

GENERAL EDITORS
GARY TAYLOR AND JOHN LAVAGNINO

THOMAS MIDDLETON

THE COLLECTED WORKS

ASSOCIATE GENERAL EDITORS
MAGD. P. JACKSON, JOHN JOWETT
VALERIE WAYNE AND ADRIAN WEISS

OXFORD

THE OXFORD MIDDLETON

Thomas Middleton (1580–1627)—‘our other Shakespeare’—is the only other Renaissance playwright who created acknowledged masterpieces of comedy, tragedy, and history; his revolutionary English history play, A Game at Chess, was also the greatest box-office hit of early modern London. His achievements extend beyond these traditional genres to tragicomedies, masques, pageants, pamphlets, epigrams, and Biblical and political commentaries, written alone or in collaboration with Thomas Dekker, John Ford, Thomas Heywood, William Rowley, William Shakespeare, John Webster, and others. Compared by critics to Aristophanes and Ibsen, Racine and Joe Orton, he has influenced writers as diverse as Aphra Behn, Anthony Trollope, and T. S. Eliot. Though repeatedly censored in his own time, Middleton has since come to be particularly admired for his representations of the intertwined pursuits of sex, money, power, and God.

The Oxford Middleton, prepared by seventy-five scholars from a dozen countries, follows the precedent of The Oxford Shakespeare in being published in two volumes, an innovative but accessible Collected Works and a comprehensive scholarly Companion. Though closely connected, each volume can be used independently of the other.

The Collected Works brings together for the first time in a single volume all the works currently attributed to Middleton. The texts are printed in modern spelling and punctuation, with critical introductions and foot-of-the-page commentaries; they are arranged in chronological order, with a special section of Juvenilia. The volume is introduced by essays on Middleton’s life and reputation, on early modern London, and on the varied theatres of the English Renaissance. Extensively illustrated, it incorporates much new information on Middleton’s life, canon, texts, and contexts; twenty per cent of the works included have never before been annotated. A self-consciously ‘federal edition’, The Collected Works applies contemporary theories about the nature of literature and the history of the book to editorial practice; its unusual features are described and explained in ‘How to Use This Book’ (p. 18).

Thomas Middleton and Early Modern Textual Culture: A Companion to The Collected Works. Because Middleton is more representative than any of his contemporaries of the full range of textual practices in early modern England, his works provide an ideal focus for understanding the history of the book, and its relation to the larger history of culture, in this pivotal period. The Companion begins, accordingly, with eleven original essays placing Middleton’s career in the context of larger cultural patterns governing the creation, reproduction, regulation, circulation, and reception of texts. These essays are followed by a textual introduction and full editorial apparatus for each work, including an account of evidence for its authorship and date of composition. This combination of detail and context provides a foundation for future studies both of Middleton and of early modern culture.

<http://thomasmiddleton.org>

Facetious Middleton, thy witty muse
Hath pleased all that books or men peruse.

Wit's Recreations (1640)

THOMAS MIDDLETON

THE COLLECTED WORKS

General Editors

GARY TAYLOR AND JOHN LAVAGNINO

Associate General Editors

MACDONALD P. JACKSON, JOHN JOWETT,
VALERIE WAYNE, AND ADRIAN WEISS

CLARENDON PRESS • OXFORD

OXFORD

UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, Oxford OX2 6DP

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship, and education by publishing worldwide in

Oxford New York

Auckland Cape Town Dar es Salaam Hong Kong Karachi
Kuala Lumpur Madrid Melbourne Mexico City Nairobi
New Delhi Shanghai Taipei Toronto

With offices in

Argentina Austria Brazil Chile Czech Republic France Greece
Guatemala Hungary Italy Japan Poland Portugal Singapore
South Korea Switzerland Thailand Turkey Ukraine Vietnam

Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press in the UK and in certain other countries

Published in the United States
by Oxford University Press Inc., New York

© Gary Taylor, John Lavagnino, John Jowett 2007

The moral rights of the author have been asserted Database right Oxford University Press (maker)

First published 2007

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means,
without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press, or as expressly permitted by law, or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department, Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this book in any other binding or cover and you must impose the same condition on any acquirer

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

Data available

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data

Data available

Printed in Italy on acid-free paper by Rotolito Lombarda SpA

ISBN 978-0-19-922588-0 (Set)
ISBN 978-0-19-818569-7 (Complete Works)
ISBN 978-0-19-818570-3 (Textual Companion)

1 3 5 7 9 10 8 6 4 2

CONTRIBUTORS

Gary Taylor (General Editor), Florida State University
John Lavagnino (General Editor), King's College London

MacDonald P. Jackson (University of Auckland) John Jowett (Shakespeare Institute, University of Birmingham)

Valerie Wayne (University of Hawai'i at Mānoa)
Adrian Weiss (independent scholar)

Susan Dwyer Amussen (Union Institute & University)

David M. Bergeron (University of Kansas)

Michael Berlin (Birkbeck, University of London)

†Julia Briggs (De Montfort University)

Douglas Bruster (University of Texas at Austin)

Paul Bushkovitch (Yale University)

Swapan Chakravorty (Jadavpur University)

Thomas Cogswell (University of California, Riverside)

Ralph Alan Cohen (Mary Baldwin College)

Celia R. Daileader (Florida State University)

Lawrence Danson (Princeton University)

Michael Dobson (Birkbeck, University of London)

†Inga-Stina Ewbank (University of Leeds)

Doris Feldmann (Friedrich-Alexander-Universität Erlangen-Nürnberg)

Lori Anne Ferrell (Claremont Graduate University)

Julia Gasper (Open University)

Suzanne Gossett (Loyola University Chicago)

Donna B. Hamilton (University of Maryland, College Park)

Ton Hoenselaars (Universiteit Utrecht)

R. V. Holdsworth (University of Manchester)

Grace Ioppolo (University of Reading)

Maija Jansson (Yale University)

†M. T. Jones-Davies (Université de Paris—Sorbonne)

Coppélia Kahn (Brown University)

Ivo Kamps (University of Mississippi)

James Knowles (Keele University)

Theodore B. Leinwand (University of Maryland, College Park)

Kate D. Levin (City College of New York)

Jerzy Limon (Uniwersytet Gdański)

Ania Loomba (University of Pennsylvania)

Lawrence Manley (Yale University)

Robert Maslen (University of Glasgow)

Jeffrey Masten (Northwestern University)

C. E. McGee (St Jerome's University)

†Scott McMillin (Cornell University)

Paul Mulholland (University of Guelph)

Marion O'Connor (University of Kent at Canterbury)

Sharon O'Dair (University of Alabama)

Anthony Parr (University of the Western Cape)

Annabel Patterson (Yale University)

Bryan Reynolds (University of California, Irvine)

Neil Rhodes (University of St Andrews)

Nikolai Rogozhin (Russian State Archive of Ancient Documents)

Peter Saccio (Dartmouth College)

Paul S. Seaver (Stanford University)

G. B. Shand (Glendon College, York University)

Debora Shuger (University of California, Los Angeles)

R. Malcolm Smuts (University of Massachusetts, Boston)

Kurt Tetzeli von Rosador (Westfälische Wilhelms-Universität Münster)

Leslie Thomson (University of Toronto)

Daniel J. Vitkus (Florida State University)

Wendy Wall (Northwestern University)

Michael Warren (University of California, Santa Cruz)

Stanley Wells (Shakespeare Birthplace Trust)

Susan Wiseman (Birkbeck, University of London)

Linda Woodbridge (Pennsylvania State University)

Paul Yachnin (McGill University)

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ALPHABETICAL CONTENTS	9
INDEX OF TITLES BY GENRE	11
LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS	13
HOW TO USE THIS BOOK, BY GARY TAYLOR	18

Middleton and His World

Thomas Middleton: Lives and Afterlives, by Gary Taylor	25
Middleton's London, by Paul S. Seaver	59
Middleton's Theatres, by Scott McMillin	74

Collected Works 1602–1627

The Phoenix , edited by Lawrence Danson and Ivo Kamps	91
Thomas Dekker and Thomas Middleton, News from Gravesend: Sent to Nobody , text edited by Gary Taylor, annotated and introduced by Robert Maslen	128
The Nightingale and the Ant ; and, Father Hubbard's Tales , edited by Adrian Weiss	149
Thomas Middleton and Thomas Dekker, The Meeting of Gallants at an Ordinary; or, The Walks in Paul's , edited by Paul Yachnin	183
Plato's Cap cast at this year 1604, being leap year , edited by Paul Yachnin	195
The Black Book , edited by G. B. Shand	204
Thomas Dekker, Stephen Harrison, Ben Jonson, and Thomas Middleton, The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment of King James through the City of London, 15 March 1604, with the Arches of Triumph , edited by R. Malcolm Smuts	219
Thomas Dekker and Thomas Middleton, The Patient Man and the Honest Whore , edited by Paul Mulholland	280
Lost Plays: A Brief Account, by Doris Feldmann and Kurt Tetzeli von Rosador	328
Michaelmas Term , edited by Theodore B. Leinwand	334
A Trick to Catch the Old One , edited by Valerie Wayne	373
A Mad World, My Masters , text edited and introduced by Peter Saccio, annotated by Celia R. Daileader	414
A Yorkshire Tragedy (one of the four-plays-in-one, called All's One) , edited by Stanley Wells	452
William Shakespeare and Thomas Middleton, The Life of Timon of Athens , text edited and annotated by John Jowett, introduced by Sharon O'Dair	467
The Puritan Widow ; or, The Puritan ; or, The Widow of Watling Street , edited by Donna B. Hamilton	509
The Revenger's Tragedy , edited by MacDonald P. Jackson	543
Your Five Gallants , text edited by Ralph Alan Cohen with John Jowett, annotated and introduced by Ralph Alan Cohen	594
Thomas Middleton and Thomas Dekker, The Bloody Banquet: A Tragedy , adapted for the Cockpit, introduced and annotated by Julia Gasper, text edited by Julia Gasper and Gary Taylor	637

CONTENTS

Andraeas Loeaechius, translated and adapted by Thomas Middleton, Sir Robert Sherley his Entertainment in Cracovia , text edited and annotated by Jerzy Limon and Daniel J. Vitkus, introduced by Daniel J. Vitkus	670
The Two Gates of Salvation ; or, The Marriage of the Old and New Testament ; or, God's Parliament House , text edited and annotated by Paul Mulholland, introduced by Lori Anne Ferrell	679
Thomas Middleton and Thomas Dekker, The Roaring Girl ; or, Moll Cutpurse , edited by Coppélia Kahn	721
No Wit/Help like a Woman's ; or, The Almanac , edited by John Jowett	779
The Lady's Tragedy ['The Second Maiden's Tragedy']: Parallel Texts, edited by Julia Briggs	833
A Chaste Maid in Cheapside , edited by Linda Woodbridge	907
The Manner of his Lordship's Entertainment , edited by David M. Bergeron	959
The Triumphs of Truth , edited by David M. Bergeron; with 'An account by Aleksei Ziuzin', text edited by Maija Jansson and Nikolai Rogozhin, and translated by Paul Bushkovitch	963
William Rowley and Thomas Middleton, Wit at Several Weapons , edited by Michael Dobson	980
Masque of Cupids , introduced by M. T. Jones-Davies and Ton Hoenselaars, text edited and annotated by John Jowett	1027
More Dissemblers Besides Women , edited by John Jowett	1034
The Widow , text edited and introduced by Gary Taylor, annotated by Michael Warren and Gary Taylor	1074
The Witch , edited by Marion O'Connor	1124
William Shakespeare, adapted by Thomas Middleton, The Tragedy of Macbeth: A Genetic Text , text edited by Gary Taylor, introduced by Inga-Stina Ewbank	1165
Civitas Amor , edited by David M. Bergeron	1202
William Rowley and Thomas Middleton, A Fair Quarrel , edited by Suzanne Gossett	1209
The Triumphs of Honour and Industry , text edited by David M. Bergeron, annotated and introduced by Kate D. Levin; with 'Orazio Busino's Eyewitness Account', translated and annotated by Kate D. Levin	1251
The Owl's Almanac , edited by Neil Rhodes	1271
The Peacemaker ; or, Great Britain's Blessing , text edited and annotated by Paul Mulholland, introduced by Susan Dwyer Amussen	1303
Masque of Heroes ; or, The Inner Temple Masque , text edited and annotated by Jerzy Limon, introduced by James Knowles	1320
William Rowley, Thomas Middleton, and Thomas Heywood, An/The Old Law , edited by Jeffrey Masten	1331
The Triumphs of Love and Antiquity , text edited and annotated by David M. Bergeron, introduced by Lawrence Manley	1397
Thomas Middleton and William Rowley, The World Tossed at Tennis [A Courtly Masque], edited by C. E. McGee	1405
Honourable Entertainments and An Invention , edited by Anthony Parr	1431
Hengist, King of Kent ; or, The Mayor of Queenborough , edited by Grace Ioppolo	1448
Women, Beware Women: A Tragedy , edited by John Jowett	1488
William Shakespeare, adapted by Thomas Middleton, Measure for Measure: A Genetic Text , edited by John Jowett	1542
The Sun in Aries , text edited and annotated by David M. Bergeron, introduced by Michael Berlin	1586
Thomas Middleton and John Webster, Anything for a Quiet Life , edited by Leslie Thomson	1593

CONTENTS

William Rowley and Thomas Middleton, The Changeling , text edited and annotated by Douglas Bruster, introduced by Annabel Patterson	1632
The Nice Valour; or, The Passionate Madman , introduced and annotated by Susan Wiseman, text edited by Gary Taylor	1679
The Triumphs of Honour and Virtue , text edited and annotated by David M. Bergeron, introduced by Ania Loomba	1714
John Ford, Thomas Dekker, Thomas Middleton, and William Rowley, The Spanish Gypsy , text edited and annotated by Gary Taylor, introduced by Suzanne Gossett	1723
Thomas Middleton and Anthony Munday, The Triumphs of Integrity with The Triumphs of the Golden Fleece , edited by David M. Bergeron	1766
A Game at Chesse: An Early Form , edited by Gary Taylor	1773
A Game at Chess: A Later Form , edited by Gary Taylor	1825
Occasional Poems, 1619–25, edited by Gary Taylor	1886
Lost Pageant for Charles I: A Brief Account, by Gary Taylor	1898
The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity , text edited and annotated by David M. Bergeron, introduced by Bryan Reynolds	1901
Lost Political Prose, 1620–7: A Brief Account, by Thomas Cogswell	1907

Juvenilia 1597–1601

The Wisdom of Solomon Paraphrased , text edited and annotated by G. B. Shand, introduced by Debora Shuger	1915
Microcynicon: Six Snarling Satires , edited by Wendy Wall	1970
The Ghost of Lucrece , edited by G. B. Shand	1985
‘Simon Smellknave’ (pseud.), adapted by Thomas Middleton, The Penniless Parliament of Threadbare Poets , edited by Swapan Chakravorty	1999
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS	2012

ALPHABETICAL CONTENTS

Full titles, common abbreviations, and alternative titles are all given.
Asterisks mark the abbreviations used in this edition.

All's One	452	*Gypsy	1723
The Almanac	779	*'Hammond'	1896
Annals 1620-27	1907	Health and Prosperity	1901
The Ant and the Nightingale	149	*Hengist	1448
*Antiquity	1397	Hengist, King of Kent	1448
Anything for a Quiet Life	1593	*Heroes	1320
*The Arches of Triumph	219	*His Lordship's Entertainment	959
*Aries	1586	The Honest Whore, Part 1	280
*Banquet	637	Honour and Industry	1251
The *Black Book	204	Honour and Virtue	1714
The Bloody Banquet	637	Honourable Entertainments	1431
'Bolles'	1890	*Hubburd	149
'Burbage'	1889	*Industry	1251
Caesar's Fall	328	The Inner Temple Masque	1320
The *Changeling	1632	*Integrity	1766
'Charles I'	1898	An *Invention	1446
*Chaste Maid	907	'To the King'	1895
A Chaste Maid in Cheapside	907	'To the worthy accomplished Master William Hammond'	1896
The Chester Tragedy	328	*Lady	833
*Civitatis	1202	The Lady's Tragedy	833
Civitatis Amor	1202	The Life of Timon of Athens	467
The Conqueror's Custom	331	Love and Antiquity	1397
A Courtly Masque	1405	*Macbeth	1165
*Cupids	1027	*Mad World	414
*Dissemblers	1034	A Mad World, My Masters	414
'The Duchess of Malfi'	1894	*Magnificent	219
*Entertainments	1431	The Magnificent Entertainment	219
The Fair Prisoner	331	'Malfi'	1894
A Fair Quarrel	1209	The Manner of his Lordship's Entertainment	959
Farrago	1909	The Marriage of the Old and New Testaments	679
Father Hubburd's Tales	149	Masque of Cupids	1027
*Five Gallants	594	Masque of Heroes	1320
Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay	330	The Mayor of Queenborough	1448
*Game	1773	*Measure	1542
A Game at Chess	1773	Measure for Measure	1542
*Ghost	1985	*Meeting	183
The Ghost of Lucrece	1985	The Meeting of Gallants at an Ordinary	183
God's Parliament House	679	*Michaelmas	334
*Gravesend	128	Michaelmas Term	334
Great Britain's Blessing	1303

ALPHABETICAL CONTENTS

* Microcynicon	1970	*‘ St James ’	1891
Middleton’s Farrago	1909	* Sherley	670
Moll Cutpurse	721	Sir Robert Sherley his Entertainment in Cracovia	670
More Dissemblers Besides Women	1034	* Solomon	1915
New River Entertainment	959	The Spanish Gypsy	1723
News from Gravesend	128	The Sun in Aries	1586
A New Way to Please You	1331	‘ The Temple of St James ’	1891
The Nice Valour	1679	* Tennis	1405
The Nightingale and the Ant	149	* Timon	467
* No Wit	779	Timon of Athens	467
No Wit/Help like a Woman’s	779	*‘ To the King ’	1895
Occasional Poems	1886	The Tragedy of Macbeth	1165
An/The *Old Law	1331	* Trick	373
‘ On Sir George Bolles ’	1890	A Trick to Catch the Old One	373
‘ On the death of that great master in his art and quality, painting and playing; Richard Burbage ’	1889	The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity	1901
* Owl	1271	The Triumphs of Honour and Industry	1251
The Owl’s Almanac	1271	The Triumphs of Honour and Virtue	1714
Pageant for Charles I	1898	The Triumphs of Integrity	1766
The Passionate Madman	1679	The Triumphs of Love and Antiquity	1397
* Patient Man	280	The Triumphs of Truth	963
The Patient Man and the Honest Whore	280	* Truth	963
The *Peacemaker	1303	* Two Gates	679
* Penniless Parliament	1999	The Two Gates of Salvation	679
The Penniless Parliament of Threadbare Poets	1999	Two Shapes	328
The *Phoenix	91	‘ Upon this Masterpiece of Tragedy ’	1894
‘ The *Picture ’	1897	* Valour	1679
* Plato	195	The Viper and her Brood	332
Plato’s Cap cast at the year 1604	195	* Virtue	1714
* Prosperity	1901	The Walks in Paul’s	183
The *Puritan	509	* Weapons	980
The Puritan Maid, the Modest Wife, and the Wanton Widow	509	The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment	219
The Puritan Widow	509	The *Widow	1074
* Quarrel	1209	The Widow of Watling Street	509
* Quiet Life	1593	The Wisdom of Solomon Paraphrased	1915
* Revenger	543	Wit at Several Weapons	980
The Revenger’s Tragedy	543	The *Witch	1124
‘ Richard Burbage ’	1889	* Women Beware	1488
A Right Woman	328	Women, Beware Women	1488
The *Roaring Girl	721	The World Tossed at Tennis	1405
The Second Maiden’s Tragedy	833	* Yorkshire	452
		A Yorkshire Tragedy	452
		Your Five Gallants	594

INDEX OF TITLES BY GENRE

Civic Pageantry

Civitatis Amor	1202
Honourable Entertainments	1431
An Invention	1446
Lost Pageant for Charles I	1898
The Manner of his Lordship's Entertainment	959
Sir Robert Sherley his Entertainment in Cracovia	670
The Sun in Aries	1586
'The Temple of St James'	1891
The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity	1901
The Triumphs of Honour and Industry	1251
The Triumphs of Honour and Virtue	1714
The Triumphs of Integrity	1766
The Triumphs of Love and Antiquity	1397
The Triumphs of Truth	963
The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment	219

Comedies

Anything for a Quiet Life	1593
A Chaste Maid in Cheapside	907
A Game at Chess	1773
A Mad World, My Masters	414
Michaelmas Term	334
More Dissemblers Besides Women	1034
No Wit/Help like a Woman's	779
The Patient Man and the Honest Whore	280
The Phoenix	91
The Puritan Widow	509
The Roaring Girl	721
A Trick to Catch the Old One	373
The Widow	1074
Wit at Several Weapons	980
Your Five Gallants	594

English History Plays

The Chester Tragedy	328
A Game at Chess	1773
Hengist, King of Kent	1448

Masques

Masque of Cupids	1027
Masque of Heroes	1320
The World Tossed at Tennis	1405

Pamphlets and Poems

Annals	1907
The Black Book	204
Father Hubbard's Tales	149
The Ghost of Lucrece	1985
The Meeting of Gallants at an Ordinary	183
Microcynicon	1970
Middleton's Farrago	1909
News from Gravesend	128
'On Sir George Bolles'	1890
The Owl's Almanac	1271
The Peacemaker	1303
The Penniless Parliament of Threadbare Poets	1999
'The Picture'	1897
Plato's Cap	195
'Richard Burbage'	1889
Sir Robert Sherley his Entertainment in Cracovia	670
'The Temple of St James'	1891
The Two Gates of Salvation	679
'To the King'	1895
'To the worthily accomplished Master William Hammond'	1896
'Upon this Masterpiece of Tragedy'	1894
The Wisdom of Solomon Paraphrased	1915

Tragedies

The Bloody Banquet	637
Caesar's Fall	328
The Changeling	1632
The Lady's Tragedy	833
The Life of Timon of Athens	467
The Revenger's Tragedy	543
The Tragedy of Macbeth	1165
The Viper and her Brood	332
Women, Beware Women	1488

CONTENTS BY GENRE

A Yorkshire Tragedy	452	The Nice Valour	1679
		An/The Old Law	1331
		The Phoenix	91
Tragicomedies		The Spanish Gypsy	1723
A Fair Quarrel	1209	The Witch	1124
Measure for Measure	1542

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

Engraved portrait of Middleton, frontispiece to Two New Playes . . . Written by Tho. Middleton, Gent. (published by Humphrey Moseley in 1657; Wing M1989) By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	2
The Revells of Christendome (1609), engraved by Thomas Cockson (Hind 1:254-5) By permission of the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford	26
Title-page of A Game at Chess (1625; STC 17882) By permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California	27
Baptismal register of the parish of St Lawrence Jewry (Guildhall Library, London, MS 6974) By permission of The Reverend David Burgess, Guild Vicar, St Lawrence Jewry	27
St Lawrence Jewry neighbourhood, from Civitatis Londinium , 2 × 6 feet, printed from eight woodblocks (late sixteenth century, sometimes attributed to Ralph Agas) By permission of the Guildhall Library, London	28
Middleton coat of arms, detail, C.2, ‘Visitation of Surrey 1623’, f. 328 ^v By permission of the College of Arms	29
Roanoke woman and child, from an original watercolour painted in 1585 by John White Courtesy of the Department of Prints and Drawings, British Museum	30
Middleton’s signature, from the Bridgewater–Huntington manuscript of A Game at Chess By permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California	33
Thomas Hill, map of Walworth Manor, Newington, Surrey (1681), CCA-Map/19 (vellum) Courtesy of the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury Cathedral	39
Burial in a shroud, from a printed epitaph of 1580: R. B., ‘An Epitaph upon the death of the worshipful Master Benedict Spinola’ (STC 1057) By permission of the Society of Antiquaries	40
Mistress Turner’s Farewell to All Women (1615) By permission of the Society of Antiquaries	45
Engraved portrait of Middleton, frontispiece to Two New Playes . . . Written by Tho. Middleton, Gent. (published by Humphrey Moseley in 1657; Wing M1989) By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	48
Engraved portrait of Massinger, frontispiece to Three New Playes . . . Written by Philip Massenger, Gent. (published by Humphrey Moseley in 1655) By permission of the Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center, The University of Texas at Austin	48
Frontispiece to The Wits (1662; Wing W3218) By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	51
Frontispiece to Wit at Several Weapons , from Gerard Langbaine’s 1711 edition of The Works of Mr Francis Beaumont and Mr John Fletcher , volume 6 By permission of the Newberry Library	51
Bernard Partridge’s painting of Middleton’s chorus of witches in Macbeth , based on the 1898 production by Henry Irving (Folger Art vol. b18, #157) By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	53
Byam Shaw, ‘Re-enter Cupid’ (Folger Art Box 5534 #32 part 2) By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	54

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

Wyndham Lewis's illustration of Apemantus and the masque of ladies in Timon of Athens (Folger Art Box L677 #24, detail) By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	56
Janusza Stannego's cover art for the programme of a 1988/89 production of A Chaste Maid in Cheapside at Teatr Wybrzeże, Poland Courtesy of Jerzy Limon	56
Judi Dench (centre) as Bianca in the 1969 Royal Shakespeare Company production of Women, Beware Women , directed by Terry Hands, photographed by Tom Holte By permission of the Tom Holte Theatre Photographic Collection, Shakespeare Birthplace Trust	56
Helen Mirren as Moll Cutpurse in The Roaring Girl (Royal Shakespeare Company, directed by Barry Kyle, 1983), photographed by Donald Cooper By permission of Donald Cooper	57
From a panorama of London by J. C. Visscher (1616) By permission of the Guildhall Library Print Room	61
Map of Middleton's London, by David Seaver	61
From a diptych by John Gipkyn, Preaching at St Paul's Cross , c.1616 By permission of the Society of Antiquaries	71
Arend van Buchell's copy of Johannes de Witt's sketch of the Swan playhouse, 1596 Reprinted by permission of the Bibliotheek der Rijksuniversiteit, Utrecht	80
Scale reconstruction by Richard Leacroft of Inigo Jones's design for a private playhouse, possibly the Cockpit (also called the Phoenix) in Drury Lane. From Leacroft, Development of the English Playhouse (London: Methuen, 1973), p. 72 Reprinted by permission of the publisher	80
Elevation and plan from Inigo Jones's design for a private playhouse, c.1616 Reprinted by permission of the Provost and Fellows of Worcester College, Oxford	81
Sections from Inigo Jones's design for a private playhouse, c.1616 Reprinted by permission of the Provost and Fellows of Worcester College, Oxford	82
Ornament from News from Gravesend (1604, STC 12199), C1 ^v By permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California	139
Title-page of Father Hubburds Tales (1604, STC 17874.7) By permission of the British Library	165
Woodcut title-page to The Black Book (1604, STC 17875) By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	204
Stephen Harrison, The Arches of Triumph (1604; STC 12863a), title-page By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	225
Harrison, Arches of Triumph , the device called Londinium, in Fenchurch Street By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	234
Harrison, Arches of Triumph , the arch for the Italians' Pageant in Gracechurch Street By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	245
Harrison, Arches of Triumph , the arch for the Dutch pageant, by the Royal Exchange By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	248
Harrison, Arches of Triumph , the arch in Soper Lane By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	252
Harrison, Arches of Triumph , the arch at the Little Conduit By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	256
Harrison, Arches of Triumph , the arch in Fleet Street By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	262

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

Harrison, Arches of Triumph , the arch at Temple Bar By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	265
Thomas Coryat's Crudities (1611), opposite p. 262 By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	282
Thomas Lant, The Funeral Roll of Sir Philip Sidney (1587), p. 16 By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	284
Henry Peacham, Minerva Britanna (1612), Y2, detail Englisches Seminar, Westfälische Wilhelms-Universität Münster	333
Tactus (Touch), from a series of five prints representing the senses by Cornelis van Kittensteyn, after Dirck Hals (engraved between 1630 and 1663) By permission of the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston (George Peabody Gardner Fund)	373
Engraving from The Parable of the Prodigal Son , a series of six prints. Number 3, 'The son wasting his heritage with riotous living'. By Crispijn de Passe the elder. Late 16th or early 17th century By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	374
Portrait engraving of Sir Robert Sherley by Diego de Astor (1609) By permission of the British Museum	671
Graphic depiction of salvation theology, from William Perkins, A Golden Chain , in Works (1600), 123 By permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California	679
The G4 ^v /H1 opening of The Two Gates of Salvation (C.66.b.22) as it appears in the 1620 issue, showing the accidental reversal of Old and New Testament passages By permission of the British Library	682
Title-page of Nicholas Okes's edition of The Roaring Girl (1611, STC 17908) By permission of Princeton University Library	721
Monument on Chancel Paston Tomb, Norfolk Paston Church of St Margaret By permission of the Norfolk Paston Church of St Margaret	838
Portrait of Sir Hugh Myddelton by Cornelis Jonson van Ceulen By permission of the Baltimore Museum of Art	959
Sir Thomas Myddelton By permission of the Guildhall Art Gallery	964
The King of Moors on a leopard; from a manuscript drawing for Anthony Munday's Lord Mayor's Show for 1616, as reproduced in a nineteenth-century edition of the pageant for the Fishmongers By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	972
Interior of Merchant Taylors' Hall, c.1850 Reproduced by courtesy of The Merchant Taylors' Company	1030
Bronze statuette of Hecate (Padua, c.1520) Skulpturengalerie, Staatliche Museen, Preußischer Kulturbesitz, Berlin	1127
The witches, from Holinshed, Historie of Scotlande (1577; shelfmark 598.h.3), p. 243 By permission of the British Library	1166
Three bearded witches, from a 1901 edition of Mary Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare By permission of Florida State University	1166
Title-page of A Faire Quarrell (1617, STC 17911) By permission of Folger Shakespeare Library	1209
The arms of Sir George Bolles, from John Stow, Survey of London , ed. John Strype (1727) By permission of the University of California, Berkeley	1257
The arms of the Grocers, from John Stow, Survey of London , ed. John Strype (1727) By permission of the University of California, Berkeley	1258

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

Leathersellers, depicted in the 1604 charter of their company By permission of the University of California, Berkeley	1266
The arms of the East India Company By permission of the University of California, Berkeley	1268
The Owl's Almanac (1618, STC 6515), title-page By permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California	1271
Headpiece from The Peace-maker (1618, STC 14387), A3 Reprinted by permission of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Trustees of the Lambeth Palace Library	1306
Headpiece from The Peace-maker (1618; STC 14387, C.123.c.12 (3)), A4 By permission of the British Library	1307
Emblem of Aeneas fleeing Troy, 'Pietas filiorum in parentes', from Geoffrey Whitney, A Choice of Emblemes (1586), sig. X2 Courtesy of Houghton Library, Harvard College Library	1334
From The Old Law (1656), sig. G4 ^v Courtesy of Houghton Library, Harvard College Library	1372
From The Old Law (1656), sig. I3 Courtesy of Houghton Library, Harvard College Library	1384
From The Old Law (1656), sig. I3 ^v Courtesy of Houghton Library, Harvard College Library	1384
From The Old Law (1656), sig. I3 ^v Courtesy of Houghton Library, Harvard College Library	1385
From The Old Law (1656), sig. K1 ^v Courtesy of Houghton Library, Harvard College Library	1388
From The Old Law (1656), sig. K2 Courtesy of Houghton Library, Harvard College Library	1388
From The Old Law (1656), sig. K3 Courtesy of Houghton Library, Harvard College Library	1390
Title-page of The World Tossed at Tennis (1620, STC 17910) By permission of the Folger Shakespeare Library	1405
Set of silver-gilt cups in the shape of a cock standing on a tortoise, with removable heads for drinking, made in 1605 and owned by the Skinners' Company By permission of the British Library	1435
Shakespeare, Comedies, Histories, and Tragedies (1623, STC 22273), sig. F1 ^v By permission of the Shakespeare Birthplace Trust	1551
Shakespeare, Comedies, Histories, and Tragedies (1623, STC 22273), sig. G2 By permission of the Shakespeare Birthplace Trust	1571
'Peine Perdue', from Cesare Ripa, Iconologie (Paris, 1644; originally 1593) By permission of Stanford University	1715
Figures of Asia, Africa, Europe, and America, from Cesare Ripa, Iconologie (Paris, 1644; originally 1593) By permission of Stanford University	1717
'Donna Indiana Orientale Di Conditione', from Cesare Vecellio, Habiti Antichi Et Moderni , volume 2 (originally published 1598; from reprint, Paris, 1860) By permission of Stanford University	1718
Title-page of A Game at Chess , Mathewes–Allde edition (1625; STC 17884, shelf- mark RB 28185) By permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California	1773
Title-page to Thomas Scott, The Second Part of Vox Populi (1624; Hind, II, 43; STC 22103.7) By permission of the British Library	1775

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

Greates Brittaines Noble and worthy Councell of Warr (broadside, 1624; Hind, II, 396-7)	1777
By permission of the Society of Antiquaries
From The High and Mighty Prince Charles, Prince of Wales, &c. The Manner of his Arriuell at the Spanish Court, the Magnificence of his Royall Entertainment there: His happy Returne, and hearty welcome, both to the King and Kingdome of England, the fifth of October, 1623	1778
By permission of the Society of Antiquaries
A Game at Chesse , Trinity College, Cambridge manuscript O.2.66, fol. 4 recto	1780
By permission of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge
A Game at Chesse , Trinity College, Cambridge manuscript O.2.66, fol. 13 recto	1791
By permission of the Master and Fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge
Chess moves in A Game at Chess : opening of 1.1	1833
Chess moves in A Game at Chess : middle of 1.1	1839
Chess moves in A Game at Chess : endgame	1881
'Burbage', from a verse miscellany, c.1630; MS 1083/16, p. 271	1889
By permission of The Rosenbach Museum & Library
John Stow, The Survey of London , revised by Anthony Munday, Humfrey Dyson, et al. (1633; STC 23345), detail of p. 870, sig. 4E1 ^v	1890
By permission of the British Library
Stow, Survey of London (1633), detail of p. 147, sig. O2	1891
By permission of the British Library
Stow, Survey of London (1633), detail of p. 147, sig. O2	1892
By permission of the British Library
Stow, Survey of London (1633), detail of p. 148, sig. O2 ^v	1892
By permission of the British Library
Stow, Survey of London (1633), detail of p. 148, sig. O2 ^v	1893
By permission of the British Library
Stow, Survey of London (1633), detail of p. 148, sig. O2 ^v	1893
By permission of the British Library
Stow, Survey of London (1633), detail of p. 149, sig. O3	1894
By permission of the British Library
Middleton's commendatory poem in John Webster, The Duchess of Malfi (1623; STC 25176), sig. A4	1894
By permission of the Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center, The University of Texas at Austin
'To the King'; Add. MS 29492, detail of f. 43	1895
By permission of the British Library
'To the King'; MS Rawl. poet. 152, detail of f. 3	1895
By permission of the Bodleian Library
'Hammond', from MS Malone 25, p. vii	1896
By permission of the Bodleian Library
'The Picture', detail of the page facing the frontispiece of A Game at Chess (1625, STC 17882)	1897
By permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California
Title-page of The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity (1626, STC 17898)	1901
By permission of The Huntington Library, San Marino, California
Vice's Executioner, from George Wither, Abuses Stript and Whipt (1617)	1971
Department of Special Collections, the University of Chicago Library

HOW TO USE THIS BOOK

Gary Taylor

This edition of The Collected Works of Thomas Middleton is designed to make the full range of his work accessible to modern readers, in a way which will encourage both a wider appreciation of his achievement and a new understanding of the English Renaissance. As a result, it differs from other editions in a number of respects. Shakespeare's plays have been available in reasonably reliable and reasonably complete editions since 1623; by contrast, this book is the first one-volume collection of Middleton's works ever published. More generally, editorial paradigms based upon the unusual conditions of the Shakespeare canon are of limited relevance to Middleton (and many other writers). Rather than simply applying to Middleton modes of editorial practice developed to represent another author, we have sought to present Middleton's works in the manner most appropriate to their nature.

In finding their way around a relatively unfamiliar author in a relatively unfamiliar editorial format, readers may be helped by the following description of this book's special features.

Act Divisions. (See also SCENE DIVISIONS.) Unlike the plays of Marlowe and Shakespeare, the plays of their younger contemporary Middleton were not normally written for uninterrupted performance. Most of Middleton's plays were performed by companies which provided four musical intervals between the five acts of a play. Act divisions in such plays therefore reflect both authorial intention and early performance conditions. We mark act divisions in such plays by a special symbol (⊗), and by recurring Latin phrases ('Explicit Actus Primus' and 'Incipit Actus Secundus'), which Middleton regularly employed in his own manuscripts. By contrast, for early plays like The Patient Man and the Honest Whore and Timon of Athens, apparently written for continuous performance, we do not interpolate editorial act divisions or act numbers.

Acting Companies. Middleton, like most dramatists, wrote his plays for a variety of acting companies and theatres; these different venues had different physical arrangements, audiences, performance conventions, and talents. Moreover, the performance of any play depends upon active collaboration between the author(s) of the script and the other theatrical professionals who embody the text and transform it into visual and aural action. Therefore, on the first page of each play, we identify not only the title and author(s), but the acting company: 'Thomas Middleton, The Puritan Widow, for Paul's Boys' or 'Thomas Middleton, The Revenger's Tragedy, for the King's Men'.

Annotations. Many of Middleton's works have never before been annotated, or never adequately annotated, and the commentaries in this edition therefore contain much original scholarship. For most of the works, a glossarial commentary is provided at the foot of the page; these annotations are comparable to those in many one-volume textbook editions of Shakespeare. However, textbooks often homogenize commentaries to the level of a 'lowest common denominator' of readers. In order to avoid such flattening, and to remain sensitive to the different demands that certain texts make on the modern reader, this edition aims to make a virtue out of multivocality, illustrating a range of possible approaches to annotation by providing special commentaries for certain works. The notes to Your Five Gallants pay particular attention to theatrical problems, options, and opportunities. The commentary to The Widow provides extended notes on 'key words'—idioms with a complex historical significance, not easily indicated by a simple gloss. A detailed economic commentary is attached to The Triumphs of Honour and Industry. In The Two Gates of Salvation and The Peacemaker, annotation focuses upon the relationship between Middleton's text and its sources. The commentary to A Game at Chesse: An Early Form is dedicated to the play's historical and political referents; by contrast, the commentary to A Later Form of the same play is systematically literary and theatrical. Varieties of feminist commentary are provided for A Mad World, My Masters, A Trick to Catch the Old One, The Roaring Girl, and A Chaste Maid in Cheapside. The commentary to Old Law, adopting the protocols of recent historicist and materialist criticism, mixes textual apparatus with annotation and photography with type. Middleton's adaptation of Macbeth, already widely available, is printed here without any glossarial commentary, giving readers the (contrasting) experience of a 'plain text'. Not all readers will find all these approaches equally valuable, but juxtaposing them within the covers of one volume will, we hope, call attention to the ways in which annotation itself shapes our experience of a text.

Authorship. This edition contains texts of all Middleton's known surviving works, and brief descriptions of what we know about his various lost ones. It includes works written by Middleton alone, works written by Middleton in COLLABORATION with other writers, and works by other writers which Middleton later adapted. The exact division of labour between authors is often difficult to determine, but the Introduction to each text summarizes what is generally believed about the attribution of particular scenes or passages. In some early works—particularly The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment and News from Gravesend—Middleton's share of the text seems to have been relatively small, but we have included the entire work, in the belief that Middleton's contribution can only be understood in its full context. This edition omits three plays—Blurt, Master Constable and The Honest Whore, Part Two (by Thomas Dekker) and The Family of Love (by Loring Barry)—which were attributed to Middleton in nineteenth-century editions. Decisions about which works to include have been based on a variety of documentary and stylistic evidence, laid out in full in the Companion (p. 331).

Character Names. In the original texts, many characters are not given personal names, but identified by generic social labels (Tyrant, Queen, Lady, Clown, White Queen's Pawn). At other times, a proper name is given somewhere in the text, but speech prefixes and stage directions use the generic label. In the eighteenth century, editors of Shakespeare and other English dramatists began systematically supplying personal names for dramatic characters, whenever they could be found. We have normally retained the original generic labels in STAGE DIRECTIONS and SPEECH PREFIXES, believing they reflect an emphasis upon social and theatrical roles rather than unique individuals. However, in exceptional circumstances—for one character in A Trick to Catch the Old One and several in A Game at Chess: A Later Form—it has seemed more important to provide proper names. (See CONSISTENCY.)

Chronology. The works are arranged in The Collected Works in what we believe to be their order of composition, from 1602 to 1627 (with the juvenilia of 1597–1601 placed in a separate sequence at the end). The order of 'authorial making' closely resembles the order of 'making public', since the plays and pageants were written for immediate performance, and all the pamphlets were apparently published soon after their composition. The evidence for the dating of individual works is given in full in the 'Canon and Chronology' section of the Companion (p. 331). Although the exact sequence of texts in a given year may be debatable, the broad outlines of the chronology are not disputed. This temporal arrangement makes it possible, for those readers interested in individual agency and artistry, to follow the author's own development; but it also enables others to situate each work in its historical and social moment. Moreover, because Middleton's pamphlets and pageants are less familiar than his plays, an arrangement by GENRES might ghettoize those works; a chronological arrangement, by contrast, juxtaposes familiar with unfamiliar texts, and shows the range of genres Middleton could juggle at one time.

Collaboration. The exact division of AUTHORSHIP in collaborative works is sometimes easy, sometimes difficult, to determine. Nevertheless, in the table of contents and on the title-pages of individual collaborative works we have listed the authors' names in an order which reflects our assessment of the relative size of their contribution to the work. Thus, Dekker's name is listed before Middleton's in The Patient Man and the Honest Whore, because Dekker seems to have written more of that play; but Middleton's name is listed before Dekker's in The Roaring Girl, because Middleton seems to have written more of that play.

Consistency. This edition does not attempt to provide or impose a unified view of Middleton or his works. The contributors come from different disciplines (literature, history, theatre, and theology); the ANNOTATIONS focus upon different aspects of the texts; different EDITORIAL PRACTICES are adopted for different works; and the critical introductions adopt different critical perspectives (from the performance orientation of A Mad World, My Masters to the postcolonial focus of The Triumphs of Honour and Virtue). This diversity is deliberate. It derives from a belief that authors and their readers are better served by a 'federal' than a 'unified' edition. By calling attention to the variety of ways in which the works of an author may be interpreted and edited, a 'federal' edition celebrates the play of difference and acknowledges the foreclosure of possibilities entailed in every act of choice.

Cross-reference. Each text in The Collected Works is provided with a textual introduction and apparatus in the Companion. The relevant page numbers are given at the end of each critical introduction in The Collected Works.

Doubling. Early modern plays were designed for performance by relatively small companies of actors, who were accustomed to doubling roles. Doubling offered opportunities for virtuoso acting; moreover, the need to double often influenced authorial decisions about the presence or absence of certain characters in certain scenes (since the same actor could not simultaneously play two different characters). Charts of doubling possibilities are printed after Anything for a Quiet Life, The Changeling, A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, A Fair Quarrel, The Lady's Tragedy, Macbeth, A Mad World, My Masters, Measure for Measure, Michaelmas Term, More Dissemblers Besides Women, No Wit/Help like a Woman's, The Phoenix, The Roaring Girl, The Spanish Gypsy, Timon of Athens, The Widow, Wit at Several Weapons, The Witch, Women, Beware Women, The World Tossed at Tennis; the very few doubling possibilities in A Game at Chess: A Later Form are noted in the commentary to its list of Persons.

Dramatis Personae. The history of dramatis personae lists in English drama, up to 1680, is traced in the Companion in the essay called 'The Order of Persons' (p. 31). Within the Middleton canon, a few dramatic texts—The Roaring Girl, Masque of Heroes, A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, The Bloody Banquet—were originally published with preliminary lists (which appear to be authorial) of their fictional characters. But most were published without such lists, or with lists apparently added by scribes or editors. In constructing editorial lists for plays that lack them, or modifying unauthoritative seventeenth-century lists, we have adopted the principles of organization used in the authorial lists. Accordingly, in most of the lists in this edition CHARACTER NAMES are grouped in households, not divided by gender, or even by rank. For the convenience of modern readers, the label given the character in SPEECH PREFIXES is printed in small capitals in the list of Persons.

Editorial Practices and Principles. The Companion includes full bibliographical descriptions of the early documents, critical analysis of their transmission and relationships, and a detailed textual apparatus for each work. A Game at Chess survives in more early independent documents than any play of the English Renaissance. By contrast, most of Middleton's works have come down to us in only a single authoritative early manuscript or printed edition, from which all later texts derive. For such single-text works, the editor's primary task is to reproduce, accurately, the substance of that earliest document, and at the same time to make it accessible to modern readers. (See PUNCTUATION, SPELLING, and STAGE DIRECTIONS.) However, all forms of early modern textual transmission introduced errors; accordingly, texts have been emended where the editors believe that such an error has occurred. How many emendations have been made in any given work depends in large part upon the quality of the early document, but also in part upon the attitude of the individual editor: some editors are more interested in detecting error, and more adventurous in correcting it, than others. All such emendations, and all variants in authoritative early texts, are recorded in the Companion; emendations and variants are not marked in the text of this volume. However, so that readers of the Collected Works may sample the kinds of editorial decision-making that affect all the texts in this book (and all modern texts of other Renaissance writers), we have foregrounded the editorial process in a few cases. In Old Law, textual notes are incorporated in the on-page commentary. For the Occasional Poems, each edited text is accompanied by a photograph of at least one relevant early document. We also reproduce two pages of a manuscript in Middleton's own handwriting (see A Game at Chess: An Early Form).

Genres. Early seventeenth-century collections of the works of Ben Jonson and William Shakespeare divided their texts into distinct literary genres. Although Middleton's canon is even more diverse, there is no comparable early collection of his works, and so no such early division into traditional formal categories. Those interested in such groupings may prefer to organize their reading by consulting the editorial Index of Titles by Genre (p. 11).

Illustrations. Middleton's plays were illustrated more often than those of any other Renaissance playwright; this volume reproduces all the relevant title-pages, and in the spirit of Middleton's own practice also incorporates other visual material from the period. We do not, however, preserve the exact size of the original images, and some images are cropped; we have seldom retained unprinted margins in their full extent. Modern reproductions of early book pages often remove show-through and offset and enhance the contrast between dark ink and white paper, so that they resemble the pages of present-day books more closely; in some cases we have left the signs of earlier printing processes in place. For example, the background in the plates from The Arches of Triumph (p. 225) is not processed to make it uniform.

Indexes. Because both the canon and CHRONOLOGY of Middleton's work will be unfamiliar to most readers, for finding a particular text the main Table of Contents may be less useful than the Alphabetical Contents (p. 9), or the Index of Titles by Genre (p. 11). The 'key words' indexed in The Widow (p. 1123) occur in many other texts.

Metrical Markers. We indicate obsolete pronunciations when they seem necessary to the metre of verse lines. A diaeresis indicates that the 'i' in words like 'conversati^on' should be pronounced as a separate unstressed syllable, so that 'conversati^on' has five syllables instead of the modern four. Every such diaeresis is editorial. An accent over the 'e' in words like 'injurèd' indicates that the past participle should be pronounced as a separate syllable, so that 'injurèd' has three syllables instead of the modern two. Middleton's early texts usually distinguish orthographically the obsolete from the modern pronunciation.

Modernization. See PUNCTUATION and SPELLING.

Music and Dance. Whenever an early score or choreography has survived, cross-references at the end of the Critical Introduction will alert readers to the relevant pages of the Companion where they are reproduced and discussed.

Punctuation. For most works, the text has been modernized to make it more intelligible for contemporary readers. Readers interested in how Middleton himself punctuated his texts may consult A Game at Chess: An Early Form, most of which is based on autograph manuscripts. For parts of Game, and all his other works, we do not have Middleton's own handwritten copy, and the earliest surviving document mixes the punctuation practices of the author(s) with those of scribe(s) and/or printing-house compositor(s). Moreover, every act of punctuation, whether made by an early copyist or a modern editor, necessarily involves arbitrary choices, which will encourage one pronunciation or interpretation over another; every system of punctuation to some degree disambiguates a text which may be deliberately ambiguous. Readers interested in how a familiar but deeply ambiguous text would look without the arbitrary choices imposed by punctuation may consult Middleton's adaptation of Shakespeare's Macbeth, here printed without punctuation. This unpunctuated text is initially hard to read, but anyone desiring a more user-friendly Macbeth can easily find one.

Revised Versions. Middleton, like other writers, sometimes revised his own work, and sometimes had it altered by other people, with or without his consent. To illustrate such transformations, we have adopted distinct editorial strategies for different works. The Nightingale and the Ant (a.k.a. Father Hubbard's Tales) illustrates how a literary work may have been reshaped in the collaborative interactions between an author and publisher. The two texts of The Lady's Tragedy, printed in parallel, illustrate how a play developed in the normal transition between an author's original manuscript and an acting company's final (censored) promptbook. The two versions of A Game at Chess, printed separately in sequence, illustrate an authorial and theatrical transformation so radical and extensive that the two texts in some ways constitute two distinct works. In Measure for Measure and Macbeth, though we present only a single text, the typography of our 'genetic text' emphasizes the process of adaptation rather than the original or final state of the text. In Penniless Parliament, the commentary tracks Middleton's abridgements and expansions of the original pamphlet.

Scene Divisions. (See also ACT DIVISIONS.) In early modern theatrical practice, a 'scene' is not a unit of fictional space (defined by a location) but a unit of action (defined by the movement of actors). Middleton's theatres did not use scenic backdrops, and the fictional location of the onstage action was indicated by dialogue or props, and sometimes not at all; moreover, a scene which begins in one fictional place may sometimes shift to another, or abandon scenic fictions altogether, foregrounding instead the situation of an actor on a platform facing an audience. Consequently, the text of this edition does not provide a novelistic or Cartesian locale for each scene ('Another Part of the Polis'). However, for ease of reference we do identify and number, in the margins, separate scene-units. One scene ends whenever all the characters/actors present leave the playing space; a new scene begins with the subsequent entry of one or more characters/actors. In most cases, these scene divisions and numbers were not supplied in the earliest texts. In A Game at Chess: An Early Form, we follow Middleton's own practice in marking act divisions, but not scene divisions.

Speech Prefixes. In seventeenth-century texts, speech prefixes are usually abbreviated, and written immediately to the left of the first words of the speech; this practice is retained in A Game at Chess: An Early Form. In all other plays—and in A Game at Chess: A Later Form—for convenience and intelligibility we give the CHARACTER NAMES in full. When the first words of the speech are a full verse line, the use of an unabbreviated speech prefix would almost inevitably have the effect of making speech prefix and verse line together too long to fit the column, thus producing turn-overs at the beginning of thousands of speeches; to avoid this, the speech prefix is placed above the first line, rather than beside it. For prose speeches, or speeches which complete a verse line begun by another speaker, the prefix is placed on the same line as the character's first words. (See also SPLIT VERSE LINES.)

Spelling. Those who wish to read Middleton in the spelling of his time may do so by turning to the photographs of Occasional Poems, or to A Game at Chess: An Early Form. But because this edition aims to make Middleton accessible to anyone interested in literature and drama, we have in all other cases modernized spelling (even when we know Middleton usually spelled a word differently), in accordance with the principles adopted for the Oxford

Shakespeare. The running TITLES, at the top of each page, offer a different spelling, based on one or more original documents; we hope these will remind users of this edition that they are reading a text which has been modernized. Those interested in the editorial process of modernization may consult the commentary to Old Law in this volume, or the textual notes to other works in the Companion, which discuss problematic cases of modernization.

Split Verse Lines. Middleton, like other verse dramatists, often divided a verse line between two or more speakers. Early modern texts seldom represent this formal feature visually, and we retain the typical early modern typographical arrangement in A Game at Chess: An Early Form. But elsewhere for the convenience of modern readers we have editorially indented the concluding part(s) of such a divided verse line in order to show the metrical integrity of the line. For instance, in the manuscript of The Lady's Tragedy the end of one character's speech and the beginning of the next speech (1.1.208) were written as follows:

see it effected.

Mem. wth best care, my lord

This is clearly intended as a single iambic pentameter line, which we print as follows:

See it effected.

MEMPHONIUS With best care, my lord.

However, in some cases three part-lines are written in such a way that the middle part-line could form a complete verse line with either the preceding or the following part-line. For instance, an exchange in The Widow (4.2.197-99) was printed this way in the 1652 first edition:

Bra. I'm all well there.

La. You feel no grief i'th' kidney.

Bra. Sound, sound, sound sir.

The middle speech is an 'amphibious' part-line, which would make an acceptable Middleton verse line in either direction: either

I'm all well there.

You feel no grief i'th' kidney?

or

You feel no grief i'th' kidney?

Sound, sound, sound, sir.

Since both arrangements are equally acceptable, and since the fluidity of the verse in fact depends upon the metrical ambiguity of the amphibious part-line, it would be arbitrary and misleading to adopt either of the two alternative indentations. Accordingly, in such cases all three part-lines are printed immediately to the right of the speech prefix, without indentation.

BRANDINO I'm all well there.

LATROCINIO You feel no grief i'th' kidney?

BRANDINO Sound, sound, sound, sir.

Visually, such arrangements are indistinguishable from three short prose speeches, but the surrounding context should alert readers to whether they are dealing with prose or verse. (Middleton sometimes moves in and out of verse even within a single speech, so if the context does not clarify whether short lines are verse or prose, then the visual ambiguity reflects a formal ambiguity.)

Stage Directions. With Middleton as with other playwrights of his time, early texts are often deficient in describing stage action, even at so basic a level as the entrance and exit of actors. This edition's stage directions are designed to provide the minimum assistance necessary to make the text theatrically intelligible. All editorial additions of debatable directions (including, for instance, most asides, indications of the person addressed by a particular speech, and gestures) are printed in the text within square brackets, but are not recorded in the Companion. The Companion does include, for every play, a list of every original stage direction, in its original SPELLING and PUNCTUATION, keyed to its position in this edition and (where different) to its exact original location.

Texts/Events. Middleton's works occupy a continuum which runs from objects (printed pamphlets) to unique events (pageants only performed once). To the extent that a work is an object, the specific material forms which concretely embody its language may themselves constitute part of its meaning. (See TYPOGRAPHY.) To the extent that a work is a unique event, where it takes place is part of its meaning: those locations are described in the introductory essays on London (by Paul Seaver) and on the London theatres (by Scott McMillin). Moreover, the same event may be described differently by different witnesses: hence we include alternative descriptions of two pageants, The Triumphs of Truth and The Triumphs of Honour and Industry, by foreign ambassadors. More generally, an event may be described in more than one object; hence, we include in our 'text' of The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment commemorative scripts of the event originally printed in three different publications by three of its collaborative creators, and we include accounts of the Lord Mayor's pageant of 1623 published separately by Thomas Middleton and his collaborator Anthony Munday. Finally, because play texts fall somewhere between these two categories—they are objects purchased by solitary readers, and at the same time they are attempts to represent and regulate recurring events—they can be edited and understood as objects and/or events: see ACT DIVISIONS, PUNCTUATION, SPELLING, and STAGE DIRECTIONS.

Titles. Because Middleton's works are not burdened by overfamiliarity, modern editors may restore their original titles without offending traditional taste. In one case, the only early text has no title at all, and we have supplied a conjectural title of our own (The Lady's Tragedy), to replace an earlier, grossly inaccurate conjecture (The Second Maiden's Tragedy). Generally the editorial problem is not dearth, but surplus. A number of Middleton's works are given—in separate early documents, or even within the same document—more than one title. In such cases, the running titles in our edition vary from page to page, thereby preserving the titular instability of the work throughout the experience of reading it. Thus, on any given opening, the reader may see 'The Nice Valour' above the left-hand page, and the alternative title 'The Passionate Mad-man' above the right-hand page, of the same play. We believe readers are capable of thinking stereoscopically, and that no real confusion should result from this practice, which preserves and foregrounds evidence which traditional editions routinely suppress.

Typography. All written and printed texts are embodied forms of language: the size, layout, calligraphy or typography of a text all signal its relationships to other texts, and encode the relationships of its parts to one another. No single book can incorporate the great and deliberate variety of embodiments of Middleton's early texts, and in any case those early embodiments would be unfamiliar and unintelligible to most modern readers. However, this edition does call attention to the range and significance of those early embodiments, in part by photographic illustrations, in part by preserving in a modern form the typographical distinctions of the original texts. Thus, the distinctive 1604 title-page of The Black Book is reproduced at the beginning of our introduction to it; the original's use of 'black letter' type for certain sections of the work is indicated here by use of a sans serif font (which suggests the emblematic visual 'blackening' of the text, but does so in a form more intelligible to modern readers); the original gothic font is reproduced in the running TITLES, where readers can be reminded of its function without being disturbed by its (to them) illegibility. Likewise, we preserve the extraordinary six-column openings of The Two Gates of Salvation, but do so in modern typefaces and modern SPELLING.

Website. At <http://thomasmiddleton.org> we publish further information relevant to Middleton and his texts, including additional indexes, illustrations, and links to other sites. It is hoped that this expanding site will eventually contain a concordance to The Collected Works.

Works Cited. In the various introductions and commentaries in this volume, references to other works are given in an abbreviated form within parentheses. Full citations for these authors and works can be found at the end of the textual introductions in the Companion. This arrangement enables us to document our scholarly sources and obligations, while minimizing the distraction caused to ordinary readers by the courtesy rituals of academic culture.

MIDDLETON AND HIS WORLD

This page intentionally left blank

THOMAS MIDDLETON: LIVES AND AFTERLIVES

Gary Taylor

THOMAS MIDDLETON and William Shakespeare were the only writers of the English Renaissance who created plays still considered masterpieces in four major dramatic genres: comedy, history, tragedy, and tragicomedy. Middleton was the only playwright trusted by Shakespeare's company to adapt Shakespeare's plays after his death. Middleton wrote the biggest hit performed by Shakespeare's company (or any other company in their lifetimes): the most talked-about dramatic work of its era, with the longest consecutive run, the most manuscript copies, the most surreptitious editions, the first engraved title-pages. But Middleton's triumphs were not confined to one company of actors: he wrote successful scripts for more theatrical venues than any of his contemporaries. The only seventeenth-century printed anthology of memorable passages from English plays quoted the Middleton canon more often than the works of any other playwright. He wrote the period's most popular theatrical song. The first English play translated into Dutch was by Middleton; his work was performed in Amsterdam and Dublin, and accounts of it were dispatched to Brussels, The Hague, Madrid, Florence, Rome, Venice, and Moscow. On and off the commercial stage, Middleton mastered more genres than any English writer of his time. Middleton was the greatest stylist of the Jacobean pamphlet, as Thomas Nashe had been of the Elizabethan pamphlet; as Ben Jonson dominated the court masque, Middleton dominated civic revels. Satirist, polemicist, ghost-writer for a king, co-author of the first masque transferred to the commercial stage, author of the most expensive and elaborate Lord Mayor's pageant that had ever been produced, Middleton was also the first officially appointed Chronologer of London.

