander,
Which I must turn into his soul again.

LADY
The Colonel do't! That's strange.

CAPTAIN
The villain did it;
140 That's not so strange. Your blessing and your leave.

LADY
Come, come, you shall not go.

CAPTAIN
Not go! Were death
Sent now to summon me to my eternity,
I'd put him off an hour. Why, the whole world
Has not chains strong enough to bind me from it.
145 The strongest is my reverence to you,

Act 2 Scene 1

A Fayre Quarrell.

Which if you force upon me in this case
I must be forced to break it.

LADY Stay, I say.

CAPTAIN
In anything command me but in this, madam.

LADY [aside]
'Las, I shall lose him! [To Ager] You'll hear me first.

CAPTAIN
At my return I will.

150 LADY You'll never hear me more, then.

CAPTAIN How?

LADY Come back, I say.
You may well think there's cause I call so often.

CAPTAIN
Ha, cause! What cause?

LADY So much, you must not go.

155 CAPTAIN How?

LADY You must not go.

CAPTAIN
Must not! Why?

LADY I know a reason for it,
Which I could wish you'd yield to, and not know.
If not, it must come forth. Faith, do not know,
And yet obey my will.

160 CAPTAIN Why, I desire
To know no other than the cause I have,
Nor should you wish it if you take your injury,
For one more great I know the world includes not.

LADY
Yes, one that makes this nothing. Yet be ruled,
And if you understand not, seek no further.

165 CAPTAIN
I must, for this is nothing.

LADY Then take all,
And if amongst it you receive that secret
That will offend you, though you condemn me
Yet blame yourself a little, for perhaps 170 I would have made my reputation sound
Upon another's hazard with less pity,
But upon yours I dare not.

CAPTAIN How?

LADY I dare not.
'Twas your own seeking, this.

CAPTAIN If you mean evilly,
I cannot understand you, nor for all the riches
This life has, would I.

175 LADY Would you never might.

CAPTAIN
Why, your goodness, that I joy to fight for.

LADY
In that you neither right your joy nor me.

CAPTAIN
What an ill orator has virtue got here?
Why, shall I dare to think it a thing possible

That you were ever false?

LADY O, fearfully! 180
As much as you come to.

CAPTAIN O silence, cover me!
I've felt a deadlier wound than man can give me.
False?

LADY
I was betrayed to a most sinful hour
By a corrupted soul I put in trust once,
A kinswoman.

CAPTAIN Where is she? Let me pay her. 185
LADY
O, dead long since.

CAPTAIN Nay, then sh'as all her wages.
False! Do not say't, for honour's goodness do not,
You never could be so. He I called father Deserved you at your best, when youth and merit
Could boast at highest in you. You'd no grace 190
Or virtue that he matched not, no delight
That you invented but he sent it crowned
To your full wishing soul.

LADY That heaps my guiltiness.

CAPTAIN
O, were you so unhappy to be false,
Both to yourself and me? But to me chiefly. 195
What a day's hope is here lost, and with it
The joys of a just cause. Had you but thought
On such a noble quarrel, you'd ha' died
Ere you'd ha' yielded, for the sin's hate first,
Next for the shame of this hour's cowardice. 200
Cursed be the heat that lost me such a cause,
A work that I was made for. Quench, my spirit,
And out with honour's flaming lights within thee!
Be dark and dead to all respects of manhood;
I never shall have use of valour more. 205
Put off your vow for shame: why should you hoard up
Such justice for a barren widowhood
That was so injurious to the faith of wedlock?

Exit Lady Ager

I should be dead, for all my life's work's ended:
I dare not fight a stroke now, nor engage 210
The noble resolution of my friends:
That were more vile.

Enter two Friends of Captain Ager's

They're here! Kill me, my shame,
I am not for the fellowship of honour.

CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND
Captain! Fie, come sir, we have been seeking for you
Very late today. This was not wont to be. 215
Your enemy's i'th' field.

CAPTAIN Truth enters cheerfully.

CAPTAIN'S SECOND FRIEND
Good faith, sir, you've a royal quarrel on't.

181 As much...to My infidelity brought about your birth.
185 pay her kill her

CAPTAIN	Yes, in some other country, Spain or Italy, It would be held so.	CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND	Pardon this traitorous slumber, clogged with evils; Give captains rather wives than such tame devils.	250
CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND	How, and is't not here so?		Exeunt
CAPTAIN	'Tis not so contumeliously received In these parts, an you mark it.		Enter Physician and Jane	2.2
CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND	Not in these? Why, prithee, what is more, or can be?	PHYSICIAN	Nay, mistress, you must not be covered to me. The patient must ope to the physician All her dearest sorrows: art is blinded else, And cannot show her mystical effects.
CAPTAIN	Yes, That ordinary commotioner, the lie, Is father of most quarrels in this climate, And held here capital, and you go to that.	JANE	Can art be so dim-sighted, learned sir? I did not think her so incapacious. You train me, as I guess, like a conjuror, One of our fine oraculous wizards, Who from the help of his examinant, By the near guess of his suspicion Appoints out the thief by the marks he tells him.	5
CAPTAIN'S SECOND FRIEND	But sir, I hope you will not go to that, Or change your own for it. Son of a whore! Why, there's the lie down to posterity, The lie to birth, the lie to honesty.		Have you no skill in physiognomy? What colour, says your coat, is my disease? I am unmarried, and it cannot be yellow; If it be maiden green, you cannot miss it.	10
CAPTAIN	Why would you cozen yourself so and beguile So brave a cause, manhood's best masterpiece? Do you ever hope for one so brave again?	PHYSICIAN	I cannot see that vacuum in your blood. But gentlewoman, if you love yourself, Love my advice, be free and plain with me. Where lies your grief?	15
CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND	O miracle! So hopeful, valiant, and complete a captain Possessed with a tame devil! Come out, thou spoilest The most improved young soldier of seven kingdoms, Made captain at nineteen, which was deserved The year before, but honour comes behind still. Come out, I say, this was not wont to be. That spirit never stood in need of provocation, Nor shall it now. Away, sir.	JANE	Where lies my grief indeed? I cannot tell the truth where my grief lies, But my joy's imprisoned.	20
CAPTAIN	Urge me not.	PHYSICIAN	This is mystical.
CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND	By manhood's reverend honour, but we must.	JANE	Lord, what plain questions you make problems of! Your art is such a regular highway That put you out of it and you are lost. My heart is imprisoned in my body, sir, There's all my joy, and my sorrow too Lies very near it.	25
CAPTAIN	I will not fight a stroke.	PHYSICIAN	They are bad adjuncts: Your joy and grief, lying so near together, Can propagate no happy issue. Remove The one, and let it be the worst, your grief, If you'll propose the best unto your joy.	30
CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND	O blasphemy To sacred valour!	JANE	Why, now comes your skill. What physic for it?
CAPTAIN	Lead me where you list.

	PHYSICIAN	I will be more than mine ears' length from you. [He retires]
	Now I have found you out. You are in love.
	JANE	JANE
	I think I am. What's your appliance now?	You hold some endeared place with this gentleman.
35	Can all your Paracelsian mixtures cure it?	ANNE
	'T must be a surgeon of the civil law,	He's my brother, forsooth, I his creature.	70
	I fear, that must cure me.	He does command me any lawful office Either in act or counsel.
	PHYSICIAN	JANE
	Gentlewoman,	I must not doubt you.
	If you knew well my heart you would not be	Your brother has protested secrecy
40	So circular. The very common name	And strengthened me in you. I must lay ope
	Of physician might reprove your niceness.	A guilty sorrow to you: I am with child.	75
	We are as secret as your confessors	'Tis no black swan I show you: these spots stick
	And as firm obliged; 'tis a fine like death	Upon the face of many go for maids.
	For us to blab.	I that had face enough to do the deed
	JANE	Cannot want tongue to speak it, but 'tis to you,
	I will trust you. Yet, sir,	Whom I accept my helper.
45	I had rather do it by attorney to you;	ANNE
	I else have blushes that will stop my tongue.	Mistress, 'tis locked	80
	Have you no friend so friendly as yourself	Within a castle that's invincible.
	Of mine own sex, to whom I might impart	It is too late to wish it were undone.
	My sorrows to you at the second hand?	JANE
	PHYSICIAN	I have scarce a wish within myself so strong,
50	Why, law, there I hit you! And be confirmed	For understand me, 'tis not all so ill
	I'll give you such a bosom counsellor	As you may yet conceit it. This deed was done	85
	That your own tongue shall be sooner false to you.	When heaven had witness to the jugal knot;
	Make yourself unready and be naked to her.	Only the barren ceremony wants,
	I'll fetch her presently.	Which by an adverse father is abridged.
	JANE	ANNE
	I must reveal:	Would my pity could help you.
55	My shame will else take tongue and speak before me.	JANE
	'Tis a necessity impulsive drives me.	Your counsel may.
	O my hard fate! But my more hard father,	My father yet shoots widest from my sorrow	90
	That father of my fate. A father, said I?	And with a care indulgent, seeing me changed
	What a strange paradox I run into:	From what I was, sends for your good brother
60	I must accuse two fathers of my fate	To find my grief and practice remedy.
	And fault, a reciprocal generation.	You know it, give it him, but if a fourth
	The father of my fault would have repaired	Be added to this counsel, I will say	95
	His faulty issue, but my fate's father hinders it:	You're worse than you can call me at the worst,
	Then fate and fault, wherever I begin	At this advantage of my reputation.
	I must blame both, and yet 'twas love did sin.	ANNE
	Enter Physician and Anne his sister	I will revive a reputation
65	PHYSICIAN	That women long has lost: I'll keep counsel.
	Look you, mistress, here's your closet. Put in	I'll only now oblige my teeth to you,	100
	What you please, you ever keep the key of it.	And they shall bite the blabber if it offer
	JANE	To breathe on an offending syllable.

JANE
I trust you, go, whisper. Here comes my father.
Enter Russell, Chough, and Trimtram

RUSSELL
Sir, you are welcome, more and most welcome,
105 All the degrees of welcome, thrice welcome, sir.

CHOUGH
Is this your daughter, sir?

RUSSELL Mine only joy, sir.

CHOUGH I'll show her the Cornish hug, sir.
[He kisses Jane]
I have kissed you now, sweetheart, and I never do any kindness to my friends, but I use to hit 'em in the teeth with it presently.

110 TRIMTRAM My name is Trimtram, forsooth; look, what my master does, I use to do the like.
[He attempts to kiss Anne]

ANNE You are deceived, sir, I am not this gentlewoman's servant, to make your courtesy equal.
[She withdraws and whispers to Physician]

115 CHOUGH You do not know me, mistress.

JANE
No indeed. [Aside] I doubt I shall learn too soon.

CHOUGH My name is Chough, a Cornish gentleman. My man's mine own countryman too, i'faith. I warrant you took us for some of the small islanders.

JANE
120 I did indeed, between the Scotch and Irish.

CHOUGH Red-shanks? I thought so, by my truth. No, truly, we are right Cornish diamonds.

TRIMTRAM Yes, we cut out quarrels and break glasses where we go.

PHYSICIAN [to Anne]
125 If it be hidden from her father, yet
His ignorance understands well his knowledge,
For this I guess to be some rich coxcomb
He'd put upon his daughter.

ANNE That's plainly so.

PHYSICIAN
Then only she's beholden to our help
130 For the close delivery of her burden,
Else all's o'erthrown.

ANNE And pray be faithful in that, sir.

PHYSICIAN
Tush, we physicians are the truest
Alchemists, that from the ore and dross of sin
Can new distill a maidenhead again.

RUSSELL
How do you like her, sir?
135 CHOUGH Troth, I do like her, sir, in the way of comparison to anything that a man would desire. I am as high as the Mount in love with her already, and that's as far as I can go by land, but I hope to go further by water with her one day.

140 RUSSELL
I tell you, sir, she has lost some colour
By wrestling with a peevish sickness now of late.

CHOUGH Wrestle? Nay, and she love wrestling, I'll teach her a trick to overthrow any peevish sickness in London, what e'er it be.

145 RUSSELL
Well, she had a rich beauty, though I say't,
Nor is it lost; a little thing repairs it.

CHOUGH She shall command the best thing that I have in Middlesex, i'faith.

RUSSELL
150 Well, sir, talk with her, give her a relish
Of your good liking to her. You shall have time
And free access to finish what you now begin.

JANE [aside]
What means my father? My love's unjust restraint,
My shame were it published, both together
Could not afflict me like this odious fool.

155 RUSSELL
Now I see why he hated my Fitzallen.

CHOUGH Sweet lady, your father says you are a wrestler. If you love that sport, I love you the better. I'faith, I love it as well as I love my meat after supper, 'tis indeed meat, drink, and cloth to me.

160 JANE
Methinks it should tear your clothes, sir.

CHOUGH Not a rag, i'faith. Trimtram, hold my cloak. I'll wrestle a fall with you now; I'll show you a trick that you never saw in your life.

JANE
165 O good sir, forbear, I am no wrestler.

PHYSICIAN [coming forward]
Good sir, take heed, you'll hurt the gentlewoman.
CHOUGH I will not catch beneath the waist, believe it. I know fair play.

JANE
'Tis no woman's exercise in London, sir.

170 CHOUGH I'll ne'er believe that. The hug and the lock between man and woman, with a fair fall, is as sweet

107 Cornish hug a hold in Cornish wrestling where each contestant grasps the other's clothing

109 hit 'em in the teeth reproach them with
it

119 small islanders inhabitants of the Hebrides off the west coast of Scotland and thus between the Scotch and the Irish

121 Red-shanks Celtic inhabitants of the Scottish highlands and Ireland

122 Cornish diamonds quartz crystals, a byword for fraudulence

123 quarrels (a) diamond-shaped panes of glass; (b) causes of complaint

127 coxcomb fool

130 close secret

138 Mount St Michael's Mount, a small island in Mount's Bay at Land's End, the westernmost tip of Cornwall

139 go further by water have sexual relations with

143 Wrestle . . . wrestling Throughout this passage wrestle has a secondary meaning of 'participate in a love bout'.

148-9 the best thing that I have in Middlesex a sexual pun

150 relish taste

170 hug . . . lock wrestling holds, with bawdy pun

- an exercise for the body as you'll desire in a summer's evening.
- PHYSICIAN
Sir, the gentlewoman is not well.
- CHOUGH
175 It may be you are a physician, sir.
PHYSICIAN 'Tis so, sir.
CHOUGH I say then, and I'll stand to't, three ounces of wrestling with two hips, a yard of a green gown put together in the inturn, is as good a medicine for the green sickness as ever breathed.
- 180 TRIMTRAM Come, sir, take your cloak again. I see here will be ne'er a match.
JANE [aside] A match? I'd rather be matched from a musket's mouth and shot unto my death.
- 185 CHOUGH I'll wrestle with any man for a good supper.
TRIMTRAM Ay, marry, sir, I'll take your part there, catch that catch may.
PHYSICIAN [to Russell]
Sir, she is willing to't. There at my house
She shall be private and near to my attendance.
- 190 I know you not mistrust my faithful care.
I shall return her soon and perfectly.
RUSSELL
Take your charge, sir. Go with this gentleman, Jane,
But pritheer look well this way ere thou goest.
[Aside to Jane] 'Tis a rich simplicity of great estate,
195 A thing that will be ruled, and thou shalt rule.
Consider of your sex's general aim,
That domination is a woman's heaven.
JANE
I'll think on't, sir.
RUSSELL [to Chough]
My daughter is retiring, sir.
- CHOUGH I will part at Dartmouth with her, sir.
[He kisses Jane]
- 200 O, that thou didst but love wrestling, I would give any man three foils on that condition.
TRIMTRAM There's three sorts of men that would thank you for 'em, either cutlers, fencers, or players.
- RUSSELL
Sir, as I began I end, wondrous welcome.
Exeunt Russell, Jane, Physician, Anne
- TRIMTRAM What, will you go to school today? You are entered you know, and your quarterage runs on. 205
CHOUGH What? To the roaring school? Pox on't, 'tis such a damnable noise I shall never attain it neither. I do wonder they have never a wrestling school. That were worth twenty of your fencing or dancing schools. 210
TRIMTRAM Well, you must learn to roar here in London, you'll never proceed in the reputation of gallantry else.
CHOUGH How long has roaring been an exercise, thinkest thou, Trimtram?
TRIMTRAM Ever since guns came up: the first was your roaring Meg. 215
CHOUGH Meg? Then 'twas a woman was the first roarer.
TRIMTRAM Ay, afire of her touch-hole, that cost many a proper man's life since that time; and then the lions, they learned it from the guns, living so near 'em; then it was heard to the Bankside, and the bears they began to roar; then the boys got it, and so ever since there have been a company of roaring boys. 220
CHOUGH And how long will it last, thinkest thou?
TRIMTRAM As long as the water runs under London Bridge, or watermen at Westminster stairs. 225
CHOUGH Well, I will begin to roar too, since it is in fashion. O Corineus, this was not in thy time, I should have heard on't by the tradition of mine ancestors (for I'm sure there were Choughs in thy days) if it had been so. 230
When Hercules and thou wert on the Olympic mount together, then was wrestling in request.
TRIMTRAM Ay, and that mount is now the Mount in Cornwall. Corineus brought it thither under one of his arms, they say. 235
CHOUGH O Corineus my predecessor, that I had but lived in those days to see thee wrestle! On that condition I had died seven year ago.
TRIMTRAM Nay, it should have been a dozen at least, i'faith, on that condition. Exeunt 240 grounds. The Hope Theatre, built 1613-14, alternated playing and bear-baiting.

226 watermen at Westminster stairs Ferry-men for hire on the Thames waited for fares at stairways connecting the shore with landing stages on the river. Westminster stairs was at the foot of Old Palace Yard.

228 Corineus Legendary Trojan hero who came to Britain with Brutus and ruled over Cornwall

231 Hercules . . . Olympic mount According to tradition, Corineus founded wrestling in Cornwall, but Chough jumbles Greek and Cornish mythology.

Incipit Actus TertiusEnter Captain Ager with his two Friends

CAPTAIN

Well, your wills now?

CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND

Our wills? Our loves, our duties

To honoured fortitude. What wills have we
But our desires to nobleness and merit,
Valour's advancement, and the sacred rectitude
Due to a valorous cause?

5 CAPTAIN

O, that's not mine.

CAPTAIN'S SECOND FRIEND

War has his court of justice, that's the field,
Where all cases of manhood are determined,
And your case is no mean one.

CAPTAIN

True, then 'twere virtuous;

But mine is in extremes, foul and unjust.

10 CAPTAIN

Well, now you've got me hither, you're as far
To seek in your desire as at first minute,
For by the strength and honour of a vow
I will not lift a finger in this quarrel.

CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND

How? Not in this? Be not so rash a sinner.

15 CAPTAIN

Why sir, do you ever hope to fight again?
Then take heed on't, you must never look for that.

Why, the universal stock of the world's injury
Will be too poor to find a quarrel for you.

20 CAPTAIN

Give up your right and title to desert, sir;
If you fail virtue here, she needs you not
All your time after. Let her take this wrong
And never presume then to serve her more.

Bid farewell to the integrity of arms,

And let that honourable name of soldier

25 CAPTAIN

Fall from you like a shivered wreath of laurel,
By thunder struck from a desertless forehead
That wears another's right by usurpation.

Good Captain, do not wilfully cast away

At one hour all the fame your life has won.

30 CAPTAIN

This is your native seat, here you should seek
Most to preserve it; or, if you will dote
So much on life, poor life, which in respect

Of life in honour is but death and darkness,
That you will prove neglectful of yourself,

35 CAPTAIN

Which is to me too fearful to imagine,

Yet for that virtuous lady's cause, your mother,

Her reputation, dear to nobleness

As grace to penitence, whose fair memory

E'en crowns fame in your issue—for that blessedness

40 CAPTAIN

Give not this ill place, but in spite of hell

And all her base fears, be exactly valiant.

CAPTAIN

O, O, O!

CAPTAIN'S SECOND FRIEND

Why, well said, there's fair hope in that.

Another such a one.

CAPTAIN

Came they in thousands

'Tis all against you.

CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND

Then poor friendless merit

Heaven be good to thee. Thy professor leaves thee;

45

Enter the Colonel and his two Friends

He's come. Do you but draw, we'll fight it for you.

CAPTAIN

I know too much to grant that.

CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND

O dead manhood!

Had ever such a cause so faint a servant?

Shame brand me if I do not suffer for him.

COLONEL

I've heard, sir, you've been guilty of much boasting

50

For your brave earliness at such a meeting.

You've lost the glory of that way this morning:

I was the first today.

CAPTAIN

So were you ever

In my respect, sir.

CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND

O most base præludium!

CAPTAIN

I never thought on victory, our mistress,

55

With greater reverence than I have your worth,

Nor ever loved her better.

CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND [aside to Captain's Second Friend]

'Slight, I could knock

His brains about his heels, methinks.

CAPTAIN'S SECOND FRIEND

Peace, prithee peace!

CAPTAIN

Success in you has been my absolute joy,

And when I have wished content, I have wished your friendship.

60

CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND

Stay, let me but run him through the tongue a little.

There's lawyer's blood in't, you shall see foul gear straight.

CAPTAIN'S SECOND FRIEND

Come, you are as mad now as he's cowardous.

COLONEL

I came not hither, sir, for an encomium.

CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND

No, the more coxcomb he, that claws the head

65

Of your vainglory with't.

COLONEL

I came provided

For storms and tempests and the foulest season

That ever rage let forth or blew in wildness

From the incensed prison of man's blood.

3.1.1-184 attributed to Middleton

25 wreath of laurel traditional sign of the victor45 professor announced follower54 præludium prelude or introduction62 foul gear corrupt matter, pus64 encomium formal expression of praise65 claws the head scratches, soothes

- Of your best preservation, with that watchfulness
 As you'd defend yourself from circular fire,
 145 Your sin's rage, or her lord. This will require it,
 Or you'll be too soon lost. For I've an anger
 Has gathered mighty strength against you, mighty;
 Yet you shall find it honest to the last,
 Noble and fair.
- COLONEL I'll venture't once again,
 150 And if't be but as true as it is wondrous,
 I shall have that I come for. Your leave, gentlemen.
 [They fight]
- CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND
 If he should do't indeed, and deceive's all now!
 Stay, by this hand he offers, fights, i'faith,
 Fights! By this light he fights, sir!
- CAPTAIN'S SECOND FRIEND So methinks, sir.
- CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND
 An absolute punto, hey!
- CAPTAIN'S SECOND FRIEND
 155 'Twas a passado, sir.
- CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND
 Why, let it pass, and 'twas, I'm sure, 'twas somewhat.
 What's that now?
- CAPTAIN'S SECOND FRIEND
 That's a punto.
- CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND O, go to, then,
 I knew 'twas not far off. What a world's this?
 Is coward a more stirring meat than bastard, my 160 masters?
 Put in more eggs, for shame, when you get children,
 And make it true court custard. Ho! I honour thee.
 [The Colonel falls]
 'Tis right and fair, and he that breathes against it,
 He breathes against the justice of a man,
 And man to cut him off, 'tis no injustice.
 165 Thanks, thanks, for this most unexpected nobleness.
- CAPTAIN
 Truth never fails her servant, sir, nor leaves him
 With the day's shame upon him.
- CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND Thou'st redeemed
- Thy worth to the same height 'twas first esteemed.
Exeunt Captain and his Friends
- COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND
 Alas, how is it, sir? Give us some hope
 Of your stay with us; let your spirit be seen
 170 Above your fortune. The best fortitude
 Has been of fate ill-friended. Now force your empire
 And reign above your blood spite of dejection,
 Reduce the monarchy of your abler mind,
 Let not flesh straiten it.
- COLONEL O, just heaven has found me
 175 And turned the stings of my too hasty injuries
 Into my own blood. I pursued my ruin
 And urged him past the patience of an angel.
 Could man's revenge extend beyond man's life,
 This would ha' waked it. If this flame will light me
 180 But till I see my sister, 'tis a kind one;
 More I expect not from it. Noble deserver!
 Farewell, most valiant and most wronged of men;
 Do but forgive me, and I am victor then.
Exit, led by his Friends
- Enter Physician, Jane, Anne, Dutch Nurse with

- PHYSICIAN
 Sweet Fro, to your most indulgent care
 Take this my heart's joy. I must not tell you
 The value of this jewel in my bosom.
- NURSE
 Dat you may vell, sir, der can niet forstoore you.
- PHYSICIAN
 Indeed I cannot tell you. You know, Nurse,
 5 These are above the quantity of price.
 Where is the glory of the goodliest trees
 But in the fruit and branches? The old stock Must decay, and sprigs, scions such as these,
 Must become new stocks from us, to glory
 10 In their fruitful issue. So we are made Immortal one by other.
- NURSE You spreke a most lieben fader, and ick sall do de 159 coward...bastard Is it more provoking to be called coward than bastard?

159-61 bastard...more eggs...court custard Bastard is a sweet wine. Eggs are needed to make it into a court, that is, impressive, custard, though the metaphor is not entirely clear. Custard also puns on coward.

14 frokin little girl, a diminutive from Dutch vrouwe

90 If that hurt you, I have the cure, you see.
 JANE Come, you're a good man, I do perceive you:
 You put a trial to me. I thank you.
 You're my just confessor, and believe me,
 I'll have no further penance for this sin.
 95 Convert a year unto a lasting ever,
 And call't Apollo's smile, 'twas once, then never.
 PHYSICIAN Pray you, mistake me not, indeed I love you.
 JANE In deed, what deed?
 PHYSICIAN The deed that you have done.
 JANE I cannot believe you.
 PHYSICIAN Believe the deed then.
 [He offers to kiss her]
 JANE Away, you're a blackamoor! You love me?
 100 I hate you for your love. Are you the man
 That in your painted outside seemed so white?
 O, you're a foul dissembling hypocrite.
 You saved me from a thief that yourself might rob me,
 105 Skinned o'er a green wound to breed an ulcer.
 Is this the practice of your physic college?
 PHYSICIAN Have you yet uttered all your niceness forth?
 If you have more, vent it. Certes I think
 Your first grant was not yielded with less pain.
 110 If 'twere, you have your price, yield it again.
 JANE Pray you tell me, sir—I asked it before—,
 Is it a practice 'mongst you physicians?
 PHYSICIAN Tush, that's a secret. We cast all waters;
 Should I reveal, you would mistrust my counsel.
 115 The lawyer and physician here agrees:
 To women clients they give back their fees.
 And is not that kindness?
 JANE This for thy love!
She spits
 Out, outside of a man, thou cinnamon tree,
 That but thy bark hast nothing good about thee!
 120 The unicorn is hunted for his horn,
 The rest is left for carrion. Thou false man,
 Th'ast fished with silver hooks and golden baits,
 But I'll avoid all thy deceiving sleights.

PHYSICIAN Do what you list, I will do something too;
 Remember yet what I have done for you. 125
 You've a good face now, but 'twill grow rugged;
 Ere you grow old, old men will despise you.
 Think on your grandam Helen, the fairest queen:
 When in a new glass she spied her old face
 She smiling wept to think upon the change. 130
 Take your time, you're crazed, you're an apple fallen
 From the tree; if you be kept long, you'll rot.
 Study your answer well. Yet I love you.
 If you refuse I have a hand above you. Exit

JANE Poison thyself, thou foul empoisoner: 135
 Of thine own practic drink the theory.
 What a white devil have I met withal!
 What shall I do? What do! is't a question?
 Nor shame, nor hate, nor fear, nor lust, nor force
 (Now being too bad) shall ever make me worse. 140
Enter Anne
 What have we here, a second spirit?
 ANNE Mistress,
 I am sent to you.
 JANE Is your message good?
 ANNE As you receive it. My brother sent me
 And you know he loves you.
 JANE I heard say so,
 But 'twas a false report. 145
 ANNE Pray pardon me, I must do my message:
 Who lives commanded must obey his keeper.
 I must persuade you to this act of woman.
 JANE Woman! Of strumpet.
 ANNE Indeed of strumpet.
 He takes you at advantage of your fall, 150
 Seeing you down before.
 JANE Curse on his fainèd smiles.
 ANNE He's my brother, mistress, and a curse on you
 If e'er you bless him with that cursèd deed.
 Hang him, poison him! He held out a rose
 To draw the yielding sense, which come to hand 155
 He shifts, and gives a canker.
 JANE You speak well yet.
 ANNE Ay, but mistress, now I consider it,

Your reputation lies at his mercy;
 Your fault dwells in his breast. Say he throw it out,
 160 It will be known; how are you then undone?
 Think on't, your good name; and they are not to be sold
 In every market. A good name's dear,
 And indeed more esteemed than our actions
 By which we should deserve it.

JANE
 Ay me, most wretched!

165 ANNE What, do you shrink at that?
 Would you not wear one spot upon your face
 To keep your whole body from a leprosy,
 Though it were undiscovered ever? Hang him, Fear him not! Horseleeches suck out his corrupt
 blood;
 170 Draw you none from him, 'less it be pure and good.

JANE
 Do you speak your soul?

ANNE By my soul do I.

JANE
 Then yet I have a friend. But thus exhort me,
 And I have still a column to support me.

ANNE
 One fault heaven soon forgives, and 'tis on earth forgot;
 175 The moon herself is not without one spot. Exeunt

3.3 Enter the Lady Ager, meeting one of her servants

LADY
 Now, sir, where is he? Speak, why comes he not?
 I sent you for him. Bless this fellow's senses,
 What has he seen? A soul nine hours entranced, Hovering 'twixt hell and heaven, could not wake ghastlier.
Enter another Servant
 Not yet return an answer? [To Second Servant] What 5 say you, sir?
 Where is he?

SECOND SERVANT
 Gone!

LADY What say'st thou?

SECOND SERVANT He is gone, madam,
 But as we heard, unwillingly he went
 As ever blood enforced.

LADY Went? Whither went he?

SECOND SERVANT
 Madam, I fear I ha' said too much already.

LADY
 These men are both agreed. Speak, whither went he? 10

SECOND SERVANT
 Why to—I would you'd think the rest yourself,
 madam.

LADY
 Meek patience bless me!

SECOND SERVANT To the field.

FIRST SERVANT To fight, madam.