'The Hogarth of the pen', he would be called, in a review of the first collected edition of his work (1840); Swinburne praised his 'perfect Hogarthian comedy' (1886), and the first Dictionary of National Biography crowned him the 'most veracious painter' of London life (1894). Middleton anticipates Hogarth's sharp ironic eye, his precise capacious vision of the exploding crowded mixedness of urban life. But the anonymous Victorian who compared Middleton to Hogarth was ambivalent about them both: both could be too 'gross' for his own admittedly 'fastidious' taste. Middleton has always made some people uncomfortable. In his own lifetime, his work was publicly burned, condemned from the pulpit in the yard of St Paul's Cathedral, banned by the Privy Council, compared to toilet paper. Cities, Hogarth and Middleton rudely remind us, require sewers—and brothels.

Hogarth's first popular success was A Harlot's Progress. The word 'pornographer' literally means 'prostitute-depicter', and in that sense both Hogarth and Middleton qualify. Their worlds wriggle with mistresses, courtesans, whores and whoremongers and whore managers. Middleton sexed language, and languaged sex, more comprehensively and creatively than any other writer in English. He dramatized literal incest in The Revenger's Tragedy and Women, Beware Women, an adult son's obsession with his mother's sexuality in A Fair Quarrel, a husband happily pimping his wife in A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, another literally selling his in The Phoenix. Middleton depicted the allure of a male transvestite in Microcynicon and a female transvestite in The Roaring Girl, stalking and sexual blackmail in The Changeling, castration and a sexually abusive priest in A Game at Chess, marital rape in Hengist, King of Kent, male impotence in The Witch, masochism in The Nice Valour, necrophilia in The Lady's Tragedy, pedophilia in Anything for a Quiet Life, an adulteress compelled to eat the corpse of her lover in The Bloody Banquet. He invoked 'back door' sex, male and female, more often than any of his contemporaries. He inventively—in A Mad World, My Masters, The Roaring Girl, and No Wit/Help like a Woman's—circumvented the prohibition on live onstage sex (fornication, masturbation, lesbianism). Hogarth saves pornography for morality by burying his syphilitic harlot at age 23. Middleton is more generous to his Molls, giving them ethics and eloquence, and dismissing them to whatever happiness can be afforded by marriage to their customers.

But by comparing Middleton to Hogarth, we extract him from the world he represents. The artists of his own time provide better parallels for his life and work. The anonymous Young Man with a Skull, depicted by Frans Hals, could have been inspired by the first scene of The Revenger's Tragedy. Middleton's tragedies can be as lurid, brutal, and demystifying as Caravaggio's David and Goliath or Judith and Holofernes. Caravaggio's torn, furrowed-browed Doubting Thomas, caught red-handed in that electric moment when scepticism thrusts its finger into faith, could be doubting Thomas Middleton's Captain Ager ('That man should hazard all upon things doubtful') or Vindice ('O, I'm in doubt, whether I'm myself or no') or Timon ('I must ever doubt, though ne'er so sure'). In Middleton's The Widow, as in Caravaggio's great painting The Tooth-Drawer in a Tavern, a con-artist extracts a painful rotten tooth; both Your Five Gallants and Caravaggio's The Cardsharps show us a naïve young man being cheated in a card game; Caravaggio’s Fortune Teller could be illustrating a scene from The Spanish Gypsy. But Middleton could also, like Peter Paul Rubens, portray King James as Solomon, animate allegorical figures like Envy and Peace, dedicate his art to the production of an ephemeral royal parade. As Middleton did in his outdoor pageants and indoor entertainments, Frans Hals painted official group portraits of serious urban dignitaries; but Hals could also crowd canvasses like Merrymakers at Shrovetide with the same seemingly spontaneous carnival abundance that Middleton packed into A Chaste Maid in Cheapside. The genre paintings of Caravaggio and Hals and the comedies of Middleton do not represent ancient gods and legendary heroes at moments of world-historical significance; instead, we see people like ourselves and our neighbours, doing things we and our neighbours do every day (and night).

1. The Revells of Christendome (1609)—engraved by Thomas Cockson, with verses by an unidentified English poet, ‘sold by Mary Oliver in Westminster Hall’—includes caricatures of King James (third from left), Henri IV of France, Prince Maurice, Christian IV of Denmark, the Pope, a Jesuit Cardinal, etc.

Like these painters, Middleton belonged to an expansive European culture. But he also, like them, belonged to a partisan locality. In the 1609 engraving The Revells of Christendome (Illus. 1), as in the 1625 engraved title-page of Middleton’s A Game at Chess (Illus. 2), the official group portrait is satirically superimposed upon an indecorous genre scene. The most powerful men in Europe are imagined as mere gamblers around a table, playing with the fate of nations and the kingdom of heaven. Recognizable individuals inhabit an allegorical action; genres clash; words breed with images. A visual artist collaborates with a poet; both collaborate with the technicians of print; they all collaborate with an entrepreneur who markets their work to a mass public.

However unique Middleton’s achievement, it depended upon such middlemen: actors, producers, publishers, printers, carpenters, composers, choreographers, collabor-

2. The title-page of A Game at Chess (1625) does not identify the author (Middleton), printer (Nicholas Okes), or engraver, but features caricatures of Prince Charles (bottom right), the Spanish ambassador Gondomar (middle), and the Archbishop of Spalato (left); others seated at the table include Felipe IV of Spain (top left) and King James (top right).

ators of all kinds. Like everyone else's, Middleton's life took place in the middle of other lives. Consider, for example, the inaugural record of his existence (Illus. 3). In it, he is linked directly to his father (no mother being mentioned), and less directly to the names of other children born into the same parish that year: age-mates like Mary Dunscombe, whose mother was buried six days after her baby's baptism, or Anthony Brisley, who would die in a plague epidemic when they were thirteen. In emerging from a womb, Middleton entered a community. Therefore, his entry on this list does not commemorate his birth. It records his baptism: not a private biological event but a public linguistic ceremony, by which a child officially entered into language, was christened and received 'into the congregation of Christ's flock'. Indeed, this list of names existed as a consequence of the Reformation of Christ's flock: in 1538, Henry VIII had ordered every English community to keep a record of its conformity to the new state religion. As a result, every parish had its own bureaucratic 'church book', like the one which becomes a major comic prop in Old Law, like the one which records Middleton's emergence from his mother's womb into a parish. On 18 April in the year of our Lord 1580—the year that Jesuits first entered England, in an attempt to roll back the Reformation—Thomas Middleton's godparents, as prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, vowed to teach him 'the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments in the English tongue, and all other things which a Christian man ought to know and believe to his soul's health', so that he might inherit 'everlasting salvation'. As in Isaak Walton's celebrated biographies of John Donne and George Herbert, as in the private diaries of a London tradesman like Nehemiah Wallington, Thomas Middleton's life was, from its first moments, understood in relation to an after-life.

3. Parish register with record of Middleton's baptism.

Any story about Middleton's life and after-life is thus, inevitably, a story of more than one life, of connected lives, of the lives in particular of men who could write their names in the emergent market-place of textual capitalism. But it is also the story of one man's singularity, and of his relationship to what was excluded from that record of his baptism: women.

Generation

In 1580, Anne Middleton was forty-one or forty-two. She presumably gave birth at home, attended by a midwife, who would have tightly wrapped the new-born in swaddling clothes, to keep him warm and immobile. Infant mortality being high, babies were given the benefits of Christianity almost immediately, and Thomas was baptized—probably within days of his birth—in the adjacent church of St Lawrence Jewry. This is the parish church where his parents had been married, where three other Middleton children were baptized and where two of them were soon buried, where his father would be buried, where his mother would remarry.

St Lawrence Jewry (so called 'because of old time many Jews inhabited thereabout') was a 'fair and large' church where, in 1501, Thomas More had given a famous series of lectures on St Augustine's De Civitate Dei. It is also a church where, until at least the 1590s, a child could have looked up and seen, 'fastened to a post of timber', the ancient shin-bone 'of a man (as it is taken)', which measured '25 inches in length by the rule' and was of a remarkable 'thickness, hardness and strength'. But if the past of the church was Catholic and magical, its present was determinedly Protestant. The minister who baptized Middleton was old Robert Crowley, a famous preacher and non-conformist, chosen by the parishioners themselves. For most of Middleton's childhood (1581–94), the vicar was George Dickins, an MA from Christ Church, Oxford, who held prebendaries at St Paul's Cathedral. Dickins was succeeded by another Oxford graduate, Thomas Sanderson of Balliol, whose education had been funded by scholarships from the Haberdashers' Company; Sanderson would become one of the translators of the 1611 'King James' Bible and the author of an anti-Catholic polemic. Unlike many parts of the country, prosperous London parishes were served by the best-educated ministers the Church of England could produce. Their parishioners wanted, and were willing to pay for, extra sermons every week.

4. William Middleton lived on 'Catteton Strete' (in 1582) and on 'Ironmonger Lane' (in 1586); probably both documents refer to the same house, on the south-west corner of the intersection of the two streets. As a boy Thomas could have walked to Cheapside (bottom) in a minute and a half, and to St Paul's churchyard (far left) in less than five.

Neither Dickins nor Sanderson seems to have been what contemporaries would have called, disparagingly, a 'Puritan' (or a 'presbyterian'); neither advocated further reforms in the rituals or ecclesiastical government of the English Church. But both ministers, like the Church hierarchy until the early seventeenth century, would have internalized and propagated some version of the theology of Jean Calvin (1509–64), a French refugee in Geneva, and the most popular writer in England during Middleton's lifetime. Calvin himself was an eclectic thinker, a tortured humanist who never achieved personal peace or intellectual closure; the best theological minds of early modern Europe wrestled with the problems Calvin posed. Middleton's introduction to such ideas would have taken the simplified form of a memorized catechism, like the one printed in thirty-nine English editions of the Geneva Bible between 1579 and 1616:

Question: Are not all ordained unto eternal life?

Answer: Some are vessels of wrath ordained unto destruction, as others are vessels of mercy prepared to glory.

Question: How standeth it with God's justice that some are appointed unto damnation?

Answer: Very well because all men have in themselves sin which deserveth no less, and therefore the mercy of God is wonderful in that he vouchsafeth to save some of that sinful race and to bring them to the knowledge of the truth.

Human nature was universally depraved. Its depravity began in the womb: 'we may be damned', John Donne insisted, 'though we be never born', and Calvin observed that 'in children many things are corrupt'. Such attitudes obviously affected how parents treated their children, and how children imagined themselves. No one could merit salvation. No amount of good work, no mere exercise of will, could close the gap between human possibility and divine law. God nevertheless, by an undeserved gift of his grace, had predestined some for election to heaven. Most were foreordained to damnation. These may seem abstruse philosophical issues, but an Italian visitor to England in the 1580s reported that 'the very women and shopkeepers were able to judge of predestination'.

To get to the church where such doctrines were taught, the Middletons had only to cross the street, and walk a block. They lived at the intersection of Ironmonger Lane and Catteton Street, in the prosperous Old Jewry area of the city, just north of the really wealthy houses and shops along the wide main thoroughfare of Cheapside (Illus. 4). Middleton grew up in the ward of Cheapside, the setting of one of his most famous plays. The centre of London government, the Guildhall, was—and still is—just behind the church of St Lawrence Jewry, and the processions celebrating the annual installation of a new Lord Mayor would have passed within a block of the Middleton home. In 1592, the mayor so celebrated was Sir William Roe, an ironmonger, neighbour, and fellow parishioner. In 1582 William Middleton (assessed at £20 in the tax roll) was the wealthiest of the nineteen named householders on Catteton Street, and among the wealthiest 10 per cent of Londoners overall; however, more than twenty members of the parish were assessed at £50, and one at £200. But although Ben Jonson's play Every Man in his Humour (1598) could thus plausibly allude to 'the rich merchant in the Old Jewry', the neighbourhood, like most neighbourhoods at the time, had a diverse population. The impressive timbered Tudor houses along the main streets were backed by tenements in the warren of narrow unpaved alleys and lanes which contemporary maps do not show, and even in the better homes masters and mistresses lived with their apprentices and servants. A single household could contain its own miniature social order.

In church all classes sang the same psalms. The gospel promised salvation to 'men of every sort'. But although the parish population may have been mixed by the distributions of geography and grace, it was conspicuously stratified by rank and status. Parishioners were arranged in their pews 'in order, in their degrees and callings'. Common people would often rise and bow when their betters entered the church and made their progress to the front pews. These rituals of obeisance were practised not only between families in public, but within families in private. Little Tom would have learned, early, to bow to his parents.

His parents had belonged to this neighbourhood since before 1574, when the parish clerk recorded the marriage of 'William Middleton & Anne Snowe of this parish'. It was apparently William's second marriage. His first wife, Margaret Barwicke, died in 1570 or 1572. She had married William on 21 November 1563; earlier that autumn, during twenty-five days in September and October, all five members of her family had died in the great plague epidemic of 1563, which carried off one-quarter of London's population. William Middleton married a woman who had just lost her entire family, and who almost certainly inherited whatever they owned.

A decade later, when William married Anne Snowe, he was a certified gentleman. On 23 April 1568, Sir Gilbert Dethicke, Garter King of Arms, 'ratified, confirmed, assigned, and allowed' to William Middleton 'and to his posterity forever' a coat of arms (illus. 5). As a young man, William had—like many London residents—immigrated to the metropolis to take up an apprenticeship; in the unknown elsewhere of his birth, he had 'been of long time one of the bearers of these arms'. Whether this pedigree was the truth or an enabling fiction, it ensured that Thomas Middleton, William's first and only son, was born a gentleman. The gentry constituted perhaps only 2 per cent of England's population. Middleton began life as a member of the governing élite. The abbreviation 'Mr', after all, stood for 'Master'.

By the 1580s, William Middleton, gentleman, was also a prosperous businessman and landholder. He owned copyhold on property in Bishop's Hatfield, Hertfordshire; he also owned a lease for nearly five hundred years on a house and wharf in the eastern suburb of Limehouse.

5. Middleton coat of arms.

In the northern suburb of Shoreditch, he had acquired a fifty-year lease on property adjoining the Curtain Theatre ('where now commonly the plays be played'), then converted a dairy house there into several tenements, from which he received 'a great yearly rent'. In January 1586, his net worth was calculated at just over £335. Such assets would hardly have supported the lifestyle of a substantial country gentleman, but (at a time when an average family could subsist on £11-14 a year) it did put the Middletons squarely in the ranks of the urban 'middle sort', described in 1581 as those who 'neither welter in too much wealth, nor wrestle with too much want'.

William Middleton had achieved this prosperity as a member of the Worshipful Company of Tilers and Bricklayers, one of the less important London guilds. Almost certainly, he had served an apprenticeship of seven and a half years before becoming a freeman of the company, and thereby a citizen of London. A bricklayer's apprentice earned, by law, only seven pence a day, and the profession was neither prestigious nor gentlemanly. But William Middleton profited from the residential construction boom which accompanied the Elizabethan explosion of London's population. He became what we would call a building contractor, training apprentices and employing journeymen. On 5 February 1577 he had been promoted to the company's livery, and at the next company election became one of their Wardens (who were allowed more apprentices than other members). His double elevation was obviously disputed, because it was achieved only as the result of a court order. The Middleton family thus belonged, not only to a parish and a neighbourhood, but to a guild, a group of less than a hundred London households with its own rules, its own hierarchy, its own squabbles, and its own social rituals (like the company dinners at the Mermaid tavern in Cornhill).

On 24 January 1586, members of that guild put on their company livery and attended the funeral of William Middleton. Death may have taken him by surprise, for he had no time to prepare or sign a written will; he spoke his bequests as he lay dying. The cause of death is, as usual, not given, but we do not need incidents like that in St Dunstan's in the West on 1 March 1617—'John Price bricklayer, slain with the fall of a chimney'—to remind us that the construction industry has always had casualties, which a primitive medical technology could seldom help. In any event, to a five-year-old boy the death of his father is almost always unexpected and unexplainable. Who is to know what he made of the words George Dickins, in his gown and surplice, read aloud at the graveside that Monday, as the corpse was made ready to be laid in the cold earth? 'In the midst of life we be in death; of whom may we seek for succour but of thee, O Lord, which for our sins justly art displeased.'

Later that year, on 5 November, the more important corpse of Sir Philip Sidney arrived in London from the Netherlands, where he had died as part of a larger Protestant effort to help the Dutch rebellion against Catholic Spain. But while much of England mourned the death of chivalry, poetry, and 'the very hope of our age', the house on Ironmonger Lane was celebrating a wedding. Most London widows re-married within a year, and an affluent propertied widow like Anne Middleton would have been regarded as a real catch. The man who caught her was Thomas Harvey, a young gentleman who had completed his apprenticeship in 1582 and become a freeman of the Grocers' Company, one of the most powerful London guilds. On 27 July, 'Master Thomas Harvey' had returned to England with Sir Francis Drake, after spending 'the space of one whole year and more in very miserable case' as chief merchant to Sir Walter Raleigh's abortive colony at Roanoke; for his pains his name would be immortalized in the first edition of Richard Hakluyt's The Principal Navigations, Voyages and Discoveries of the English Nation (1589). Thomas Middleton thus became the first important English writer to be personally exposed, in childhood, to the backwash of European global expansion. Returning colonists told stirring stories of famous men, of weeks voyaging on the vast Atlantic, of the unmapped hot lush fragrant coast of what is now North Carolina, of the strange dress and habits of the Roanoke natives (Illus. 6); maybe Harvey was among those who were later said to 'have spoken of more than ever they saw'. Certainly, like his fellow traveller, the scientist and reputed atheist Thomas Harriot, Harvey had good reason to try to impress folks back home, and to make the most of this disappointing start to England's imperial future. Harvey himself had 'spent or lost whatsoever he embarked and shipped in', and was now 'poor and unable to pay his creditors'. He needed Anne's money. He visited her 'often'; she made enquiries about him through friends on 'whom she relied'; in the end, she 'settled her liking towards him, as a fit man for her to make choice of'. On 7 November, the forty-eight-year-old Anne Middleton vowed to 'obey him and serve him, love, honour, and keep him', and Thomas Harvey, a 'young man' perhaps twenty years her junior, took her 'for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer'.

6. Roanoke woman and child, from an original watercolour painted in 1585 by one of Thomas Harvey's fellow voyagers. The scanty clothing, boyish haircut, and tattoos of the mother, the dark skin and nudity of the child, would all have been scandalously exotic.

The 'worse' and 'poorer' began almost immediately. In English common law, wives had no separate property; once married, a woman forfeited all her goods to her husband. But Anne, apparently following William Middleton's dying advice, had taken care to protect the interests of her two young children, Thomas and Avis. Between them, they were entitled to one-third of the estate; Anne 'of her free grant' increased that sum to 66 pounds, 13 shillings, and 4 pence (two-thirds of £100) apiece. In June, she had, with the help of three Inns of Court lawyers, created a complex trust to protect those bequests. Several months later, before her remarriage, the three trustees met with Harvey at Anne's house in Ironmonger Lane, and 'before supper, we all sitting there together', they explained the legal instruments 'given over in trust unto us'; 'Harvey gave his consent, and seemed also at that time not to dislike of anything'. But as soon as the marriage was blessed and consummated, Harvey asserted his prerogative. In an attempt to gain control of the children's portions, he demanded the papers, was refused, 'grew into great choler', and appealed to the Lord Mayor. Anne fought back, turning a wife's lack of independent legal status to her own advantage. Within a month of her marriage, she had herself arrested for defaulting on her financial commitment to the children; Harvey, as husband, was responsible for her debts, and so was forced to pay the Lord Mayor's Court, in cash, a sum equal to both bequests. To raise the money, he was compelled 'to suffer his goods to be sold at an outcry at his door'. Within a month of his marriage, the angry greedy Harvey had been ('by the cunning means of his wife') legally and financially humiliated in the very public venues of the Guildhall and the street where they lived.

So began a classic dysfunctional marriage in a country without divorce. There were times of 'peaceable and quiet continuance together' when 'they kept the deceased Middleton's children at their own charge'; Harvey set up shop as a grocer and trained apprentices, probably working, as most small retailers did, from the family home. But for most of the next fifteen years that home was in turmoil. Husband and wife fought, in and out of different courts. Harvey was imprisoned for debt. When he got out, he abandoned the family that did not want him, committing his body to the continuing English war against the Spanish empire. After the defeat of the Armada in 1588, a profitable victory abroad may have seemed likelier than any victory in Ironmonger Lane. Harvey joined the 1589 expedition against Portugal, then served in the Low Countries. Anne refused to send him 'one penny'. When he returned to London, he went back into business as a grocer, taking an apprentice in July 1592, but he was soon arrested for debt again, and spent at least four months in prison (December 1592 to April 1593). In September 1595, he was imprisoned again, this time for plotting to poison Anne. A month later Anne, through an intermediary, paid Harvey £56 to take to sea, in exchange for a deed ceding all the property which had belonged to William Middleton. Harvey left England for most of three years. He was reported dead. But by 1598 he was back in London, alive, and in 1600 he was back in court, suing his wife again—and five other people, including his stepson Thomas. From the beginning, the struggle for conjugal mastery had rippled outward, as neighbours and friends and relatives of both parties joined the tug of war, as tenants and creditors and debtors on the sidelines became involuntary participants, victims of the uncertainty over who controlled the contested properties.

But the most constant victims were Thomas and Avis—inevitably witnesses, and often parties, to an emotional and legal turmoil which lasted from their early childhood all the way through adolescence. Avis, baptized on 3 August 1582, was only three when her father died, four when her mother remarried. Just before she turned sixteen, she contracted a marriage as aggravating as her mother's. Her new husband, Allen Waterer of the parish of St Leonard Shoreditch, was twenty-five, and claimed to belong to the Clothworkers' guild; as soon as he could accumulate enough capital, he could set himself up in business. Avis's inheritance, which Anne had so fiercely protected from her own husband, could not be protected from her daughter's husband. In fact, Anne had some trouble protecting her own assets from her new son-in-law. Newlyweds were expected to set up house on their own, but Allen and Avis moved in with Anne, who gave them 'friendly entertainment'. But 'Allen Waterer and his mother-in-law could not agree together', and a new round of lawsuits commenced. Anne alleged that Allen sought 'to thrust her out of her house, and forbade her tenants to pay her any rent'; Allen alleged that Anne, by 'devilish and subtle practices', sought to deceive 'her own children'. Both Thomas Middleton and Thomas Harvey were soon embroiled in this struggle between Anne and her son-in-law. Allen moved to Holywell Lane (where the famous actor Richard Burbage would have been one of his neighbours); when Harvey went to Holywell Lane to serve a writ, Allen 'did rail, revile, and threaten the plaintiff with whipping . . . and thrust him out of his ground by the head and shoulder'. In June 1601, Allen assaulted Harvey again, wounding him so badly that his life was despaired of; in December, Allen was again arrested, this time for abusing a constable (who was a friend of Harvey's). From Avis herself, in all these documents, we hear nothing; she was busy elsewhere, bearing three children in three years.

Education

Her elder brother Thomas was luckier. While Avis was trapped at home with her embattled mother, Thomas could escape to grammar school, to the disciplined predictability of hourglass, clock, bell, ten or more hours a day, six days a week, for six or more years. By his seventh birthday, the familiar world of his early childhood had disintegrated: his father was dead, his father's apprentices were dispersed, his mother had married a nightmare, in prison or abroad most of the time, who when he did come home was more likely than not to find 'the doors were shut against' him. I don't know when Thomas entered grammar school; seven was normal, as late as nine was possible, but in any case it must have been in the first three years of his mother's second marriage. I don't know which London grammar school he attended, but all would have been within walking distance. In the years when infancy crossed into manhood, he crossed back and forth between a female vernacular household and a male classical schoolroom.

Even before entering grammar school, he would have learned, like his father, to read and write his mother tongue. His own mother (like 84 per cent of London women in the 1580s) signed her name with a mark; she probably could not write. But she did ensure that young Thomas, at home or at a local petty school, grasped and mastered the material technology and bodily routines of writing, routines which would occupy much of every working day for the rest of his life. 'A hand gets me my living', a professional writer says in The Widow (5.1.190): writing was a manual skill, enabling a fully socialized hand to manipulate expensive handmade tools (paper, ink, pens). Francis Clement, in The Petty School (1587), explained how to prepare a quill, taken from the feather of a bird, for use as a pen: 'Enter a rift with the edge of your knife even in the mid-back of your quill, then rive the same scissure half an inch into the quill—but, I say, just in the back, lest haply it show ragged and grinning teeth, for then will it never prove good.' There was a 'good' way to sharpen a pen, and a 'bad' way—just as there were good and bad ways of holding it. Proper sharpening and manual posture, careful adjustments to the viscosity of the ink, would enable the student's pen to 'glide or swim upon the paper'. Writing, in the era of inkwell and quill, was a liquid art.

The difference between good and bad in these physical routines was physically enforced. The sovereign schoolmaster rapped and whipped, and set his students to compete against each other for his favour. For the subjects of Tudor pedagogy, there was not only a distinction between good and bad, but a clear hierarchy within the good, and at the top of that hierarchy stood Latin, which was taught in grammar schools. The dominant (and literary) class was bilingual, and its political and economic power would be legitimized, increasingly, by its possession of the cultural capital conferred by literacy and Latinity. We know much of what Middleton learned in school, despite our ignorance of which petty or grammar school he attended, because all schools operated within a narrow range of authorized uniformity. In the 1530s and 1540s, Henry VIII had combined the newly concentrated powers of the Tudor state with the dispersive powers of the new technology of print to commission and impose a set of standardized national textbooks: a primer, a catechism, a grammar, a Book of Common Prayer. By early in the reign of Elizabeth I these had all, after much revision and evolution, hardened into enduring forms. The style and curriculum of English grammar schools was not wholly legislated, but, despite incidental local variations, all followed an educational model articulated by the Dutch humanist Desiderius Erasmus (c.1467–1536). This model can be seen, in all its naturalized simplicity, in the summary of an English schoolmaster like William Kempe, writing in 1588 of The Education of Children:

first the scholar shall learn the precepts; secondly, he shall learn to note the examples of the precepts in unfolding other men's works; thirdly, to imitate the examples in some work of his own; fourthly and lastly, to make somewhat alone without an example.

The 'precepts' here are both moral and stylistic; the 'other men's works' come from the literature of classical antiquity; the goal is the production of some written 'work' of one's own, first by imitation, then by invention. This educational regime slighted women, mathematics, science, technology, any vocational skill; it was designed to produce male eloquence.

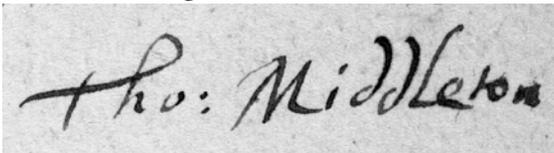

It produced Middleton. It did so, in part, by demanding that literature be perceived and experienced as a complex interlocking system of widely distributed printed texts. Rather than diet upon a single admired model, like Cicero, Erasmus demanded that one feed as widely as possible upon the writers and genres of antiquity: oratory, philosophy, epic, satire, comedy, tragedy, fable. By memorizing, 'unfolding', and imitating, the student internalized this cornucopia of texts as a storehouse of human possibilities and verbal strategies, which could be immediately accessed and applied, as occasion demanded. All thought was textual, and textuality was modular, broken down into parts which could themselves be broken down into subparts (genres, authors, works, speeches, phrases), broken down to be recycled, every component susceptible to recombination, fragments becoming ornaments, collaged into handbooks and anthologies, reconnected in a net of polytextual cross-referencing, inexhaustible, interminable.

What the ideal student achieves by this process is copia, myriad-kinded copiousness. What Middleton achieved was an ability to write prose, verse, comedy, tragedy, tragicomedy, history, allegory, masque, pageant, satire, poetry commendatory or commemorative, biblical commentary, annals. Moreover, this abundance of works is matched by an abundance within works, a pleasure in the piling up of plots, voices, classes, things, an everywhere multiplicitousness—in the unexampled conspicuous consumption of The Triumphs of Truth, the carnivalian fertility of A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, the panoply of parody in The Owl's Almanac, the comprehensive mortality of Women, Beware Women. Here, indeed, is Erasmus's plenty.

The link between the past copia of the grammar school canon and the future copia of the grammar school graduate was copying. 'Nature has implanted', Erasmus observed, 'in the youngest child an ape-like instinct of imitation'. Selves would best be fashioned by mimicking a fashion they could see: students enacted dialogues which taught them the proper fashion for everything from wiping their nose to polishing their prose. More advanced school exercises regularly included instructions like 'make some parodiae, or imitations of Latin verses'. Middleton—whose family crest was a chained ape (Illus. 5)—was compelled to mimic. We do not possess any of the innumerable school compositions he must have written in the 1590s, but his apprenticeship by imitatio was continued in the works he wrote between the ages of sixteen and twenty-two: The Wisdom of Solomon (an exercise in paraphrase and amplification), Microcynicon (Roman satire), The Ghost of Lucrece (Ovidian epistle), The Peniless Parliament of Threadbare Poets (compilation on a set theme), Two Shapes (Roman history). However effective these works are, their shared artistic agenda was the prescribed imitation of prescribed models.

But the end of imitation is an ability 'to make somewhat alone without an example'. Erasmus advised his students, 'teipsum... exprimis' ('express yourself'). Elizabethan grammar schools studied authors as unlike as Virgil and Lucian, and produced students as unlike as Sidney and Nashe, Shakespeare and Herbert, Heywood and Jonson. Uniqueness is common, and no one, then or since, writes quite like Middleton. Through all the diversity of his genres and characters there persists a particularity—a register of words, a registering of the world—as distinctive as his signature.

But Middleton's verbal personality, like that of his contemporaries, was defined by relation to a shared, reiterated, enforced, memorized, dead ideal. Sidney's quantities, Jonson's armature of abstruse art, the polysyllability of Shakespeare, of Milton the grammar alien and grace alluding—these are all approaches to the common goal of making English classical.

Tom Middleton read the same authors and learned to use the same figures. But whereas other writers of his time were described as 'our Virgil' (Spenser), 'the English Petrarch' (Sidney), 'a second Ovid' (Greene), 'England's Horace' (Jonson), or a compound of Theocritus, Virgil, Ovid, Lucan, Orpheus, and Homer (Drayton), Middleton did not make or attract such comparisons. He instead celebrates 'modern use' (The Triumphs of Integrity 85). Writing 'in these latter days', he has only a fallen language for a fallen world. That language is more immediately intelligible to twenty-first century readers, less encumbered with classical allusions or obsolete linguistic forms, than the writing of any of his contemporaries.

As often as I look upon that treasure,
And know it to be mine—there lies the blessing—
It joys me that I ever was ordained
To have a being, and to live 'mongst men:
Which is a fearful living, and a poor one,
Let a man truly think on't.
To have the toil and griefs of fourscore years
Put up in a white sheet, tied with two knots:
Methinks it should strike earthquakes in adulterers,
When e'en the very sheets they commit sin in May prove, for aught they know, all their last garments.
O what a mark were there for women then!
But beauty able to content a conqueror (Whom earth could scarce content) keeps me in compass.
I find no wish in me bent sinfully
To this man's sister or to that man's wife:
In love's name let 'em keep their honesties
And cleave to their own husbands, 'tis their duties.
Now when I go to church, I can pray handsomely,
Not come like gallants only to see faces,
As if I had just went to market still on Sundays.

(Women, Beware Women 1.1.14–34)

William Hazlitt, who in 1808 began the resurrection of Middleton's reputation, praised his scenes as 'an immediate transcript from life'. But to call him a transcriber or—as T. S. Eliot would later do—'merely a great recorder', is to misrecognize art as artlessness. No English writer before Middleton had ever achieved such sustained transparency, or constructed such seemingly unconstructed representations of the shifting currents of ordinary speech. What the cultural arbiters of Middleton's lifetime admired in The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia or Josuah Sylvester's translations of Sieur du Bartas was aristocratic artifice, consciously modelled on the monumentality of written texts more than a thousand years old. Middleton learned to listen instead to the transience of the vernacular, to the human preoccupation not only with eternity but with ephemera: news, almanacs, fads and affectations, the slippery emotional wave-front of daily, hourly, life. Recommending The Roaring Girl to potential readers, his introductory epistle does not invoke the comedies of Aristophanes, Plautus, or Terence, but instead compares 'the fashion of play-making' to 'the alteration of apparel'; the most he will say of his own work is that it is 'a kind of light-colour summer stuff', 'fit for the times'. Even when he wants to commend someone else's play—like The Duchess of Malfi—he uses the language not of permanent stone but of perishable fabric. 'Thy note | Be ever plainness', he advises his friend John Webster, 'tis the richest coat.'

Immediately below these English verses ‘upon this masterpiece of tragedy’, Middleton writes a couplet in Latin ‘In Tragœdiam’. This movement between two languages is typical of grammar school routines; however grand the design, much of the daily grind involved translation from Latin into English, English into Latin—or (later) either into Greek, Greek into either. Middleton’s first published work, The Wisdom of Solomon, is a translation, as is Sir Robert Sherley; he can quote Ovid in Microcynicon, Seneca in The Revenger’s Tragedy, Horace and Virgil in A Game at Chess; his plays adapt material from Plautus and Terence which he probably read in Latin in school. But No Wit/Help like a Woman’s demonstrates his fondness for Petronius, a Roman writer too raunchy for the curriculum—and also establishes his familiarity with a play, published only a few years before, by the Italian writer Giambattista della Porta. A command of Latin made romance languages easy to acquire, and Middleton was especially interested in modern European writers: he read the anti-Petrarchan Pietro Aretino, the satirical Miguel de Cervantes, the realist Niccolò Machiavelli, and many others now less familiar.

But the ability to read and write other languages may have been less formative than the linguistic habits associated with translation itself. People who are fully bilingual do not translate one of their languages into the other; they simply switch, as occasion demands, from the first self-contained vocabulary and syntax to the second (like an ambidextrous ballplayer, catching with her left hand, then her right). But Tudor grammar school had less to do with learning to use languages than with learning to translate them. Middleton spent six or seven years wrestling with the insolubles of translation. Of course, the sometimes extended family of meanings housed in one word in one language will seldom coalesce in any single word in another language; young Middleton and his fellow translators will, inevitably, often have been defeated by desired meanings left out, or undesired meanings thrust in. One effect of such repeated frustrations is a heightened sensitivity to puns, double meanings, complex words; another is an awareness of the uncontrollability of reference.

The Latin word translatio can be translated by the Greek word μεταφορά (‘metaphor’), and a third effect of years of translatio is an interest in the effect of conflating dissimilar contexts. Middleton read the satires of Horace alongside those of Joseph Hall; he mixed Lucian with Nashe. In the summer of 1593, he and his schoolmates translated dead texts, while the bubonic plague translated their neighbours into graves. (In six months the ground around St Lawrence Jewry accommodated seventy-seven fresh corpses, sometimes in clusters: Alice Tilstone, for instance, lost both her children and her husband; Henry Ainsworth, haberdasher, lost two children and two servants.) Middleton might have been reading Virgil’s Georgics at any time between 1594 and 1597, when two poor harvests were succeeded by two years of dearth; prices in London rose 10 per cent a year—the most concentrated burst of inflation in the entire sixteenth century, and particularly devastating for families (like his own) on fixed incomes. In 1597 he paraphrased The Wisdom of Solomon—and joined his mother in selling the reversion of a lease on the Curtain properties; he received twenty shillings for his share, and was allegedly a party to her expulsion of several tenants. Did the judgement of Solomon comfort or condemn him?

The next year he escaped to Oxford, where it should have been easier to ignore such disparities between the word and the world. He arrived there in April of 1598, a few days short of eighteen, a common age for matriculation. At least a full day’s journey from his family and the other 200,000 residents of London, Oxford was a townlet of only about 6,000 inhabitants—most of them associated, one way or another, with the University. Middleton’s fellow residents at Queen’s College were, of course, all men; they included Thomas Overbury (later an influential figure in the court of James I) and a number of future divines: preachers like Robert Johnson and John Moore, the noted Puritan Robert Mandevill, the argumentative Richard Pilkington, and Barnabas Potter, who would become a chaplain to Prince Charles. George Abbot, then at University College, would in 1611 become Archbishop of Canterbury; he is probably represented as the White Bishop in A Game at Chess. But the man who more than any other had shaped the personality of Queen’s College since 1586 was John Rainolds, leader of the Puritan party in Oxford and, arguably, in all of England. Rainolds moved to Corpus Christi College at about the time Middleton arrived, but his influence on Queen’s, and the students and fellows he had attracted, long remained. In March 1599 Henry Airay, like Rainolds a champion of evangelical Calvinism, and unlike Rainolds an admired neo-Latin poet, was elected Provost of the college.

Elizabethan England was a nation dominated by an enforced state religion, and Protestantism was a part of every aspect of Middleton’s education, beginning with the memorized catechisms of petty school. In grammar schools the day often began, at six o’clock, with ‘prayers on bended knees’; Virgil and Horace were sometimes supplemented by such ‘Christian poets’ as Juvenecus, Prudentius, and Palingenius; also popular were textbook Colloquies written in Geneva by followers of Calvin. When he was not in school, Middleton, if he resembled other Londoners, paid at least as much attention to sermons as plays. In the decade of the 1580s, 113 sermons were printed (as compared to only 16 plays); by 1600, religious lecturers in London were preaching 100 sermons a week, in addition to the regular weekly sermons offered in parish churches.

Many of those sermons were preoccupied with the question posed by the famous preacher William Perkins: ‘How a man may know whether he be a child of God, or no?’ Calvin’s division of the human world into those predestined to damnation and those elected to salvation made this the most urgent of personal questions—far more important, for most believers, than doctrinal disputes or ecclesiastical politics. It was a question which often provoked a crisis of identity, particularly among young adults. Mere outward piety was no proof of election; as another preacher observed, often enough a beautiful apple 'at the core is rotten'. You must examine the core, your inner self, for signs of its spiritual state, which would forecast your eternal destination. Failure to do so—persistence in what Calvin castigated as 'self-ignorance'—was itself a sign of the reprobate. Believers therefore tied themselves to 'daily self-examination', scanning for latent content, anxiously anatomizing 'those evil desires that do gently tickle the mind'. The word 'psychology' was first used, in 1575, by the Protestant theologian Melancthon; in the next seventy-five years, English collected a store of new compounds beginning with the word 'self', including several apparently coined by Middleton (self-affecting, self-changing, self-conceiving, self-disparagement, self-scandal, and self-treason).

This reading and rereading of the self attended an equally endless and intense reading of the Bible, for Protestants not only the key to salvation but also the greatest of the ancient classics. 'Upon this book I will found my church', Luther might as well have said, and upon its copia could be modelled many literary genres. Solomon and David were celebrated as the two chief authors of what tradition and Sir Philip Sidney called 'the poetical part of the Scripture'. Sidney himself, with his sister the Countess of Pembroke, translated all the Psalms; Donne declared their putative author, David, 'a better poet than Virgil'. Such readings of Scripture inspired a Protestant poetics which informed the spiritual lyrics of Donne and Herbert, the epics of Spenser and Milton, the satires of Marston and Hall. All these writers struggled to combine a classical with a biblical tradition; so did Middleton.

If it seems sacrilegious for any author to see himself in a mirror supplied by Solomon or David, the country pastor Herbert or the blind titan Milton may at least appear likelier candidates than lewd metropolitan Middleton—so fascinated by the fiscal and the physical, so familiar with debased genres of writing and living. But neither biblical poet was an innocent; both were great sinners, both transgressed publicly and privately. Their example authorized an implicated, political, metrosexual poetry, a poetry aware of its own sinful place in an imperfect human order. It was, after all, the author Solomon who 'looked on all the works that [his] hands had wrought' and realized 'all was vanity and vexation of spirit' (Eccl. 2:11), realized that 'of making many books there is no end' (12:12). Middleton's portrayal of authors—in The Black Book, The Puritan Widow, The Nice Valour, A Game at Chess—suggests that he was equally conscious of the devices and vices of the textual trade.

The texts and devices of the legal trade kept intruding on Middleton's efforts to study Aristotle's Rhetoric and other staples of the university curriculum. Sometime in 1598 he 'came from his place in Oxford to help his mother in those troubles' between her and his brother-in-law Allen Waterer. New students were supposed to remain resident in Oxford for a full uninterrupted year, and absconders could lose their scholarships; one witness thought Middleton, by answering his mother's call 'lost his fellowship at Oxford', which had allegedly been secured for him by his stepfather. Certainly, family troubles kept interfering with his intellectual life, and the pursuit of an intellectual life kept eroding his inheritance. In the summer of 1599 he was again in London, a party to further legal wrangling between his mother and his brother-in-law; on 3 December 1599 he sold Waterer his half-share in the Limehouse lease. On 10 June 1600, his stepfather Harvey began two lawsuits, designed to secure control of all the family properties; these would drag on for almost a year. Long before the verdict (in Harvey's favour), Middleton had, on 28 June 1600, sold Waterer his share of the other properties in return for money 'paid and disbursed for my advancement and preferment in the University of Oxford, where I am now a student, and for my maintenance with meat, drink, and apparel, and other necessaries'—including, presumably, books.

The books he was buying, though, were not necessarily the ones recommended by the University authorities. It's tempting to read autobiographically his account of a poor student: he 'daily rose before the sun, talked and conversed with midnight, killing many a poor farthing-candle', reading 'Aristotle's works', but he was then 'unfruitfully led to the lickerish study of poetry, that sweet honey-poison that swells a supple scholar with unprofitable sweetness and delicious false conceits,' and as a result eventually became 'one of the Poor Knights of Poetry' (Father Hubbard's Tales 1125–51). Certainly, by the summer of 1600, Middleton had sold, for an Oxford education, the entire landed inheritance his mother had fought so many years to preserve. Seven months later, he had lost Oxford, too. On 8 February 1601, the Earl of Essex, the man to whom Middleton had dedicated his first work, launched an abortive rebellion, in London, after commissioning a special performance of Shakespeare's old play about deposing a king, Richard II; on 8 February 1601, Middleton too was 'in London, daily accompanying the players'. The end of the Earl's life coincided, fortuitously, with the end of Middleton's academic career. Like most gentlemen—like his fellow playwrights Francis Beaumont, John Fletcher, and Philip Massinger—he left the university without taking a degree.

On 21 April 1601, before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, Middleton acknowledged receipt of £25 which had been set aside for him at the time of his father's death, and held in trust until his twenty-first birthday. Middleton was the protected orphan of a citizen of London; but the City had now discharged its duty. He was a gentleman; but he had no land and no guaranteed income. He was the son, stepson, and brother-in-law of tradesmen; but he had no vocation. He had been to grammar school and university; but he had no career. He had £25 and talent.

Vocation

Sidney had described poetry as his ‘unelected vocation’, and Middleton had the same calling. But he did not have Sidney’s income or leisure. He would be defined, by himself and others, in legal records and in print, as a ‘poet’—a word then applied to any kind of writer, in verse or prose. Whether poets are born or made, Middleton had been one since 1597. But four years later, he became a poet in another sense, never pertinent to Sidney. To write, Middleton had to eat; to eat, now, he had to find someone who would pay him to write. Middleton in 1601 became a professional poet. Unlike Sidney or Donne or Raleigh, or himself at an earlier age, Middleton was now ‘merely’ (wholly and only) a poet. For such men, there were three possibilities: patronage, print, and plays.

Writers were sometimes subsidized by aristocratic connoisseurs. Thomas Nashe had been, briefly, the guest of Sir George Carey; Samuel Daniel was being supported by the Countess of Pembroke; Ben Jonson would be maintained for thirty years by notables minor and notables major. Middleton apparently lacked the ability or the effrontery to insert himself into personal favour with the aristocracy. By 1604 literary patrons were epitomized, for him, by Sir Christopher Clutchfist, ‘the Muses’ bad paymaster’; they ‘never give the poor Muse-suckers a penny’.

In the absence of estates or patrons, a poet must set his ‘wit to sale’. Wit was retailed in bookshops and theatres. Both these outlets were relatively new; both depended on new textual technologies, which could only flourish in cities. Concentrated urban populations provided a dense enough market to support a capital-intensive leisure industry. Gutenberg’s development of movable type and viscous ink in the mid fifteenth century eventually transformed the book trade; but the high cost of an investment in presses, type fonts, and paper stocks bankrupted any printer who did not have ready access to a market large enough to buy up quickly or predictably hundreds of copies of a single book. Likewise, enclosed purpose-built theatres transformed the economics of playing, by enabling actors to charge in advance for admission and to hierarchize prices in relation to a fixed hierarchy of architectural space; but a profitable return on such investments in the purchase or lease of land and buildings could only be sustained in areas where thousands of people were able and willing to pay for admission many times each year. Once these industries were established, both actors and printers generated a demand for fresh wit, which in turn transformed the economics of authorship.

The first books printed in England had appeared a century before Middleton’s birth. By multiplying copies and reducing costs, print increased the accessibility of texts; what technology made possible, ideology made desirable, as the Reformation urged individual Christians to learn to read, so they could encounter the Word of God at first hand. Supply and demand began to spiral around each other in an ascending double helix. From Middleton’s birth to Elizabeth I’s death (1580–1603), half again as many new titles were published as in the years from her accession to his birth (1558–1579). The market was still dominated by theological books (half of all extant titles between 1583 and 1623) and by stock secular work like primers, almanacs, and proclamations, but a small market for original vernacular literature had emerged, to be filled by writers such as Robert Greene, Thomas Nashe, and Samuel Rowlands.

But man could not live by print alone. Authors did not own copyright and received no royalties. Monsieur Lepet’s pamphlet, The Uprising of the Kick, promises to become ‘a stock book’, like ‘the almanacs . . . and the Book of Cookery’; but ‘tis the bookseller | That has the money for ‘em’, not the masochistic author (The Nice Valour 5.3.9–16). A commercial success like The Owl’s Almanac (two editions within four months) earned Middleton no more money than The Two Gates of Salvation (copies of which still remained unsold eighteen years after its publication). For each pamphlet Middleton would have been paid up to £2, a flat fee which remained constant for more than sixty years, oblivious to inflation. In lieu of or addition to this fee, he might receive a certain number of copies to sell on his own: Nashe is described ‘fiddling [his] pamphlets from door to door like a blind harper for bread and cheese, presenting [his] poems like old brooms to every farmer’. The author as door-to-door salesman was forcefully reminded that his texts were merchandise; however finely made, literary commodities were of less utility than the housewares which local manufacturers were producing in unprecedented quantities.

A more dignified form of salesmanship was the dedication. Middleton had dedicated The Wisdom of Solomon to the Earl of Essex (1597), and The Ghost of Lucrece to Baron Compton (1600). The dedicatee, honoured by this unsolicited homage, was supposed to reciprocate with a cash gift. A lucky dedication might net as much as £3; an unlucky one, nothing. The return on a dedication was thus higher, but less predictable, than a bookseller’s fee. Taken together, fees, sales, and dedications over the course of twenty years earned the prolific Elizabethan pamphleteer Richard Robinson only about £3 annually—not even a subsistence income for a single adult.

By contrast, for what was apparently his first full-length play, The Tragedy of Randolph, Earl of Chester, Middleton was paid £7. In 1601, more experienced dramatists might receive £8 per play, and by 1613 a single script could be worth as much as £20. Between 1598 and mid-1603, professional dramatists like Henry Chettle, Thomas Dekker, and William Haughton were earning about £25 a year in fees from a single company—and they could also have been selling to other companies. In addition, they pocketed the surplus profits from the second or third performance. Each purpose-built Elizabethan theatre manufactured and sold vicarious emotion to hundreds or thousands of customers, six days a week: for the first time in European history, the commercial playhouses and their acting companies mass-produced and routinized the commodification of affect. The new technology needed new scripts, and a successful playwright could make two or three times as much as most university graduates.

Given the economics of patronage, print, and playing, it is not surprising that Middleton chose plays. As Francis Meres observed in 1598, 'for lack of patrons—O ingrateful and damned age!—our poets are solely or chiefly maintained, countenanced, and patronized by our witty comedians and stately tragedians'. But the theatre's appeal was not just financial. One of Middleton's collaborators on his first recorded play, Michael Drayton, confessed that his 'pride of wit' and 'heat of blood' could not help being moved by the 'shouts and claps at every little pause, | When the proud round on every side hath rung...' Moreover, the applause of the audience was enhanced by the exciting company of other playwrights. In 1601, Middleton could see new plays by Dekker, Heywood, Jonson, Marston, and Shakespeare, not to mention revivals of Marlowe, Kyd, and Nashe. In 1602, he was paid to write his own prologue and epilogue for a revival of Robert Greene's best play, Friar Bacon and Friar Bonny. Backstage, he was initiated into a fraternity of wit.

Unlike the guilds of Bricklayers or Grocers, that fraternity had no royal charter, no statutory privileges, no governing body, no incremental structure of professional advancement. Nevertheless, there was a pattern to playwrights' careers. They worked for companies of actors; they did not run their own businesses; they did not sell directly to the public. If the theatres had been organized as a guild, its masters would have been the actor-sharers who co-owned a joint-stock theatrical company like the Admiral's or the Chamberlain's Men. Playwrights were normally journeymen, 'hired men' like the freelance actors paid for their role in mounting a given play. Like other hired men, playwrights were not guaranteed regular employment; they received no share of the company's profits; they owned none of its real or chattel property. Like journeymen, they often did piecework, writing 'new additions' to a valuable old property—as Middleton did to Shakespeare's Macbeth and Measure for Measure, as others did to Middleton's The Bloody Banquet, No Wit/Help like a Woman's, and The Nice Valour.

Upon the standards of the dead (the classics studied in school, or play scripts written by earlier authors) were superimposed the standards of the living (the actors and audiences to be pleased now). Whether doing piecework or writing masterpieces, playwrights had to fit their product to the company's market profile: regular actors of a known number and type working in a particular theatre serving regular customers of a certain kind. Companies, if dissatisfied with the attempted fit, could demand that a script be altered or shortened. Ben Jonson, John Webster, and Richard Brome complained about such changes to their texts; Middleton did not—either because his scripts were less self-indulgent, or because he was more hospitable to criticism of them, or more persuasive in answering it. Successful companies had to be flexible enough to welcome initiatives and take risks, but a playwright had to persuade a company that his initiative was worth their risk. He had no power beyond his ability to persuade. And he became more persuasive with each successful play. Thus, although a playwright did not earn royalties, successful work paid future dividends by enhancing his credibility, his 'credit', with companies of actors. Most playwrights acquired a stock of credit by an apprenticeship, in which they collaborated with older, more experienced men. Middleton between 1602 and 1605 collaborated with Munday (twenty years his senior), Drayton (seventeen years), Shakespeare (sixteen), and Dekker (perhaps ten).

All playwrights worked within the same structure, but they had different relations to it, and to each other. In the first place, the fraternity was small—smaller than a guild—and all of its members must have known each other. More than half the known plays written between 1590 and 1640 were the work of just twenty-two men. Of these, several were amateurs, people who were not dependent on the theatre for a permanent livelihood and who did not stay in it long. Mr John Marston composed satires and satirical plays while attending the Inns of Court and awaiting his inheritance, but he would not have considered himself a professional writer; Mr Francis Beaumont after a short smart career as a playwright secured a marriageable heiress and retired to her country estate. When John Webster inherited his father's successful business as a saddler, he still worked on plays—including Anything for a Quiet Life, with Middleton—but he could do so at his leisure. If some men of means wrote plays on the side, so did some actors: Nathan Field, Thomas Heywood, Samuel Rowley, William Rowley, and William Shakespeare. These men enjoyed an unusually privileged position, being shareholders in the companies which bought and performed their plays. But they were not the only writers with sustained relationships to a single company. Beginning perhaps with Henry Chettle in 1602, some playwrights who were not actors signed contracts binding them to a company, giving it exclusive rights to their work, and promising to supply an agreed number of plays for a fixed annual sum. In later decades, John Fletcher, Philip Massinger, John Shirley, and Richard Brome were apparently monopolized in this way.

Middleton was not an actor, he could not afford to be an amateur, and as a newcomer he could not expect an exclusionary contract. He began writing plays as a freelance, learning through collaboration with veterans, staking a claim to professional status. But if that much was almost inevitable, other decisions were not. Though he often collaborated, Middleton never, to our knowledge, teamed up to write a play with Beaumont, Fletcher, Jonson, Chapman, Marston, or Massinger; he certainly must have known them all, but he did not run with that crowd. Though Middleton wrote brilliantly for companies of very young actors, he clearly preferred Paul's to what Thomas Heywood called the 'bitterness, and liberal invectives' of the rival children's company at the Blackfriars. Middleton began ‘accompanying the players’ during the War of the Theatres (a public jeering match between acting companies and their playwrights), and it was almost impossible not to be situated within the attendant rivalries and personal pairings. By collaborating with Dekker, he aligned himself against Jonson, and that alignment soured relations between Jonson and Middleton for the next quarter-century. But Middleton’s early partnership with Dekker represents more than a personal rejection of—or by—Jonson. After all, young Middleton (whose father had been a bricklayer) might seem to have more in common with the satirical Jonson (whose stepfather was a bricklayer, and who was himself a dues-paying member of that company) than with the good-hearted Dekker; he might seem to have even more in common with the satirical educated gentleman Marston. But Dekker, like Shakespeare and Rowley and Heywood after him, by his very difference complements Middleton. Jonson rejected difference; Middleton collaborated with it.

So Middleton in 1601 or 1602 became a ‘stagewright’, a profession held in no more esteem than acting (which most people considered a vicious frivolity). But Middleton remained a gentleman, a distinction regularly advertised on his title-pages. He shared this mixed status—a compound of the elite and the contemptible—with Francis Beaumont, John Fletcher, John Marston, and William Rowley. Ben Jonson was not born, and never became, a gentleman, nor did he marry into a gentry family; so that when, in 1619, he gossiped that Middleton was ‘a base fellow’, his disdain had the edge (and the envy) of an arriviste, berating his social superiors for not living up to their rank.

Within two years of becoming a dramatist, Master Middleton’s life had been transformed. By the end of 1603, his mother was dead, Queen Elizabeth was dead, his brother-in-law was dead; he was married, his wife was pregnant, and he was laid off.

He had married Mistress Marbeck, a woman baptized in 1575 as ‘Magdalen’ but later called ‘Mary’; either name could be reduced to the nickname ‘Moll’, and both could be combined as Mary Magdalene, or ‘Mary which was called Magdalen’ (Luke 8:2), the female disciple of Jesus. Granddaughter of a famous musician, once persecuted for his Protestantism, who became royal organist at Windsor (John Marbeck, c.1505–1585?), and niece of the chief physician to Elizabeth I, who was also a tobacco-advocate and chronicler of the 1596 expedition against Cadiz (Roger Marbeck, 1536–1605), Mistress Marbeck was the daughter of one of the Six Clerks in the Court of Chancery, Edward Marbeck. She was born in the parish of St Dunstan in the West, where her father died in December 1581. Middleton and Marbeck probably met, not by way of any of her distinguished relatives, but through her less distinguished brother, an actor; Tom Marbeck and Tom Middleton were both working for the Admiral’s Men in 1602. Like her husband, Mistress Marbeck had been born in London, belonged to a gentry family, had lost her father at an early age, and had much youthful experience of life in the company of lawyers. They lived together for a quarter of a century, and by entering his life she decisively changed its plot. From about the age of seven to about the age of twenty-two, Middleton had attended an all-male grammar school, an all-male university, and theatres run by all-male companies of actors performing plays written by an all-male club of playwrights. Regular female companionship, by day and night, was itself a new experience.

This female, moreover, must in some respects at least have differed from those he had known since childhood. His mother Anne, like his Queen Elizabeth, was—by the standards of the time, and the standards of a child—already old when he was born; although he may have admired, and could hardly have ignored, the capable independence of both, their wrinkled parsimonious stubbornness was probably less attractive. ‘Such a troublesome woman’—that is what hostile witnesses called Anne in the last decade of her life, and what if they dared they might have called Elizabeth. If Anne was too old and inflexible, Avis was too young and malleable: a wife at sixteen, a mother at seventeen, a silent property in the struggles between her husband and her other relatives. When Allen Waterer died in July 1603, Avis married again within two months—yet managed in the interim to be swindled by Allen’s brother. By marrying Mistress Marbeck, Middleton chose a companion of a very different type.

Women normally married earlier than men, and were younger than their husbands; Mary (Magdalen), though, was five years older than Thomas—which made her seven years older than Avis. In seeking or accepting a gentleman-playwright as a husband she did not make a timid or conservative choice, but her judgement was sound enough. Unlike Avis, Mary (Magdalen) chose a man who was educated, witty, a good collaborator, a good provider who did not much trouble the courts or his neighbours, a man remarkable for his representations—in plays like The Patient Man and the Honest Whore and Anything for a Quiet Life, in pamphlets like The Peacemaker—of a masculinity defined by non-violence. And unlike Avis, Mary (Magdalen) did not exhaust her youth bearing and raising offspring: she had, to our knowledge, only one child, their son Edward, born between November 1603 and November 1604. Either she was lucky, or the Middletons, like increasing numbers of English couples in the seventeenth century, managed their sexual life in a way which emphasized conjugal ‘comfort’, not procreation.

Mary (Magdalen) was also responsible for a change of residence. They were not married at St Lawrence Jewry; and although I don’t know where they set up house initially, by 1609 they were living in the village of Newington in Surrey, where they stayed for the rest of their lives (Illus. 7). The medieval village had changed little in the preceding three centuries, and as late as 1853 the American visitor Harriet Beecher Stowe found it a ‘charming retreat’ with a view from the window of sheep and lambs grazing in a meadow. Long famous for its peaches and gardens, praised for plentiful ‘cakes and ale’,

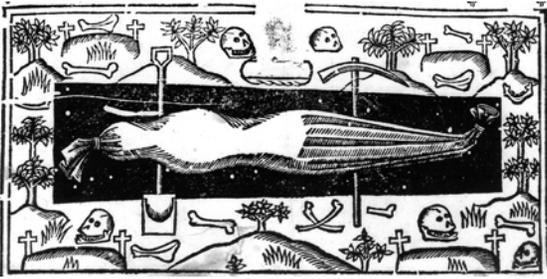

7. In this 1681 map, Newington has a few more buildings than it did in Middleton's time, but still contrasts strikingly with his childhood neighborhood, crowded a century earlier (Illus. 4). The road on the lower right, in Middleton's time called 'Blackman Street', led to Southwark and London Bridge. The road on the upper right led to Lambeth Palace. The River Thames is beyond the right edge of the map (north).

Newington was a short trip 'over the fields' on the marshy south side of the Thames, where family friend John Gerard (author of the famous Herbal published in 1597) found water violets in the ditches. When Middleton, in the Honourable Entertainments, visualized the 'field-empërress' Flora, her 'close-enfolded rose', her 'ruffling robin and lark's heel', he was celebrating the countryside still intact all around Newington. For most of his adult life, he had to walk through that stubbornly rural world to get to the urban rush-and-clutter of actors, alewives, and aldermen.

'Blackman Street', where the Middletons lived, was artificially raised above the surrounding floodplain, and lined on both sides with hedges; it was part of the old Roman road that crossed London Bridge, passed through Southwark, then headed south-west to Portsmouth (by way of Clapham, Wimbledon, and Kingston-on-Thames). Alternatively, you could reach Middleton's home by taking the horse-ferry from Westminster to Lambeth, and walking from there along Lambeth Palace Road. Newington was one of 'the city out-leaps for a spirt' (in 1639), a place Londoners could reach easily on foot on day-trips, particularly on Sundays, when they wanted to get away from it all. It was not far from the open-air theatres on the south bank, and for more than a decade had a theatre of its own, which hosted Titus Andronicus and The Jew of Malta, among other plays, in the 1590s. The parishes of Southwark—where Avis lived, after her first marriage—had come under the jurisdiction of the Mayor of London in 1550. Newington, by contrast, was still a separate village, but close enough to the City for easy commuting.

It was also growing. By October 1599 there were new 'houses where the playhouse did stand at Newington'; maybe the Middletons eventually lived in one of them. In 1576, the parish of St Mary's Newington had a population of about 2,000; fifty years later, it had increased to about 3,000. This parish was wealthy enough, and close enough to London, to attract as its 'parson' a doctor of divinity from Cambridge University, 'Master Doctor' Thomas Puckering, who had in 1572 matriculated at Queen's College, where he acquired his BA (1576), MA (1579), BD (1586), and DD (1591). Puckering was rector from at least 1594 to 1617. St Mary's Newington was able and anxious to attract an educated ministry, and to hear 'lectures' in addition to the weekly sermon. But Middleton, although a gentleman, was apparently not wealthy or important enough to play an active part in parish affairs: in the October 1624 subsidy roll of taxable incomes in Newington Butts, he had the lowest possible assessment; taxability put him, financially, in the top quarter of the population, but at three pounds, eight shillings he was worth only about one-sixth the amount his father had been, more than forty years before. Though he probably lived in Newington for more than two decades he was never mentioned in the vestry minutes. The vestry was dominated by George Cure (head of Newington's leading gentry family) and Thomas Edge (who might have been Middleton's step-uncle).

In late 1603 Middleton's recent marriage, however happy, and his new home, however pleasant, gave him at least one and possibly two more bodies to feed, house, and worry about in a period of personal and social crisis. In May 1603, London suffered another outbreak of bubonic plague (described in News from Gravesend and The Meeting of Gallants at an Ordinary). Many people fled London, and if the Middletons had not already moved to Newington, the plague should have encouraged them to do so. In the first eight years of James I's reign the plague remained endemic in London. In 1625, another major outbreak occurred, but by then Newington was no longer a refuge: from 1 June to 8 August, it suffered 401 deaths (twenty times the average death rate), burying perhaps 13 per cent of the parish in 69 days (Illus. 8).

8. 'A sheet with two knots, and away' (A Chaste Maid in Cheapside 5.1.6). A corpse, wrapped in a knotted sheet, prepared for lowering into the grave.

The plague did not kill Middleton or his family, but it did imperil his livelihood. In spring 1603, in response to the epidemic, municipal authorities closed the theatres, which apparently did not reopen until April 1604, and for the rest of the decade they were, by even the most optimistic estimates, closed more often than open. The London theatres had had nine years of uninterrupted and expanding prosperity, but the 1603 epidemic exposed the inherent insecurity of their market. Even during plague, acting companies could survive by touring provincial towns, but in such conditions they did not have the money or the need to buy new scripts. The plague was therefore particularly devastating for artisans like Middleton, whose income was entirely dependent on the economic climate in London. In the thirty-six months from January 1608 to December 1610, for instance, there may have been only eight months of public playing; his only known productions during those three years are two pamphlets and half a play.

Unlike bricklayers or grocers, playwrights had no guild to protect them from unfair competition, or to support them in hard times; because they were usually paid in advance, by installments, they were often working for money they had already spent. Dekker, Field, Jonson, and Massinger were all, at different times, imprisoned for unpaid debt; Middleton in 1609 defaulted on a debt of £6, and in 1606—depending on whom you believe—did or did not pay off a loan with the manuscript of a new play. If an uncontrolled market was one source of uncertainty, censorship was another: in 1605 Jonson and Chapman were imprisoned for writing a satirical play.

In 1599, Middleton's own Microcynicon had been one of a number of satires burned by order of the Archbishop of Canterbury. For a nineteen-year-old, it can be both frightening and exhilarating to be considered dangerous, but the consequences were sometimes far more serious. In the same ecclesiastical crackdown, printers were forbidden to publish any more works by Nashe—thereby depriving him of his livelihood, and pitching him into the terminal poverty described by Middleton in The Black Book.

Middleton had some familiarity with poverty. In 1600 two witnesses described his stepfather Harvey as 'extreme poor'; in 1606, 1607, and 1608 his sister Avis and her husband were in court in forma pauperis, seeking to recover money they had lost in 1603. Avis's second husband, the cutler John Empson, was apparently no more successful as a businessman than Anne's second husband had been. As their examples demonstrate, people—including 'gentlemen' like Harvey—moved in and out of poverty, and many paupers were 'poor householders which be ashamed to beg and be no common beggars' or 'poor able labouring folk' who could not find work, or were 'not able to live off' the work they could find. The numbers of the poor in England, the depth of their poverty, the gap between wages and the cost of living, all rose steadily during the sixteenth century, reaching a brutal nadir in the years from 1580 to 1630. Middleton could have seen the human consequences on his own doorstep. In 1612, the overwhelmed 'inhabitants and parishioners of the town of Newington' petitioned the national Privy Council 'to have some contribution towards the maintenance of their poor'; in recognition of the severity of their need, they were granted £15 yearly, from county funds, for relief of the indigent. In 1618 several members of the Fishmongers' Company built twenty-two almshouses for the poor at the corner of Lambeth Road and Blackman Street, which must have been very near Middleton's home on Blackman Street; Middleton celebrated this act of charity in The Peacemaker (ll. 175–7), published that year.

Poverty was, of course, the cruelly literal opposite of the copia which humanist rhetoric treated as a metaphor. 'A good thrifty man will gather his goods together in time of plenty, and lay them out again in time of need', Sir Thomas Wilson noted in The Art of Rhetoric, 'and shall not an orator have in store good matter, in the chest of his memory, to use and bestow in time of necessity?' For Middleton, 1603 was a 'time of need', in which he drew upon the 'good matter' he had laid up during his education and apprenticeship. But the relation between plenty and paucity was not just temporal; if in one sense they alternated in time, in another they cohabited, structurally bound together, both socially and rhetorically.

Rhetorically, brevitas complements copia, as scarcity does abundance. They had often been opposed, but Erasmus insisted that good authors yoke concision to amplitude, and he demonstrated their interdependence in his influential Adagia, a huge textbook compendium of aphorisms. If copia best describes the scale and variety of Middleton's matter, brevitas better describes his manner. His first successful publication, The Penniless Parliament of Threadbare Poets (1601), abridges and reshapes an earlier sprawling work three times its length; later, he probably trimmed as much as 25 per cent off Shakespeare's Macbeth, and abridged his own A Game at Chess to two-thirds its performed length. In 1611, he contrasted the 'huge bombasted plays' of Elizabeth's reign, 'quilted with mighty words to lean purpose', with the 'spruceness' of 'neater inventions' which had become fashionable under James I. This generational shift from the long-winded to the tight-lipped belonged to a larger European reaction against the Ciceronian accumulation of tropes and clauses, a reaction stimulated by the Flemish humanist Lipsius and the French dialectician Ramus, which found its first important English advocate in Francis Bacon. Sidney and Lyly heaped; Herbert and Middleton honed. But for professional writers this turning of the tide of literary fashion also reflected an economic shift. Spenser's epic amplitude had appealed to the self-aggrandizement of potential patrons. But why write long plays or pamphlets, when you got paid the same amount for short ones? Shakespeare could afford to elaborate, because he was a major shareholder in a profitable acting company; so could Jonson, because his main income came from court masques. Both had the leisure to embellish, and expected their work to embellish the leisure of others. Middleton did not. He was one of the first inhabitants of a commercial and mental world he summed up in three words: 'hurry hurry' (Revenger's Tragedy 2.1.200).

Socially, Middleton's lifetime straddled the centre of a century-long deepening of the divide between rich and poor: the poor got poorer while the rich got richer, partly because the population grew more rapidly than the economy. A surplus of labour depressed wages, but created new opportunities for an expansive merchant capitalism. Theatres themselves illustrate this evolution. Joint-stock companies like the Chamberlain's Men were originally formed by actors who between them owned the assets and divided the profits from a new industry supported by a multiplying population. But as these founders retired or died their valuable shares, like stocks, could be inherited or bought by people who did not work in the theatre, but profited from the labour of those who did. Those who did work were, even so, the lucky ones, for there were soon more would-be players than there were parts to play. Edward Alleyn, one of London's first leading actors, made a fortune large enough to endow the founding of Dulwich College; none of his successors did so well.

The situation for working writers was even worse. Writers belonged to an intellectual class in part deliberately created by a state-sponsored educational boom. During the first two or three decades of Elizabeth's reign the expanding needs of the Protestant church, the state bureaucracy, and the legal profession created relatively buoyant opportunities for educated young men. But the supply of intellectuals soon exceeded demand for their services. When the first enclosed theatres were built in London, in the years just before Middleton's birth, the need to perform regularly in a fixed location created a sudden ravenous demand for new plays; this commodity hunger, which helped compensate for the shortfall in state employment, fuelled the careers of the first generation of dramatists—men like Greene, Peele, Kyd, Marlowe, and Shakespeare. But as the decades passed, acting companies acquired, in their chests and memories, stocks of old reliables, which could be revived without paying living playwrights for new scripts. By the reign of Charles I, almost three-fourths of known court performances were revivals of old plays. Middleton's generation of dramatists, attracted by the theatrical prosperity and achievement of the last decade of Elizabeth's reign, found themselves in an increasingly constricted and competitive marketplace. Success for one meant failure for another; worse, a playwright with a long career was eventually competing with his own past successes. Playwrights became less, as shareholders became more, secure.

Consummation

What security was achievable for a writer, Middleton had achieved by the end of 1604. His comedy The Phoenix was performed at court in February of that year. In March, he was named as part-author of The Magnificent Entertainment, commissioned by the City of London to honour their new king. He sold five pamphlets to London publishers; two were popular enough to be reprinted within the year. Even before he had sold the last pamphlet, he had begun collaborating with Dekker on The Patient Man and the Honest Whore, a play printed within months of its first performances, and which remained popular, on stage and in print, for more than thirty years. His apprenticeship was over, and he had fashioned a career which would engage virtually every aspect of early modern textual culture.

The shape of that career is most easily seen by stepping back from the annual succession of texts—which can, in any case, be read, for the first time, in the chronological parade of this edition—and looking instead at certain recurrent features of Middleton's working life. Most obvious is the diversity of his Renaissance self-marketing: the embodiment of 'Wit at Several Weapons', Middleton made plays for different companies, pageants for the city, pamphlets for the book trade. In all these venues, he worked in collaboration, often with other writers, always with groups which had their own corporate interests. Outside these professional networks, his career brought him into complicated relationships with different artistic constituencies: the legal community, the City authorities, the royal court, and—beyond all those, most important and least definable—the shifting community of readers and spectators, the great laity of literature, the daily physical world which preachers and proclamations could only imperfectly regulate. In relation to such issues, the work of 1604 epitomizes the next two decades of Middleton's professional life.

By 1604, if not before, Middleton had reduced his vulnerability and dependence on any one literary market by diversifying his portfolio. The Phoenix was performed by an all-boy company playing indoors at St Paul's; The Patient Man and the Honest Whore, by Prince Henry's Men, playing outdoors at the Fortune Theatre. Middleton worked in all for at least seven companies; his plays exploit the varied artistic opportunities offered by different casts, theatres, audiences. He may also have exploited—as Robert Daborne did—the rivalry between companies, getting a higher price for his product by offering to sell it to a competitor.

He supplemented his income as a playwright by writing pageants and pamphlets. The pageants were the outdoor sector of a larger market in subsidized theatre, which also included indoor shows written for the City (Honourable Entertainments), the royal court (Masque of Cupids), or the Inns of Court (Masque of Heroes). Competition for such lucrative work was direct and intense: in the case of Lord Mayor's shows, for instance, a guild committee considered scenarios for pageants submitted by several writers, and chose one. Not surprisingly, most of the successful bids came from playwrights who had proven their talent in the theatres; play-writing served as an apprenticeship for pageant-writing.

Moreover, as in the theatres, a would-be pageant-writer might get his start by working as a junior collaborator with a more experienced colleague. Middleton assisted Dekker in 1604, and for his first Lord Mayor's show, in 1613, he worked with Anthony Munday (who did not write the pageant but did produce it, and received a much larger share of the fee). Middleton wrote and produced six of the nine annual shows between 1617 and 1626. His first two, in 1613 and 1617, were both written for the Grocers, and his family connection with that guild may have helped him win the contract: Sir Thomas Myddelton, the Lord Mayor he celebrated in 1613, was about the same age as his stepfather Harvey, and like Harvey was involved in various overseas ventures in the 1580s and 1590s. As in the theatre, success increased a writer's credit with his employers, and made it likelier that he would be commissioned again. But, also as in the theatre, writers were paid for one job, with no guarantee that they would receive another. The City offered nothing comparable to the monopoly enjoyed by Ben Jonson at court, who between 1616 and 1625 was paid for fifteen masques. Nonetheless, Middleton was the City's chief writer from 1616 to 1626, responsible for Lord Mayor's parades, indoor revels, and civic celebrations of the monarchy. Those pageants, rather than his plays or poems, also brought him the only personal financial patronage he is known to have ever received: in November 1613 'Mr. Middleton the poet' received ten shillings (half a pound) from another Thomas Myddelton (1586–1666), the son of the Lord Mayor for whom our man Middleton had written The Triumphs of Truth, performed a few weeks before. The relationship indicated by this little gift may have been important to Middleton's future career:

Mayor Myddelton remained prominent in London until the late 1620s, and was one of the city's four members of Parliament from 1624 to 1626, and his eldest son (who like the poet had matriculated at Queen's College, Oxford) would be elected to Parliament in 1624 and 1625—and in the 1640s would become an important officer in the Parliamentary army.

For men like Mayor Myddelton the poet Middleton not only wrote and produced civic revels; he also—unlike Jonson—published them. He prepared a narrative description of all his pageants, dedicating each to the Mayor it celebrated. He collected ten of his indoor shows into a volume of Honourable Entertainments. This practice no doubt reflected Middleton's sense of the 'perfection' to which civic pageantry could aspire, and his commitment to the political and social values of the City. But it also provided him with another source of income and another relationship to the book trade.

To book-buyers as to theatre-goers, Middleton's appeal was protean. In his lifetime, his publications ranged in format from the diminutive octavo of Microcynicon to the imposing large folio which included The Life of Timon of Athens, in typeface from the black letter of The Black Book to the roman of Meeting of Gallants at an Ordinary and the italic used for speeches in all the pageants, in visual design from the simplicity of Plato's Cap to the six-columned complexity of The Two Gates of Salvation, in price from a penny for The Penniless Parliament of Threadbare Poets to the sixpence that an early purchaser paid for a freshly-printed copy of A Mad World, My Masters to the shilling (twelve pence) apiece paid for bound second-hand copies of The Phoenix and A Trick to Catch the Old One in 1628. These material embodiments of his texts are not simply stamped by printers upon passive authorial flesh; Middleton actively exploited the potencies of print. Like the difference between theatrical spaces, the difference between textual spaces created opportunities for imaginative play. The size of Microcynicon, for instance, is characteristic of poetry books in the 1590s, but it also reflects its title, which itself reflects its author's youth; black letter is used in parodies of black letter genres; type, length, and price help to define the size and social status of a work's readership, which in turn helps to define the author's stance, from Plato's Cap, doffing his cap 'To all those that are laxative of laughter', to Honourable Entertainments, gravely addressing 'his worthy and honourable patrons'.

The Black Book, printed twice in 1604, sported a special black title-page, and this use of original visual designs would characterize every Middleton play published from 1611 until his death. The Roaring Girl was not the first commercial play printed with a title-page woodcut—there were a few scattered precedents between 1590 and 1609—but Middleton became the only dramatist of his time to make such illustrations a regular feature of printings of his plays. The World Tossed at Tennis (1620) was the first masque with an illustrated title-page; The Triumphs of Health and Prosperity (1626), the first Lord Mayor's show;

A Game at Chess (1625), the first individual English play printed with an original title-page engraving—actually, with two separate engravings in editions by different printers. Middleton may have been influenced by woodcuts on the title-pages of pamphlets, like the one which he read when writing A Yorkshire Tragedy: then as now, a striking cover can effectively promote the text it contains. But such visual accompaniments were particularly appropriate to dramatic texts, where they part-supplied, part-suggested, the spectacle of a full performance.

Middleton himself was clearly involved in the publication of The Roaring Girl in 1611—just as in 1604 Dekker had been involved in preparing The Magnificent Entertainment for the press, and as Middleton in that year prepared pamphlets to sell to printers. What changed between 1604 and 1611 was the application to a play of routines previously used for pageants and pamphlets. Nine of Middleton's plays were printed between 1604 and 1608, but there is no evidence that he participated in their publication; some are anonymous, others misattributed, and none contains a preface, epistle, or dedication. Most were probably sold to printers by two acting companies which broke up between 1606 and 1608. Middleton in that decade apparently accepted the view expressed by the actor-dramatist Thomas Heywood in 1608, who suspected the 'honesty' of men who made 'a double sale of their labours, first to the stage and after to the press'. Either Middleton avoided reselling his plays, or at least he wanted to conceal his doing so, and so avoided any sign of personal involvement in their publication. By 1611, such squeamishness had vanished, as part of a larger gradual shift in the literary status of plays. In that year, Middleton and Dekker published The Roaring Girl with an illustrated title-page, an authorial epistle, and a list of Dramatis Personae; Heywood himself published his play The Golden Age, to be followed two years later by The Silver Age and The Brazen Age; and Jonson for the first time dedicated the text of a play (Catiline) to an individual patron. Not everyone recognized this social-climbing genre, of course. Sir Thomas Bodley, founder of the great library at Oxford, still lumped playbooks with 'almanacs' and other 'riff-raffs', and thought that including such 'baggage books' in the University's library would cause a 'scandal'. But in some quarters at least English plays had begun to be taken seriously as literary works, as commodities with a small but growing clientele in the book trade, and as labour which authors could honestly offer to the reading public.

The Roaring Girl, the first of his plays which Middleton prepared for the press, was printed by Nicholas Okes for the bookseller Thomas Archer. Okes had a hand in more Middleton books than any other stationer, sometimes as printer, sometimes as publisher: he published all but one of Middleton's civic pageants, and printed two unlicensed editions of A Game at Chess, apparently from a manuscript supplied by the author. In the early seventeenth century a stationer's shop was a small business, dominated by the character and interests of its owner, and Middleton must have known Okes personally, perhaps as well as he knew the actor Richard Burbage (whose epitaph he wrote) or the impresario Philip Henslowe (whose account book he appears in): these were all men with whom he had sustained professional associations.

Okes was, like Middleton, a native Londoner, Middleton's age, married at about the same time, with an eldest son just a little younger than Middleton's. In December 1603 he ended his apprenticeship in the Stationers' Company, the guild which controlled the book trade, and got married; for the next three years he must have worked as a journeyman printer, until in January 1607, for £70 or more, he acquired a press of his own and became, at the unusually young age of twenty-seven, a 'Master Printer'. This is a sign of his status within the guild; it does not imply that he was a distinguished craftsman. English printers were much less accomplished in the art of fine bookmaking than their continental counterparts, and Okes was often sloppy even by English standards. But he did have a taste for plays. In his first year of independent operation he printed the first edition of King Lear, and later would print the first edition of Othello; he was also eventually responsible for work by Beaumont, Daborne, Daniel, Dekker, Donne, Fletcher, Ford, Heywood, Jonson, Munday, Taylor, Webster, and Wither. In working on these authors, and Middleton, Okes reflected and encouraged changes in the book-buying market.

Okes was not the only printer Middleton knew. Most Jacobean stationers were the owners of small shops, where Middleton the reader presumably browsed and bought books from the same men to whom Middleton the writer occasionally sold manuscripts: men like William Stansby (who printed Middleton's Masque of Heroes and Jonson's Works), Edward Allde (who printed a surreptitious edition of A Game at Chess in 1625, four years after he had been imprisoned for an equally scandalous book about the King of Bohemia), and Thomas Archer (who published not only The Roaring Girl but a series of texts on 'the woman question')—to name only three of the forty-three stationers who dealt in Middleton texts during his lifetime. Of course, these men all knew each other, too. The book trade was often collaborative: in 1608, Okes was one of two printers who shared the manufacturing of Middleton's A Mad World, My Masters, which was retailed by a third. Work on the first edition of The Magnificent Entertainment, in 1604, was divided among four separate printers, as was The Patient Man and the Honest Whore, also in 1604.

Such shared printing was part of a larger pattern of collaboration within the culture. Dekker, Middleton, and Jonson all composed parts of James I's royal entry into London, several other people wrote and delivered individual speeches, Stephen Harrison was 'the sole inventor of the Architecture', hundreds of craftsmen contributed. Later, when publishing accounts of his Lord Mayor's shows, Middleton went out of his way to acknowledge his collaboration with craftsmen such as Garret Christmas. Pageants were pervasively collaborative.

So were plays. Again, Middleton's collaboration with Dekker in 1604 is typical: a third of his known plays and masques were written with one or more partners. In context this statistic is not surprising, since from one-half to two-thirds of all plays written between 1590 and 1642 are of plural authorship, and in other periods and genres of literary production collaboration has been far more common than Romantic myths of solitary genius lead us to expect. These working partnerships could develop into, or out of, intensely personal relationships: Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher allegedly shared a bed and a woman, and when Beaumont retired to the country Philip Massinger became Fletcher's chief collaborator, eventually being buried in the same grave. After Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones had collaborated for decades, their break-up was as venomous as the worst divorce. In the Renaissance theatre, inspiration was often (perhaps always) social, a process of reciprocal stimulation. The division of imaginative labour in the sweatshops of wit could make the making of plays dramatic, an unpredictable performance of give-and-take, collaborate-and-compete, connect-and-contrast. What began as apprenticeship could develop into fellowship: by 1611, when they co-wrote The Roaring Girl, Middleton and Dekker were equal partners.

When Dekker was imprisoned for the debts he accumulated while producing the 1612 Lord Mayor's show, Middleton found another collaborator—or another collaborator found him. William Rowley was, unlike Dekker, a gentleman, and almost certainly younger than Middleton. He was also an actor, apparently described in a ballad of 1612 as 'the fat fool of the Curtain' [Theatre]. Certainly, his known roles are remarkable for their jolly obesity. He 'personated' Jaques, 'a simple clownish gentleman' in his own play All's Lost by Lust, and through almost every play which Rowley wrote or co-wrote bustles an endearing idiot, apparently created for Rowley to recreate—Bustopha in The Maid in the Mill, Young Cuddy Banks in The Witch of Edmonton; Pompey Doodle, Chough, Gnotho, Simplicity, Lollio, Sancho, in plays in this volume. Part of the appeal for an audience of this gallery of harmless happiness is the very familiarity of the actor in the new role. When the Fat Bishop says, 'I've all my lifetime played the fool till now' (A Game at Chess 2.2.92–3), or when Sancho is asked 'What parts dost use to play?' and replies that he could 'fit you' in the role of 'a coxcomb' (The Spanish Gypsy 4.2.73–5), we hear, through and in the character, the great clown Rowley.

But the clown was no fool, and he could play more than one part. Rowley's first known play was published in 1607; like most of his work, it was written in collaboration, and over the course of his career he teamed up with the best in the business—Day, Dekker, Fletcher, Ford, Heywood, Webster, and Wilkins. But he also wrote, occasionally, on his own, and his (lost) Hymen's Holiday was successful enough to be selected for court performance in February 1612. After Rowley's success and Dekker's arrest, in 1613, Rowley and Middleton began collaborating, and over the next decade they wrote at least six scripts together. Rowley by then belonged to the Prince's Men; since 1609, the patron of his company of actors had been Prince Charles, who with the death of his brother Henry in 1612 became heir to the throne. In 1616, Rowley became leader of the Prince's company, and in the same year Middleton wrote Civitas Amor to celebrate Charles's investiture as Prince of Wales. This shared connection was strengthened in 1620, when Prince Charles commissioned Rowley and his company to create a masque, The World Tossed at Tennis, which Rowley wrote with Middleton. In 1624 Middleton wrote, and Rowley acted in, A Game at Chess, a play which—like the earlier masque—probably pleased Prince Charles as much as it annoyed his father. But the Prince was only a small part of the complex collaboration between Middleton and Rowley. Most critics consider them the best doubles team in the history of European drama.

One of the plays they wrote together was Old Law; one of the roles Middleton wrote for Rowley was performed at the law-school of the Inner Temple. The London legal community was one of the most important constituencies for drama and dance. In fact, the relationship between actors and lawyers goes back at least as far as the fifth century BCE, when Athenian tragedy and comedy were both influenced by the rhetoric, forms, and cases in Athenian law courts. This connection, made at the beginning of European drama, was also made at the beginning of Middleton's career: The Phoenix contains some of his funniest satire of lawyers, whose manoeuvres he had been watching since he was six. Some such distrust of legalistic modes of thought was encouraged by Protestant theology, with its insistence upon the superiority of grace to law. On the other hand, many members of Middleton's audiences—especially at St Paul's—were lawyers, and he probably had personal relationships with some of them. In addition to the lawyers who helped his mother construct her trust fund, Middleton certainly knew attorney Michael Moseley, who represented him in court, and his wife Mary (Magdalen) Marbeck had been born into the legal community. As a 'Six Clerk' Edward Marbeck had been involved in almost every aspect of proceedings in the Court of Chancery. Although Mary's father had died twenty years before she met Middleton, her family must still have had law-world friends: each of the six Six Clerks had as many as eight under-clerks, and in 1594 it was estimated that the office was worth £3,000 per annum.

Such income derived from a structure of collaboration, masquerading as rivalry: though one client might lose, both lawyers would always win. Dramatists and actors, likewise, whatever their personal or professional rivalries, joined forces to relieve clients of their assets—as Middleton shows, openly and comically enough, in A Mad World, My Masters and Hengist, King of Kent. The common player and the common lawyer—increasingly well paid, increasingly professionalized, increasingly conspicuous in the daily life of early modern London—were both verbal performers for an audience which had to pay whatever the outcome. Playhouses and courthouses proved, from The Phoenix to the end of Middleton's career, difficult to disentangle. Michaelmas Term (1604–5) is named for, and begins with a personification of, the first term of the annual legal season; A Yorkshire Tragedy (1605) is based upon a scandalous court case; Old Law (1619?) defends common law against arbitrary prerogative; Masque of Heroes (1619) entertained the Inner Temple; Middleton gave copies of A Game at Chess (in 1625) and The Witch (in 1625?) to Inns of Court lawyers; some of his poems circulated in manuscript miscellanies apparently compiled in the same milieu. Some of the stationers who dealt in Middleton texts, like John Browne and George Eld, had shops near the Inns, and catered to lawyers and law students. As a critic facetiously concluded in 1885, if ‘Shakespeare was [Sir Francis] Bacon, we can only say that it is quite certain that Middleton was [Sir Edward] Coke’. (Coke was the better lawyer, but James I preferred Bacon’s more absolutist legal theories.)

Middleton recorded Bacon’s impeachment by Parliament, and Coke’s imprisonment by the King, in his Annals for the year 1621. Both entries testify to Middleton’s continuing interest in lawyers, but the manuscript which contains those entries was written as part of his new job as official Chronologer of the City of London. If lawyers were one constituency to which Middleton appealed, the wholesale merchants who governed London were another: The Marriage of the Old and New Testament was dedicated, in 1620, to two such merchants, John Browne and Richard Fishbourne. John Stow had received a subsidy from the City for research on his Survey of London (1598, 1603), as had Anthony Munday for revising Stow’s work in 1618; but Middleton in September 1620 became the first writer to be promised an annual City salary for recording contemporary London life for posterity. It was a job he had in fact been doing two decades before the post was created. Middleton spent a good part of his career representing Londoners to themselves—idealistically in his civic pageants, ironically in his equally numerous city comedies. The popular comedies of the 1590s had dramatized, typically, times and places in the misty distance of romance; but from Michaelmas Term to Anything for a Quiet Life, Middleton depicted contemporary London with its pants down, usually with a hand in someone else’s pocket or placket. In 1623, he signed himself Poëta et Chron. Londinensis, ‘Poet and Chronicler of London’, a phrase as ambiguous in Latin as in English.

Though written for the City, The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment celebrated the accession of James I, and The Phoenix, though written for a London theatre, was also performed before the new royal court—which presumably enjoyed its vision of a vigorous new ruler, replacing one who, after ‘forty-five years’ in office, had grown tired and out of touch. In play and pageant, Middleton represented the court of James I to itself and others. In subsequent years, A Trick to Catch the Old One, No Wit/Help like a Woman’s, Masque of Cupids, A Fair Quarrel, Old Law, The Widow, More Dissemblers Besides Women, The Changeling, and The Spanish Gypsy would all follow The Phoenix and be performed before the Stuart royal family. Such command performances were the most prestigious critical recognition a play could receive. In 1618, James I authorized a special patent for publication of Middleton’s The Peacemaker—a pamphlet condemning violence, which pretended to be the work of the King himself. James I was indeed a peacemaker; soon after his accession, he proclaimed an end to the ideologically-driven sometimes-hot sometimes-cold war with Spain which had dominated English minds for decades. A negotiated settlement was finalized in 1604, the year when Middleton came of artistic age; for the next twenty years, England was at peace.

9. Mistress Turner’s Farewell to All Women (1615). Middle-class Anne Turner was hanged for helping Lady Frances Howard (‘Vanity’) murder Sir Thomas Overbury. Howard was the most scandalous woman of her time.

Peace, though, encouraged renewed attention to domestic affairs, and attention spawned criticism. The political nation soon became disillusioned with the new king it had welcomed so enthusiastically. What had at first seemed munificence was reinterpreted as profligacy, once the bills came due, and kept coming due, and kept getting bigger. In The Revenger’s Tragedy, The Lady’s Tragedy, Hengist, King of Kent, and Women, Beware Women, Middleton depicted a series of sexually, politically, and financially corrupt courts. None of these plays impersonated or explicitly criticized the reigning monarch or his ministers, but comparisons were not hard to make. Not surprisingly, though they have been hailed by critics as masterpieces, none of these plays is known to have been performed before the King.

Court tragedies, like city comedies, represent a world beyond the boundaries of official morality, beyond the inaugural parade and the regal proclamation, a world of backdoors, bedrooms, and alleyways, where the immediate gossip of neighbours matters more than the eternal judgement of God. ‘All the whole street will hate us’, the cruel father worries in A Chaste Maid in Cheapside (5.2.97); ‘O what will people think?’ the would-be adulteress cries in The Widow (3.3.138). Middleton wrote, above all, and for those nameless ‘people’ on that nameless ‘street’. The constituency most important to his career was not the official singular but the irregular plural: not the few identifiable individuals to whom works were dedicated or for whom masques and pageants were written, but the unspecified thousands who attended his shows and bought his books. Not the polished élite attending a commemorative service in St Paul’s Cathedral, but the customers milling in the dozens of bookshops in the cathedral yard, or applauding a play performed by boy actors in an indoor theatre in the cathedral precincts, or simply strolling through the aisles of the cathedral itself, as they do in Your Five Gallants, on the make. This is the company Middleton must have kept satisfying.

Volatile, ephemeral, unrespectable, reconstituted in different combinations every time, the audience Middleton addressed resembles in many ways the audience for street ballads. During his lifetime, innumerable ballads were printed on broadsides, which (like admission to the open-air theatres) cost a penny, and which (like Middleton’s title-pages) were normally illustrated with woodcuts (Illus. 9). But although ballads could be purchased and read, they were (like plays) primarily an oral and performed art. London reverberated to the sound of balladmongers, music teachers, dancing schools, shopkeepers singing to passing customers (‘What is’t you lack, you lack, you lack?’). The performance of a play was almost always followed by a jig—a miniature comedy, written in ballad-measure, and sung and danced to ballad-tunes by two to four actors. The influence of these afterpieces can be seen in the songs inside Middleton’s plays, which often, like jigs, combine rhyme and music to enact a story. In Act 3 of The Widow, for instance, Latrocinio distracts and then robs Ansaldo with a song; Ansaldo, turning the tables, forces Latrocinio to sing at gunpoint on his way to jail; Philippa and Violetta musically debate whether it is better to be ‘a fool’s mistress | Or an old man’s wife?’

Not surprisingly, the authors of plays sometimes wrote ballads, and more often alluded to them. The alternative title of The Puritan Widow—‘The Widow of Watling Street’—is taken from a ballad printed in 1597, and the history of Hengist, King of Kent had been balladed in 1589 (‘Of the lewd life of Vortiger, King of Britain, and of the first coming of Hengist and the Saxons into the land’). This overlap between the two genres was sometimes simultaneous: the Calverly murders stimulated instant ballads as well as Middleton’s instant Yorkshire Tragedy, and Anything for a Quiet Life was the title of a ballad of about the same date as Middleton and Webster’s play. Like modern tabloids and television docudramas, ballads fed on sensational news, and what The World Tossed at Tennis says of the subject matter of street songs could also be said of early modern plays: ‘one hangs himself today, another drowns himself tomorrow, a sergeant stabbed next day . . . fashions, fictions, felonies, fooleries—a hundred havens has the balladmonger to traffic at, and new ones still daily discovered’ (29–35). Certainly, to cultural authorities the two forms were equally vulgar. In Satyres and Satyricall Epigrams (1617), Henry Fitzgeffrey condemned Books, made of ballads; ‘Works’, of plays;

Sights, to be read, of my Lord Mayor’s days

—thus lumping together Ben Jonson’s proud 1616 collection of his ‘Works’, anthologies of ballads, and Lord Mayor’s shows like Middleton’s 1617 Triumphs of Honour and Industry. In 1600, Sir William Cornwallis read ballads in his privy and then used them to wipe himself; in 1640 a petition signed by 15,000 citizens complained of ‘The swarming of lascivious, idle, and unprofitable books and pamphlets, playbooks, and ballads’, which caused the ‘withdrawing of people from reading, studying, and hearing the Word of God and other good books’.

The Word of God was at odds with more than plays and ballads. In 1584 London contained more than a hundred churches, but George Whetstone noted that this was less than the number of ‘ordinary tables’ for playing dice. Middleton stages dice games in Michaelmas Term and Your Five Gallants, trap-stick in Women, Beware Women, law-games in The Phoenix, dancing lessons in More Dissemblers Besides Women; he manipulates adult-size puppets in The Revenger’s Tragedy and Wit at Several Weapons; he imagines The World Tossed at Tennis or at stake in A Game at Chess. In A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, social rituals of precedence or jealousy are transfigured into bizarre repetitive moves and countermoves: ‘The game begins already’ (1.2.79). His language dances and parries with images of a world at play. The very words ‘game’ and ‘sport’ flirt with sexual meanings, and the climax of The Changeling is an image of barley-brake (5.3.163).

Not only mentally but geographically, there was at least as much room in Middleton’s world for playing as for praying. In 1628 an observer counted ‘above thirty hundred alehouses, tipping houses, tobacco shops, etc.’ in London. Houses of recreation were not only more numerous but more popular than houses of religion: ‘come into a church on the Sabbath day, and ye shall see but few’, a bishop recorded in 1560, ‘but the alehouse is ever full’. These secular resorts are not featured so prominently on maps, but from Middleton’s childhood home on Ironmonger Street it was as easy to walk to the Windmill Tavern or Blossom’s Inn as to St Lawrence Jewry or the Guildhall. Actors usually gathered in a favourite ordinary to hear a playwright read his new script; the wine they drank there was a business expense, recorded in the company's account books. Middleton himself was a regular customer at 'a very great haunted inn' owned by Ewen Hebsen; he was in debt to Hebsen for a bond of £26, most of which he had paid by July 1609, when Hebsen died. In 1612 Hebsen's heir wrote off the remaining £7 as a 'desperate' (uncollectable) debt.

No one proposed the complete abolition of alehouses; without modern water treatment plants, it was healthier to drink beer than water. But if alehouses were a necessary evil, playhouses were superfluously satanic. In 1608, preaching at Paul's Cross, William Crashaw condemned 'ungodly plays and interludes'—and was particularly outraged that The Puritan Widow had dared satirize 'names of two churches of God'. In 1623, in a printed sermon that probably influenced A Game at Chess, Thomas Scott complained of the 'Neutralist, who is of all religions, or no religion; who goes...to a play with greater delight and love, than to a sermon'. There was nothing original about such complaints: pulpits had been spitting at stages before Middleton was born. 'Will not a filthy play, with the blast of a trumpet, sooner call thither a thousand', another preacher at Paul's Cross had asked, in 1578, 'than an hour's tolling of a bell bring to the sermon a hundred?' Certainly, plays were popular: between 1567 and 1642, more than fifty million visits were made to thirteen London theatres. The plays performed in those theatres were 'filthy' in part because they brought together, on stage and in the audience, unsupervised idle women and men, who had congregated to spend their money in the pursuit of pleasure. In 1604 Dekker and Middleton made a prostitute the eponymous co-protagonist of their play, but long before then playhouses had been stigmatized as haunts of prostitution.

Such 'markets of bawdry' catered to a demand for unauthorized sex, real or imagined, that the social structure of early modern London had intensified. Half of its inhabitants were aged twenty-five or under. The active sexual energies of this young population could not be satisfied licitly for simple demographic reasons: there were 115 men for every 100 women. Moreover, 15 per cent of the total population were male apprentices, adolescents and young adults who could not marry. Although Middleton was probably only twenty-two when he married his twenty-seven-year-old bride, they were both atypical: London-born women were likely to be married by the age of twenty-one, and the average age of marriage for London men was twenty-eight. The demand for sex before or without marriage must have been explosively high. Poverty increased both demand and supply: poor young men were less likely to marry, poor young women were more likely to become prostitutes. Illegitimate births peaked in the decades from 1590 to 1620. But if poverty stimulated the economy of desire, so could wealth and power: the court of James I was notoriously unchaste (Illus. 9). James himself apparently had sexual partners of both genders, as do characters in Michaelmas Term. In the world of the theatre, particularly, where young boys dressed as women, homophobia was sure that men often 'played the sodomites, or worse'.

Middleton had an extraordinarily active sexual imagination. The range of his practice may or may not have matched that of his pen. (Which is more inspiring, consummation or frustration?) But his body, so irrelevant to us, was for him a constant stimulant or irritant, an incapable presence familiarly collaborating with the books he read, the sermons he heard, the buildings he inhabited. Many of the books, sermons, and buildings have survived, still visible, touchable. The body is gone.

All that remains to us of the physical Middleton is a single half-length portrait (Illus. 10). It displays a man with a finely shaded face, shoulder-length curls, and a trim beard—a head distinctly unlike Shakespeare's dome, Jonson's rough round, Sidney's polished arrogance, Chapman's Homeric beard and muscled neck. This Middleton also differs, most revealingly, from the formal unhand-some Massinger etched by the same artist (Illus. 11). The day after Middleton's death, Massinger had begun writing exclusively for the King's Men; the timing suggests that he replaced Middleton as the company's house dramatist. But the two men apparently never collaborated, and the contrast between their portraits might suggest why. Massinger's portrait—with its straight lines, blocked letters, awkward contrasts, pasty face and disconnected nimbus—is perfectly stolid. Middleton looks altogether more stylish. Is he observing out of a window or interrogating a mirror? The engraving almost certainly derives from one of the portrait miniatures fashionable in Middleton's lifetime, an object of intimacy and vanity, often encased within a jewelled setting. The subject in this object, the object subjected to our gaze, wears his crown of laurel as naturally as one might don a low-slung, feathered hat. His left arm must be propped akimbo on his hip, a posture associated with authority or even vanity—but any arrogance is tucked away in the gown that conceals the arm; the gesture is not displayed but implied. Part of the function of any gown, of course, is to conceal. Middleton's body is hidden under layers of artifice: the flesh beneath the shirt beneath the gown, which is itself doubled over. As fluid as his pen, the dark gown, like his dark hair and his white collar, flows around him in waves and folds. It could be legal or academic, classical or modish, masculine or effeminate, warm or swank. If this dark-dressed dark-faced man were a character in A Game at Chess, he would obviously belong to the Black House; it's easy to picture him on the title-page, in place of the black-bearded black-gowned Black Knight (Illus. 2). Gowns are great sartorial playthings, inviting constant adjustment, gathering, folding, swishing—fashion in motion. His mother Anne owned 'a turkey program gown and a silk program kirtle' worth £7 at her death—as much as Middleton earned for his first play; his sister Avis, when newly widowed, bought 'a silk rash gown'. But this taste for expensive gowning was by no means confined to Middleton's family. The wardrobe of Sir Edmund Tilney, Master of the Revels until his death in

10. Engraved portrait of Middleton, used as a frontispiece for Two New Playes... Written by Tho. Middleton, Gent. (published by Humphrey Moseley in 1657).

1610, was so elaborate that he felt compelled to repent it in his will.

When this engraving was printed, the body hidden beneath the gown had been beneath the ground for thirty years. He made his final curtain call in the parish church of Newington, Surrey. St Mary's church 'is very small', the famous antiquarian John Aubrey recorded, later in the century, 'built of brick and boulder (which is irregular or unsquare stone put in a wall), a double roof covered with tile, and the walls with a rough cast; the windows are of a modern Gothic; the floor is paved with stone'. There were five bells in the church tower, and its turrets were sixty feet high, like the 'steep towers and turrets' that Middleton imagined his happy witches flying over, 'in moonlight nights'. On 30 June 1627 'a man out of the street' was buried, anonymously, in St Mary's churchyard; the bells tolled again, on 4 July, when the same minister committed the body of 'Mr Thomas Middleton' to the ground—'earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust'. There were presumably more mourners at Middleton's burial, but none of them could be sure whether the gentleman ascended into bliss, descended into torment, or simply rotted in place.

11. Engraved portrait of Massinger, used as a frontispiece for Three New Playes... Written by Philip Massinger, Gent. (published by Humphrey Moseley in 1655).

Reputation

The humanist educational system insisted on the persisting life of the works of authors who had been dead for millennia; it held out the promise that texts written now might likewise 'live' for ever. So Spenser describes his 'Epithalamium' as 'an endless monument'; Jonson is confident that 'this art shall live'; Daniel anticipates that 'th' unborn shall' read his 'authentic' verse 'in time to come'; Drayton proclaims that his 'world-outwearing rhymes' constitute an 'immortal song'. Middleton—or, as Thomas Heywood tells us he preferred to be called, 'plain

Tom—did not praise himself in this way. The future of his soul may have mattered more to him than the future of his texts; or maybe neither mattered; perhaps (as his parody of almanacs suggests) he was amused and sceptical about any attempt to fix futures.

This attitude toward posterity—whether we attribute it to humility, other-worldliness, carelessness, or scepticism—shaped the history of Tom’s posthumous reputation. He did not, as Spenser and Milton did, elect himself England’s laureate; he did not, as Jonson did, build a monument to himself in his own lifetime, by publishing his works in folio; he did not, as Donne did, stage-manage his own death. Nor did he make it easy for others to improve the value of his literary estate after his death. Shakespeare was a corporation man, a shareholder in the same joint-stock company of actors for at least twenty years; his lifelong friends, the senior partners who survived him, collected and published his plays, which were company property, in 1623. In 1647, an ambitious royalist bookseller could acquire virtually all of the unpublished plays of Beaumont and Fletcher from the same single source, the King’s Men. Middleton, by contrast, worked freelance; his plays were scattered among many companies. No one owned him.

Sidney’s manuscripts were left in the possession of his sister, the Countess of Pembroke; Donne’s works were posthumously edited by his son; Shakespeare’s family paid for a monument in Holy Trinity Church. Middleton’s family was not so well positioned to enhance his reputation. His stepfather, Thomas Harvey, had probably been dead for twenty years: he last paid his dues to the Grocers in 1605–6. Of his younger sister Avis no records have been found after 1609. In 1603 she had one surviving daughter; no children of her second marriage were baptized in the parish of St George the Martyr in Southwark. A John Empson (who may have been her husband) was buried there on 18 July 1625; another John Empson (who could have been her son or stepson) was married there on 24 June 1628. Even if she were alive, Avis, wife or widow of a feckless cutler, was not in a position to champion her elder brother’s work. His friend and favourite collaborator William Rowley, who would have been better placed, had predeceased him in February 1626.

In February 1628, Magdalen Middleton, widow ‘of Thomas Middleton deceased, late Chronologer of this City’, upon her ‘humble petition’ to the Alderman’s Court, was granted twenty nobles (two-thirds of £20), presumably to relieve her poverty. Middleton had never acquired landed property, and after his death (Mary) Magdalen would have had no income; such widows were particularly vulnerable to destitution. Fifty-two years old, and not wealthy, she would have had difficulty finding a second husband, and she would have been foolish not to sell books and manuscripts for whatever they would fetch. Her problems did not last long, however: she was buried a year after her husband, on 18 July 1628, at St Mary’s in Newington.

Any remaining literary property would have descended to their only son, Edward. ‘Edward Middleton of Newington, gent.’ died in 1649; his will does not mention a wife or children of his own, instead beginning with another man’s wife (‘First I bequeath unto my loving friend Elizabeth Browne, wife of Edmond Browne, £5 to buy her mourning after my decease . . .’). Elizabeth’s youngest son got £10, and her husband was named executor of his estate. He had, apparently, no wife or children of his own. Edward had been nineteen in November 1623; in September 1624 he was arrested and questioned by the Privy Council about the whereabouts of his father, then in hiding after the crackdown on A Game at Chess. This is not an experience likely to encourage most twenty-year-olds to interest themselves further in literary politics.

In the mid-1620s, Middleton needed champions. In August 1624, A Game at Chess became not only the greatest success of Middleton’s career, but the most spectacularly and scandalously popular play of the English Renaissance. After its suppression, Middleton went into hiding, then into prison. He was released, but to our knowledge never wrote another play. John Marston, in 1608, had also been imprisoned for representing King James on stage; he too was released, but never wrote another play. Middleton died in 1627, but his dramatic career apparently ended in 1624. His career as a writer of pageants was simultaneously eclipsed. In prison or hiding, he could not write or produce the Lord Mayor’s show of October 1624, and the 1625 show was cancelled. The pageant to celebrate Charles I’s royal entry into London, written by Middleton and scheduled for summer 1625, was delayed and delayed and finally aborted by the King himself. Middleton did write the 1626 Lord Mayor’s show, but this pageant, his first in three years, was bedevilled by the financial problems of the Company of Drapers; the cheapest show since 1609, it was not a success. Middleton did not get a chance to bounce back from that failure, because by the next October he was dead.

As a result of this enforced or fortuitous three-year silence, Middleton was for some time defined retrospectively as the author of a single work, A Game at Chess—a burst of light which by its magnitude and finality tended to obscure what preceded it. Moreover, Middleton’s departure from the theatre coincided with Ben Jonson’s return to it, after a ten-year absence. In 1626, Jonson coupled Middleton with another object of his contempt, the radical satirist George Wither, and imagined ‘the poor English play’ (The Game at Chess) being used for toilet paper (‘cleansing his posteriors’). Middleton’s career as a playwright ended in 1624 with an unparalleled success; Jonson’s ended, from 1626 to 1631, in a series of embarrassing failures. Nevertheless, Jonson’s rejection by ‘the loathed stage’ actually enhanced his literary reputation, provoking odes of praise and defence by the poets Thomas Randolph and Thomas Carew, the Oxford don Richard James, and several others. Middleton’s success became scatological; Jonson’s failure, a badge of integrity. Jonson’s former secretary, Richard Brome, alluded to the same Middleton play in 1629, and in the first posthumous reference to Middleton by name, in 1632, William Heminges (another Jonson acolyte, writing a poem to Randolph) included in a list of modern poets ‘squoblinge Middleton’. Heminges thus epitomized Middleton either as the author of spectacular plays and pageants full of firecrackers (‘squibs’) or the author of satirical ‘squibs’ (like A Game at Chess). Heminges went on to describe Middleton, ‘with tears’, telling the story of an amputated finger (like that in The Changeling?). This image of a weeping Middleton may have seemed as unmanly to the testosterone wits of the 1630s as it does now; modern male critics prefer an ever-ironic, intellectual, un-sentimental Middleton. Certainly, Heminges in successive couplets contrasted Jonson (who made Puritans ‘quake’) with Middleton, whom they ‘seemed much to adore’ for his ‘learnèd exercise’ against Catholic Spain (A Game at Chess, again).

The hostility of Jonson and the approval of Puritans were, in the literary court of Caroline England, doubly damning. Middleton was as isolated, in this cavalier coterie, as Milton—but without Milton’s massive defensive appropriation of classical authority. His plays continued to be revived in the theatre, and to influence the playwrights of the late 1620s and 1630s, from Massinger and Shirley to less familiar figures like Brome, Davenport, Glapthorne, and Richards. But the troubled state of his reputation is evident in an epigram printed in 1640 in the anthology Wit’s Recreations:

Facetious Middleton, thy witty muse
Hath pleased all that books or men peruse.
If any thee despise, he doth but show
Antipathy to wit in daring so.
Thy fame’s above his malice, and ’twill be Dispraise enough for him to censure thee.

The opening couplet, with its assurance of unconditional and universal delight, is contradicted by the following four lines, which wittily defend Middleton against the antipathy, malice, and censure of those who despise him. This is embattled praise.

Middleton could be so readily and radically diminished by ‘malice’ in part because most of his work was unavailable or unidentified. This problem, which began in the first decades after his death, persisted into the twentieth century. Of the thirteen pamphlets in this edition, five were published anonymously; three were identified only by the initials ‘T.M.’ attached to a preface, one by the same initials on the title-page, three by the full name attached to a preface, and only one—the very first—by the full name on the title-page. Three-quarters of the pamphlets were thus attributed ambiguously if at all. Of the thirty plays in this edition, two were not published in the seventeenth century at all; four were published anonymously; four were misattributed to other playwrights; five named Middleton’s collaborator as sole author; two attributed parts of the play to fictitious collaborators. Such confusions affected half of his surviving theatrical canon.

More grievously, much of that canon did not survive at all, in part because the middle decades of the seventeenth century were particularly disruptive of England’s social and literary fabric. The Calvinist consensus of the English church, which had lasted half a century, was shattered in the last years of Middleton’s life by the rise of a faction influenced by the Dutch theologian Jacobus Arminius (who argued that salvation was not predetermined, but could be influenced by individual action). Within a year of the accession of Charles I, Arminians effectively dominated the Church hierarchy. The reformist Protestant humanism of much of the laity collided with the new conservatism of the episcopate. The Thirty Years War, which began in central Europe in 1618, led to increasingly bitter divisions over foreign policy. The shortfall in government revenue, disguised by Elizabeth’s unmarried parsimony, intensified into a perpetual crisis for the more lavish and fertile Stuarts; efforts to remedy the crisis were perceived, more and more widely, as corrupt or illegal. Fifteen years after Middleton’s death, the annual Lord Mayor’s shows had been suspended, ballads had been banned, the theatres were closed, and the Commons was at war with the Crown.

This dissolution affected Middleton’s reputation, in part because it determined how and by whom he would be interpreted. Charles I was reading Shakespeare and Jonson in prison in the weeks before his execution; it is hard to imagine him reading Middleton. When his son Charles II returned to London in 1660, the Restoration’s programmatic cultural nostalgia was more receptive to the gallant Beaumont and Fletcher, the neoclassical Jonson, the royal Shakespeare, than to vulgar critical Middleton. But the turmoil of these decades also had simpler, physical consequences for Middleton’s reputation. On 2 September 1642, Parliament closed the theatres, condemning plays as ‘spectacles of pleasure, too commonly expressing lascivious mirth and levity’. The acting companies held on for a while, but eventually disintegrated. On 15 April 1644, the Globe theatre was pulled down; on 6 August 1655, the Blackfriars; on 25 March 1656, the Hope—empty playhouses replaced by profitable tenements for a continually expanding urban population. In 1666, the Fire of London destroyed not only the church of St Lawrence Jewry, but most of the old City within the walls, including innumerable books and manuscripts.

Because Middleton’s works had not been collected, they were particularly susceptible to chance destruction in these social cataclysms. If Shakespeare’s Comedies, Histories, and Tragedies had not been published together in 1623, we could easily have lost half of his canon—including Julius Caesar, As You Like It, Twelfth Night, Macbeth, Antony and Cleopatra, Coriolanus, The Winter’s Tale, and The Tempest. (Obviously, the fact that a play had not been printed is no reflection on its artistic virtue.) We can still read these works because, after 1623, perhaps 750 copies of thirty-six Shakespeare plays were widely dispersed in a single expensive volume, likely to be preserved in the library of a wealthy family or institution. Middleton’s works were interred in no such monumental tome, and it is hard to be sure what quantity or quality of comedies, histories, and tragedies perished as a result.

12. Restoration Middleton emphasized isolated single characters and fond memories of innocent vulgar clowning, as in this 1662 visual anthology, which includes The Changeling (upper left).

The casualties must have been substantial. We can specify five lost plays, one lost masque, one lost royal pageant, two lost prose works, one lost prologue and epilogue. There were no doubt more. In 1611 alone, he wrote three surviving plays; for 1610 and 1612, not a single play survives. From spring 1602 to spring 1608, Middleton wrote all or part of fourteen known plays, averaging more than two plays per year; he also produced five known pamphlets. This period is probably representative of his usual productivity, which we can observe because of the survival of Henslowe's account books and the collapse of two acting companies, leading to the publication of an unusual number of plays. Even during this period, Middleton almost certainly wrote other material which has not survived; our knowledge of more than one-fifth of these plays is, after all, fortuitous. But even if we assume that the figures for these six years are complete, then from 1609 to 1624, at a comparable rate, he would have turned out, alone or in collaboration, in addition to civic pageants and a few pamphlets, another thirty-five dramatic texts. By this conservative estimate, we can read, now, only about half of Middleton's plays and masques. If 1611 is typical, then between 1601 and 1624 he would have written at least sixty-nine plays. Nor is this conclusion surprising. More than forty plays by Dekker are lost; of the plays written by Philip Massinger between 1625 and 1640, only about half survive. If Middleton's writing had been collected and published shortly after his death, that edition would probably have doubled the canon available to us—and maybe have tripled it.

13. Elegant eighteenth-century Middleton: the masque in Wit and Several Weapons, 5.2, as illustrated in a frontispiece from Gerard Langbaine's 1711 edition of The Works of Mr Francis Beaumont and Mr John Fletcher, volume 6. Conflating 5.2.45-7 and 5.2.74-6, this illustration shows Cunninggame (front left) stealing off leading the Niece (centre) under the approving eyes of Wittypate (right); behind them a reluctant Guardianess (left) is urged to dance by an energetic Lady Ruinous (right), while the Old Knight dances obliviously on at the rear. Priscian and Sir Ruinous are the two central figures in the musicians' gallery, above the spectators who crowd the stage boxes. The anonymous engraver may well have been influenced by the staging of this scene in Colley Cibber's adaptation, The Rival Fools, performed at Drury Lane in 1709.

We cannot judge work that has not survived. But we cannot ignore it, either, when estimating the relative scale of an author's achievement. In 1675 Edward Phillips, who compiled the first biographical encyclopedia of English poets, described Middleton as 'a copious writer'; he little realized how copious. Four years before, when the bookseller Francis Kirkman had ranked the top ten English playwrights in order of importance, that order had been determined largely by the number of their extant works; 'Middleton and Rowley' were sixth. The top three, not surprisingly, were Shakespeare, 'Beaumont and Fletcher', and Jonson—whose canons had been preserved, virtually complete, in folios. Genius cannot be statistically determined, but by any criteria Middleton belongs among the most productive dramatists of early modern England.

That status could hardly be appreciated in the years after 1660. When the monarchy returned and the theatres reopened, a reader could find virtually all of Jonson or Fletcher or Shakespeare in one book. By contrast, Middleton's work—like Marlowe's, Dekker's, Webster's, Ford's—was scattered in many separate cheap individual editions, each for sale in only a few remaining copies, or none, in a world without public libraries, without bibliographies, without journals for essays in criticism, without classes in English literature. In 1655, John Cotgrave's English Treasury of Wit and Language had quoted more excerpts from plays in the Middleton canon than from any other playwright—but he attributed none of his quotations, and until the twentieth century no reader of Cotgrave's anthology could have been aware of how much quotable Master Middleton contributed to it. In 1662 The Changeling was featured in a visual anthology of famous theatrical roles, but Middleton was not named (Illus. 12). In 1663, William Davenant could look back forty years, to a time when he was only eighteen, and remember the unparalleled 'crowd' that had rushed the doors to see Middleton's 'Play of Gundamar'—but the only published texts of A Game at Chess did not name its author, and neither did Davenant. After the Restoration, eight of Middleton's plays were successfully revived, but most were simply unknown. Those who knew them often took advantage of their unfamiliarity by borrowing from them, wholesale, without acknowledgement. As early as 1688, antiquarians like Gerard Langbaine complained about such robberies, but to no avail. To most readers or audiences, some of Middleton's virtues now appeared to be those of Shakespeare or Fletcher, whose folios included some of his plays (Illus. 13); other Middleton achievements were silently appropriated by Aphra Behn, Colley Cibber, and a dozen lesser writers. One of the most populist after-pieces of the eighteenth-century stage, 'The Slip', was lifted from A Mad World, My Masters, but its original creator was never credited. Middleton became virtually invisible for a century and a half. In that century and a half, the canon of English literature was established.

When Middleton resurfaced, in the nineteenth century, he entered a canonical system dominated by Shakespeare. This context has shaped the subsequent history of his reception. For eighteenth-century scholars from Lewis Theobald to George Steevens, Middleton's texts were simply raw linguistic data, collected for the better explication of Shakespeare; the revolutionary editor Edward Capell went out of his way to describe Middleton as 'no mean comic genius', but this remark was made in The School of Shakespeare, an anthology of extracts from 'diverse English books, that contribute to a due understanding of his writings' (1779). This pattern persisted into the twentieth century, Shakespeare serving as Middleton's chief patron. Those texts where Middleton's writing intertwines with Shakespeare's have been more widely edited, translated, produced, discussed, and illustrated than any of his other work (Illus. 14–16). Verdi made thrilling romantic opera out of Middleton's adaptation of the cauldron scene in Macbeth, Duke Ellington jazzed up Middleton's share of Timon of Athens. The most famous work of art inspired by Middleton is undoubtedly Dante Gabriel Rossetti's 'Mariana' (1870), based on a Middleton passage in Measure for Measure. In the nineteenth century, authorship problems in the Middleton canon were first seriously discussed in the meetings and transactions of the New Shakspeare Society, and Shakespeare journals and conferences continue to be a main outlet for Middleton scholarship. Repertory companies founded primarily to produce Shakespeare have pioneered Middleton's restoration to the stage, from William Poel and his Elizabethan Stage Society, responsible for the only nineteenth-century performance of a Middleton play, to the Royal Shakespeare Company, which mounted the first professional revival since the early seventeenth century of Women, Beware Women. And though some contributors to this edition hail from departments of history, drama, or theology, most are teachers of English literature, and most were hired specifically to teach Shakespeare. Middleton has thus inevitably been understood and described—misleadingly—in terms of his similarities to or differences from Shakespeare. After all, every modern reader of Middleton is someone who has already read Shakespeare.