LADY
 To fight!

FIRST SERVANT
 There came two urging gentlemen
 That called themselves his seconds, both so powerful
 As 'tis reported they prevailed with him 15
 With little labour.

LADY O, he's lost, he's gone!
 For all my pains, he's gone. Two meeting torrents
 Are not so merciless as their two rages:
 He never comes again. Wretched affection,
 Have I belied my faith? Injured my goodness? 20
 Slandered my honour for his preservation,
 Having but only him, and yet no happier?
 'Tis then a judgement plain, truth's angry with me,
 In that I would abuse her sacred whiteness
 For any worldly temporal respect. 25
 Forgive me, then, thou glorious woman's virtue, Admired where'er thy habitation is,
 Especially in us weak ones. O, forgive me,
 For 'tis thy vengeance this. To belie truth,
 Which is so hardly ours, with such pain purchased, 30
 Fastings and prayers, continence and care,
 Misery must needs ensue. Let him not die
 In that unchaste belief of his false birth
 And my disgrace. Whatever angel guides him,
 May this request be with my tears obtained: 35
 Let his soul know my honour is unstained.
 Run, seek, away! Exeunt Servants

If there be any hope
 Let me not lose him yet. When I think on him,
 His dearness and his worth, it earns me more:
 They that know riches tremble to be poor. 40
 My passion is not every woman's sorrow:

Finis Actus Tertius

4.1

Incipit Actus QuartusEnter Colonel's First Friend, Usher, Roarer with Chough and Trimtram

COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Truth, sir, I must needs blame you for a truant, having but one lesson read to you, and neglect so soon. Fie, I must see you once a day at least.
CHOUGH Would I were whipped, tutor, if it were not 'long of my man Trimtram here.

TRIMTRAM Who, of me?

CHOUGH [aside to Trimtram] Take't upon thee, Trim, I'll give thee five shillings, as I am a gentleman.

TRIMTRAM I'll see you whipped first. Well, I will, too.
[To Colonel's First Friend] Faith, sir, I saw he was not perfect, and I was loath he should come before to shame himself.

COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND How! Shame, sir? Is it a shame for scholars to learn? Sir, there are great scholars that are but slenderly read in our profession. Sir, first it must be economical, then ecumenical. Shame not to practice in the house how to perform in the field. The nail that is driven takes a little hold at the first stroke, but more at the second, and more at the third, but when 'tis home to the head, then 'tis firm.

CHOUGH Faith, I have been driving it home to the head
this two days.

TRIMTRAM I helped to hammer it in as well as I could too,
sir.

COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Well, sir, I will hear you rehearse anon. Meantime peruse the exemplary of my bills, and tell me in what language I shall roar a lecture to you, or I'll read to you the mathematical science of roaring.

CHOUGH Is it mathematical?

COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND O, sir, does not the winds roar?
the sea roar? the welkin roar? Indeed, most things do roar by nature, and is not the knowledge of these things mathematical?

CHOUGH Pray proceed, sir.

COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND [reads his bill] 'The names of the languages, the Sclavonian, Parthamenian, Bartheothian, Tyburnian, Wappinganian, or the modern Londonian. Any man or woman that is desirous to roar in any of these languages, in a week they shall be perfect, if they will take pains. So let 'em repair into Holborn to the sign of the cheat-loaf.'

CHOUGH Now your bill speaks of that, I was wondering a good while at your sign. The loaf looks very like bread, i'faith, but why is it called the cheat-loaf?

COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND This house was sometimes a baker's, sir, that served the court, where the bread is called cheat.

TRIMTRAM Ay, ay, 'twas a baker that cheated the court with bread.

COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Well, sir, choose your languages, and your lectures shall be read, between my usher and myself, for your better instruction, provided your conditions be performed in the premises beforesaid.

CHOUGH Look you, sir, there's twenty pound in hand, and twenty more I am to pay when I am allowed a sufficient roarer.

[He gives Colonel's First Friend money]

COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND You speak in good earnest, sir.

CHOUGH Yes, faith, do I. Trimtram shall be my witness.

TRIMTRAM Yes indeed, sir, twenty pound is very good earnest.

USHER Sir, one thing I must tell you belongs to my place.

You are the youngest scholar, and till another comes under you, there is a certain garnish belongs to the school. For in our practice we grow to a quarrel. Then there must be wine ready to make all friends, for that's the end of roaring, 'tis valiant but harmless, and this charge is yours.

CHOUGH With all my heart, i'faith, and I like it the better because no blood comes on it. Who shall fetch?

ROARER I'll be your spaniel, sir.

43 known to one having had sexual experience with only one person

whipped

11 come before come earlier

15 but slenderly read have small knowledge

16 economical, then ecumenical private before universal. The Colonel's Friend's language is inflated and inexact.

to drive the nail to the head, Tilley N15

25 rehearse repeat his lesson

26 exemplary exemplar, copy bills generally, documents, but here handbills

thian, Tyburnian, Wappinganian... Londonian

nonce words combining adjectives derived from places around the world—S[c]lavonian is the language of the Slavs or Russians, Parthamenian is derived from Parthia, an ancient kingdom of western Asia—with others derived from places familiar in Jacobean England. Tyburn was the site of a gallows where felons were hanged; Wapping, on the north bank of the Thames, was the usual place of execution for pirates. Bartheoian may come from Bermudas, the name given a notorious quarter of London.

40 Holborn one of the main thoroughfares of London, running from the Old Bailey to Drury Lane through a quarter of lawyers, taverns, booksellers, and gardens of dubious repute

been a baker's shop.

considered notably fawning.

- COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Bid Vapour bring some tobacco,
too.
CHOUGH Do, and here's money for't.
[He offers money to Roarer]
USHER No, you shall not, let me see the money.
[He takes the money]
75 So, I'll keep it, and discharge him after the combat.
Exit Roarer
For your practice sake you and your man shall roar him out on't (for indeed you must pay your debts so, for that's one of the main ends of roaring), and when you have left him in a chafe, then I'll qualify the rascal.
80 CHOUGH Content, i'faith. Trim, we'll roar the rusty rascal out of his tobacco.
TRIMTRAM Ay, and he had the best craccus in London.
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Observe, sir, we could now roar in the Sclavonian language, but this practice hath been 85 a little sublime, some hair's breadth or so above your caput. I take it for your use and understanding both, it were fitter for you to taste the modern assault, only the Londonian roar.
CHOUGH I'faith, sir, that's for my purpose, for I shall use 90 all my roaring here in London. In Cornwall we are all for wrestling, and I do not mean to travel over sea to roar there.
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Observe, then, sir, but it were necessary you took forth your tables to note the most 95 difficult points for the better assistance of your memory.
CHOUGH Nay, sir, my man and I keep two tables.
TRIMTRAM Ay, sir, and as many trenchers, cat's meat and dog's meat enough.
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Note, sir: Dost thou confront my 100 cyclops?
USHER With a briarean brousted.
CHOUGH [writing] Cyclops.
TRIMTRAM [writing] Briarean.
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND I know thee and thy lineal pedi-105 gree.
USHER It is collateral, as Brutus and Posthumus.
- TRIMTRAM [writing] Brutus.
CHOUGH [writing] Posthumus.
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND False as the face of Hecate. Thy sister is a— 110
USHER What is my sister, centaur?
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND I say thy sister is a bronsterops.
USHER A bronsterops!
CHOUGH Tutor, tutor, ere you go any further, tell me the English of that. What is a bronsterops, pray? 115 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND A bronsterops is in English a hippocrene.
CHOUGH A hippocrene. Note it, Trim. I love to understand the English as I go.
TRIMTRAM What's the English of hippocrene? 120
CHOUGH Why, bronsterops.
USHER Thou dost obtrect my flesh and blood.
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Again I denounce, thy sister is a fructifer.
CHOUGH What's that, tutor? 125
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND That is in English a fucus or a minotaur.
CHOUGH [writing] A minotaur.
TRIMTRAM [writing] A fucus.
USHER I say thy mother is a callicut, a panagron, a duplar 130 and a sindicus.
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Dislocate thy bladud.
USHER Bladud shall conjure, if his demons once appear.
Enter Roarer with wine and Vapour with tobacco
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Advance thy respondecy.
CHOUGH Nay, good gentlemen, do not fall out. A cup of 135 wine quickly, Trimtram!
USHER [drawing his sword] See, my steel hath a glister.
CHOUGH Pray wipe him and put him up again, good Usher.
USHER Sir, at your request I pull down the flag of defiance.
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Give me a bowl of wine. My fury 140 shall be quenched. Here, Usher.
[He drinks]

- [He drinks]
 CHOUGH I like the conclusion of roaring very well, i'faith.
 TRIMTRAM It has an excellent conclusion indeed, if the 145 wine be good, always provided.
 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND O, the wine must be always provided, be sure of that.
 USHER Else you spoil the conclusion, and that, you know, crowns all.
 150 CHOUGH 'Tis much like wrestling, i'faith, for we shake hands ere we begin. Now that's to avoid the law, for then if he throw him a furlough into the ground, he cannot recover himself upon him, because 'twas done in cold friendship.
 155 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND I believe you, sir.
 CHOUGH And then we drink afterwards, just in this fashion.
 Wrestling and roaring are as like as can be, i'faith, even like long sword and half pike.
 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Nay, they are reciprocal, if you 160 mark it, for as there is a great roaring at wrestling, so there is a kind of wrestling and contention at roaring.
 CHOUGH True, i'faith, for I have heard 'em roar from the Six Windmills to Islington. Those have been great falls
 then.
 165 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Come, now a brief rehearsal of your other day's lesson, betwixt your man and you, and then for today we break up school.
 CHOUGH Come, Trimtram. If I be out, tutor, I'll be bold to look in my tables, because I doubt I am scarce perfect.
 170 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Well, well, I will not see small faults.
 CHOUGH [to Trimtram] The wall!
 TRIMTRAM The wall of me? To thy kennel, spaniel!
 CHOUGH Wilt thou not yield precedency?
 175 TRIMTRAM To thee? I know thee and thy brood.
 CHOUGH Know'st thou my brood? I know thy brood too:
 thou art a rook.
 TRIMTRAM The nearer akin to the Choughs.
 CHOUGH The rooks akin to the Choughs?
 180 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Very well maintained.
 CHOUGH Dungcrower, thou liest.
 TRIMTRAM Lie! Eucleate the kernel of thy scabbard.
- CHOUGH Now if I durst draw my sword, 'twere valiant,
 i'faith.
 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Draw, draw, howsoever. 185
 CHOUGH Have some wine ready to make us friends, I pray
 you.
 TRIMTRAM Chough, I will make thee fly and roar.
 CHOUGH I will roar if thou striketh me.
 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND So, 'tis enough, now conclude in 190 wine. I see you will prove an excellent practitioner.
 Wondrous well performed on both sides.
 CHOUGH Here, Trimtram, I drink to thee.
 [He drinks]
 TRIMTRAM I'll pledge you in good friendship.
 [He drinks]
 Enter a Servant
 SERVANT Is there not one Master Chough here? 195
 USHER This is the gentleman, sir.
 SERVANT My master, sir, your elected father-in-law, desires speedily to speak with you.
 CHOUGH Friend, I will follow thee. I would thou hadst come a little sooner, thou shouldst have seen roaring sport,
 200 i'faith.
 SERVANT Sir, I'll return that you are following.
 CHOUGH Do so. Exit Servant
 I'll tell thee, tutor, I am to marry shortly, but I will defer it a while till I can roar perfectly, that I may get 205 the upper hand of my wife on the wedding day. 'T must be done at first or never.
 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND 'Twill serve you to good use in that, sir.
 CHOUGH How likest thou this, whiffler? 210
 VAPOUR Very valiantly, i'faith, sir.
 CHOUGH Tush, thou shalt see more by and by.
 VAPOUR I can stay no longer indeed, sir. Who pays me for my tobacco?
 CHOUGH How, pay for tobacco? Away, ye sooty-mouthed 215
 piper, you rusty piece of Martlemas bacon, away!
 TRIMTRAM Let me give him a mark for't.
 CHOUGH No, Trimtram, do not strike him, we'll only roar out a curse upon him.
 TRIMTRAM Well, do you begin then. 220

- CHOUGH May thy roll rot, and thy pudding drop in pieces, being sophisticated with filthy urine.
- TRIMTRAM May sergeants dwell on either side of thee, to fright away thy twopenny customers.
- 225 CHOUGH And for thy penny ones, let them suck thee dry.
- TRIMTRAM When thou art dead, mayst thou have no other sheets to be buried in but mouldy tobacco leaves.
- CHOUGH And no strewings to stick thy carcass but the bitter stalks.
- 230 TRIMTRAM Thy mourners all greasy tapsters—
- CHOUGH With foul tobacco pipes in their hats instead of rotten rosemary. And last of all, may my man and I live to see all this performed and to piss reeking even upon thy grave.
- 235 TRIMTRAM And last of all for me, let this epitaph be remembered over thee.
- ‘Here coldly now within is laid to rot
A man that yesterday was piping hot.
Some say he died by pudding, some by prick,
240 Others by roll and ball, some leaf, all stick
Fast in censure, yet think it strange and rare
He lived by smoke, yet died for want of air.
But then the surgeon said when he beheld him,
It was the burning of his pipe that killed him.’
- 245 CHOUGH So, are you paid now, whiffler?
- VAPOUR All this is but smoke out of a stinking pipe.
- CHOUGH So, so, pay him now, Usher.
- [Usher gives money to Vapour]
- COLONEL’S FIRST FRIEND Do not henceforth neglect your schooling, Master Chough.
- 250 CHOUGH Call me rook if I do, tutor.
- TRIMTRAM And me raven, though my name be Trimtram.
- CHOUGH Farewell, tutor.
- TRIMTRAM Farewell, Usher.
- [Exeunt Chough and Trimtram]
- COLONEL’S FIRST FRIEND
Thus when the drum’s unbraced and trumpet cease,
Soldiers must get pay for to live in peace. Exeunt 255
- [The Colonel discovered in bed, with his two Friends watching him.] Enter the Colonel’s Sister, meeting the Surgeon 4.2
- SISTER
O my most worthy brother, thy hard fate ’twas—
Come hither, honest surgeon, and deal faithfully
With a distressed virgin. What hope is there?
- SURGEON Hope? Chillis was ’scaped miraculously, lady.
- SISTER What’s that, sir? 5
- SURGEON Cava vena. I care but little for his wound i’t’h oesophag, not thus much, [snapping his fingers] trust me, but when they come to diaphragma once, the small intestines, or the spinal medull, or i’t’h’ roots of the emunctories of the noble parts, then straight I fear 10 a syncope, the flanks retiring towards the back, the urine bloody, the excrements purulent, and the dolour pricking or pungent.
- SISTER
Alas, I’m ne’er the better for this answer.
- SURGEON Now I must tell you his principal dolour lies i’t’h 15 region of the liver, and there’s both inflammation and turmafaction feared. Marry, I made him a quadrangular plumation, where I used sanguis draconis, by my faith, with powders incarnative, which I tempered with oil of hypericon, and other liquors mundificative. 20
- SISTER
Pox o’ your mundies figatives, I would they were all fired.
- SURGEON But I purpose, lady, to make another experiment at next dressing with a sarcotrick medicament, made

25 sacrocolla—
SISTER Sacro-halter!
What comfort is i'this to a poor gentlewoman?
Pray tell me in plain terms what you think of him.
SURGEON Marry, in plain terms I know not what to say to 30 him. The wound, I can assure you, inclines to paralism, and I find his body cacochymic. Being then in fear of fever and inflammation, I nourish him altogether with viands refrigerative and give for potion the juice of sanicola, dissolved with water cerefolium. I could do no 35 more, Lady, if his best guiguimos were dissevered. Exit
SISTER
What thankless pains does the tongue often take
To make the whole man most ridiculous.
I come to him for comfort, and he tires me
Worse than my sorrow. What a precious good 40 May be delivered sweetly in few words,
And what a mount of nothing has he cast forth.
[She approaches the bed]
Alas, his strength decays! How cheer you, sir,
My honoured brother?
COLONEL In soul, never better.
I feel an excellent health there, such a stoutness!
45 My invisible enemy flies me. Seeing me armed With penitence and forgiveness, they fall backward,
Whether through admiration, not imagining
There were such armoury in a soldier's soul
As pardon and repentance, or through power
50 Of ghostly valour. But I have been lord
Of a more happy conquest in nine hours now
Than in nine years before. O, kind lieutenants,
This is the only war we should provide for,
Where he that forgives largest and sighs strongest 55 Is a tried soldier, a true man indeed,
And wins the best field, makes his own heart bleed.
Read the last part of that will, sir.
COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND (reads) 'I also require at the hands of my most beloved sister, whom I make full executrix, 60 the disposure of my body in burial at St Martin's i'th'
- field, and to cause to be distributed to the poor of the same parish, forty mark, and to the hospital of maimed soldiers, a hundred. Lastly, I give and bequeath to my kind, dear, and virtuous sister the full possession of my present estate in riches, whether it be in lands, leases, 65 money, goods, plate, jewels, or what kind soever, upon this condition following: that she forthwith tender both herself and all these enfeoffments to that noble captain, my late enemy, Captain Ager.'
SISTER How, sir? 70
COLONEL
Read it again, sir, let her hear it plain.
SISTER
Pray spare your pains, sir, 'tis too plain already.
Good sir, how do you, is your memory perfect?
This will makes question of you. I bestowed
So much grief and compassion o' your wound, 75
I never looked into your senses' epilepsy.
The sickness and infirmity of your judgement
Is to be doubted now, more than your body's.
Why, is your love no dearer to me, sir,
Than to dispose me so upon the man 80
Whose fury is your body's present torment,
The author of your danger, one I hate
Beyond the bounds of malice? Do you not feel
His wrath upon you? I beseech you, sir,
Alter that cruel article.
COLONEL Cruel, sister? 85
Forgive me, natural love, I must offend thee,
Speaking to this woman. Am I content,
Having much kindred, yet to give thee all,
Because in thee I'd raise my means to goodness,
And canst thou prove so thankless to my bounty 90
To grudge my soul her peace? Is my intent
To leave her rich, whose only desire is
To send me poorer into the next world
Than ever usurer went, or politic statish?
Is it so burdensome for thee to love 95
Where I forgive? O, wretched is the man
That builds the last hopes of his saving comforts

- 24 iris of Florence white iris
mastic gum or resin from the tree
Pistacia Lentiscus

- 4.4 VOICE (within)
Hem!
Enter Captain Albo, a Bawd, and a Whore
BAWD Hark of these hard-hearted bloodhounds. These butchers are e'en as merciless as their dogs, they knock down a woman's fame e'en as it walks the streets by 'em.
5 WHORE And the Captain here, that should defend us, walks by like John-of-the-apple-loft.
CAPTAIN ALBO What for interjections, Priss? Hem, Evax, Vah! Let the carnifexes scour their throats, thou knowest there is a curse hangs over their bloody heads: this year there shall be more butchers' pricks burnt than of all trades besides.
BAWD I do wonder how thou camest to be a captain.
CAPTAIN ALBO As thou camest to be a bawd, Meg, and Priss to be a whore, everyone by their deserts.
15 BAWD Bawd and whore? Out, you unprofitable rascal, hast not thou been at the new play yet, to teach thee better manners? Truly they say they are the finest players, and good speakers of gentlewomen of our quality. Bawd and whore is not mentioned amongst 'em, but the handsomest narrow-mouthed names they have for us, that some of them may serve as well for a lady as for one of our occupation.
WHORE Prithee, patroness, let's go see a piece of that play.
25 If we shall have good words for our money, 'tis as much as we can deserve, i'faith.
BAWD I doubt 'tis too late now, but another time, servant.
CAPTAIN ALBO Let's go now, sweet face. I am acquainted with one of the pantomimics: the bulchins will use the Irish captain with respect, and you two shall be boxed amongst the better sort.
30 WHORE Sirrah, Captain Albo, I doubt you are but white-livered. Look that you defend us valiantly, you know your penance else. Patroness, you remember how you used him once?
35 BAWD Ay, servant, and I shall never forget it till I use him so again. Do you remember, Captain?
CAPTAIN ALBO Mum, Meg, I will not hear on't now.
BAWD How I and my Amazons stripped you as naked as an Indian—40 CAPTAIN ALBO Why, Meg!
BAWD And then how I bound you to the good behaviour in the open fields.
- WHORE And then you strewed oats upon his hoppers—
CAPTAIN ALBO Prithee, sweet face—
WHORE And then brought your ducks to nibble upon him, you remember?
CAPTAIN ALBO O, the remembrance tortures me again. No more, good sweet face.
BAWD Well, lead on, sir. But hark a little.
50 Enter Chough and Trimtram
CHOUGH Didst thou bargain for the bladders with the butcher, Trim?
TRIMTRAM Ay, sir, I have 'em here. I'll practise to swim, too, sir, and then I may roar with the water at London Bridge. He that roars by land and by water both is the perfect roarer.
CHOUGH Well, I'll venture to swim too. If my father-in-law gives me a good dowry with his daughter, I shall hold up my head well enough.
TRIMTRAM Peace, sir, here's practice for our roaring, here's a centaur and two hippocrenes.
60 CHOUGH Offer the jostle, Trim.
Trimtram jostles the Captain
CAPTAIN ALBO Ha! What meanest thou by that?
TRIMTRAM I mean to confront thee, cyclops.
CHOUGH I'll tell thee what a means. Is this thy sister?
65 CAPTAIN ALBO How then, sir?
CHOUGH Why then, I say she is a bronsterops, and this is a fucus.
WHORE No indeed, sir, we are both fucusses.
CAPTAIN ALBO Art thou military? Art thou a soldier?
70 CHOUGH A soldier? No, I scorn to be so poor. I am a roarer.
CAPTAIN ALBO A roarer?
TRIMTRAM Ay, sir, two roarers.
CAPTAIN ALBO Know then, my freshwater friends, that I am a captain.
75 CHOUGH What, and have but two to serve under you?
CAPTAIN ALBO I am now retiring the field.
TRIMTRAM You may see that by his bag and baggage.
CHOUGH Deliver up thy panagron to me.
TRIMTRAM And give me thy sindicus.
80 CAPTAIN ALBO Deliver?
BAWD I pray you, Captain, be contented, the gentlemen seem to give us very good words.
CHOUGH Good words? Ay, if you could understand 'em, the words cost twenty pound.
85 BAWD What is your pleasure, gentlemen?

- CHOUGH I would enucleate my fructifer.
WHORE What says he, patroness?
BAWD He would enoculate; I understand the gentleman
90 very pithily.
CAPTAIN ALBO Speak, are you gentle or plebeian? Can you give arms?
CHOUGH Arms? Ay, sir, you shall feel our arms presently.
TRIMTRAM 'Sault you the women, I'll pepper him till he 95 stinks again. I perceive what countryman he is; let me alone with him.
CAPTAIN ALBO Darest thou charge a captain?
TRIMTRAM Yes, and discharge upon him, too.
[Trimtram turns his back to the Captain]
CAPTAIN ALBO Foh, 'tis poison to my country, the slave 100 has eaten pippins! O, shoot no more, turn both thy broad-sides rather than thy poop! 'Tis foul play: my country breeds no poison. I yield, the great O'Toole shall yield on these conditions.
CHOUGH I have given one of 'em a fair fall, Trim.
105 TRIMTRAM Then thus far we bring home conquest. Follow me, Captain, the cyclops doth command.
CHOUGH Follow me, tweaks, the centaur doth command.
BAWD Anything, sweet gentlemen. Will't please you to lead to the tavern where we'll make all friends?
110 TRIMTRAM Why, now you come to the conclusion.
CHOUGH Stay, Trim; I have heard your tweaks are like your mermaids: they have sweet voices to entice the passengers. Let's have a song, and then we'll set 'em at liberty.
115 TRIMTRAM In the commendation of roaring, not else, sir.
CHOUGH Ay, in the commendation of roaring.
BAWD The best we can, gentlemen.
Sing Bawd
Then here thou shalt resign
Both captain and commander;
120 That name was never thine,
But apple-squire and pander.
And henceforth will we grant
In pillage or in moneys,
- In clothing or provant,
Whate'er we get by conies. 125
With a hone, a hone, a hone,
No cheaters nor decoys
Shall have a share, but alone
The bravest roaring boys.
Whate'er we get by gulls, 130
Of country or of city,
Old flat-caps or young heirs,
Or lawyers' clerks so witty,
By sailors newly landed,
To put in for fresh waters, 135
By wandering gander-mooners,
Or muffled late night-walkers.
With a, etc.
Whate'er we get by strangers,
The Scotch, the Dutch, or Irish, 140
Or to come nearer home,
By masters of the parish.
It is concluded thus,
By all and every wench,
To take of all their coins 145
And pay 'em back in French.
With a, etc.
CHOUGH Melodious minotaur!
TRIMTRAM Harmonious hippocrene!
CHOUGH Sweet-breasted bronsterops!
150 TRIMTRAM Most tuneable tweak!
CHOUGH Delicious duplar!
TRIMTRAM Putrefactious panagron!
CHOUGH Calumnious callicut!
TRIMTRAM And most singular sindicus! 155
BAWD We shall never be able to deserve these good words at your hands, gentlemen.
CAPTAIN ALBO Shake golls with the captain, he shall be thy valiant friend.
CHOUGH Not yet, Captain, we must make an end of our 160
roaring first.

87-9 enucleate . . . fructifer . . . enoculate

- TRIMTRAM We'll serve 'em as we did the tobacco man: lay a curse upon 'em. Marry, we'll lay it on gently, because they have used us so kindly, and then we'll shake golls together.
- 165 WHORE As gently as you can, sweet gentlemen.
- CHOUGH For thee, O pander, mayst thou trudge till the damned soles of thy boots fleet into dirt, but never rise into air.
- 170 TRIMTRAM Next, mayst thou fleet so long from place to place, till thou beest kicked out of Fleet Street.
- CHOUGH As thou hast lived by bad flesh, so rotten mutton be thy bane.
- TRIMTRAM When thou art dead, may twenty whores follow thee, that thou mayst go a squire to thy grave.
- 175 CAPTAIN ALBO Enough for me, sweet faces, let me sleep in my grave.
- CHOUGH For thee, old sindicus, may I see thee ride in a caroche with two wheels and drawn with one horse.
- 180 TRIMTRAM Ten beadles running by, instead of footmen.
- CHOUGH With every one a whip, 'stead of an Irish dart.
- TRIMTRAM Forty barbers' basins sounding before instead of trumpets.
- BAWD This will be comely indeed, sweet gentlemen roarers.
- 185 TRIMTRAM Thy ruff starched yellow with rotten eggs.
- CHOUGH And mayst thou then be drawn from Holborn to Hounslow Heath.
- TRIMTRAM And then be burnt to Colebrook for destroying of Maidenhead.
- 190 BAWD I will study to deserve this kindness at your hands, gentlemen.
- CHOUGH Now for thee, little fucus, mayst thou first serve out thy time as a tweak, and then become a bronsterops as she is.
- 195 TRIMTRAM Mayst thou have a reasonable good spring, for thou art like to have many dangerous foul falls.
- CHOUGH Mayst thou have two ruffs torn in one week.
- TRIMTRAM May spiders only weave thy cobweb lawn.
- CHOUGH Mayst thou set up in Rogue Lane.
- TRIMTRAM Live till thou stinkest in Garden Alleys.
- 200 CHOUGH And die sweetly in Tower Ditch.
- WHORE I thank you for that, good sir roarer.
- CHOUGH Come, shall we go now, Trim? My father-in-law stays for me all this while.
- TRIMTRAM Nay, I'll serve 'em as we did the tobacco man:
I'll bury 'em altogether, and give 'em an epitaph.
- 205 CHOUGH All together, Trim? Why then the epitaph will be accessory to the sin.
- TRIMTRAM Alas, he has kept the door all his lifetime, for pity let 'em lie together in their graves.
- 210 CAPTAIN ALBO E'en as thou wilt, Trim, and I thank you, too, sir.
- TRIMTRAM
He that the reason would know, let him hark,
Why these three were buried near Marybone Park;
These three were a pander, a bawd, and a whore,
- 215 That sucked many dry to the bones before.
That sucked many dry to the bones before.
Will you know how they lived? Here't may be read,
The Low Countries did ever find 'em bread.
They lived by Flushing, by Sluys, and the Groyne, Sickened in France, and died under the Line.
- 220 Three letters at last commended 'em hither,
But the hangman broke one in putting together.
P. was the first, who cries out for a pardon.
O. craves his book, yet could not read such a hard one.
- An X. was the last, which in conjunction
Was broke by Brandon, and here's the conclusion:
By three trees, three letters; these three, pander,
bawd, whore,
- 225 Now stink below ground, stunk long above before.
- CHOUGH So, now we have done with you, remember roaring boys.
- 230 TRIMTRAM Farewell centaur.
CHOUGH Farewell bronsterops.

Finis Actus Quartus

5.1 Incipit Actus Quintus
Enter Physician and Jane [dressed] as a Bride

PHYSICIAN
 Will you be obstinate?
 JANE Torment me not,
 Thou ling'ring executioner to death,
 Greatest disease to nature, that striv'st by art
 To make men long a-dying. Your practice is 5 Upon men's bodies. As men pull roses
 For their own relish but to kill the flower,
 So you maintain your lives by others' deaths.
 What eat you then but carrion?
 PHYSICIAN Fie, bitterness!
 Y'ad need to candy o'er your tongue a little,
 10 Your words will hardly be digested else.
 JANE
 You can give yourself a vomit to return 'em
 If they offend your stomach.
 PHYSICIAN Hear my vow.
 You are to be married today.
 JANE A second torment,
 Worse than the first, 'cause unavoidable.
 15 I would I could as soon annihilate
 My father's will in that as forbid thy lust.
 PHYSICIAN
 If you then tender an unwilling hand
 Meet it with revenge: marry a cuckold.
 JANE
 If thou wilt marry me, I'll make that vow
 20 And give my body for satisfaction
 To him that should enjoy me for his wife.
 PHYSICIAN
 Go to, I'll mar your marriage.
 JANE Do, plague me so.
 I'll rather bear the brand of all that's passed
 In capital characters upon my brow
 25 Than think to be thy whore, or marry him.
 PHYSICIAN
 I will defame thee ever.
 JANE Spare me not.