In order for there to be any such modern readers of Middleton, his work had to be reprinted and edited. In the eighteenth century, fragments of Middleton had been anthologized in collections of quotations like The British Muse and Beauties of the English Drama, and a handful of his plays had been printed entire in successive editions of A Select Collection of Old Plays. But most of his work was available only to wealthy collectors. In 1707 a copy of The Roaring Girl was purchased for three pounds nine shillings—78 times its original price, and two and a half times the price of a Shakespeare First Folio sold in the same decade. Edmond Malone, who bought books for the first Earl of Charlemont, 'picked up' A Chaste Maid in Cheapside in Dublin in 1797, but was unable to 'secure' a copy of Old Law, and complained that George III's buyers were pushing up auction prices for rare books. The first editions of Middleton's work, originally cheap and accessible, had become rare and expensive, while the expensive upmarket folios of Jonson, Shakespeare, and Fletcher had made their work readily obtainable.

14. Spectacular Victorian Middleton: Bernard Partridge's painting of Middleton's chorus of witches in Macbeth, based on the 1898 production by Henry Irving.

Middleton's achievement did not begin to be visible, or imaginable, until 1840, when Edward Lumley of Chancery Lane, London, published a five-volume limited edition of The Works of Thomas Middleton, Now first collected, with some account of the author, and notes, by the Reverend Alexander Dyce. Dyce (1798–1869) was a resident of Gray's Inn (part of the London legal community Middleton had satirized and entertained); his lifetime of scholarship was supported by his parents' investments in the East India Company (which Middleton had celebrated in The Triumphs of Honour and Industry and other pageants). In 1840, Dyce was already an experienced editor of Renaissance plays, having worked on Peele, Webster, Greene, and Shirley; he would go on to edit Beaumont and Fletcher, Marlowe, Ford, and Shakespeare. All the contemporaries of Shakespeare whom Dyce edited, including Middleton, had been quoted and praised in Charles Lamb's influential anthology of Specimens of English Dramatic Poets, Who Lived about the Time of Shakespeare (1808). Dyce's Middleton was simply one part of a vast nineteenth-century archival project, carried out by many scholars, to recover systematically the culture of 'Elizabethan' England. His approach was archaeological, even anthropological: hence, 'As they faithfully reflect the manners and customs of the age, even the worst of Middleton's comedies are not without their value.'

By modern standards, Dyce's edition—like all nineteenth-century editions of Renaissance literature—leaves much to be desired. He guessed that Middleton had been born in 1570 (an error that still shows up in reference works) and conjectured that he was educated at the Inns of Court (an error that misled generations of critics into associating Middleton with coterie writers like Marston rather than popular writers like Shakespeare, Dekker and Heywood). More pervasively, Dyce froze the Middleton canon in the chaotic state created by the second half of the seventeenth century. He did not include some of Middleton's best work; he did include some mediocre work not by Middleton; he did little to disentangle Middleton from his collaborators. Nevertheless, Dyce's edition revolutionized perceptions of Middleton. His collection established, for the first time, a corpus, a body of work, an intertextual field susceptible to analysis of its structure, coherence, development, internal relations and articulations. His introductory life, citing manuscript sources never before consulted, made it possible to imagine a human body doing the work, a person, a personality; what Rowe's biography had done for Shakespeare in 1709, Dyce's biography did for Middleton. By reprinting as frontispiece the 1657 engraving (Illus. 10), Dyce put back into circulation an image of the poet, enabling readers like Swinburne to imagine his 'noble and thoughtful face, so full of gentle dignity and earnest composure'. Thanks to Dyce, the young American critic and poet James Russell Lowell in 1843 could draw 'an estimate' of Middleton's 'character', could casually quote ten of his plays, could situate their author among the poets whose words have 'a mysterious and oracular majesty' and whose 'tragic faculty' can 'bring up for us the snowy pearls which sleep in the deep abysses and caverns of the soul'. Thanks to Dyce, in 1854 the first African American novelist and playwright, William Wells Brown, could quote Women, Beware Women as well as Shakespeare. Thanks to Dyce, in 1878 the Aberdeen professor, journalist, and novelist William Minto could, in an article on Middleton in the famous ninth edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, affirm that 'in daring and happy concentration of imagery, and a certain imperial confidence in the use of words, [he] of all the dramatists of that time is the disciple that comes nearest to the master' [Shakespeare].

This praise came too late to save Middleton's physical remains. Two years before, the parish church of St Mary's Newington had been pulled down to make room for a wider road; all bodies were removed from the churchyard and interred together in a new vault. The surviving grave markers were meticulously transcribed, but the Middletons' must have disappeared long before, for they are not recorded. And if Victorian London did not much value what was left of Middleton's corpse, some Victorian critics were no tenderer toward his corpus. In the 1870s, Middleton's plays were being read not only by Minto and Swinburne, but also by the postmaster and novelist Anthony Trollope. Trollope read every play in Dyce's edition, and concluded that 'Perhaps of all the so-called Elizabethan dramatists Middleton was the worst.' In 1878, at about the time Minto's Encyclopaedia article was coming off the press, Trollope was writing, at the end of Your Five Gallants, 'This piece is so tedious, so perplexed, so uninteresting and so bad, that one is at [a] loss to conceive how such a man as Dyce could have given up his time to editing it. To have read it is a sin, in the wasting of time.'

15. Pre-Raphaelite Middleton: Byam Shaw's illustration of the Middleton masque of ladies in Timon of Athens.

Trollope was in the 1860s the most popular and 'the most English' of novelists; his revulsion from Middleton is representative of a class and a generation, but it also identifies certain real features of Middleton's work which any reader will soon observe. One of those features is Middleton's frank sexuality. Trollope was described by his contemporaries as 'the prose laureate of English girls of the better class' (1869); his heroines were praised for being 'like the honest English girls we know' (1867); Henry James remarked that 'the British maiden' of Trollope's novels has 'a kind of clinging tenderness, a passive sweetness' reminiscent of 'the fragrance of Imogen and Desdemona'. Middleton's women exude rather different fragrances (Illus. 15–19). In The Nice Valour, Middleton concludes that 'desire is of both genders' (5.3.180): both genders have powerful sexual appetites, and each may desire either—or both. Middleton would only begin to return to the theatrical repertory in the roaring twenties, a decade in which T. S. Eliot praised 'the indecencies of Elizabethan and Restoration drama' and Virginia Woolf confided to her diary that she 'adore[d] Shakespeare at his bawdiest'. She could have found even more bawdy in Middleton. By 1963, Kenneth Tynan could observe, in a family newspaper, that 'where sexual vagaries are concerned there is more authentic reportage in The Changeling and Women Beware Women than in the whole of' Shakespeare. In 1963—the year when sex was invented, in Philip Larkin's famously ironic chronology—Tynan's claim was praise; but Queen Victoria would not have been amused. Neither was Trollope.

But even Trollope could not avoid, at times, being impressed. The plot of his novel The Fixed Period (1882) is taken from Old Law, and in a moment of uncharacteristic weakness he conceded that Middleton, 'had he given himself fair chance by sustained labour, might have excelled all the Elizabethan dramatists except Shakespeare'. Others were more openly enthusiastic. In 1885–6 Dyce's edition was reprinted in eight volumes with a few changes (and more errors) by A. H. Bullen, who provided a new and more avid introduction; Bullen concludes that, if Middleton does not deserve to be called 'a great dramatist', then 'I know not which of Shakespeare's followers is worthy of that title'. Bullen's expensive limited edition, more widely reviewed than Dyce's, was followed in 1887–90 by Middleton's entry in the popular Mermaid series, a two-volume selection of ten plays edited by Havelock Ellis (soon to become famous for Studies in the Psychology of Sex). From then on, Middleton was treated, by editors and academic critics, as a major Renaissance dramatist. Individual plays have been translated into Dutch, German, French, Italian, Japanese, Polish, and Spanish.

His status has continued to rise. Each new decade has seen more revivals of his plays than the one before, including productions outside the English-speaking world (Gdańsk, Rome, Zurich). In 1922 The Waste Land's most frequent, and in some ways most surprising, quotations were from Middleton and Webster; in 1927 Eliot wrote the most influential single essay on Middleton, describing him as 'one of the most voluminous, and one of the best, dramatic writers of his time', 'a great artist or artisan', dispassionately exposing the 'fundamental passions of any time and any place'. Not everyone accepted this assessment. The Cambridge don L. C. Knights, in 1936, judged Middleton far inferior to Jonson; Jonson has continued to attract much academic admiration, as he did in his own time. But whether Eliot inspired awe or dissent, he had put Middleton in the literary canon, on the critical agenda, in the university curriculum. After Eliot, English playwrights—Peter Barnes, Edward Bond, Barrie Keefe, Joe Orton—began to acknowledge Middleton as a precursor.

Eliot famously asserted that Middleton had 'no point of view', no 'peculiar personality'; 'He is merely the name which associates six or seven great plays.' Eliot's modernist misunderstanding of Middleton's work originated in ignorance of his biography. The central facts of Middleton's life were first established, by Mark Eccles, in 1931, four years after Eliot's essay was published. Middleton's seeming impersonality itself reflects a personality, a decision to reject the selfish rant of battling parents and battling poets. Aged twenty, he called himself 'Thomas Medius & Gravis Tonus', punning musically on his surname (Ghost of Lucrece 69–70); medius means 'in the middle' but also 'middling, ordinary' and 'neutral, ambiguous'—and 'central', and 'the common good'. Gravis teeters, ambiguously, between 'impressive' and 'base'. Middleton yokes opposites: his first surviving play, The Phoenix, is one of the first English tragicomedies, and later plays combined tragic plots (Hengist, King of Kent) and comic plots (The Mayor of Queenborough) so evenly that they boasted alternative titles. The emotional and intellectual complexity of Middleton's double plots, and multiple plots, first began to be appreciated in the twentieth century, in the work of critics like William Empson and Richard Levin. 'Was ever such a contrariety seen?' (Old Law 2.1.161).

The relationship between Middleton's life and his work requires more than a reliable biography; we also need to know which works Middleton wrote, and when he wrote them. We will respond to The Wisdom of Solomon Paraphrased differently, once we realize that most of it must have been written by a sixteen-year-old (not a twenty-six-year-old, as earlier scholars believed). The first sustained analysis of 'The Chronology of Middleton's Plays' (by R. C. Bald) was not published until 1937. The larger problem of the canon itself took much longer to solve. Most of the correct conclusions were reached by E. H. C. Oliphant between 1925 and 1929, but it took six decades for his intuitions to be confirmed by the more scientific methods of the American Cyrus Hoy, the Australian David Lake, the New Zealander MacDonald P. Jackson, and the Englishman R. V. Holdsworth. These decades of scholarship have made it possible for this edition to print his works in chronological order, beginning with his adult work and the reign of James I (with the Juvenilia gathered together in a separate section). It should make possible a new understanding of Middleton's artistic development. His early city comedies for the Children at Paul's were all written in his mid-twenties, with the brilliant surface virtuosity and drive of absolute youth, in exhilarated command of materials within the narrow circle of its own ego and experience. From that centre Middleton moved gradually outward, first beyond his own sex, eventually beyond his own neighbourhood to the larger European world. He never lost his lewd, ironic, grounded comic genius, but the later comedies and tragicomedies achieve a wider emotional range and a more complex orchestration of tones. Middleton wrote The Revenger's Tragedy when he was twenty-six (Shakespeare's age when he churned out Henry the Sixth, Part Two, John Osborne's when he spat out Look Back in Anger); The Revenger's Tragedy is a masterpiece unequalled in laser intensity, but the forty-one-year-old who wrote Women, Beware Women commanded a broader spectrum of verbal and psychological light.

Twentieth-century Middleton. 16. Wyndham Lewis's 1912 modernist icon of Apemantus and the masque of ladies in Timon of Athens (upper left). 17. Janusza Stannego's post-modernist cover art for the programme of a 1988/89 production of A Chaste Maid in Cheapside at Teatr Wybrzeże, Poland (upper right). 18. Judi Dench (centre) as Bianca in the 1969 Royal Shakespeare Company production of Women, Beware Women, directed by Terry Hands, with a design reflecting the chess game (bottom).

Eliot, typically, did not even mention Middleton's masques, pageants, or pamphlets. These works were, and still remain, less familiar than the plays. The first serious study of the genre of the masque was not published until 1927, and—like the later influential work of Stephen Orgel and Roy Strong—Enid Welsford concentrated upon The Court Masque. Even now, people are sometimes surprised to discover how many masques were not performed at court, not designed by Inigo Jones, and not written by Ben Jonson. This critical privileging of the court also helps to explain the neglect of pageants, which were written, by contrast, for the commonest possible public. Despite their wide and international audience—demonstrated by the Russian and Italian ambassadors whose reports are printed in this edition, and by the fact that the Anglophile Spanish ambassador Gondomar owned a copy of Middleton's Triumphs of Truth—the first serious study of Lord Mayor's shows, David Bergeron's English Civic Pageantry 1558-1642, was not published until 1971.

As for the genre of pamphlets, in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries such works were reprinted, if at all, in historical anthologies like The Harleian Miscellany or An English Garner; in the twentieth century, early modern prose generally only interested critics seeking precursors of the novel. Middleton's pamphlets are not precursors of the novel. The one thing they have in common is that they do not fit our generic categories; we don't know which anthology should include them, or which course should teach them. Some of them—like The Black Book and Father Hubbard's Tales—are at least fabular or fictional, in ways which are almost familiar. Like short stories, these narratives depend on snapshot vignettes, resonant anecdotes, acute social observation, the creation of a distinct narrative voice. Like the short texts of Flannery O'Connor in particular, they are wickedly intelligent, observant, ironic. But Flannery O'Connor would not introduce Lucifer with a stage direction and a verse soliloquy. And other Middleton pamphlets abandon narrative altogether. It might be more useful to consider them experimental fiction, or postmodern non-novels. Like Michael Martone's The Blue Guide to Indiana (2001), Middleton's The Owl's Almanac (1618) takes a pedestrian non-fiction genre and transforms it into a literary fairground; but Martone does not switch-hit prose and verse, or rise to Middleton's playful complex typographic mimicry. Middleton's 'non-dramatic prose' is not consistently either. Like his plays, the pageants and the pamphlets mix rhyme, blank verse, and non-verse. Just as, in the plays, there is no tidy hierarchy of forms—prose for the lower orders, verse for the higher—so among the pamphlets there is no severe divide between 'literature' and 'unliterature'. The pamphlets embody the full unregulated variety of Renaissance discursive practices, mixing poetry and theology, politics and parody, journalism and jouissance.

19. Feminist Middleton: Helen Mirren's performance of Moll Cutpurse—in the Royal Shakespeare Company's 1983 production, directed by Barry Kyle—signalled a growing interest in Middleton's treatment of gender and sexuality.

The first attempt to render such a mixture available and intelligible was R. B. McKerrow's five-volume edition of The Works of Thomas Nashe, published between 1905 and 1910. Nashe was clearly an important influence on Middleton, and possibly a personal mentor, and McKerrow's work made critical appreciation of a career like Middleton's for the first time possible. But McKerrow also set standards for annotation and bibliographical description which were at the time virtually impossible for any editor of Middleton's much larger and more complicated canon to satisfy. McKerrow's friend, W. W. Greg, in 1906 reviewed Churton Collins's edition of the works of Robert Greene; the review was so damning and humiliating that it probably caused Collins to commit suicide, and certainly made it professional suicide for any serious scholar thereafter to edit an early modern writer without scrupulous attention to the new methods of analytical bibliography. Even McKerrow could not complete an edition of Shakespeare which satisfied such standards (though he died trying). From 1953 to 1961, Fredson Bowers produced a four-volume bibliographer's edition of Dekker, but the 'non-dramatic' canon was omitted and the commentary delegated to a junior collaborator, Cyrus Hoy, who would not publish his four volumes until 1980. Bowers's standards were even higher than Greg's had been, now including identification of compositors and sequence of typesetting. Such bibliographical perfectionism was self-defeating, and it defeated three postwar attempts to produce a new edition of Middleton.

That century of editorial constipation did not stop the march of Middleton's reputation, but scholarship and criticism have been hampered by the absence of a reliable text of the whole œuvre. The book you are now holding will, we hope, make it possible for many more people to experience what I felt in the summer of 1984, when for the first time I read all of Middleton. In one of the world's great research archives, founded in Middleton's lifetime at Middleton's university, I sat for days, surrounded by rare books, sometimes quietly moved to tears, sometimes unable to contain my laughter, so inappropriate in the venerable hush of the Duke Humphrey Library. And I thought, again and again, why was I never told to read this? Why was I never taught this? Why is this not on the shelves of ordinary libraries? Why have I never seen this performed? Why have I never heard this music? And why have I never been introduced to this Dickensian, Dostoevskian riot of life? Vindice, DeFlores, and Beatrice Joanna I'd encountered in college, but what about Allwit and all the rest? Lucifer, Candido, Quomodo, Sir Bounteous Progress, Dampit, Pieboard, Tailby, Weatherwise, Pompey Doodle, Captain Ager, Plumporridge, Simplicity, Simon, George, Lepet, the Yorkshire Husband, the Black Knight and Fat Bishop and White Queen's Pawn, the Tyrant, the Lady, the Young Queen, the Duchess of Milan, Mistress Low-water, Moll, Valeria, Hecate and Madge Owl, Livia and Bianca and Isabella—where have you people been all my life?

This edition does not claim to be definitive; we do not expect, or even hope, that it will last for ever. 'Nothing is perfect born' (Roaring Girl 9.2.27). Like Middleton himself, we are fallen authors, living in a fallen world, and the texts we produce are inevitably imperfect. Nevertheless, in at least one respect this edition should permanently transform our reading of Middleton. For the first time, you can find all that is left of him in one big book: this is 'the Middleton First Folio'. As that phrase suggests, this volume mimics many features of Shakespeare editions, and its visual design makes a larger cultural claim. As early as 1636, Shakespeare and Middleton were being coupled. Two gentlemen went to see Shakespeare's Pericles; one laughed and the other cried. Later, they went to see Middleton's Mayor of Queenborough; the first cried and the second laughed. Middleton is 'both a great comic writer and a great tragic writer': T. S. Eliot's phrase could be applied to only one other English playwright, and to very few in any language. Middleton is, David Frost concluded in 1968, 'Shakespeare's true heir', and The Collected Works of Thomas Middleton invites readers to think of our language as the home of two world champion playwrights, not just one. Our other Shakespeare has been, for centuries, scattered in a half-buried debris field; here, finally, the startling surviving pieces have all been unearthed, catalogued, authenticated, re-sequenced, and put back together in a single magic box that we can carry to our private desert islands and our collective urban wildernesses. We can now see the English Renaissance, stereoscopically, from the perspectives of two very different geniuses. We do not have to choose between them, any more than we need choose Mozart over Beethoven, or Michelangelo over Leonardo da Vinci. We are simply blessed, enriched, by their coexistence, their wrestling with each other and the world.

Middleton, of all writers, might have resisted the dignified uniformity asserted by the bulk and binding of such a book. His praise of The Duchess of Malfi, published in 1623, seems to contrast Webster's modest quarto with the 'cathedral palaces' of the monumental Shakespeare Folio, also published that year. Certainly, it would be misleading to impose upon Middleton's muchness the minimalism of a single critical voice-over, even if that voice were as hypnotizing as Samuel Johnson's. Editorially, this collection attempts to convey the formal individuality and variety of his early texts, and to offer a corresponding diversity of textual embodiment and annotation. Critically, the contributors have little in common but the republic of Middleton. It is a republic we invite you to join. For you are Middleton's, and our, most important collaborator. Only you, fallen reader, can open the magic box, and let the dead come out and dance.

SEE ALSO

Sources for Middleton's life and reputation: Companion, 449

MIDDLETON'S LONDON

Paul S. Seaver

'I AM thy mother', announces the figure of London at the outset of Thomas Middleton's The Triumphs of Truth, and London was never far from this dutiful son's thoughts. The city is mentioned in more than thirty of his works, and specific locales—Watling Street, Paul's Wharf, Finsbury Fields—appear with even greater frequency. When it is not named, London is almost always implied, providing the model of urban experience most familiar to writer and audience. 'The fashion of play-making', wrote Middleton, 'I can properly compare to nothing so naturally as the alteration of apparel', reminding his readers by this comparison of the rapid changes visible everywhere in London's streets during this first age of fashion, but it was not only fashions in play-making and clothes that were undergoing constant change in Middleton's lifetime. London itself was changing at an unprecedented rate, providing a setting and a stage evidently at once frightening and exciting, framed by much that was old and familiar, but constantly threatening to outgrow that frame, as the medieval city was transformed into England's and Europe's greatest metropolis.

Middleton's London, apostrophized in 1616 as 'this queen of cities, lady of this isle', was in one sense an ancient crone—a 'reverend mother' in Middleton's kinder comparison—its walls dating back to Roman times. But if the walls had contained the medieval city, this was no longer true, for Middleton was born into a metropolis undergoing explosive growth, growth which would continue for perhaps a generation after his death, before the rate slowed in the later decades of the seventeenth century. London's population, which numbered little more than 50,000 in Sir Thomas More's time, was in the neighbourhood of 80,000 to 100,000 by the time Middleton was born in 1580, and the metropolis grew to perhaps 300,000 by the time of his death; then the walls contained no more than perhaps a third of the metropolitan population.

In 1600 when the young Moravian Baron Waldstein visited London at the conclusion of his studies at Strasbourg, he noted in his diary that on 5th July he 'went along the Thames to the small town of Westminster, [but] although it is over a mile from the City, we went past buildings the whole way'. The young baron remarked upon the built-up strip along the Strand precisely because north of that highway and west of Chancery Lane were still green fields, an area which was to become rapidly urban in Middleton's last years as builders began to develop the Covent Garden area as far as St Martin's Lane and north into St Giles-in-the-Fields. In fact by the time of Middleton's birth urban sprawl had begun to the north-west of Aldersgate in Clerkenwell and to the north-east of Aldersgate in the rapidly growing parish of St Giles Cripplegate. Another strip development extended north from Bishopsgate and another east from Aldgate toward the village of Mile End, while along the river urban development moved beyond St Katherine's to Wapping, Shadwell, and the Radcliffe docks.

Urban growth on such an unprecedented scale frightened the Crown, and as early as 1580 Queen Elizabeth I issued the first of what became a series of royal proclamations that sought to limit further growth. The 'excess of people', if not checked, posed three dangerous consequences: first, the Queen foresaw a city that could not be well governed without the creation of 'new jurisdictions and officers'; second, 'such multitudes' could not be supplied with food 'upon reasonable prices'; and third, the influx of the poor into crowded tenements created the conditions in which a 'plague or popular sickness' could not only 'invade the whole city', but could endanger 'her majesty's own person'. For remedy it was proposed to forbid any new building within three miles of the city's gates or the subletting of any rooms not already let or occupied. Less than a year before her death the old Queen complained that 'partly by the covetous and insatiable dispositions of some persons, that without any respect of the common good and public profit of the realm do only regard their own particular lucre and gain, and partly by the negligence and corruption of others who by reason of their offices and places ought to see the said proclamation . . . performed', enforcement had been neglected and 'the said mischiefs and inconveniences do daily increase', for remedy of which the new proclamation not only reiterated the former order against new building or new subdividing, but ordered that all illegal new building be torn down or let to the poor at such rates as were set by the churchwardens and minister of the parish. James I and the plague arrived together in the summer of 1603, and from the safe distance of Woodstock the new king issued a new proclamation, noting 'that the great confluence and access of excessive numbers of idle, indigent, dissolute and dangerous persons, and the pestering of many of them in small and strait rooms . . . have been one of the chiefest occasions of the great plague and mortality', and reiterating former regulations, particularly as they applied to the creation of subdivided housing. But despite attempts to enforce the proclamations and the multiplication of new regulations and restrictions, the population of the metropolis continued to expand. In 1615 King James, in a gesture reminiscent of King Canute commanding the tides, proclaimed that 'now that our City of London is become the greatest, or the next greatest, city of the Christian world: it is more than time that there be an utter cessation of further new buildings, lest the surcharge and overflow of people do bring upon our said City infinite inconveniences'. James concluded on a rather plaintive note, expressing the wish that 'as it was said of the first emperor of Rome, that he found the city of Rome of brick and left it of marble, so that we whom God hath honoured to be the first king of Great Britain, mought be able to say in some proportion, that we had found our City and suburb of London of sticks, and left them of brick, being a material far more durable, safe from fire, beautiful, and magnificent'. Such a rebuilding of the metropolis was not to be in James I's or Thomas Middleton's lifetime but was only begun in earnest after the great fire of 1666 devastated almost all of the old walled city.

In fact, for all London's explosive growth, Middleton's city in its physical aspect would not have changed out of all recognition from that known by Sir Thomas More at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and even in essentials from the city known by Geoffrey Chaucer a century earlier. The walled city was still the centre of metropolitan life, and the six medieval gates were still closed and guarded at night. Despite the traffic, one could pass through Aldgate (to the north of the Tower on the eastern border of the walled city) and walk along Cornhill and Cheapside and out of Newgate into Fleet Street in the west in about twenty minutes, and the distance from the river and out of Bishopsgate, Moorgate or Aldersgate to the north was even shorter. As in Chaucer's time, London Bridge remained the only passage for foot traffic or carts across the Thames. As a consequence, much of the traffic not only across the river but in fact from one end of London to the other and beyond was by the small wherries manned by watermen. When in Middleton's A Chaste Maid in Cheapside Touchwood Junior and Moll seek to flee the City to Barn Elms upriver near Putney, Moll is dispatched to take boat at Trigg Stairs, and Touchwood promises to follow from Paul's Wharf. Aided by the easy passage across the river, the population of Southwark on the south bank grew from more than 19,000 in 1603 to almost 26,000 three decades later, forming a dense urban development clustered around the south end of the bridge, and a strip of housing extending to the east along the river to Bermondsey and Rotherhithe, and west to the bear- and bull-baiting rings, the theatres, and the Winchester rents stretching to Paris Garden, after which there were only green fields and marshes around the bend of the Thames to Lambeth opposite Westminster.

Viewed from Southwark, the city not only kept its medieval aspect because the bulk of the housing remained the traditional three- and four-storey half-timbered structures, but even more importantly because the most prominent landmarks that would strike the eye were principally of medieval origin. At the east end of the city just outside the walls the massive fortification of the Tower of London was still the most prominent masonry pile, a constant reminder of the royal presence. Along the waterfront, Baynard's Castle, another Norman structure, still stood, and just to the west of the Fleet River (still an open if unsanitary ditch) was Bridewell Palace, an early Tudor structure now converted to civic use as one of the city's system of municipal hospitals. Further to the west past the Inns of Court until one's view was cut off by the bend in the Thames were the palaces of the great lay and ecclesiastical lords, Arundel House, Somerset House, Durham House and so on, all built between the Strand and the river. But what would have been most recognizable to any Londoner from the fourteenth to the late seventeenth century was the skyline, dominated by old St Paul's and by the towers of more than a hundred churches within and just beyond the walls. St Paul's, one of the largest Gothic cathedrals in Europe, stretched from east to west 585 feet, and its tower (even after its steeple burned down during a thunderstorm in 1561) was visible as far upriver as Richmond and as far downriver as Greenwich. It is no wonder that the popular Elizabethan rags-to-riches story of Dick Whittington, the fifteenth-century Lord Mayor, who as a boy was summoned to return to his apprenticeship 'by London bells sweetly rung', still resonated for Londoners, for the sound of church bells must have been ubiquitous.

Whittington's story resonated in another, more profound way, for, according to the Elizabethan tale, he came to London as a poor apprentice from the north country, and in fact immigration was crucial to the growth of London throughout the early modern era. By the late Elizabethan period between 4,000 and 5,000 apprentices were bound each year and more than 80 per cent of them came from beyond the Home Counties. Given the fact that as the seventeenth century wore on, premiums for apprenticeships increased, as did the start-up costs of setting up even a household business, it is surprising that thousands of young people trooped into the city every year, particularly when so many succumbed to disease (some 10 per cent of Elizabethan apprentices perished from disease in the course of their service), and when an increasing percentage could only look forward to a lifetime of wage labour: as skilled journeymen, if they were persistent and lucky, and as mere wage labourers, if they were not so fortunate. Part of the answer lies in the fact that the population of rural England grew in the Elizabethan period faster than new labour could be absorbed by either rural agriculture or industry; part in the failure of urban centres outside London to grow appreciably until well into the seventeenth century; and part, surely, in the fact that wages in London were appreciably higher than those even in south-east England generally. Wages for journeymen and even mere labourers in the building trades in London, such as those employed by Middleton's father, a bricklayer, as well as by carpenters, masons, and plasterers, were by 1590 some 50 per cent higher than elsewhere, and even in the 1590s when toward the end of the decade bad harvests sent grain prices skyrocketing, bread prices were lower in London than in the countryside.

MIDDLETON'S LONDON

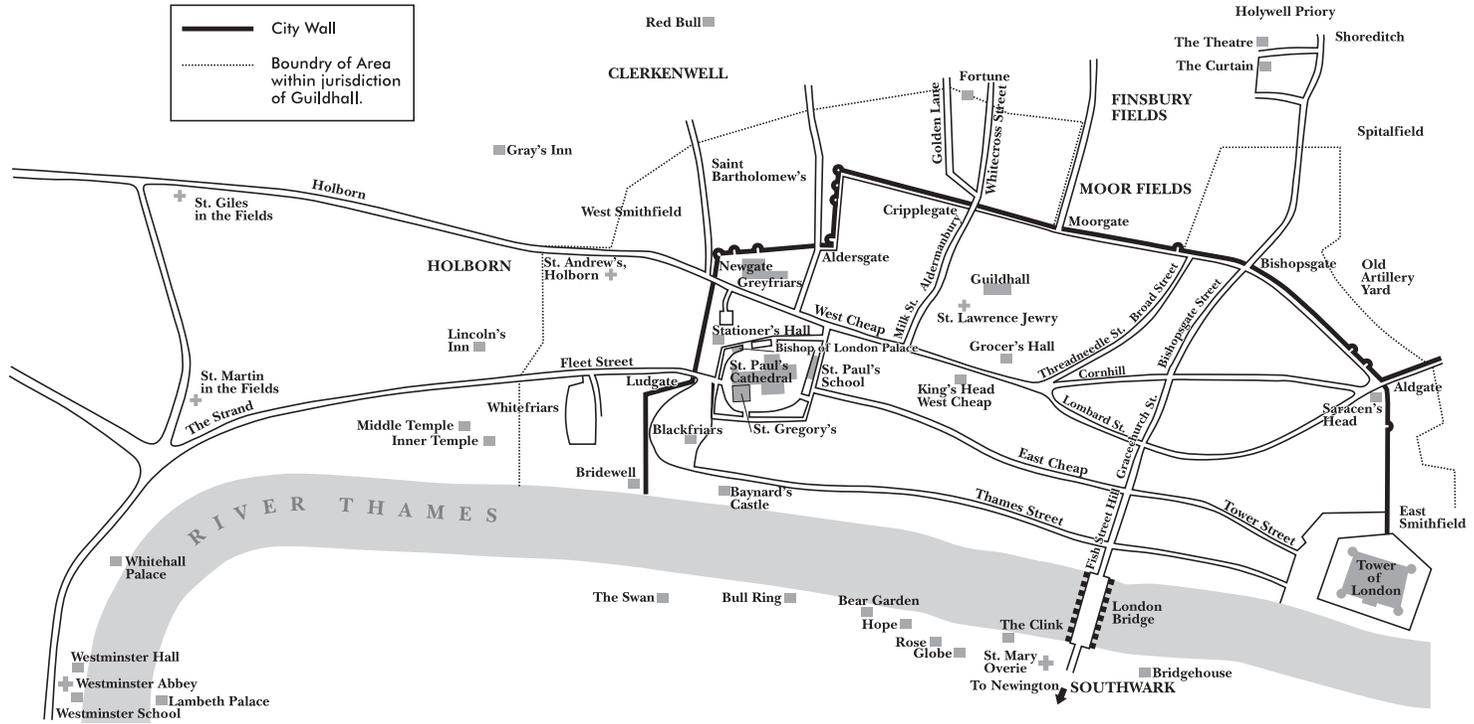

From a panorama of London by J. C. Visscher (1616).

It is reasonable to suppose that an equal number of young women came to the city seeking work as serving-maids in households, for maidservants were not the prerogative of the rich; most households, even of quite ordinary artisans, employed at least one maid. In the early seventeenth century even a mere London turner, who was never wealthy enough to enter the livery of that artisan company, employed a maidservant throughout his married life—two during the years when his wife was coping with small children as well as the household. In addition there were at least 5,000 alien immigrants in the city by the end of Elizabeth's reign. Middleton's London, like London today, was a polyglot capital, where one would encounter not only native English speaking unintelligible northern dialects, but also Welshmen, Irishmen, Scots, Flemings, Dutch, Germans from the Hanse, Norwegian sailors, French weavers, Spanish and Portuguese merchants, and a handful of more exotic American Indians and African blacks. In A Chaste Maid in Cheapside Sir Walter Whorehound enters Yellowhammer's goldsmith's shop accompanied by a Welsh gentlewoman, and in A Fair Quarrel the physician enters accompanied by a Dutch nurse, her nationality easily recognizable by her accent. But the full importance of immigration can only be appreciated when measured against the grim demographic history of the early modern city.

Thomas Middleton lived to be forty-seven, and both he and his sister lived to marry and have children. Survival itself was a minor miracle, but the fact that only two of William Middleton's children reached adulthood suggests that even the fortunate Middletons could not escape the appalling mortality rates that characterized early modern London. John Wallington, a London turner of William Middleton's generation, had twelve children by his first wife over the course of a marriage of twenty years, of whom only six survived to adulthood. The two sons each married, the elder having five children, none of whom survived to the age of fifteen, the younger also having five children, only one, a daughter, living long enough to marry and have children in her turn. In the poorer parishes, fewer than half the male children survived to their fourteenth year, and even in the more prosperous and salubrious parishes fewer than seven out of every ten children born lived to celebrate a fifteenth birthday. London men, like most of the early modern English, married late, in part because citizenship, premised on freedom in a company, could not be achieved before the age of twenty-four, and so most men married several years later. In fact most young men were not apprenticed until their late teens, which would have prevented them from achieving their freedoms and setting up as independent householders until their late twenties. Hence, although the age at which London women first married was several years younger, in their early twenties rather than later, the average London family succeeded in baptizing fewer than three children. However, families were limited not so much by low fertility as by high mortality. In fact, more burials than baptisms took place in London during Middleton's lifetime, and it has been estimated that the deficit amounted to about 3,500 a year during the first half of the seventeenth century. London grew, then, not by natural, biological increase, but by immigration, and the best guess is that something over 10,000 new migrants entered the city annually, perhaps close to half the surplus of births over deaths for the whole of England.

Mortality was an ever-present spectacle and could never have been far from a Londoner's conscious thoughts. The London bells that summoned Whittington to return may well have been tolling a funeral. The plague which struck London thrice during Middleton's lifetime was only the most spectacular display of mortality. The comparatively minor incursion of 1593 carried off more than 10,000 Londoners, but those of 1603 and 1625 were responsible for the deaths of more than 25,000 on each occasion. Yet, dramatic and horrifying as these epidemics were, and in each of those three terrible years the plague accounted for the majority of all deaths in London, these spectacular visitations must be seen against the background of a constant high level of mortality that was to continue into the nineteenth century. In the parish of St Botolph without Aldgate, 24 per cent of those buried between 1558 and 1626 died of the plague, but another 22 per cent died of consumption, and various kinds of sickness identified as agues, fevers, fluxes, and colic carried off another 9 per cent. Smallpox carried off 2.4 per cent, and 1.5 per cent of the deaths were reported to be women in childbed. Elizabethans, of course, were presumed to perish from an excess of food and drink, and a Dutchman named Peter Yeop was reported in 1588 to have 'ended his life of a surfeit with drink'. Accidental deaths, although not as common as those attributable to disease, were common enough. Some twenty-one of the deaths recorded at St Botolph's were caused by drowning, one particularly pitiful case being a child of three whose chair in a privy 'whelmed backward', propelling her to her death in the town ditch. In 1590 one Richard Hawkesworth, a shoemaker, came along Aldersgate with a gun on his shoulder 'and having certain powder in his sleeve, which by mischance he, shooting of his said piece, fired the said powder', giving himself powder burns from which he died shortly after. Edward Frier, a bricklayer, like Middleton's father, died in 1618 'from a fall which he had from the top of the new church at Wapping, where he wrought'. In fact William Middleton himself almost perished in an accident three years before Thomas was born. While opening up a vault in the south aisle of St Lawrence Jewry for the tomb of Sir John Langley, Middleton and his men were digging too close to the supporting pillar and, but for a timely warning shout from the parish clerk, would have perished when the pillars, walls, and ceiling thundered down, carrying away the organ loft and destroying the pews in the adjacent chancel. It is not surprising that many at the time believed in an active Providence, intervening both to take life and to grant it, for death came suddenly and unexpectedly, and survival when so many died so young clearly seemed an act of special favour. Quite fittingly Thomas Beard, the Puritan divine, entitled his study of God's providence—which he found in the apparently arbitrary accidents of contemporary life—The Theatre of God's Judgements.

Yet despite the deadly play of God's judgements upon the city, particularly upon the young—and even in the plague year of 1593 more than 7,000 Londoners died of other causes, while in 1625, another plague year, more than 14,000 perished from other diseases and accidents—London continued to grow, so that in 1616 King James complained with perhaps pardonable exaggeration that 'with time England will only be London, and the whole country be left waste'. Indeed at the time it was recognized that this city of immigrants constituted a unique society, for Londoners 'are by birth for the most part a mixture of all countries of the same [realm], by blood gentlemen, yeomen and of the basest sort, without distinction, and by profession busy bees, and travellers for their living in the hive of this commonwealth', and this anonymous observer of Elizabethan London went on to describe the inhabitants of the city more prosaically as consisting 'of these three parts, merchants, handicraftsmen, and labourers'.

As might be expected in England's principal trading centre and port city, the merchants, the smallest of the three groups in number, were both the richest and the most politically powerful element in the city. Nevertheless, even in London the number of merchants active in overseas trade was very small. In 1606, for example, only 219 merchants were engaged in the trade in traditional woollen cloth to the northern European cloth markets, a trade monopolized by the Merchant Adventurers through all but the later years of Middleton's lifetime. This was in the seventeenth century a declining trade, and by 1640 only 103 merchants were still actively exporting cloth to Hamburg and the Netherlands. In those years the quantities of exported cloths dropped from 101,000

(1606) to 59,000 (1640). All merchants were not Merchant Adventurers, and the Levant Company merchants, trading in the eastern Mediterranean for silks and currants, were rapidly rising to prominence on the strength of the expanding trade in these luxuries. Raw silk imports, which had stood at a mere 12,000 pounds by weight in 1560 at the beginning of Elizabeth's reign, rose to 142,000 pounds in 1629, just after Middleton's death. Between 1611 and 1630 the Levant Company admissions book shows the entry of 203 into the ranks of the company. In 1559 sixteen (72 per cent) of the twenty-two richest Londoners, according to the subsidy of that year, were Merchant Adventurers. In 1640 the Crown raised a forced loan from 140 leading citizens; among them were 21 Merchant Adventurers, who contributed loans of an average of £155, and 31 Levant Company merchants, who paid an average of £275. Over several generations those engaged in the newer, long-distance trades—in the eastern Mediterranean, the East Indies, and the Americas—gradually replaced the Merchant Adventurers as the dominant economic force in the city, although trade with northern Europe continued to be an important component of London's business. It is no accident that Middleton's Lord Mayor's show for 1617, celebrating the mayoralty of George Bolles, a rich Grocer, begins with a scene in which 'a company of Indians, attired according to the true nature of their country, seeming for the most part naked, are set at work in an island of growing spices, some planting nutmeg trees, some other spice trees of all kinds, some gathering fruits, some making up bags of pepper'. The spices that once came to London markets by way of Mediterranean and Middle Eastern middlemen now reached the warehouses of the Grocers direct from the holds of the East India Company fleet, which had been sailing around the Cape to the Far East on a direct ocean route since the founding of the company at the end of Elizabeth I's reign.

Obviously all merchants did not belong to these two élite companies, and many were engaged in the expanding domestic trade. Feeding the growing population of London was itself a formidable business. Kentish ports alone shipped over 12,000 quarters of grain to the London market in 1587 and close to 28,000 in 1624, and whereas most of the cereals consumed by Londoners came from the south and east coast ports, much of the meat consumed came from the north and west, from Wales, Ireland, and Scotland, as well as the highland pastures of England. In 1662 more than 18,500 Scottish cattle passed through Carlisle on their way to southern markets, and by the end of the century it was estimated that Londoners were consuming one mutton per head each year. During Middleton's lifetime Londoners switched almost totally from using wood for fuel to coal, and although the trade in sea coal was infinitely less glamorous than the import of Levantine silk, the collier trade came to constitute a significant proportion of the shipping in the pool of London. Newcastle was shipping more than 120,000 tons of coal in the 1590s and close to 300,000 tons per year in the last decade of Middleton's life, by which time the coal trade engaged more than 28,000 tons of shipping, which must have been close to 20 per cent of the total tonnage of London shipping in that period.

As crucial as London's merchant community was to the growth and wealth of the city, an Elizabethan observer was surely correct in claiming that retail shopkeepers and artisans 'do far exceed' both the number of merchants and poor labourers together. Despite the dominant role of trade, London was also a major manufacturing centre, and the role of manufacturing in London's economy grew, leading to a shift in the balance of London imports away from luxury products to raw materials. In fact, one way to measure the increasing importance of manufacturing is to note the shift from the importing of manufactured goods to that of raw materials. In 1560 45 per cent of all imports were manufactured goods and only 26 per cent raw materials; by the 1630s the import of manufactured goods had slipped to 29 per cent of total imports, and the import of raw materials (exclusive of food in both cases) had risen to 35 per cent. What data we have suggests that a majority of Elizabethan Londoners were engaged in one or another form of production, and that in the early Stuart era manufacturing remained the dominant occupation of Londoners (rising from 58 per cent of London householders in the Elizabethan period to slightly more than 60 per cent in the early Stuart years), despite the great expansion of trade across the Atlantic and to the Far East. Further, as the proportion of those householders living within the walls and engaged in trade, distribution, and exchange of some kind increased from 28 per cent to 36 per cent of the intramural total, those engaged in manufacturing in the growing extramural parishes increased from 70 per cent of all occupations to more than 74 per cent. However, even within the walls more householders were engaged in production than in exchange, and the overwhelming number of those engaged in manufacturing worked in small shops presided over by a master and including the master's journeymen and apprentices. The fast-growing printing industry was one of these, numbering some dozen printing houses in 1550 and twenty-three in 1587, the twenty or so master printers employing about 150 journeymen and apprentices. The small number of print shops gives no sense of actual production, for in 1586 when a Star Chamber decree required the relicensing of all cheap broadside ballads, the Stationers' Company registered 237 titles in one year; it has been estimated that by the death of Elizabeth I some three million ballads had been printed, most of them, like most books, funnelled through the booksellers surrounding St Paul's Churchyard. A few industries had outgrown the streetfloor shop—shipbuilding, rope-making, glass- and brick-making, the larger tanneries and breweries, most of which were located outside the walls—but these large-scale operations were the exception, not the rule, even in the suburbs. The view of three small shops in a rank, where both manufacturing and retailing were carried on, with which the second act of The Roaring Girl opens, and the cry, 'What is't you lack, gentlemen, what is't you buy', was a scene familiar to even the most casual visitor to the metropolis and as much a part of the quotidian street scene as the church steeples were of the more distant prospect.

Elizabethans who attempted to map their society tended to see urban populations as an undifferentiated mass. William Harrison, despite having been born in London, spent pages (twenty in a modern edition) in his Description of England in a detailed anatomy of the major and minor nobility, that social pyramid that stretched from dukes and earls down to knights, esquires and mere gentlemen, but devoted scarcely two paragraphs to the 'citizens and burgesses... who be those that are free within the cities and are of some likely substance to bear office in the same'. In fact London society was both stratified and complex. At its apex were the rich merchants and financiers, such as Middleton's contemporary and namesake, Sir Thomas Myddelton, a scion of a minor branch of that ramified Welsh family which had married into the Shropshire gentry and thus achieved an English patronymic. This Myddelton was apprenticed to Fernando Poyntz, a London grocer, and by the 1580s was deeply engaged in the sugar trade in Antwerp until its capture by Spanish forces put an end to English involvement in its economy. In the later 1580s Myddelton was frequently engaged in various partnerships with his father-in-law, Richard Saltonstall (father of the Massachusetts Bay adventurer), and by the 1590s Myddelton was investing in privateering enterprises that preyed on Spanish shipping and was increasingly engaged in money lending at 10 per cent—£20 to Job Throckmorton, the probable author of Martin Marprelate (the puritan satire on timeserving, careerist Elizabethan bishops), and more than a thousand pounds to the Earl of Shrewsbury. At the same time he was investing his profits in a Denbighshire estate, which by the end of Elizabeth's reign gave him a rent-roll of over £150. In the next reign he became alderman, lord mayor, and knight, his mayoralty ushered in by a lord mayor's show paid for by the Grocers' Company and scripted by Thomas Middleton, who shared his name if not his fortune.

Sir Thomas was not alone at the apex of this urban society. During the first quarter of the seventeenth century, 20 per cent of all merchants who were elected aldermen left fortunes of more than £20,000, and a handful of the spectacularly rich—Sir John Spencer, Sir William Craven, and Sir Baptist Hicks—were reputed to have fortunes of more than £100,000. In 1582 some seventy-five Londoners were assessed in the subsidy of that year at more than £200, the vast majority of whom were Merchant Adventurers. All but two of the twenty-six aldermen were numbered among this wealthy group. To be assessed in 1582 at £50 or more placed one among the richest 4.8 per cent of the metropolitan population. William Middleton, Thomas's father, already a wealthy property owner, was assessed at £20. To be assessed at all (the minimum was £3) placed one among the top 25 per cent of all London households.

There is another way to view the social pyramid. Altogether there were sixty companies ranked in an early precedence list dating from the twenty-third year of Henry VIII's reign, beginning with the Mercers and descending to the Blacksmiths, although only fifty-one of those companies had a livery. New companies were formed, such as the Apothecaries, who broke away from the Grocers and obtained a charter from James I. The peculiarity of the freedom of London was such that any citizen, free of a company, could carry on any trade or occupation. As a consequence, although overseas merchants came principally from the ranks of the twelve great livery companies—Mercers, Grocers, Drapers, Haberdashers, Merchant Taylors, Clothworkers, Goldsmiths, Skinners, Ironmongers, Salters, Fishmongers, and Vintners—members of the twelve did not have an exclusive monopoly even of the trades designated by their companies' names. Even the Merchant Taylors' Company, whose livery was dominated by wholesale traders overseas, nevertheless fiercely defended its handicraft members in the clothworking trades from the attempts by the Clothworkers' Company to force them under that company's jurisdiction, on the grounds that such an attempt at rationalization violated the traditional freedom of London citizens to engage in any legitimate occupation. Every livery company, whether one of the twelve, where the majority of the merchants were to be found, or among the vast number of craft and trade guilds, had an élite membership co-opted into 'the clothing' from whom the company officers were selected and who were expected to wear the company livery on company quarter days and court days and to vote in the Congregation. There were perhaps 2,500 liverymen in London at the end of Elizabeth's reign, and these members of the élite at least of their companies constituted the heads of about 10 per cent of the households in the city.

Not all Londoners were citizens, but it has been estimated that about three-quarters of the adult males were citizens in the 1550s and, despite the rapid growth of the city during the next generation, perhaps two-thirds were citizens in 1600 and about half in 1640. Citizenship mattered: one could live and work in the city without being a citizen, but one could not sell the product of one's labour without that privilege. Citizenship was obtained by becoming free of a company, and that freedom could be obtained by apprenticeship, patrimony (one could become free of one's father's company without having served a formal apprenticeship) or by purchase (also referred to as redemption). In the late decades of the sixteenth century 83 to 90 per cent of all those gaining their freedom did so by completing an apprenticeship.

As a consequence, social status was a complex issue. The son of a gentleman apprenticed to a Grocer and Merchant Adventurer was, despite his birth, a servant during his apprenticeship and did not achieve his freedom until his apprenticeship was completed. Nevertheless, the apprentice Grocer might find himself during the later years of his service acting as a factor living in a foreign port and buying and selling on his master's and sometimes his own behalf. Such a servant might end his career as a wealthy Grocer himself and an alderman, and if an alderman, almost inevitably, if he lived long enough, a Lord Mayor, a knight, and a justice of the peace, as all senior aldermen became automatically. The minutes of the election-day meeting of the Grocers' Court of Assistants on 11 July 1614 presented this ordered hierarchy at the head of that day's entry: at the top was listed Sir Thomas Myddelton, knight and Lord Mayor, followed by Sir Robert Napier, knight and baronet, Sir Stephen Soame, knight, and the three junior aldermen—Mr Nicholas Stiles, Mr George Bolles (soon to be Lord Mayor), and Mr Richard Pyott—followed by the three wardens of the company and the seventeen assistants in attendance, ranked according to seniority on the bench. Mobility, of course, was a two-way street, and a Vintner who failed in his trade might find himself suing for the privilege of being one of the company's licensed porters, unloading casks of wine at the crane and trundling those casks from the cart into the vaults of one of his more successful company brethren. As a porter, the Vintner would be performing the tasks of a mere labourer, but despite his bankruptcy, such a porter remained both a freeman of his company and a citizen of London.

The complexities of urban status did not end there. Journeymen were freemen of their companies who worked for masters for wages, usually on contracts that ran from year to year, the wages being paid at the conclusion of the contract; as wage labourers, journeymen differed little from other, unfree (non-citizen) wage labourers, except that they were citizens, free of a company, and therefore possessed the right, if they could accumulate the capital necessary to do so, to open a shop as an independent master and to take on apprentices and journeymen in their turn. Women present another anomaly, for in theory women had none of the rights of citizenship available to adult males, and this despite the obviously important economic role they played, either as maidservants or as housewives. And the housewife such as Anne Middleton, even the wife of an artisan, might find herself running a complex household, consisting of several maidservants, an apprentice and a journeyman, in addition to her husband and children. By Middleton's lifetime women had been excluded from all but a handful of apprenticeships (a few appear bound apprentice to cordwainers to learn the manufacture of perfumed gloves; a few appear bound in other trades jointly to the artisan's wife to learn such skills as lace-making or mantua-making—trades that paid too poorly for men to undertake). However, a small number of women appear in the records as partners of, for example, their citizen brothers, and as such opened shops and engaged in trade. More importantly, it was assumed that even without formal apprenticeship a woman might learn her husband's trade, and as the widow of a citizen, a woman had the right to keep open her husband's shop, to trade and to bind apprentices.

Middleton's London, viewed from the top, was properly oligarchical, a 'republic of wholesale merchants', as the Venetian ambassador described it. Neither Elizabeth I nor the early Stuart kings approved of 'popular' government, and the Crown had long been pleased to strengthen the powers of the governors of their principal city. An oligarchy based on merit, rather than heredity, and presided over by an annually elected mayor, who ruled at best as primus inter pares, was already sufficiently at odds with the principles of hereditary monarchy and aristocracy, even without being 'popular' or democratic, to pose a sharp contrast to prevailing concepts of politic rule. Essentially the city was ruled by its court of aldermen, twenty-six men representing the twenty-six wards of the city, who once selected were expected to serve for life. Although nominated by the ward in which a vacancy had occurred, the aldermanic court could reject nominees, which in effect gave the aldermen power to co-opt their membership. By custom aldermen were chosen from among the liveried members of the twelve great companies, and the few who rose from minor companies customarily transferred to one of the twelve certainly before election to the mayoralty. Thus Sir Edward Barkham, whose installation as Lord Mayor was celebrated in The Sun in Aries, began his rise as a Leatherseller and was then translated to the Drapers in 1621, the year of his election to the mayoralty. Although the lord mayor and the sheriffs were elected in the common hall or Congregation, to which all liveried members of the city companies had a right to attend, in fact one of the sheriffs was customarily selected from among the junior aldermen who had not yet held that office, and the Lord Mayor was invariably the oldest serving alderman who had not yet served as Lord Mayor. In fact it was the very predictability of such 'elections' that permitted the city company of the mayor elect to hire a Munday or Middleton, a Heywood or Dekker, to write the script for the pageant months in advance of its performance.

For all intents and purposes, the mayor and aldermen ran the city. They constituted the mayor's court, which governed as the executive council of the city, sat as the city's court of orphans and the sheriff's court, and those aldermen who had already served as mayor were named to the commission of the peace and served with the city recorder as justices of the peace in the city sessions court. Aldermen sat on all the boards of the five city hospitals—Christ's, Bridewell, St Bartholomew's, St Thomas's, and Bethlehem. All civic property was under the control of the City Lands Committee, which was composed of the city chamberlain and four to six aldermen. Although in a formal sense legislation and taxation required the consent of the Common Council, a body of 212, elected by the freemen of the wards, in fact the Common Council did not meet without the aldermen being present, and the aldermanic veto ensured that Common Council enacted nothing without their approval. In effect, Common Council gave the aldermanic bench a broader base of consent and legitimacy for important or controversial acts.

The mayor and aldermen represented an immense concentration of official power, but its exercise faced substantial limitations. From one direction they faced a steady stream of orders and reprimands from a concentration of political power even more formidable than their own. The presence of the Court and Privy Council on their doorstep was constantly felt, immensely helpful particularly in commercial matters, but a source of irritation and frustration in others. From the opening of the public theatres official London tried to close them and to confine playing to the Court, but perhaps nothing better illustrates the true limits of City power than the grovelling letter the Lord Mayor wrote on 25 February 1593 to Archbishop Whitgift in which he 'humbly and earnestly' beseeched that prelate to speak with the Queen's Master of Revels to see whether the archbishop might have better success than he, the Lord Mayor, had in persuading the Master to 'reform' the players by making them play in private in preparation for performances before the Queen, rather than in the public playhouses, and so free the city 'from these continued disorders which thereby do grow and increase daily among us'. The plague periodically closed the theatres, but the city never succeeded in doing so.

The mayor and aldermen found prostitution and bawdy-houses similarly objectionable, but equally difficult to control. While the governors of Bridewell even managed to inflict the humiliating punishment of whipping on members of the gentry caught fornicating, as they did on one occasion to Richard Denny of Bawdsey, Suffolk, for committing 'whoredom' with two maids at the sign of the Bell in Newgate market, despite his 'being very penitent for his said lewdness' (he had admitted that it had been his customary practice for the past ten or twelve years, when he had come to town), the city fathers were very much less successful in closing bawdy-houses and punishing prostitutes protected by the powerful. John Hollingbrig, who ran a brothel in Holborn, wore the livery of Lord Ambrose Dudley; a brothel was run out of Worcester House under the protection of that earl; and the punishment of Elizabeth Barlowe, sentenced for bawdry, was spared at the suit of 'Mr Browne which keepeth my Lord of Leicester's house'. Actors were not the only professional entertainers protected by the court aristocracy.

If the London magistrates were limited in one direction by the interests of a powerful Crown and Court, they were limited in the other direction by the multiplicity of subordinate communities upon whose cooperation their effective rule rested. London was a congeries of overlapping communities, the two most important of which were the guild and the parish. London citizens almost never appear in the records without mention of their company membership. Although apprenticeship was a private contract between master and apprentice, the company clerk kept a record of each apprentice binding, and the company court supervised the apprenticeship, transferring the apprentice to another master, if his first master failed in his business, failed to teach his apprentice his trade, or treated his apprentice with undue brutality. By the same token, masters who could not control their apprentices would have them brought before the company court for discipline, which might range from a reprimand to a public whipping. Every livery company presented its freemen with a ladder of honour and responsibility: from the yeomanry to the livery, and from the livery to the court assistants, the company wardens, and finally to the mastership of the company, officers elected yearly from among the liveried assistants who were themselves co-opted by the company court.

The livery companies presented the same set of anomalies and contradictions that the city government did, being at once both oligarchic and hierarchical and egalitarian and consensual: company minutes invariably list those in attendance according to the hierarchy of social estimation and political power. Sir Thomas Myddelton, nominated to the livery and chosen one of the assistants early in 1592, appears among the knighted aldermen at the top of the list of those attending the Grocers' court in 1612 and remained among that select company until he ceased to attend the court in the summer of 1631, shortly before his death. When the Merchant Taylors Company was assessed at £175 in 1565, 'for and towards the provision of wheat and other grain to be made for the use of the City', the company taxed its members according to the same hierarchy of social prestige and power: the three knighted aldermen were to pay £5. 18s. 4d. each; Mr Thomas Rowe, alderman, the four wardens of the company, and the other assistants were all assessed at £2. 3s. 4d.; and the thirty-seven liverymen not on the court of assistants were ordered to pay 33s. 4d. each. Privilege and power had its costs, and those in the yeomanry of the company were not assessed at all. At the same time companies saw all their members as brothers, and all grocers were expected to pay the annual 'brotherhood' fee in acknowledgement of their membership. Nothing better captures this guild ideal than the annual exhortation of the senior warden whom the company clerk records in July 1620 as giving, 'a very religious, brotherly and profitable speech for the good of this Company' in which he made 'a very earnest exhortation and persuasion to the whole assembly to live in brotherly love and unity amongst themselves and to be obedient to the lawful government and ordinances of this Company'.

Company courts of assistants met frequently, some as often as every other week, but all company members were expected to appear at their hall on quarter days to pay their quarterage in acknowledgement of their membership. Companies appointed searchers who inspected workshops to ensure that the quality of production was maintained and to confiscate shoddy goods, and company searches frequently extended beyond the Lord Mayor's jurisdiction to the two- to three-mile radius around the city specified in the company's royal charters. Companies served as quasi-governmental institutions; for example, Elizabethan and Caroline forced loans were apportioned by the mayor's court to the companies, which in turn were responsible for raising the assessed sums from among their wealthier members. Although companies ceased to be religious confraternities in King Edward's reign, the guilds remained administrators and repositories of charitable bequests, and in consequence performed a variety of social services, ranging from administering schools and almshouses, to providing scholarships to Oxford and Cambridge, loan funds to young and impecunious masters, small dowries to poor maids to enable them to marry, and alms to ancient members too old to work. Thomas Harvey, Middleton's stepfather, first appears in the records of the Grocers' Company as the second of nine 'young men' who were suitors for the company loan funds in a minute of 27 February 1587, less than three months after he married Middleton's mother (he was granted £50 for two years from the Sir Thomas Ramsey loan fund by the court of assistants on 4 December 1590). The companies were metropolitan institutions, and although divided between the livery and the yeomanry—and a liveried Haberdasher might well be a Merchant Adventurer trading to Hamburg, while a yeoman Haberdasher had a small shop retailing haberdashery—the combination of regulatory and supervisory powers and social services created a number of common interests that gave reality to the company identity no matter how casual most members might be about paying their quarterage regularly at the company hall. A master who failed to bring his apprentice before the company clerk to have his binding recorded could find himself in trouble both with his company and the City Chamberlain; a master who flouted a summons to appear before his company's court of assistants might find himself marched into their presence by a company of the Lord Mayor's servants. The companies eventually became businessmen's clubs, but in Middleton's lifetime they still played a key role in the life of Londoners and constituted one of every citizen's primary communities.