PHYSICIAN I will produce thy bastard,
 Bring thee to public penance.
 JANE No matter, I care not:
 I shall then have a clean sheet. I'll wear twenty Rather than one defiled with thee.
 PHYSICIAN Look for revenge. 30
 JANE
 Pursue it fully then. [Aside] Out of his hate
 I shall pursue, I hope, a loathèd fate. Exit
 PHYSICIAN
 Am I rejected, all my baits nibbled off,
 And not the fish caught? I'll trouble the whole stream
 And choke it in the mud; since hooks not take, 35 I'll throw in nets that shall or kill or break.
Enter Trimtram with rosemary
 This is the bridegroom's man.—Hark, sir, a word.
 TRIMTRAM
 'Tis a busy day, sir, nor I need no physic.
 You see I scour about my business.
 PHYSICIAN Pray you a word, sir. 40
 Your master is to be married today?
 TRIMTRAM Else all this rosemary's lost.
 PHYSICIAN I would speak with your master, sir.
 TRIMTRAM My master, sir, is to be married this morning, and cannot be within while soon at night. 45
 PHYSICIAN
 If you will do your master the best service
 That e'er you did him; if he shall not curse
 Your negligence hereafter, slacking it;
 If he shall bless me for the dearest friend
 That ever his acquaintance met withal: 50
 Let me speak with him ere he go to church.
 TRIMTRAM A right physician, you would have none go to the church nor churchyard till you send them thither!
 Well, if death do not spare you yourselves, he deals hardly with you, for you are better benefactors and 55 send more to him than all diseases besides.
 CHOUGH (within) What, Trimtram, Trimtram!
 TRIMTRAM I come, sir! Hark you, you may hear him. He's upon the spur and would fain mount the saddle of matrimony, but if I can I'll persuade him to come to 60 you.
 PHYSICIAN
 Pray you do, sir. Exit Trimtram
 I'll teach all peevish niceness
 To beware the strong advantage of revenge.
Enter Chough
 CHOUGH
 Who's that would speak with me?

235 lanceprisados lance-corporals, low-grade non-commissioned officers
 5.1.1-392 attributed to Rowley
 2 ling'ring executioner to death one who aggravates the death sentence by dragging it out
 6 but to kill but in the process kill
 9 candy o'er sweeten

 28 public penance typically, standing in a sheet in a public place as a sign of repentance and shame
 36.1 rosemary symbol of wedding

 62 peevish niceness obstinate coyness
 63 advantage superior position

- PHYSICIAN None but a friend, sir:
65 I would speak with you.
CHOUGH Why sir, and I dare speak with any man under the universe. Can you roar, sir?
PHYSICIAN No, i'faith, sir.
I come to tell you mildly for your good,
70 If you please to hear me. You are upon marriage?
CHOUGH
No, sir, I am towards it, but not upon it yet.
PHYSICIAN Do you know what you do?
CHOUGH Yes sir, I have practised what to do before now, I would be ashamed to be married else. I have seen a 75 bronsterops in my time, and a hippocrene, and a tweak, too.
PHYSICIAN
Take fair heed, sir. The wife that you would marry
Is not fit for you.
CHOUGH Why, sir, have you tried her?
PHYSICIAN
80 Not I, believe it, sir, but believe withal
She has been tried.
CHOUGH
Why, sir, is she a fructifer? or a fucus?
PHYSICIAN
All that I speak, sir, is in love to you.
Your bride that may be has not that portion 85 That a bride should have.
CHOUGH
Why sir, she has a thousand and a better penny.
PHYSICIAN
I do not speak of rubbish, dross, and ore,
But the refinèd metal, honour, sir.
CHOUGH What she wants in honour shall be made up in 90 worship, sir. Money will purchase both.
PHYSICIAN
To be plain with you, she's naught.
Physician draws his sword CHOUGH If thou canst not roar thou'rt a dead man. My bride naught?
PHYSICIAN
95 Sir, I do not fear you that way. What I speak
My life shall maintain. I say she's naught.
CHOUGH Dost thou not fear me?
PHYSICIAN Indeed I do not, sir.
CHOUGH I'll never draw upon thee while I live for that trick. Put up and speak freely.
- PHYSICIAN [sheathing his sword]
Your intended bride is a whore, that's freely, sir. 100 CHOUGH Yes, faith, a whore's free enough, an she hath a conscience. Is she a whore? Foot, I warrant she has the pox then.
PHYSICIAN
Worse, the plague; 'tis more incurable.
CHOUGH A plaguy whore? A pox on her, I'll none of her. 105
PHYSICIAN
Mine accusation shall have firm evidence.
I will produce an unavoided witness,
A bastard of her bearing.
CHOUGH A bastard? 'Snails, there's great suspicion she's a whore then. I'll wrestle a fall with her father for putting 110 this trick upon me, as I am a gentleman.
PHYSICIAN
Good sir, mistake me not. I do not speak
To break the contract of united hearts.
I will not pull that curse upon my head,
To separate the husband and the wife. 115
But this in love I thought fit to reveal,
As the due office betwixt man and man,
That you might not be ignorant of your ills.
Consider now of my premonishment
As yourself shall please. 120
CHOUGH I'll burn all the rosemary to sweeten the house, for in my conscience 'tis infected. Has she drunk bastard?
If she would piss me wine vinegar now nine times a day I'd never have her, and I thank you too.
Enter Trimtram
TRIMTRAM Come, will you come away, sir? They have all 125 rosemary and stay for you to lead the way.
CHOUGH I'll not be married today, Trimtram. Hast e'er an almanac about thee? This is the nineteenth of August, look what day of the month 'tis.
[Trimtram] looks in an almanac
TRIMTRAM 'Tis twenty-nine indeed, sir. 130
CHOUGH What's the word? What says Bretnor?
TRIMTRAM The word is, sir, 'There's a hole in her coat.'
CHOUGH I thought so. The physician agrees with him. I'll not marry today.
TRIMTRAM I pray you, sir, there will be charges for new 135
rosemary else. This will be withered by tomorrow.
CHOUGH Make a bonfire on't to sweeten Rosemary Lane.
Prithee, Trim, entreat my father-in-law that might have been to come and speak with me.

Bretnor Thomas Bretnor, author of a series of almanacs. See Owl for a satirical example.

137 Rosemary Lane now Royal Mint Street, running from the Minorities to Leman Street. Occupied by old clothes shops, it was an abode of whores and thieves.

140 TRIMTRAM The bride cries already, and looks t'other way.
 An you be so backward, too, we shall have a fine
 arseward wedding on't. Exit
 CHOUGH You'll stand to your words, sir?
 PHYSICIAN I'll not fly the house, sir.

145 When you have need, call me to evidence. Exit
 CHOUGH If you'll prove she has borne a bastard, I'll stand to't she's a whore.
Enter Russell and Trimtram

RUSSELL
 Why, how now, son, what causeth these delays?
 All stay for your leading.

CHOUGH
 Came I from the Mount to be confronted?

150 RUSSELL How's that, sir?
 CHOUGH Canst thou roar, old man?
 RUSSELL Roar? How mean you, sir?
 CHOUGH Why then, I'll tell thee plainly: thy daughter is a bronsterops.

155 RUSSELL A bronsterop? What's that, sir?
 TRIMTRAM
 Sir, if she be so she is a hippocrene.
 CHOUGH Nay worse, she is a fructifer.
 TRIMTRAM Nay then, she is a fucus, a minotaur, and a tweak.

160 RUSSELL
 Pray you, speak to my understanding, sir.
 CHOUGH If thou wilt have it in plain terms, she is a callicut and a panagron.
 TRIMTRAM
 Nay then, she is a duplar and a sindicus.

165 RUSSELL Good sir, speak English to me.
 CHOUGH All this is Cornish to thee. I say thy daughter has drunk bastard in her time.

RUSSELL
 Bastard! You do not mean to make her a whore?
 CHOUGH Yes, but I do. If she make a fool of me, I'll ne'er make her my wife till she have her maidenhead again.

170 RUSSELL
 A whore? I do defy this calumny.
 CHOUGH Dost thou? I defy thee then.

TRIMTRAM Do you, sir? Then I defy thee too. Fight with us both at once in this quarrel if thou darest.
 CHOUGH I could have had a whore at Plymouth. 175
 TRIMTRAM Ay, or at Penryn.
 CHOUGH Ay, or under the Mount.
 TRIMTRAM Or as you came, at Yeovil.
 CHOUGH Or at Hockey Hole in Somersetshire.
 TRIMTRAM Or at the hanging stones in Wiltshire. 180
 CHOUGH Or at Maidenhead in Berkshire. And did I come in by Maidenhead to go out by Staines? O, that man, woman, or child would wrestle with me for a pound of patience!

RUSSELL
 Some thief has put in poison at your ears 185
 To steal the good name of my child from me.
 Or if it be a malice of your own,
 Be sure I will enforce a proof from you.
 CHOUGH He's a goose and a woodcock that says I will not prove any word that I speak. 190
 TRIMTRAM Ay, either goose or woodcock; he shall, sir, with any man.
 CHOUGH [calls] Phy-si-ci-an, mauz avez Physician.
 RUSSELL Is he the author?
 [Enter Physician]

PHYSICIAN
 Sir, with much sorrow for your sorrow's sake 195
 I must deliver this most certain truth:
 Your daughter is an honour-stainèd bride,
 Indeed she is the mother to a child
 Before the lawful wife unto a husband.
 CHOUGH Law, that's worse than I told thee. I said she had 200 borne a bastard, and he says she was the mother on't, too.

RUSSELL
 I'm yet an infidel against all this,
 And will believe the sun is made of brass,
 The stars of amber— 205
 CHOUGH And the moon of a Holland cheese—
 RUSSELL
 Rather than this impossibility.
 O, here she comes.

141-2 backward . . . arseward wedding

(a) If Chough turns his back, as Jane has done, they will be 'arseward' to each other. (b) Chough's unwillingness to go forward with the wedding may suggest he is instead interested in anal intercourse.

149 All stay for your leading Everyone is waiting for you to lead the way.

150 confronted forced to face a hostile situation. Chough, however, seems to mean affronted, insulted.

156 bronsterop Russell does not quite catch the word the first time.

168-70 make her a whore . . . make a fool of me . . . make her my wife Russell means that Chough does not intend to call her a whore, but Chough understands the phrase as make her into a whore, and continues this sense of make in the succeeding phrases.

171 calumny a damaging false charge, slander

175 Plymouth on the south coast of England in Devon, east of Cornwall

176 Penryn in Cornwall at the head of a branch of Falmouth harbour

177 under the Mount near St Michael's Mount

178 Yeovil in Somerset (with pun on evil)

179 Hockey Hole in Somersetshire Wookey Hole, near Wells, was on Chough's route to London; there were two places called Hockley in the Hole, one in London, the other in Bedfordshire.

180 hanging stones in Wiltshire Stonehenge

181 Maidenhead in Berkshire Maidenhead is at the east end of Berkshire, near London.

182 in by Maidenhead to go out by Staines Staines is a town in Middlesex, 17 miles west of London; the sequence punningly suggests defloration.

188 enforce a proof force you to prove

189 goose and a woodcock Both birds were symbols of foolishness.

193 mauz avez Usually glossed as Rowley's attempts at Cornish, the phrase also suggests the French mauvez, wicked.

201 on't of it

203 infidel unbeliever

Act 5 Scene 1

A Fayre Quarrell.

Enter Jane and Anne

210 Nay, come, daughter, stand at the bar of shame.
 Either now quit thyself or kill me ever.
 Your marriage day is spoiled if all be true.
 JANE
 A happy misery. Who's my accuser?
 PHYSICIAN
 I am, that knows it true I speak.
 CHOUGH Yes, and I'm his witness.
 215 TRIMTRAM And I.
 CHOUGH And I again.
 TRIMTRAM
 And I again, too. There's four, that's enough I hope.
 RUSSELL
 How can you witness, sir, that nothing know
 But what you have received from his report?
 220 CHOUGH Must we not believe our physicians? Pray you, think I know as much as every fool does.
 TRIMTRAM
 Let me be Trimtram. I pray you too, sir.
 JANE
 Sir, if this bad man have laid a blemish
 On my white name, he is a most false one,
 225 Defaming me for the just denial
 Of his foul lust. [To Physician] Nay, now you shall be known, sir.
 ANNE
 Sir, I'm his sister and do better know him
 Than all of you. Give not too much belief
 To his wild words. He's oftentimes mad, sir.
 PHYSICIAN
 I thank you, good sister.
 230 ANNE Are you not mad
 To do this office? Fie upon your malice!
 PHYSICIAN
 I'll presently produce both nurse and child,
 Whose very eyes shall call her mother before it speaks.
 CHOUGH Ha, ha, ha, ha! By my troth, I'd spend a shilling
 235 on that condition to hear that. I think in my conscience
 I shall take the physician in a lie. If the child call her mother before it can speak I'll never wrestle while I live again.
 TRIMTRAM It must be a she child if it do, sir, and those 240 speak the soonest of any living creatures, they say.
 CHOUGH Bow wow, a dog will bark a month sooner, he's a very puppy else.

RUSSELL [aside to Jane]
 Come, tell truth 'twixt ourselves, here's none but friends.
 One spot a father's love will soon wipe off.
 The truth, and then try my love abundant. 245
 I'll cover it with all the care I have
 And yet, perhaps, make up a marriage day.
 JANE
 Then it's true, sir, I have a child.
 RUSSELL Hast thou?
 Well, wipe thine eyes, I'm a grandfather then.
 If all bastards were banished, the City would be thin 250
 In the thickest term-time. Well, now, let me alone,
 I'll try my wits for thee. Richard, Francis, Andrew!
 None of my knaves within?
 Enter his Servant
 SERVANT
 Here's one of 'em. Sir, the guests come in apace.
 RUSSELL
 Do they, Dick? Let 'em have wine and sugar, 255
 We'll be for 'em presently. But hark, Dick.
 [He whispers]
 CHOUGH I long to hear this child speak, i'faith, Trim. I would this foolish physician would come once.
 TRIMTRAM If it calls her mother, I hope it shall never call you father. 260
 CHOUGH No, and it do I'll whip it, i'faith, and give thee leave to whip me.
 RUSSELL Run on thy best legs, Dick.
 SERVANT I'll be here in a twinkling, sir. Exit
 Enter Physician, Nurse, with the Child
 PHYSICIAN
 Now gentlemen, believe your eyes if not my tongue. 265
 [To Jane] Do not you call this your child?
 CHOUGH Phew, that's not the point. You promised us the child should call her mother. If it does this month, I'll ne'er go to the roaring school again.
 RUSSELL Whose child is this, Nurse? 270
 NURSE
 Dis gentleman's, so he to me reden.
 She points to the Physician
 CHOUGH 'Snails, she's the physician's bronsterops, Trim.
 TRIMTRAM His fucus, his very tweak, i'faith.
 CHOUGH A glister in his teeth, let him take her, with a 275 purgation to him.
 RUSSELL
 'Tis as your sister said: you are stark mad, sir,
 This much confirms it. You have defamed

209 bar as in a court
 210 quit thyself clear thyself of the charge
 222 Let me be Trimtram Let me be known as Trimtram, rather than as a fool like Chough.
 224 white pure
 233 call her mother identify her as its mother
 251 term-time when the law courts were in session and many people came to London let me alone give me a chance 253 knaves servants

 254 apace swiftly
 256 for 'em with them, ready for them
 271 me reden told me, from Middle Dutch reden, redenen, to reason or speak. Based on the Physician's statement that the baby is his 'heart's joy' (3.2.2), the Nurse believes he is the child's father.

 272 'Snails exclamation, God's nails
 274 glister enema
 277-80 defamed...bastard Russell threatens the physician with legal action in an ecclesiastical court for defamation, as well as with the civil punishment he will receive for fornication and the fine for support of his child.

Mine honest daughter. I'll have you punished for't,
 Besides the civil penance of your sin
 And keeping of your bastard.

280 PHYSICIAN This is fine.
 All your wit and wealth must not thus carry it.

RUSSELL Sir Chough, a word with you.
 CHOUGH I'll not have her, i'faith, sir. If Trimtram will have her, an he will, let him.

285 TRIMTRAM Who, I, sir? I scorn it. If you'll have her, I'll have her too; I'll do as you do, and no otherwise.

RUSSELL
 I do not mean't so either. This only, sir:
 That whatsoe'er you've seen, you would be silent.
 Hinder not my child of another husband

290 CHOUGH Though you forsake her.
 CHOUGH I'll not speak a word, i'faith.

RUSSELL As you are a gentleman.
 CHOUGH
 By these basket-hilts, as I am a youth,
 A gentleman, a roarer.

295 RUSSELL Charm your man, I beseech you, too.
 CHOUGH I warrant you, sir, he shall do nothing but what I do before him.
Enter Servant with Fitzallen

RUSSELL
 I shall most dearly thank you. O, are you come?
 Welcome, son-in-law. This was beyond your hope.

300 We old men have pretty conceits sometimes:
 Your wedding day's prepared, and this is it.
 How think you of it?

FITZALLEN As of the joyfullest
 That ever welcomed me. You show yourself now
 A pattern to all kind fathers. My sweetest Jane!

RUSSELL
 Your captivity I meant but as sauce
 Unto your wedding dinner. Now, I'm sure,
 'Tis far more welcome in this short restraint
 Than had it freely come.

FITZALLEN A thousandfold.

JANE I like this well.

310 CHOUGH [aside to Trimtram] I have not the heart to see this gentleman gulled so. I will reveal, I make it mine own case. 'Tis a foul case.

TRIMTRAM Remember you have sworn by your hilts.

CHOUGH I'll break my hilts rather than conceal. I have a trick. Do thou follow me. I will reveal it and yet not speak it neither. 315

TRIMTRAM 'Tis my duty to follow you, sir.
 CHOUGH (sings)
 Take heed in time, O man, unto thy head.

TRIMTRAM (sings)
 All is not gold that glistereth in bed.

RUSSELL Why, sir? Why, sir? 320

CHOUGH [sings]
 Look to't, I say, thy bride's a bronsterops.

TRIMTRAM [sings]
 And knows the thing that men wear in their slops.

FITZALLEN How's this, sir?
 CHOUGH [sings]
 A hippocrene, a tweak, for and a fucus.

TRIMTRAM [sings]
 Let not fond love with foretops so rebuke us. 325

RUSSELL Good sir!
 CHOUGH [sings]
 Behold a baby of this maid's begetting.

TRIMTRAM [sings]
 A deed of darkness after the sun-setting.

RUSSELL Your oath, sir!
 CHOUGH [sings]
 I swear and sing, thy bride has taken physic. 330

TRIMTRAM [sings]
 This was the doctor cured her of that pththisic.

CHOUGH [sings]
 If you'll believe me I will say no more.

TRIMTRAM [sings]
 Thy bride's a tweak, as we do say that roar.

CHOUGH
 Bear witness, gentlemen, I have not spoke a word:
 My hilts are whole still. 335

FITZALLEN
 This is a sweet epithalamium
 Unto the marriage bed, a musical Harmonious lo! Sir, you've wronged me,
 And basely wronged me. Was this your cunning fetch,
 To fetch me out of prison, forever 340

To marry me unto a strumpet?

RUSSELL None of those words, good sir.
 'Tis but a fault, and 'tis a sweet one, too.

283-4 will have her, an he will if he will have her
 293 basket-hilts hilts provided with a metal defence for the swordsman's hand
 300 pretty conceits clever fancies, tricks
 311 gulled fooled
 311-12 I make it mine own case I imagine this were happening to me.
 312 foul case (a) dirty situation; (b) impure vagina; (c) taken from the wrong case of printer's type

 318 unto thy head lest thou have horns on thy head, i.e. be a cuckold
 319 All is not gold that glistereth proverbial, Tilley A146 322 knows is sexually familiar with slops wide baggy breeches or hose
 324 for and apparently added for the rhythm 325 foretops the top of the head, here suggesting horns and cuckoldry

 330 taken physic received medicine, especially purges; here with ironic reference to the birth of the baby
 331 pththisic wasting disease of the lungs
 336 epithalamium wedding song
 338 lo! a Greek and Latin exclamation of joy, frequent in epithalamia 339-40 fetch...fetch (a) contrivance, trick; (b) bring

- Come, sir, your means is short: lengthen your fortunes
 345 With a fair proffer. I'll put a thousand pieces
 Into the scale to help her to weigh it up
 Above the first dowry.
 FITZALLEN Ha? You say well.
 Shame may be bought out at a dear rate.
 A thousand pieces added to her dowry?
 RUSSELL
 350 There's five hundred of 'em to make the bargain.
 [He gives Fitzallen money]
 I have worthy guests coming and would not delude
 'em.
 Say, speak like a son to me.
 [Jane and Fitzallen kneel]
 FITZALLEN Your blessing, sir,
 We are both yours. Witness, gentlemen,
 These must be made up a thousand pieces,
 355 Added to a first thousand for her dowry,
 To father that child.
 PHYSICIAN O, is it out now?
 CHOUGH
 For t'other thousand I'll do't myself yet.
 TRIMTRAM Or I, if my master will.
 FITZALLEN [rising with Jane]
 The bargain's made, sir. I have the tender 360 And possession both, and will keep my purchase.
 CHOUGH Take her e'en to you with all her movables, I'll wear my bachelor's buttons still.
 TRIMTRAM So will I, i'faith; they are the best flowers in any man's garden, next to heartsease.
 FITZALLEN [taking the child]
 365 This is as welcome as the other, sir,
 And both as the best bliss that e'er on earth
 I shall enjoy. Sir, this is mine own child,
 You could not have found out a fitter father;
 Nor is it basely bred, as you imagine,
 370 For we were wedded by the hand of heaven
 Ere this work was begun.
 CHOUGH At Pancridge, I'll lay my life on't.
 TRIMTRAM I'll lay my life on't too, 'twas there.
 FITZALLEN
 Somewhere it was, sir.
- RUSSELL Was't so i'faith, son?
 JANE
 And that I must have revealed to you, sir,
 375 Ere I had gone to church with this fair groom.
 [Pointing to the Physician] But thank this gentleman,
 he prevented me.
 I am much bound unto your malice, sir.
 PHYSICIAN
 I am ashamed.
 JANE Shame to amendment then.
 RUSSELL
 Now get you together for a couple of cunning ones. 380
 But son, a word. The latter thousand pieces
 Is now more than bargain.
 FITZALLEN No, by my faith, sir.
 Here's witness enough on't, 'must serve to pay my fees.
 Imprisonment is costly.
 CHOUGH By my troth, the old man has gulled himself finely. 385
 Well, sir, I'll bid myself a guest, though not a groom.
 I'll dine and dance and roar at the wedding for all this.
 TRIMTRAM So will I, sir, if my master does.
 RUSSELL
 Well sir, you are welcome. But now, no more words
 on't
 Till we be set at dinner, for there will mirth 390
 Be the most useful for digestion.
 See, my best guests are coming.
 Enter Captain Ager, Surgeon, Lady Ager, the Colonel's Sister, Captain Ager's two Friends
 CAPTAIN Recovered, sayst thou?
 SURGEON May I be excluded quite out of Surgeon's Hall else.
 395 Marry, I must tell you the wound was fain to be twice corroded, 'twas a plain gastrolophe, and a deep one, but I closed the lips on't with bandages and sutures, which is a kind conjunction of the parts separated against the course of nature.
 CAPTAIN Well, sir, he is well. 400
 SURGEON I feared him, I assure you, Captain. Before the suture in the belly it grew almost to a convulsion, and there was like to be a bloody issue from the hollow vessels of the kidneys.

344 means is short resources are slender

345 proffer offer

346-7 Into the scale...dowry He will put an extra thousand pieces into one side of the scale to make Jane heavier, with implied contrast to light, i.e. sexually promiscuous.

348 dear expensive

354 made up a thousand pieces brought up to a thousand pieces

359 tender formal offer, usually of money

360 possession (a) monetary ownership;

(b) sexual knowledge of purchase that which is obtained, winnings

361 movables personal property

362-4 bachelor's buttons...heartsease flowers, usually buttercups and pansies, with secondary meanings based on the names

365 the other Jane, but it could also mean the money

370 wedded by the hand of heaven in a private contract of marriage; see note to I.I.191-3

372 Pancridge St Pancras, a large parish in London. St Pancras church was often used for hasty and irregular marriages.

377 he prevented me His actions anticipated mine.

382 more than bargain more than was agreed

383-4 fees...costly Prisoners had to pay their own upkeep.

393-448 attributed to Middleton

394 Surgeon's Hall Barber-Surgeon's Hall in Monkswell Street else otherwise

395-6 twice corroded worn away

396 gastrolophe Lowe mentions a suture used in the belly, called gastroraphie; the term is applied here to the wound itself.

401 feared him feared for him

403 issue discharge

A Fayre Quarrell.

405 CAPTAIN (giving him money)
 There's that to thank thy news and thy art together.
 SURGEON And if your worship at any time stand in need of incision, if it be your fortune to light into my hands,
 I'll give you the best. [Exit]

CAPTAIN
 Uncle, the noble Colonel's recovered.
 410 RUSSELL Recovered!
 Then honour is not dead in all parts, coz.
Enter the Colonel with his two Friends
 CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND Behold him yonder, sir.
 CAPTAIN [aside]
 My much unworthiness is now found out.
 Thou'st not a face to fit it.
 415 COLONEL'S FIRST FRIEND Sir, yonder's Captain Ager.
 COLONEL
 O lieutenant, the wrong I have done his fame
 Puts me to silence. Shame so confounds me
 That I dare not see him.
 CAPTAIN
 I never knew how poor my deserts were 420 Till he appeared. No way to give requital?
 [He gives Captain's First Friend the will]
 Here, shame me lastingly, do't with his own.
 Return this to him, tell him I have riches
 In that abundance in his sister's love
 These come but to oppress me and confound
 425 All my deservings everlastingly.
 I never shall requite my wealth in her, say.

How soon from virtue and an honoured spirit
 May man receive what he may never merit!
 [Captain's First Friend takes will to the Colone!]
 COLONEL
 This comes most happily to express me better,
 For since this will was made there fell to me
 The manor of Fitzdale; give him that too.
 430 [He writes on the will]
 He's like to have charge, there's fair hope
 Of my sister's fruitfulness. For me,
 I never mean to change my mistress,
 And war is able to maintain her servant. 435
 CAPTAIN'S FIRST FRIEND [returning will to Ager]
 Read there, a fair increase, sir, by my faith!
 He hath sent it back, sir, with new additions.
 CAPTAIN
 How miserable he makes me. This enforces me
 To break through all the passages of shame
 And headlong fall—
 COLONEL Into my arms, dear worthy! 440
 [They embrace]
 CAPTAIN You have a goodness
 Has put me past my answers. You may speak
 What you please now, I must be silent ever.
 COLONEL
 This day has shown me joy's unvalued treasure.
 I would not change this brotherhood with a monarch, 445
 Into which blessed alliance sacred heaven
 Has placed my kinsman and given him his ends.
 Fair be that quarrel makes such happy friends.
Exeunt omnes

THE TRIUMPHS OF HONOUR AND INDUSTRY

Text edited by David M. Bergeron, annotated and introduced by Kate D. Levin

LOOKING below us onto the street we saw a huge mass of people, surging like the sea, moving here and there in search of places to watch or rest—which proved impossible because of the constant press of newcomers. It was a chaotic mixture: dotards; insolent youths and children, especially of that race of apprentices I mentioned earlier; beribboned serving wenches; lower class women with their children in their arms: all were there to see the beautiful show. We saw few carriages about, and fewer horsemen . . . because the insolence of the crowd is extreme.

The report of Orazio Busino, chaplain to the Venetian Ambassador, provides vivid descriptions of the audiences for the pageant celebrating the installation of George Bolles, Grocer, as London's Lord Mayor on 29 October 1617. In addition to the crowds roiling through the streets and hanging out of windows, Busino talks about the spectators who are paying for the show, the guildmembers whose authority and influence make the city 'more like a republic of merchants than anything else'. The day's spectacle had to entertain 'the crowd' and affirm 'the republic'; Thomas Middleton's The Triumphs of Honour and Industry, printed in a single edition of 500 copies by Nicholas Okes, is a canny effort to do both. It takes a distinct position in the debate about the form and purpose of such entertainments, a debate that erupted periodically in the texts of civic pageants and court masques throughout the Stuart era.

The basic conflict was over the question of audience: who were these performances for? What were spectators likely to understand? What was the relationship between the audiences for court and city entertainments—and between the entertainments themselves? The honour of 'ordering, overseeing and writing' the 1617 pageant was a lucrative one. The pageant cost £882, of which Middleton received £282 to cover his own fee as well as the salaries of a range of actors and artisans. Anthony Munday got a generous consolation prize of £5 for 'his pains in drawing a project for this business'. The other contestant was Middleton's frequent collaborator Thomas Dekker, who was paid £4 'for the like'. The competition between these writers was more than a commercial one; they represent very different artistic approaches to the questions outlined above.

Middleton and Dekker are on one side of the convoluted debate about the audience—and by extension, the aesthetic value—of civic entertainments. Dekker, in his text of the 1612 pageant Troia-Nova Triumphans, defines two kinds of spectators and validates the different abilities of both groups to respond: 'Princes' behold triumphs 'with delight; common people with admiration'. Honour and Industry shares this encompassing view of its audience. The elaborate iconography invites aristocratic 'delight', while the breezy, ebullient narrative encourages and welcomes popular 'admiration'.

Ben Jonson represents a very different point of view. Although he removed himself from the milieu of civic pageantry by cultivating the position of house dramatist to James I, a position cemented in 1616 with a royal pension, Jonson always seemed to be looking over his shoulder for potential gatecrashers. In a masque text from 1609, Jonson describes his clientele as having 'enquiring eyes' and 'quick ears'; a world of difference from 'those sluggish ones of porters, and mechanics, that must be bored through, at every act, with narrations'. Although Jonson would have been appalled by the comparison, Anthony Munday was in many ways his counterpart in the world of 'porters and mechanics'. Skewered by Jonson in The Case is Altered (c.1600) as Antonio Balladino, the 'pageant poet' specializing in stale conceits, Munday was nonetheless as ubiquitous in serving the livery companies as Jonson was in writing for the court. Between 1602 and 1616, Munday was chosen to compose or help produce at least nine Lord Mayor's pageants (to Middleton's one).