Although he was himself a university-educated gentleman, the world of tradesmen and guildsmen was one Middleton knew well and at first hand, as the son of a Tiler and Bricklayer, the stepson of a Grocer, and a brother-in-law both of a Cutler and of a Clothworker. Unlike Ben Jonson, he never became a member of his father's company, as he could easily have done by patrimony. He may have believed that the freedom of an artisan company ill consorted with his gentility; he may have concluded that such a company had little to offer in the way of patronage; but whatever his motives for not taking up citizenship and a company's freedom, he did not turn his back on the world of his birth, as the sympathetic presentation of the world of small artisans and shopkeepers in A Chaste Maid in Cheapside and other city plays suggests. As an established writer, he scripted three Lord Mayor's Shows for the Grocers, one of the wealthiest and most powerful of the great livery companies. It was a world with its share of villains (they people the disciplinary record of every company's court minutes) and Quomodo, the villainous Draper and moneylender of Michaelmas Term, was both a feared and familiar figure in a city in which banks had not yet come into existence but where small artisans and great merchants alike were in constant need of credit. The City also had its heroes—Dick Whittington, the fifteenth-century Lord Mayor, Sir Thomas Gresham, the early Elizabethan financier who built the New Exchange, and such contemporary figures as Sir Thomas Myddelton, who, although a moneylender like Quomodo, acquired his Welsh estates by purchase rather than by foreclosure on improvident gentry, and who among his other bequests left money to provide dowries to enable poor maidservants of Grocers to marry.

The other community to which every Londoner belonged, whether citizen or mere inhabitant, was the local parish. In origin parishes were medieval institutions, defining the geographical unit of parishioners who were expected to attend the obligatory religious services at their local parish church, to take communion at least once a year at Easter, and to support their incumbent minister—a rector, vicar, or stipendiary curate—with their tithe payments and other dues. London parishes within the walls were with a couple of exceptions extraordinarily small: St Stephen's Coleman Street, a parish of 26.7 acres, was by far the largest, while St Martin's Ironmonger Lane was a tiny 1.1 acre. St Lawrence Jewry, the parish in which Middleton was born, was at 5.6 acres larger than most of the 97 parishes within the walls but dwarfed by the large extramural parishes in the liberties, such as St Botolph Aldgate at 38.6 acres or St Botolph without Bishopgate at 44.5 acres. The average assessed rent in St Lawrence was £14.66 in 1638, which was above the average rent of £11.05 for the 113 parishes of the city and liberties, but that amount by no means placed it among the truly wealthy parishes in the city, such as Allhallows Lombard Street, which included the row of goldsmiths' shops along Lombard Street and which had an average rent of £38.92, or St Mary Magdalen Milk Street, where the average rent was £27.40. The wealthiest parishes tended to cluster in the centre of the city, along Cheapside and Lombard Street, whereas the poorest parishes were beyond the walls; St Botolph without Aldgate, for example, the large extramural parish east and north of Aldgate, had an average rental of only £3.67. Nevertheless, almost all parishes contained a mixed population of merchants, tradesmen, and artisans, the wealthy merchants and shopkeepers occupying residences along the principal streets and the artisans who sold their products to retailers resident in the back courts, alleys, and closes; the social segregation familiar to modern Londoners which sees a labouring population in the East End and a wealthy West End still lay in the future.

The church of St Lawrence Jewry fronted on Cateaton Street (now Gresham Street), a block north of Cheapside, and behind the church stood the Guildhall. St Lawrence was an inappropriate rectory like many in the city: some were in the patronage of city companies—St Martin Outwich of the Grocers' Company, St Laurence Pountney of the Merchant Taylors—others in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's and other ecclesiastical institutions. St Lawrence was in the gift of Balliol College, Oxford, which, as an absentee owner and patron, was content to lease the farm of the tithes to the parish itself, which paid Balliol as rector £20 and the vicar £20 as well. In 1575 the patron granted the next presentation to the parish, and in that year the parish elected as their vicar Robert Crowley, an Edwardian Protestant, a famous preacher, and a nonconformist who had been among those purged in 1566 at the height of the Vestiarian Controversy, when the Bishop of London was ordered to clamp down on those who had hitherto refused to wear the vestments prescribed by the ornaments rubric in the Book of Common Prayer. The parish supplemented Crowley's income with a lectureship, which paid £10 a year in addition to his vicarial stipend for a sermon beyond those required by his incumbency. In the 1570s Crowley was preaching lectures at St Margaret New Fish Street and at St Saviour, Southwark, as well. In 1581, during Middleton's first year of life, that old nonconformist resigned the living and lectureship, and although the parish tried to claim that it leased the advowson (the right to present or nominate the vicar) as well as the tithes, Balliol successfully reasserted its rights.

Although Londoners were notorious for denying their parish ministers the tithe income traditionally owed to the parish rector or vicar—by tradition Londoners paid tithes on a notional rent, rather than on their actual incomes, and kept rents low while increasing the fines paid on the renewal of leases to compensate for the inflation of property values—they also insisted on a preaching clergy and were willing to pay for lectureships in order to ensure the quantity and quality of preaching they desired. Much of the impetus behind this demand for preaching came from the Puritan members of the parish congregations, but the Puritans were not alone in wanting a preaching ministry. In the 1580s and 90s, in the years when Middleton was growing up in St Lawrence Jewry, between 30 and 40 London parishes (out of 113) hired lecturers, and perhaps 25 to 29 at any one time can clearly be identified as Puritans. St Lawrence had appointed Puritan preachers in the early Elizabethan years and would again in the 1620s, but there is no reason to suppose that all, or even a majority of the parishioners were Puritans, in that or most other London parishes, although clearly a majority of those active in the parish vestry wanted a preaching ministry and were willing to tax themselves to pay for it.

Parishes after the Reformation rapidly became civil as well as ecclesiastical institutions, and London parishes in particular soon had to cope with the growing numbers of the poor which accompanied the explosive growth of the metropolis. Even before the rood loft, the last vestige of the Catholic past, was dismantled in June 1566 and the first parish lecturer, propagating the new Protestantism, was hired in 1567, the vestry of St Lawrence Jewry, like other urban parishes, was appointing collectors for the poor. By the autumn of 1572 the system of parochial poor relief was backed by statute, supplementing such acts of private benevolence as that of Lady North, a native of Middleton's parish, who left a bequest in 1574 to provide fourpence weekly to six poor, 'honest' parishioners. Whatever hopes there had been for the great civic hospitals, erected largely out of the wreckage of the monastic dissolution—Bridewell was a former royal palace, but Christ's, which became the city orphanage, and St Bartholomew's, St Thomas's and Bethlehem were all erected on former religious foundations—the growth of urban poverty soon overwhelmed both the capacity of the hospitals and of private charity to cope, and long before the great codification of the Parliamentary poor law in 1598 and 1603, London had instituted a system of compulsory parochial poor rates and had ordered the livery companies to stockpile grain, which could be sold at below market rates to the poor in years of dearth and high prices.

Residence in a parish and membership in a company tell little about the actual level of involvement and the degree to which a resident's or guildsman's identity was wrapped up in those institutions. The Middletons presumably attended at least Sunday Morning Prayers at St Lawrence Jewry, paid their tithes and 'casualties', as the various church dues were called, and took communion in that church at least once a year, for failure to pay tithes would have invited a suit in a church court, and failure to take communion would have led to presentment as a recusant. On the other hand, there is no evidence that Middleton's father attended the vestry or served as one of the two churchwardens, the annually elected officers responsible for fiscal affairs of the parish and charged with tasks as varied as the payment of the clerk's wages, the repair of the chancel, and the provision of fire-fighting equipment and the parish pump. Company membership might mean equally minimal involvement. Middleton's father twice signed the Tilers and Bricklayers court minutes, which suggests that he was a member of that company's court of assistants, but Middleton's stepfather, Thomas Harvey, never rose above the yeomanry of the Grocers' Company and appears in their records merely as paying his annual brotherhood money. As for Middleton's brother-in-law, John Empson, Cutler, he too remained in the yeomanry of that minor company, paying his fees for opening his shop and binding apprentices, but otherwise appearing in the record only in the autumn of 1607 when he was fined 'for that he like a mad man very unorderly about 10 of the clock at night came to Mr Porte's house and there exclaimed and cried out against the master that he had undone him, and that he would bring his wife and children to our master, his doors', and again two years later, when he appeared in court to demand the return of his former apprentice, whom he had turned vagrant into the streets when Empson had gone out of town. Troublesome and vexatious as such associations might on occasion be, the parish and the guild provided most Londoners with a defined neighbourhood and a structured business community, a neighbourhood at once more intimate and face-to-face than one of the twenty-six wards of the city, and a set of associates joined at least by some common social and economic interests. Since most of London's inhabitants had left close family and kin behind when they migrated, these institutionalized communities probably played a larger role in most Londoners' lives than they might have in smaller and more stable places. In the absence of parishes and guilds it is hard otherwise to explain the capacity of the metropolis to absorb thousands of newcomers annually without creating the conditions for social revolution.

As Middleton's London grew, so both the Mayor's Court and the Crown's Privy Council became increasingly fearful of their capacity to maintain order, and yet the anticipated social anarchy never actually occurred. Vagrancy grew with poverty, and at times of high unemployment the alarmed magistrates instituted sweeps of the unemployed, who were whipped at Bridewell and sent out of town, presumably to return to their home parishes. Petty thievery was a constant problem; drinking and gambling at alehouses frequently led to brawling. Throughout Middleton's lifetime, apprentices regularly rioted at Shrovetide, despite mayoral precepts ordering masters to keep their apprentices at home, and despite the mobilizing of double watches and by James I's reign of one of the city regiments as well. (One suspects neither the watch nor the troops had much stomach for suppressing rioting sanctioned by custom, if not by the Lord Mayor, particularly when the riots were directed against theatres and bawdy-houses.) Weapons were readily available: many apprentices owned swords, although they could not wear them in their masters' shops, and all households were expected to own halberds and to be prepared to reinforce the watch. In 1626 a mayoral precept complained that 'much danger and hurt hath happened amongst the boys and youths of this City by their late meetings and marching together with pikes, shot and swords and the like'. The cry of 'clubs, apprentices' was well known, but Fishmongers' apprentices were reported to go at each other with their considerably more lethal fish-knives.

For all of that, the few riots that appeared to be dangerously out of control all seem directed at targets the City authorities were reluctant to defend. For example, on a late summer evening in 1618 a servant in the household of the Spanish ambassador, riding home up Chancery Lane, apparently knocked over a child playing in the road; a mob quickly collected and pursued the rider to the Barbican where he took refuge in the ambassadorial residence. The mob surrounded the house and smashed its windows and was preparing to force entrance when the Chief Justice, who had been at dinner nearby, and the sheriff arrived, took the rider into custody and dispersed the crowd. The ambassador protested, the Privy Council understandably wrote an angry missive to the Lord Mayor, complaining of this gross breach of ambassadorial immunity and of the length of time it had taken the City to mobilize its forces of law and order (they quite reasonably suspected the City authorities of taking their time in moving to defend so unpopular a target), and calling for the imprisonment and punishment of the ringleaders of the mob. Ten years later a mob of 'boys' set upon Dr John

Lamb, the hated Duke of Buckingham's astrologer, whom they attacked as 'the duke's devil' as he was leaving a playhouse (possibly the Fortune, given the direction of his flight). They chased him through Moorgate to the Windmill Tavern where he took temporary refuge, and later, despite an escort of constables, stoned and beat him to death. The King was scandalized that a city mob would dare to murder the creature of his favourite in this brutal fashion on the very doorstep of the Court, and the Privy Council ordered the imprisonment of the constables and the Provost Marshal's men who were present or should have been present to prevent the outrage, but the culprits were never caught.

These were spectacular and widely noted riots, not because they posed any real threat to the social order, but because of their political implications. The drunken brawling, purse-cutting, 'picking' (as petty thievery was called), and riotous assaults, the beating of apprentices by brutal masters and the beating of masters by sturdy and unruly apprentices—all were charges that appear with some frequency in the records of Bridewell, of the City and Middlesex Sessions, and of guild courts. They posed no real threat to either the social or political order, and they rarely attracted the notice of Middleton's contemporaries, unless they were themselves the victims. Innocents from the country were warned to be wary of cheats and titillated with descriptions of a criminal underground by Dekker and others, but the record is instead of human failure and human viciousness: typical of many others, on 2 October 1574 the court at Bridewell heard the case of 'John Thomas, servant with Mr Austin, Skinner, sent in by Mr Starkie as a pilferer and one that will not at his master's commandment at no time serve God nor go to church, and for that he is otherwise riotous and disobedient'. He was ordered 'to have correction'.

This picture of an expanding metropolis of masters and servants, of citizens and their government, a bourgeois world of trade and manufacturing, has a significant piece missing: the non-citizen members of the learned professions of law, religion, and medicine and the resident armigerous gentry, such as Thomas Middleton himself. The physicians were the smallest component of the learned professions by far; university-trained, numbering just thirty in 1589, and organized in the Royal College of Physicians, they shared the actual practice of medicine with the much larger Barber Surgeons' Company, a city guild, and with the Apothecaries' Company, which broke away from the Grocers and received a royal charter in 1618. In theory these were complementary, not competitive practitioners, the medical doctors diagnosing illnesses and disease, the surgeons treating wounds and broken bones, and the apothecaries preparing medicines prescribed by physicians. Hence, in A Fair Quarrel the physician refers to the fact that doctors 'cast all waters', a Galenic diagnostic technique which was still standard practice, while the surgeon constantly refers to incisions, wounds, and sutures. In practice physicians had an élite practice and were rarely resorted to by ordinary people, who depended on folk medicine and practitioners—cunning men and women—supplemented by the advice of apothecaries and the skills of barber surgeons.

The clergy in London, also largely university-trained by this time (future clerics normally matriculated and proceeded to an MA, if not to one of the higher degrees in divinity), numbered perhaps two hundred or more. The parish clergy staffed the 122 parishes of the city and suburbs, to which number must be added the lecturing preachers who lacked a parish benefice, the schoolmasters of the more prestigious grammar schools, such as St Paul's and Merchant Taylors', and the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's Cathedral. The Bishop of London and the Archbishop of Canterbury were resident nearby in Fulham and Lambeth respectively, not actually in the City. Despite occasional purges of nonconformist Puritans, London never lacked for preaching at any time during Middleton's life. Sermons could be heard on any day of the week, and for those jaded by the local talent there was the weekly sermon at Paul's Cross, where Londoners could hear young talent straight from the universities, royal chaplains, present and future bishops, and other ecclesiastical luminaries. Competent preachers never lacked for an audience, and for the ambitious graduate London was a proving ground and an opportunity to attract and impress future patrons. Bishop John Earle in his Microcosmography described Paul's Walk in the Cathedral as a 'market of young lecturers, whom you may cheapen here at all rates and sizes'. John Poynter began his clerical career as curate and lecturer at St Mildred Bread Street in the City, but then went on to the living at Hanwell in Oxfordshire. After leaving Oxford with an MA Ezechial Culverwell, the son of a London Haberdasher of St Martin Vintry, spent the next three decades at various Essex livings until he was finally deprived in 1609 for nonconformity. He returned to London, preaching in the pulpits of various of his friends: St Anne Blackfriars, where his nephew, William Gouge, was preacher; Allhallows Bread Street, where Richard Stock was rector and preacher (Stock and Culverwell had edited Richard Rogers's Seven Treatises, a well-known guide to the godly life, for the press some years before, when Culverwell was Rector of Felsted, Essex, and Rogers was lecturer at nearby Wethersfield); and elsewhere. The clergy did not necessarily spend the whole of their professional lives in the City, but a small group did, forming close alliances with the godly merchants and craftsmen in their parishes and in the city companies, preaching their funeral sermons and remembered in their wills.

The lawyers were by far the largest, the fastest growing and the wealthiest of the professions, and although the centre of the profession was just to the west of the city in the Inns of Court, their influence in the city was pervasive. Between 1590 and 1639 more than 12,000 young men were admitted to one of the four Inns of Court—Lincoln's Inn, Gray's Inn, Inner and Middle Temple—where lawyers were trained in the common law, and during the same four decades more than 2,000 were called to the bar and were thus qualified to plead as barristers before the central courts—King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer—as well as the county Assizes. However, this gives a much too restrictive picture of their practices, for the same barristers also practised before the so-called English Bill courts—Chancery, Star Chamber, Requests, Wards and Duchy Chamber—and the ecclesiastical courts and admiralty alone remained the exclusive arena for the shrinking number of university-trained civil lawyers. In the city itself the Recorder of London was invariably a prominent lawyer, as was the City Serjeant; many of the company clerks of the more important guilds were lawyers as well, and since much of the business before the city courts involved issues of debt and contract, lawyers also practised before those courts. City companies retained learned counsel and consulted widely, when faced with difficult legal issues: for example, when the Grocers' Company was attempting to carry out the complex bequest of Lady Slany, the widow of a prominent Grocer and alderman, their Court of Assistants ordered that the company clerk, an attorney, and Mr Pheasant (doubtless Peter Pheasant, a prominent and pious barrister and eventual Serjeant-at-Law), the counsel retained by Lady Slany's executrixes, consult with Sir Thomas Coventry, the King's Solicitor General. The city companies tried to insist that their brethren settle disputes by arbitration before the company courts, before seeking remedies at common law, and regularly fined those who sued at law without permission, but London merchants and tradesmen were as litigious as the gentry in this very litigious age, and more than 70 per cent of the cases brought before King's Bench and Common Pleas were brought by litigants who were not landed gentry.

From a diptych by John Gipkyn,
Preaching at St Paul's Cross, c.1616.

Heading the list of Dramatis Personae in the 1611 edition of Middleton and Dekker's The Roaring Girl is not Moll Cutpurse herself, or even the cives & uxores, but rather four knights. The gentry, like the nobility, had long been accustomed to come up to London to pursue business at Court and their law suits during term-time, but from the 1580s on increasing numbers of the landed élite apparently established residence in the City and suburbs for longer periods, much to the increasing alarm of the Crown. When Elizabeth I ordered those gentry home who were not pursuing legal business in a proclamation in 1596, the order came in the midst of a dearth that followed harvest failure, and the Crown was anxious that the landed classes return home and fulfil their traditional role of relieving their neighbourhoods. Elizabeth's Stuart successors continued to be concerned about the consequences of the 'decay of hospitality', but they also saw that the political as well as the social order was threatened 'by the absence of so many persons of quality and authority from their countries, whereby those parts are left destitute both of relief and government'. How many of the landed élite were actually resident in the metropolis it is impossible to tell, but two figures may be indicative of the situation in the last years of Middleton's life. In a newsletter the Reverend Joseph Mead wrote on 3 January 1623 he claimed that 'the two last proclamations have caused the remove from about this city, and Westminster, of 7,000 families, and with them 1,400 coaches. . . . All tradesmen complain much, as do the poor, of their departure'. A decade later an official survey of those of the élite still in residence contrary to a recent royal proclamation discovered 37 of the nobility, 147 baronets and knights, and 130 squires and gentlemen. If more than 300 élite families were still in residence, despite the proclamation and the Christmas exodus—and it was customary for such families to keep open house at their principal country residence until after Twelfth Night—then a figure in the thousands resident at least briefly at other times does not seem unlikely.

If the need to pursue suits at law originally drew the landed élite to town, continued residence had other attractions. Since the obligations and expectations of hospitality were attached to the family seat and did not apply to life in London, the great crowd of servants and gentleman retainers associated with residence in a great house could be dispensed with for all but a handful of the court aristocracy. Many a gentleman found it easier to live on his rent-roll in London than on his estates, and with the improvement in the travelling coach in the early seventeenth century it became harder or at least less excusable to leave wife and children behind. But the attraction of London lay not only in such practical matters. For young gentlemen without professional ambitions the Inns of Court provided a respectable finishing school in which it was possible to meet and form social alliances with others of the same class, to visit the Court and take dancing and fencing lessons, to view the latest fashions, to visit the bookstalls at St Paul's and the public and private theatres, to gamble at cockfights and view the bear- and bull-baiting across the river, from which it was only a short distance to the houses of prostitution in the Winchester rents and at Holland's Leaguer, the notorious brothel located in the former manor house of Paris Garden. Above all London offered ready access to one's social equals: as the gallant Cockstone remarks in Michaelmas Term to the newly arrived Richard Easy, a gentleman from Essex, 'Here you may fit your foot, make choice of those whom your affection may rejoice in.'

For gentlemen the country offered the opportunity to exercise power over one's neighbours as a justice of the peace and to gossip with one's social equals at quarter sessions and the twice-yearly meetings of the Assize, and at least for the sturdy and athletic there were the pleasures of the chase; for wives and daughters only the opportunities of social intercourse on the occasion of long visits to distant kin broke the busy but isolated life of the country house. For the latter London spelled liberation. One gets a sense of the attractions of London in a chance observation by Margaret Cavendish, the Duchess of Newcastle, who recalled that in her youth (she was born about 1623) she and her sisters used 'in winter time to go sometimes to plays, or to ride in their coaches about the streets to see the concourse and recourse of people'. Similarly, after noting her pious upbringing (she was the daughter of the Provost of Eton), Anne, Lady Halkett observed that 'so scrupulous I was of giving any occasion to speak of me, as I know they did of others, that though I loved well to see plays and to walk in the Spring Garden sometimes. . . . yet I cannot remember 3 times that ever I went with any man besides my brothers, and if I did, my sisters or others better than myself was with me'. London fashions had become as important for women as for men. As Tawny Coat, the pedlar, remarks to Hobson, the London Haberdasher, in Heywood's play If You Know Not Me, You Know Nobody, Part II, 'Faith, Sir, our country girls are kin to your London courtiers, every month sick of a new fashion', and in 1621, when Thomas Knyvett, a Norfolk gentleman, was in London pursuing family legal business, he conscientiously wrote to his young wife at home, busy with her infant children, that her 'gown and things are a-making' and that 'all they wear at court is plain white aprons, among the great ladies', to which he added a postscript that waistcoats for women were now 'quite out of fashion'.

London's explosive growth during Middleton's lifetime made it a magnet attracting all sorts and degrees of people. For young men and women its guilds and households offered the opportunity for training and employment available in such numbers and variety nowhere else. For the ambitious cleric the city offered both readily available pulpits and the opportunity to demonstrate their preaching prowess before potential patrons. Proximity to the law schools and the central courts made London the inevitable focus for the legal profession which itself was growing at an unprecedented rate. The need to pursue legal business or to seek patronage at Court may have brought the gentry to town, but once there the opportunities of urban life and the amusements offered there kept increasing numbers in residence month after month. Proximity to the Court perhaps inevitably made London a centre of fashion and political news-gathering, but it was the growth of London that made possible the variety of commercialized entertainment, which anticipated the development of respectable amusements in the provinces by a century, and which, once in existence, could only be temporarily halted even by civil war and revolution.

MIDDLETON'S LONDON

Much of Middleton's London was old, however much it was transformed during his lifetime: the walled city with its medieval gates was still the centre of the metropolis, despite the erosion of its once independent liberties and the spread of its suburbs. Its economic life was still dominated by the livery companies, and its government structured by the mayor's Court of Aldermen and the wards, as it had been for centuries. But Thomas Middleton and his like represented something new in urban life; literate laymen writing for a largely literate lay mass audience was a way of life, whether seen as a trade or profession, little older than Middleton's engagement in it. The traditional religious culture survived but was transformed by Protestantism and the printing press, the masses and religious processions giving way to sermons preached and printed and the proliferating guides to a godly life. There was also a traditional culture of urban secular entertainment, of street entertainers—jugglers, acrobats, ballad singers—and of the alehouse, where dicing and card-playing accompanied drinking, which survived and flourished in Middleton's London and in fact long after. But alongside these traditional amusements were the new public theatres with their apparently insatiable appetite for new plays and the growing publishing industry prepared to satisfy an expanding literate laity both in London and throughout the rest of the country with an endless stream of new printed ballads, jest books, almanacs, plague pamphlets, crime stories, and plays. The new market opened the possibility of a new, if precarious, career alongside the traditional learned professions. Some straddled the traditional and the new, such as Ben Jonson, who wrote for the public stage but welcomed and gloried in his aristocratic and royal patronage, but others, such as Anthony Munday, Thomas Dekker, Thomas Heywood, and Thomas Middleton himself, found in the London theatre companies, publishing houses, and livery companies an urban market for their skills no longer dependent on the traditional power structure of Crown, Church, and nobility. For these writers—'poets', as they still called themselves—London was as much a new world to be explored and exploited as the New World beyond the ocean sea.

SEE ALSO

List of works cited: Companion, 457

MIDDLETON'S THEATRES

Scott McMillin

The London Theatre in 1601

SUPPOSE a young writer with a good ear and a knack for the stage—call him Thomas Middleton—had looked over the London theatre in 1601. What would he have seen?

He would have seen a theatre busy with controversy and competition, disreputable in the opinion of authority and magnetic to Londoners of all ranks. The two best-known acting companies were playing in splendid new theatres: the Chamberlain's Men at the Globe across the Thames from the city proper, a little beyond the reach of the authorities in one direction; and the Admiral's Men at the Fortune across the city to the north-west, beyond their reach in another. (The City fathers disliked crowds seeking entertainment, and the theatres were prudently built outside their jurisdiction.) These were the twin foundations of the London drama, the Chamberlain's Men and the Admiral's Men, the actors a generation of theatregoers had grown up with in the 1590s. The stage was known more by its acting companies and its star performers than by its playwrights. One went to see the great actor of the previous decade, Edward Alleyn, play a revival of The Jew of Malta at the Fortune (he had just returned to the stage after a hiatus of three years), or the Chamberlain's Men play Henry V at the Globe with Richard Burbage, Alleyn's rival, in the title role.

But the scene extended beyond the Globe and the Fortune. The Privy Council had tried for years to limit the number of adult companies to these two, but this pressure had not prevented a troupe under the patronage of the Earl of Derby from moving into a new inn-yard theatre at the Boar's Head in 1599 and becoming well enough known to be invited to Court for performances that winter. The great comic Will Kempe was soon to return after morris-dancing from London to Norwich on a wager and then acting on the continent. He had built his fame with the Chamberlain's Men, but now it was thought he would join a fourth company that was gaining a foothold in London, the Earl of Worcester's Men. With Worcester's Men vying for Kempe and negotiating to play at yet another playhouse, the Rose (not new but serviceable), the theatre was obviously outpacing the Privy Council's stated intentions. (Worcester was himself a Privy Counsellor.) To a young writer, the theatre must have looked like a growth industry.

These theatres—the Globe, the Fortune, the Rose, the Boar's Head—can become something more vivid than mere names if one thinks about where they stood and how they were reached. The map of London (see page 62) shows the locations. The Globe was on the Bankside, close to the Rose and another older theatre not yet mentioned, the Swan. They were reached on foot by walking down Gracechurch Street and across London Bridge, although some theatregoers treated themselves to the luxury of hiring a boatman to row them across the river—for a sixpenny fee that cost more than admission to the playhouse. The new Fortune stood north of the city, through Cripplegate to Golden Lane, to the west of the very first permanent playhouses that had been built in London just over a generation ago. (The Curtain was one of the earliest houses, and was still usable.) The Boar's Head was in Whitechapel, a few steps east of the city boundary, beyond the edge of the map. People living near St Paul's Cathedral could walk to the Fortune in minutes and the Boar's Head in half an hour. These were real places for theatre people, and Kempe, Alleyn, and Burbage were not only real, they were stars. To be able to choose among them would have been a theatregoer's delight. And then to walk to the theatre where Burbage (let us say) was acting, to see once again what a fine new theatre it was, to see that the rest of the company was largely the experienced professional troupe that one remembered from before (Kempe was gone, but Robert Armin had taken his place), then to see a play that was being talked about all over town—a theatregoer so blessed would think London the best place in the world for plays.

What theatre people may have talked about first in 1601, however, was the return of the children's companies. To the great advantage of Middleton's early career, two companies of boys were once again (after an absence of a decade) giving public performances in small exclusive playhouses recently refurbished in the centre of the city: one in the vicinity of St Paul's, the other a few streets toward the river, in the Blackfriars precinct. The adult troupes used boy actors to play the female roles in their plays, but the companies at St Paul's and Blackfriars were entirely made up of boys, who were choristers in training for the music at St Paul's or the Queen's Chapel, but had also been learning plays for performance at Court. Now their masters, on the pretence of holding open rehearsals, were charging high admissions for progressive and well-to-do patrons to see the plays, often even before the Queen could. These private theatres were roofed-over, heated in the winter, and intimate. Candlelight illuminated the stage. Some of the finest music in London could be heard during their act-intervals, an innovation that had not yet taken hold at the open-air theatres. Ordinary citizens could not usually afford this kind of entertainment, but the tone was being set for the London theatre of 1601 in these avant-garde houses, and people interested in theatre would have been talking about them. A shrewd observer would have sensed a change was in the making, although the form it would eventually take would have been hard to predict.

Five of the playhouses in use in 1601—the Fortune, the Globe, the Boar's Head, St Paul's, and the Blackfriars—were new or refurbished. Counting the children, up to six companies were putting on plays. The adult companies knew nothing of the long run or the classical revival. Everything they staged had been written within the last twenty years. The bill changed every day, and with the adult companies a play would usually not be repeated within the week. (The first long run would be of a Middleton play, A Game at Chess, which ran for nine consecutive performances in 1624.) Much of their repertory was new in the past two years, although the Admiral's Men were just now beginning a revival phase as they refurbished many of Alleyn's vehicles from the 1590s. Each adult company was putting on more than a dozen plays in daily rotation and introducing new plays with some regularity. The children's companies put on fewer plays, but they were known for doing the latest thing and wanted new scripts. An ambitious young writer could hardly ask for greater opportunities than Middleton found in London in 1601.

The sense of excitement the theatre always holds for young people must have seemed especially intense, for this industry was bold, imaginative, entertaining, risqué, profitable, and frowned upon by the authorities. The children's theatres were in respectable neighbourhoods, but the open-air theatres, especially the ones on the Bankside—the Globe, the Rose, and the Swan—stood in an area known for brothels, taverns, and bear-baiting pits. Writers in search of respectability would have thought twice about working in the theatre. Middleton was looking for an income, and although he seems to have wanted to change the world with even more determination than is usual among writers aged twenty-one, he would have seen the theatre as a market, the best literary market in town.

He would also have seen the other side of the theatre—it was filled with uncertainties and rife with opportunities for failure. The adult companies depended on box-office takings for their basic income, with extra money coming from command performances during the Christmas festivities at Court. They acted six days a week when conditions were in their favour—i.e., when the City authorities had no extraordinary reason, such as an outbreak of plague, to do what they wanted to do and close the theatres down. The children acted less frequently, probably three times a week. All these companies would have known how quickly disaster could strike. Many of the adult actors would remember the bad plague years of the early 1590s, when the London playhouses were closed for months at a time and long provincial tours were the means of survival. Such trouble may have seemed fairly distant in 1601, but it was still a worry; and from March 1603 the theatres would be shut down for more than a year, first by Queen Elizabeth's illness and death, then by a terrible new outbreak of plague.

The theatre building and refurbishing at the turn of the century was done in defiance of a Privy Council Order of 28 July 1597, which not only ordered all playhouses closed but insisted on their destruction. The order was not carried out, but it serves as a reminder of the political controversy surrounding the theatre industry. There was commercial uncertainty as well. Those splendid new theatres, the Globe and the Fortune, were not only signs of prosperity among the companies but also instruments of competition between them. When Shakespeare's company built the Globe across the river in the Bankside area, the Admiral's Men had been acting there for years, at the Rose. The most famous theatre ever built in England was not a polite undertaking. In danger of losing their lease, the Chamberlain's Men had torn down their old theatre (called the Theatre, north of the city) when their landlord was out of town for the Christmas holidays of 1598; they transported the heavy timbers across the river to the Bankside, and used them as the main structural units for the Globe, which they built less than two hundred yards from the Rose. Lovers of Shakespeare do not often dwell on this piece of commercial aggression and questionable legality. Perhaps the Admiral's Men were already planning to leave the Bankside, but in any case the Chamberlain's Men were solving the problem of losing their lease at the same time as they were putting pressure on the competition. Their new theatre was close enough to the Rose that crowd noise from one of these open-air theatres would have been heard in the other. Roslyn Knutson has shown that the Admiral's Men tried to meet the competition with an unusual outburst of new plays, but they must also have been looking to new locations. The Rose was now one of the older theatres, the Globe the newest: the Bankside theatre area had obviously changed. The Admiral's Men soon vacated the Rose. Their new theatre, the Fortune, was built across the city to the north-west. They were moving more or less in the direction from which their rivals had come.

The children's companies were another kind of rivalry. For ten years the adult companies had been free of competition from children's companies, but now a new generation of 'little eyases' (as they are called in Hamlet) or the 'nest of boys able to ravish a man' (as Middleton called them in Father Hubbard's Tales) were acting in two playhouses. These companies had an advantage: the boys were not paid for their acting. They were being trained for the Queen's musical and dramatic entertainments at the expense of the Church and the Crown. So these roofed-over and stylish theatres were operating on child labour under institutional subsidies, yet they could charge high admissions. The adult companies had to keep prices down because of their competition with each other, and because they had large theatres to fill. Drawing audiences was a daily contest. London was becoming the largest city in Europe, but its population was still under 200,000 at the turn of the century, even counting the suburbs and the City of Westminster. Up to six companies, each putting on three to six performances a week, were competing for a scarce resource, the full house. The best of them, it should be added, were making very good money despite all the competition.

For which of these companies would a young playwright have most wanted to write? We tend to think the answer should be the Chamberlain's Men, who in 1601 were creating some of our own world by staging Hamlet, followed over the next few years by the rest of Shakespeare's most famous tragedies. Hindsight always brings us around to ourselves, but to someone actually facing 1601 as a day-to-day business of opportunity and survival, Shakespeare and the Chamberlain's Men would have seemed very well established, prone to taking strange risks, and a little out of touch. Staging Richard II at the request of the Earl of Essex (as they did in February 1601) was a bizarre decision, whether or not they knew Essex would try to overthrow the government the next day. The Henry V in which Burbage was starring at the Globe was their ninth English history play by Shakespeare. The achievement was as stunning as it was old-fashioned. Fifteen years earlier, when Middleton was learning to read, history plays had been a new development, an innovation largely made by a company called the Queen's Men. Shakespeare and his company virtually took over that company's plots by rewriting plays on the reigns of Henry IV, Henry V, Richard III, and King John. This was how they worked, by beating others at their own game. That they were about to change the history of literature with Shakespeare's tragedies would not have been so apparent in 1601 as their commercial strength and the way they built it. Hamlet was a rewrite too, after all, although in this case the original property may have been their own.

That is not to say that Middleton steered around the Chamberlain's Men. A freelance takes his opportunities where he can, and at first Middleton found his opportunities elsewhere, with the Admiral's Men at the Fortune and the children's company at St Paul's. Within a few years, he would be writing for the Chamberlain's Men too, and collaborating with Shakespeare. He would also have learned a good deal about tragic characterization from Hamlet, with the long-term results to be most fully evident in The Changeling. But in 1601 the Admiral's Men and the revived children's companies presented great opportunities to a beginning writer, the adult company specializing in the older writer by whom Middleton was most deeply influenced—Marlowe, not Shakespeare—and the other specializing in the sort of satirical and avant-garde attitudes that a young writer would share and be quick to turn his own way.

Middleton obviously listened to Marlowe from an early age—one stanza of The Wisdom of Solomon Paraphrased (16.97–102) is a paraphrase of Edward II (5.1.11–15), for example—and his mature work deepened the relationship. His ironic tone in both comedy and tragedy draws upon

The Jew of Malta and The Massacre at Paris; the sharp focus and relentlessness of his satire are secular versions of the religious intensity of Doctor Faustus. The refusal of Middleton's writing to admit the sentimental, its readiness for breaking and entering upon the established pieties, its tendency to be interrupted by outbursts of parody—these traits come from Marlowe more obviously than from Shakespeare. But what Middleton refused of Marlowe is important too, and the refusals would have been related to the Admiral's Men at the Fortune. Middleton did not follow Marlowe into the dominating central role, the Alleyn role—Tamburlaine, Faustus, Barabas—around which the rest of a play would be organized. The theatrical energy of a Middleton play circulates through many strong roles, as though it is the ensemble that matters most. And some of those strong roles are for female characters—another departure from Marlowe.

Middleton would have first heard Marlowe by hearing Alleyn, or hearing about Alleyn, whose performances in The Jew of Malta, Doctor Faustus, and Tamburlaine were extremely popular in the London of the 1590s. The teenaged Middleton must have seen these performances, heard about them, caught them from other conversations: teenagers know a hero when one appears, and Alleyn came into his prime when Middleton was the right age to be vastly impressed. By 1602–3, however, when he was writing for Alleyn and the Admiral's Men, his attitude might have been different. Alleyn had returned to acting when the company moved to the Fortune, and his famous roles from the 1590s were being revived one after another. The Admiral's Men were building an audience at their new theatre by resorting to past successes, and Marlowe's plays were prominent in the effort: Doctor Faustus, The Jew of Malta, and The Massacre at Paris were revived in 1601–2. Nostalgia was not among Middleton's stronger feelings. The career and the money lay in writing new plays, not in tinkering with revivals (as Middleton did in writing a new prologue and epilogue for Greene's Friar Bacon). The Alleyn revivals were cutting into the demand for new plays at the Fortune. Between 1600 and 1603, as Middleton was coming into their fold, the number of new plays produced by the Admiral's Men was well below their norm.

What a young writer would have prized at the Fortune was the opportunity to collaborate with experienced dramatists like Thomas Dekker, Henry Chettle, Anthony Munday, and Michael Drayton, men who could teach a novice the arts of commercial play-scripting as they worked together. These writers knew how to write for Alleyn, but they also knew how to write for the ensemble which Alleyn had built around him and which remained when Alleyn retired, again, in about 1603. One of Middleton's next ventures for the company became the earliest play by which he is known today, a collaboration with Dekker, The Patient Man and the Honest Whore of 1604. It is very much an ensemble piece, built on the interactions among important roles.

At the same time Middleton was writing for another troupe that specialized in ensemble performance, the children's company at St Paul's. Here he found the continuity to develop his own voice. He wrote at least five plays for the Paul's boys between 1603 and 1607 and one or two for the children's company at the Blackfriars—and all of the surviving plays he wrote for those two companies are comedies, resolutely new comedies, designed to make the romantic comedy of the previous decade look old. The new comedy, satiric in tone and urban in subject—'city comedy'—was not Middleton's alone (Jonson, Chapman, and Marston were also writing in this vein), and some of its early examples were staged at the public theatres. But Middleton's plays for the children's companies were the most sustained effort in the new mode, and no writer was more alert to the satirical and erotic characteristics of boy performers. Their charm and precocity allowed them to put on risqué satires about the London of their own day—unseemly or dangerous material if performed by adults. These boys were sharply trained, and talented. They could sing, they could play musical instruments, they could act. Their music was supposed to come first—it was for the appreciation of the Queen herself, occasionally. Their acting came a close second—it was for the profit of the Master who taught them their music. The Master knew he could charge high prices and still draw the wealthier, better educated theatregoers, the style-setters of the day, to see these charmers perform. While Middleton was not the only writer who supplied texts suited to these talents, he was the most consistent. And he was one of the two (Jonson was the other) best able to satirize the movers and shakers of a changing London even as some of them sat there and applauded the effort.

Public and Private Theatres

Middleton's early plays for the children's company at Paul's were the closest he ever came to being a 'house' writer. For the rest of his career he was freelancing, and his work was performed in most of the commercial theatres of his time (he is known to have written for the original Globe, the second Globe, the Rose, the Fortune, the Swan, the Phoenix, Blackfriars, and St Paul's, and we do not know the theatres for some of his plays). London also had a variety of non-commercial playing places for which Middleton wrote. One of these was the city itself—the streets of London, which were the setting for a processional kind of showmanship at which Middleton became a master. And his work was occasionally seen in the centres of power and influence at Court, in the law schools, or in the London residences of the élite: more than a half-dozen of his commercial plays were brought to Court for command performances; he wrote masques for the Inner Temple and for Denmark House, and he wrote a number of indoor entertainments and speeches for official functions of the City. No playwright of his time had his work performed on a greater variety of London stages.

A freelance dramatist has to know his theatres and the differences among them. In the dozen commercial playhouses operating in London during his time, Middleton would have encountered few contrasts greater than that between St Paul's and the Fortune, the two theatres where he began his career. These could well have been, respectively, the smallest and the largest commercial theatres in London. The Fortune stage is known to have run 43 feet across and 27 feet 6 inches deep, a very large platform of nearly 1,200 square feet. Richard Hosley has estimated the Fortune's audience capacity at about 3,000. No one can be sure how small St Paul's was, for the exact location of the playhouse is still disputed. Reavley Gair thinks the theatre was very small: a stage of about 170 square feet, and an audience of about 100 persons. An upward limit can be determined from the other private playhouse, the Blackfriars, said to have been larger than Paul's. Richard Hosley has estimated the stage at Blackfriars at 29 feet wide and 18 feet 6 inches deep, or 537 square feet. Between Gair's estimate of 170 square feet for Paul's and Hosley's of 537 square feet for Blackfriars, there is an enormous difference, of course, but even Blackfriars was not half the size of the Fortune, and Paul's was smaller than that.

All the commercial theatres Middleton wrote for would have ranged in size between the extremes of St Paul's and the Fortune. The open-air theatres were larger than the private houses, although the smallest of the public theatres, the Rose (in use only during Middleton's earliest years as a writer), had a stage about the same size as Hosley has estimated for the Blackfriars. (The Rose foundations were excavated in 1989 and offer abundant evidence that the public theatres could differ from one another.) Generally speaking, the public-theatre stages ran from 500 square feet upward to about 1,200 square feet and the private-theatre stages ran from 500 square feet downward to whatever size one can imagine for the yet-to-be-located St Paul's. Audience capacities were between 2,000 and 3,000 at the public theatres and under 1,000 at the private houses.

The Court stages were set up for the occasion in various halls and chambers. We cannot be certain where the Middleton command performances were staged; the range of possibilities is great. Tiny platforms were built at Hampton Court and Richmond during Queen Elizabeth's reign (twelve feet square and fourteen feet square respectively) and a forty-foot square masque stage was set up in the old Banqueting House at Whitehall in 1604–5. Those are perhaps the extremes of size, and they are even greater than the contrast between St Paul's and the Fortune. The new Banqueting House built in 1607 was the most prestigious building for entertainments (until it burned in 1619 and was replaced with the even more famous Banqueting House which still stands today). The masques of Jonson and Jones were the primary shows at the new Banqueting House, but plays were sometimes given there after 1610. When a document says that The Changeling was given 'at Whitehall' in 1624, the reference could be to the Banqueting House, the Great Chamber, the Hall, or the Cockpit, which were all used for plays. Hardly any information remains about the temporary stages erected in these spaces, although when the Cockpit was turned into a permanent theatre in 1629–30 (shortly after Middleton's death), it had a shallow apron stage 35 feet across backed by a concave façade reaching a maximum depth of about 16 feet. This size is in the private-theatre range.

A play staged at Court was attended by the rich and powerful, brilliantly attired, several hundred in number. Middleton would probably not have been invited. (His only recorded summons to Court was to be arrested for the scandalous A Game at Chess in 1624.) At the Fortune or the Globe, by contrast, the 2,000–3,000 spectators on a good day included some who paid a penny to stand in the yard ('groundlings'), others who paid an additional one or two pennies to obtain seats and some protection from bad weather in the roofed-over galleries, and a few of the wealthy or ostentatious who paid sixpence to sit in private boxes. Professional men like lawyers and courtiers, along with women from all ranks of London life, apprentices and journeymen taking time from work, and the occasional foreign traveller, would have been seen in the crowd. These public playhouses drew from all areas except royalty and perhaps the church, but they were basically cheap and accessible to the common playgoer. It was in a theatre like this—the Rose—that Middleton, coming of age, could have seen Allyn play Marlowe.

The roofed-over private theatres liked to claim their audiences were 'select' and 'choice', and to a large extent this was true. Their admission prices are hard to pin down, but Michael Shapiro's examination of the evidence indicates that Blackfriars was the most expensive theatre in town, with an admission scale of six-, twelve-, or eighteen-pence—six times the prices of the public houses. Some gallants paid an extra sixpence to sit on stools along the edges of the stage. Paul's set itself between the extremes, sometimes charging sixpence throughout the house for an especially popular play, but normally charging two-, four-, or sixpence, twice the scale for the public theatres and distinctly less than Blackfriars. It may have held the smallest audience, but it was not the most select. The Paul's neighbourhood was expanding during the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries. Families headed by gentlemen, haberdashers, merchant tailors, weavers, barber-surgeons, booksellers, scribes, and stationers were finding it a good place to live, and the middle aisle at St Paul's Cathedral was crowded with lawyers, booksellers, shopkeepers, and their clients and customers during the day (see Your Five Gallants, 4.4).

The most important characteristic Middleton found at Paul's was its ambience of familiarity with a small audience who knew they were in on a trend. One sign of that familiarity is the fluency with which the Paul's plays move from dialogue to soliloquy or aside, as though in such small space everything was tinged by a gesture to the audience. Another sign is the prologue to Michaelmas

Term, a scathing attack on the legal profession—meant to be enjoyed by an audience well stocked with lawyers. The Children of Paul's specialized in satirizing the up-and-coming professionals of the day, many of whom lived within minutes of the theatre and who were reaching that stage of professional satisfaction where joining others of their own class in laughing at themselves was thought to be a pleasure.

That is where Middleton established himself—on what appeared to be the most progressive, modern side of the London theatre. In one sense, it was also the short-lived side. The satires performed by children's companies sometimes landed them in trouble with the Privy Council, one reason why their careers were brief. Another reason is that boy actors do not last long, and when their voices change there is no guarantee they will become good adult actors. (A notable exception was Nathan Field, who went from the children's company at Blackfriars to Lady Elizabeth's Men and then to the King's Men.) By 1607 voices must have been cracking at St Paul's and Blackfriars, and replacements were, one suspects, proving difficult to find. Five of Middleton's plays for the boy companies reached print in 1607–8, a sign of trouble in the producing organizations (who saw publication as a benefit only after a play ceased performance). But Middleton was not tied to Paul's. He still had links to the Fortune company, where the Admiral's Men had become the Prince's Men after the accession of King James; and by now some of his work was being staged at the Globe, where the Chamberlain's Men were now the King's Men. The new patronage did not mean the players and their writers were coming into a close relationship with royalty, but it was a connection royalty could tap on occasion: when Prince Charles requested The World Tossed at Tennis, it was the Prince's Men who received the commission.

Middleton's work with the King's Men was important to the next phase of his career. In 1608 and 1609, the King's Men were assisting the demise of the children's companies by calling in the Blackfriars lease, helping to bribe the manager at St Paul's to keep his boys from starting up again, and preparing to use the Blackfriars theatre as their second playhouse. No playwright was in a better position for this move than Middleton. When he later wrote The Witch, The Widow, and Anything for a Quiet Life for the King's Men at the Blackfriars, he was writing for the leading adult company in London, he was writing for the theatre where a children's company had staged Your Five Gallants and A Trick to Catch the Old One, and he was writing for the kind of theatre in which he had established himself as the most experienced and reliable playwright.

The move of the King's Men to the Blackfriars proved to be one of the decisive events not just in Middleton's time but in the course of English drama. The long-term future of the commercial drama lay in the private roofed-over playhouse. The reason is not hard to find, if we think about theatre-going in terms of real experience: the weather, for instance. Nothing can be more certain than that audiences and players at an outdoor house like the Globe often would rather have been indoors. The damp cold and gloom of a London winter can be suffered for an afternoon of playgoing, but suffered is the right word, and the English rain can bring misery in any season. That the early Elizabethan commercial drama survived these hazards of the air is perhaps the most amazing thing about it—some take it as a sign of British character. The adult troupes held to the open-air theatres not because they favoured bracing conditions, however, but because they were in business. Their finances were geared to audiences that numbered in the thousands, and indoor-theatre audiences numbered in the hundreds. The Globe and the Fortune had cheap admissions because of the company's need to draw sizeable audiences, they were large because those audiences had to have somewhere to stand or sit, and they were open to the skies because a theatre so large had to use the sun as its means of illumination. A shift in theatre economics was about to occur: establishing a daily repertory at Blackfriars prices would eventually prove to be more profitable than the public theatre system, and that is why we have roofs over our heads today when we can afford to go to the theatre. In 1608, however, this trend would not have been certain. Giving up the public-theatre venue would have been financially questionable, but adding a second playhouse, roofed and warm, would have been just the direction in which an expansive well-capitalized organization would want to travel.

The King's Men were the company to make the move. In a unique arrangement, the ownership of both the Globe and the Blackfriars was shared among the company's senior members. That gave the company a choice between their own public and private theatres, an advantage held by no other company of the time. Exactly how they divided their performances between the two playhouses is hard to say, although the proximity of Blackfriars to the Inns of Court and the royal courts at Whitehall, St James's, and Denmark House would have made it convenient for a large number of well-to-do patrons from the beginning of Michaelmas term in early October to the end of Easter term in early summer. From this, a leap of seasonal reasoning sometimes leads to the conclusion that the Globe was restricted to being a summer theatre after 1608, but the evidence for such a neat division is not solid, at least not during Middleton's lifetime. Drawing large crowds to the Globe would have been financially desirable in any season, and it is not likely the larger theatre stood empty for months at a time. Nevertheless, the company's prestige was now building around the Blackfriars operation, and other adult companies were looking toward private-theatre opportunities too. Between 1610 and the closing of the theatres by the outbreak of civil war in 1642, five private theatres were used by the adult companies. That is not to say that open-air theatres were being abandoned; indeed, new ones were being built. The Red Bull in Clerkenwell was a notable addition around 1605, and the Hope on the Bankside was opened in 1614. When the Globe burned to the ground in 1613, it was rebuilt, as was the Fortune after it burned down in 1621. But the trend was in the other direction. No new public theatre was opened after the Hope in 1614, but the new private theatres were the Phoenix in 1616, Salisbury Court in 1629, and the remodelled Cockpit-at-Court (not a commercial theatre) also in 1629. The private theatres were being established on the western side of an expanding London, in the direction of the Covent Garden and West End centres of today's commercial theatre. Influential men were building new residences, settling their families, and conducting their business in these areas. The theatre was moving up-market, and it was in the private playhouses that the move was being made. When a diarist named Thomas Crosfield jotted down the important London theatres in 1634, he named three private theatres (Blackfriars, the Phoenix, and Salisbury Court) and two public ones (the Red Bull and the Fortune). He did not mention the public theatre we think of as the most famous, the Globe, although it was still in use by the King's Men.

Staging Middleton: Preliminary Notes

The distinction between public and private theatres on which this discussion rests has always been the basis for Elizabethan–Jacobean theatre history. Like most paired terms standing in opposition, these can be misleading if one uses them heedlessly or thinks they tell the entire truth. It is not true, for example, that all the public theatres were like one another and different from all the private theatres. The private playhouse at St Paul's was small compared to the one at Blackfriars, the stage at the public Fortune had a different shape from the stage at the public Swan, the stage at the public Rose was not much larger than the stage at the private Blackfriars—we have noticed these variations and should assume there were others. It is also not true that the plays written for the private houses were all sophisticated, witty, and out-of-touch with the common people, while those for the open-air theatres were broad, democratic, and spotted with outbursts of vulgarity. Such generalizations do contain shades of accuracy, but they lose validity in the simplicity of binary thinking. By the time Crosfield made his note about the theatres referred to above, the Red Bull and the Fortune were known for rowdiness and sensationalism, the three private houses he named were known for sophistication and Court connections, and the Globe he did not name was somewhere between these extremes. Even then, however, and certainly earlier, during Middleton's career, both kinds of theatre belonged to the same commercial system, and plays were written to be suitable to that system and hence to both kinds of theatre. They were also adaptable to the various fit-up theatres at Court and in the law schools; sometimes they were taken on tour in the provinces. The acting companies had to be prepared for different venues, and their plays had to be flexible.

1. Arend van Buchell's copy of Johannes de Witt's sketch of the Swan playhouse, 1596.

To gain a sense of how Middleton's plays were staged, the basic elements of Elizabethan-Jacobean theatre structure can be seen in the two most useful illustrations which have come down to us from the early playhouses, one from a public theatre and one from a private. The public-theatre illustration (Illus. 1) is a copy of a drawing of the open-air Swan theatre (where Middleton's A Chaste Maid in Cheapside was staged in 1613). The drawing was made by a visitor named Johannes De Witt in about 1596, when the Swan was the newest theatre in London, a tourist attraction. De Witt was so struck by the new playhouse that he sketched what he saw, put in some labels of features which reminded him of the classical theatre ('mimorum aedes' for the tiring-house, 'proscenium' for the stage, etc.), and wrote a description which mentions that the theatre could hold 3,000 spectators.

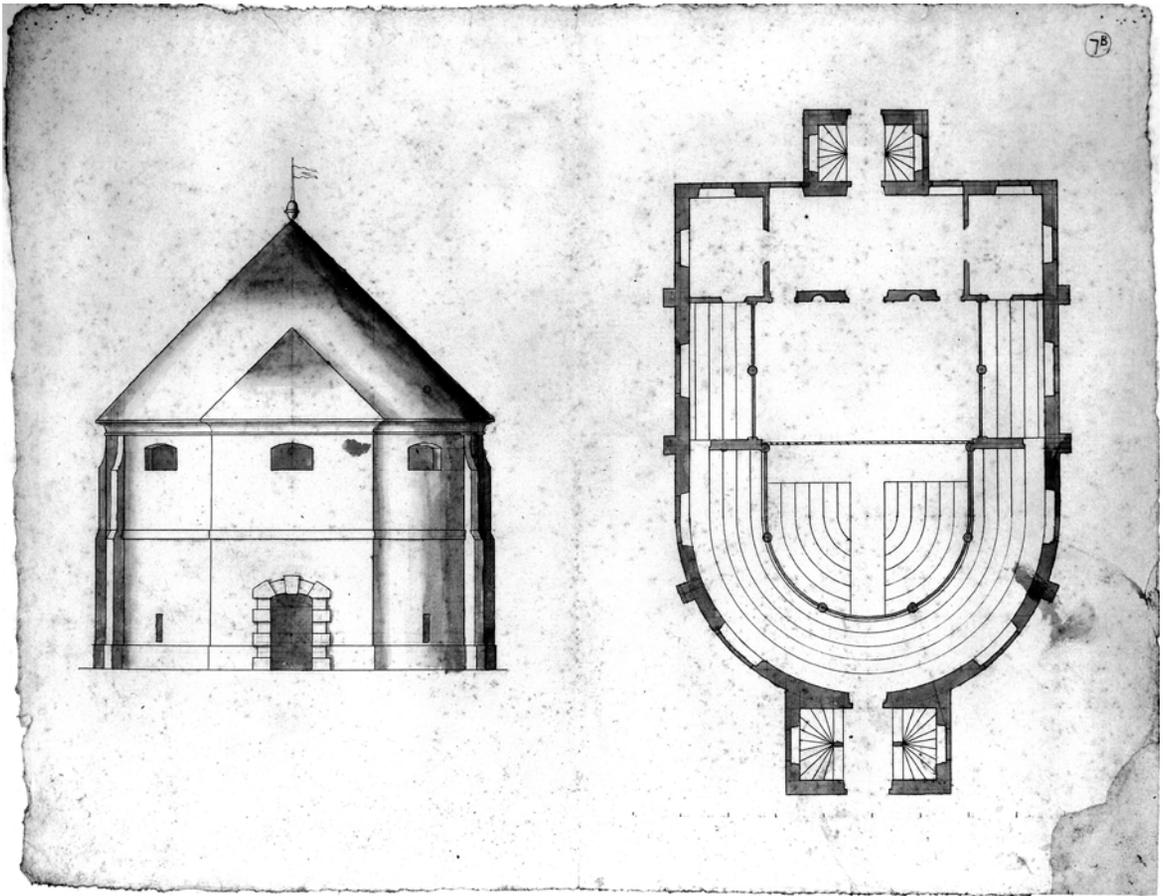

The other illustration comes from a set of plans drawn up by Inigo Jones for an unnamed indoor theatre of the seventeenth century (Illus. 3 and 4). John Orrell has made a case for identifying it as the Phoenix in Drury Lane, opened in 1617 (where The Changeling was staged in 1622), but the matter is not settled. It is best not to be specific about the playhouse and to take the drawings as Jones's design for some private theatre, whether it was realized or not (Illus. 2).

2. Scale reconstruction by Richard Leacroft of Inigo Jones's design for a private playhouse, possibly the Cockpit (also called the Phoenix) in Drury Lane.

We recall that the private theatres were normally smaller than the public Swan, were roofed-over and more comfortable, lit by candle-power, attended to a noticeable extent by more fashionable audiences. One sees something else in the two illustrations: a basic similarity in the relationship between stage and audience. Both stages are set into the audience, so that actors would be seen from many angles. Both theatres bring their spectators around on three, or (counting the galleries to the rear) four sides of the actors. The Swan drawing gives a drastic version of this relationship: its stage is so assertive that it seems to interrupt the galleries that continue behind the tiring-house. (Some have thought the drawing was at fault for this effect, but there is no reason to doubt what De Witt was getting at, although his perspective is strained. If playing were brought to a permanent halt by order of the authorities, the theatrical unit shown in the drawing could be demounted, leaving a ring of galleries for bear-baitings and other spectator sports long associated with the Bankside.) Not all public theatres had such a severe downstage thrust. The recent excavation of the foundations of the Rose indicates a relatively shallow and wide stage, tapered at the front and closely integrated with the tiring-house façade to the rear. Yet both the Swan and the Rose had the basic characteristic of a stage that reached into a surrounding audience area. Both theatres were designed to place the actor in the centre of many points of view.

3. Elevation and plan from Inigo Jones's design for a private playhouse, c.1616.

The Jones drawings of the private theatre show a similar stage-to-audience relationship: the spectator galleries extend along each side of the stage, so that the audience tends to surround the actor. Now, however, the auditorium and stage are a single architectural unit—this is a theatre built to stay that way. The Swan had two stage pillars supporting a roof-cover for part of the platform, but there is no need for that in the private theatre, which had its own roof. (The covering at the open-air theatres was called 'the heavens', the space under the stage was 'the hell', and these religious terms probably faded out from the private houses.) The pit where the groundlings would have stood for a penny at the Swan has been designed for seats in the private house, and these were among the more expensive seats. Keep in mind the different sizes of these arrangements. Where the Swan could accommodate up to 3,000 and used a stage which might have approached the nearly 1,200 square feet at the Fortune, the Inigo Jones drawing has been calculated to show a stage of 350 square feet and seating for between 500 and 700. The smaller theatre would have had a much more intimate feel to it. But the basic relationship of stage to audience obtains in all the commercial theatres for which we have any evidence.