The dramaturgy and written description of a Munday pageant is consistent over the years. He creates a succession of 'inventions', from which one figure emerges as a kind of narrator or presenter. At some point toward the end of the pageant this figure explains to the Lord Mayor and his entourage the iconography of all the devices they have seen—the 'narration' that so disgusted Jonson. Munday's pamphlets similarly segregate performance and explication. He describes all the inventions in the first part of each text, giving lengthy and painstakingly learned derivations for his themes. The speeches are listed in the second part of each pamphlet. Munday's tone is monochromatically earnest, and his texts teem with scholarly justifications and marginal glosses, as if aspiring to the solidity and profundity of a Jonsonian entertainment. That aspiration is explicit at the close of Metropolis-coronata (1615), when Munday describes the final procession 'as if it had been a royal masque, prepared for the marriage of an immortal deity, as in the like nature we hold the Lord Mayor, to be this day solemnly married to London's supreme dignity, by representing the awful authority of sovereign majesty'.

Where Munday in the texts of his city entertainments strives to emulate a 'higher' tone associated with the court, Middleton in The Triumphs of Honour and Industry works to frame a mode of civic rhetoric that is neither craven nor pedantic. Unlike Munday, Middleton's prose commandeers attention through its integration of narration and performance. Readers are told to look, listen, imagine, by a narrator who often seems distracted in his eagerness to show us the best bits. "The first invention", the Indians 'at work in an island of growing spices', is typographically announced with its own heading. Its successor, however, simply rolls into view in the following paragraph. This chariot features India, 'the seat of merchandise', and several emblematic companions. Middleton starts to sketch out the significance of the device but interrupts himself, telling us, 'if you give attention to Industry that now sets forward to speak, it will be yours more exactly'.

Industry finishes her encomium to the virtues and rewards of hard work by introducing the next device, the 'Pageant of Nations', but the narrator again intervenes, backtracking to give us a more detailed description of the props and costumes of the mercantile values peopling the chariot, 'that you may take the better note of their adornments': India's wedge of gold, Perfection's crown, and so forth. Only then are we reminded of Industry's closing lines, as 'the Pageant of Several Nations, which is purposely planted near the sound of the words, moves with a kind of affectionate joy' into the procession. Eventually, all but panting, the narrator confesses, 'I arrive now at that part of triumph which my desire ever hastened to come to, this Castle of Fame or Honour, which Industry brings her sons unto in their reverend ages.' Here, the narrator does not merely describe the emblematic participants, he takes us by the hand and points: 'If you look upon Truth first, you shall find her properly expressed'.

Throughout, the narrator is wry, hard-working, supremely confident of his own worth, and, by implication, the worth of the occasion and the honorand. This persona holds right up to the pamphlet's final lines. Honour's last speech is set down, the artisans responsible for the devices are thanked, and we are told, 'The season cuts me off; and after this day's trouble, I am as willing to take my rest.'

The various 'inventions' are composed with an eye toward their effect in performance, and can be 'admired' by audience members not stationed near enough to hear the words. The Island of Spices needs only to be seen; Busino admired the 'grace and many varied gestures' that marked the children's dancing. The speeches themselves are relatively brief and provide ample opportunity for expository pantomime: Industry gesturing with her prop, a large, golden, Cupid-topped sphere; Justice reprimanding Reward in front of an open seat in the Castle of Honour. Middleton has not just written a lecture on the ethics of high government office or a guided tour of the pageant's iconography; dramatic action, however rudimentary, is embedded in the material.

One 'invention', the Pageant of Nations, constitutes an act of genuine theatrical daring. According to Industry, the pageant represents 'several nations where commerce abounds', producing 'a stream of amity and peace'. London's interest in—and profound ambivalence toward—cultural exotics would most likely have rendered these appropriately costumed foreigners far more 'readable' to the crowd than the 'six celestial figures' accompanying them on the pageant wagon. Busino's eyewitness account of Honour and Industry suggests the emblematic significance of national dress for xenophobic Londoners:

Foreigners in London are little liked, not to say hated, so those who are wise take care to dress in the English style or that of France, which has been adopted by the court, and make themselves understood by signs whenever they can avoid speaking, and so they avoid mishaps. Only the Spanish nation choose the prerogative of dressing in their own fashion, and are therefore easily recognized and mortally hated.

The Venetian goes on to report a brawl along the pageant route in which the crowd, incited by a woman wielding a bunch of greens, mobbed a gentleman believed to be connected with the Spanish embassy.

Spain and France, twin objects of England's secret admiration and obsessive fears, come in for special treatment in Honour and Industry. Hysterical talk of imminent invasion—by Catholicism, by a second armada—boomed alongside trade with both countries. Rumours proliferated identifying members of James's inner circle as spies in the pay of the Spanish Ambassador, Gondomar; at the same time, the English appetite for Spanish imports like sugar and wine burgeoned. A pamphlet from 1615 bemoans the 'pretty mystery' of trade with Spain: 'though the gain scarce provideth for the merchants' livelihood, yet the commodities make the land merry'. France, with its Catholic seminaries swallowing up recusant English youth, was a constant object of English paranoia. For several years now the English had followed with fascination and horror a series of embassies between James I and the royal families of France and Spain to negotiate for the marriage of Prince Charles to an (unavoidably) Catholic princess of either house. In the weeks leading up to the performance of Honour and Industry, court circles were abuzz with news of the latest exploded conspiracy: a Milanese Jesuit had claimed that powerful French and Spanish factions were plotting to kidnap His Majesty and Prince Charles, incite a Catholic uprising, invade England, and present the conquered kingdom as a dowry for the marriage of the second Princess of Spain to the Duke of Orleans.

Middleton, as a playwright, must have been acutely aware of the range of possible audience responses to his featured players in the Pageant of Nations. His Spaniard and Frenchman, dressed to the life, are 'not content with a silent joy, like the rest of the nations'; rather, they 'have a thirst to utter their gladness'. The pageant text records (and translates) their speeches of congratulations and well-wishing: flattering to the Grocers, unimpeachably bland to court auditors, riotous—in performance—to the crowd. Busino confirms Middleton’s theatrical acumen, reporting that the Spaniard ‘kept kissing his hands, right and left, but especially to the Spanish Ambassador, who was a short distance from us, in such a wise as to elicit roars of laughter from the multitude’.

Presumably this invention was part of the proposal that won Middleton the pageant-writing job. On paper, it must have appealed to the Grocers in their capacity as traders working to encourage and even protect commerce with ‘strangers’. The implication that London’s merchants warranted diplomatic greetings independent from those delivered to the King would also have been gratifying. New links between court and City were being forged by the success of London’s overseas trading ventures. Several important noblemen were admitted to the freedom of the East India Company in 1614; in 1617 the opportunity to invest in the Company’s Second Joint-Stock produced something of a stampede on the part of astute courtiers. And yet The Triumphs of Honour and Industry does not try to assert the City’s status by adopting an élite or exclusive stance. Instead, the pageant is an effort to negotiate a distinct civic voice and dramaturgical method through which to address its several audiences: the merchants, the multitude, and the monarchy.

The Triumphs of Honour and Industry

A solemnity performed through the City at confirmation and establishment of the right honourable George Bolles in the office of His Majesty’s lieutenant, the Lord Mayor of the famous City of London.

Taking beginning at his lordship’s going, and proceeding after his return from receiving the oath of mayoralty at Westminster on the morrow next after Simon and Jude’s day, October 29, 1617.

The commentary for The Triumphs of Honour and Industry and for the eyewitness account of it that follows are efforts to detail the economics of civic pageantry, and to suggest the matrix of commercial, social and political forces that shaped this form of theatre.

Currencies. The relationship of different denominations of currency during this period is straightforward: 12 pennies or pence (12*d.*) equalled one shilling (1*s.*), and 20 shillings (20*s.*) made up £1. A mark was worth two-thirds of £1 (or 1*3s.* and 4*d.*—or 160*d.*).

Values. The sums quoted below cannot be interpreted by means of a formula converting Jacobean currency into present-day values; such mathematics would give no sense of the vast differences in commodities and culture. A brief listing of prices and incomes should, however, help the reader evaluate the costs associated with Lord Mayor’s shows. Between 1610 and 1620, a successful skilled worker in the construction trades (a journeyman mason or carpenter) might earn £18–20 a year. The Bishop of London’s revenues totalled £1400 in 1604; a decade later the vicar of St Lawrence Jewry and similarly placed parish rectors could earn £60 annually. In 1612 the Earl of Salisbury’s landed income was £7,313. Around 1619, a baker’s average expenses included 2*s.* 4*d.* a week to feed each of his children, 10*s.* a week for his own and his wife’s meals, 12*s.* a week for wood, 8*d.* a week for water, and £30 a year for rent. His journeymen received weekly salaries of 2*s.* 6*d.* (£6. 10*s.* a year); his maidservants were paid 10*d.* a week (slightly over £2 annually). In 1607 eggs were 10 for 4*d.*; complaints were registered in 1615 over the high price of butter: 8*d.* a pound. Alehouses were to sell a quart of the strongest beer for 1*d.*; a quart of ‘small’ beer cost halfpenny. The price of a horse ranged from £1 for an ‘old nag’ to £15 for a superior animal. The standard amount of ‘common cloth’ for an adult garment, 4 1/2 yards, cost £4. 1*3s.* 4*d.* in 1617; a pair of shoes cost 2*s.* 8*d.* The baker’s staggering annual expenditure of £20 on clothing for himself, his wife, and two apprentices is thus far from extravagant. Public theatre admission prices ranged from a penny for standing room to 6*d.* for the best accommodations. At a private theatre such as the Blackfriars, 6*d.* was the minimum charge; a box by the stage cost 2*s.* 6*d.*

5 beginning at his lordship’s going Middleton’s text in fact begins after Bolles has returned by water from Westminster, and is travelling through London’s streets. By the time of Honour and Industry, the usual route, after disembarking at Baynard’s Castle, was to St Paul’s Churchyard and from there along Cheapside to Guildhall. Pageant devices were stationed at intervals in the streets or in courtyards, and each one was carried as part of the procession after the Lord Mayor had stopped to watch and hear. After feasting at Guildhall, the Lord Mayor was escorted back to St Paul’s for religious services. The pageant devices were then regrouped for the delivery of one last speech upon his return to his house in the evening.

6 receiving the oath According to Munday’s 1618 continuation of Stow, the new Lord Mayor, accompanied by his predecessor and the Aldermen, arrive at Westminster, whereupon they ‘put on their cloaks within the palace, and go round about . . . making divers courtesies in the Hall, passing up to the Exchequer’ where the actual swearing-in takes place. ‘After the oath taken in the Exchequer, they descend down again, and go first to the King’s Bench, then to the [Court of] Common Pleas, and putting off their cloaks, go about the King’s Tomb in Westminster Abbey’ before returning by barge to the City.

The Epistle Dedicatory

10 To the worthy deseruer of all the costs and triumphs which the noble society of Grocers in bounteous measure bestow on him, the right honourable George Bolles, Lord Mayor

10-11 all the costs... in bounteous measure bestow The scrupulously detailed budget in the account book kept by wardens of the Grocers' Company 'concerning matters of Triumph' for 1617 records a total of £884. 12s. 10d. collected for the pageant, which cost £882. 18s. 11d., leaving a surplus of £1. 13s. 11d. This 'bounteous measure' was tithed from the wealthier members of the Grocers' yeomanry—all those who had obtained the 'freedom' of the Company allowing them to engage in trade (see note to 11-12 below regarding the 'freedom'). The majority of the yeomanry, aside from journeymen who were free of the Company but not independent shopkeepers, were retail grocers. Approximately 140 members of the Company (perhaps 20 per cent of the total membership) were recruited to serve as members of the livery, an elite group from which the guild's executive leadership—its master, wardens, and the 20-25 person Court of Assistants—was chosen. Initial entrance into the livery was usually as a 'bachelor', either in 'budge' (wearing a gown faced with sheepskin on special occasions), or—denoting greater wealth—in 'foynes' (a gown faced with marten fur). Members of the livery were asked to contribute at a higher rate than the yeomanry toward triumphs such as Lord Mayor's pageants. For Honour and Induftry, the 'bachelors in budge' were assessed £4 each; 42 of them contributed £162. 4s. The 'bachelors in foynes' were dunned £6; £393 was raised from 69 members of this group. The sums raised in both of these categories are not evenly divisible by the amounts requested: one bachelor in budge came up with a mere £2. 4s rather than the full £4, and three bachelors in foynes offered £5 instead of the £6 requested. These reduced payments may be evidence of the relatively straitened financial circumstances in which successful merchants occasionally found themselves. But if some members of the livery endured reversals of fortune, others wilfully refused to contribute. In response to this lack of fraternal spirit, the Grocers in 1617 paid £4 to one William Atkins, 'the Lord Mayor's officer, for pains by him taken about such brothers of this Company as were disobedient and refused to pay as they were assessed'. (See note to Busino 28-9 for other refusals to undertake guild and civic responsibilities.) In addition to members of the livery, 53 'special contributors', a category of wealthy yeomen who were not serving as bachelors, made contributions in differing amounts, ranging from £3 to £8, adding up to £258. 2s. 8d. Another 47 yeomen, also not liverymen, made donations from 10s to £2 as 'general contributors', totalling £71. 6s. 2d.

The cost of Lord Mayor's shows is frequently alluded to in pageant texts, usually as a tribute to the power and prosperity of the guilds able to raise such enormous sums from their members. Nonetheless, these huge outlays apparently occasioned some unease, as registered in Thomas Dekker's text for the 1612 show by his paradoxical language asserting that 'a sumptuous thriftiness in these civil ceremonies manag[es] all'. But for Dekker, the political advantages to be won by a 'sumptuous' display justify the expense. Indeed, using language reminiscent of pageant 'devices', he implies that conspicuous consumption is itself an aesthetic category for determining the success of these shows: 'the chairs of magistrates ought to be adorned, and to shine like the chariot which carries the sun... as well to dazzle and amaze the common eye, as to make it learn that there is some excellent and extraordinary arm from heaven thrust down to exalt a superior man, that thereby the gazer may be drawn to more obedience and admiration'.

12 George Bolles (1538-1621) Bolles, with his network of family connections, range of investments, and steady progress through the Grocers' Company ranks, in many respects typifies the active and successful guildsman of his age. His father-in-law, John Harte (d. 1604), had been Lord Mayor (1589-90), a Member of Parliament from London (1592-3, 1597-8), one of the principal founders and a governor of the East India Company, an investor in the Levant and Muscovy Companies, and a Grocer; at least one of Bolles's brothers-in-law and a son-in-law were also members of the Grocers' Company. Bolles subscribed £1,000 jointly with Harte at the East India Company's formation in 1599 and is named in the Company's first charter, issued in 1600. Bolles subsequently adventured £400 in the Company's third voyage (1607) and £550 in the fourth (1608), and was a committee member of the Company in 1602-7 and 1610-11. Other trade-related investments included the Virginia Company (1609), the North-West Passage Company of 1612, and the Muscovy Company (1620). Bolles was not, however, a 'mere merchant'—a term for those who engaged personally and exclusively in foreign enterprise. Instead, he invested capital in joint-stock companies whose officers and employees conducted the actual trading overseas. Nor were Bolles's business interests limited to the grocery trade. The 'freedom of the City', achieved through membership in one of London's guilds, allowed its possessor to undertake any line of commerce and was a prerequisite for holding public office. Bolles's primary occupation appears to have been the domestic grocery trade, perhaps in London, certainly in the provinces, but by the 1590s he was the main supplier of general commodities—including though not limited to foodstuffs—to Hull and King's Lynn. He may have shared this business with his father-in-law, who left Bolles his 'great warehouse' at his death in 1604. Bolles started assuming responsibilities within the Grocers' Company just as his active involvement in trading began to taper off. He was admitted to the Grocers' Court of Assistants in 1598, became a Warden of the Company in 1599, a Master of the Company in 1606, an Alderman of the City in 1607, and served as Sheriff in 1608-9 before becoming Lord Mayor.

Bolles is associated with an anecdote that reflects the often prickly relations between City and Court during these years. Shortly after publication of the Book of Sports in May, 1618, James I, apparently intent on (literally) driving home its message, had his carriages clatter through London's streets on a Sunday during church services. Bolles, exercising his authority as Mayor, commanded that the carriages be stopped. Infuriated, the king is said to have issued an official warrant for his carriages, exclaiming, 'He thought there had been no more kings in England but himself.' Bolles obeyed the warrant, apparently informing the king, 'Whilst it was in my power, I did my duty; but that being taken away by a higher power, it is my duty to obey.' See the epitaph by Middleton, 'On Sir George Bolles' for a character summary emphasizing his civic responsibility and generosity.

Anthony Munday's continuation of Stow's Survey (1618) is dedicated to Bolles, Lord Mayor at its publication, and also to the Recorder of London and 'all the knights and Aldermen' of the City. Munday, himself a member of the Drapers' Company, apparently presented the augmented Survey to all the major guilds. The Skinners', Goldsmiths' and Merchant Taylors' accounts record 'gratuities' (ranging from 11s. to 22s.) to Munday for the volume.

Lord Mayor London's Lord Mayor was chosen annually from among the senior of the famous City of London.

Right Honourable,

15 Out of the slightest labours and employments there may that virtue sometimes arise that may enlighten the best part of man, nor have these kind of triumphs an idle relish, especially if they be artfully accomplished; under 20 such an esteemed slightness may often lurk that fire that may shame the best perfection. For instance, what greater means for the imitation of virtue and nobleness can anywhere present itself with more alacrity to the beholder than the memorable fames of those worthies in the castle, manifested by their escutcheons of arms, the only symbols of honour and antiquity. The honourable seat that is reserved, all men have hope that your justice and goodness will exactly merit, to the honour of which I commend your lordship's virtues, remaining

At your honour's service,

T. M.

The Triumphs of Honour and Industry

It hath been twice my fortune in short time to have employment for this noble society, where I have always met with men of much understanding, and no less bounty; to

Aldermen; as of 1622, an Alderman was required to have assets worth at least 10,000 marks (£6,666). (See also
ll. 28-9 of the Busino Account and note for the costs of public office—and some consequences of those costs.)

20 shame...perfection outdo the best of things (as opposed to Middleton's pageant, which he calls the slightest of things)

24 escutcheons shields

26 reserved held for Bolles alone to occupy as its duly elected occupant. Middleton's pageant supplies a literal chair or 'seat of honour' (190) as part of the Castle of Fame.

32 twice...time Middleton had also written
The Triumphs of Truth for the Grocers in 1613. For that pageant, however, his responsibilities were limited to 'the ordering overseeing and writing of the whole device and also for the apparelling the personage in the pageant', for which he was paid £40. Anthony Munday had been an essential (and much better paid) collaborator, receiving £149 for 'the device of the pageant and other shows, and for the apparelling and finding of all the personages in the said shows (excepting the pageant) and also for the portage and carriage both by land and water'. (See the Busino Account, note to
l. 192, regarding the terms 'device' and 'pageant'.) By 1617, Middleton was fully entrusted with producing, in addition to writing, the show. He was paid £282 not just 'for the ordering, overseeing and writing of the whole device', but also as a kind of general contractor 'for the making of the Pageant of Nations, the Island, the Indian Chariot, the Castle of Fame, trimming the Ship, with all the several beasts which drew them, and for all the carpenter's work, painting, gilding and garnishing of them, with all other things necessary for the apparelling and finding of all the personages in the said shows, and for all the portage and carriage, both by land and by water, for the lighters for the show by water, for painting of a banner of the Lord Mayor's arms, and also in full for the greenmen, devils and fireworks'.

34-5 to whom cost appears but as a shadow
While the £882 paid out for Honour and Industry did not equal the £1,295 lavished on the previous Grocers' pageant
(The Triumphs of Truth, 1613), the 1617
spectacle was among the more costly
Lord Mayor's shows during this period.
The Merchant Taylors spent £747. 2s.
10d. in 1602, but their Court Books make clear that this is an extraordinary sum meant to satisfy the 'greater expectation now looked from our Company than ordinary, by reason we have been free so long from the same charge, having not had a Mayor of our company sithence... thirty and three years at the least'. A scant decade later, the Company raised £978. 12s. 11d. for Thomas Dekker's 1612 extravaganza, Troia-Nova Triumphans. The thrifty Ironmongers spent a mere £205. 15s. 11d. in 1609;
the £523. 11s. 9d. spent on their 1618 show was much closer to the average cost of £700 for Jacobean and Caroline pageants. That the guilds undertook expenditures on civic pageantry in something of a competitive spirit is evident from Anthony Munday's thinly veiled apology for the shortcomings of the 1609
Ironmongers' show: 'And let me tell you, did their number hold level with other Societies, or carry correspondency in the best helping matter, their bounty should hardly have gone behind the best.'

The other locus of theatrical conspicuous consumption was King James's court. As with Lord Mayor's pageants, the designers/producers of these spectacles received much larger payments than the writers, and it is difficult to determine if this difference reflects the relative value placed on these different services, or the expenses involved in purchasing the necessary materials and labour. Oberon, the Fairy Prince, performed by Prince Henry at Court in 1611, cost £1,087. 6s. 10d., of which Ben Jonson received £40 for his work with designer

Inigo Jones, who was paid at least £390.
Composer Alphonso Ferrabosco received £20. Extant accounts record payments of approximately £1000 (the total expenditure was rumoured to be £1500) for The Lords' Masque, staged at Court in honour of Princess Elizabeth's marriage in 1613. Jones received upwards of £370—although some of this seems to have been for two other masques also performed as part of the nuptial celebrations—while Thomas Campion, as 'poet', received £66. Jonson's annual pension bestowed by James I in 1616 was for an amount similar to Campion's fee: 100 marks (£66) for services 'done and to be done', including the writing of masques. In 1617, £750 was spent for two performances of Jonson and Jones's The Vision of Delight, featuring the newly-made Earl of Buckingham, with additional payment of £100 to be divided among the twelve French musicians who performed in this and other holiday entertainments for the King. By 1618, word at Court was that straitened royal finances had forced the Queen to cancel a planned masque of ladies and caused the King to allocate £4,000 of a loan from Middelburg and Dutch East India merchants for Jonson and Jones's Pleasure Reconciled to Virtue. Also performed twice, this masque celebrated the investiture of Prince Charles as Prince of Wales. Detailed accounts survive for the costumes of Prince Charles and two companions: these three masquing suits alone cost £249.

The triumphs of Honor and Industry.

35 whom cost appears but as a shadow, so there be fullness of content in the performance of the solemnity; which that the world may judge of, for whose pleasure and satisfaction custom hath yearly framed it (but chiefly for the honour of the City), it begins to present itself, not 40 without form and order, which is required in the meanest employment.

The first invention

A company of Indians, attired according to the true nature of their country, seeming for the most part naked, 45 are set at work in an island of growing spices: some planting nutmeg trees, some other spice trees of all kinds; some gathering the fruits, some making up bags of pepper; every one severally employed. These Indians are all active youths, who, ceasing in their labours, dance 50 about the trees, both to give content to themselves and the spectators.

After this show of dancing Indians in the island follows triumphantly a rich personage presenting India, the seat of merchandise. This India sits on the top of an illustrious 55 chariot; on the one side of her sits Traffic or Merchandise, on the other side, Industry, both fitted and adorned according to the property of their natures: Industry holding a golden ball in her hand, upon which stands a Cupid, signifying that Industry gets both wealth and love, and, with her associate Traffic or Merchandise, who holds a globe 60 in her hand, knits love and peace amongst all nations.

To the better expressing of which, if you give attention to Industry that now sets forward to speak, it will be yours more exactly.

THE SPEECH OF INDUSTRY IN THE CHARIOT

I was jealous of the shadowing of my grace, 65
But that I know this is my time and place.
Where has not Industry a noble friend?
In this assembly even the best extend
Their grace and love to me, joyed or amazed:
Who of true fame possessed, but I have raised, 70
And after added honours to his days.
For Industry is the life-blood of praise:
To rise without me is to steal to glory;
And who so abject to leave such a story?
It is as clear as light, as bright as truth, 75
Fame waits their age, whom Industry their youth.
Behold this ball of gold, upon which stands
A golden Cupid, wrought with curious hands;
The mighty power of Industry it shows,
That gets both wealth and love, which overflows 80
With such a stream of amity and peace,
Not only to itself adding increase,

35-6 so there be fullness of content Middleton seems to be playing on two senses of the word 'content': the one implying satisfaction and the one referring to what is contained in a work. 'Fullness of content' was occasionally a matter of dispute. Anthony Munday was brought before the Ironmongers in early November, 1609, to hear their objections to the performance of Camp-bell, that year's effort. Problems included 'that the children were not instructed their speeches which was a special judgement of the consideration, then that the music and singing were wanting, the apparel most of it old and borrowed, with other defects'. Munday had the temerity to ask for a £5 increase in his fee 'in regard of his speeches made for the water', but the Ironmongers were unbending: 'in respect he performed not his speeches on land, nor the rest of his contracted service, the Company were not to go beyond their bargain'.

43 Indians honours the connection of the Grocers to the East India Company; Bolles and his father-in-law were important members of both (see note to 11-12 above). The East India Company, chartered in 1600, was a phenomenal financial success for many of its investors and for the Crown, which benefitted from customs and imposts on the East India trade. In 1621, for example, Crown revenues from these sources were said to exceed £20,000. Indeed, the Company's dynamism made it vulnerable to royal interference around the time of Honour and Industry's performance. The long-established Merchant Adventurers were just beginning to recover from King James's suspension of their charter between 1614 and early 1617 in favour of the disastrous Cokayne project. Undaunted, James seems to have had a related idea of intervening in East Indian trade. By early November of 1617, he had granted a patent to his 'Right trusty and well-beloved cousin and councillor' Sir James Cunningham for the establishment of a Scottish East India Company, to compete directly with the established company. Protests from the English East India merchants caused the patent to be withdrawn by March of 1618, but only on the condition that the Company reimburse Cunningham and his associates for the hypothetical profits they had foregone; the King then demanded a loan of £20,000 for the royal treasury.

48 pepper a reference to the Grocers' original name, the Guild or Fraternity of Pepperers, whose existence is first recorded in 1180. The Guild traded drugs, spices and other commodities in large quantities. By the 1370s, merchants selling 'engrossed' goods were members of 'the Company of Grocers'.

49 youths Most of the figures on the pageant wagons in Lord Mayor's shows were played by children, and there is no evidence to suggest that the main figures in Honour and Industry, including the members of the Pageant of Nations (see l. 96 ff. below), were an exception (see note to l. 244-5 below). This practice was not without its problems, and adult actors seem to have taken on increased responsibilities at least in Munday's pageants. In Camp-bell, the 1609 effort for which he was sternly reprimanded by the sponsoring Ironmongers (see note to l. 35 above), Munday explains that he has chosen to have two key roles played by adults in part because 'the weak voices of so many Children, which such shows as this do urgently require, for personating each device, in a crowd of such noise and uncivil turmoil, are not any way able to be understood'.

56 Industry Middleton's 'Industry' is very different from Dekker's in his 1612 show, Troia-Nova Triumphans. There, Industry is figured 'in the shape of an old country-man, bearing on his shoulder a spade, as the emblem of labour'.

59 gets both 'aquires' and 'begets'
65 jealous Industry here refers to the 'shadowing of my grace' by the more centrally placed and spectacularly dressed India. This assignment of an extra-emblematic motivation—the implication, even, of rudimentary dramatic conflict—is typical of Middleton's efforts to give the stock figures of civic pageantry distinct voices and even personalities.

The arms of Sir George Bolles.

But several nations where commerce abounds
Taste the harmonious peace so sweetly sounds;
For instance, let your gracious eye be fixed
Upon a joy true, though so strangely mixed.

And that you may take the better note of their adornments, India, whose seat is the most eminent, for her expression holds in her hand a wedge of gold; Traffic, her associate, a globe; Industry, a fair golden ball in her hand, upon which stands a golden Cupid; Fortune expressed with a silver wheel; Success holding a painted ship in a haven; Wealth, a golden key where her heart lies; Virtue bearing for her manifestation a silver shield; Grace holding in her hand a book; Perfection, a crown of gold.

At which words, the Pageant of Several Nations, which is purposely planted near the sound of the words, moves with a kind of affectionate joy, both at the honour of the day's triumph and the prosperity of Love, which by the virtue of Traffic is likely ever to continue. And for a good omen of the everlasting continuance of it, on the top of this curious and triumphant pageant shoots up a laurel tree, the leaves spotted with gold, about which sit six celestial figures, presenting Peace, Prosperity, Love, Unity, Plenty, and Fidelity: Peace holding a branch of palm; Prosperity, a laurel; Love, two joined hands; Unity, two turtles; Plenty holding fruits; Fidelity, a silver anchor. But before I entered so far, I should have showed you the zeal and love of the Frenchman and Spaniard, which now I hope will not appear unseasonably: who, not content with a silent joy, like the rest of the nations, have a thirst to utter their gladness, though understood of a small number; which is this:

THE SHORT SPEECH DELIVERED BY THE FRENCHMAN IN FRENCH

La multitude m'ayant monté sur ce haut lieu pour contempler le glorieux triomphe de cette journée, je vois qu'en quelque sorte la noble dignité de la très honorable Société des Grociers y est représentée, dont me jouissant par-dessous tous, je leur souhaite et à Monseigneur le Maire le comble de toutes nobles et heureuses fortunes.

THE SAME IN ENGLISH It is my joy chiefly (and I stand for thousands) to see the glory of this triumphant day, which in some measure requites the noble worthiness of the honourable Society of Grocers, to whom and to my Lord Mayor I wish all good successes.

This Frenchman no sooner sets a period to his speech, but the Spaniard, in zeal as virtuous as he, utters himself to the purpose of these words:

86 strangely 'strange' had the sense of 'unusual' or 'uncommon'; 'stranger' was also synonymous with 'foreigner' during this period

92 wheel In emblem books, the changeable nature of Fortune is routinely symbolized by a wheel. While in this particular case Middleton is following the standard iconography, models for his pageant figures and their symbolic accessories cannot always be found in the emblem literature of his day.