In both the Swan and the private theatre a raised gallery is shown to the rear of the stage. This is the most obvious position for characters who are said to appear 'above' in the play texts, but it may have served other purposes too. The eight figures seated in the Swan drawing's gallery do not appear to be involved in the scene being acted on the platform. Who they are and what they are doing in the gallery are questions that have never been conclusively answered: they might be spectators, or musicians, or actors watching a rehearsal. De Witt's intentions have not reached us on this and on other matters. The clearest point about the Swan gallery is that it would have been useful whoever sat there. It is good space in a playhouse. Wealthy playgoers might pay more to sit behind the stage, wanting to be part of the show that the rest of the audience came to see. Musicians could accompany the action well enough from the gallery position, and if one section were set apart as a 'music room', there would be other sections for wealthy spectators too. Most important for our purposes is that an actor standing in one of the gallery compartments could claim to be at a window or on the walls of a city without generating disbelief, even if the other compartments were providing expensive seats for aristocrats or serving as a musicians' room. The same can be said of the gallery in the Jones drawing, although here the architecture seems to point up the centre of the gallery for acting, perhaps leaving the other sections for audiences or musicians.

4. Sections from Inigo Jones's design for a private playhouse, c.1616.

The positioning of the highest-priced seats is always significant in a theatre. We know that special seats or boxes were reserved for wealthy patrons at both the public and private theatres. Exactly where those boxes were is a harder question. De Witt's drawing makes us think they were in the gallery, but this is by no means certain. Perhaps they were in the part of the galleries marked 'orchestra' on the Swan drawing, which should be imagined as being level with the stage and close to it. Herbert Berry has argued that the Blackfriars boxes were behind the stage but at stage level; Andrew Gurr and Richard Hosley think the evidence favours side boxes. No one can be quite certain, and the matter is complicated by the private-theatre custom of setting stools for high-paying spectators along the sides of the stage itself. The important point is that the highest-priced seats are not centrally positioned with sight lines to a visual stage picture. The centrally-positioned seat became important in the Court theatres: it was the King's seat, and it played its part in the long-term story of the theatre, as we will note. The King was seated according to sight-lines: his own sight-line, first of all, so that the effect of perspective scenes would be best observed by the eyes that mattered most; and the sight-lines of all the others, who were seated behind the chair of state, or along the sides of the room, able to see much of the stage and something of the King. (The Court convention held that no one should sit with his back to the King, so the area between the chair of state and the stage was kept clear of spectators. This was also the dancing area for masques.) But the exclusive seats in the commercial theatres of Middleton's time were in expensive boxes close to the actors, and they helped to create the 'surround' relationship between performer and spectator.

The Inigo Jones drawing adds one crucial feature that the Swan drawing lacks—a large central entrance to the platform, providing a third entrance and capable of being curtained for 'discovery' scenes that occur in the repertoires of all the playhouses. Why the Swan drawing shows no central door has long puzzled stage historians, who know that Middleton's A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, the only extant play that can be confidently connected with the Swan, calls for a discovery scene at the very beginning, and that The World Tossed at Tennis, the only other play that can be connected with the Swan, calls for three doors. The Swan drawing is not helpful on this issue. Plays written for other playhouses, public and private, call for a central opening of the sort the Jones drawing shows, ample enough not only for discovery scenes but also for moving large standing properties like a bed or a throne onto the main stage. How discoveries were managed on the Swan arrangement has been the subject of much speculation, but it is clear that a third entrance was normal in the theatres. Middleton liked to bring characters on from different directions simultaneously (one of his favourite forms of stage direction is 'Enter X, meeting Y'), and his more crowded scenes are busy with comings and goings. His plays could all be played on the Swan stage if necessary, but they imply at least a third entrance and make modern directors glad to have more than that.

So the private and public theatres were alike in affording a central platform for most of the action and upstage spaces for rare effects of discovery and raised locations. Readers may wish to supplement these areas with their imaginations, on the understanding that actors feel free to use available space as they see fit. Perhaps surprise entrances were sometimes made through the audience, for example, or perhaps a canopied pavilion was built in front of one entrance door to stand for a repeatedly-used location. Theatre thrives on imagination in the first place, and actors do not feel bound to restrict themselves to the skimpy evidence that stage historians have to work with in reconstructing the past. Middleton specialized in the 'shop' scene, where some sort of representation of a tradesman's stall stood on the platform stage, and he could call upon a property tree or two for pastoral moments, or a throne to indicate the Court. But the printed and manuscript plays of the period do not reflect much in the way of variation beyond the basic use of the main platform and occasional raised or discovered scenes—and the raised or discovered characters nearly always address other characters on the platform stage, maintaining a flow of relationship from the upstage spaces out to the platform and thus into the space of the audience.

That was always the flow. Those entrance doors to the rear are an odd thing about the Elizabethan stage to modern ways of thinking. We like our actors to enter from different angles, at least from the sides as well as from upstage, and sometimes from the front or from the audience, but both the Swan drawing and the Jones plans show entrance doors only upstage. That means the actors entering the stage had only one direction to move, but that is the crucial direction for Elizabethan staging—toward the audience, down toward most of them, past those sitting along the sides, and away from anyone in the gallery. Such an actor is seen from many angles at once—thus, from many angles, he is at once expected to do something interesting. Alexander Leggatt has pointed out that one move the actor does not make in this kind of theatre is the little downstage curve required of entrances from the wings in a proscenium-arch theatre—the curve that allows a step in the direction of the audience as the actor moves into the garden, the parlour, or whatever the stage represents under the illusion it is not a stage. If you can picture actors entering from the upstage doors at the Swan or the Phoenix, then picture them moving downstage into a sort of criss-cross of views from the audience who see them from all angles, then you will be visualizing the basic system of Elizabethan-Jacobean staging in the public and private theatres.

If you also visualize the actors dressed in expensive costumes, you will catch one of the key features of Middleton's stage. The actor moving into the centre of a surrounding audience's gaze makes his costume crucial to the projection of his role. Middleton often writes significance into costumes themselves. The entry of the Duke and Bianca 'in great state' in Women, Beware Women 4.3 should reveal brilliance and decadence in their attire, with Bianca now displaying more than enough of the jewellery which was said to be 'locked up in [her] hidden virtues' when she entered in plain dress at the beginning of the play. When Fripperly dresses up in the fine garb from his own pawn shop in the opening scene of Your Five Gallants, the stage business establishes his character as fully as anything in the dialogue. To visualize Middleton's plays, visualize costumed actors standing out as full-dimensioned figures. They are the scenic design, in their patterns of motion and colour.

We call the Elizabethan-Jacobean arrangement a 'thrust' stage today, to set it off from the normal proscenium-arch design, but for the Elizabethans a platform extending out into an audience was the norm, and names were needed for anything else: an actor on a raised gallery was 'above' and a set-scene revealed behind curtains was 'discovered'. These two kinds of upstage variation, action 'above' and action 'discovered', were used infrequently, but in the hands of a shrewdly visual dramatist (and because of their infrequency) they made an impact.

How Middleton used the basic arrangement of staging spaces is a subject waiting to be studied. The few suggestions that follow are only a sketch of the possibilities, intended to give some sense of the variations that could be played on the basic configuration of stage space described above. The place to begin is with the simplest Elizabethan staging, which is also the hardest for modern readers to grasp: a stage space that refuses to be anything but itself. We are trained by film and realistic theatre to read theatrical space in the image of some other kind of space, and we are not so familiar with theatrical space which signifies itself and is yet strictly subject to the names assigned it in the dialogue. In the realistic theatre, something said to take place in the forest will be accompanied by elaborate devices intended to make the stage look like a forest, while a film can be shot in the forest itself. The Jacobean stage did not disguise its basic contradiction but used it—the contradiction between a stage-obviously-itself and the language which called this space something else. The contradiction was amplified by such conventions as having boys play the women's roles and having adult actors double several roles within a play. Middleton's plays thrive on such doubleness of acting and staging: his stage does not 'stand' for something else so much as it allows different figures to be set forth in its own repeated space, rather as the boy actor playing a woman or the doubling actor playing several parts set forth different figures in their bodies. The identity of the woman who kills herself rather than yield to a tyrant's lust in The Lady's Tragedy is no settled matter when she is performed by a teenaged boy named Richard Robinson. The Witch is practically an experiment in double determinancies. It begins with a banquet laid out, signalling a location of the ruling class, but the dialogue is coy about which ruler it is (the King is referred to early in the scene, but a Duke comes along instead, and the Lord Governor finally turns out to be the host). When the stage clears at the end of the first scene, witches come into the same space 'with properties and habits fitting'. Their implements take the place of the banquet. This space that gained reluctant identification with authority only to be filled with witches known for a different kind of banquet is not about to stabilize itself for our comfort. Witches were probably played by adult actors, an exception to the practice of the boy actor, and in a large-cast play like this one, adult actors would have to double other roles. The players of the witches would turn up elsewhere as humans. We are meant to be kept guessing.

Consider now the two kinds of special upstage space: the entrance doors and the raised gallery. These are utilitarian spaces, of course, but actors and dramatists turn useful things to special effect. Middleton likes to place female characters 'above', for example. In a comedy like The Widow, the raised space is used repeatedly for Phillipa and Violetta to gain a vantage point over the affairs of the men and thus take some control of their situation. They are the only characters who appear 'above'—this becomes known as their space through repetition. Margot Heinemann has remarked that the new element in Middleton's women characters is their ability to reflect on their situations in general terms, an ability which takes on another social dimension when it is seen that the performers of the women are boys; and the use of the raised acting space as a vantage-point in their own houses is one way the women/boys become 'reflective' over the domestic space where they are ordinarily confined.

But in tragedy, the raised space gives a different meaning for women characters/boy performers. In Women, Beware Women, Bianca is first seen by the Duke when she is 'above', on the gallery. Twice in the later action she will appear on the same gallery, which is used to set forth different places, places in the control of others. It is on the gallery that she is surprised by the Duke in the rape scene, and it is on the gallery that she dies with him in the sensational, richly-costumed finale. The same 'above' that may give women a measure of control in the comedies can demonstrate their conspicuous vulnerability in the tragedies.

The central entrance door, which the Jones plans show as larger and more ornate than the other doors at the Phoenix, could have been curtained for the occasion and used for discovery scenes. Keeping in mind the downstage flow of Elizabethan staging, however, we can see another possibility. Standing properties like the throne could have been moved out from the sizeable central entrance onto the platform stage itself, where they would have been more visible and useful. A combination of the discovery and the moved-out standing property would have been a curtained pavilion or canopy jutting out onto the platform from the central entranceway. The important thing for readers to remember is that a standing property or curtained canopy might have been left in place during the entire performance, giving a symbolic visual focus to the stage. A throne standing in a central upstage position, waiting to be used in the appropriate scenes, would also provide a significant emblem of power and ambition throughout the play. Middleton's favourite standing property was the London shop, a structure for displaying a tradesman's wares which could be approached along the platform in a 'shop-and-street' arrangement. Something more than the central entrance/discovery space seems to have been used for the shop, for the business of setting out the goods or of shutting up the shop often attends the dialogue, as though the actors have a structure to work with. Middleton seems to have expected a standard 'stall' to have been available. Three stalls, a row of shops, are used in various scenes in The Roaring Girl, and it is likely that these were left in place during the entire play.

Michaelmas Term shows what could be done with the shop. Middleton establishes this shop-and-street combination in I.I: the action begins in a public concourse, pauses while an interlude takes place in Quomodo's shop, then continues in the public place. Quomodo's shop-business is to cozen a country gentleman named Easy, who comes along the street and gets taken in. Eventually Easy will obtain the shop and Quomodo will be left on the outside, but at first it seems that Easy hasn't a chance. He is fooled by all the disguises practised on him by Quomodo's henchmen, Shortyard and Falselight. His only hope comes from a raised area in Quomodo's place, a 'gallery' from which Quomodo's wife customarily observes the close dealings going on below. The raised space allows her to see the nature of her husband and to sympathize with poor Easy. The turning point comes when Quomodo goes a step too far and feigns his own death. From that point on, Quomodo (disguised as a Beadle, while his effigy is borne away as his corpse) must be outside the shop, where he discovers that his wife has married Easy upon hearing of her husband's death. Now the interior space is hers and Easy's. Quomodo must operate in the public concourse, where he is inadequate.

The final scene unites the shop structure and the concourse into one space, the judge's house. Perhaps this was accomplished by removing the shop structure. Perhaps the shop structure was turned into part of the judge's house. Readers can use their imaginations, but the basic visual idea is that the stage which was earlier divided into the street and the shop now is being unified, although perhaps not completely. A glance back to the Prologue will show what Middleton is getting at. In the Prologue, the entire stage was used for the cynical address of a character called Michaelmas Term, who shows how corrupt London's lawyers and law-schools are. At the end, the entire stage frames something better, a form of Justice that puts cynicism almost out of court.

An ironic twist is given to the 'shop-and-street' set-up in The Patient Man and the Honest Whore, where Candido's shop is replaced in the next scene with Bellafront's dressing room. Soon a third room is established—Hippolito's melancholy study. Each of these locations is introduced with the business of setting up the furniture and wares, and the point—that the tradesman, the whore, and the melancholic are engaging in similar trade—was probably reinforced by using one structure for all three locations. This would also be the curtained discovery space for the display of madmen at Bedlam hospital in the concluding scene, for the insane are put on display in much the same fashion as the wares of the various trades.

The idea running through all these examples of Middleton's staging is that theatrical spaces, costumes, properties, boys playing women, and adults playing more than one role must be read with a canny eye—the eye prepared for the pleasure and uncertainty of doubleness, reversal, and surprise, not the eye which looks for the security of settled identities. All theatre depends on a discrepancy between the sign that is made and the agent making the sign—between actor and character, between platform stage and fictional space—but Middleton's theatre carries the discrepancy further than we do, and plays with it harder. His theatre glories in the doubled and performed identity, turns it into the mode of production, and makes it one of the things the play is about.

The City As Theatre

The London of Middleton's time also had its non-commercial theatres, and these were sharply divided between the élite and the popular. Fabulously expensive masques were staged at Court, and word of these affairs, especially word of their cost, circulated through a public which never got to see one. What the public got to see were the great processional triumphs that marked events of political importance in London. The most elaborate of these was The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment staged by the City in 1604 to celebrate the accession of James I. The more frequent kind of civic procession was the annual triumph for the newly-elected Lord Mayor, whose ceremonial journeys through the city were accompanied by pageant wagons and chariots displaying allegorical conflicts between the forces of good and evil. Gordon Kipling and Glynne Wickham have shown that these City processions were the secular descendants of the great medieval craft cycles and other early processions, where the dominant ideology of a city was dramatized in an outpouring of industry and cooperation.

Students of Shakespeare rarely hear of the city pageants or read a court masque, for the simple reason that Shakespeare did not write for these occasions. Most playwrights of the time did write for them, however: there were careers to be made in these non-commercial venues, money to be earned, and alliances to be built up during a time when tensions between City and Court were beginning to reflect antagonisms that would eventually contribute to the outbreak of civil war.

Middleton was a City writer. Beginning in 1613, he produced seven of the day-long Lord Mayor's pageants, along with entertainments for such civic events as the opening of a new waterworks or shooting-day at Bunhill and speeches for festive banquets honouring City officials. After 1620 he was City Chronologer, responsible for recording important events in the life of London and for devising the kinds of shows included in the ten Honourable Entertainments of 1620-1. At Court he was probably best recognized for the half-dozen of his commercial-theatre plays which were brought in for command performances at Christmastime. When he did write for Court interests, it was usually on commission from the City. He helped the City welcome King James in 1604 and celebrate its new Prince of Wales in 1616; he wrote the masque which the City was asked to produce for the Somerset-Howard marriage in 1614. These commissions brought Middleton into contact with some of the truly private theatres of Jacobean London, the by-invitation-only theatres that were set up for the occasion in the centres of influence themselves, such as the Great Hall of the Inner Temple (Masque of Heroes) or Merchant Taylors' Hall (Masque of Cupids). Yet these were not court masques of the kind Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones were devising for the Banqueting House at Whitehall. Jonson and Jones were preparing their masques at the political centre of the nation, and the most powerful people in the land attended them, even performed in them at times. Middleton's masques were designed for the fringes of court influence. The World Tossed at Tennis was intended for royal eyes, but the prologue announces without dismay that this performance did not take place, and its stage life seems to have occurred in commercial theatres instead. Civitateis Amor, the show for the installation of the Prince of Wales, was written on behalf of the City and called upon the same pageant-ship used for the Lord Mayor's show a few days before.

Court masques do occur within Middleton's plays, as part of the plot. They are marked by a fierce irony. The double masque at the end of The Revenger's Tragedy—a repetition of a masque, the second group of dancers not realizing their murderous entertainment has just been danced by another group—is a grotesque piece of humour at the expense of court conventions. Women, Beware Women is structured by the outdoor procession near the beginning and the indoor masque at the end: the action moves from the comparative innocence of the procession (where Bianca, on the gallery, is spotted by the Duke's roving eye) to the corruption and violence of the court masque at the climax: Bianca is again 'above', but now she is joined with the Duke as a spectator, both of them to die in the general slaughter that concludes this play. The wedding entertainment in No Wit/Help like a Woman's, as David Bergeron has noted, burlesques the staging which had been used for Middleton's speech for the King in the royal entry of 1604. When No Wit/Help was later performed at Court the King would have had a chance to see the parody, although that does not mean he caught the joke.

Middleton's pageantry for the City was extensive and profitable. His seven Lord Mayor's shows formed a substantial part of his career, and his first, The Triumphs of Truth in 1613, was the most expensive ever staged in the City. Its total cost came to £1,300, about the same amount as it cost the King's Men to rebuild the Globe Theatre after it burned to the ground in the same year. To understand what kind of play these civic 'ridings' amounted to, one must think about drama that comes to its audience. The 'theatre' is the city itself, its streets lined with spectators, and the episodes of the 'play' are carried on pageant wagons or chariots that move past this audience, heralded by trumpeters and attendants dressed as giants or devils bent on clearing the way. Churchbells ring throughout the city, and sometimes wine flows in the conduits. Processional drama is fundamentally different from commercial drama because no admission is charged (a large difference) and because it moves through the city in a demonstration of the theory that the public is involved in the play.

Picture the scene at the Little Conduit in Cheapside, one of the stations where Londoners lined the streets and looked out of house windows on 29 October 1613 to see the show come along—as though the very buildings were bowing to the Lord Mayor, as The Owl's Almanac puts it. In Middleton's extravaganza, the Mayor was accompanied by five 'islands' pulled by porters and decked with 'all manner of Indian fruit trees, drugs, spiceries'. There was a baptized king of the Moors and his queen, their conversion having been wrought 'by the religious conversation of English merchants, factors, travellers'. (This year's Mayor was a Grocer, and the Grocers were trading overseas—hence the Indian islands and the baptized Moorish king.) Truth, made to look naked and slender, was riding in a chariot joined by Zeal and an Angel on horseback, this virtuous team going before the Mayor; behind him, trying to get at him, ruin him if possible, came Error in a chariot, with Envy 'eating of a human heart, mounted on a rhinoceros, attired in red silk, suitable to the bloodiness of her manners, her left pap bare, where a snake fastens, her arms half naked, holding in her right hand a dart tinted in blood'.

Now, at the Little Conduit, the procession approaches a grand pageant wagon containing London's Triumphal Mount. The Mount is large enough to hold London (represented as a grey-haired mother), Religion, Liberty, Perfect Love, Modesty, Knowledge, Chastity, Fame, Simplicity, and Meekness, along with the charitable and religious works of the twelve Great Companies of London, 'especially the worthy Company of Grocers'. But no one can see these personages and items yet. They are covered by a mist which emanates from four monsters of Error—Ignorance, Impudence, Falsehood, and Barbarism—crouched at the corners of the pageant. The fog of Error covers London and all its accomplishments.

The Lord Mayor's procession is still held, but most Londoners do not turn out for it. Readers of Middleton do not have much experience with this kind of show today. In Mardi Gras processions, Thanksgiving Day parades, and various Midsummer and May Day celebrations, elaborate pageants move through our cities, but usually no conflict is acted out by which the forces of evil try to get at a political leader. At the Little Conduit in Middleton's 1613 show, Truth rides up to the mist-shrouded pageant, says something right-minded and confident to those four monsters and Error, then waves a fan of stars she holds in her right hand, and (thanks to the workmanship of the designer John Grinkin) the cloud of mist rises to become a 'bright-spreading canopy, stuck thick with stars, and beams of gold shooting forth', revealing London and all her cohorts. Do not think Error is finished yet. The cloud descends in time for the entire procession to move on to the cross in Cheapside, where the fog-clearing magic of Truth works its wonders for another crowd of spectators, then to the Standard, then to St Laurence-Lane end, and so on to the Guildhall. Still, that is not all. The entire parade accompanies the Lord Mayor back to Paul's later in the day, then escorts him to his home in the evening. There, outside the Mayor's door, the climax to the entire day occurs when Zeal reduces Error to embers with a great blast of flame from his head—a fireworks display which one hopes the children were allowed to stay up for.

A Glance Ahead

The technical sophistication of the Lord Mayor's shows was obviously important to Middleton's career, and it is worth asking—of a playwright who had Zeal reduce Error to ashes with a burst of fireworks in 1613—where he stood in relation to the long-term development of scenic extravagance which has marked the history of western drama down to our own time. Eye-widening technology and costs that run beyond the imagining of the average citizen are staples of the commercial drama in New York and London today. Did Middleton's Lord Mayor's shows participate in the early stages of this trend?

When one thinks about the advances that were being made in the Court masque, one realizes the answer has to be no. The influential experiments in lighting, movable scenery, and perspective views were in the hands of Inigo Jones and his literary collaborators, especially Ben Jonson. These experiments were being carried out in the area of the theatre where Middleton worked least, the Court. His Lord Mayor's shows did borrow techniques from the masque, to be sure. Glynne Wickham has pointed out that the Lord Mayor's shows 'gave to humble citizens something of the pleasure latent in a change of scene which Inigo Jones was offering in his decorations of masques to those courtiers privileged to attend them'. But the distinction in audiences makes all the difference. At Court, there was already in place an essential element of the modern scenic theatre, an exclusive audience of wealth and privilege. The audience for Middleton's Lord Mayor's shows consisted of the populace rather than the King and his courtiers, and the theatre was London itself rather than the Banqueting House at Whitehall.

The question of Middleton's modernism becomes more pointed when one recalls that artificial lighting was being practised in another venue of his career, the roofed-over private playhouse. It is a long journey from the candlelight of St Paul's and the Blackfriars to the computerized lighting-boards of the Royal Shakespeare Company, but artificial lighting is the technique in both cases, and higher admission prices a means of affording it. We have noted that Middleton was well positioned for the move of the King's Men to Blackfriars in 1608, and this was a consequential move in the direction of wealth and privilege. As Peter Thomson remarks about the King's Men at the Blackfriars, 'by assuming a private face, the country's leading group of players carried further the drift from the popular theatre of the Middle Ages toward the minority theatre with which we are familiar today'.

So the question is whether the private theatres for which Middleton wrote were experimenting with scenic innovation during his time. It is perhaps surprising to discover (the theatre usually being a trend-following industry) that they were not. Middleton's private theatre plays do not reflect the technological flamboyance of his Lord Mayor's shows. When he did write masques into his plays, the technical effects are tinged with travesty, disaster, or bleak comedy, and he calls only for the kinds of effects (a descending god, smoke, a burning star) which had long been available in the commercial theatres. More generally, there is no evidence that movable scenery, perspective views, and the other staging effects that become possible once the potential of artificial lighting is exploited were practised by anyone at Blackfriars and the other private playhouses until about 1635–40, after Middleton's death.

Why were the crucial experiments being conducted at Court? Money is the first reason, and sight-lines are the second. The most expensive Lord Mayor's show could cost as much as building a commercial playhouse, but a court masque under James I would routinely run into four figures, enough to build a little cluster of playhouses. This was the kind of wealth required for changing the direction of the English theatre. Perhaps the most revealing thing about the arrangements for the court masque is the position of the best seat in the house. We have noted the position of royalty in the banqueting and masquing houses. King James was seated just the right distance away from the stage, and at just the right elevation, to enjoy the perfect sight-lines for the illusion of perspective depth on a proscenium-arch stage with artificial lighting. At the commercial theatres, the most expensive seats were close to the stage, in the thick of things: in the private boxes behind or to the sides of the stage (gallants even paid extra for stools placed on the stage in the private theatres). Middleton wrote for the thick of things, and it is unlikely that perfect sight-lines were often on his mind.

The major technological change that occurred in the theatre of Middleton's time, then, rather passed by his plays and could be seen in his civic processions as a vivid reflection from Court. In its fullest perspective, that major change sends the theatre in the direction of concentrated wealth, technological progress, and a minority audience. Middleton is not our contemporary when it comes to these things. Suppose that having Zeal reduce Error to ashes was not only showmanship. Suppose it was what the writer sought to bring about. 'Tis the excellency of a writer to leave things better than he finds 'em', he wrote in his preface to The Roaring Girl, and although the comment in context is ironic enough to be read several ways, the straightforward way carries far into Middleton's overall career. At a time when some London playwrights and designers were finding the royal purse open to them—and at a time, too, when major advances in scenic technique were being made via that same purse—Middleton built his career mainly in the playhouses and pageants of the City. It is likely that this satirist of unprincipled men in the freewheeling get-what-you-can scene of early Stuart London saw that leaving the City 'better than he found it' was of greater use than helping to create new theatre technology by keeping the sight-lines clear for the King.

SEE ALSO

List of works cited: Companion, 459

This page intentionally left blank

COLLECTED WORKS 1602-1627

This page intentionally left blank

THE PHOENIX

Edited by Lawrence Danson and Ivo Kamps

The Phoenix, As it hath been sundry times acted by the Children of Paul's, and presented before his Majesty': this is the potent advertising claim made on the title-page of the first printed edition (1607) of Thomas Middleton's first solo effort as a dramatist. That the play had been performed by the fashionable company of boy actors, and most of all that it had been performed before King James himself, were facts to recommend it to the book-buying public. As E. K. Chambers has noted, the most probable date of the performance before the King was 20 February 1604, so the play had to have been written before that. How long before? Topical allusions open only a small window of opportunity. Characters crack sardonic jokes about the cheapness of an aristocratic title—in Scene 6, for instance, Falso asks, 'Daughter, what gentleman might this be?' and she replies, 'No gentleman, sir, he's a knight'—jokes which take their point from King James's wholesale creation of knighthoods as he progressed from Edinburgh to London in the spring of 1603 to assume his English throne. And in the play's opening speech, the old Duke says, 'Forty-five years I've gently ruled this dukedom'. Elizabeth I had reigned for forty-five years when, following her death on 24 March 1603, James VI of Scotland became also James I of England. The Phoenix is, then, in various senses a Jacobean play: it was written in the first year of James's reign; it was performed at court in James's presence; and (going now beyond external circumstances) it is imbued with the anxiety and optimism of that time of political transition.

The play's engagement with this transition begins with its title and the name of its hero. To a Renaissance audience, the 'phoenix' bird suggested death but also renewal and rebirth. The bird, as legend had it, was periodically consumed by fire, but always miraculously rose anew from its ashes, a singular process suggesting that the whole kind (genus) of the phoenix was contained in the individual bird. The phoenix became a convenient image of royal succession in England, and Elizabeth I was especially so portrayed in art and literature. Contemplating the Queen's death, Fletcher and Shakespeare were to write in 1613 that when 'The bird of wonder dies—the maiden phoenix— | Her ashes new create another heir | As great in admiration as herself' (All is True; or Henry VIII 5.4.40–2). The new 'heir' was of course James I, and the point of the passage is that although England mourns the loss of its Virgin Queen, 'the Dignity' or 'singularity of the royal office' lives on in James—'Dignitas nunquam perit, individua vero quotidie pereunt, the Dignity never perishes, although individuals die every day' (Kantorowicz).

In Scene 1 of Middleton's play, the old ruler is not quite dead but certainly dying. His son and heir, Phoenix, to prepare himself for the succession, disguises his royalty, gives out the false news that he will be travelling in foreign countries, and, with his sidekick Fidelio, begins to explore his own territory, a place called 'Ferrara', where characters bearing Italian-sounding type-names participate in actions wholly native to the England of 1603. As a prince-in-disguise, Phoenix not only inserts himself into the life of his subjects, but into theatre history. He is one of several such disguised rulers on the Jacobean stage: the most notable others are Shakespeare's Duke Vincentio in Measure for Measure and Marston's Malevole in The Malcontent. Scholars have argued the question of historical priority, but there is in fact no way to be sure which playwright first used the device.

The Phoenix's membership in the class of disguised-ruler plays has, in this century, been one of its chief claims to fame—unfortunately, since the differences between Shakespeare's dramaturgy and Middleton's are more striking than the similarities; and because, given Shakespeare's prestige, the comparison inevitably introduces Shakespearean standards which are, at best, irrelevant to Middleton's practice and which, at worst, obscure or distort it. This much, however, Measure for Measure and The Phoenix have in common: their disguised rulers are an odd combination of the disarmingly ordinary (both Phoenix and Vincentio can be naïve or even bumbling, as when Phoenix finds himself in the dark with the Jeweller's Wife in Scene 13), and the politically powerful, their disguised omnipresence giving them an almost magical power to oversee and intervene in the affairs of their subjects. Phoenix, like Shakespeare's Duke, undergoes his own education; but as he does so he creates the image of an all-pervasive, all-surveilling power of the kind that might produce a politically effective anxiety in even the most obscure justice of the peace.

Recent scholarship has been critical of the figure of the ruler in disguise. Measure for Measure's 'duke of dark corners', for instance, is viewed as a manipulative ruler who arouses anxiety in his subjects for the benefit of an oppressive culture. In The Phoenix, however, ducal surveillance and anxiety-arousing practices take on positive connotations; that is, Middleton appears to be capitalizing on the widespread, and perhaps excessive, expectations people had of the new King's abilities to transform English society for the better. Phoenix goes incognito to 'look into the heart and bowels of this dukedom' and 'mark all abuses ready for reformation or punishment' (1.102–4), but his efforts to clean up the legal system, stop sexual perversions, and avert a murder plot against his father are more obviously beneficial to the people than Vincentio's moralizing and callous manipulation of Isabella. If in Measure for Measure we, like Angelo and Isabella, learn to fear the hidden power of the spying Duke, in Middleton's play we are made to feel that an all-seeing, God-like authority is necessary to protect the people from a multitude of abuses. The reigning Duke of Ferrara says as much before transferring power to Prince Phoenix in the closing scene:

State is but blindness; thou hadst piercing art:
We only saw the knee, but thou the heart.
To thee then power and dukedom we resign;
He's fit to reign whose knowledge can refine.
(15.179–82)

The old Duke directly blames his own 'blindness' for the chaos in his dukedom; in sharp contrast to Vincentio who knew exactly what was going on in Vienna (he merely felt uncomfortable intervening directly), it is the Duke of Ferrara's inability to see, his ignorance, that has allowed corruption and treason to flourish. Phoenix's better sight is therefore crucial to Ferrara's health; but in Vienna the Duke's undercover escapades are primarily designed to stage and reassert his power. Hence, The Phoenix and Measure for Measure may draw on the same basic ruler-in-disguise motif, but they do so to different effects: Shakespeare may make us look anxiously over our shoulder; Middleton makes us feel that indeed we 'can sleep so soundly' knowing 'what watch the King keeps to maintain the peace' (Henry V 4.1.265, 280).

Comparisons to Shakespeare can only go so far. In the realm of character, for instance, nothing in The Phoenix reminds us of the tense psychosexual sparring of Angelo and Isabella. However, what Middleton extraordinarily accomplishes in this early play must be understood in its own terms and according to its own generic norms.

Those terms may be elusive for modern readers who see dramatic effects either as realistic or as allegorical, lifelike or symbolic, psychological or social. So Middleton has in this century been praised for the racy, cynical, richly individualized language of the Captain, and it has even been claimed—plausibly enough—that this remarkable character is drawn from life: Middleton's stepfather, Thomas Harvey, was a seafaring man, constantly in need of money which he tried to get by legal plunder of his wife, Anne Middleton. But the comically disturbing Scene 8, in which the Captain literally sells his wife, shows how, in Middleton's drama, an apparent imitation of the rough surface of daily life becomes ingeniously and richly symbolic of wider social issues. Middleton here shockingly literalizes the idea of woman as commodity and of marriage as a transaction of property. The Captain's very matter-of-factness as he carries out the grotesque action not only makes him a memorable character (in all senses of the word); it enacts Middleton's satiric idea, that in this nominal 'Ferrara', human beings have become equated with commodities and moral values with financial.

Middleton's language can be as cunningly double as his action. When the Lady protests, 'Have you no sense, neither of my good name | Or your own credit?' (8.5–6), her husband's response hinges on a quintessential Middletonian pun:

Credit? Pox of credit,
That makes me owe so much. It had been Better for me by a thousand royals
I had lost my credit seven year ago.
'T'as undone me; that's it that makes me fly:
What need I to sea else, in the spring time,
When woods have leaves, to look upon bald oak?
Happier that man, say I, whom no man trusts;
It makes him valiant, dares outface the prisons,
Upon whose carcass no gowned raven jets:
O, he that has no credit owes no debts.
'Tis time I were rid on't. (8.6–17)

The Captain finds profit in being a man without either moral or financial 'credit': credit is trust, trust begets debt, so having good credit is a liability to this impecunious man who would prefer to exchange his chaste wife for ready cash.

Since his wife is concerned not only about his 'credit' but also about her 'good name' (Castiza or 'chastity'), we might expect her to separate the spiritual and material, or moral and financial, faces of the words 'credit' and 'chastity'. Instead they become, in her response, even more intricately implicated:

O, why do you
So wilfully cherish your own poison,
And breathe against the best of life, chaste credit?
Well may I call it chaste, for like a maid,
Once falsely broke, it ever lives decayed.
O, captain, husband, you name that dishonest
By whose good power all that are honest live;
What madness is it to speak ill of that,
Which makes all men speak well. Take away credit,
By which men amongst men are well reputed,
That man may live, but still lives executed. (8.17–27)

Now credit and chastity have become equated: both, once lost, can never be regained; both have been given value as commodities. All honest things, the Lady says, live by credit—and lest we think that she has succeeded in removing her 'credit' from the commercial realm where the Captain has placed his, she concludes with a pun on 'executed', meaning both 'killed' and 'signed, sealed, and delivered in law'.

But this scene's success does not depend only on verbal handy-dandy. The characters' disconcerting insistence on literalizing in action the rigidified logic implied in their punning language creates a bizarre, almost dream-like effect. If Shakespeare's Angelo astonishes us by his ability to look inward, the Captain astonishes us by his resistance to having any place inward to look.

The wife-selling scene in this early play already reveals many of Middleton's most characteristic dramatic skills. One is the deadpan presentation of a villainy all the more shocking for being made to seem only the way of the world. Here, Phoenix watches as Fidelio, disguised as a scrivener, is forced to read aloud the elaborate bill of his mother's sale. While Fidelio reads, the Captain counts his money and interjects the occasional huckster's line. The contract is addressed 'To all good and honest Christian people, to whom this present writing shall come', and delivers 'all the right, estate, title, interest, demand, possession, and term of years to come, which I the said captain have, or ought to have...[i]n and to Madonna Castiza, my most virtuous, modest, loving, and obedient wife—', and the Captain breaks in, 'By my troth, my lord, and so she is—three, four, five, six, seven—' (8.87–101). And it proceeds:

FIDELIO 'In primis, the beauties of her mind, chastity, temperance, and, above all, patience—'

CAPTAIN You have bought a jewel, i'faith, my lord—
nine-and-thirty, forty—

FIDELIO 'Excellent in the best of music, in voice delicious; in conference wise and pleasing; of age contentful, neither too young to be apish, nor too old to be sottish—'

CAPTAIN You have bought as lovely a penny-worth, my lord, as ere you bought in your life. (8.108–17)

The racy, specialized language of Middleton's rogues is more dramatically inventive than the highfalutin editorializing with which Prince Phoenix responds. But as a figure (however distantly suggested) for a newly installed reform-minded monarch, his speeches are worth listening to. Of the Captain's wife-selling, Phoenix says:

Of all deeds yet, this strikes the deepest wound
Into my apprehension.
Reverend and honourable matrimony,
Mother of lawful sweets, unshamed mornings,
Dangerless pleasures, thou that mak'st the bed
Both pleasant and legitimately fruitful: without thee,
All the whole world were soiled bastardy.
Thou art the only and the greatest form,
That put'st a difference between our desires
And the disordered appetites of beasts,
Making their mates those that stand next their lusts.
(8.164–74)

Phoenix puts a different social value on matrimony than the Captain does—but still it is a social value, literally a 'form' which defines the 'lawful' and makes order out of actions which, in every outward way, are identical to the 'disordered appetites of beasts'. 'Matrimony' puts the exchange-value of sex under civic control; it creates the difference between 'soiled bastardy' and the 'legitimately fruitful' upon which other exchanges (including, for instance, Prince Phoenix's succession to his dying father's throne) depend. In Middleton, social value is not merely a surface covering a deeper reality, an externality that hides a more real internality; it creates form, meaning, difference, and thereby puts the 'human' in human life.

The plot of The Phoenix is episodic: it's one damned (literally) thing after another until the grand recognition scene when Phoenix reveals himself and metes out punishment. The various plots are linked, first of all by Phoenix's supervision of them, and second by interlocking character affiliations: for instance, the corrupt Justice Falso becomes the guardian (and would-be sexual partner) of his niece, who happens to be Fidelio's beloved; the Jeweller's Wife is Falso's daughter; the Captain tries to sell his wife to Proditor, who is also the aspiring assassin of the old Duke; and Tangle, who is Falso's competitor in legal shenanigans, draws up the bill of sale.

Of the villainies Phoenix encounters, Proditor's plot to assassinate the Duke (he hires Phoenix to be his hit man) is nominally the most heinous but dramatically less interesting than the actions involving what we might call society's middle class. Abuses of the legal system—abuses which Middleton himself might have encountered, and which he might look to a new monarch to reform—are especially prominent. The play is full of law-Latin and legalese. Scene 9, in which Justice Falso and the litigious Tangle engage in a legal as well as actual fencing match, is energetically ingenious and, for all its absurdity, frightening. In another instance of literalizing theatricality, the corrupt justice and the 'villainous law-worm' (4.44–5) try to outduel each other with rapiers, while simultaneously trying to outmanoeuvre one another as if in a court of law. Legal words are weapons, the legal system a deadly game.

Abuses of the law and of sexual relations are closely related in the play, and both sorts of abuse are caught up in the satiric logic of commodification. In their adulterous affair, the Knight and the Jeweller's Wife use pet-names for one another: he is 'Pleasure' and she is 'Revenue'—where the 'pleasure' he supplies in exchange for her 'revenue' is social advancement as well as sexual gratification. In the final scene, when Phoenix brings each of the villains to book, the Jeweller's Wife is arraigned in terms that figure her sexual adventuring as a crime against the fabric of society (15.230–42). She is 'one of those | For whose close lusts the plague never leaves the city'; she deceives her 'husband, the world's eye, and the law's whip'; with her citizen gold she maintains aristocrats 'whom the court rejects'; she reverses the economic priorities of the gender system ('Now few but are by their wives' copies free'), and erases social distinctions ('now we see | City and suburbs wear one livery'). Like other anxious (male) Jacobean satirists, Middleton here seems to judge unconstrained female sexuality the opening wedge in the decline of civilization.

Adultery, incest, wife-selling, rampant theft, treason, bribery, social levelling, and attempted murder: these are some of the specific transgressions Phoenix encounters. In the register of fantastic satire they represent the actual social milieu in which the play was written. The last

- INFESTO
His judgement is a father to his youth.
- PRODITOR [aside]
Ay, I would he were from court.
- INFESTO
20 Our largest hopes grow in him.
- PRODITOR
And 'tis the greatest pity, noble lord,
He is untravelled.
- LUSSURIOSO 'Tis indeed, my lord.
- PRODITOR
Had he but travel to his time and virtue—[Aside] O, he should ne'er return again.
- DUKE
25 It shall be so: what is in hope begun,
Experience quickens; travel confirms the man,
Who else lives doubtful, and his days oft sorry;
Who's rich in knowledge has the stock of glory.
- PRODITOR
Most true, my royal lord.
- DUKE
30 Someone attend our son.
Enter Prince Phoenix, attended by Fidelio
- INFESTO
See, here he comes, my lord.
- DUKE
O, you come well.
- PHOENIX
'Tis always my desire, my worthy father.
- DUKE
Your serious studies, and those fruitful hours 35 That grow up into judgement, well become Your birth, and all our loves. I weep that you are my son,
But virtuously I weep, the more my gladness.
We have thought good and meet, by the consent
Of these our nobles, to move you toward travel, 40 The better to approve you to yourself,
And give your apter power foundation:
To see affections actually presented,
E'en by those men that owe them, yields more profit,
Ay, more content, than singly to read of them,
45 Since love or fear make writers partial.
The good and free example which you find
In other countries, match it with your own,
The ill to shame the ill, which will in time
Fully instruct you how to set in frame
A kingdom all in pieces.
- PHOENIX
50 Honoured father,
With care and duty I have listened to you.
What you desire, in me it is obedience;
I do obey in all, knowing for right,
- Experience is a kingdom's better sight.
- PRODITOR
O, 'tis the very lustre of a prince.
55 Travel! 'Tis sweet and generous.
- DUKE
He that knows how to obey, knows how to reign;
And that true knowledge have we found in you.
Make choice of your attendants.
- PHOENIX They're soon chosen;
[Indicating Fidelio] Only this man, my lord, a loving 60 servant of mine.
- DUKE
What, none but he?
- PHOENIX I do entreat no more,
For that's the benefit a private gentleman
Enjoys beyond our state, when he notes all,
Himself unnoted.
65 For should I bear the fashion of a prince,
I should then win more flattery than profit;
And I should give 'em time and warning then
To hide their actions from me; if I appear a sun,
They'll run into the shade with their ill deeds, 70 And so prevent me.
- PRODITOR [aside]
A little too wise, a little too wise to live long.
- DUKE
You have answered us with wisdom: let it be.
Things private are best known through privacy.
- Exeunt*
- Manent Phoenix and Fidelio*
- PHOENIX
Stay you, my elected servant.
- FIDELIO My kind lord.
- PHOENIX
75 The duke my father has a heavy burden
Of years upon him.
- FIDELIO
My lord, it seems so, for they make him stoop.
- PHOENIX
Without dissemblance he is deep in age,
He bows unto his grave. I wonder much Which of his wild nobility it should be 80 (For none of his sad council has a voice in't)
Should so far travel into his consent
To set me over into other kingdoms
Upon the stroke and minute of his death?
- FIDELIO
85 My lord, 'tis easier to suspect them all,
Than truly to name one.
- PHOENIX Since it is thus,
By absence I'll obey the duke my father,
And yet not wrong myself.

19 from away from

23 to in addition to

26 quickens enlivens

28 stock of glory wealth of heaven

30.1 Phoenix (See Critical Introduction.)Fidelio faithful

40 approve you to make proof of

41 apter naturally well-suited

42 affections passions, appetites

43 owe own

44 singly only

46 free generous

49 set in frame restore order in

63 state high position

70 prevent forestall

74 elected chosen

81 sad serious, grave

83 set me over send me

So by my lord's firm policy we may see,
To present view, what absent forms would be. Exit

Sc. 2

Enter the Captain with soldiering fellows

FIRST SOLDIER There's noble purchase, captain.
SECOND SOLDIER Nay, admirable purchase.
THIRD SOLDIER Enough to make us proud forever.
CAPTAIN Hah?
5 FIRST SOLDIER Never was opportunity so gallant.
CAPTAIN Why, you make me mad.
SECOND SOLDIER Three ships, not a poop less.
THIRD SOLDIER And every one so wealthily burdened, upon my manhood.
10 CAPTAIN Pox on't, and now am I tied e'en as the devil would ha't.
FIRST SOLDIER Captain, of all men living, I would ha' sworn thou wouldst ne'er have married.
CAPTAIN 'Sfoot, so would I myself, man. Give me my due;
15 you know I ha' sworn all heaven over and over.
FIRST SOLDIER That you have, i'faith.
CAPTAIN Why, go to, then.
FIRST SOLDIER Of a man that has tasted salt water to commit such a fresh trick.
20 CAPTAIN Why 'tis abominable, I grant you, now I see't.
FIRST SOLDIER Had there been fewer women—
SECOND SOLDIER And among those women fewer drabs—
THIRD SOLDIER And among those drabs fewer pleasing—CAPTAIN Then 't'ad been something.
25 FIRST SOLDIER But when there are more women, more common, pretty sweethearts, than ever any age could boast of—
CAPTAIN And I to play the artificer and marry: to have my wife dance at home, and my ship at sea, and both 30 take in salt water together. O, lieutenant, thou'rt happy, thou keepest a wench.
FIRST SOLDIER I hope I am happier than so, captain, for o'
my troth, she keeps me.
CAPTAIN How? Is there any such fortunate man breathing?
35 And I so miserable to live honest? I envy thee lieutenant,
I envy thee, that thou art such a happy knave.
Here's my hand among you; share it equally; I'll to sea with you.
SECOND SOLDIER There spoke a noble captain.
40 CAPTAIN Let's hear from you. There will be news shortly.

2.0.1 soldiering fellows soldiers on board a ship (distinguished from sailors) 1 purchase booty
10-11 as the devil would ha't (i.e., the converse of the commonplace that marriages are made in heaven)
14 'Sfoot by God's foot (a mild oath)
19 fresh unsophisticated
22 drabs prostitutes
28 artificer an artful or wily person, a trickster
30 salt lecherous, salacious salt water (In the wife's case, salt water alludes to her lover's semen.)
32-3 o' my troth upon my truth, or honesty

FIRST SOLDIER Doubt it not, captain.
Exeunt [all but Captain]

CAPTAIN What lustful passion came aboard of me that I should marry—was I drunk? Yet that cannot altogether hold, for it was four o'clock i'th' morning. Had it been five, I would ha' sworn it. That a man is in danger 45 every minute to be cast away, without he have an extraordinary pilot that can perform more than a man can do! And to say truth, too, when I'm abroad what can I do at home? No man living can reach so far.
And what a horrible thing 'twould be to have horns 50 brought me at sea, to look as if the devil were i'th' ship; and all the great tempests would be thought of my raising—to be the general curse of all merchants.
And yet they likely are as deep in as myself, and that's a comfort. O, that a captain should live to be married!
55 Nay, I that have been such a gallant salt-thief should yet live to be married. What a fortunate elder brother is he, whose father being a rammish plowman, himself a perfumed gentleman, spending the labouring reek from his father's nostrils in tobacco, the sweat of his father's 60 body in monthly physic for his pretty queasy harlot;
he sows apace i'th' country; the tailor o'ertakes him i'th' city; so that oftentimes before the corn comes to earring, 'tis up to the ears in high collars, and so at every harvest the reapers take pains for the mercers—65 ha! Why this is stirring happiness indeed. Would my father had held a plow so and fed upon squeezed curds and onions, that I might have bathed in sensuality. But he was too ruttish himself to let me thrive under him;
consumed me before he got me, and that makes me 70 so wretched now to be shackled with a wife, and not greatly rich, neither.

Enter his Lady

LADY Captain, my husband.
CAPTAIN 'Slife, call me husband again and I'll play the captain and beat you. 75
LADY
What has disturbed you, sir, that you now look
So like an enemy upon me?
CAPTAIN
Go, make a widower, hang thyself.
LADY
How comes it that you are so opposite

35 honest virtuously
49 do (in the sexual sense)
50 horns (Cuckolds were said to wear horns on the brow.)
56 salt-thief pirate
58 rammish having a rank smell
60 tobacco (On the Renaissance stage, London fops were often represented as avid 'tobacco drinkers'.) 61 monthly physic (possibly a form of birth control, or a medicine for menstrual pains, or a medicine for venereal disease) queasy sickly or nauseated 64 earring maturing to the point where the corn is ready to be picked up... collars (A pun on the ears of corn and the ears of the brother, who is wearing expensive high-ruffed collars.) 65 mercers dealers in textile fabrics, especially in silks, velvets, and other expensive materials
69 ruttish lustful
70 consumed me spent my inheritance wastefully
72.1 Lady (Also called Castiza: her name means 'chaste'.)
74 'Slife God's life (a mild oath)
74-5 play the captain (Discipline on board was enforced by the captain.)

Scene 2

The Phœnix.

80 To love and kindness? I deserve more respect,
But that you please to be forgetful of it.
For love to you did I neglect my state,
Chide better fortunes from me,
Gave the world talk, laid all my friends at waste.

CAPTAIN
85 The more fool you. Could you like none but me?
Could none but I supply you?
I am sure you were sued to by far worthier men,
Deeper in wealth and gentry.
What could'st thou see in me to make thee dote 90 So on me, if I know I am a villain?
What a torment's this? Why didst thou marry me?
You think, as most of your insatiate widows,
That captains can do wonders, when, 'las,
The name does often prove the better man.

LADY
95 That which you urge should rather give me cause
To repent than yourself.

CAPTAIN Then to that end,
I do't.

LADY What a miserable state Am I led into?
Enter Servus

CAPTAIN How now, sir?
SERVUS Count Proditor
Is now alighted. [Exit Servus]

100 CAPTAIN What! My lord? I must Make much of him; he'll one day write me cuckold.
'Tis good to make much of such a man;
E'en to my face, he plies it hard—I thank him.
Enter Proditor
What, my worthy lord!

PRODITOR I'll come to you
In order, captain. [Kisses Lady]

105 CAPTAIN [aside] O, that's in order:
A kiss is the gamut to pricksong.

PRODITOR
Let me salute you, captain. [Exit Lady]

CAPTAIN My dear
Esteemèd count, I have a life for you.

PRODITOR
Hear you the news?

CAPTAIN What may it be, my lord?

PRODITOR
110 My lord, the duke's son, is upon his travel
To several kingdoms.

CAPTAIN May it be possible, my lord,
And yet so little rumoured?
PRODITOR Take't of my truth;
Nay, 'twas well managed, things are as they are handled:
But all my care is still, pray heaven, he return
Safe, without danger, captain.

CAPTAIN Why, is there
115 Any doubt to be had of that, my lord?

PRODITOR Ay, by my faith, captain.
Princes have private enemies, and great.
Put case a man should grudge him for his virtues,
Or envy him for his wisdom: why, you know 120 This makes him lie bare-breasted to his foe.

CAPTAIN That's full of certainty, my lord. But who
Be his attendants?

PRODITOR Thence, captain, comes the fear.
But singly attended, neither—[aside] my best gladness—
Only by your son-in-law, Fidelio. 125

CAPTAIN Is it to be believed? I promise you, my lord, then I begin to fear him myself. That fellow will undo him. I durst undertake to corrupt him with twelve pence over and above, and that's a small matter. H'as a whorish conscience, he's an inseparable knave, and I could ne'er 130 speak well of that fellow.

PRODITOR All we of the younger house, I can tell you, do doubt him much. The lady's removed; shall we have your sweet society, captain?

CAPTAIN Though it be in mine own house, I desire I may 135 follow your lordship.

PRODITOR I love to avoid strife.
[Aside] Not many months Phoenix shall keep his life.
Exit

CAPTAIN
So, his way is in; he knows it:
We must not be uncourteous to a lord. 140 Warn him our house 'twere vile; his presence is an honour. If he lie with our wives, 'tis for our credit;
we shall be the better trusted; 'tis a sign we shall live i'th' world. O, tempests and whirlwinds! Who but that man whom the forefinger cannot daunt, that makes 145 his shame his living—who but that man, I say, could endure to be thoroughly married? Nothing but a divorce can relieve me. Any way to be rid of her would rid my torment. If all means fail, I'll kill or poison her, and 81 But that except that

82 state rank

84 Gave ... talk gave the world cause for gossip

86 supply to furnish something needed or desired (here with sexual connotation)

88 gentry class of well-born people just below the nobility

94 name reputation

99.1 Servus servant

100 alighted dismounted, arrived

101 write me cuckold make a cuckold out of me

103 plies it hard works hard at it (i.e., cuckolding)

106 gamut the first or lowest note in the medieval scale of music

pricksong music sung from notes written or 'pricked'; sexual intercourse

108 I ... you my life is at your disposal

118 private secret

119 Put case suppose that

127 to fear him to fear for him

130 an inseparable knave (Fidelio is inseparable from his whorish conscience.)

132 the younger house (the Ferraran House of Commons)

133 doubt fear

141 Warn him to bar him from

143-4 live i'th' world live well

145 the forefinger (i.e., pointing in scorn at a cuckold)

150 purge my fault at sea. But first I'll make gentle try of a divorce: but how shall I accuse her subtle honesty?
I'll attach this lord's coming to her—take hold of that,
ask counsel: and now I remember, I have acquaintance with an old crafty client, who by the puzzle of suits and 155 shifting of courts has more tricks and starting holes than the dizzy pates of fifteen attorneys—one that has been muzzled in law like a bear and led by the ring of his spectacles from office to office.
Him I'll seek out with haste; all paths I'll tread, 160 All deaths I'll die ere I die married. Exit

Sc. 3 Enter Proditor with Lady (the Captain's wife)

PRODITOR

Puh, you do resist me hardly.

LADY

I beseech your lordship, cease in this.

'Tis never to be granted. If you come as a friend unto my honour and my husband, you shall be ever welcome; if 5 not, I must entreat it—

PRODITOR Why, assure yourself, madam, 'tis not the fashion.

LADY

'Tis more my grief, my lord; such as myself
Are judged the worse for such.

PRODITOR

Faith, you're too nice:

You'll see me kindly forth.

10 LADY

And honourably welcome.

Exeunt

Sc. 4 Enter a Groom before Phoenix and Fidelio [in disguise], alighting into an inn

GROOM Gentlemen, you're most neatly welcome.

PHOENIX You're very cleanly, sir; prithe, have a care to our geldings.

GROOM Your geldings shall be well considered.

5 FIDELIO Considered?

PHOENIX Sirrah, what guests does this inn hold now?

GROOM Some five-and-twenty gentlemen, besides their beasts.

PHOENIX Their beasts?

10 GROOM Their wench, I mean, sir; for your worship knows those that are under men are beasts.

PHOENIX How does your mother, sir?

GROOM Very well in health; I thank you heartily, sir.

PHOENIX And so is my mare, i'faith.

15 GROOM I'll do her commendations indeed, sir.

FIDELIO Well kept up, shuttlecock.

PHOENIX But what old fellow was he that newly alighted before us?

GROOM Who, he? As arrant a crafty fellow as e'er made water on horseback: some say he's as good as a 20 lawyer—marry, I'm sure he's as bad as a knave. If you have any suits in law, he's the fittest man for your company. He's been so towed and lugged himself, that he is able to afford you more knavish counsel for ten groats than another for ten shillings. 25

PHOENIX A fine fellow; but do you know him to be a knave, and will lodge him?

GROOM Your worship begins to talk idly. Your bed shall be made presently. If we should not lodge knaves, I wonder how we should be able to live honestly. Are there honest 30 men enough, think you, in a term-time to fill all the inns in the town? And, as far as I can see, a knave's gelding eats no more hay than an honest man's—nay, a thief's gelding eats less, I'll stand to't. His master allows him a better ordinary—yet I have my eightpence, day and 35 night. 'Twere more for our profit, Iwis, you were all thieves, if you were so contented. I shall be called for:
give your worships good morrow. [Exit]

PHOENIX A royal knave, i'faith. We have happened into a godly inn. 40

FIDELIO Assure you, my lord, they belong all to one church.

PHOENIX [Seeing Tangle in the doorway] This should be some old, busy, turbulent fellow: villainous law-worm, that eats holes into poor men's causes. 45

Enter Tangle with two Suitors [and Groom]

FIRST SUITOR May it please your worship to give me leave?

TANGLE I give you leave, sir; you have your veniam. Now fill me a brown toast, sirrah.

GROOM Will you have no drink to't, sir?

TANGLE Is that a question in law? 50

GROOM Yes, in the lowest court, i'th' cellar, sir.

TANGLE Let me ha't removed presently, sir.

GROOM It shall be done, sir. [Exit]

TANGLE Now as you were saying, sir—I'll come to you immediately, too. 55

PHOENIX O, very well, sir.

TANGLE I'm a little busy, sir.

FIRST SUITOR But as how, sir?

TANGLE I pray, sir?

FIRST SUITOR He's brought me into the court; marry, my adversary has not declared yet. 60

TANGLE Non declaravit adversarius, sayst thou? What a villain's that. I have a trick to do thee good: I will 151 subtle cunning

honesty chastity

152 attach seize (with legal sense of taking into custody)

155 starting holes loopholes

3.1 hardly strongly

9 nice coy, reserved

4.0.2 alighting arriving

1 neatly (the first of the Groom's malapropisms)

14 mare (pun on the French word for mother, mere)

19–20 made water urinated

25 groats coins worth four pence each shillings coins worth twelve pence each (one twentieth of a pound sterling)

31 term-time periods when courts of law are in session

35 ordinary a regular daily meal or allowance of food

36 Iwis certainly

47 veniam permission to do something

52 removed to transfer a cause or person for trial from one court of law to another

61 declared to make a declaration or statement of claim as plaintiff in an action

62 Non declaravit adversarius your adversary hasn't declared

65 get thee out a proxy, and make him declare with a pox to him.
 FIRST SUITOR That will make him declare to his sore grief.
 I thank your good worship. But put case he do declare?
 TANGLE Si declarasset, if he should declare there—
 FIRST SUITOR I would be loath to stand out to the judgement of that court.
 70 TANGLE Non ad iudicium? Do you fear corruption? Then I'll relieve you again; you shall get a supersedeas non molestandum, and remove it higher.
 FIRST SUITOR Very good.
 75 TANGLE Now if it should ever come to a testificandum, what be his witnesses?
 FIRST SUITOR I little fear his witnesses.
 TANGLE Non metuis testes? More valiant man than Orestes!
 FIRST SUITOR [gives money] Please you, sir, to dissolve this into wine, ale, or beer. I come a hundred mile to you, I protest, and leave all other counsel behind me.
 TANGLE Nay, you shall always find me a sound card; I stood not o' th' pillory for nothing in eighty-eight; all the world knows that. Now let me dispatch you, sir; I come to you presenter.
 85 SECOND SUITOR Faith, the party hath removed both body and cause with a habeas corpus.
 TANGLE Has he that knavery? But has he put in bail above, canst tell?
 90 SECOND SUITOR That, I can assure your worship, he has not.
 TANGLE Why, then, thy best course shall be to lay out more money, take out a procedendo, and bring down the cause and him with a vengeance.
 95 SECOND SUITOR Then he will come as indeed.
 TANGLE As for the other party, let the audita querela alone; take me out a special supplicavit, which will cost you enough, and then you pepper him. For the first party, after the procedendo you'll get costs; the cause being found, you'll have a judgement; nunc pro tunc, you'll get a venire facies to warn your jury, a decem tales to fill up the number, and a capias ut lagatum for your execution.