95 book In association with Grace, the book here most likely represents divine truth. Books are also used in emblems to signify secular wisdom.

crown of gold Crowns appear in emblems that depict divine as well as temporal authority.

103 laurel a sign for triumph or lasting fame

106 palm also used to represent triumph

107 turtles turtle doves. Often a reference to married love, turtle doves are appropriate here in association with the figure of Unity.

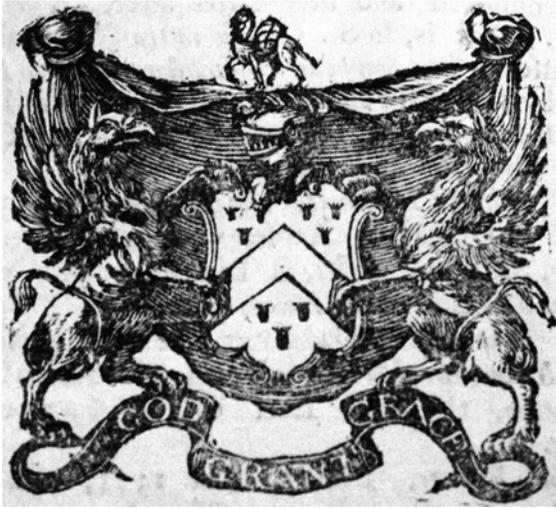

anchor An anchor is most often used in emblems depicting Hope, but also appears in representations of religious faith.

112-113 understood . . . number This suggests that in performance, the speeches of the Frenchman and Spaniard were not followed by the English translations Middleton supplied in his pamphlet. The pamphlet itself was printed by Nicholas Okes, who received £4 from the Grocers for printing 500 copies—the customary number of copies at the usual price for these commemorative publications. Only a handful are entered in the Stationers' Register (Honour and Industry is not among them), and it is unclear whether the pamphlets were consistently intended for sale to the general public or primarily for distribution among the members of the Lord Mayor's guild. A somewhat specialized audience for this and other such pageant texts is implied by their tendency to assume a reader's familiarity with the overall shape and geography of the shows. For example, although Middleton's fee included compensation for many aspects of the spectacle on the Thames accompanying Bolles's passage to and from Westminster for his oath-taking, the text of Honour and Industry contains almost nothing about this part of the day's festivities—presumably because no speeches were written for delivery on the water. By comparison, in the Busino Account the flotilla on the river is described at length as an essential part of the celebration. (See note to l. 32-3 for the responsibilities covered by Middleton's fee.)

THE SPANIARD'S SPEECH IN SPANISH Ninguna de todas estas

naciones conciben mayor y verdadera alegría en este triunfante y glorioso día que yo, no, ninguna de todas ellas, porque ahora que me parece, que son tan ricas, es señal que los de mi nación en tratando con ellas recibirán mayor provecho de ellas, a mi señor Don Mayor todas buenas y dichosas fortunas, y a los de la honrada Compañía de Especieros dichosos deseos, y así Dios guarde a mi señor Don Mayor, y ruego a Dios que todo el año siguiente, puede ser tan dichoso como esta entrada suya, a la dignidad de su Señoría, guarde Dios a su Señoría.

THE SAME IN ENGLISH None of all these nations conceive more true joy at this triumphant day than myself: to my Lord Mayor all fair and noble fortunes, and to the worthy Society of Grocers all happy wishes; and I pray heaven that all the year following may be as happy and successful as this first entrance to your dignity.

This expression of their joy and love having spent itself, I know you cannot part contented without their several inscriptions: now the favour and help must be in you to conceive our breadth and limits, and not to think we can in these customary bounds comprehend all the nations, but so many as shall serve to give content to the understander, which thus produce themselves:

An Englishman, a Frenchman, an Irishman, a Span-

148 inscriptions An inscription was a written legend or description, often inscribed on the thing it explicated. Here, Middleton seems to be combining this meaning with the tradition, lapsed by 1617, of having pageant devices bear written labels. In 1575, William Smyth had described a 'pageant of triumph richly decked, whereupon by certain figures and writings, (partly touching the name of the said mayor) some matter touching Justice, and the office of a magistrate is represented'.

149-51 not to think we can...comprehend all the nations Middleton's Pageant of Nations does in fact exclude the Dutch, with whom England had long-standing trade relations. Middleton had used a Dutchman and his son—and parodied the Dutch language—in No Wit (1611); the omission from a pageant glorifying London's mercantile power was not due to oversight or unfamiliarity. England's natural allies and co-religionists on the continent had, paradoxically, become ferocious competitors in the sphere of foreign trade in the first decades of the seventeenth century. The growth of hostilities between the English and Dutch East India Companies during this period would have been of particular concern to the Grocers. As early as 1610, the Dutch had proposed a union of the two Companies, but, as one letter to the English Ambassador in Holland attests, the proposal was not looked on with favour: 'we fear that in case of joining, if it be on equal terms, the art and industry of their people will wear out ours'. Hostilities between the two merchant groups erupted into open warfare during 1618-19, and reached their severest crisis—at least in the English popular imagination—with the notorious murder of English merchants by the Dutch in the 1624 'Massacre of Amboyna'.

153 a Frenchman Trade with France for commodities including cloth and wine was steady throughout this period. A brief effort was made in 1611 to regulate trade with France by establishing a French Company; aside from its charter, this entity left few records.

an Irishman The performer dressed as an Irishman is presumably included to acknowledge the Grocers' membership in the Irish Society. In the aftermath of rebellion by a number of powerful Roman Catholics in the province of Ulster, King James offered the City of London the opportunity to resettle the seized lands. 'Motives and Reasons to induce the City of London to undertake Plantation in the North of Ireland', issued by the Privy Council, was delivered to the Lord Mayor in 1609; he in turn asked each of the major guilds to nominate representatives to a committee charged with considering the undertaking. The 'motives' included the hope that these plantations would 'furnish the City of London yearly with manifold provision' and that these 'colonies may be a means to utter infinite commodities from London to furnish the whole north of Ireland and Isles of Scotland'. After deliberating, the City helped form the Irish Society with a subscription of £20,000, of which the Grocers contributed £1,748. The actual division of lands did not take place for a number of years; the Grocers received final details of their allotment on 12 February 1617.

153-4 a Spaniard Trade with Spain was unregulated, except for the formation of Spanish Companies from 1577-85 and 1604-6. The peace treaty of 1604 between England and Spain touched off enormous growth in trade between the two countries, with the balance weighted unfavourably for the English. Traders were relatively ineffectual in selling English-made goods but imported large amounts of Spanish wares such as sugar, tobacco and wines.

The Tryumphs of Honour and Induftry.

155 iard, a Turk, a Jew, a Dane, a Polander, a Barbarian, a Russian or Muscovian.

This fully expressed, I arrive now at that part of triumph which my desire ever hastened to come to, this Castle of Fame or Honour, which Industry brings her sons unto in their reverend ages.

160 In the front of this Castle, Reward and Justice, decked in bright robes, keep a seat between them for him to whom the day's honour is dedicated, showing how many worthy sons of the City and of the same society have by their truth, desert, and industry come to the like honour before him; where on a sudden is shown divers of the same right worshipful Society of Grocers, manifested both 165 by their good government in their times, as also by their escutcheons of arms, as an example and encouragement to all virtuous and industrious deservers in time to come. And in honour of antiquity is shown that ancient and memorable worthy of the Grocers' company, Andrew Bockrill, who was mayor of London the sixteenth year of Henry the Third, 1231, and continued so mayor seven years together.

Likewise, for the greater honour of the company, is also shown in this Castle of Fame the noble Allen de la Zouche, grocer, who was mayor of London the two-and-fiftieth year of the same Henry the Third, which Allen de la Zouche, for his good government in the time of his mayoralty, was by the said King Henry the Third made both a baron of this realm and Lord Chief Justice of England; also that famous worthy, Sir Thomas Knolles, grocer, twice mayor of this honourable city, which Sir 154 a Turk The development of English Levantine trade in the late 1500s exemplifies the interrelationships between London's political and economic élites. The Levant Company, chartered in 1592, was an amalgam of the Turkey and Venice Companies. Of the twelve members issued the Turkey Company's original patent in 1581, eight were or subsequently became Aldermen of the City of London, seven were Lord Mayors, and four served as MPs for the City of London. John Harte, George Bolles's father-in-law, was among these founding twelve. In 1592, the Turkey Company joined with the only slightly-less formidable leadership of the Venice Company to form the Levant Company. A select group of twenty additional merchants were, upon payment of £130, allowed to join the original fifty-three persons granted the patent for this new enterprise. Among the monopolies included in this grant was the right to establish and make exclusive use of an overland trade route to the Far East. The leading members of the Levant Company (again including John Harte) instead formed the East India Company, which received its first charter in 1600. Meanwhile, the Levant Company, which had changed from a joint-stock (a company funded by a range of investors but whose activities were directed by a small governing committee) to a regulated company (whose members individually engaged in trade), continued to enjoy royal favour. In 1615, the Crown went so far as to make it illegal for any merchandise to be imported into England from the Levant except directly, and in English shipping. Competition from foreign merchants, or from English entrepreneurs working overland routes, was effectively eliminated.

a Jew Jews served as middlemen in both the Barbary and Levant trades. Physical descriptions were available in accounts by English travellers abroad, such as George Sandy's observations about Turkish Jews in his A Relation of a Journey begun An: Dom: 1610, published in 1615: 'Their undergarments, differing little from the Turks' in fashion, are of purple cloth; over that they wear gowns of the same colour, with large wide sleeves, and clasped beneath the chin, without band or collar: on their heads high brimless caps of purple, which they move at no time in their salutations. They shave their heads all over... it being their ancient fashion'.

a Dane, a Polander The Eastland Company, incorporated in 1579, was a regulated company, offering its members a monopoly on trade of English merchandise with Denmark and Poland. The Danes controlled access to the Baltic Sea of all foreign shipping, exacting a variety of tolls on the value of goods being shipped. The King of Denmark, Christian IV, was brother of James I's Queen Anne; commerce between the two countries was occasionally shaped by this royal family connection. Poland was a significant source of grain imported into England, particularly during the second decade of the seventeenth century. In addition, Poles were generally thought to use more spices on their meat than other European nationals, making the country a market for the resale of commodities imported into England from India.

a Barbarian The entire northern coast of Africa was referred to as 'Barbary' during this period, but Middleton's 'Barbarian' most likely acknowledges England's commerce with Morocco. Established in the 1550s, this trade was a major source of grocery goods such as sugar and dates. A regulated company, created largely at the insistence of the Earl of Leicester, was chartered for twelve years from 1585 to 1597, and unregulated trade resumed thereafter.

154-5 a Russian or Muscovian Chartered in 1555, the Russia Company helped to pioneer the joint-stock principal of commercial organization, although it was trading as a regulated company by the mid-1620s, shortly after George Bolles's investment (see note on 'a Turk' at l. 154 above for 'joint-stock' vs. 'regulated'). Russia's relevance to the grocery trade included its market for English re-exports such as wine and spices; Russia also provided some spices, primarily from Persia, for English consumers. The first Russian ambassador to England, Osep Napea, arrived in 1557 under the auspices of the nascent Russia Company. Napea and his entourage were feted by the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and members of the Company for almost a month before being received at court by King Philip and Queen Mary. The Company continued to play an important role in diplomatic relations between England and Russia. For example, the Company paid at least £1,376 toward the expenses of Sir Richard Lee's embassy on behalf of Queen Elizabeth I to the Tsar in 1600. The week after the performance of Honour and Industry, the Company hosted an ambassador from Russia, who arrived with an entourage of seventy-five people as well as gifts of white hawks and live sables for James I. At the ambassador's departure in June, 1618, he was understood to take with him a loan of £50,000 from the Company, made 'not merely with the hope of obtaining privileges advantageous for their traffic, but also the monopoly of the Russian trade, to the utter exclusion of the Dutch'.

157-8 Castle of Fame or Honour Middleton's lack of specificity here—Fame or Honour—is interesting. He certainly does not mean for them to be synonymous, as they are given distinct personifications—and distinct genders—later in the pageant: Fame is 'not without her silver trumpet' (229), Honour is 'manifested by a fair star in his hand' (232).

The Tryumphs of Honour and Induftry.

185 Thomas begun at his own charge that famous building of Guildhall in London, and other memorable works both in this city and in his own company; so much worthiness being the lustre of this castle, and ought indeed to be the imitation of the beholder.

190 My lord no sooner approaches, but Reward, a partner with Justice in keeping that seat of honour, as overjoyed at the sight of him, appears too free and forward in the resignation.

REWARD

*Welcome to Fame's bright Castle; take thy place:
This seat's reserved to do thy virtue's grace.*

JUSTICE

195 *True, but not yet to be possessed. Hear me:
Justice must flow through him before that be;
Great works of grace must be required and done
Before the honour of this seat be won.
A whole year's reverend care in righting wrongs,
200 And guarding innocence from malicious tongues,
Must be employed in virtue's sacred right
Before this place be filled: 'tis no mean fight
That wins this palm; truth, and a virtuous care
Of the oppressèd, those the loadstones are 205 That will 'gainst envy's power draw him forth
To take this merit in this seat of worth,
Where all the memorable worthies shine
In works of brightness able to refine
All the beholders' minds, and strike new fire
210 To kindle an industrious desire*

*To imitate their actions and their fame,
Which to this Castle adds that glorious name.
Wherefore, Reward, free as the air or light,
There must be merit, or our work's not right.*

REWARD

*If there were any error, 'twas my love; 215
And if it be a fault to be too free,
Reward commits but once such heresy.
Howe'er, I know your worth will so extend,
Your fame will fill this seat at twelve months' end.*

About this Castle of Fame are placed many honourable 220 figures, as Truth, Antiquity, Harmony, Fame, Desert,
Good Works; on the top of the Castle, Honour, Religion, Piety, Commiseration: the works of those whose memories shine in this Castle.

If you look upon Truth first, you shall find her properly 225 expressed, holding in her right hand a sun, in the other a fan of stars; Antiquity with a scroll in her hand, as keeper of Honour's records; Harmony holding a golden lute, and Fame not without her silver trumpet; for Desert, 'tis glorious through her own brightness, but holds nothing; 230 Good Works expressed with a college or hospital. On the top of the Castle, Honour manifested by a fair star in his hand; Religion with a temple on her head; Piety with an altar; Commiseration with a melting or burning heart.
And, not to have our speakers forgotten, Reward and 235
Justice, with whom we entered this part of Triumph, Reward holding a wreath of gold ready for a deserver, and Justice furnished with her sword and balance.

185 Guildhall civic hall for the governing bodies of the City of London
191–2 too free . . . resignation Reward too easily relinquishes the seat to the new Lord Mayor, according to Justice in the speech that follows.
225 Truth Compare the representation of Truth in the 1613 pageant.
231 Good Works . . . college or hospital
London's guilds contributed to the foundation and maintenance of a number of educational institutions, and the Lord Mayor, Court of Aldermen and Common Council were responsible for the upkeep of the City's four royal hospitals:
St Bartholomew's, Bethlehem, Christ's, and St Thomas's. Four beades from each of the four hospitals marched in the procession in blue coats; in 1617
the Grocers paid 'diverse tailors' 14d for each coat. In addition, the beades from each hospital received 12d each 'for their dinners and attendance in this service done'—in addition to 'long caps and ribbons'.
240 Paul's Churchyard churchyard at the east end of St Paul's Cathedral. The Grocers paid 10s. 'for taking up of the spurs at Paul's and for setting them again and for paving and gravel'. 'Spurs' were cylindrical stones set at the corner of buildings or archways to protect against damage by wheeled traffic.

Presumably they were removed and then reset to accommodate the anticipated crowds. Another piece of evidence that property along the pageant route was modified for the day's celebration is the payment of £1. 14s. 6d. to the 'city carpenter, for pulling down divers signs and setting them up again'.
Cheapside chief commercial street running east from St Paul's. The churchwardens of St Peter's, located along the pageant route on Cheapside, received 3s. 4d. for allowing the waits of the City, a group of wind-instrumentalists maintained by the municipality, to be stationed there while providing musical accompaniment for the procession. The waits themselves were paid £2. 13s. 4d.
for five days of 'service' in connection with the Lord Mayor's inaugural.

241–2 that gave delight upon the water
This is Middleton's only allusion within the text of Honour and Industry to the elaborate water-borne procession that took place prior to the events that he does narrate. While Middleton's pageant does not feature speeches delivered as part of a 'water show', a practice begun by George Peele in his pageant of 1591 and continued sporadically over the years, 'both castle and island' now gathered before the Lord Mayor had begun the day's festivities transported by boat as part of the flotilla on the Thames. Middleton's fee included arranging for water transport as well as 'lighters for the show by water' for the actual performance, but the Grocers paid a separate sum of 2s. 6d. for 'going by water at several times to see the work made ready' prior to the big day. The inaugural ceremony's logistical complexities are suggested by the payment of 13s. to 'several watermen for carrying of the whifflers', young freemen serving as armed attendants, and 'divers' members of the Court of Assistants and liverymen,

'to and from Westminster'. Presumably,
Bolles paid for his own transportation, as there is no sum assigned for the usual rental of a barge for the new Lord Mayor. The Grocers' Accounts do, however, record payment of £1. 10s. for the hire of a barge to carry various members to the separate oath-taking ceremonies at Westminster of Robert Johnson, a grocer, as one of London's two Sheriffs. It was customary for the mayor-elect to choose one of the Sheriffs, usually from his own guild; Johnson was selected by Bolles to serve during his Mayoral term. The other

240 All this service is performed before the feast, some in Paul's Churchyard, some in Cheapside; at which place the whole triumph meets, both castle and island, that gave delight upon the water. And now, as duty binds me, I commend my lord and his right honourable guests to the solemn pleasure of the feast, from whence, I presume, 245 all epicurism is banished; for where Honour is master of the feast, Moderation and Gravity are always attendants. The feast being ended at Guildhall, my lord (as yearly custom invites him) goes accompanied with the triumph towards St Paul's, to perform the noble and reverend 250 ceremonies which divine antiquity virtuously ordained, Sheriff was elected by London's Common Council (see the Busino Account, notes to ll. 28-9 and 236).

244 the feast Stow's Survey of 1603 records the tradition, dating back at least to the reign of Henry VIII, that London's 60 guilds were represented at the 'Mayor's feast' by their wardens and a stated number of Company members, ranging from 17 for the venerable Mercers to one for lesser guilds like the Coopers. These guests—several hundred of them—were joined by members of the nobility, ambassadors, and other worthies. The Grocers' accounts do not record the cost of this feast for 1617; the banquet was traditionally paid for by the new Lord Mayor and Sheriffs. The Grocers did pay the keeper of Guildhall 12s. to have the 'Mercers' hangings' carried to and from the Guildhall, hung up and taken down, and for the necessary timber and hooks. These 'hangings' were presumably the result of the bequest of £73. 6s. 8d. 'for a hanging of tapestry to serve for principal days in the Guildhall' by Nicholas Alwyn, a Mercer and Lord Mayor in 1499. The Grocers also paid George Newball, Keeper of Blackwell Hall, £2 'for the use of his house for the children' during the feast, and the porters of the Hall received 10s. for 'looking to the pageant and other shows whilst the children were at dinner' (see note to l. 49 above regarding child performers). Blackwell or Bakewell Hall, used as a cloth market in Stow's time, was adjacent to the Guildhall. In addition, the Company picked up the tab for the breakfast shared by the bachelors and other participants in the day's festivities 'at the Ship behind Old Fish Street', conveniently located near the pageant route (which they would be expected to line) from Baynard's Castle to St Paul's Churchyard. Mr Abell, a vintner, received £27. 8s. 9d. 'for all manner of charges'. Another entry suggests that these shows provided an opportunity for expense-account socializing: committee members involved in supervising various aspects of the pageant, along with the Company Wardens, consumed £25. 16s.

worth of 'dinners and potatoes . . . in the hall as elsewhere during the time of their sitting about these businesses'.

presume The pageant text, along with the public, waits patiently outside the doors during the feast and the services at St Paul's which follow. Munday's continuation of Stow, however, gives a glimpse into the hierarchical, ritualized private part of the public celebration at Guildhall: 'the new Lord Mayor with two of the ancientest Aldermen, Master Recorder and the Sheriffs, go up to the lords' table to bid them welcome, and likewise all the other guests there: and from thence to the Lady Mayoress' table: and so come forth to the gentlewomen's table, and to the judges; and from thence he goeth into the Chamberlain's Office, where he dineth. But the old Lord [Mayor], at their first entering into the Hall, goeth up directly to the high table of the hustings, and there keepeth the state for that feast. After the Hall is almost served the seconds, then the new Lord Mayor goeth with Master Recorder, and those other aldermen that dined with him, to bid the old Lord [Mayor], and all the guests in the Hall welcome.'

245 epicurism excess in eating; see Triumphs of Truth 666. The 'moderation and gravity' which Middleton ascribed to the proceedings would have been in sharp contrast to the behaviour of guests at court masques. Orazio Busino, observer of Court as well as City entertainments, described the scene that followed Prince Charles's performance in Jonson and Jones's Pleasure Reconiled to Virtue (1618): 'His majesty . . . glanced round the table and departed, and at once like so many harpies the company fell on their prey. The table was almost entirely covered with sweetmeats, with all kinds of sugar confections . . . The meal was served in bowls or plates of glass; the first assault threw the table to the ground, and the crash of glass platters reminded me exactly of the windows breaking in a great midsummer storm.'

253 torchlight 49 dozen 'large staff torches' cost £36. 15s. The Company also paid £5. 8s. 3d. for ten-and-half dozen 'small and is no less than faithfully observed, which is no mean lustre to the City. Holy service and ceremonies accomplished, he returns by torchlight to his own house, the whole triumph placed in comely order before him; and at the entrance of his gate, Honour, a glorious person, 255 from the top of the castle gives life to these following words.

HONOUR

*There is no human glory or renown,
But have their evening and their sure sun-setting,
Which shows that we should upward seek our crown
And make but use of time for our hope's bettering.* 260

torches' and five-and-a-half dozen 'links' 'to light the pageant and other shows from Leadenhall over night to Carter Lane and other places appointed'. Leadenhall, used variously as a market for cloth and a storage facility for grain, also had a role in civic pageantry. According to a petition of 1519, 'if any triumph or nobleness were to be done, or showed by the commonality of the city for the honour of our sovereign lord the King, and realm, and for the worship of the said City, the said Leadenhall is most meet and convenient place to prepare and order the said triumph therein, and from thence to issue forth to the places therefore appointed'. Carter Lane, one street away from St Paul's, appears to have been the location where pageant wagons were stored the night before a Lord Mayor's show. For the 1613 pageant written by Middleton, Anthony Munday received an additional £3. 13s. 4d. over his £149 producer's fee for 'the clearing of all charges for the standing of the pageant etc. at the Bell in Carter Lane'.

254 placed in comely order 'Ordering' the pageant throughout the day was a major concern; failure to do so could have dire consequences for the production. In his 1615 pageant text, Munday is apparently explaining some organizational glitches in transferring the pageants from water to land when he bemoans 'the time being so short, and our preparation requiring such decency in order: yet much abused by neglect in marshalling, and hurried away with too impudent hastiness'. The various pageant devices had to be kept in order; so did Company members and participating dignitaries. And the pageant route itself had to be kept clear of people so that the whole cumbersome procession could circulate in a timely way. For Honour and Industry, the Grocers paid £5 to George Bell 'for himself and 10 others for the ushering, marshalling and making way for the whole Company on the day, they furnishing themselves with all things necessary'. (See also the Busino Account, l. 157 ff. and notes.)

The triumphs of Honor and Industry.

So, to be truly mindful of our own
 Is to perform all parts of good in one.
 The close of this triumphant day is come,
 265 And Honour stays to bid you welcome home.
 All I desire for my grace and good
 Is but to be remembered in your blood,
 With honour to accomplish the fair time,
 Which power hath put into your hands. A crime
 270 As great as ever came into sin's hand
 I do entitle a too-sparing hand:
 Nothing deads honour more than to behold
 Plenty cooped up, and bounty faint and cold,
 Which ought to be the free life of the year;
 275 For bounty 'twas ordained to make that clear,

Which is the light of goodness and of fame,
 And puts by honour from the cloud of shame.
 Great cost and love hath nobly been bestowed
 Upon thy triumph, which this day hath showed.
 Embrace 'em in thy heart, till times afford
 Fuller expression; in one absolute word,
 All the content that ever made man blest,
 This triumph done, make a triumphant breast.

280

No sooner the speech is ended but the triumph is dissolved, and not possible to 'scape the hands of the defacer; things 285 that, for their quaintness (I dare so far commend them), have not been usually seen through the City; the credit of which workmanship I must justly lay upon the deserts of Master Rowland Bucket, chief master of the work; yet

269–71 A crime... too-sparing hand This kind of rhetoric, encouraging the Lord Mayor's generosity, is a frequent refrain in these pageants. The Lord Mayor was responsible for securing and storing grain for distribution to the City's poor in time of dearth, and the pageants' constant appeals for 'bounty' may reflect this larger corporate duty. Individual philanthropy was also a hallmark of the successful tradesman. Here again, Bolles is exemplary. His will includes bequests of £50 to Christ's Hospital, £20 to St Bartholomew's, £20 to aid prisoners, and £19 for poor relief. He was also generous to the Grocers, leaving £30 for plate, £33 for a commemorative dinner, and £50 for the Company's general use. The generosity of Bolles's father-in-law was more spectacular: among his many bequests John Harte left £112 to London's hospitals, £733 to found a grammar school in Yorkshire, and, along with at least one identifiably Puritan London magnate, £30 towards the purchase of books and £600 as endowment for the newly-established Sidney Sussex College at Cambridge.

284–94 These closing credits contain information about Middleton's collaborators that presumably was not communicated to the pageant's audience. Like the translations provided in the pamphlet for the speeches of the Spaniard and Frenchman (see note to l. 112 above), this is a difference between the text and performance of Honour and Industry.

285 the hands of the defacer Pageant producers were occasionally reimbursed for items 'defaced' in the course of the day's activities. In 1616 Anthony Munday applied to the Fishmongers for an additional £10 over his fee for a number of reasons including the 'spoiling [of] the silk coats which the halberdiers did wear'; he was 'content thankfully to accept' a little over half that amount. Accounts for the 1617 show indicate the Grocers' concern that the 'triumph' be preserved as carefully as possible.

The Company's beadle received 12s. 9d. 'for candles and for bringing in of the pageants after the show to the hall'; another 11s. were disbursed 'to certain workmen for setting up the beasts in the pageant-chamber over the entry in the hall'. An order in the Goldsmiths' records from 1611 suggests that the display, or at least storage, of these scenic elements at livery company halls was a common practice: 'the leopards, unicorns, and mermaids of the pageants standing in the gallery next the hall shall be taken down and laid in some other place... because it is intended that provision of armour shall be made and set up there'. In addition to looking after the 'triumph', the Grocers took some care to clean up the city streets: 11s. were paid 'for carrying away the rubbish at Leadenhall'—where the pageant elements were prepared—'and taking down the partitions there'.

286 quaintness ingeniously designed; skillfully made; elaborate
 287 seen through the City The hiring of porters to carry the various pageants through the streets was one of the responsibilities to be covered out of Middleton's £282 fee. The Grocers allotted an additional £1. 10s. to be divided among eight of these men in 'gratuity' for their services; 5s. was paid to 'Thomas Hunt, porter, being hurt in the service'.

289 Rowland Bucket Munday thanks 'the exact and skilful painter Rowland Bucket' at the end of the text for the 1614 Lord Mayor's Show, Himatia-Poleos. It seems that Bucket did not, however, work exclusively on civic projects or for guild-related clients. Indeed, a sampling of his known employments indicates numerous points of contact between London's different social élites. Bucket received £7. 5s. in connection with the 1620 Accession Day tilt. For building six chariots for The Triumph of Peace (1634), a lavish masque sponsored by the Inns of Court, Bucket was paid £272. 17s.; Inigo Jones received £200 for scenery and James Shirley got the generous sum of £120 for writing the text. Bucket was also employed with some frequency by the Earl of Salisbury. One project undertaken for this last patron was overtly hostile to the City's interests. Bucket participated in the interior decoration of the New Exchange, developed beginning in 1607 as a commercial centre by the Earl outside the City walls along the increasingly fashionable Strand. The building had sparked an outcry from City merchants who feared that 'if such a work be erected, the situation of the place... being near unto the Court of Whitehall in the midst of the nobility and where much of the gentry lodge... will have such advantages' that the Royal Exchange already extant within the City will be rendered 'of no use for salesmen at all'. Undaunted by the City's protests, Salisbury proceeded with his plan and commissioned Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones to prepare an entertainment, costing £179, to greet James I and his family, all of whom attended the opening of the building on April 11, 1609. Jonson's text for this most unusual entertainment—a court-sponsored celebration promoting commerce in London—affirms the appeal to his élite audience of exotic items from faraway places. However, the tradesmen importing and selling such goods are portrayed with implicit scepticism. A merchant displaying his wondrous inventory to the august audience is as much charlatan as wizard, and he bluntly describes his competitors 'about the town' as stocking their shelves with counterfeit goods and 'trash'. London citizens are unambiguous figures of fun: another character ridicules their ignorant curiosity about the construction of the New Exchange by describing at length the 'quotidian torture that I have endured... from my great cousin the multitude'.

The triumphs of Honor and Industry.

290 not forgetting the faithful care and industry of my well approved friend, Master Henry Wilde, and Master Jacob Challoner, partners in the business. The season cuts me off; and after this day's trouble I am as willing to take my rest.

A sampling of his services and their cost: 'for a great square banner of the Prince's arms within the sunbeams of gold', £7; for mending the Company's banner, 5s.;

for 'the new painting and gilding of 10 trumpet banners at 4s. a piece', £2; for mending '24 trumpet banners', £1. 4s.; 'for painting and gilding of 2 long pennants of the Lord Mayor's arms on callico', £2. 13s. 4d.; 'for painting and gilding of 8 other pennants on callico with the arms of the City, Company, England, and Scotland', £8. Challoner and two companions were also involved in the actual pageant: they received 13s.

4d. 'for the ordering, marshalling, and setting forth of the banners, streamers, and other silk works and for looking to them and for their pains all that day'. The Grocers were concerned that Challoner, along with other non-guildmembers essential to the pageant's success, be distinctively costumed: £1. 1s. 4d was spent on 16 ells of taffeta 'for scarves for the fencers, marshals and Jacob Challoner'.

Orazio Busino's Eyewitness Account of The Triumphs of Honour and Industry

Translated and annotated by Kate D. Levin

Public solemnity in the manner of a triumph for the City of London's chief magistrate, known as 'my Lord Mayor', held for the enjoyment of the populace shortly after his election.

5 For a good understanding of this supreme judicial office, you need to know that in addition to the absolute power of His Majesty the King, there exists in London a head of that city's government. The city itself is more like a republic of merchants than anything else: idlers are banished, and noblemen and foreigners are excluded from 10 its government. All the houses on the major streets, with the exception of a few mansions, are shops of a variety of tradesmen, and each house has its own sign or trademark like an inn. Anyone who wants to attain

the eminent position of the Lord Mayorship must start 15 in youth by working for seven years, bareheaded, in the shop of a tradesman whose business he wants to learn, just to acquire the title 'apprentice'. Then he can open his own shop, and with earnings from trade or other 20 good fortune, increase his capital to the sum of 200,000 ducats—at which point he is eligible for this august office. First, though, he has to have served as sheriff, which is to say as a kind of criminal magistrate, and also as an alderman, which is like a senator. Hundreds of such 25 children exist in this little world of London, and, because it costs so much and a new person must be chosen each year, anyone of them might be elected to the office. Moreover, anyone with a clear head flees the opportunity

Title Orazio Busino Busino was chaplain to Pietro Contarini, appointed the Venetian ambassador to England in 1617. Accompanied by Busino, Contarini arrived in England in October of that year. His chief commission was to enlist England's support for Venice against Spanish-sanctioned (and funded) efforts to invade and annex the Venetian republic. Busino's obvious and ardent anti-Spanish sentiments have much to do with that country's predatory attitude towards his own. This eyewitness account of The Triumphs of Honour and Industry is not an official dispatch; it does not have the status of a diplomatic relazione. Instead, Busino's observations about English personalities and customs were written for the enjoyment of Contarini's brothers back home. In late 1618 Busino left England with Contarini, who had been appointed his country's ambassador to Spain.

I triumph The classical Roman triumphal entry honouring military victories was revived in fifteenth-century Italy to welcome important visitors (usually royal or noble) and celebrate major civic and religious festivals. The defining feature of these triumphs was the use of elaborate chariots representing historical or allegorical scenes. Middleton's use of 'triumph' in the titles of most of his Lord Mayor's pageants plays on this sense of the word as a lavish continental form of entertainment associated with the wealthy and powerful. Busino's description of Honour and Industry as being 'in the style of a triumph' affirms the Grocers' own aspirations for the event: the expenditures for 1617 are described in the wardens' account book as 'concerning matters of Triumph'.

10-11 noblemen . . . government Only those who had earned the 'freedom of the City' were eligible for election to one of the City's governing bodies (see Industry 12, note regarding the 'freedom').

16-18 seven years . . . the title 'apprentice' In fact, the title for youths during those seven years of work was 'apprentice'.

16 bareheaded an indication of subservience
20-1 200,000 ducats £50,000; one ducat was worth 5s. Although fortunes of this size were not unheard of among London's élite, Busino exaggerates in asserting that this amount was prerequisite for selection as Lord Mayor (see note to 28-9 below, and Industry 12, note).

28-9 flees . . . enormous The financial burdens of the mayoralty on its incumbent had historically been substantial. A petition from 1535 asking that the households of the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs be combined 'at an expense of not less than £1600' was an early, but by no means the only, effort to scale back the costs of these positions. An Act of Common Council passed in 1555, again attempting to redress the problem, acknowledged that 'almost all good Citizens fly and refuse to serve'. At the time of Honour and Industry's composition, the Lord Mayor's expenses, in addition to numerous acts of public generosity, included the food, lodging and most of the liveries of an official household consisting of thirty or so functionaries. The cost of feeding such a household, in addition to the Lord Mayor's own family, was by itself enormous. Upon the death in office of Lord Mayor Thomas Skinner in 1596, the Court of Aldermen allotted £10 to be distributed among his official retinue as reimbursement for meals that had not been provided in the relatively brief interim before the installation of the new Lord Mayor. The price of acquiring a suitable dwelling could also be astronomical. Sir James Pemberton, Lord Mayor in 1610-11, spent £4000-5000 on this alone. London's Common Council helped to defray the Lord Mayor's house-keeping expenses in different ways over the years. For example, during a period in the 1580s the Council switched from annual donations of 4 tuns of wine (one tun equalled 252 gallons) to payments of £40. The Council also allocated substantial sums for 'decorations'. Individual guilds were apparently expected to help member Lord Mayors establish their households. George Bolles seems to have spared his colleagues this burden, since Grocers' Company accounts record £2 'paid and given in benevolence to certain officers of the Lord Mayor's house, in 30 because the expenditure is so enormous as the position requires hosting elaborate public festivals for an entire year. The Lord Mayor is set up as monarch by the twelve heads of companies of very picked men, extremely wealthy and experienced, and within these twelve are placed and 35 subordinated another sixty companies comprising all the mechanical arts, however humble. On public occasions company members wear gowns reaching the ground, with slight differences which will be described at another time so as not to postpone recounting the style used on the day of the triumph for the new Lord Mayor, which took 40 place on November 8. His Excellency received a private invitation to see the first part of the triumph, the water show, which features ships, galleons, brigantines, large boats and barges as long as a galley. This all takes place on the River Thames, beginning near the Lord Mayor's house and heading toward the King's palace or court, where 45 he swears his oath of fealty. The incumbent made his progress with the greatest possible pomp he could devise, always alluding to his line of trade with huge expenditure, which in truth exceeds that of a petty or medium duke. At a very early hour His Excellency arrived at the house of a 50 nobleman with a fine and commodious view from a dock on the Thames. This river flows the length of the City like our Grand Canal in Venice, but the width is like that of the Giudecca Canal. We watched as a large flotilla, including the big vessels already mentioned, made an appearance 55 accompanied by innumerable small boats of sightseers—like the gondolas that swarm around the Bucintoro. The ships were very beautifully decorated, their balustrades festooned with various paintings, huge banners and an infinite number of pennants. Accompanied by thundering 60 regard his Lordship took no money of the bachelors'.

Not surprisingly, financial ruin was an occasional consequence of office. Richard Martin, who served as sheriff for a year (1581–82) and as mayor for parts of two terms (1589, 1594), spent £7000 on these offices; in 1602 he was removed from the Court of Aldermen 'on account of his unfitting demeanour and carriage'—euphemisms, as it turns out, for his poverty and imprisonment for debt. His colleagues had apparently given him 1,000 marks (£667) as a condition of his resignation from office, which he then refused to do. In 1621, Sir Francis Jones's 'failing' was the talk of London. According to the indefatigable letter writer John Chamberlain, Jones, 'the night before he should have accompanied his successor to Westminster did sgombrare, conveying all of worth out of his house, and himself with his wife into some secret corner in the country, where ever since he has played least in sight. He is one of the farmers [of the customs] and always esteemed a man of great wealth. Howsoever it falls out that . . . many men [are] like to lose great sums by him.'

The office of Lord Mayor was only one among several positions that prominent Londoners sought to avoid. Individuals selected as Aldermen frequently paid fines averaging £500 rather than undertake the more costly duties of office. The merchant Sir Thomas Myddelton, the subject of The Triumphs of Truth (1613), agreed to serve as Alderman upon his election in 1603 only after being imprisoned in Newgate for refusing either to take office or pay a fine. Myddelton's confinement took place even though James I petitioned for his release on the grounds that his position as Surveyor of Customs exempted him from 'private service'. The acceptance of fines in lieu of service seems to have caused particular difficulty in filling the office of Sheriff. In 1613, twelve persons were elected and refused to serve; 1614 saw eleven refusals. This breakdown of civic-mindedness—or increase in cost-consciousness—on the part of London's guildmembers is registered in Munday's 1614 pageant text, Himatia-poleos, The Triumphs of Old Drapery. In an outburst of fraternal pride, Munday, himself a draper, notes that 'when many solemn meetings have been made in the Guildhall, for election of a Sheriff by common consent, and as many refusals still happening day by day . . . ; yet when no one would undergo the office and charge, a draper has done it, worthily and willingly'. Even the guilds themselves had to threaten members with stiff fines for refusing to be elevated to the next—and more costly—rung of membership. The Merchant Taylors' 1613 ordinances charged members unwilling to serve as Wardens £50.

31–4 twelve heads . . . sixty companies The Lord Mayor was chosen annually from London's Court of Aldermen, all of whose members belonged to a craft guild, or company. The twelve largest and wealthiest of these companies—the Mercers, Grocers, Drapers, Fishmongers, Goldsmiths, Skinners, Merchant Taylors, Haberdashers, Salters, Ironmongers, Vintners, and Clothworkers—supplied the vast majority of Aldermen throughout this period. The near-monopoly of the larger guilds on elective positions is partially due to the tradition, almost always observed, whereby members of the sixty or so smaller guilds obtained membership in one of the twelve 'great' companies upon election as Aldermen.

Translation to membership in one of the twelve companies was an absolute requirement upon election to the Lord Mayorship.

40 November 8 Busino is using the Gregorian calendar, adopted by Roman Catholic countries in 1582 at the behest of Pope Gregory XIII. Until 1752 England remained on the Julian calendar, which, in 1617, was ten days behind the Gregorian. By English calculations, the Lord Mayor's pageant took place on October 29.

 57 Bucintoro The Bucintoro (ship of gold) was an elaborately decorated barge used by the Doge of Venice for the annual enactment of Venice's 'marriage with the sea'. This rite, performed as part of Ascension Day festivities, included the throwing of a golden wedding band into the waters around the Lido. The Englishman Thomas Coryate, who visited Venice in 1608, described the Bucintoro as 'a thing of marvellous worth, the richest galley of all the world; for it cost one hundred thousand crowns which is thirty thousand pound sterling. A work so exceeding glorious that I never heard or read of the like in any place of the world, these only excepted, viz: that of Cleopatra, which she so exceeding sumptuously adorned with cables of silk and other passing beautiful ornaments; and those that the Emperor Caligula built with timber of cedar and poops and stems of ivory.' With a surge of patriotism, Coryate adds, 'lastly that most incomparable and peerless ship of our gracious Prince called the Prince Royal . . . doth by many degrees surpass this Bucintoro of Venice, and any ship else (I believe) in Christendom.'

65 canon and fireworks, a very numerous and well-appointed group of musicians sang and played on fifes, drums, and other instruments. They were rowed swiftly upriver with the swelling tide, to the constant peal of firing ordnance. We saw the aforementioned barges carrying stages highly decorated with various devices, which later served as triumphal cars on the city's main thoroughfare. When the fleet arrived at a certain point it received a booming salute from the sakers, and a greater one when 70 the Lord Mayor disembarked at the dock near the court of Parliament where, as I have said, he takes his oath before the appointed judges. Amazed by all this, we then went to the house of a respected goldsmith on the main street in the most beautiful part of the city, where we had been assigned windows from which to see more of the show. While the procession was being ordered we gazed up and down the street. The houses have many high vantage points and all the façades are entirely of windows, glazed from one side to the other. They were filled with the handsomest faces, like so many beautiful paintings, with varied headtires and rich clothing of every colour, including silver and gold. Two lone ugly faces marred the charming view—and I say this apart from our natural loathing of the nation—two Spaniards: badly dressed, emaciated, with sunken eyes, ugly as ogres. We couldn't avoid catching glimpses of them from time to time as we gazed at the nearby English ladies who, by comparison, were all the more radiant. Looking below us onto the street we saw a huge mass of people, surging like the sea, moving here and there in search of places to watch or rest—which proved impossible because of the constant press of newcomers. It was a chaotic mixture: dotards; insolent youths and children, especially of that race of apprentices I mentioned earlier; beribboned serving wenches; lower-class women with their children in their arms: all were there to see the beautiful show. We saw few carriages about, and fewer horsemen; only a few carrying ladies to watch the procession from the houses of close friends or relatives on the street, because the insolence of the crowd is extreme. They swing up onto the back of carriages, and if one of the drivers turns on them with his whip, they jump to the ground and hurl stinking mud at him. We saw them dirty the beautiful livery of a coachman in exactly this way; one must have patience. No one unsheathes a sword in these great tumults: everything resolves itself with kicks and punches and muddy faces. A perpetual shower of firecrackers rained from the windows onto the seething crowd, popping mischievously under everyone's clothes and faces and between their legs. The children fight with each other to collect the squibs off the ground once they are extinguished. Looking up again

64-5 firing ordnance John Kellocke was paid £32. 10s. 'for the whole charge of the... [barge] and a galley, and for his service with men, shot, powder, cassocks, colours and all other necessaries for them.'

69 salute from the sakers Sakers were small cannon. Robert Bevis Connor received £31 'for the charge of six score chambers, twice shot off'.

73-4 main street... city Goldsmiths' Row, a stretch of properties in Cheapside controlled by the Goldsmiths' Company and leased to members of that guild, like Busino's host. Stow described the Row as 'the most beautiful frame of fair houses and shops that be within the walls of London, or elsewhere in England', and one foreign visitor was impressed by the 'great treasures and vast amount of money [which] may be seen here'. From their window in the Row, the Venetian party would have had an excellent view of the pageant's progress along Cheapside to Guildhall. It seems from his account that Busino does not actually see one of the devices performed for the Lord Mayor; rather, he is describing the entire procession in motion. Nonetheless, it is clear that the actors, dancers, and musicians on each pageant wagon continue to perform as they move through the streets.

75 assigned windows It usually fell to the King's Master of Ceremonies to find suitable vantage points for visiting diplomats who wished to see the procession through Cheapside. A fee of £3 was expected by householders for the use of their windows when the ambassadors themselves paid. When the King paid, as he often did for 'extraordinary' ambassadors (foreign emissaries of the highest rank sent on specific, usually short-term missions), the rate was £5.

at windows farther down the street, we saw various young men mingling with lovely damsels and, in our naïvete, we thought that these were brothers or husbands for the protection of each young lady. We were told, however, that, to the contrary, these men were their servants, which is to say in plain language, their lovers and favourites, granted great intimacy and many liberties. Foreigners in London are little liked, not to say hated, so those who are wise take care to dress in the English style or that of France, which has been adopted by the court, and make themselves understood by signs whenever they can avoid speaking, and so they avoid mishaps. Only the Spanish nation choose the prerogative of dressing in their own fashion, and are therefore easily recognized and mortally hated. Some of us saw a wretched woman enraged against a man thought to belong to the Catholic Ambassador's household. She aroused the crowd to persecute him, leading the way by striking him with a bunch of greens while calling him 'Spanish rogue'. And although he was already dressed very finely, his clothes were further embroidered in a nasty manner with a kind of soft, fetid mud found at all times in such quantity that this city would better be called 'Lorda' than 'Londra'. And if the don hadn't saved himself in a shop, they would certainly have torn out his eyes. So much are the haughty Spaniards detested that they are considered harpies in this country; it seems to me that they are not as well known elsewhere. The companies of gownsmen now began to appear. Their purpose was merely to line the sides of the streets, but they were accompanied by footmen and other officers to protect them from the press of the crowd. Their gowns were like doctoral robes, or like those of the Doge, with sleeves very wide from the shoulders and lined with various materials like plush, velvet, marten, feathers, a beautiful kind of badger, and also sable. These gownsmen were members of the apothecaries' guild from which the present Lord Mayor derives. Several different marching groups numbering over a thousand all together wore a kind of pouch over the left shoulder, half of red cloth and half of black, in the shape I've sketched in the margin. Other gownsmen wore long robes and pouches of red damask; these members were younger than the first and had to wait at table during the banquet. Others wore gowns with all red shoulders; still others wore small stoles at their throats. To assist the proceedings and clear a pathway in the street, a constable on horseback, with a gold chain around his neck and two footmen in livery, weaved up and down; he was so large and plump that, we 113-18 in our naïvete... liberties Note that the Italians, stock figures of lascivious immorality in the plays of Middleton and his contemporaries, are shocked by the behaviour of these English ladies and their gallants.

128 Catholic Ambassador's This ostensibly peculiar reference to a Spanish diplomat as the 'Catholic Ambassador'—Busino was himself a Catholic chaplain of the Catholic Ambassador from Venice—is understandable in light of the Venetian Republic's long history of challenges to papal authority. As recently as 1606, the pope had excommunicated the Venetian government and interdicted its territories for failing to exempt Catholic clergymen from civil laws and church property from taxation. However, despite enormous pressure brought to bear on the Republic, the papal interdict completely failed to curb Venice's ideological independence and was revoked in less than a year, following a series of face-saving manoeuvres by a papal envoy. In calling Spain's ambassador 'the Catholic Ambassador', Busino registers Venetian hostility towards Spain for its powerful support of papal orthodoxy.

145-6 various materials... sable The garments worn by those in the procession were part of a sartorial code that distinguished levels of guild and civic office (see Industry 10-11, note). An order from 1562 stipulates that bachelors of the Grocers Company should not 'wear any kinds of furs in their gowns, but only foynes', or marten, 'and budge', or sheepskin. The use of velvet in their gowns is carefully restricted, and they are prohibited 'any unreasonable ruffs in their shirts, but only black and white; their doublets to be of black satin, and they with coats or jackets of satin or damask, and of no other colour'. By contrast, the Wardens are 'to wear russet satin in their doublets'. At various events during the year London's Aldermen wore their violet or scarlet gowns, 'lined' or 'furred' depending on the season, often in combination with similarly coloured cloaks. The Lord Mayor's installation called for the 'scarlet gown, furred'. Aldermen who had 'passed the chair' or served as Lord Mayor were entitled to wear 'grey amis'—hoods of grey fur (probably badger)—while Alderman who had not yet been Mayor could wear 'calabre' or squirrel fur.

147 apothecaries' guild In identifying Bolles as an apothecary, not a grocer, Busino touches on a controversy then at its apogee. Apothecaries had long been part of the Grocers' company, which had jurisdiction over the sale of drugs. However, increasing complaints about the quality of pharmaceuticals and the competence of those administering them led King James to take a personal interest in the Apothecaries' 1614 petition for a separate charter. Despite vociferous protests by the Grocers, the charter was granted on December 6, 1617.

150-2 pouch... in the margin Busino is describing a vestige of medieval guild livery. According to Stow, this garment is 'a memory of the hoods of old time... made in colours according to... [the companies'] gowns, which were of two colours, as red and blue or red and purple...; but now of late time they have used their gowns to be all of one colour, and those of the saddest, but their hoods being made the one half of the same cloth their gowns be of, the other half remaineth red as of old time.'

154 wait at table A group of bachelors acted as the Lord Mayor's serving gentlemen on feast days throughout the year.

157 constable The Grocers paid £4 to Roger Walrond, 'marshal of this city... in respect of his service and attendance with his men on the day'. Walrond seems to have been in charge of more general matters of crowd control, while George Bell and his ten assistants (see Industry 24 I-2, note) were primarily concerned with ordering the pageant and Company members. In addition, whiffers, young freemen of the Company, helped to clear the way and keep back the crowds. The Grocers purchased '24 dozen of white staves' for £4. 17s. 8d. to be distributed among 'the whiffers, the marshals and their men', and the porters charged with carrying the pageant and attending the Company at Guildhall.

160 agreed without hesitation, he was of the genuine porcine race of Bacchus. A number of robust youths and men also managed to clear the way with their fencing swords, which they brandished about with much dexterity; but 165 as soon as one part of the street was freed of people, the crowd closed in on another. Some men masked as wild giants strode through the crowd with wheels and fireballs, hurling sparks here and there at the bodies and faces of the multitude, but to no avail in making a wide and clear route for the procession. The first stages which appeared were harnessed to hippogriffs, each one ridden 170 by a child dressed in silk livery; others followed with lions, camels, and other equally large animals, laden with bales from which the children threw various confections to the crowd. These animals were yoked by silk cords and pulled the triumphal cars. The first car represented 175 a very beautiful wood with fruit atop its trees, peopled by children dressed like Indians, with long hair on their heads and tinted faces, as if naked, with a little apron from which hung plumes, or more exactly red and variously coloured bird feathers. In addition, there were two pastoral 180 figures with fifes, one dressed head to foot in red feathers and the other wrapped in a tiger skin, as if they were man and wife. They played very well in the Indian manner as the children danced with much grace and many varied gestures, using their entire bodies—hands, 185 head, and feet—turning in good measure around the trees, changing from one position to the next in a way that amazed everybody. After that followed other large and handsome stages, one of which represented, as far as I could understand, the Indians' religion of the sun 190 above a grouping of various other figures. Another stage

161-2 robust youths...swords Payment of £7 was made to 'John Bradshaw, fencer, for himself and 18 fellow flourishers with long swords for their service'. (See Industry 291-2, note, regarding the distinctive dress of fencers and marshals.)

166-7 wild giants...fireballs The use of 'giants' or 'greenmen' hurling firecrackers into the crowd was a time-honoured method of clearing a pathway for the oncoming procession. Part of Middleton's fee in 1617 included the hiring of 'greenmen, devils, and fire works'. The efforts of one of these individuals seems to have been particularly appreciated:
 the Grocers paid 11s. 'in benevolence to the fireman or greenman over and above his agreement'.

170-2 hippogriffs...camels Busino is describing the griffins and camels, featured in the Grocers' Company coat of arms, which were a regular part of companysponsored pageants. 'Hippogriffs' were not, however, mere griffins. Memorable features of Ariosto's epic romance Orlando Furioso, hippogriffs had the body and legs of a horse. Busino's choice of words thus indicates something about his familiarity with Italian literature; it also suggests that the fantastic animals referred to here were almost always in fact cloth, lath and plaster constructions costuming more mundane beasts—usually horses—which were frequently used to pull pageant wagons through the streets. Alternatively, pageant devices sometimes included animal statuary carrying performers (see the 'King of the Moors' illustration for Triumphs of Truth,

 p. 972).

173 various confections The Grocers spent £5. 7s. 8d. for '50 sugar loaves, 36 pounds of nutmegs, 24 pounds of dates, and 114 pounds of ginger, which were thrown about the streets by those which sat on the griffins and camels'.

177 dressed like Indians While these Indians are definitely meant to represent inhabitants of the 'East Indies', their resemblance to North American Indians may reflect the confusion and lack of specificity associated with the term

 'Indian' during this period. In the 1614 edition of Purchas, His Pilgrimage, Samuel Purchas explains that 'The name of India is now applied to all far distant countries, not in the extreme limits of Asia alone;
 but even to whole America, through the error of Columbus and his fellows; who at their first arrival in the western world, thought that they had met with Ophir and the Indian regions of the east.'

190 Indians' religion of the sun This is probably a misreading of the second device Middleton describes: India seated on the chariot with Industry at her side, holding a golden ball. The sun was believed to be the object of religious devotion by the 'Indians' of North America as well as those encountered in the East India trade. George Chapman and Inigo Jones's
The Memorable Masque, staged at Court as part of the 1613 nuptial celebrations for Princess Elizabeth and the Elector Palatine, had featured 'the Phoebades', a group of sun-worshipping 'Virginians'.

carried a very beautiful castle; another was a fine ship, apparently returning from the Indies with cargo and crew aboard. Other stages carried the figures of Trade, and the nations which traffic with the Indies. Among these, a Spaniard was perfectly impersonated, the gestures of his nation expertly mimicked, with small black mustachios, hat and cape after the Spanish fashion, a ruff at the throat and little palm-length muffs on his hands. He was continually blowing kisses to the onlookers; but to the Spanish Ambassador, who was a short distance from us, he did it to such a superlative degree that the entire crowd roared with laughter. After this triumphant fleet the Archbishop of Canterbury appeared on horseback, which is to say the Pope of England. He was on the right, the country's principal baron was on his left, and before them marched forty gentlemen on foot wearing gold chains around their necks. There were mace-bearers, footmen, and other officers wearing coats of black velvet with the rose, the imprese of the kingdom, richly embroidered on the back in gold and silk. Then followed in pairs the earls, marquises and other lords and treasurers of the realm. After that came various banners, including one especially large one with its panels smoothed, carried by four or six men who supported the staff with other staves attached to it; others carried the long tail of this banner. It really was a splendid spectacle. All these banners bore the insignia of the Lord Mayor's company; all the other companies have different banners of their own. Following this came fifty old men in liveries of long peacock blue gowns with red caps and sleeves, each holding a javelin. At night these same men carry torches to the Lord Mayor's doorway. After these came a big man wearing a red hat, large as a basket, and holding a very beautiful gilded rapier. He was followed closely by two little children, immaculately dressed, each carrying a small staff topped with flowers. Finally we saw his Excellency the Lord Mayor, on a barded horse, in a red gown and chain of gold around his neck, over which was a large order like the Fleece, given in earlier times by a king to a Lord Mayor for having uncovered a conspiracy and killed the oppressor. This order is all of gold with a very large and precious jewel. Fifteen or twenty aldermen then followed on horseback all dressed in red gowns like the Lord Mayor's; those with gold chains around their necks had previously held that 192 fine ship The 'Ship', featured prominently in the pageant's accounts, is not specifically mentioned in Middleton's text. A ship appears in a great number of Lord Mayor's shows, and it has been suggested that such standard or subsidiary features (along with lions and camels) were originally referred to as 'devices' while the term 'pageant' was reserved for especially elaborate inventions or those specific to a particular show or occasion. Since Middleton has not given the ship's occupants any speeches in Industry, he does not feel compelled to describe it. This explanation would seem to be supported by the reference to tradition in the Grocers' accounts regarding the musicians aboard the ship: they 'were present in the show according to the accustomed manner'. These musicians included thirty-two of his Majesty's Trumpeters and 'a boy to sound in the ship'; the group received a lump sum of £26, while the Sergeant Trumpeter got a separate fee of 11s. Another child, 'a little boy which played on the drum in the ship', received 12s.; he too was contracted for as part of a professional adult group, who would appear to be the same ones described in lines 61-3 of Busino's account. These '8 drums and 4 fifes', supplying their own costumes of 'black hats, white doublets, black hose and white stockings and with scarves according to the colour' of the Grocer's Company, collectively received £12. 11s.

200-1 the Spanish Ambassador Don Diego Sarmiento de Acuña, known as Count Gondomar, the inspiration for the Black Knight in A Game at Chess.

213 various banners Under the heading 'mercery wares for banners and other things' the Grocers' accounts record payment of £6. 12s. for '7 yards of crimson damask', £8 for '20 ells of taffeta sarsenet, at 8s. per ell', and £10. 16s. 11d. for '59 dozen of crimson and white ribbon of all sorts' (see also Industry 291-2, note).

214-16 four or six men... others Sixteen 'poor men', recipients of the Company's alms, were paid 5s. each 'for their service in carrying of the streamers, banners, and other things, in respect they had no coats'. Ten others 'of the said banner and streamer bearers which had coats' got 1s. each 'for their dinners'.

215 other staves 'Two new banner staves' were purchased for 8s.

220 peacock blue gowns The livery worn by these 'fifty old men'—also almsmen—was apparently the same as that worn by the banner and streamer bearers. The Grocers paid £159. 4s. 6d. 'to divers clothworkers' for '18 azure coloured cloths for the poor men's gowns', and this fabric was used to make '124 gowns, after 12d. a piece'—a total of £6. 4s. paid 'to divers tailors'.

220-1 red caps and sleeves Thomas Hinkman, 'capper', received £18. 3d. for '10 dozen of round caps, and 5 dozen and

3 long caps'. Roger Clarke, a mercer, received £10 for '10 pieces of crimson mochado to make sleeves for the poor men, and to face the beadles', streamer- and banner-bearers' coats'. The mochado, a kind of silk, was then turned over to 'divers tailors' to make '124 pair of sleeves, at 2d. a piece' (a total of £1. 8d.).

221 javelin The Grocers paid £1. 13s. 4d. for 'the hire of 124 javelins'.

223-4 big man... rapier The Mayor's Swordbearer and head of his official household.

228 barded armoured chain of gold Presumably the 'rich collar of gold, to be worn by the Mayor', given to the City of London by Sir John Allen, a Mercer and Lord Mayor in 1525 and 1535.

229 the Fleece A reference to the ornament worn by the knights of the Golden Fleece, an order of knighthood associated with the Catholic faith, instituted at Bruges in 1430 by Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy.

230-1 a Lord Mayor... oppressor Busino here is referring to that paragon of civic heroism, Sir William Walworth, a Lord Mayor and fishmonger whose slaying of Wat Tyler in 1381 saved the kingdom for Richard II. Munday's 1616 pageant, Chrysanaleia: The Golden Fishing, features the awakening of Walworth from his tomb to address his distant successor as Lord Mayor.

240 office. Last in line on horseback were the two sheriffs, dressed in slightly different red gowns, with small gold chains around their necks. These two have been chosen to administer justice in London for the present year as officials of this Lord Mayor. All of this fine company were to enjoy the bounty, and they were followed by an endless troop of scavengers, sticking like a tail to the procession, all of whom also expect to participate in the very sumptuous feast that begins today and continues with open doors for an entire year. Let this serve as a close for the illustrious gentlemen so as not to be as protracted as the long itinerary already described; making them most humble reverence and thanks.

245

236 two sheriffs The Lord Mayor's appointee was Robert Johnson, a grocer; the Sheriff elected by the Common Council (often referred to as election 'by common consent') was William Halliday, a mercer. Halliday had refused the shrievalty in 1614, the same year he became a Committee member of the East India Company. He was a governor of that Company from 1621-24 (see note to 28-9 above for refusals of civic office, and Industry 241-2, note, regarding the selection of sheriffs).