 SECOND SUITOR I thank you, my learned counsel.
 PHOENIX What a busy caterpillar's this? Let's accost him in that manner. 105
 FIDELIO Content, my lord.
 PHOENIX O, my old, admirable fellow, how have I all this while thirsted to salute thee? I knew thee in octavo of the duke— 110
 TANGLE In octavo of the duke: I remember the year well.
 PHOENIX By th' mass, a lusty, proper man.
 TANGLE O, was I?
 PHOENIX But still in law.
 TANGLE Still in law? I had not breathed else now; 'tis very marrow, very manna to me to be in law: I'd been dead ere this else. I have found such sweet pleasure in the vexation of others, that I could wish my years over and over again, to see that fellow a beggar, that bawling knave a gentleman—a matter brought e'en to a judgement today, as far as e'er 'twas to begin again tomorrow: O, raptures! Here a writ of demur, there a procedendo, here a sursurrara, there a capiendo, tricks, delays, money-laws. 120
 PHOENIX Is it possible, old lad? 125
 TANGLE I have been a term-trotter myself any time this five-and-forty years; a goodly time and a gracious in which space I ha' been at least sixteen times beggared, and got up again, and in the mire again, that I have stunk again, and yet got up again. 130
 PHOENIX And so clean and handsome now?

67 put case suppose
 68 Si declarasset if he should declare 69 stand out to endure to the end, hold out against 71 Non ad iudicium not to the judgement
 72-3 supersedeas non molestandum writs staying proceedings at law because one of the parties is under the king's protection
 75 testificandum testifying
 78 Non metuis testes you don't fear witnesses
Orestes In Greek mythology, son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra who avenged the death of his father by killing his mother.
 82 sound card a person whose agency will ensure success
 82-3 I... pillory (Standing in the pillory was a punishment for men who made a living by giving false evidence.)
 83 eighty-eight (1588, proverbial date for 'the old days', from the year when the Spanish Armada was defeated)

85 presenter immediately
 87 habeas corpus a writ requiring the body of a person to be brought before the judge or into the court
 88 above in a higher court
 93 procedendo a writ issued by a superior court directing an inferior court to proceed to a final hearing
 96 audita querela a writ initiating a process to introduce new evidence on behalf of the defendant after completion of the trial.
 97 supplicavit a writ for taking surety of the peace against a person 100 found judged
nunc pro tunc now for then (i.e., not at the legally appointed time) 101 venire facies a writ directed to a sheriff requiring him to summon a jury to try a cause decem tales a supply of men (in this case ten) to fill the jury 102 capias ut lagatum a writ commanding an officer to arrest an outlawed person

103 execution to put in force the sentence that the law has given 109-10 in octavo... duke in the eighth year of the duke's reign 112 lusty cheerful, lively proper handsome 114 still always 116 marrow rich and nutritious food manna food miraculously provided for the Israelites in the wilderness (Exodus 16:14-36)
 122 demur a motion to delay or suspend action because of a point of difficulty which the court must decide 123 sursurrara (Anglicized variant of certiorari) a writ, issuing from a superior court, upon the complaint of a party that he has not received justice in an inferior court, by which the records of the cause are called up for trial in the superior court capiendo a writ of arrest
 126 term-trotter one who frequented London in term-time

TANGLE You see it apparently; I cannot hide it from you.
 Nay, more, in felici hora be it spoken, you see I'm old, yet have I at this present nine-and-twenty suits in law.
 135 PHOENIX Deliver us, man!
 TANGLE And all not worth forty shillings.
 PHOENIX May it be believed?
 TANGLE The pleasure of a man is all.
 PHOENIX An old fellow, and such a stinger?
 140 TANGLE A stake pulled out of my hedge, there's one. I was well beaten, I remember; that's two. I took one abed with my wife against her will; that's three. I was called cuckold for my labour; that's four. I took another abed again; that's five. Then one called me wittol; that's six.
 145 He killed my dog for barking; seven. My maid-servant was knocked at that time; eight. My wife miscarried with a push; nine; and sic de ceteris. I have so vexed and begged the whole parish with process, subpoenas, and suchlike molestations, they are not able to spare so 150 much ready money from a term as would set up a new weathercock; the churchwardens are fain to go to law with the poor's money.
 PHOENIX Fie, fie.
 TANGLE And I so fetch up all the men every term-time, that 155 'tis impossible to be at civil cuckoldry within ourselves, unless the whole country rise upon our wives.
 FIDELIO O' my faith, a pretty policy.
 PHOENIX Nay, an excellent stratagem. But of all I most wonder at the continual substance of thy wit, that 160 having had so many suits in law from time to time, thou hast still money to relieve 'em.
 FIDELIO He's the best fortune for that; I never knew him without.
 TANGLE Why do you so much wonder at that? Why, this 165 is my course: my mare and I come up some five days before a term.
 PHOENIX A good decorum.
 TANGLE Here I lodge, as you see, amongst inns and places of most receipt—170 PHOENIX Very wittily.
 TANGLE By which advantage I dive into countrymen's causes, furnish 'em with knavish counsel, little to their profit, buzzing into their ears this course, that writ this office, that ultimum refugium—as you know I have 175 words enough for the purpose.
 PHOENIX Enough i' conscience, i' faith.
 TANGLE Enough i' law, no matter for conscience. For which busy and laborious sweating courtesy, they cannot choose but feed me with money, by which I 180 maintain mine own suits. Ho, ho, ho.
 PHOENIX Why, let me hug thee—caper in mine arms.

[They caper around the stage]

TANGLE Another special trick I have—nobody must know it—which is to prefer most of those men to one attorney whom I affect best, to answer which kindness of mine, he will sweat the better in my cause, and do them the 185 less good. Take 't of my word, I helped my attorney to more clients the last term than he will dispatch all his life time: I did it.
 PHOENIX What a noble, memorable deed was there!
Enter Groom
 GROOM Sir. 190
 TANGLE Now, sir.
 GROOM There's a kind of captain very robustiously inquires for you.
 TANGLE For me? A man of war? A man of law is fit for a man of war; we have no leisure to say prayers; we 195 both kill o' Sunday mornings. [To Phoenix] I'll not be long from your sweet company.
 PHOENIX O, no, I beseech you. Exit Tangle [with Groom]
 FIDELIO What captain might this be?
 PHOENIX
 Thou angel sent amongst us, sober Law,
 Maid with meek eyes, persuading action,
 No loud immodest tongue, voiced like a virgin,
 And as chaste from sale,
 Save only to be heard, but not to rail:
 How has abuse deformed thee to all eyes,
 205 That where thy virtues sat, thy vices rise?
 Yet why so rashly for one villain's fault
 Do I arraign whole man? Admirèd law,
 Thy upper parts must needs be sacred, pure,
 And incorruptible; they're grave and wise. 210
 'Tis but the dross beneath 'em, and the clouds
 That get between thy glory and their praise,
 That make the visible and foul eclipse.
 For those that are near to thee are upright,
 As noble in their conscience as their birth; 215
 Know that damnation is in every bribe,
 And rarely put it from 'em; rate the presenters,
 And scourge 'em with five years imprisonment,
 For offering but to tempt 'em.
 Thus is true justice exercised and used: 220
 Woe to the giver when the bribe's refused.
 'Tis not their will to have law worse than war,
 Where still the poor'st die first;
 To send a man without a sheet to his grave,
 Or bury him in his papers. 225
 'Tis not their mind it should be, nor to have
 A suit hang longer than a man in chains,
 Let him be ne'er so fastened. They least know
 That are above the tedious steps below.

133 felici hora in a happy hour
 135 Deliver us tell us 144 wittol a man who knows of his wife's adultery and tolerates it 146 knocked beaten
 147 sic de ceteris so with the rest 151 churchwardens laymen who execute a church's business 155 within among 169 receipt most frequented

 174 ultimum refugium last refuge 183 prefer introduce or recommend 192 robustiously boisterously

203 as...sale (i.e., the law, like a virgin, is not for sale)
 217 presenters bribers
 224 sheet winding sheet
 225 papers legal documents
 227 suit law suit, with pun on clothes

230 I thank my time, I do.
 FIDELIO I long to know what captain this should be.
 PHOENIX See where the bane of every cause returns.
Enter Tangle with Captain
 FIDELIO 'Sfoot, 'tis the captain, my father-in-law, my lord.
 PHOENIX Take heed.
 235 CAPTAIN The divorce shall rest then, and the five hundred crowns shall stand in full force and virtue.
 TANGLE Then do you wisely, captain.
 CAPTAIN Away sail I, fare thee well.
 TANGLE A lusty crack of wind go with thee.
 240 CAPTAIN But ah!
 TANGLE Hah?
 CAPTAIN Remember, a scrivener.
 TANGLE I'll have him for thee. [Exit Captain] Why, thus am I sought after by all professions. Here's 245 a weatherbeaten captain, who not long since new married to a lady widow, would now fain have sued a divorce between her and him, but that her honesty is his only hinderance: to be rid of which, he does determine to turn her into white money; and there's a lord, his 250 chapman, has bid five hundred crowns for her already.
 FIDELIO How?
 TANGLE Or for his part, or whole, in her.
 PHOENIX Why, does he mean to sell his wife?
 TANGLE His wife? Ay, by th' mass, he would sell his soul 255 if he knew what merchant would lay out money upon
 't—and some of 'em have need of one, they swear so fast.
 PHOENIX Why, I never heard of the like.
 TANGLE Non audivisti, didst ne'er hear of that trick? Why, 260 Pistor, a baker, sold his wife t'other day to a cheesemonger, that made cake and cheese; another to a cofferer; a third to a common player. Why, you see 'tis common.
 Ne'er fear the captain; he has not so much wit to be a precedent himself. I promised to furnish him with an 265 odd scrivener of mine own, to draw the bargain and sale of his lady. Your horses stand here, gentlemen.
 PHOENIX Ay, ay, ay.
 TANGLE I shall be busily plunged till towards bedtime above the chin in profundis. Exit

PHOENIX What monstrous days are these? 270
 Not only to be vicious most men study,
 But in it to be ugly; strive to exceed
 Each other in the most deformèd deed.
 FIDELIO Was this her private choice? Did she neglect
 The presence and opinion of her friends, for this? 275
 PHOENIX I wonder who that one should be,
 Should so disgrace that reverend name of lord,
 So loathsomely to buy adultery?
 FIDELIO We may make means to know.
 PHOENIX Take courage, man; we'll beget some defence. 280
 FIDELIO I am bound by nature.
 PHOENIX I by conscience.
 To sell his lady! Indeed, she was a beast
 To marry him, and so he makes of her.
 Come, I'll thorough now I'm enterèd. Exeunt

Enter Jeweller's Wife with a Boy

Sc. 5

JEWELLER'S WIFE Is my sweet knight coming? Are you certain he's coming?
 BOY Certain, forsooth. I am sure I saw him out of the barber's shop, ere I would come away.
 JEWELLER'S WIFE A barber's shop? O, he's a trim knight. 5
 Would he venture his body into a barber's shop when he knows 'tis as dangerous as a piece of Ireland? O, yonder, yonder, he comes. Get you back again and look you say as I advised you.
Enter Knight
 BOY You know me, mistress. 10
 JEWELLER'S WIFE My mask, my mask.
[Exit Boy, after giving her a mask]
 KNIGHT My sweet Revenue!
 JEWELLER'S WIFE My Pleasure, welcome. I have got single.
 None but you shall accompany me to the justice of 15 peace, my father's.
 KNIGHT Why, is thy father justice of peace, and I not know it?

235 rest remain to be dealt with 236 crowns coins worth five shillings each 239 crack...wind fart
 249 white money silver coins 250 chapman a man whose business is buying and selling 252 part, or whole (Tangle paraphrases a bill of sale, and puns on 'whole/hole', with sexual connotation.)
 257 fast steadfastly 259 Non audivisti You didn't hear 260 Pistor baker
 261 cofferer a builder of boxes or chests 269 profundis the depths (i.e. of legal matters)

275 presence company 282 beast a human being controlled by sexual appetite
 284 thorough (go) through 5.1 knight (Originally a mounted soldier in service to the king, and in chivalry one who serves a lady, the title here indicates one of those newly raised to the knighthood by King James I. See Critical Introduction and 6.148, 9.2-4.) 3 forsooth truly out of come out of 4 barber's shop (Barbers also pulled teeth and did minor medical operations.) 5 trim stylish (punning on 'freshly barbered') 7 dangerous... Ireland (For the previous nine years, Ireland had been in an almost constant state of rebellion against the occupying English.) 11 mask (Small masks were worn by ladies of fashion as a sign of modesty, but also as an allure, and possibly to hide the scars of smallpox.) 12-13 Revenue... Pleasure (The endearments spell out the terms of the relationship: the impetuous knight takes money from the middle-class woman, who takes sexual pleasure and social preferment in return.)

JEWELLER'S WIFE My father! I'faith, sir, ay; simply though I stand here a citizen's wife, I am a justice of peace's daughter.

KNIGHT I love thee the better for thy birth.

[Enter the Knight's Lackey]

JEWELLER'S WIFE Is that your lackey yonder, in the steaks of velvet?

KNIGHT He's at thy service, my sweet Revenue, for thy money paid for 'em.

JEWELLER'S WIFE Why, then, let him run a little before, I beseech thee, for, o' my troth, he will discover us else.

KNIGHT He shall obey thee; before sirrah, trudge.

[Exit Lackey]

But do you mean to lie at your father's all night?

JEWELLER'S WIFE Why should I desire your company else?

KNIGHT 'Sfoot, where shall I lie then?

JEWELLER'S WIFE What an idle question's that? Why, do you think I cannot make room for you in my father's house as well as in my husband's? They're both good for nothing else.

KNIGHT A man so resolute in valour as a woman in desire were an absolute leader. Exeunt

Sc. 6 Enter two suitors with the Justice Falso

FIRST SUITOR May it please your good worship, master justice—

FALSO Please me and please yourself; that's my word.

FIRST SUITOR The party your worship sent for will by no means be brought to appear.

FALSO He will not? Then what would you advise me to do therein?

FIRST SUITOR Only to grant your worship's warrant, which is of sufficient force to compel him.

FALSO No, by my faith! You shall not have me in that trap. Am I sworn justice of peace, and shall I give my warrant to fetch a man against his will? Why, there the peace is broken. We must do all quietly; if he come he's welcome, and, as far I can see yet, he's a fool to be absent—[aside] ay, by this gold is he, which he gave me this morning.

FIRST SUITOR Why, but may it please your good worship—

FALSO I say again, please me and please yourself; that's my word still.

FIRST SUITOR Sir, the world esteems it a common favour, upon the contempt of the party, the justice to grant his warrant.

FALSO Ay, 'tis so common, 'tis the worse again; 'twere the better for me 'twere otherwise.

FIRST SUITOR I protest, sir, and this gentleman can say as much, it lies upon my half undoing.

FALSO I cannot see yet that it should be so—I see not a cross yet.

FIRST SUITOR I beseech your worship show me your immediate favour, and accept this small trifle but as a remembrance to my succeeding thankfulness. [Offers money]

FALSO Angels? I'll not meddle with them. You give 'em to my wife, not to me.

FIRST SUITOR Ay, ay, sir.

FALSO But, I pray, tell me now, did the party viva voce, with his own mouth, deliver that contempt, that he would not appear, or did you but jest in't?

FIRST SUITOR Jest? No, o' my troth, sir, such was his insolent answer.

FALSO And do you think it stood with my credit to put up such an abuse? Will he not appear, says he? I'll make him appear with a vengeance. Latronello!

[Enter Latronello]

LATRONELLO Does your worship call?

FALSO Draw me a strong-limbed warrant for the gentleman speedily. He will be bountiful to thee. Go and thank him within.

FIRST SUITOR I shall know your worship hereafter.

Exeunt [Suitors with Latronello]

FALSO Ay, ay, prithee do. Two angels one party, four another; and I think it a great spark of wisdom and policy—if a man come to me for justice—first to know his griefs by his fees, which be light and which be heavy.
He may counterfeit else, and make me do justice for nothing. I like not that, for when I mean to be just, let me be paid well for't: the deed so rare, purges the bribe.

[Enter Furtivo]

How now? What's the news thou art come so hastily?
How fares my knightly brother?

FURTIVO Troth, he ne'er fared worse in his life, sir. He ne'er had less stomach to his meat since I knew him.

FALSO Why, sir?

FURTIVO Indeed, he's dead, sir.

FALSO How, sir?

FURTIVO Newly deceased, I can assure your worship. The tobacco-pipe new dropped out of his mouth before I took horse—a shrewd sign. I knew then there was no way but one with him. The poor pipe was the last man he took leave of in this world, who fell in three pieces before him, and seemed to mourn inwardly, for it looked as black i'th' mouth as my master.

FALSO Would he die so like a politician, and not once write his mind to me?

FURTIVO No, I'll say that for him, sir; he died in the perfect state of memory, made your worship his full and whole 22-3 steaks of velvet (velvet decorations, in thick strips like steaks, inset in his garment)

27 discover reveal

6.o.1 Falso false

21 upon . . . party when a person summoned before the court refuses to appear

26 it lies upon it is a matter of 28 cross coin bearing a cross stamped upon it; also, a coin generally

33 Angels gold coins worth ten shillings each

36 viva voce with the living voice

43 Latronello little thief

55.1 Furtivo furtive, sly

59 stomach . . . meat appetite for food

65-6 no . . . one (i.e., he must die)

69 black . . . mouth (because of (a) speaking slander or (b) the tobacco's tar)

70 like a politician cunningly

75 executor, bequeathing his daughter, and with her all his wealth only to your disposition.
 FALSO Did he make such a godly end, sayest thou? Did he die so comfortably, and bequeath all to me?
 FURTIVO Your niece is at hand, sir, the will, and the witnesses.
 80 FALSO What a precious joy and comfort's this, that a justice's brother can die so well—nay, in such a good and happy memory—to make me full executor. Well, he was too honest to live, and that made him die so soon. Now, I beshrew my heart, I am glad he's in heaven, has left all his cares and troubles with me, and that great vexation of telling of money. Yet I hope he had 85 so much grace before he died to turn his white money into gold, a great ease to his executor.
 [Enter Niece and two Gentlemen]
 FURTIVO See, here comes your niece, my young mistress, 90 sir.
 FALSO Ah, my sweet niece, let me kiss thee, and drop a tear between thy lips. One tear from an old man is a great matter; the cocks of age are dry. Thou hast lost a virtuous father, to gain a notable uncle.
 NIECE
 95 My hopes now rest in you next under heaven.
 FALSO
 Let 'em rest, let 'em rest.
 FIRST GENTLEMAN
 Sir—
 FALSO
 You're most welcome ere ye begin, sir.
 FIRST GENTLEMAN
 We are both led by oath and dreadful promise
 Made to the dying man at his last sense, 100 First to deliver these into your hands,
 The sureties and revealers of his state.
 [Gives papers to Falso] FALSO Good.
 FIRST GENTLEMAN
 With this his only daughter and your niece,
 Whose fortunes are at your disposing set;
 Uncle and father are in you both met.
 105 FALSO Good, i'faith, a well-spoken gentleman; you're not an esquire, sir?
 FIRST GENTLEMAN Not, sir.
 FALSO Not sir? More's the pity. By my faith, better men than you are, but a great many worse. You see I have 110 been a scholar in my time, though I'm a justice now.

Niece, you're most happily welcome, the charge of you is wholly and solely mine own; and since you are so fortunately come, niece, I'll rest a perpetual widower.
 NIECE
 I take the meaning chaster than the words;
 Yet I hope well of both, since it is thus: 115
 His phrase offends least that's known humorous.
 FALSO [reading the will] 'I make my brother,' says he, 'full and whole executor'—honestly done of him i'faith. Seldom can a man get such a brother. And here again says he, very virtuously, 'I bequeath all to him and his 120 disposing'—an excellent fellow. O' my troth, would you might all die no worse, gentlemen.
 Enter Knight with Jeweller's Wife
 FIRST GENTLEMAN But as much better as might be.
 KNIGHT Bless your uprightness, master justice,
 FALSO You're most soberly welcome, sir. [Jeweller's Wife 125 kneels] Daughter, you've that ye kneel for; rise, salute your weeping cousin.
 JEWELLER'S WIFE Weeping cousin?
 NIECE Ay, cousin.
 KNIGHT [speaking apart with Jeweller's Wife] Eye to weeping 130 is very proper, and so is the party that spake it, believe me, a pretty, fine, slender, straight, delicate-knit body. O, how it moves a pleasure through our senses! How small are women's waists to their expenses! I cannot see her face, that's under water yet. 135
 JEWELLER'S WIFE News as cold to the heart as an old man's kindness: my uncle dead?
 NIECE
 I have lost the dearest father.
 FALSO [reading the will] 'If she marry by your consent, choice and liking, make her dowry five thousand 140 crowns.' [Aside] Hum, five thousand crowns? Therefore by my consent she shall ne'er marry. I will neither choose for her, like of it, nor consent to't.
 KNIGHT [aside] Now, by the pleasure of my blood, a pretty cousin. I would not care if I were as near kin to her as 145 I have been to her kinswoman.
 FALSO Daughter, what gentleman might this be?
 JEWELLER'S WIFE No gentleman, sir, he's a knight.
 FALSO Is he but a knight? Troth, I would a' sworn he'd been a gentleman. To see, to see, to see! 150
 JEWELLER'S WIFE He's my husband's own brother, I can tell you, sir.
 FALSO Thy husband's brother? Speak certainly, prithe.

83 honest virtuous
 93 cocks tearducts
 98 dreadful reverential
 99 sense moments of consciousness
 101 sureties those who make themselves liable for another's debts
 106 esquire a man belonging to the higher order of gentry, ranking immediately below a knight
 116 humorous whimsical, odd, quaint

130-1 Eye ... proper it is proper for an eye to weep
 144 blood (the supposed seat of animal or sensual appetite)
 145 cousin kinswoman (here niece)
 148 No ... knight Between his ascension and December 1604, James I almost tripled the number of knights in the realm, thereby cheapening the aura of the rank. The Jeweller's Wife refers to this cheapening when she states that the knight, who outranks a gentleman, is no gentleman.

 151 my ... brother (This is the only indication in the play that the Knight is related to the Jeweller; it makes possible the double entendre in the Jeweller's Wife's next line.)

155 JEWELLER'S WIFE I can assure you, father, my husband and he have lain both in one belly.

FALSO I'll swear then he is his brother indeed, and by the surer side. I crave hearty pardon, sweet kinsman, that thou hast stood so long unsaluted in the way of kindred. Welcome to my board; I have a bed for thee.

160 My daughter's husband's brother shall command Keys of my chests and chambers—I have stable For thy horse, chamber for thyself, And a loft above for thy lousy lackey. All sit, away with handkerchiefs, dry up eyes; At funeral we must cry; now let's be wise.

Exeunt [all but Knight and Jeweller's Wife]

JEWELLER'S WIFE I told you his affection.

KNIGHT It falls sweetly.

JEWELLER'S WIFE But here I bar you from all plots tonight; The time is yet too heavy to be light.

KNIGHT Why, I'm content, I'll sleep as chaste as you, And wager night by night who keeps most true.

JEWELLER'S WIFE Well, we shall see your temper. Exeunt

Sc. 7 Enter Phoenix and Fidelio [putting on new disguises]

PHOENIX Fear not me, Fidelio; become you that invisible rope-maker, the scrivener, that binds a man as he walks, yet all his joints at liberty, as well as I'll fit that common folly of gentry, the easy-affecting venturer, and no doubt our purpose will arrive most happily.

5 FIDELIO Chaste duty, my lord, works powerfully in me, and rather than the poor lady my mother should fall upon the common side of rumour to beggar her name, I would not only undergo all habits, offices, disguised professions, though e'en opposite to the temper my blood holds, but in the stainless quarrel of her reputation, alter my shape forever.

10 PHOENIX I love thee wealthier, thou hast a noble touch. And by this means, which is the only safe means to preserve thy mother from such an ugly land- and sea-monster as a counterfeit captain is, he resigning and basely selling all his estate, title, right, and interest in his lady, as the form of the writing shall testify. At 15 What otherwise can follow but to have

A lady safe delivered of a knave?

FIDELIO I am in debt my life to the free goodness of your inventions.

PHOENIX O, they must ever strive to be so good; Who sells his vow is stamped the slave of blood.

Exeunt

Enter Captain, his Lady following him

Sc. 8

CAPTAIN Away!

LADY Captain, my husband—

CAPTAIN Hence, we're at a price for thee, at a price, Wants but the telling, and the sealing; then—

LADY Have you no sense, neither of my good name Or your own credit?

5 CAPTAIN Credit? Pox of credit, That makes me owe so much. It had been Better for me by a thousand royals I had lost my credit seven year ago. 'T'as undone me; that's it that makes me fly: 10 What need I to sea else, in the spring time, When woods have leaves, to look upon bald oak? Happier that man, say I, whom no man trusts; It makes him valiant, dares outface the prisons, Upon whose carcass no gowned raven jets: 15 O, he that has no credit owes no debts. 'Tis time I were rid on't.

LADY O, why do you So wilfully cherish your own poison, And breathe against the best of life, chaste credit? Well may I call it chaste, for like a maid, 20 Once falsely broke, it ever lives decayed. O, captain, husband, you name that dishonest By whose good power all that are honest live; What madness is it to speak ill of that, Which makes all men speak well. Take away credit, 25 By which men amongst men are well reputed, That man may live, but still lives executed. O, then show pity to that noble title Which else you do usurp. You're no true captain, To let your enemies lead you—foul disdain, 30 And everlasting scandal: O, believe it! The money you receive for my good name

156-7 the surer side (proverbially, the mother's side)	gentlemen	22 inventions inventiveness; creative devices
166 affection disposition	easy-affecting venturer careless investor	24 blood passion
169 heavy grave	5 arrive turn out	8.4 Wants lacks light happy, wanton	6 Chaste virtuous	telling counting
7.1 become you pretend to be	8 common vulgar	6 Pox (an exclamation of irritation or impatience)
2 scrivener notary (The disguise would probably include an inkhorn worn at his waist and a pen behind his ear.)	beggar impoverish	8 royals gold coins worth fifteen shillings
3 fit take the shape of	9 habits clothing	14 outface to face boldly or defiantly
4 gentry class immediately below nobility;	13 noble touch (like pure gold tested against a touchstone)	15 gowned raven (a judge or lawyer, who wears black robes)
	20 of from	jets to strut, swagger
	21 my life throughout my life

Will not be half enough to pay your shame.
 CAPTAIN
 No, I'll sell thee then to the smock. See, here comes
 My honourable chapman.
Enter Proditor [and Lackey]
 35 LADY O, my poison!
 Him, whom mine honour and mine eye abhors. Exit
 PRODITOR
 Lady—what so unjovially departed?
 CAPTAIN [aside] Fine she-policy; she makes my back her bolster, but before my face she not endures him. Tricks!
 PRODITOR
 40 Captain, how haps it she removed so strangely?
 CAPTAIN
 O, for modesty's cause awhile, my lord,
 She must restrain herself; she's not yours yet.
 Beside, it were not wisdom to appear Easy before my sight.
 45 Faugh! Wherefore serves modesty but to pleasure a lady now and then, and help her from suspect? That's the best use 'tis put to.
 PRODITOR Well observed of a captain.
 CAPTAIN No doubt you'll be soon friends, my lord.
 50 PRODITOR I think no less.
 CAPTAIN And make what haste I can to my ship; I durst wager you'll be under sail before me.
 PRODITOR A pleasant voyage, captain.
 CAPTAIN Ay, a very pleasant voyage as can be. I see 55 the hour is ripe. Here comes the prison's bawd, the bond-maker, one that binds heirs before they are begot.
 PRODITOR And here are the crowns, captain. [Giving money]
 [To Lackey] Go, attend. Let our bay courser wait.
Enter Phoenix and Fidelio, both disguised LACKEY It shall be obeyed. [Exit]
 60 CAPTAIN [aside to Fidelio] A farmer's son, is't true?
 FIDELIO [aside to the Captain] Has crowns to scatter.
 CAPTAIN I give you your salute, sir.
 PHOENIX I take it not unthankfully, sir.
 CAPTAIN I hear a good report of you, sir—you've money.
 65 PHOENIX I have so, true.
 CAPTAIN An excellent virtue.
 PHOENIX [aside] Ay, to keep from you—hear you me, captain? I have a certain generous itch, sir, to lose a few angels in the way of profit: 'tis but a game at 70 tennis,
 Where, if the ship keep above line, 'tis three to one;

If not, there's but three hundred angels gone.
 CAPTAIN Is your venture three hundred? You're very preciously welcome; here's a voyage toward will make us all— 75
 PHOENIX [aside] Beggarly fools and swarming knaves.
 PRODITOR [aside] Captain, what's he?
 CAPTAIN [aside to Proditor] Fear him not, my lord, he's a gull, he ventures with me; some filthy farmer's son. The father's a Jew, and the son a gentleman: faugh!— 80 PRODITOR [aside to the Captain] Yet he should be a Jew, too, for he is new come from giving over swine.
 CAPTAIN [aside to Proditor] Why, that in our country makes him a gentleman.
 PRODITOR Go to, tell your money, captain. 85
 CAPTAIN Read aloft, scrivener. One, two—FIDELIO [reading the deed] 'To all good and honest Christian people, to whom this present writing shall come: know you for a certain, that I, captain, for and in the consideration of the sum of five hundred crowns, have 90 clearly bargained, sold, given, granted, assigned and set over, and by these presents do clearly bargain, sell, give, grant, assign and set over, all the right, estate, title, interest, demand, possession, and term of years to come, which I the said captain have, or ought to 95 have—'
 PHOENIX [aside] If I were as good as I should be—FIDELIO 'In and to Madonna Castiza, my most virtuous, modest, loving, and obedient wife—'
 CAPTAIN By my troth, my lord, and so she is—three, four, 100 five, six, seven—
 PHOENIX [aside] The more slave he that says it, and not sees it.
 FIDELIO 'Together with all and singular those admirable qualities with which her noble breast is furnished.' 105 CAPTAIN Well said, scrivener, hast put 'em all in? You shall hear now, my lord.
 FIDELIO 'In primis, the beauties of her mind, chastity, temperance, and, above all, patience—'
 CAPTAIN You have bought a jewel, i'faith, my lord— 110
 nine-and-thirty, forty—
 FIDELIO 'Excellent in the best of music, in voice delicious;
 in conference wise and pleasing; of age contentful, neither too young to be apish, nor too old to be 115 sottish—'
 CAPTAIN You have bought as lovely a penny-worth, my lord, as ere you bought in your life.

34 smock a woman's undergarment 39 bolster pillow (The captain means that when his back is turned, his wife is much friendlier toward Proditor.) 40 strangely in an unfriendly manner
 46 from suspect from being suspected 49 friends lovers
 55-6 prison's...begot (i.e., the bail bondsman, like a pimp, caters to every debtor, whose children are born already owing him money)
 58 courser a spirited or swift horse
 69-71 'tis...line This is a complicated image which refers, first, to the line on an Elizabethan tennis court wall (the ball had to hit above the line to remain in play), and second, to shipping (where the 'line' refers to the proper line of flotation, the 'water line', when the ship is fully laden).

 71 three...one (a profit of three to one on his investment)
 73 venture investment
 74 toward approaching 80 Jew (intended prejudicially: someone cunning and greedy)

82 giving over giving up 83-4 Why...gentleman (a gibe at the expense of upwardly mobile yeoman farmers and their sons)
 86 aloft in a lofty tone
 92 these presents these words or documents 102 slave a common term of abuse
 108 In primis first 114-15 neither...sottish (i.e., neither so young as to be affected, nor so old as to be doltish)
 116 penny-worth bargain

PRODITOR Why should I buy her else, captain?
 120 FIDELIO 'And, which is the best of a wife, a most comfortable sweet companion—'
 CAPTAIN I could not afford her so, i'faith, but that I am going to sea, and have need of money.
 FIDELIO 'A most comfortable sweet companion—'
 PRODITOR What, again? The scrivener reads in passion.
 125 FIDELIO I read as the words move me. Yet if that be a fault it shall be seen no more—'which said Madonna Castiza lying, and yet being in the occupation of the said captain—'
 CAPTAIN Nineteen—occupation? Pox on't, out with occupation, a captain is of no occupation, man.
 130 PHOENIX [aside] Nor thou of no religion.
 FIDELIO Now I come to the habendum: 'to have and to hold, use and—'
 CAPTAIN
 Use? Put out use, too, for shame, 135 Till we are all gone, I prithee.
 FIDELIO 'And to be acquitted of and from all former bargains, former sales—'
 CAPTAIN Former sales?—nine-and-twenty, thirty—by my troth my lord, this is the first time that ever I sold her.
 140 PRODITOR Yet the writing must run so, captain.
 CAPTAIN Let it run on then—nine-and-forty, fifty—FIDELIO 'Former sales, gifts, grants, surrenders, re-entries—'
 CAPTAIN For re-entries, I will not swear for her.
 145 FIDELIO 'And furthermore, I the said, of and for the consideration of the sum of five hundred crowns to set me a board before these presents utterly disclaim for ever any title, estate, right, interest, demand, or possession, in or to the said Madonna Castiza, my late virtuous and unfortunate wife.'
 150 PHOENIX [aside] Unfortunate indeed, that was well placed.
 FIDELIO 'As also neither to touch, attempt, molest, or encumber any part, or parts whatsoever, either to be named or not to be named, either hidden or unhidden, 155 either those that boldly look abroad, or those that dare not show their faces—'
 CAPTAIN Faces? I know what you mean by faces; scrivener, there's a great figure in faces.
 FIDELIO 'In witness whereof, I the said captain have interchangeably set to my hand and seal, in presence of all these, the day and date above written.'
 160 CAPTAIN Very good, sir, I'll be ready for you presently—four hundred and twenty, one, two, three, four, five—
 PHOENIX [aside]
 Of all deeds yet, this strikes the deepest wound
 165 Into my apprehension.

Reverend and honourable matrimony,
 Mother of lawful sweets, unshamed mornings,
 Dangerless pleasures, thou that mak'st the bed
 Both pleasant and legitimately fruitful: without thee,
 All the whole world were soiled bastardy. 170
 Thou art the only and the greatest form,
 That put'st a difference between our desires
 And the disordered appetites of beasts,
 Making their mates those that stand next their lusts.
 Then, with what base injury is thy goodness paid! 175
 First, rare to have a bride commence a maid,
 But does beguile joy of the purity,
 And is made strict by power of drugs and art,
 An artificial maid, a doctored virgin,
 And so deceives the glory of his bed: 180
 A foul contempt against the spotless power
 Of sacred wedlock. But if chaste and honest,
 There is another devil haunts marriage—
 None fondly loves but knows it—jealousy,
 That wedlock's yellow sickness, 185
 That whispering separation every minute,
 And thus the curse takes his effect or progress.
 The most of men in their first sudden furies
 Rail at the narrow bounds of marriage,
 And call 't a prison; then it is most just, 190
 That the disease o' th' prison, jealousy,
 Should still affect 'em. But O! Here I am fixed
 To make sale of a wife, monstrous and foul,
 An act abhorred in nature, cold in soul.
 Who that has man in him could so resign 195
 To make his shame the posy to the coin?

CAPTAIN
 Right, i'faith, my lord, fully five hundred.
 PRODITOR I said how you should find it, captain; and with this competent sum you rest amply contented.
 CAPTAIN Amply contented. 200
 FIDELIO Here's the pen, captain: your name to the sale.
 CAPTAIN 'Sfoot, dost take me to be a penman? I protest I could ne'er write more than A, B, C, those three letters, in my life.
 FIDELIO Why, those will serve, captain. 205
 CAPTAIN I could ne'er get further.
 PHOENIX Would you have got further than A, B, C? [Aside]
 Ah, Base Captain, that's far enough, i'faith.
 FIDELIO Take the seal off, captain.
 CAPTAIN It goes on hardly, and comes off easily. 210
 PHOENIX [aside] Ay, just like a coward.
 FIDELIO Will you write witness, gentleman?
 CAPTAIN He? He shall; prithee come and set thy hand for witness, rogue—thou shall venture with me?

124 in passion sorrowfully
 127 occupation possession (with sexual connotation)
 132 habendum to have and to hold 134 Use (use sexually)
 142-3 re-entries the re-entering upon possession of lands, tenements, etc., previously granted or let to others

144 re-entries (the Captain's meaning is sexual) 158 great figure zero
 171 form the essential determinant principle of a thing (in scholastic philosophy)
 178 strict tight (referring to the bride's genitalia)

178-9 power...virgin artificial means by which women who had lost their virginity were made to appear as virgins
 184 fondly foolishly
 185 yellow (a colour often associated with jealousy)
 196 posy a motto or short inscription

Scene 8

The Phœnix.

215 PHOENIX Nay, then I ha' reason, captain, that commands me. [Writes]
CAPTAIN [aside] What a fair fist the pretty whoreson writes, as if he had had manners and bringing up: a farmer's son? His father damns himself to sell musty corn, while 220 he ventures the money. 'Twill prosper well at sea—no doubt he shall ne'er see't again.
FIDELIO So, captain, you deliver this as your deed?
CAPTAIN As my deed, what else, sir?
PHOENIX [aside] The ugliest deed that e'er mine eye did 225 witness.
CAPTAIN So, my lord, you have her; clip her, enjoy her;
she's your own. And let me be proud to tell you now, my lord, she's as good a soul, if a man had a mind to live honest, and keep a wench, the kindest, sweetest, 230 comfortablest rogue—
PRODITOR [aside to Captain]
Hark in thine ear,
The baser slave art thou, and so I'll tell her.
I love the pearl thou sold'st, hate thee the seller.
Go, to sea, the end of thee—is lousy.
CAPTAIN
235 This is fine work, a very brave end, hum—
PRODITOR [aside]
Well thought upon, this scrivener may furnish me.
[He takes Fidelio aside]
PHOENIX [aside]
Why should this fellow be a lord by birth,
Being by blood a knave?—one that would sell
His lordship if he liked her ladyship.
240 FIDELIO Yes, my lord?
PHOENIX What's here now?
PRODITOR I have employment for a trusty fellow, bold, sure—
FIDELIO What if he be a knave, my lord?
245 PRODITOR There thou com'st to me—why he should be so,
and men of your quill are not unacquainted.
FIDELIO Indeed all our chief living, my lord, is by fools and knaves. We could not keep open shop else: fools that enter into bonds, and knaves that bind 'em.
250 PRODITOR [talking apart with Fidelio] Why, now we meet.
FIDELIO And as my memory happily leads me, I know a fellow of a standing estate, never flowing:
I durst convey treason into his bosom,
And keep it safe nine years.
PRODITOR A goodly time.
FIDELIO
255 And, if need were, would press to an attempt,
And cleave to desperate action.
PRODITOR That last fits me;
Thou hast the measure right. Look I hear from thee.
FIDELIO
With duteous speed.

PRODITOR Expect a large reward.
I will find time of her to find regard. Exit
CAPTAIN The end of me is lousy?
FIDELIO [aside to Phoenix]
O, my lord!
I have strange words to tell you.
PHOENIX [aside to Fidelio] Stranger yet?
I'll choose some other hour to listen to thee;
I am yet sick of this. Discover quickly.
FIDELIO [aside to Phoenix]
Why, will you make yourself known, my lord?
PHOENIX [aside to Fidelio] Ay. 260
Who scourgeth sin, let him do't dreadfully.
CAPTAIN
Pox of his dissemblance: I will to sea.
PHOENIX [aside] Nay, you shall to sea, thou wouldst poison
the whole land else—[to the Captain] why, how now,
captain? 270
CAPTAIN In health.
FIDELIO What, drooping?
PHOENIX Or ashamed of the sale of thine own wife?
CAPTAIN You might count me an ass, then, i'faith.
PHOENIX If not ashamed of that, what can you be ashamed 275 of, then?
CAPTAIN Prithee ha' done, I am ashamed of nothing.
PHOENIX [aside] I easily believe that.
CAPTAIN This lord sticks in my stomach.
PHOENIX How? Take one of thy feathers down, and fetch 280 him up.
FIDELIO I'd make him come.
PHOENIX But what if the duke should hear of this?
FIDELIO Ay, or your son-in-law, Fidelio, know of the sale of his mother? 285
CAPTAIN What an they did, I sell none but mine own. As for the duke, he's abroad by this time, and for Fidelio, he's in labour.
PHOENIX He in labour?
CAPTAIN What call you travelling? 290
PHOENIX That's true. But let me tell you, captain, whether the duke hear on't, or Fidelio know on't, or both, or neither, 'twas a most filthy loathsome part.
FIDELIO A base, unnatural deed—
CAPTAIN Slave and fool— 295
[Phoenix and Fidelio discover themselves, and grab him]
Ha, who? O!—
PHOENIX Thou hateful villain; thou shouldst choose to sink
To keep thy baseness shrouded.
Enter his Lady
FIDELIO Ugly wretch.
LADY
Who hath laid violence upon my husband?

226 clip embrace
234 lousy filthy, contemptible
236 furnish supply
245 com'st to understands 250 meet understand each other

252 standing stagnant
263 Discover let us take off our disguise
266 dreadfully so as to cause fear or awe
280 down i.e., down your throat

282 I'd... come I would make him vomit 286 an if 287 duke the future duke, Phoenix
298.1 his Lady Castiza

300 My dear, sweet captain—help!
 PHOENIX
 Lady, you wrong your value;
 Call you him dear that has sold you so cheap?
 LADY [recognizing Phoenix and Fidelio]
 I do beseech your pardon, good my lord. [Kneeling]
 PHOENIX
 Rise.
 FIDELIO
 My abusèd mother.
 LADY My kind son, [rising]
 305 Whose liking I neglected in this match.
 FIDELIO
 Not that alone, but your far happier fortunes.
 CAPTAIN
 Is this the scrivener and the farmer's son?
 Fire on his lordship, he told me they travelled.
 PHOENIX
 And see the sum told out to buy that jewel 310 More precious in a woman than her eye, her honour.
 Nay, take it to you, lady, and I judge it Too slight a recompense for your great wrong,
 But that his riddance helps it.
 CAPTAIN
 'Sfoot, he undoes me! I am a rogue and a beggar;
 315 The Egyptian plague creeps over me already,
 I begin to be lousy.
 PHOENIX
 Thus happily prevented, you're set free,
 Or else made over to adultery.
 LADY
 To heaven and to you my modest thanks.
 PHOENIX
 320 Monster, to sea, spit thy abhorrèd foam,
 Where it may do least harm—there's air and room.
 Thou'rt dangerous in a chamber, virulent venom
 Unto a lady's name and her chaste breath.
 If past this evening's verge the dukedom hold thee,
 325 Thou art reserved for abject punishment.
 CAPTAIN I do beseech your good lordship, consider the state of a poor, downcast captain.
 PHOENIX Captain? Off with that noble title; thou becomest it vilely. I ne'er saw the name fit worse; I'll sooner allow 330 a pander a captain than thee.
 CAPTAIN More's the pity.
 PHOENIX Sue to thy lady for pardon.
 LADY I give it without suit.
 CAPTAIN I do beseech your ladyship not so much for 335 pardon, as to bestow a few of those crowns upon a poor, unfeathered rover that will as truly pray for you—[aside] and wish you hanged—as any man breathing.
 LADY
 I give it freely all.
 PHOENIX Nay, by your favour,
 I will contain you lady. [Giving the Captain a few coins]
 Here, be gone.
 Use slaves like slaves—wealth keeps their faults unknown. 340
 CAPTAIN
 Well, I'm yet glad, I've liberty and these.
 The land has plagued me, and I'll plague the seas. Exit
 PHOENIX
 The scene is cleared, the bane of brightness fled;
 Who sought the death of honour is struck dead.
 Come, modest lady.
 FIDELIO My most honest mother. 345
 PHOENIX
 Thy virtue shall live safe from reach of shames.
 That act ends nobly, preserves ladies' fames. Exeunt
 Enter Justice Falso, Knight, and Jeweller's Wife Sc. 9 FALSO Why this is but the second time of your coming, kinsman. Visit me oftener. Daughter, I charge you bring this gentleman along with you. Gentleman? I cry ye mercy, sir! I call you gentleman still, I forget you're but a knight. You must pardon me, sir. 5 KNIGHT For your worship's kindness. Worship? I cry you mercy, sir. I call you worshipful still, I forget you're but a justice.
 FALSO I am no more, i'faith.
 KNIGHT You must pardon me, sir. 10 FALSO 'Tis quickly done, sir. You see I make bold with you, kinsman, thrust my daughter and you into one chamber.
 KNIGHT Best of all, sir. Kindred, you know, may lie anywhere. 15
 FALSO True, true, sir. Daughter, receive your blessing.
 Take heed the coach jopper not too much. Have a care to the fruits of your body—look to her, kinsman.
 KNIGHT Fear it not, sir.
 JEWELLER'S WIFE Nay, father, though I say it, that should 20 not say it, he looks to me more like a husband than a kinsman.
 FALSO I hear good commendations of you, sir.
 KNIGHT You hear the worst of me, I hope, sir. I salute my leave, sir. 25

315 Egyptian plague (See Exodus 8:16–18)

339 contain restrain

9.3–5 Gentleman? . . . knight (another joke about the cheapening of the title; see 6.148)

6–8 Worship? . . . justice (The title belongs to a knight, but is questionable for a justice of the peace; Middleton satirizes the narrowing distance between the ranks.)

11 make bold take liberties

12 kinsman (Falso and the Knight are not really kinsmen, although they are morally akin. Falso's social-climbing adds a fiction of incest to the actual crimes of pandering and adultery.)

17 coach (Falso speaks as if his daughter and the Knight were about to leave on their wedding journey.)
jopper bump up and down

17–18 Have . . . body be careful not to get pregnant (but the same words might be used to tell a married woman to protect her lawful pregnancy)

FALSO You're welcome all over your body, sir.
 [Exeunt Knight and Jeweller's Wife]
 Nay, I can behave myself courtly, though I keep house i'th' country. What, does my niece hide herself? Not present, ha? Latronello!
 [Enter Latronello]

30 LATRONELLO Sir.
 FALSO Call my niece to me.
 LATRONELLO Yes, sir. [Exit] FALSO A foolish, coy, bashful thing it is. She's afraid to lie with her own uncle. I'd do her no harm i'faith. I 35 keep myself a widower o' purpose, yet the foolish girl will not look into 't. She should have all, i'faith; she knows I have but a time, cannot hold long. See where she comes.
 [Enter Niece]
 Pray, whom am I, niece?

NIECE I hope you're yourself,
 40 Uncle to me and brother to my father.
 FALSO O, am I so? It does not appear so, for surely you would love your father's brother for your father's sake, your uncle for your own sake.
 NIECE I do so.
 FALSO
 45 Nay, you do nothing, niece.
 NIECE
 In that love which becomes you best, I love you.
 FALSO
 How should I know that love becomes me best?
 NIECE
 Because 'tis chaste and honourable.
 FALSO
 Honourable! It cannot become me then, niece, 50 For I'm scarce worshipful. Is this an age
 To entertain bare love without the fruits?
 When I received thee first, I looked Thou shouldst have been a wife unto my house,
 And saved me from the charge of marriage.
 55 Do you think your father's five thousand pound would ha' made me take you else? No, you should ne'er ha' been a charge to me. As far as I can perceive yet by you, I've as much need to marry as e'er I had. Would not this be a great grief to your friends, think you, if 60 they were alive again?
 NIECE
 'Twould be a grief indeed.

FALSO You've confessed
 All about house that young Fidelio,
 Who in his travels does attend the prince,
 Is your vowed love.
 NIECE
 Most true, he's my vowed husband. 65
 FALSO And what's a husband? Is not a husband a stranger at first, and will you lie with a stranger before you lie with your own uncle? Take heed what ye do, niece, I counsel you for the best: strangers are drunken fellows, I can tell you. They will come home late o' nights, 70 beat their wives, and get nothing but girls. Look to 't, if you marry, your stubbornness is your dowry. Five thousand crowns were bequeathed to you, true, if you marry with my consent, but if e'er you go to marrying by my consent, I'll go to hanging by yours. Go to, be 75 wise and love your uncle.
 NIECE
 I should have cause then to repent indeed.
 Do you so far forget the offices
 Of blushing modesty? Uncles are half fathers.
 Why, they come so near our bloods they're e'en part of it. 80
 FALSO Why, now you come to me, niece. If your uncle be part of your own flesh and blood, is it not then fit your own flesh and blood should come nearest to you?
 Answer me to that, niece.
 NIECE
 You do allude all to incestuous will, 85
 Nothing to modest purpose. Turn me forth,
 Be like an uncle of these latter days,
 Perjured enough, enough unnatural;
 Play your executorship in tyranny,
 Restrain my fortunes, keep me poor, I care not. 90
 In this alone most women I'll excel,
 I'll rather yield to beggary than to hell. Exit FALSO Very good. O' my troth, my niece is valiant. She's made me richer by five thousand crowns, the price of her dowry. Are you so honest? I do not fear but I shall 95 have the conscience to keep you poor enough, niece, or else I am quite altered o' late.
 [Enter Latronello]
 The news, may it please you, sir?
 LATRONELLO Sir, there's an old fellow, a kind of law-driver, entreats conference with your worship. 100

26-7 You're...courtly (Falso makes an absurdly affected compliment, and then praises his own supposed sophistication.)
 36 should have all would inherit my estate (if we marry and I then die)
 50 I'm scarce worshipful ('Honourable' is an aristocratic title, while 'worshipful' pertains to the status of gentry, which he has barely attained. Falso makes the Niece's 'honourable' into a mere matter of social titles.)

 54 charge of marriage (By marrying his own niece and ward, Falso would avoid the cost of paying her dowry to someone else.)
 57 by from 59 friends relatives, her parents
 71 get procreate
 85 will sexual desire

87 these...days nowadays
 94 made me richer (i.e., Falso gets to keep her dowry)
 95 honest (a) law-abiding (b) chaste
 99 law-driver (As Falso's repetition at 9.101 indicates, the phrase is Latronello's invention. Tangle drives the law as a coachman drives horses or an overseer drives slaves.)

FALSO A law-driver? Prithée, drive him hither.
[Exit Latronello]

Enter Tangle [with a Suitor]

TANGLE [to Suitor] No, no I say, if it be for defect of appearance, take me out a special significavit.

SUITOR Very good, sir.

105 TANGLE Then if he purchase an alias or capias, which are writs of custom, only to delay time, your procedendo does you knight's service—that's nothing at all. Get your distringas out as soon as you can for a jury.

SUITOR I'll attend your good worship's coming out.

110 TANGLE Do, I prithée, attend me. I'll take it kindly, a voluntate. [Exit Suitor]

FALSO What, old signor Tangle!

TANGLE I am in debt to your worship's remembrance.

115 FALSO My old master of fence: come, come, come, I have not exercised this twelve moons; I have almost forgot all my law-weapons.

TANGLE They are under fine and recovery. Your worship shall easily recover them.

FALSO I hope so. [To Latronello, within] When there?
[Enter Latronello]

120 LATRONELLO Sir?

FALSO The rapier and dagger foils, instantly.
[Exit Latronello]
And what's thy suit to me, old Tangle. I'll grant it presently.

125 TANGLE Nothing but this, sir, to set your worship's hand to the commendation of a knave whom nobody speaks well on.

FALSO The more shame for 'em. What was his offence, I pray?

130 TANGLE Vestras deducite culpas—nothing but robbing a vestry.

FALSO What, what! Alas, poor knave, give me the paper. He did but save the churchwardens a labour. Come, come, he has done a better deed in't than the parish is aware of, to prevent the knaves; he robs but seldom, they once a quarter. Methinks 'twere a part of good justice, to hang 'em at year's end, when they come out of their office, to the true terrifying of all collectors and sidemen.

TANGLE Your worship would make a fruitful commonwealth's man. The constable lets 'em alone, looks on, and says nothing. 140

FALSO Alas, good man, he lets 'em alone for quietness' sake, and takes half a share with 'em. They know well enough, too, he has an impediment in his tongue. He's always drunk when he should speak. 145

TANGLE Indeed, your worship speaks true in that, sir. They blind him with beer, and make him so narrow-eyed that he winks naturally at all their knaveries.

FALSO So, so, here's my hand to his commendations.
[He signs the paper]

TANGLE A caritate, you do a charitable deed in't, sir. 150

FALSO Nay, if it be but a vestry matter, visit me at any time, old signor law-thistle!

[Enter Latronello with rapier and dagger foils]

O, well done, here are the foils. [Exit Latronello]
Come, come, sir, I'll try a law-bout with you.

TANGLE I am afraid I shall overthrow you, sir, i'faith. 155

FALSO 'Tis but for want of use then, sir.

TANGLE Indeed, that same odd word, use, makes a man a good lawyer, and a woman an arrant. [Takes some practice strokes] Tuh, tuh, tuh, tuh, tuh, now am I for you, sir. But first to bring you into form, can your worship name all your weapons? 160

FALSO That I can, I hope. Let me see, longsword, what's longsword? I am so dulled with doing justice that I have forgot all i'faith.

TANGLE Your longsword, that's a writ of delay. 165

FALSO Mass, that sword's long enough, indeed. I ha' known it reach the length of fifteen terms.

TANGLE Fifteen terms, that's but a short sword.

FALSO Methinks 'tis long enough. Proceed, sir.

TANGLE A writ of delay, longsword. Scandala magnatum, 170 backsword.

FALSO Scandals are backwords, indeed.

TANGLE Capias comminus, case of rapiers.

FALSO O, desperate!

102-3 defect of appearance failure to appear at a legal proceeding

103 significavit writ to stay a suit because of a prior excommunication alleged against the plaintiff

105 alias a second writ issued where one of the same kind has been issued before capias a writ ordering the defendant's immediate arrest

106 writs of custom unwritten law
procedendo a writ issued by a superior court directing an inferior court to proceed to a final hearing

107 knight's...nothing (another job at the cheapening of aristocratic titles)

108 distringas a writ directing the sheriff to take a person's property and goods into custody to force compliance with an order

110-11 a voluntate at your pleasure

114 fence fencing (alluding to Tangle's ability to duel in law, which the rest of this scene makes literal)

117 fine and recovery (legal terms for the procedure of taking possession of property following a judicial verdict)

124 hand signature

129-30 Vestras...vestry reveal your own faults (with a pun on 'vestry', room where church vestments and sacred vessels are kept)

132 churchwardens laymen who execute a church's business

134 prevent anticipate

135 quarter quarter of a year, when rents and other quarterly charges are due

137-8 collectors and sidemen parish alms-collectors and the churchwardens' assistants

139-40 commonwealth's man good citizen

(derived from derisive name given to radical reformers of the mid-sixteenth century)

150 A caritate for the sake of charity

152 signor law-thistle (Like the prickly plant, he hurts anyone who tries to handle him.)

157 use (a) practice (b) legal term for the right of one person to take the profits of land to which another has title (c) sexual intercourse

158 arrant notorious person (and implying 'errant', wandering)

167 terms periods when courts of law are in session

170 Scandala magnatum insulting words spoken about a peer or other great person of the realm

173 Capias comminus a writ ordering immediate arrest

175 TANGLE A latitat, sword and dagger. A writ of execution, rapier and dagger.
 FALSO Thou art come to our present weapon, but what call you sword and buckler, then?
 TANGLE O, that's out of use now! Sword and buckler was called a good conscience, but that weapon's left long ago. That was too manly a fight, too sound a weapon for these our days. 'Slid, we are scarce able to lift up a buckler now, our arms are so bound to the pox. One good bang upon a buckler would make most of our gentlemen fly i' pieces. 'Tis not for these linty times. Our lawyers are good rapier and dagger men; they'll quickly dispatch your—money.
 FALSO Indeed, since sword and buckler time, I have observed, there has been nothing so much fighting. Where be all our gallant swaggerers? There are no good frays o' late.
 TANGLE O, sir, the property's altered, you shall see less fighting every day than other, for everyone gets him a mistress, and she gives him wounds enough; and, you know, the surgeons cannot be here and there, too. If there were red wounds, too, what would become of the Rhenish wounds?
 FALSO Thou sayst true, i'faith. They would be but ill-favouredly looked to then.
 TANGLE Very well, sir.
 FALSO I expect you, sir.
 TANGLE I lie in this court for you, sir. My rapier is my attorney, and my dagger his clerk.
 FALSO Your attorney wants a little oiling, methinks. He looks very rustily.
 TANGLE 'Tis but his proper colour, sir. His father was an ironmonger. He will ne'er look brighter, the rust has so eat into him; he's never any leisure to be made clean.
 FALSO Not in the vacation.
 TANGLE Non vacat exiguis rebus adesce Jovi.
 FALSO Then Jove will not be at leisure to scour him, because he ne'er came to him before.
 TANGLE You're excellent at it, sir—and now you least think on't, I arrest you, sir.

[Tangle thrusts at Falso, forcing him back]
 FALSO Very good, sir. 215
 TANGLE Nay, very bad, sir, by my faith. I follow you still, as the officers will follow you as long as you have a penny.
 FALSO You speak sentences, sir. By this time have I tried my friends, and now I thrust in bail—[Lunges at Tangle] 220
 TANGLE [parries] This bail will not be taken, sir. They must be two citizens that are no cuckold.
 FALSO By'r Lady then I'm like to lie by it. I had rather 'twere a hundred that were.
 TANGLE Take heed, I bring you not to a Nisi prius, sir. 225
 FALSO I must ward myself as well as I may, sir.
 TANGLE 'Tis court day now. Declarat attornatus, my attorney gapes for money.
 FALSO You shall have no advantage yet. I put in my answer. 230
 TANGLE I follow the suit still, sir.
 FALSO I like not this court, by'r Lady. I take me out a writ of remove, a writ of remove, do you see, sir?
 TANGLE Very well, sir.
 FALSO And place my cause higher. 235
 TANGLE [starts back] There you started me, sir. Yet for all your demurs, pluries, and sursurraras, which are all longswords—that's delays—all the comfort is, in nine years a man may overthrow you.
 FALSO You must thank your good friends then, sir. 240
 TANGLE Let nine years pass, five hundred crowns cast away o' both sides, and the suit not twenty—my counsellor's wife must have another hood, you know, and my attorney's wife will have a new forepart—yet see at length law. I shall have law. Now beware, I bring you to a narrow exigent, and by no means can you avoid the proclamation— 245
 [Tangle knocks Falso's rapier from his hand]
 FALSO O!
 TANGLE Now follows a writ of execution—a capias utlagatum gives you a wound mortal, trips up your heels, and lays you i'th' Counter. [Overthrows him] 250
 FALSO O, villain!

175 latitat a writ summoning the defendant to appear before the so-called King's Bench writ of execution order to the sheriff or other official to execute a legal judgement 178–9 sword...now (Heavy swords and shields had been made old-fashioned by lighter rapiers and daggers.)
 183 pox syphilis
 185 linty soft (like lint or cotton fluff)
 196 red wounds sexual wounds (i.e., symptoms of venereal disease)
 197 Rhenish wounds (Rhenish wine is white; the 'wounds' are suppurating sores caused by venereal disease.)
 202 lie wait
 209 vacation time when law courts are not in session

 210 Non...Jovi 'Jove has no leisure to give heed to small things' (Ovid, Tristia, 2.216)
 219 sentences wise sayings
 223 lie by it stay in prison
 225 Nisi prius a writ directing the sheriff to summon jurors 226 ward protect
 227 Declarat attornatus my attorney declares
 232–3 writ of remove (i.e., to another court) 237 demurs motions to delay or suspend an action because of a point of difficulty which the court must decide pluries a writ issued subsequently to a first and second of the same kind, which have proved ineffectual

sursurraras See 4.123
 241–2 five hundred...twenty five hundred crowns have been wasted in a cause worth less than twenty crowns
 244 forepart ornamental covering for the breast 246 exigent a writ issued in the course of proceedings to declare a person an outlaw (immediately preceding the writ of capias utlagatum)
 247 proclamation proclamation of outlawry (utlagatum)
 249 writ of execution a writ to put in force the sentence that the law has given 249–50 capias utlagatum a writ commanding the officer to arrest an outlawed person
 251 Counter name of two London prisons

TANGLE I cry your worship heartily mercy, sir. I thought we had been in law together, adversarius contra adversarium, by my troth.