245 open doors . . . entire year The munificent hospitality of London's Lord Mayor impressed a number of foreigners. Paul Hentzner of Brandenburg, travelling through England in 1598, noted that during 'the year of his magistracy' the Lord Mayor 'is obliged to live so magnificently that foreigner or native, without any expense, is free, if he can find a chair empty, to dine at his table, where there is always the greatest plenty.' In fact, the City's generosity to foreign notables was often under orders from the Crown. In addition to feasting important visitors, the Lord Mayor was periodically directed to obtain, and occasionally pay for, housing for foreign diplomats. The difficulties of such a task can be inferred from the Privy Council's letter of January 9, 1617, requiring the Lord Mayor to 'take present order for some fair and convenient house . . . within the city' for the French ambassador, 'and to cause the same to be furnished with hangings, bedding, and all other furniture necessary for such a purpose. And if perhaps you cannot find room sufficient in any one house for the lodging of all his company, which we conjecture may require some eighteen or twenty beds . . . , you shall in that case do well to take up so many lodgings in some good houses near adjoining to the place where the ambassador shall be, as shall serve the turn.'

246 illustrious gentlemen The brothers of Busino's patron; see note to Title above.

THE OWL'S ALMANAC

Edited by Neil Rhodes

THE almanac, with its prognostication of forthcoming events, has an ancient pedigree. Edmund in The Tragedy of King Lear is sarcastic about his father's belief in dire astrological predictions, and the Fool, who offers his own burlesque of such fateful documents, tells us that he is living before the time of Merlin. If we are willing to accept the Fool's chronology then these must be the earliest prognostication and mock-prognostication recorded in Britain. At the other end of the spectrum, if you want to be ahead of next year's events you can buy a copy of Old Moore's Almanack in the UK or The Farmer's Almanac in the US from your local newsagent or railway bookstall. So while almanacs are among the most topical, socially specific, and ephemeral of all publications, the almanac itself seems timeless.

The Owl's Almanac (1618) is the most elaborate and also the cleverest parody of the early printed almanac.

These publications were enormously popular in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, as we can see from the fact that the Stationers' Company closely guarded the patent privilege for almanacs (as for bibles) because there was so much and such predictable demand, and the Owl stitches together a ludicrous sampler of their most familiar features: the law terms, the 'computation of time' (a sort of countdown of major events from Adam and Eve to the present which survives in the modern Timetables of History), tide predictions, the anatomy or astrological man, rules for health and profit, lists of the major fairs and highways, and finally, that indispensable calendar of 'good' and 'bad' days in the forthcoming year. The principal sources for the Owl's mockery are almanacs by Edward Pond (1609) and Thomas Bretnor (1617), two of the most prolific prognosticators in the Jacobean period and solemn exponents of the astrologer's art. Pond, for example, gives a laborious account of how to tell time by the moon, which is parodied in the Owl's opaque do-it-yourself instructions for assembling a moon-clock, while Bretnor's computation of time is redesigned by the Owl to include such notable events as the appearance of a dancing horse on the top of St Paul's. (A version of the moon-clock, incidentally, reappeared in 1757 as 'a striking sun-dial' in Benjamin Franklin's comic almanac, Poor Richard.) But perhaps the most distinctive feature of the Owl's parody is that it extends to the style as well as the substance of the serious almanac. In Sir Thomas Overbury's character of an almanac-maker we are told that 'The verses in his book have a worse pace than ever had Rochester hackney: for his prose, 'tis dappled with inkhorn terms...' (A Wife, 1614), and these ponderous neologisms are reproduced—or rather reactivated—in the bizarre verbal inventiveness of The Owl's Almanac. Another feature which the Owl pounces upon is Bretnor's liking for laconic catchphrases, presumably intended to suggest sibylline gravity but which have more the flavour of Christmas-cracker mottoes. Some of the elaborate marginalia, which are such a striking feature of Middleton's text, parody these, but others reflect the practice of almanac owners jotting down their own observations on the blank pages opposite the calendars; hence the fatuous marginal glosses from the Owl such as 'Terrible doings' (644.n) or 'No such women now' (612.n). The parody in The Owl's Almanac is certainly comprehensive when even the readers of almanacs are not spared.

The Owl's other main source is Dekker's The Raven's Almanac (1609), a mock-prognostication which the Owl directly addresses in a prefatory epistle to the Raven. Dekker himself was originally identified as the Owl, but this cannot be the case: he is hardly likely to have written a letter to himself and, besides, there are many stylistic aspects of the work which are beyond his range. Modern bibliographies acknowledge that The Owl's Almanac is not by Dekker. The author was, however, certainly part of Dekker's circle, and new research has made a strong case for Middleton's authorship: we now know that Middleton wrote Plato's Cap (1604), another mock-almanac which he put out in the same year as the brilliant Nasheian pastiche, The Black Book, and almanac parody crops up frequently in his dramatic work. In A Yorkshire Tragedy, Sam is 'the true picture of a common servingman' because he has an almanac in his pocket (1.28-9); in The Puritan Widow Pieboard's almanac is given a sarcastic going-over (3.5.239 ff.); in The Roaring Girl Laxton refers to an almanac 'calculated for the meridian of cooks' wives' (3.47-8); in Anything for a Quiet Life the barber-surgeon Sweetball is guided by his almanac (3.2.158-62); and in No Wit/Help like a Woman's Weatherwise allows his entire life to be governed by his almanac's directions. Chough's foolishness is confirmed by his reliance on Bretnor in A Fair Quarrel (5.1.131), and, most significantly, within months of the publication of The Owl's Almanac Middleton staged an almanac parody in Masque of Heroes, presided over by a Doctor Almanac and with characters representing Good Days and Bad Days appearing in the antemasque.

But perhaps the strongest pointer to Middleton's authorship of The Owl's Almanac is its stylistic virtuosity, which derives from Nashe's extraordinary experiments in comic prose technique during the 1590s. (In fact, Nashe refers to 'The Owl's Almanac which Pasquil hath undertaken to write' in two of his anti-Marprelate tracts, but no connection has been established between that and the present work.) A number of writers attempted to emulate Nashe's prose style, but Middleton was the only one to do so with real success (see Rhodes 1980). There is a eulogy to Nashe in The Ant and the Nightingale (1604), and in The Black Book Middleton writes a sequel to Pierce Penniless which manages to reproduce many of the hallmarks of Nashe's style: an intrusive authorial persona, electric rhetorical shifts, comic-grotesque physicality and, above all, a sense of pace, dexterity, and metaphoric flair. These are also the characteristics which make The Owl's Almanac as lively as any comic prose pamphlet of the Jacobean period. Most texts of this kind are consciously written documents and betray signs of a certain stylistic rigor mortis. By contrast, what preserves the Owl's vitality is his ability, like Nashe's, to mimic the rhetorical strategies of the stand-up comic in an oral rather than a written mode of discourse. This is why, when introducing Aquarius in the zodiacal line-up, the Owl explains that he will tell us his story 'admirably, though he be illiterate and unlearned' (1057-8), and this is why at various points the text seems to be theatrically conceived. There is audience presence: 'Nay, but there be more tormentors of my kind coming. Draw the curtains of your eyes and see' (1082-4), and there is digressive patter: 'In good faith, 'tis strange, my masters, to my sense: a couple of fishes (I'll tell you their names as they fall better into my knowledge) come leaping over the fallows like pepper in a mortar...' (1086-9). There is a variety of characters: witness the appearance of the mincing, petulant twins after the 'ram-headed oration' of Aries and the 'bull-headed oration' of Taurus, or the sudden intrusion of the fine lady in the prognostication for chandlers: 'Fah! What a gross light is this! In truth, Sir Timothy, it condenses the wit and stupefies the brain; pray let our flames be wax...' (2119-21). And behind them, running the show, is the Owl himself, commenting on the proceedings with such pointless observations as 'This is very likely' (824.n; these, as we saw, also parody the almanac owner's annotation) or remarking self-consciously on his own style: 'The spring is like a piece of powdered beef... I mean when 'tis but slenderly boiled... or else the simile holds not' (1309-15). Certainly, the Owl is adept at doing the police in different voices.

One of the curious aspects of the pamphlet, then, is that it is on the one hand an elaborately designed parody of a printed document, in which the typography and page layout have a comic function, and on the other hand something that is very much a performance. The first aspect provides Middleton's text with a structure, a set of limits and forms, into which he pours and contains the free-floating verbal play of Nashe. The second aspect, however, serves to underline another Nasheian characteristic, which is the rapid fluctuation in stylistic register. We are told, for instance, that Prometheus loved 'a pretty damosel that dwelt under the immortal canopy in this cold horizon, which made his virgin in frosty congealing mornings look like Vespasian, as if she had been wringing at a hard stool' (540-5). The sudden, deflating switch from the lyrical opening of the sentence to the picture of a Roman emperor straining on his chamber-pot is hilarious, and immediately reminiscent of Nashe (face-wrinkling metaphors also happen to be a Nasheian speciality). Switches of this kind are not, however, confined to a lowering of tone. In a remarkable passage on the origin of the human heart, the Owl describes how it was pumped into action by fear: 'the poor heart with very thought of the terrifying beast drives itself with a continual systole and diastole, like the clack of a mill or a sun-sucked leaf chained to a spider's twine. Yet I have not read that before that time it ever stirred' (875-9). This is imaginative writing of real quality. The physiological terms, which it is surprising to find being used as early as 1618, are suddenly translated into metaphors which capture brilliantly the clatter of the palpitations, driven as if under the pressure of escape, and at the same time the delicacy and fragility of the vital organ, the parched and chained leaf imaging the prison of mortality. This is not only imaginatively crafted, but sensitive.

Throughout The Owl's Almanac there is experimentation in the Nasheian mode, and it is the metaphorical scatter which gives the text its distinctive verbal texture.

This may take the form of compound coinages such as 'ghost-groping' (948) for Pluto, god of the underworld, or 'cranny-lighted' (1738) for the dimly lit corners of the haberdasher's workshop; and this kind of formulation can also serve for metonymic epithets in such inventions as 'marrow-melting luminists' (chandlers, or candlemakers) and 'pale-bodied blazers' (candles) (2135-6). There is a fair number of more pedantic coinages, the 'inkhornisms' which, according to Overbury, 'dappled' the pages of the serious almanac ('dimidiate', 460; 'saxifies', 1079; 'inaulated', 1672; 'labecutable', 1748). There are grotesque but ingenious similes, as in the picture of Cancer, 'like a waterman in a boat, his arse toward the place to which he was going; he looked like a piece of Hebrew spelled the wrong way' (787-90), and there is in general a suppleness in the language of the text which makes it responsive to the physical characteristics of its subjects: Capricorn, for example, is described as 'falling flat and flexible on his knees' (1012), a picture which captures precisely the goat's emblematic posture.

Concentrating upon the Owl's stylistic inventiveness helps us to establish the probable authorship of the pamphlet, and it also suggests why it is so successful as a parody. But does this text have any context or content? Is it simply a clever display of word-spinning? The 'contents' are indeed labelled as such at the start, and these are necessarily determined to a large extent by the contents of actual almanacs. There are, however, two original sequences in The Owl's Almanac which together account for well over half of the complete text: the story of Prometheus and the signs of the zodiac, and the set of prognostications for the London livery companies, the 'fundamental trades'. The Prometheus story is a fantastic concoction based upon the picture of astrological man which prefaced many almanacs. This shows a naked human body surrounded by the signs of the zodiac, with pointers from each sign to the part of the body which it governs. There are famous examples of the picture from the medieval period and later, but by the early seventeenth century the astrological man had become something of a figure of fun, as Dekker indicates at the start of The Raven's Almanac: 'At the beginning of every almanac it is the fashion to have the body of a man drawn as you see, and not only baited, but bitten and shot at by wild beasts and monsters... he stands as if he had been some notorious malefactor, and being stripped stark naked to go to execution'. He then compares the figure to an 'anatomy', i.e. a gallows corpse carved up by the barber-surgeons in the interests of medical science. Dekker's grim joke provides the Owl with a starting point for an elaborate aetiological fantasy or explanation of causes: what is the origin of the zodiac, and where do the parts of the body come from? (Spoof aetiologies, incidentally, are another Nasheian feature.) The Owl contends that it all begins with Prometheus's theft of fire from the gods. So far from this being a welcome piece of new technology for terrestrial life, it turns out to be a calamity for many creatures. Fire provides the means by which

Aries the ram is sheared of his fleece, Virgo polluted by the tobacco smoke of young gallants, and Capricorn the goat stigmatized as lecherous (as a result of Prometheus's kindling of sexual heat); even Aquarius bears a grudge against him on the grounds that the widespread use of fire has depleted his resources of water. So Prometheus is chained to a stake in the Caucasus and, spurred on by a punitive Jupiter, the creatures proceed in turn to bite, head-butt, sting, shoot, and generally torment their wretched victim. Various parts of the body originate from these attacks (the navel, for instance, is created by Virgo's hurling a red-hot spit at Prometheus's belly), and when the ceremony is complete Jupiter places his instruments of revenge in the sky as the zodiac.

This focus on the human body and its various members and organs supplies the Owl with a fund of the kind of comic-grotesque metaphor that we associate with Nashe, but the way in which Prometheus is presented as a victim is much more typical of Middleton. As we have seen, one of the most remarkable passages in the text is the depiction of the terror-stricken heart, and underlying the comedy of the zodiac sequence is a view from the scaffold. Prometheus 'stands shivering and shaking like a condemned caitiff that attends the fatal stroke' (651-3); he is turned into the subhuman 'like an Indian (in New Spain), stood there exposed as a fair mark for any man's fury' (660-1); and human/animal roles are reversed when he is baited at the stake by Taurus the bull. Jupiter, the author of these torments, is ambiguously presented. At one point he refers, Prospero-like, to 'the nurture of my sceptre' (866) which can limit 'boundless savageness', but in the Taurus section we are told how glad he is to see justice 'so nobly and stoutly executed on a villain' (719-20). That sounds very much like Middletonian irony. And, interestingly, in the later section on the disposition of the planets for the year, Jupiter reappears as a pseudonym for King James in a political moral about Europe, and then stands metonymically to represent kings in general. There is perhaps a hint of a Shelleyan rebel Prometheus in The Owl's Almanac.

The immediate context, however, for the Owl's handling of the Prometheus story is the Ovidian theme of the end of the Golden Age and loss of innocence. The arrival of fire on earth is a tragedy, but here principally for Prometheus himself as he stands exposed to the excoriating justice of Jupiter, and the theatricality of the text is reinforced by the fact that the entire sequence is designed in terms of the scaffold as sadistic spectacle. The scene of punishment has an audience, 'troupes and multitudes of all kinds... spreading themselves either as actors or spectators in this rueful tragedy' (1122-6). Following this sequence the Owl moves on to 'a lecture upon the four quarters, with what particular diseases hang upon every quarter' (1355-6), and then to floods and famines. The metaphor of the anatomy, or executed traitor, is extended to 'the body of the year', and so the Owl rather neatly links his tale of Prometheus to the almanac calendar itself. At this point the text changes direction—'The string of sorrow is now tuned to a merry note. Diseases, drownings, dearths and other dreary tragedies, get you from the stage' (1455–7)—and we move into the comic set of predictions for the London livery companies. Here, the timeless aspects of the almanac represented in the Owl's reworking of Ovidian myth are replaced by the topical and socially specific: this is London, this is 1618.

What also happens in the last major section of the text is that we see a return of the Golden Age. After the miseries attributed to and inflicted upon Prometheus, the London tradesmen are promised a year of milk and honey, a bonanza. Labourers will buy velvet neck-pieces from the mercers, and servants will break their masters' plate to the benefit of goldsmiths; doctors will prescribe wine from the vintners, an epidemic of rust will provide work for armourers and property developers will boost the profits of carpenters. Throughout this section there is a sense of an economy going into overdrive, as raw materials are turned into a cornucopia of saleable commodities in the way that Lorna Hutson has described in Thomas Nashe in Context. Moreover, the hectic economic activity feeds into the comic prose style, with the tradesmen conceived in terms of their own materials and products, and the products acquiring human characteristics in a riot of anthropomorphism. Pewter is a soft-natured gentleman; money will choke the throats of misers' purses; leaning buildings bow to the Lord Mayor; and tottering houses have their ribs painted. This section of The Owl's Almanac shows us an urban society at work, and in doing so emphasizes the materiality of the almanac and its parodic offspring. The almanac is concerned with time and tide, the phases of the moon and the rotation of the seasons, but it is also concerned with the body and with the fabric of economic and social life. What The Owl's Almanac ultimately gives us, in the range and vivacity of its parody, is a rich, comic panorama of Jacobean life, and in particular of the life of Middleton's London.

The Owl's Almanac

Prognosticating many strange accidents which shall happen to this kingdom of Great Britain this year 1618. Calculated as well for the meridian mirth of London as any other part of Great Britain. Found in an ivy bush written in old characters and now published in English by the painful labours of Mr Jocunday Merry-brains.

To the right worshipful and generous-minded gentleman, Sir Timothy Thornhill, Knight
Sir,

Is it not strange that an owl should write an almanac? Yet why not, as well as a crow to speak Latin to Caesar? And why not an owl prognosticate wonders which are sure to happen this year, as for astrological wizards to shoot threatening calendars out of their ink-pots at the world, and yet when they hit, their fillips hurt nothing? Lies are as well acquainted with astronomers as oaths are with soldiers, or as owing money is familiar to courtiers, but Madge Owlet fetches her predictions out of an upper room in heaven where never any common star-catcher was garreted before. Had I a bird of paradise I should gladly send her flying to you, and therefore I hope that your acceptance of this owl (though she be none of mine, but hiding her broad face under my eaves by chance) will keep petty, idle birds from wondering about her. I wish every year you are to live to begin and end with you as merrily as this prognostication takes her aim to make you, and that I may cease to be when I give over from being

Devoted ever at your worship's disposing,
L. L.

The Owl's epistle to the Raven

Brother Raven, I did ever envy the happiness of other birds when I saw them freely enjoying woods, fields, parks, forests, cities, kingdoms, and all that the moving canopy of heaven can cover,	95
--	----

as their proper cages to sing in all the day, drawing thereby audience to their bewitching music-lectures, when poor I (having more knowledge, except in song, than the proudest of them) durst never or seldom gad abroad in the light. But when I heard and beheld yourself a student in the mathematics, and by jumbling together a hotch-potch of calculations to be counted an astronomer and to paste up your name on every post in the title of a book called The Raven's Almanac, I did then more vex than ever before.

I confess you are a bird of larger wing than I am, goodlier is your proportion, piercing are your eyes, your colour so amiable that women take a pride to have hair black as a raven's; dreadful is your voice, bloody your beak, and your talons full of terror. But let your bosom be open, and then (as in some great statesmen who carry an outward-glorious show) nothing is to be found but ugliness, treachery and rapacity. But if it shall be no dishonour for me to stand on the tiptoes of mine own commendations, I would then against your ominous croaking thus far prefer my wakeful hooting that I have ever been held a predooming bird, but (besides that) an emblem of wisdom, and so sacred among the Athenians that they carried the reverence of my picture stamped upon their money.

Now (Brother Raven) as in this point I spitefully make comparisons with you, as proving myself not one to whom you may cry 'Hail fellow well met', so will I in these my Ptolemaical predictions discover to the world such wonders from the planetary regions that not only thou, but all other birds (daring to pry into the privy chamber of heaven) shall pluck in their heads (as I do until twilight) with shame, and never offer more to pester Paul's Churchyard with their trivial prognostications. I have been this year in progress with the moon, riding on the dog which the man in the moon leads, whose bush of thorns he lent me instead of a fan to keep off the wind, whilst he himself ran along by me as my footman. Much skill learned I of the moon, for she is a great light to almanac-makers, albeit in show she seem but a cold friend to them, and much mad talk had I with that lunatical fellow (the squire of her body). The twelve houses of the sun lay higher up into the country, so that, by reason my sight hath ever been bad, I had no great stomach to mount up thither, because I know the sun (who could never endure me) would have spied both a mote London are too hot for four hundred of those five hundred to tarry by it.

It hath eight returns.

1 The first return, an Essex yeoman hath a goose goes gagging into his neighbour's barn.

2 The second return, he that owns that barn wrings off the neck of this goose.

3 The third return, the goose's master ambles up to the term to a man of law, drawing out his purse as he drivels out his speech and scrapes with his hobnails for counsel how to sue in the goose's name.

4 The fourth return, he that assaulted and battered the goose gallops up too and thrashes out his silver about that goose too.

5 The fifth return, the matter comes to trial.

So that $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \text{The goose is plucked} \\ \text{The goose is roasted with delicate sauce} \\ \text{The lawyer eats the goose} \\ \text{and gives the feathers to stick the other two coxcombs} \end{array} \right\} \begin{array}{l} \text{there's the jury.} \\ \text{there's the verdict.} \\ \text{there's a judgement entered—} \\ \text{execution upon that judgement.} \end{array}$

6 The sixth return, the lawyer persuades his client it was no goose, but a gander. To it again they go.

7 The seventh return, the two Essex calves have sucked each other dry and have neither goose nor gander.

8 The eighth return, they go home like a couple of tame geese when their feathers are plucked, and are passing good friends.

Star Chamber days There are Star Chamber days in all these four terms, for the council of heaven (with the King in all his glory) sits to censure the riots of the mighty on earth oppressing the poor, the fatherless and widow, and by the royal authority of that most honourable court to guard innocence and weakness from the malice and tyranny of bloody-minded creditors, whose pleas are never heard before so high an assembly of judges.

A memorial of the time sithence some strange and remarkable accidents until this year 1617

Since the first lie was told is (as I remember) 5565 years: and that was by all computation in Adam's time, but now in these days men and women lie downright.

Since the burning of Paul's steeple many fiery faces have heated the city, but especially some catchpoles' red noses have set five hundred a-sweating coming by the Counter gate. But since the burning at Winchester (at which time no small number of geese were both plucked and powdered) many heads ache to this day to remember it, albeit it be now about twelve or thirteen years past.

Since the first making of noses chimneys, with smoking men's faces as if they were bacon and baking dried neats' tongues in their mouths.

Some almanacs talk that printing hath been in England not above 156 years, but I find in an old worm-eaten cabalistical author that sheets have been printed in this kingdom above a 1000 years before that time.

Tailors have been troubled with stitches ever since yards came up to measure women's petticoats, and that is at least ago years:

Oranges came from Seville into England above a 100 years past, but we had great store of lemons long before.

Since hot waters caused bad livers in London and her suburbs is not much above 15 or 16 years, but they never burnt out the bottom of men's purses so much until Ralph Savage gave them phlegethontical brewings and horrible necromantical names.

	3. Gemini, the twins, govern the arms and shoulders: so thieves go to the sessions two by two, arm in arm, shoulder to shoulder.	475
	4. Cancer, the crab, governs the stomach: and reason, for a crab well buttered is excellent meat.
	5. Leo, the lion, governs the heart: he that hath not the heart of a lion hath the head of an ox.	480
	6. Virgo, the virgin, governs bowels and belly and makes both cry 'O!' if they meddle too much with her government.
	7. Libra, the balance, governs the loins, for much double-dealing is done in those quarters.
	8. Scorpio, the scorpion, governs the secret parts, for those sting pockily.	485
	9. Sagittarius, the archer, governs the thighs, for between them is the sweetest shooting.
	10. Capricornus, the goat, governs the knees, for a man lecherous as a goat is brought upon his knees.	490
	11. Aquarius, the water-bearer, governs the legs; he hath a staff to help, too, and all little enough sometimes when he carries drink and water both.	495
	12. Pisces, the fishes, govern the feet, for let a man come out of any tavern in Fish Street drunk, it is so slippery with fish-water that down he comes and lies like a heap of stinking gubbins.	500
	If these twelve be not able to govern man's unruly body, then let the twelve companies of London have him to their halls and whip him. But to prove that these are strong enough to hold him, you may by the verses following perceive that the sun of these twelve makes himself a girdle in the zodiac.	505

These sum the dozen of those stars in sky
Which lend bright Cynthia such variety.

The first induction of the zodiac

The zodiac, which begged his name of living creatures (for all the cullizans in it except one, which is of no great weight neither, drew their pedigree from the idea of some excellent animal) took his original thus.

How the zodiac took his original

When Jupiter reigned in the sky, and the fry of the gods in the zodiac circle, Prometheus, that melancholic artisan, casting down from the earth's ceiling a compassionate eye on mankind, who at that time had no other fire than that of love, (which was Cupid's,) and that of anger, (which is the heat of Nemesis,) commiserated man's cold comfort and vowed when time served to pull opportunity by the nose and pleasure man with that artificious pantechnon which in worth far transcended that peerless pearl of Antony's lady.

Prometheus the thief that first stole fire

What might move him to divulge this treasure out of the exchequer of heaven, I know not. Some think it was a swelling desire that possessed him, thinking to eternize his fame and make his name immortal by bestowing this rare gift upon mortals.

Others imagine that this Prometheus was wound into the love (and not unlikely, for your semi-saints and demi-deities were ever liable to Cupid's archery) of a pretty damosel that dwelt under the immortal canopy in this cold horizon, which made his virgin in frosty congealing mornings look like Vespasian, as if she had been wringing at a hard stool, and that for her sake he became so liberal to the earth's inhabitants.

Armourers had first use of fire

Howsoever, whether this or that was his instigation, occasion being tossed in his way he bestowed this hot benefit on man, imparting it first unto Pyrodes, an excellent armourer.

The means how he came by it is not certainly known. Some think that he himself by his deep-searching wit first invented the manner how to dash it out of the igniferous flint.

In his right hand a shivering flint he locks,
Which 'gainst another in his left he knocks
So up and down that from the coldest stone
At every stroke small fiery sparkles shone,
Which withered, Daphne with her leaves doth feed,
This was our fire's ('tis thought) both root and seed.

First fire from a flint

Others imagine he got this knowledge by coming into Mulciber's shop (which stands at the foot of brimstone-bubbling Etna) and secretly peeping over the old farrier's shoulder as he was striking fire. But the most received opinion is that he played the thief and stole it either out of Vulcan's forge (as some would have it) or rather e coelo out of Jove's treasury, as most imagine. Howsoever, he bestowed it on man, flat against Jove's will and pleasure, who was much enraged at this his action.

Prometheus robbed Vulcan's forge of fire

And surely there was just cause of Jove's displeasure, for it is thought that at that time as many damned mischiefs thronged into the world with fire as there did fantastical fooleries with Monsieur into England. Then pranked Dame Poena et Pecunia (money and misery), bags and beggary, the very heart and head of infelicity. Then came craft into the world with his pages, Sinon, Davus, Geta, Parasitus (the fawn), and goodman Dolus (Doctor Deceit), who for his antiquity might bear arms as big as Charles's Wain. Then came posting in (on a piebald cut) Simony (see money), Bribery, Humorism, Malice, all the whelps of Acheron, all the weeds of the infernal banks, with pale-faced Incontinence and giddy-brained Intemperance, the two swiftest coach-horses of hell.

Why Jove was angry seeing men to use fire

Fire the breeder of mischief

About this very time landed Deterior Aetas (the ill-favoured-faced beldam) and calendared herself into the earth's almanac, a cunning, a coyng and purloining sorceress at whose tail marched in most stinking ranks all the sores, mischiefs and state-imposthumes that covered their damned heads with Pasquil's Madcap, or else were minced and boiled together in Madcap's Gallimaufry. Now issued in from the rearward Madam Vice or old Iniquity, with a lath dagger painted according to the fashion of an old Vice in a comedy, with a head of many colours as showing her subtlety, and at her back two punks that were her chambermaids, the one called Too Little, the other Too Much, and these two had like quicksilver eaten the world's goodness to the heart.

In a left wing of this army of Barathrum were skirmishing more sins than ever The Bellman of London or Lanthorn and Candlelight did ever muster up together.

For before these barrels of mischief were set abroad every old man was a piece of reverend coin on which the very face of goodness was engraven, and every sprig of youth was a laurel branch which all the year long grew green and smelt sweet of innocence. Women were those creatures that were fairer within than without, wooing men to love them for their virtues, and not one of that name did then sound woe-man. Maids had that title from modesty, marriage was the merrymage, a child playing with a dog the emblem of simplicity; every man's life was his chronicle to following times, and in every leaf was Honesty and Fidelity in texted letters. A Golden Age was this, yet without gold, where every commonwealth was more (if more might be) than Sir Thomas More's never-enough-praised Utopian.

Jove, the reputed admiral of the air's ocean, billowing his brows with disdain and fury, cracking a cloud at every bended wrinkle and thumping out a thunder at every frown, his face flashing fire and his looks menacing storms, stood still as if mortality had seen Medusa stamped on the ground, as if Cato had seen a swaggerer, vowed with a thousand Stygian oaths that Prometheus should repent him of his bold attempt and audacious profusion in communicating that Jovial flame which would in time set the whole world in combustion. Forthwith flies there a voice which summons his winged herald Mercury, to whom the fire-stealer is delivered in charge to be conveyed to Vulcan, the master of the heavenly ferrary or Jove's iron works, to be chained to the top of the cold Caucasus. Mercury presently made proclamation (with an iron voice out of his star-threatening turret) that all creatures who thought themselves endamaged by this fire-work of Prometheus should instantly present themselves before him and wreak their baleful ire on him at their pleasure. On frosty-fronted Caucasus, that cold mountain, (at Jove's command) was this Prometheus lodged, shackled to a stake with chains which Vulcan had hammered out for that unruly hell-hound, the wide-throated porter of Erebus (Cerberus), where to this hour he stands shivering and shaking like a condemned caitiff that attends the fatal stroke to sever his headpiece from his fear-frozen carcass, or like a schoolboy doomed with that fatal solve ligulas (or 'untruss'). Even so he stood till the sound of the writhen horn had famed his act far and near with the liberty of inflicting penalties, viz. how that all the world was licensed to whet the spears of anger to spit him who, like an Indian (in New Spain), stood there exposed as a fair mark for any man's fury.

Aries: the ram

The first tilter that ran against him was Aries the crooked-horned-winding ram; off left he his grazing and thus began he his indictment.

Calling to mind the prejudice that this fire-filcher had done him, how that now such craft had sunk into the brains of man, such rape and avarice into his heart, that poor rams could no more sleep in their golden fleeces; whereas before that time their woollen coats were never in fear or danger of cutting out by the cruelty of fire-moulded metal, their tender lambs were never taken from their uberous sides, their blood was never 'tainted in the parliament of wolves, nor had the fox that crafty noddle of his own to play the bloodsucker amongst their flocks. This tale being bleated out and heard, this cornuted husband of the sheep's heads fetching a feeze backward (like the Roman ram, to push forward with the more violent and villainous force) ran with all his horniferous strength at the poor fire-felon and stroke his brow-butters full in Prometheus's forehead that the very print remaineth in his front, and doth still in some of his race to this day; yea, such was the violence of the blow that it hath caused a wrinkled brow in all his progeny.	670	715	Jove clapped the bull on the flanks (as a bearward doth the bull at Paris Garden in a great day of baiting) and was glad to see justice (whose sword is put into the hands of fools and coxcombs upon earth) to be so nobly and stoutly executed on a villain by a creature merely irrational. O brave ram!		680	725	Yea, the thunder-darting god laughs so loud that the echo of that noise even shook the palaces celestial, but before the wrinkles of his cheeks were made smooth again, Jove fed his eyes with the sight of two twins (called Gemini) hand-in-hand approaching this condemned miscreant. The tears fell in sweet showers from their eyes, sometimes trickling down their tender cheeks, anon those balls of light swimming only in circles of water like two islands encompassed about with a pair of rivers. So stood they gazing and grieving to behold that arch-pirate, their tormented enemy, whose punishment in heart they wished to be doubled as were their bodies.	Room for two fencers

'Who thou art', quoth the Gemini with feeble voices, 'we cannot tell; known only art thou unto us as a fatal tree upon which grows all our miseries. Thou didst first reveal the use of fire to man, teaching him since how to feed and foster it continually, and by that mystery opened to him the way to our undoing. It was thy wit and work to set the world at wars by the fire of dissension and the burning coals of ambition, and to that end smiths, gun-makers, spear-makers and suchlike hard-handed fellows have been a long time thy slaves and prentices, night and day hammering from the murd'rous anvil knives, poniards, stilettoes, swords, bills, pole-axes, cannons, culverins, sakers, muskets, petronels and pistols, to feed whose insatiable, sulphurous and devouring, fire-spitting mouths that black meal of hell (gunpowder) hath likewise been invented. The revenge was as common as the law, or as the blows of a spital whore (hot and dangerous), and therefore like the ass in the fable that would needs be so lusty at legs as to lend the lion a brace of kicks and to play at spurn-point with him, so would the crab have a bout with Don Fire-Drake. But the ass played his jade’s tricks when Coeur-de-Lion lay half dead in his belly, scarce having one tooth in his head because age, being his barber, had plucked all out, and so Monsieur Cancro was the more hot upon his enemy because he had him bound to the peace.	Age a terrible tooth-drawer
Prometheus made an ass to carry two apes	This threatened sentence took place: upon his shoulders they mounted, Prometheus both patient and speechless, enduring their bawling exclamations whose scolding day and night grew to be so loud, and the barking so intolerable, that the head of man and his ears laid their noddles together, taking counsel of the brain how to prevent the shaking down and utter ruin of the capital building by such an everlasting, roaring thunder; and thereupon found out no better means to stop such breaches than by clammy wax just at the wickets of the ears, whose little key-holes being so choked up, the horror of their sounds could not pierce too far; so that ever since, the head (being the body’s hive) doth by certain bee-workings of the brain convey wax to the cells of hearing.	770	815	Or it may be he was thus sour the rather because Prometheus looked like a fisher (as he hung) with a long drivelling beard, who was wont to scare such crabbed companions out of their rocky and mossy dens; or else because fishermen, by help of that felon’s skill in fire-works, got both anchors to hold their peter-boats and little hooks to choke harmless fishes, with other engines to destroy the poor inhabitants of the ocean.	This is very likely

My grey-bearded sire well calculating the event of this mischief would ever charge his sons and daughters to beware of those force-eneebing companions (the children of heat), declaring to us by way of items (as he went grazing down the hill) the aptness and inclination of our bodies that way. Goats subject to agues, quails to the falling sickness. Gout, of goat

I am continually vexed with the spirit-spending ague, as the quail with the falling sickness, or else ever buckled and bended in the knees with the joint-tormenting gout (which I think borrowed his name of goat), as now I am whilst kneeling I tell this story, so that Damage herself calls upon me to sacrifice in wrath to her sister Nemesis, and (as I intend) this wagoner of lust shall rue my malevolent mood before he and I depart. His knees, which I trow are within my reach, for I will proportion his penance to the quality of his offence, shall be the object of my baneful butchery. O! ever will I pray that the gonagra may possess his hams and the sciatica his hips eternally.'

Aquarius: the water-bearer

The rage of fire

But opinion might persuade me that of all men alive Aquarius the water-porter should not fume at fiery Prometheus so much, since old Oceanus the senior sea god would lovingly call him his endeared friend. Yea, but Aquarius has excellent reason for it and will tell it as admirably, though he be illiterate and unlearned: 'For', saith he, 'in times past when fire was kept underboard like a prisoner and dwelt far from our houses like the antipodes, every conduit might flow his circle, every fountain run his dripling race without molest. But now, since fire is grown superlative and breathes naught but devastations and incendiaries, since it hath got the knack of translating houses into bon-fires (for envious neighbours to warm themselves by), making them lofty torches as though they would outface the moon, the pipes of our aquary conveyance have been so drawn, the channels of springs so sucked, that I can sound my tankard like an empty cask and look into the bottom, but see not a drop of water. And, assuredly, were all the waters of Europe sunk down into their kennels, yet would I lave this thief with this relic of water in my tankard, and send it into his shoes with an army of imprecations that it might prove like the Ethiopian well in the daytime or the Sicilian river in the night, or (at least) like the English fount that saxifies wood and turns it into rigid stone; that his supporters might be congealed

Pisces: the fishes

In good faith, 'tis strange, my masters, to my sense: a couple of fishes (I'll tell you their names as they fall better into my knowledge) come leaping over the fallows like pepper in a mortar, as though Revenge had sent them on her errand. The company turned their heads back jointly at the voice of that news like a steeple weathercock at the landing of another wind. Well, not many skips spent but fortune led them to this Igni-fur, and being seated low by nature they covet no higher than his feet (a lesson for ambitiosoes), which by this time were drowned in water that ran from the waterman's pitcher (sufficient life-room for these two sworn brothers) where, engraving some few signs and characters in the plain visage of the water (for fishes are the mutest creatures alive), the beholders might gather thus much.

'Fire (which this tyrant to fishes hath invented against us of the moister orb) hath so instructed the fish-chasers in the art of framing bearded hooks and such inevitable baits of faithless forgery, that the hare lives not in more fear of the hound than we of these traitorous, enticing (I may call them Italian) salads. And, alas, when our captivated corpses are yielded to those scale-hunters, then begins the Tamburlaine-Ignis to broil our bark and carbonado our well-compacted limbs. In heat has this hunter offended, but we will torment him in another kind. O, let our frozen nature numb the passages of his veins, and let no blood of warmth have recourse to these forward feet that led this wretch into this woe, whiles that our tenter-teeth, armed with envy's points, nibble on his toes and vex his corns and kibes.'

SPRING

Spring a piece of powdered beef

The spring is like a piece of powdered beef that is new skipped out of purgatory: of nature hot and moist (paralleled to the sanguine complexion), I mean when 'tis but slenderly boiled so that the blood may flash through the crushers (this were enough now to make a good stomach bark) or else the simile holds not. And surely there will be very good agreement betwixt powdered beef and the spring, that falling so justly in Lent. Nay, Taurus himself (the sign where the sun dwells in the height of the spring) shall domineer in this quarter as lively as in a butcher's shop.

Diseases incident to this quarter

Spring diseases

Are crawling things, being lobsters, wriggling eels and other fish to weak and watery stomachs, and fasting days to good stomachs.

SUMMER

Summer a marrow-bone

Summer will be like the beef's marrow-bone (sweet and sweaty), smacking of the taste of the doublet collar. Of a fretting complexion being called summer, quasi 'sun-more', because the sun is more powerful then than at other seasons.

Diseases incident to this quarter

Summer diseases

Diseases that now land are dry throats and wet backs. For the first, the first part of Cancer (the sign which Sol sets foot in at the beginning of this quarter) is very sovereign, but the latter must be beholden to the launderer. Choleric humours will rage now in a man's body more than in his picture, and a cross word may chance to cost many a servant a cracked crown, which though it will not be taken at the goldsmith's, yet must it be taken to the surgeon's.

AUTUMN, or Foli-lapse (fall of the leaf)

Fall of the leaf the pewter dish

The harvest quarter is like in my judgement (that I may go no farther than my mess of meat) to the pewter dish it is put in (according to his natural operation cold and dry), as opposite to the flesh that lies in it as Cato and Catiline.

Diseases

Autumnian diseases a H

And thus have I anatomized the whole body of the year and read a lecture upon the four quarters, with what particular diseases hang upon every quarter, but the body of the year being great, gross and subject to much corruption, his breath striking all sorts of people (as being infectious) poisons them in general. And these are other diseases which I find will be reigning.

General diseases to reign this year

Many young wenches will be subject to the falling sickness, cramps with pitiless convulsion will hold fast the strings of misers' purses, giddiness and staggers threaten draymen, porters, tapsters, carmen, and shoemakers upon Mondays. Swellings both in men and women, and some women greatly vexed with pushes, but every prison horribly tormented with scabs. All the fiddlers that play upon wind instruments shall in cold, nipping mornings have fistulas in their fingers. The toothache will vex young children at first breeding of them, and young people that are to pluck teeth out will be ready to run mad. Comfit-makers' wives shall cry out to have a hollow tooth stopped, and waiting gentlewomen never lie still till it be drawn. Some carbuncles will be found among goldsmiths, but they not very hotly reigning.

More hospitals must be built if this world hold

Fistula a pipe

Inundations and most strange overflowings of waters
 Never did the stars stuff an almanac with more prodigious births of nature than this year is to bring forth. Sins of men grow thicker than the hair-bushes on the head, and having filled bodies (as by the former hospital bed roll appears) with maladies, mark how the very element of water (as if heaven had drunk up a second deluge to drown all) spreads abroad his dankish and showery wings.

For widows that have buried 5 or 6 husbands before are likely this year at the burial of the last to weep out so much water as may serve to wash another wedding smock, but that joy hath dried up both the conduits of their eyes.

So will rich heirs and executors wear mourning garments and have onions in one hand, but branches of heartsease in the other.

The Lord Mayor's cauldrons, brass pots, kettles, chafers, skillets etc. will have their waters and broths flow up so high in his kitchen chimney, till they gallop so fast that they shall (in spite of all scummers) run over, whilst all the fat runs

Widows drowned in tears

These waters do less hurt than the Thames doth at Billingsgate in men's cellars into the fire. Hot waters threaten so to overflow the stomachs of frozen-blooded bawds and dried up panderesses till they lie drowned, being dead drunk, that roaring boys shall take their hackney mares out of the stable, put them into coaches and ride them to Ware for nothing but their provender.	1445	Bread (by the scarcity of true weights) will be so little this year that many a baker will rather stand on the pillory and have his batch marked with O (a goose eye, the memento of a pillory) than to give every loaf his just bigness.

Terrible doings are oxen to do this	Romney Marsh, by all signs and tokens, will meet with such an inundation of waters this winter that, the summer following, oxen shall go up to the knees and sheep up to the bellies in grass—a fatal manger to fatten fools at, for they feed themselves plump, and no sooner fed full but they go to the pot.	1405	Pheasant, partridge and quails will be very dainty this year, but woodcocks shall fly up and down the city.	Pillories. Baker, your hole for nine pence
What beasts are oxen to do this	If all the jailers in and about London should this year shake off the fetters of mortality, the learned astrologians are of opinion that all the cellars and tap-houses of prisons would be drowned in strong beer and ale, which from the eyes of barrels should gush out for extreme sorrow.	1450	A brief and merry prognostication, presaging good fortunes to a set of fundamental trades	Stultorum plena sunt omnia
This will be a woeful day	Are there more horrors yet? Yes, yes, every mischief hath his twin, and no calamity was ever born alone. What can follow diseases but inundations of waters, which are tears? And after deep floods dearth must of consequence play the servingman.	1410	The string of sorrow is now tuned to a merry note. Diseases, drownings, dearths and other dreary tragedians, get you from the stage, and now let a company of jovial citizens have a fit of mirth to make them laugh a little.
Wenches and mischiefs are ever breeding	Infinite numbers, therefore, of sheep, calves, and oxen shall this year die so that people will be in danger to be better fed than taught. The blood of these innocents will dye red a shambles, and most merciless cutting of throats shall there be in Eastcheap. A thousand lambs shall be carried to the stocks and three times that number lose their lives at Smithfield Bars, some of them in that butcherous massacre being driven up into Whitecross Street.	1455	Mercers

For this year shall old plain lads that never went farther than the leatherseller for their habits mount to your shops, wrap themselves in your royal weeds and scorn to dine thrice in a suit. Old Euclioes and old Corydons shall persuade Chremes, and all three swear it in silk and sweat it in satin.	Brave doings for mercers The world in a new coat
Our constables carry geese thither		1420	Bespeak new shop books in Papernoster Row, inquire for them of a one hundred quire, make a new counter on the other side, for such a cluster of dash-thrifts and scatter-goods are coming up out of all shires that your shops will swarm again. I could tell you (were it not needless) what a volume of velvet ladies' trains will devour, and of which piles, and what a bundle of silk of Seres will be trussed up in gentlemen's wardrobes.	But not paid for
What will the price be, with a mess of mustard too		1470	Long summers will discard the draper, when every tender soul must have a stuff gown, for cloth is too stubborn. Every fool will clothe himself with rash in all his actions, and every fantastical ass will be in a fustian fume at this my prognostication, but odi profanum vulgus.

Grocers

Grocers

Never look as pale as your sugarloaves, you cinnamonian gingibers, for that your spices groan in their bags like a pig in a wallet, I can tell you there are ten thousand sour countenances that hope all to be sweetened by the grocer. Nay, all the scolds' tongues in the country that were wont to rail so bitterly must be bathed (as it is decreed by the authority of their husbands) in the oil of your ware, that is, in the syrup of sugar. For your hotter spices, why, they'll fly quickly; abundance of choleric complexions will never be without hot mouths, and you yourselves know that everybody will take pepper in the nose before he hath a casket to put it in. All the children in the world (if they be like me) will have a sweet tooth in their head, the first that grows out of their gums. Yea, and your own prentices will jerk a clod of currants currently down their throats, and it may be, pocket up an injury as big as a pound of sugar to welcome a friend in a tavern.

Old folks shall take my lady's part that often use this speech:

*I love the grocer next my heart,
the skimmer next my breech.*

Every old-trot will wrap up a race to heat her cold stomach.

The gentle nurse to still her baby's cry

Not so much as the cobbler but he shall have a plum pie as black as his wax he slimes his thread with, so well stuffed that the grocer shall quick-smother the butcher, and weak, waterish

Drapers

Now you, Master Drapers, that harbour the minds as well as the mantles of sheep, droop your fronts like a piece of well basted cloth, for gentlemen shall put more cloth in their hose now than ever they did, and tailors ask more lining than ever they had. You shall not need to fear the second birth of those French gascoignes, nor the base retire of bases, when a cloak or horseman's coat is more comely. Good husbands will have a cloth gown to sit by the fire in and whip off a measure of ale, and all our wives that smell of housewifery must have their winter weeds from the draper. An ordinary cloth shall lose the nap within a month after it kissed the back, and a good shower of rain shall wash off the wool of a new cloak. White frieze will turn the warm fashion because 'twill say well against the cold wind, and frizado the country ministers will buy up to make them cassocks because 'tis warm and comely. Your yard is like to be as short as ever it was, and you shall have many days as dark as twilight. But the main is this: there is a lean spindle-shank that looks as if he had eat never a bit of meat since the creation will speak to you for a thousand black; he will help you to sell them and you need not see him, Monsieur Mors, Domine Death, that peeps over

It is a merry world with you when many mourn, and the more wet eyes the more dry clothes.

Fishmongers

I promise to you, you soldiers under happy hering, that there shall be great store of fishmongers this year. For all the butcher curseth our fasting days, yet shall your gettings be good, and if he grudge that you should be permitted to sell all the year, and his shop shut up in Quadregesima, you shall tell him that Lent is the fishmonger's harvest, though it be the butcher's spring. You need not fear the defect of water, for a cold morn shall wring it out of your nose and you take it not off with your sleeve. A codshead will be an ordinary dish, or a dish at an ordinary, and a red sprat a good breakfast for a prentice. Stockfish and onions will be a dish for Dutchmen, and a side of ling will make a double brace of servingmen's beards wag. The kindreds of Rufus that frequent the grape will metamorphose their noses into rochet, and he that has no facing may feed upon his cousin greenfish. Every maid will be in love with fish, and old men will make much of hearing. In fine, the fishmonger shall be more beholden to one recusant than all the puritans in a city.

Goldsmiths

Proface, you goldsmiths, harken to my news, and I'll make your hearts jog like a quicksilver jelly with laughing. This year shall great minerals of gold and silver burst out of misers' coffers, and their heirs shall play their pelf away at span-counter. What though the golden age be worn out, yet the golden art shall flourish still, and though no mines of the earth appear to us, yet earthly minds will be plenty. Every Jack will have a jewel in his ear that he may defy the pillory with the better grace, and many elder brothers shall Jolly travellers, hot-shots that mean to breathe in beyond-sea air, shall come to you to metamorphose their moon into your sun, their shillings into sovereigns, to clap them close in their coffers and so geld England of her gold, and posters to fairs shall court ducats to beguile thieves and lessen their carriage.

On St George's day you may put out a thousand chains to grass on men's shoulders, and you know what the citizens will give for one to welcome his majesty to London.

A blue coat without a cullizan will be like haberdine without mustard. Every kitchen-maid will have a marriage ring as an emblem of her good man's love, and the youths of the parish will offer gold at a bridal, the metal's purity being a signet of the bride's virginity.

Negligent servants will crack their masters' plate lest it last too long, and a little fall will make a salt look like Grantham steeple with his cap to the alehouse.

Fine wives will have a goldsmith's shop on their livery cupboards though their husbands stand up to the chin in the mercer's rolls, and five thousand will have silver in the mouth when they have none in the purse.

Gallant ladies will have silver stools for fear of pollution, and every malkin will have a silver bodkin to rouse a bird in the hair-bush.

Every busy wooer will present a costly necklace to his lovely joy, and not a pin that came not through your fingers. Gossips at christ'nings shall help you away with many spoons, and New Year's gifts (to leave out bribes) are able to make you rich. There shall be more gilding now than honest dealing, and gentlemen's spurs shall speak false Latin: they shall jingle as if they were all silver to the heel when they are lead at the heart.

Many church doors shall be opened with silver keys lest the locks be thought baser than the bell metal, and that which you thought not of, most men might climb the ladder of promotion by silver steps. And after all this 'twill be good fishing with a silver hook.

Skinners

Skinners

Old wives, you pelleters, that are as gripple of the world as a man shot overboard of a rope, shall line their coats with your softest furs lest they forfeit their voice to the cold. Your badge shall be worn in ruddy braggadocian's countenance, for modesty shall hang down the head like a twig with a pompion at it. 'Tis like to prove a very windy spring, and by that means many Venetians will be blasted out behind; everyone rub one till the world is out at the elbows, and they that use wrestling must needs to the tailor. Every schoolboy that plays the truant should not want a jerkin, and he that learns more knavery than virtue should have a breech or two. An ocean of indentures will not serve you for measures, and as much thread as would compass the world will be stitched up in a twelve month.

Every simpering Sib and coy Katherine shall round a muff before her as a case for her nose, or a den for her fingers in frost-biting weather, and every oyster-wife's throat shall be furred with marry-muffs when cold complexions will be content to warm their fingers in a meaner fire. Your trade must needs hold, for every tip-sitaprapolonian will maintain an excellent good facing. But you must not, when you espy a hard-favoured gentleman with a bugled cheek or a chin like a visor, pace down your row with cry, 'Will you buy a good face, will you buy a good face, sir?' 'Twill make him hereafter go five miles about rather than grace your street any more with that face he has, as bad as 'tis.

Rich men will be ashamed hereafter to transport their hose so often to the botchers for fear they purchase creepers. Neither will there be any more such old miserrimoes that when they hear one knock at the door will clap on their gown (their sloven's cover) lest their patched rags appear to the world; I know you shall take measure of them for a new suit first. Finally, a long waist will be much in request if you can frame it, because a short body is obnoxious to a stinking breath, the mouth and tail are too nigh.

Haberdashers

Never indenture your foreheads so ruefully, you bonny bonnetonists, for you see the fashion of steeple crowns (a sore waster of felts) is already past. There is an ambassador making for England now so fraught with quaint humoralities and attireable sesquipedalities that he will set all the noses of your now worn bonnets utterly out of joint. But, do you hear me, never doubt of the fashion of your blocks for all this; rather, when a swad-swained gentleman shall amount into your cranny-lighted shops and call for a hat of the courtier's block, exonerate your press, out with a Spaniardo and clap it on his coxcomb, and swear an oath as long as your tongue, 'This hat is excellently blocked, sir'.

Tailors

Tailors

I presage, you limb-trimmers, a shipful of new fashions shall sail into our coasts out of the Isle Lunatic, and you dapper lances shall make at the footman's armour so valiantly that they shall pierce it in a hundred places. Your snippers never looked so bright as they are this year, and your goose shall be counted the valiantest lad in a country, for that he can make so many drapers shrink. I foretell a great rot amongst the present fashions: they shall change as fast as the moon for

- punies novices, freshmen
- 1673 Littleton possibly Sir Thomas Littleton (1402-81), author of the standard work on English property law. However, the phrase 'or else Littleton will not know them' seems to suggest a superior person who will not acknowledge the Inns of Court freshmen if they are not properly dressed. Edward, later Lord Littleton was an Inner Temple lawyer who was called to the bar in 1617; he became a Bencher of his Inn, an MP and Chief Justice for

- North Wales. Middleton wrote Heroes for the Inner Temple in 1619.

there this seven year, to keep the wit of addle pates from freezing, and many old boys shall drink till their caps crack. White hats will take slur quickly, for their colour is labecutable, and pure black shall moulder to dirt, for that was burnt on the block.

Citizens' wives shall shift their taffetas often, for that the low portals knap them out at the crown, and all my black sisters must get them broader brims, for these will not hide their forehead faults. A shower of rain shall put a pasteboard out of square and order, and a little drop will cockle your silk as rising for revenge if it come from the gutter. Five hundred virgins shall be married in their velvet pot-lids, and but ten millions of blowzes in their felt stool-pans. O, how many brides will measure their brain on their wedding eve in your shop, and he that roofs not his wife under one of your shelters on his marriage day shall be trussed up in wool and sent into Burgundy.

Prentices shall wear no more caps, for it makes them look like costards, and he that fronts it with straw must be content also to lie in straw. But the best friend to men of your mould will be mannerly courtesy and obsequious compliments. Two friends shall not pass in the street without an interchange of vails, nor old men see Cardinal candle cast his eye upon the table without reverence to his charity. As for those of your name that are conversant with small wares, they shall fly out of your shops like foul words out of a thankless person.

Salters

And as for you, Master Salters, you'll flourish this year, for white herrings, a hot summer, and fresh beef shall stand as stiffly under you as any three legs under the bright trifoot in the world. All the brewers have sworn by the pearly cognizance that Barleycorn gives his pages in their faces that there shall be no more broom foisted into the vat instead of your hops. Fatal cords will be busily set on work and hempen caudles will be common physic for desperate persons. Mice and rats will gnaw the goodwife's yarn, and hands and feet shall rub out her linen, so that need will make her trot to your worships for flax and tow, and thrift will make her set her maid to the distaff. Musicians will be counted scrapers and crowders if they buy not some of your rosin, and had not our sow cast her farrow it should have gone hard, but we would have had some of it to unhair a fat pig. Ships will leak and they be not lined with your pitch. In a word, the wheel and the brewer, the shepherd and the mariner, will make you now or never.

Ironmongers

You that draw your line from the loins of Ironside, you shall have harder doings than ever you had since your hammer told his master what his trade was, and I think a hard world is that which you desire. Such an iron age is now on foot, and such a crew of copper consciences, that to sheath a blade in a man's corpse will be counted voluntary valour, and a hard heart will be thought a good spirit, steel to the back. Opulent, rich clunch-fists shall lie in as much fear of the pilferer as a buck of the wood-knife, and to prevent the purloiner they shall gird the ribs of their chests with girths of your iron, and lace the belly of their money-tombs with laces of your weaving.

*He's mad that lays up gold of Ophir
In a wooden lined coffer.*

Boys are as like to break glass windows as ever they were, and that will make men speak for your wires; and thieves are as like to break prison, and that will make the jailer sue for your iron to bolt them. A warming pan will be counted excellent physic for a featherbed, and an iron cradle very good authority to hold up sea-coal. My gossip Gooseing must needs have a fair pair of andirons to garnish her hall against her belly's abed, and all the wives in the parish shall beg as much of their sweethearts at midnight. All the hobbinolls of the country shall arm their high shoes with your metal to encounter with London stones, and there shall be so much scratching between Susan Scold-out and Tib Tattle-basket that I am persuaded the single combat will make you sell all your nails.

Vintners

A cask full of comfort for you, crimson-nosed vintners, that quilt your guests' apparel with the best bombast. You shall not need to take much care for those fellows that war so long under the colours of sack and sugar in the rearward, that

Fill your barrels full with heart of oak and flower of the field, then will they untruss a hoop and lask like a squirt, so shall the maids' faucets fly from the taphole, and this will make them trot to the fountain of liquid liquor again. Every market town shall be better furnished with houses for ale than for alms, and that village shall be counted a dunghill of puritans where there is never a tapsterring of bene-bouse. Small beer shall be for diet-keepers, but strong twang shall prove as good as bagpudding (meat, and drink, and cloth). The best medicine for the fleas will be a cup of merry-go-down, and the only help to clap the door upon sorrow and shut him out will be a draught of March beer. The merry physician's counsel to an odd patient of his shall be the very pitch of Paracelsians' diet: the first draught will wash a man's liver, the second increase his blood, and the third satisfies his thirst. And all the world knows what a countryman's bond is:

Alms and ale have not one entertainment

Leathersellers

*A pot of ale still the assurance doth hatch,
And serves for the scrivener to bind up the match.*
The water in Netherland will taste of the brack, and most of those Flemings would taste of our English beer. Harvest men will be as dry as the Arabian sand, and a dozen of hay-tossers will quickly toss down a bung of moisture. Salt meat will be a great dish if it come to the board in a charger, and that will draw down liquor. Red herring will prove a prologue to a hungry fast, and that will work for the brewer. Monsieur Domingo, knight of the malt-hoop, has enacted against sippers and sparrowinchers, but those that take off their life by quantus shall be dubbed on a barrel head. There will be one in a parish shall piss as much against the wall in a year as half his neighbours spend in three. Other of your customers shall carry as much as your horse, but those that drink in an empty cup may chance to have sore lips for their labour.

park vermin are like to fall into paste and our bucks' heads into pots to pleasure your faculty and wardrobe your shelves. A buff jerkin shall be a lordly wear and a pair of buskins a preservative against the gout. All tradesmen that occupy with the leathern apron shall sue unto you, so that your vocation may be called the forepart of most mechanicals, and many cutpurses shall nip those foreparts to make you vend your leather. Our boys in Lent shall put off and scrape to your workshops for a metal to course their tops, and most of the world will turn Adam and Eve and put on mortality. The owners of our country will be new-belted against Christmas, and the plough-joggers of our town must smell of your counter at Easter. To conclude, ample indentures, large copies, and drumheads will metamorphose your skins, an you will let them.

Pewterers

From great and gorgeous swilling, you pewter Johns, issueth a world of leaking, and I know every man will purchase a piss-pot to prevent the colic, or else he must spout out at the window, and that may prove perilous to the urine if the descent be violent. At fairs and marts young married wives must look out for their vessels, and all the year shall Francis Truge wear your buttons' metal before him. Many a good bit shall be turned in your platters, and many a mouth shall pronounce (when the feast comes marching in the pewterers' livery) that you are the upholders of all good cheer. Basins and ewers shall revive into the fashion, as a pewter standish proves profitable for a scribe; 'twill be somewhat chargeable in the melting, but foist in the leaden lubber and it will pay your painstaking. Sea-coal fire this year shall melt a million of dishes, and the negligence of servants shall put many a pot in the pillory, for pewter shall be the softest natured gentleman, he shall sink at every blow and take thought inwardly at every knock. In sum, a pewter pot of ale with a toast in his belly will quench a man's

Barber-Surgeons

Barber-Surgeons

You cunning cutbeards, never let your stomachs quail to suck your living out of festered sores, for lucri bonus est odor, silver has a sweet sound; ask Vespasian the emperor else. For your comfort a proud match at football shall send many a lame soldier to your tent, and a fiery fray in Smithfield shall bring many a bloody companion to your shop. The fencing schools will serve to keep your hand in ure, but the bragging prizes, a hundred pound to a pig's turd, will put chink into your purses. The French something shall line your squirrel skins brim-full, and stretch the strings and so thoroughly choke their throats that they shall speak no more than an oven's mouth rampired. O, the income that is Neapolitan shall bring in a hot summer to you; an it were not for tobacco, which is a preventer, I think surgeons would be the only purchasers in London. Joints shall be ill-knit, and gentles shall cut their fingers; sanguine complexions shall swarm, and letting of blood will be common. But the spider shall intercept something of you again. He shall be phlebotomist to the fly if she come in his net, and the fleas must be let blood at midsummer for God-a-mercy. Tavern quarrels shall find you Sunday fare all the Sundays in the year, and lazy ignavoes that sit still and putrify like a mud-sink shall fall into your hands for felons. And this shall attire you from Good Friday to Maundy Thursday: curst and crabbed masters shall send many a cracked crown to your cure, and the toothache shall find you beef for your house your lifetime. Young beards shall pullulate and multiply like a willow, if worm bark them not; howsoever, shaving will be good to make a down spout. The picke-devant (I presage) will be the cut, and a pair of muchatoes that will fence for the face shall be the tantara flash sea-coal. Fume shall besmudge our neatoes that they shall go to the barber's ball oftener than