255 FALSO O! Reach me thy hand, I ne'er had such an overthrow in my life.

TANGLE 'Twas long of your attorney there. He might 'a stayed the execution of capias utlagatum, and removed you with a supersedeas non molestandum into the court of equity.

260 FALSO Pox on him, he fell out of my hand when I had most need of him.

TANGLE I was bound to follow the suit, sir.

265 FALSO Thou couldst do no less than overthrow me. I must needs say so.

TANGLE You had recovered cost else, sir.

FALSO And now, by th' mass, I think I shall hardly recover without cost.

270 TANGLE Nay, that's certo scio—an execution is very chargeable.

FALSO Well, it shall teach me wit as long as I am a justice. I perceive by this trial if a man have a sound fall in law, he shall feel it in his bones all his life after.

275 TANGLE Nay, that's recto upon record, for I myself was overthrown in eighty-eight by a tailor, and I have had a stitch in my side ever since—O! Exeunt

Sc. 10 Toward the close of the music, the justice's three men prepare for a robbery, [and exeunt]

Enter Justice Falso, untrussed

FALSO Why, Latronello, Furtivo, Fucato—where be these lazy knaves that should truss me, not one stirring yet?

A CRY WITHIN Follow, follow, follow!

FALSO What news there?

5 A CRY WITHIN This way, this way, follow, follow!

FALSO Hark, you sluggish soporiferous villains. There's knaves abroad when you are a-bed. Are you not ashamed on't? A justice's men should be up first and give example to all knaves.

Enter two of his men, tumbling in, in false beards

10 LATRONELLO O, I beseech your good worship.

FUCATO Your worshipful worship.

FALSO Thieves, my two-hand sword! I'm robbed i'th' hall! Latronello, knaves, come down! My two-hand sword, I say!

15 LATRONELLO I am Latronello, I beseech your worship.

FALSO Thou Latronello? Thou liest. My men scorn to have beards.

LATRONELLO We forget our beards.

[They take off their false beards]

Now, I beseech your worship, quickly remember us.

FALSO How now?

20

FUCATO Nay, there's no time to talk of how now—'tis done.

A CRY WITHIN Follow, follow, follow.

LATRONELLO Four mark and a livery is not able to keep life and soul together. We must fly out once a quarter; 'tis for your worship's credit to have money in our purse. Our fellow Furtivo is taken in the action.

25

FALSO A pox on him for a lazy knave. Would he be taken? FUCATO They bring him along to your worship; you're the next justice. Now or never show yourself a good master, an upright magistrate, and deliver him out of their hands.

30

FALSO Nay, he shall find me—apt enough to do him good, I warrant him.

LATRONELLO He comes in a false beard, sir.

FALSO 'Sfoot, what should he do here else? There's no coming to me in a true one, if he had one. The slave to be taken! Do I not keep geldings swift enough?

35

LATRONELLO The goodliest geldings of any gentleman in the shire.

FALSO Which did the whoreson knave ride upon?

40

LATRONELLO Upon one of your best, sir.

FUCATO Stand-and-Deliver.

FALSO Upon Stand-and-Deliver? The very gelding I choose for mine own riding, as nimble as Pegasus the flying horse yonder. Go shift yourselves into your coats, bring hither a great chair and a little table.

45

FUCATO With all present speed, sir.

FALSO And Latronello—

LATRONELLO Ay, sir.

FALSO Sit you down and very soberly take the examination.

50

LATRONELLO I'll draw a few horse heads in a paper, make a show. I hope I shall keep my countenance.

[Exeunt Latronello and Fucato]

FALSO Pox on him again. Would he be taken? He frets me. I have been a youth myself. I ha' seen the day I could have told money out of other men's purses—mass, so I can do now—nor will I keep that fellow about me that dares not bid a man stand, for as long as drunkenness is a vice, stand is a virtue. But I would not have 'em taken. I remember now betimes in a morning I would have peeped through the green boughs and have had the party presently, and then to ride away finely in fear;

55

60

254-5 adversarius contra adversarium adversary against adversary

258 long of because of

260 supersedeas non molestandum See 4.72-3

260-1 court of equity a system of English law existing, at this time, side by side with the court of common law and, on occasion, superseding it

270 certo scio I know it for certain

275 recto right

276 eighty-eight See 4.83

10.0.1 music the music being played during interval between the acts of a play in the indoor theatres. (No act divisions are indicated in the text.)

0.3 untrussed with the laces of his breeches undone

1 Fucato disguised

6 soporiferous sleepy

12 two-hand sword a large, heavy sword requiring two hands to wield

23 mark a coin worth 13s. 4d. or 2/3 of the pound sterling livery the clothing and/or food dispensed to retainers or servants

29 next nearest

50-1 examination interrogation

56 told count

58-9 drunkenness... virtue (because one who is drunk cannot stand up; also, one who is drunk may become sexually impotent)

'twas e'en venary to me, i'faith, the pleasantest course of life. One would think every woodcock a constable and every owl an officer. But those days are past with me. And, o' my troth, I think I am a greater thief now and in no danger. I can take my ease, sit in my chair, look in your faces now, and rob you, make you bring your money by authority, put off your hat, and thank me for robbing of you. O, there is nothing to a thief under covert baron.

Enter Phoenix, Fidelio [disguised in robes], Constable, Officers, and the thief Furtivo

CONSTABLE Come, officers, bring him away.

FALSO [aside] Nay, I see thee through thy false beard, thou mid-wind-chined rascal! [To Constable and Officers] How now, my masters, what's he? Ha?

CONSTABLE Your worship knows, I never come but I bring a thief with me.

FALSO Thou hast left thy wont else, constable.

PHOENIX Sir, we understand you to be the only uprightness of this place.

FALSO But I scarce understand you, sir.

PHOENIX Why, then you understand not yourself, sir.

FALSO Such another word, and you shall change places with the thief.

PHOENIX A maintainer of equal causes, I mean.

FALSO Now I have you. Proceed, sir.

PHOENIX This gentleman and myself, being led hither by occasion of business, have been offered the discourtesy of the country, set upon by three thieves, and robbed.

PHOENIX What are become of the other two? Latronello and Fucato!

LATRONELLO [within] Here, sir!

PHOENIX They both made away from us, the cry pursues 'em, but as yet none but this taken.

[Enter Latronello and Fucato, with chair and table]

FALSO Latronello.

LATRONELLO Sir?

FALSO Take his examination.

LATRONELLO Yes, sir.

FALSO Let the knave stand single.

FURTIVO Thank your good worship.

FALSO He's been a suitor at court, sure. He thanks me for nothing.

PHOENIX He's a thief now, sure.

FALSO That we must know of him. What are you, sir?

FURTIVO A piece next to the tail, sir—a servingman.

FALSO By my troth, a pretty phrase and very cleanly handled. Put it down, Latronello. Thou mayst make use on't. Is he of honour or worship whom thou servest?

FURTIVO Of both, dear sir—honourable in mind, and worshipful in body. 110

FALSO Why would one wish a man to speak better?

PHOENIX O, sir, they most commonly speak best that do worst.

FALSO Say you so, sir? Then we'll try him further. Does your right worshipful master go before you as an example of vice, and so encourage you to this slinking iniquity? He is not a lawyer, is he? 115

FURTIVO He's the more wrong, sir. Both for his conscience and honesty, he deserves to be one.

FALSO Pity he's a thief, i'faith. I should entertain him else. 120

PHOENIX Ay, if he were not as he is, he would be better than himself.

FURTIVO No, 'tis well known, sir, I have a master the very picture of wisdom.

LATRONELLO [aside] For indeed he speaks not one wise word. 125

FURTIVO And no man but will admire to hear of his virtues.

LATRONELLO [aside] Because he ne'er had any in all his life.

FALSO You write all down, Latronello.

LATRONELLO I warrant you, sir. 130

FURTIVO So sober, so discreet, so judicious.

FALSO Hum.

FURTIVO And above all, of most reverend gravity.

FALSO I like him for one quality, he speaks well of his master; he will fare the better. Now, sir, let me touch you. 135

FURTIVO Ay, sir.

FALSO Why, serving a gentleman of such worship and wisdom, such sobriety and virtue, such discretion and judgement as your master is, do you take such a beastly 140

course, to stop horses, hinder gentlewomen from their meetings, and make citizens never ride but o' Sundays, only to avoid morning prayer and you? Is it because your worshipful master feeds you with lean spits, pays you with Irish money, or clothes you in northern dozens? 145

FURTIVO Far be it from his mind, or my report. 'Tis well known he kept worshipful cheer the day of his wife's burial, pays our four marks a year as duly by twelve pence a quarter as can be. 150

PHOENIX [aside] His wisdom swallows it.

FURTIVO And for northern dozens—fie, fie, we were ne'er troubled with so many.

FALSO Receiving then such plenteous blessings from your virtuous and bountiful master, what cause have you to be thief now? Answer me to that gear. 155

FURTIVO 'Tis e'en as a man gives his mind to't, sir.

63 venery a source of great enjoyment; the indulgence of sexual desire

71 covert baron A legal term meaning that a wife is under the protection of her husband. (Falso means that it is easy to be a thief when you are protected by judicial authority.)

74 mid-wind-chined Mid-wind refers to one's breathing capacity, and chined is short for mourning of the chine, a horse disease.

79 uprightness a just person

85 equal causes impartial

97 Take...examination write down his interrogation

120 entertain hire

127 admire marvel

135 touch test (to test the purity of gold or silver by rubbing it upon a touchstone)

145 Irish money debased coins which the English imposed on Ireland from 1601 to 1603

145-6 northern dozens coarse woollen cloth

149 marks (one mark is worth 160 pence)

156 gear matter, business

FALSO How, sir?
 FURTIVO For alas, if the whole world were but of one trade, 160 traffic were nothing. If we were all true men, we should be of no trade. What a pitiful world would here be.
 Heaven forbid we should be all true men: then how should your worship's next suit be made? Not a tailor left in the land. Of what stuff would you have it made?
 165 Not a merchant left to deliver it—would your worship go in that suit still? You would ha' more thieves about you than those you have banished, and be glad to call the great ones home again to destroy the little.
 PHOENIX A notable rogue.
 170 FALSO O' my troth, a fine knave, and he's answered me gloriously. What wages wilt thou take after thou art hanged?
 FURTIVO More than your worship's able to give. I would think foul scorn to be a justice then.
 175 FALSO [aside] He says true, too, i'faith, for we are all full of corruption here—Hark you, my friends.
 PHOENIX Sir?
 FALSO By my troth, if you were no crueller than I, I could find in my heart to let him go.
 180 PHOENIX Could you so, sir? The more pitiful justice you.
 FALSO Nay, I did but to try you. If you have no pity, I'll ha' none. Away! He's a thief—to prison with him.
 FURTIVO I am content, sir.
 FALSO Are you content? Bring him back. Nay, then you 185 shall not go. I'll be as cruel as you can wish. You're content? Belike you have a trick to break prison, or a bribe for the officers.
 CONSTABLE For us, sir?
 FALSO For you, sir? What colour's silver, I pray? You 190 ne'er saw money in your life. I'll not trust you with him. Latronello and Fucato, lay hold upon him. To your charge I commit him.
 FURTIVO O, I beseech you, sir.
 FALSO Nay, if I must be cruel, I will be cruel.
 195 FURTIVO Good sir, let me rather go to prison.
 FALSO You desire that? I'll trust no prison with you. I'll make you lie in mine own house, or I'll know why I shall not.
 FURTIVO Merciful sir.
 200 FALSO Since you have no pity, I will be cruel.
 PHOENIX Very good, sir. You please us well.
 FALSO You shall appear tomorrow, sirs.
 FURTIVO Upon my knees, sir.
 FALSO You shall be hanged out o' th' way. Away with 205 him, Latronello and Fucato. Officers, I discharge you my house; I like not your company.
 Report me as you see me, fire and fuel;
 If men be Jews, justices must be cruel.

Exeunt. [Manent Phoenix and Fidelio]

PHOENIX
 So, sir, extremes set off all actions thus:
 Either too tame, or else too tyrannous.
 210 He being bent to fury, I doubt now
 We shall not gain access unto your love,
 Or she to us.
 FIDELIO Most wishfully, here she comes.
Enter Niece
 PHOENIX
 Is that she?
 FIDELIO This is she, my lord.
 PHOENIX
 A modest presence.
 FIDELIO Virtue bless you, lady.
 215 NIECE
 You wish me well, sir.
 FIDELIO
 I'd first encharge this kiss, and next this paper;
 You'll know the language, 'tis Fidelio's.
 NIECE
 My ever vowèd love! How is his health?
 FIDELIO
 As fair as is his favour with the prince.
 220 NIECE
 I'm sick with joy. Does the prince love him so?
 FIDELIO
 His life cannot requite it.
 Not to wrong the remembrance of his love,
 I had a token for you, kept it safe,
 225 Till by misfortune of the way this morning
 Thieves set upon this gentleman and myself,
 And with the rest robbed that.
 NIECE O me, I'm dearly
 Sorry for your chance. Was it your loss?
 They boldly look you in the face that robbed you;
 230 No further villains than my uncle's men.
 PHOENIX
 What, lady?
 NIECE 'Tis my grief I speak so true.
 FIDELIO
 Why, my lord!
 PHOENIX
 But give me pausing, lady. Was he one
 That took the examination?
 NIECE One and the chief.
 PHOENIX
 Henceforth hang him that is no way a thief:
 235 Then I hope few will suffer.
 Nay, all the jest was, he committed him
 To the charge of his fellows, and the rogue
 Made it lamentable, cried to leave 'em.
 None live so wise but fools may once deceive 'em.
 240 FIDELIO
 An uncle so insatiate?

160 traffic commerce

162 true honest

208 Jews (Jews were stereotyped as strict interpreters of the law.)

211 doubt fear

213 wishfully according to wish or desire

217 encharge give in charge

228 chance unfortunate event

PHOENIX Ay, is't not strange, too,
That all should be by nature vicious,
And he bad against nature?
NIECE
Then you have heard the sum of all my wrongs.
PHOENIX
245 Lady, we have, and desire rather now
To heal 'em than to hear 'em.
For by a letter from Fidelio
Direct to us, we are entreated jointly
To hasten your remove from this foul den
Of theft and purposed incest.
250 NIECE I rejoice
In his chaste care of me; I'll soon be furnished.
FIDELIO
He writes that his return cannot be long.
NIECE
I'm chiefly glad. But whither is the place?
PHOENIX
To the safe seat of his late wrongèd mother.
NIECE
255 I desire it.
Her conference will fit mine; well you prevail.
PHOENIX
At next grove we'll expect you.
NIECE I'll not fail. Exeunt

Sc. 11

Enter Knight and Jeweller's Wife

KNIGHT It stands upon the frame of my reputation, I protest, lady.
JEWELLER'S WIFE Lady—that word is worth an hundred angels at all times, for it cost more. If I live till tomorrow 5 night, my sweet Pleasure, thou shalt have them.
KNIGHT Could you not make 'em a hundred and fifty, think
you?
JEWELLER'S WIFE I'll do my best endeavour to multiply, I assure you.
10 KNIGHT Could you not make 'em two hundred?
JEWELLER'S WIFE No, by my faith—KNIGHT Peace, I'll rather be confined in the hundred and fifty.
JEWELLER'S WIFE Come e'en much about this time, when 15 taverns give up their ghosts and gentlemen are in their first cast—
KNIGHT I'll observe the season.
JEWELLER'S WIFE And do but whirl the ring o'th' door once about. My maid-servant shall be taught to understand 20 the language.

KNIGHT Enough, my sweet Revenue.
JEWELLER'S WIFE Good rest, my effectual Pleasure. Exeunt

Enter Proditor and Phoenix, [the latter in disguise]

Sc. 12

PRODITOR Come hither, Phoenix.
PHOENIX What makes your honour break so early?
PRODITOR A toy, I have a toy.
PHOENIX A toy, my lord?
PRODITOR Before thou layest thy wrath upon the duke,
5 Be advised.
PHOENIX Ay, ay, I warrant you, my lord.
PRODITOR
Nay, give my words honour; hear me.
I'll strive to bring this act into such form
And credit amongst men, they shall suppose,
Nay, verily believe the prince his son
10 To be the plotter of his father's murder.
PHOENIX
O, that were infinitely admirable!
PRODITOR
Were't not? It pleaseth me beyond my bliss.
Then if his son meet death as he returns,
Or by my hired instruments turn up,
15 The general voice will cry. O happy vengeance!
PHOENIX
O blessed vengeance!
PRODITOR Ay, I'll turn my brain
Into a thousand uses, tire my inventions,
Make my blood sick with study, and mine eye
20 More hollow than my heart, but I will fashion, Nay, I will fashion it. Canst counterfeit?
PHOENIX
The prince's hand? More truly, most direct;
You shall admire it.
PRODITOR Necessary mischief:
Next to a woman, but more close in secrets,
Thou'rt all the kindred that my breast vouchsafes.
25 Look into me anon. I must frame, and muse, and fashion.
Exit
PHOENIX
'Twas time to look into thee, in whose heart
Treason grows ripe, and therefore fit to fall.
That slave first sinks whose envy threatens all.
Now is his venom at full height.
30 Voices within
FIRST VOICE Lying or being in the said country in the tenure and occupation aforesaid—

243 bad...nature unnatural, immoral. (The incestuous Falso hopes to violate the customary relationship between uncle and niece.)
251 furnished provided for 254 seat residence
11.1 stands upon the frame is a matter of 4 angels gold coins worth ten shillings each it (i.e., the title 'Lady')

8 multiply (a) get more money (b) have children
15 give up their ghosts closing time
16 cast vomit
22 effectual productive
12.1 Phoenix An error in the text: Proditor does not know the true identity of the disguised Phoenix.
2 break rise (like the sun at break of day)

3 toy an idle fancy or whim
15 instruments (men in Proditor's service) turn up overthrow 19 Make...study (Too much study was thought to have an ill effect on the body.)
20 fashion contrive
31-2 tenure...occupation ownership, possession

SECOND VOICE No more, then. A writ of course upon the matter of—35 THIRD VOICE Silence!
 FOURTH VOICE Oho, O, O, yes! Carlo Turbulenzo, appear, or lose twenty mark in the suits.
 PHOENIX Ha? Whither have my thoughts conveyed me? I am now within the dizzy murmur of the law.
 40 FIRST VOICE So that then, the cause being found clear, upon the last citation—
 FOURTH VOICE Carlo Turbulenzo, come into the court.
Enter Tangle with two [Suitors] after him TANGLE Now, now, now, now, now, upon my knees I praise Mercury, the god of law, I have two suits at 45 issue, two suits at issue.
 FIRST SUITOR Do you hear, sir?
 TANGLE I will not hear. I've other business.
 FIRST SUITOR I beseech you, my learned counsel.
 TANGLE Beseech not me, beseech not me. I am a mortal 50 man, a client as you are. Beseech not me.
 FIRST SUITOR I would do all by your worship's direction.
 TANGLE Then hang thyself.
 SECOND SUITOR Shall I take out a special supplicavit?
 TANGLE Mad me not, torment me not, tear me not. You'll 55 give me leave to hear mine own cause, mine own cause.
 FIRST VOICE [within] Nay, moreover, and further—TANGLE Well said, my lawyer, well said, well said.
 FIRST VOICE [within] All the opprobrious speeches that man could invent, all malicious invectives, called wittol to his 60 face.
 TANGLE That's I, that's I. I Thank you my learned counsel for your good remembrance. I hope I shall overthrow him horse and foot.
 FIRST SUITOR Nay, but good sir.
 65 TANGLE No more, sir. He that brings me happy news first, I'll relieve first.
 BOTH SUITORS Sound executions rot thy cause and thee.
Exeunt
 TANGLE Ay, ay, ay, pray so still, pray so still. They'll thrive the better.
 70 PHOENIX I wonder how this fellow keeps out madness? What stuff his brains are made on?
 TANGLE I suffer, I suffer, till I hear a judgement.
 PHOENIX What, old signor?
 TANGLE Prithee, I will not know thee now. 'Tis a busy 75 time, a busy time with me.
 PHOENIX What, not me, signor?

TANGLE O, cry thee mercy. Give me thy hand—fare thee well. He's no relief against me, then. His demurs will not help him, his sursurraras will but play the knaves with him.
 80 Enter Justice Falso
 PHOENIX The justice—'tis he.
 FALSO Have I found thee, i'faith? I thought where I should smell thee out, old Tangle.
 TANGLE What, old signor justicer—embrace me another time, an you can possibly. How does all thy wife's children?—well? That's well said, i'faith.
 85 FALSO Hear me, old Tangle. [Taking hold of him]
 TANGLE Prithee, do not ravish me. Let me go.
 FALSO I must use some of thy counsel first.
 TANGLE Sirrah, I ha' brought him to an exigent. Hark, that's my cause, that's my cause yonder. I twinged him, I twinged him.
 90 FALSO My niece is stolen away.
 TANGLE Ah, get me a ne exeat regno quickly. Nay, you must not stay upon 't. I'd fain have you gone.
 95 FALSO A ne exeat regno. I'll about it presently—adieu.
 PHOENIX You seek to catch her, justice? She'll catch you.
Enter First Sutor
 FIRST SUITOR A judgement, a judgement!
 TANGLE What, what, what?
 FIRST SUITOR Overthrown, overthrown, overthrown.
 100 TANGLE Ha, ah, ah.
Enter Second Sutor
 SECOND SUITOR News, news, news.
 TANGLE The devil, the devil, the devil!
 SECOND SUITOR Twice Tangle's overthrown, twice Tangle's overthrown!
 105 TANGLE Hold!
 PHOENIX Now, old cheater of the law—
 TANGLE Pray, give me leave to be mad.
 PHOENIX Thou that hast found such sweet pleasure in the vexation of others.
 110 TANGLE May I not be mad in quiet?
 PHOENIX Very marrow, very manna to thee to be in law.
 TANGLE Very syrup of toads and preserved adders.
 PHOENIX Thou that hast vexed and beggared the whole parish, and made the honest churchwardens go to law with the poor's money.
 115 TANGLE Hear me, do but hear me. I pronounce a terrible, horrible curse upon you all—and wish you to

33 writ of course an ordinary, customary writ
 36 Turbulenzo troublemaker (Italian)
 40 cause the case of one party in a suit
 41 citation a reference to decided cases
 44 Mercury (In Elizabethan comedy and rogue literature, he was usually the lightfooted protector of thieves.)
 53 supplicavit a writ issuing out of the King's Bench or the Court of Chancery for taking surety of the peace against a person 59 wittol a man who knows of his wife's adultery and tolerates it 63 horse and foot completely

 66 relieve free from an obligation 71 on of
 79 sursurraras (see 4.123)
 85 an if
 91 twinged pinched, tweaked

94 ne exeat regno let him not leave the kingdom (a writ of restraint)
 109-110 Thou...others (see 4.117-18)
 112 Very marrow, very manna physical and spiritual nourishment; (see 4.116)
 113 preserved kept in one's possession
 114-116 Thou...money (see 4.150-1)
 118-119 wish...attorney (a variation on 'wish you to the devil')

120 my attorney. See where a praemunire comes, a dedimus potestatem, and that most dreadful execution, excommunicato capiendo. There's no bail to be taken, I shall rot in fifteen jails. Make dice of my bones, and let my counsellor's son play away his father's money with 'em: may my bones revenge my quarrel! A capias comminus? Here, here, here, here: quickly dip your quills in my blood, off with my skin, and write fourteen lines of a side. There's an honest conscionable fellow; he takes but ten shillings of a bellows-mender. Here's another deals all with charity; you shall give him nothing, only his wife an embroidered petticoat, a gold fringe for her tail, or a border for her head. Ah, sirrah! You shall catch me no more in the springle of your knaveries. Exit

125
130 135
140
145 150
155

FIRST SUITOR Follow, follow him still. A little thing now sets him forward. [Exeunt Suitors]

PHOENIX
None can except against him. The man's mad
And privileged by the moon, if he say true:
Less madness 'tis to speak sin than to do.
This wretch that loved before his food his strife,
This punishment falls even with his life.
His pleasure was vexation, all his bliss
The torment of another.
Their heart, his health, their starvèd hopes his store:
Who so loves law dies either mad or poor.
Enter Fidelio

FIDELIO
A miracle, a miracle!

PHOENIX How now, Fidelio?

FIDELIO
My lord, a miracle!

PHOENIX What is't?

FIDELIO I have found
One quiet, suffering, and unlaywered man,
An opposite, a very contrary
To the old turbulent fellow.

PHOENIX Why, he's mad.

FIDELIO Mad? Why, he is in his right wits. Could he be madder than he was? If he be any way altered from what he was, 'tis for the better, my lord.

PHOENIX Well, but where's this wonder?

FIDELIO 'Tis coming, my lord, a man so truly a man, so indifferently a creature, using the world in his right nature but to tread upon; one that would not bruise the cowardliest enemy to man, the worm, that dares not show his malice till we are dead. Nay, my lord, you will admire his temper! See where he comes.

I promised your acquaintance, sir. You is
The gentleman I did commend for temper. 160
Enter Quieto

QUIETO
Let me embrace you simply,
That's perfectly, and more in heart than hand;
Let affectation keep at court.

PHOENIX Ay, let it.

QUIETO 'Tis told me you love quiet.

PHOENIX Above wealth.

QUIETO
Ay, above life. I have been wild and rash, Committed many and unnatural crimes,
Which I have since repented. 165

PHOENIX 'Twas well spent.

QUIETO
I was mad, stark mad, nine years together.

PHOENIX I pray! As how?

QUIETO
Going to law. I'faith, it made me mad. 170

PHOENIX
With the like frenzy, not an hour since
An aged man was struck.

QUIETO Alas, I pity him.

PHOENIX
He's not worth pitying, for 'twas still his gladness
To be at variance.

QUIETO Yet, a man's worth pity.
My quiet blood has blessed me with this gift:
I have cured some, and if his wits be not Too deeply cut, I will assay to help 'em. 175

PHOENIX
Sufferance does teach you pity.
Enter his Boy

BOY O, master, master, your abominable next neighbour came into the house, being half in drink, and took away your best carpet. 180

QUIETO Has he it?

BOY Alas, sir.

QUIETO Let him go, trouble him not. Lock the door quietly after him, and have a safer care who comes in next. 185

PHOENIX But, sir, might I advise you, in such a cause as this a man might boldly, nay, with conscience, go to law.

QUIETO O, I'll give him the table too first. Better endure a fist than a sharp sword. I had rather they should pull 190

119 praemunire praemunire facias, a writ summoning a person accused

119-20 dedimus potestatem we have given the power; a writ empowering one who is not a judge to do some act in place of a judge

120-1 excommunicato capiendo a writ of arrest for someone who stands excommunicated for forty days

124 quarrel cause

capias comminus a writ ordering the defendant's immediate arrest

127-8 ten shillings (For a bellows-mender, ten shillings would be at least two weeks' wages.)

130 tail the bottom of a gown that reaches nearly to the ground

131 border ornamental work around the edge of a cap

135 except take exception

136 privileged . . . moon exempt by reason of lunacy

142 store possessions

154 his its

160.1 Quieto quiet, calm

177 assay attempt

178 Sufferance suffering

181 carpet tablecloth

off my clothes than flay off my skin and hang that on mine enemy's hedge.

PHOENIX

Why, for such good causes was the law ordained.

QUIETO

True, and in itself 'tis glorious and divine—

195 Law is the very masterpiece of heaven.

But see yonder.

There's many clouds between the sun and us,

There's too much cloth before we see the law.

PHOENIX

I'm content with that answer. Be mild still,

200 'Tis honour to forgive those you could kill.

QUIETO

There do I keep.

PHOENIX

Reach me your hand. I love you,

And you shall know me better.

QUIETO

'Tis my suit.

PHOENIX

The night grows deep, and—

Enter two Officers

FIRST OFFICER Come away, this way, this way.

205 PHOENIX Who be those? Stand close a little.

[As they retire,] Phoenix jars the ring of the door; the Maid enters, catches him

MAID O, you're come as well as e'er you came in your life.

My master's new gone to bed. Give me your knightly hand, I must lead you into the blind parlour. My mistress will be down to you presently.

She takes in Phoenix, amazed

210 FIRST OFFICER I tell you our safest course will be to arrest him when he comes out o'th' tavern, for then he will be half drunk, and will not stand upon his weapon.

SECOND OFFICER Our safest course, indeed, for he will draw.

215 FIRST OFFICER That he will, though he put it up again, which is more of his courtesy than of our deservings.

Exeunt [Officers]

QUIETO

The world is nothing but vexation,

Spite, and uncharitable action.

FIDELIO

Did you see the gentleman?

QUIETO

Not I.

FIDELIO

Where should he be? It may be he's passed by.

220 Good sir, let's overtake him.

Exeunt

Enter Phoenix with the Maid

MAID Here, sir, now you are there, sir. She'll come down to you instantly. I must not stay with you—my mistress would be jealous. You must do nothing to me, my mistress would find it quickly. Exit

PHOENIX 'Sfoot, whither am I led? brought in by th' 5 hand? I hope it can be no harm to stay for a woman, though indeed they were never more dangerous. I have ventured hitherto and safe, and I must venture to stay

now. This should be a fair room, but I see it not: the blind parlour calls she it? 10

Enter Jeweller's Wife

JEWELLER'S WIFE Where art thou? O, my knight!

PHOENIX Your knight? I am the duke's knight.

JEWELLER'S WIFE I say you're my knight, for I'm sure I paid for you.

PHOENIX Paid for you? Hum—'Sfoot, a light! 15

[Phoenix lights a candle; Jeweller's Wife extinguishes it]

JEWELLER'S WIFE Now out upon the marmoset. Hast thou served me so long, and offer to bring in a candle?

PHOENIX [aside] Fair room, villainous face, and worse woman. I ha' learned something by a glimpse o'th' candle. 20

JEWELLER'S WIFE How happened it you came so soon? I looked not for you these two hours. Yet, as the sweet chance is, you came as well as a thing could come, for my husband's newly brought abed.

PHOENIX And what has Jove sent him? 25

JEWELLER'S WIFE He ne'er sent him anything since I knew him. He's a man of a bad nature to his wife; none but his maids can thrive under him.

PHOENIX Out upon him.

JEWELLER'S WIFE Ay, judge whether I have a cause to be 30 a courtesan or no? to do as I do? An elderly fellow as he is, if he were married to a young virgin, he were able to break her heart, though he could break nothing else. Here, here, there's just a hundred and fifty. [Giving money] But I stole 'em so hardly from him, 'twould e'en 35 have grieved you to have seen it.

PHOENIX So 'twould, i'faith.

JEWELLER'S WIFE Therefore, prithee, my sweet Pleasure, do not keep company so much. How do you think I am able to maintain you? Though I be a jeweller's wife, 40 jewels are like women: they rise and fall. We must be content to lose sometimes to gain often, but you're

198 too much cloth too many lawyers (here referred to by their professional garb)

205 close (i.e., close to the wall of the Jeweller's house)

208 blind windowless

212 stand upon rely on

13.16 marmoset monkey

25 what...him (Phoenix assumes that the Jeweller has been 'brought abed' with an illness; the Jeweller's Wife continues the exchange in a sexual vein, suggesting his sterility or impotence.)

26-7 knew him had sexual relations with him

27-8 bad...him (Her husband is sexually incompetent with her but not with the maid-servants.)

31 courtesan in this usage, a mistress or a woman who has extramarital sexual relations

33-4 nothing else (i.e., her hymen)

35 hardly with difficulty

41 rise and fall (i.e., in price [jewels] and sexually [women]) content always to lose and never to gain. What need you ride with a footman before you?

 45 PHOENIX O, that's the grace.
 JEWELLER'S WIFE The grace? 'Tis sufficient grace that you've a horse to ride upon. You should think thus with yourself every time you go to bed: if my head were laid, what would become of that horse? He would run a bad race then, as well as his master.
 50 PHOENIX Nay, an you give me money to chide me—
 JEWELLER'S WIFE No, if it were as much more, I would think it foul scorn to chide you. I advise you to be thrifty, to take the time now, while you have it. You shall seldom get such another fool as I am, I warrant you. Why, there's Metrezza Aureola keeps her love with half the cost that I am at. Her friend can go afoot like a good husband, walk in worsted stockings, and inquire for the sixpenny ordinary.
 55 PHOENIX Pox on't, and would you have me so base?
 JEWELLER'S WIFE No, I would not have you so base neither. But now and then, when you keep your chamber, you might let your footman out for eighteen pence a day—a great relief at year's end, I can tell you.
 60 PHOENIX [aside] The age must needs be foul when vice reforms it.
 JEWELLER'S WIFE Nay, I've a greater quarrel to you yet.
 PHOENIX I'faith, what is't?
 JEWELLER'S WIFE You made me believe at first the prince had you in great estimation, and would not offer to travel without you—nay, that he could not travel without your direction and intelligence.
 65 PHOENIX I'm sorry I said so, i'faith, but sure I was overflown when I spoke it. I could ne'er have said it else.
 70 JEWELLER'S WIFE Nay, more: you swore to me that you were the first that taught him to ride a great horse and tread the ring with agility.
 PHOENIX By my troth, I must needs confess I swore a great lie in that, and I was a villain to do it, for I could ne'er ride great horse in my life.
 75 JEWELLER'S WIFE Why lo, who would love you now but a citizen's wife?—so inconstant, so forsworn! You say women are false creatures, but take away men and they'd be honestest than you. Nay, last of all, which offends me most of all, you told me you could countenance me at court, and you know we esteem a friend there more worth than a husband here.
 80
 85
 90
 95 100
 105
 110
 115
 120
 125 130 135
 140
 145 150
 155
 160
 165
 170
 175
 180
 185
 190
 195 200 205
 210
 215
 220
 225
 230
 235
 240
 245
 250 255
 260 265
 270
 275
 280
 285
 290
 295 300 305
 310 315
 320
 325
 330
 335
 340 345
 350
 355
 360
 365
 370
 375
 380 385 390
 395
 400
 405
 410 415
 420
 425
 430
 435
 440
 445
 450 455
 460
 465
 470
 475
 480
 485
 490
 495
 500 505
 510
 515
 520
 525
 530
 535
 540
 545
 550
 555
 560
 565
 570 575 580 585
 590
 595 600
 605
 610
 615
 620
 625
 630
 635 640
 645 650
 655
 660 665
 670
 675
 680
 685
 690
 695 700
 705
 710
 715
 720
 725
 730
 735
 740
 745 750
 755
 760
 765 770
 775
 780 785
 790 795 800
 805
 810
 815
 820
 825
 830
 835
 840 845
 850 855 860
 865
 870
 875
 880
 885 890
 895
 900 905
 910
 915 920
 925
 930
 935
 940 945
 950
 955
 960
 965
 970
 975
 980 985
 990 995

FIRST OFFICER A notable lad, and worthy to be arrested.
 We'll have but ten for waiting, and then thou shalt choose whether thou wilt run away from us, or we from thee.

30 KNIGHT A match at running? Come, come, follow me.
 SECOND OFFICER Nay, fear not that.
 KNIGHT Peace, you may happen to see toys, but do not see 'em.

FIRST OFFICER Pah!
 35 KNIGHT That's the door.
 FIRST OFFICER This?
He knocks on the door
 KNIGHT 'Sfoot, officer, you have spoiled all already.
 FIRST OFFICER Why?
 KNIGHT Why? You shall see. You should have but whirled 40 the ring once about, and there's a maid servant brought up to understand it.
 MAID Who's at door?
 KNIGHT All's well again. Phist, 'tis I, 'tis I.
 MAID You? What are you?
 45 KNIGHT Puh, where's thy mistress?
 MAID What of her?
 KNIGHT Tell her one—she knows who—her Pleasure's here, say.
 MAID Her pleasure? My mistress scorns to be without her 50 pleasure at this time of night. Is she so void of friends, think you? Take that for thinking so!
[Maid gives him] a box [on the ear and shuts the door]
 FIRST OFFICER The hundred and fifty angels are locked up in a box. We shall not see 'em tonight.
 KNIGHT How's this? Am I used like a hundred-pound 55 gentleman? Does my Revenue forsake me? Damn me if ever I be her Pleasure again! Well, I must to prison.
 FIRST OFFICER Go prepare his room; there's no remedy. I'll bring him along; he's tame enough now.
[Exit Second Officer]
 KNIGHT Dare my tailor presume to use me in this sort? He 60 steals and I must lie in prison for't.
 FIRST OFFICER Come, come away, sir.
Enter a Gentleman with a Drawer
 GENTLEMAN Art sure thou sawest him arrested, drawer?
 DRAWER If mine eyes be sober.
 GENTLEMAN And that's a question. Mass, here he goes! He 65 shall not go to prison. I have a trick shall bail him—away!
[Exit Drawer]
He blinds the Officer; [and the Knight escapes]
 FIRST OFFICER O!
 GENTLEMAN Guess, guess, who am I? Who am I?
 FIRST OFFICER Who the devil are you? Let go—a pox on 70 you! Who are you? I have lost my prisoner.

GENTLEMAN Prisoner? I've mistook. I cry you heartily mercy. I have done you infinite injury. O' my troth,
 I took you to be an honest man.
 FIRST OFFICER Where were your eyes? Could you not see I was an officer? Stop, stop, stop, stop!
 GENTLEMAN Ha, ha, ha, ha! Exit [pursued by Officer] 75

Enter Proditor and Phoenix [the latter in disguise] Sc. 15

PRODITOR
 Now, Phoenix.
 PHOENIX Now, my lord.
 PRODITOR Let princely blood
 Nourish our hopes; we bring confusion now.
 PHOENIX
 A terrible sudden blow.
 PRODITOR Ay. What day
 Is this hangs over us?
 PHOENIX By th' mass, Monday.
 PRODITOR
 As I could wish. My purpose will thrive best. 5
 'Twas first my birthday, now my fortune's day.
 I see whom fate will raise needs never pray.
 PHOENIX
 Never.
 PRODITOR
 How is the air?
 PHOENIX O, full of trouble.
 PRODITOR
 Does not the sky look piteously black?
 PHOENIX
 As if 'twere hung with rich men's consciences. 10
 PRODITOR
 Ah, stuck not a comet like a carbuncle
 Upon the dreadful brow of twelve last night?
 PHOENIX
 Twelve? No, 'twas about one.
 PRODITOR About one? Most proper,
 For that's the duke.
 PHOENIX [aside] Well shifted from thyself.
 PRODITOR
 I could have wished it between one and two, 15
 His son and him.
 PHOENIX
 I'll give you comfort, then.
 PRODITOR
 Prithée.
 PHOENIX
 There was a villainous raven seen last night
 Over the presence chamber in hard jostle 20
 With a young eaglet.

32 toys sportive or frisky movements 54-5 hundred-pound gentleman the minimum property required for one who aspired to be called a gentleman
 61.1 Drawer tapster or bartender 66.1 blinds the Officer (holds his hands over the officer's eyes)

 15.1 Phoenix See note to 12.1.
 2 confusion destruction 14 that's the duke (the comet portends the death of the dukedom's 'number one') shifted from thyself (Phoenix suggests that Proditor has cleverly misread the comet's meaning, which is the fall of the number one conspirator.)

 20 jostle combat

PRODITOR
A raven! That was I. What did the raven?

PHOENIX
Marry, my lord, the raven—to say truth,
I left the combat doubtful.

PRODITOR
So 'tis still,
25 For all is doubt, till the deed crown the will.
Now bless thy loins with freedom, wealth and honour;
Think all thy seed young lords, and by this act
Make a foot-clothed posterity. Now imagine Thou seest thy daughters with their trains born up, 30 Whom else despised want may curse to whoredom,
And public shames, which our state never threat:
She's never lewd that is accounted great.

PHOENIX [aside]
I'll alter that court axiom, thus renewed:
She's never great that is accounted lewd.
[Enter several nobles]

PRODITOR
35 Stand close, the presence fills. Here, here the place.
And at his rising let his fall be base,
Beneath thy foot.

PHOENIX
How for his guard, my lord?

PRODITOR
My gold and fear keeps with the chief of them.

PHOENIX
That's rarely well.
[Phoenix hides behind the Duke's presence-chair]

PRODITOR [aside]
40 Bold, heedless slave, that dares attempt a deed
Which shall in pieces rend him—
[Enter Lussurioso and Infesto]

LUSSURIOSO
My lords both!

PHOENIX
The happiness of the day.

PHOENIX [aside]
Time my returning;
Treasons have still the worst, yet still are spurning.
[Enter the Duke attended]

PRODITOR
The duke!

PHOENIX [aside]
I ne'er was gladder to behold him.

ALL
Long live your grace!

DUKE
45 I do not like that strain:
You know my age affords not to live long.

PRODITOR [aside]
Spoke truer than you think for.

DUKE
Bestow that wish upon the prince our son.

PHOENIX [aside to Proditor]
Nay, he's not to live long neither.

PRODITOR
50 Him as the wealthy treasure of our hopes,
You as possession of our present comfort,
Both in one heart we reverence in one.

PHOENIX [aside]
O, treason of a good complexion.
[A Horn [sounds within]
Enter Fidelio]

DUKE
How now, what fresher news fills the court's ear?

PRODITOR
Fidelio!

FIDELIO
55 Glad tidings to your grace.
The prince is safe returned and in your court.

DUKE
Our joy breaks at our eyes; the prince is come!

PRODITOR
Soul-quicking news—[aside] pale vengeance to my blood.

FIDELIO
By me presenting, to your serious view,
A brief of all his travels.
[He delivers a paper]

DUKE
'Tis most welcome. 60
It shall be dear and precious to our eye.

PRODITOR [aside to Phoenix]
He reads, I'm glad he reads.
Now take thy opportunity, leave that place.

PHOENIX [aside to Proditor]
At his first rising let his fall be base.

PRODITOR [aside to Phoenix]
That must be altered now. 65
Which? his rising or his fall?

PHOENIX [aside to Proditor]
Art thou dull now?
Thou hear'st the prince is come.

DUKE
What's here?

PRODITOR
My lord?

DUKE [reads]
'I have got such a large portion of knowledge, most worthy father, by the benefit of my travel—'

PRODITOR
70 And so he has, no doubt, my lord.

DUKE [reads]
'That I am bold now to warn you of Lord Proditor's insolent treason, who has irreligiously seduced a fellow and closely conveyed him e'en in the presence-chair to murder you.'

PHOENIX
O, guilty, guilty! 75
[Phoenix steps forward and drops his weapon]

DUKE
What was that fell? What's he?

PHOENIX
I am the man.

26 loins children
28 foot-clothed posterity heirs wealthy enough to have fancy trappings for their horses
35 presence presence-chamber

38 gold... them (They've been bribed and threatened.) 39 rarely very
42 Time my returning time for me to return

43 spurning spreading
47 think for expect 64 At... base (Phoenix repeats Proditor's instructions, see 15.36)

PRODITOR
O, slave!

PHOENIX
I have no power to strike.

PRODITOR I'm gone, I'm gone.

DUKE
Let me admire heaven's wisdom in my son.

PHOENIX
I confess it, he hired me—

80 PRODITOR This is a slave!
'Tis forged against mine honour and my life;
For in what part of reason can 't appear,
The prince, being travelled, should know treasons here?
Plain counterfeit—

DUKE Dost thou make false our son?

PRODITOR
I know the prince will not affirm it.

85 FIDELIO He can
And will, my lord.

PHOENIX Most just, he may.

DUKE A guard!
[Guards secure Proditor]

LUSSURIOSO
We cannot but in loyal zeal ourselves
Lay hands on such a villain.

DUKE
Stay you. I find you here, too.

LUSSURIOSO Us, my lord?

90 DUKE [reads] 'Against Lussurioso and Infesto, who not only most riotously consume their houses in vicious gaming, mortgaging their livings to the merchant, whereby he with his heirs enter upon their lands—from whence this abuse comes, that in short time the son of the merchant

95 has more lordships than the son of the nobleman, which else was never born to inheritance: but that which is more impious, they most adulterously train out young ladies to midnight banquets, to the utter defamation of their own honours and ridiculous abuse of their 100 husbands.'

LUSSURIOSO
How could the prince hear that?

PHOENIX Most true, my lord;
My conscience is a witness 'gainst itself,
For to that execution of chaste honour
I was both hired and led.

LUSSURIOSO
I hope the prince, out of his plenteous wisdom,
Will not give wrong to us! As for this fellow, [points at
Phoenix]

105 He's poor and cares not to be desperate.

Enter Justice Falso

FALSO
Justice, my lord! I have my niece stol'n from me.
She's left her dowry with me, but she's gone;
I'd rather have had her love than her money, I. 110
This, this is one of them. [Points at Phoenix] Justice,
my lord!
I know him by his face; this is the thief.

PRODITOR
Your grace may now in milder sense perceive
The wrong done to us by this impudent wretch,
Who has his hand fixed at the throat of law, 115
And therefore durst be desperate of his life.

DUKE
Peace! You're too foul; your crime is in excess;
One spot of him makes not your ulcers less.

PRODITOR O!

DUKE [to Phoenix]
Did your violence force away his niece? 120

PHOENIX
No, my good lord, I'll still confess what's truth.
I did remove her from her many wrongs,
Which she was pleased to leave, they were so vile.

DUKE [to Falso]
What are you named?

FALSO Falso, my lord, Justice Falso.
I'm known by that name.

DUKE Falso, you came fitly, 125
You are the very next that follows here.

FALSO
I hope so, my lord. My name is in all the records,
I can assure your good grace.
[Enter Niece and Lady behind]

DUKE [reads] 'Against Justice Falso—'

FALSO Ah! 130

DUKE [reads] 'Who, having had the honest charge of his niece committed to his trust by the last will and testament of her deceased father, and with her all the power of his wealth, not only against faith and conscience detains her dowry, but against nature and 135 humanity assays to abuse her body.'

NIECE [comes forward]
I'm present to affirm it, my loved lord.

FALSO
How? What make I here?

NIECE Either I must agree
To loathèd lust or despised beggary.

DUKE
Are you the plaintiff here?

FALSO Ay, my good lord, 140
For fault of a better.

DUKE Seldom comes a worse.

92 livings estates
97 train entice

113 milder more indulgent
118 spot of stain on

138 What...here? What am I doing here?
141 fault lack

[Reads] ‘And, moreover, not contained in this vice only, which is odious too much, but against the sacred use of justice, maintains three thieves to his men—’

145 FALSO Cuds me!

DUKE [reads] ‘Who only take purses in their master’s liberty, where if any one chance to be taken, he appears before him in a false beard, and one of his own fellows takes his examination—’

150 FALSO [aside] By my troth, as true as can be, but he shall not know on’t.

DUKE [reads] ‘And in the end will execute justice so cruelly upon him, that he will not trust him in a prison, but commit him to his fellows’ chamber.’

155 FALSO [aside] Can a man do nothing i’ the country but ’tis told at court? There’s some busy informing knave abroad, o’ my life.

PHOENIX
That this is true, and these, and more, my lord,
Be it under pardon spoken for mine own.
160 He the disease of justice, these of honour,
And this of loyalty and reverence:
The unswept venom of the palace.

PRODITOR Slave!

PHOENIX
Behold the prince to approve it.

PRODITOR O, where?

PHOENIX
Your eyes keep with your actions, both look wrong.
[Discovering himself]

PRODITOR
An infernal to my spirit!

165 ALL My lord the prince!

PRODITOR
Tread me to dust, thou in whom wonder keeps.
Behold, the serpent on his belly creeps. [Prostrating himself]

PHOENIX
Rankle not my foot—away!
Treason, we laugh at thy vain-labouring stings,
170 Above the foot thou hast no power o’er kings.

DUKE
I cannot with sufficient joy receive thee,
And yet my joy’s too much.

PHOENIX My royal father,
To whose unnatural murder I was hired,
I thought it a more natural course of travel,
175 And answering future expectation,
To leave far countries and inquire mine own.

DUKE
To thee let reverence all her powers engage,
That art in youth a miracle to age.
State is but blindness; thou hadst piercing art:
180 We only saw the knee, but thou the heart.

To thee then power and dukedom we resign;
He’s fit to reign whose knowledge can refine.

PHOENIX
Forbid it, my obedience.

DUKE Our word’s not vain;
I know thee wise, canst both obey and reign.
The rest of life we dedicate to heaven. 185

ALL
A happy and safe reign to our new duke!

PHOENIX
Without your prayers safer and happier.
Fidelio.

FIDELIO
My royal lord.

PHOENIX
Here, take this diamond.
You know the virtue on’t. It can fetch vice. 190
Madam Castiza—

FIDELIO She attends, my lord.
[Lady comes forward; exit Fidelio]

PHOENIX
Place a guard near us.
[To Lady] Know you yon fellow, lady?

LADY My honour’s evil.

PRODITOR
Torment again?

PHOENIX So ugly are thy crimes,
Thine eye cannot endure ’em. 195
And that thy face may stand perpetually Turned so from ours, and thy abhorred self Neither to threaten wrack of state or credit,
An everlasting banishment seize on thee.

PRODITOR
O, fiend! 200

PHOENIX
Thy life is such it is too bad to end.

PRODITOR
May thy rule, life, and all that’s in thee glad,
Have as short time as thy begetting had.

PHOENIX Away, thy curse is idle. Exit Proditor
The rest are under reformation, and therefore 205
Under pardon.

LUSSURIOSO, INFESTO, FALSO, and SEVERAL NOBLES
Our duties shall turn edge upon our crimes.

FALSO [aside] ’Slid, I was afraid of nothing, but that for my thievery and bawdry I should have been turned to an innkeeper. 210

Enter Jeweller’s Wife with Fidelio
My daughter! I am ashamed her worship should see me.

JEWELLER’S WIFE Who would not love a friend at court?
What fine galleries and rooms am I brought through? I

145 Cuds God’s (an oath) 147 liberty part of a county exempt from the jurisdiction of the sheriff

166 wonder keeps marvels dwell
179 State high rank
180 knee (i.e., the courtier’s bended knee)

198 wrack destruction
207 turn edge upon make blunt

- 215 had thought my knight durst not have shown his face
here, I.
- PHOENIX
Now, mother of pride and daughter of lust,
Which is your friend now?
- JEWELLER'S WIFE Ah, me!
- PHOENIX I'm sure you are not so unprovided to be without 220 a friend here; you'll pay enough for him first.
- JEWELLER'S WIFE This is the worst room that ever I came in.
- PHOENIX I am your servant, mistress; know you not me?
- JEWELLER'S WIFE Your worship is too great for me to know.
- 225 I am but a small-timbered woman when I'm out of my apparel, and dare not venture upon greatness.
- PHOENIX
Do you deny me, then? Know you this purse?
- JEWELLER'S WIFE That purse? O, death! Has the knight served me so? given away my favours?
- PHOENIX
230 Stand forth—thou one of those
For whose close lusts the plague never leaves the city.
Thou worse than common—private, subtle harlot,
That dost deceive three with one feignèd lip:
Thy husband, the world's eye, and the law's whip.
- 235 Thy zeal is hot, for 'tis to lust and fraud,
And dost not dread to make thy book thy bawd.
Thou'rt curse enough to husband's ill-got gains,
For whom the court rejects, his gold maintains.
How dear and rare was freedom wont to be,
240 Now few but are by their wives' copies free,
And brought to such a head that now we see
City and suburbs wear one livery.
- JEWELLER'S WIFE 'Tis 'long of those, an't like your grace, that come in upon us, and will never leave marrying of 245 our widows till they make 'em all as free as their first husbands.
- PHOENIX I perceive you can shift a point well.
- JEWELLER'S WIFE Let me have pardon, I beseech your grace, and I'll peach 'em all, all the close women that are; and 250 upon my knowledge there's above five thousand within the walls and the liberties.
- PHOENIX
A band? They shall be sent against the Turk:
Infidels against infidels.
- JEWELLER'S WIFE I will hereafter live so modestly I will not lie with mine own husband, nor come near a man in 255
the way of honesty.
- FALSO I'll be her warrant, my lord.
- PHOENIX
You are deceived. You think you're still a justice.
- FALSO 'Sfoot, worse than I was before I kneeled. I am now justice now. I know I shall be some innkeeper at last. 260
- JEWELLER'S WIFE
My father! 'Tis mine own father.
- PHOENIX
I should have wondered else, lust being so like.
- NIECE
Her birth was kin to mine; she may prove modest.
For my sake, I beseech you pardon her.
- PHOENIX
265 For thy sake I'll do more. Fidelio, hand her.
My favours on you both; next, all that wealth
Which was committed to that perjured's trust.
- FALSO
I'm a beggar now, worse than an innkeeper.
Enter Tangle, mad
- TANGLE Your mittimus shall not serve: I'll set myself free with a deliberandum, with a deliberandum, mark you. 270
- DUKE
What's he? A guard!
- PHOENIX Under your sufferance,
Worthy father, his harm is to himself;
One that has loved vexation so much,
He cannot now be rid on't.
He's been so long in suits that he's law-mad. 275
- TANGLE A judgement, I crave a judgement, yea! Nunc pro tunc, corruptione alicuius. I peeped me a raven in the face, and I thought it had been my solicitor: O, the pens prick me.
Enter Quiet
- PHOENIX
280 And here comes he, wonder for temperance,
Will take the cure upon him.

225 small-timbered small-framed (a house instead of a palace)

225-6 out of my apparel (not wearing a social-climber's elaborate costume, with a joke about literal nakedness)

226 venture upon greatness make pretence to social eminence (with pun on having sex)

227 purse (i.e., the one she gave Phoenix in sc. 13)

231 close secret

236 book (i.e., the Bible; a sardonic comment on affected piety)

238 whom...rejects (i.e., disgraced aristocrats like the Jeweller's Wife's knight)

240 by...free (The husbands are only 'free' by virtue of the wives' permission to be as promiscuous as they are. 'Copy' is a legal term, as in 'copyhold': an estate held at the will of the lord and subject to his decisions.)

241 head (with a pun on the cuckold's horns)

242 City...livery (Middle-class city dwellers dress indistinguishably from prostitutes who live in the suburbs.)

243 'long of because of those (i.e., courtiers like the Knight)

245 free promiscuous

247 shift a point turn an argument

249 peach inform against, impeach

250-1 within...liberties within the City and the adjacent district subject to municipal control

265 hand her take her by the hand

269 mittimus a warrant of commitment to prison

270 deliberandum deliberating (also the writ known by that name)

276-7 Nunc...alicuius now for then (i.e., not at the legally appointed time) by the corruption of someone

QUIETO
A blessing to this fair assembly.

TANGLE Away, I'll have none on't; give me an audita querela, or a testificandum, or a dispatch in twelve terms:
285 there's a blessing, there's a blessing.

PHOENIX
You see the unbounded rage of his disease.

QUIETO
'Tis the foul fiend, my lord, has got within him.
The rest are fair to this; this breeds in ink,
And to that colour turns the blood possessed.
290 For instance, now your grace shall see him dressed.

TANGLE
Ah ha, I rejoice; then he's puzzled, and muzzled, too.
Is't come to a cepi corpus?

QUIETO Ah, good sir,
This is for want of patience.
[Quieto binds Tangle]

TANGLE That's a fool:
She never saw the dogs and the bears fight—
A country thing.
295 QUIETO This is for lack of grace.

TANGLE
I've other business, not so much idle time.

QUIETO
You never say your prayers.

TANGLE
I'm advised by my learnèd counsel.

QUIETO
The power of my charm come o'er thee,
300 Place by degrees thy wits before thee;
With silken patience here I bind thee,
Not to move till I unwind thee.

TANGLE
Yea! Is my cause so muddy? Do I stick? Do I stick fast?
305 Advocate, here's my hand—pull, art made of flint?
Wilt not help out?—alas, there's nothing in't.

PHOENIX
O, do you sluice the vein now?

QUIETO Yes, my honoured lord.

PHOENIX
Pray, let me see the issue.

QUIETO
I therefore seek to keep it.
[Opens Tangle's vein over a basin]
Now burst out,
Thou filthy stream of trouble, spite, and doubt.

TANGLE O, an extent, a proclamation, a summons, a 310 recognizance, a tachment, an injunction, a writ, a seizure, a writ of 'praisement, an absolution, a quietus est.

QUIETO
You're quieter, I hope, by so much dregs.
Behold, my lord.
[Holds up basin to Phoenix]

PHOENIX This, why it outfrowns ink. 315

QUIETO
'Tis the disease's nature, the fiend's drink.

TANGLE O, sick, sick, signor Ply-fee, sick. Lend me thy nightcap, O!

QUIETO [gives medicine to Tangle]
The balsam of a temperate brain
I pour into this thirsty vein,
320 And with this blessed oil of quiet,
Which is so cheap that few men buy it,
Thy stormy temples I allay.
Thou shalt give up the devil and pray.
Forsake his works, they're foul and black,
325 And keep thee bare in purse and back.
No more shalt thou in paper quarrel,
To dress up apes in good apparel.
He throws his stock and all his flock
Into a swallowing gulf 330
That sends his goose unto his fox,
His lamb unto his wolf.
Keep thy increase,
And live at peace,
For war's not equal to this battle:
335 That eats but men, this men and cattle.
Therefore no more this combat choose,
Where he that wins does always lose,
And those that gain all, with this curse receive it,
From fools they get it, to their sons they leave it. 340

TANGLE
Hail, sacred patience. I begin to feel
I have a conscience now, truth in my words,
Compassion in my heart, and, above all,
In my blood peace's music. Use me how you can,
You shall find me an honest, quiet man. 345
O, pardon, that I dare behold that face.
Now I've least law, I hope I have most grace.

PHOENIX
We both admire the workman and his piece.
Thus, when all hearts are tuned to honour's strings,
350 There is no music to the choir of kings. [Exeunt omnes]

Finis

283-4 audita querela a writ initiating a process to introduce new evidence on behalf of the defendant after completion of the trial

284 testificandum testifying

288 The...to this All others are good compared to this one (meaning either the fiend or Tangle).

290 dressed given medical treatment

292 cepi corpus I have taken the body (the response of an officer who has arrested a person upon a writ of capias)

293 That's (i.e., 'patience' is)

310-13 extent...est (These are the legal terms being carried away with Tangle's blood; the last one means 'it is done'.)

319 balsam medicinal resin

328 apes pretenders to gentility

336 cattle property

348 piece masterpiece

350 to compared to

The Phœnix.

THE PARTS

Boys

PHOENIX (532 lines): drawer; Soldier or Servus; [Knight] or [Gentleman]

FALSO (387 lines): Groom; Boy; noble or attendant; Captain or Soldier; Gentleman or Drawer or Officer; Servus (or Captain); lackey (or Captain); Constable (or Officer); Quieto's boy (or Officer); Maid (or Officer)

TANGLE (312 lines): Boy; Soldier; Servus; noble or attendant, Proditor (or Servus) or lackey; Maid or Officer or Gentleman or Drawer; Quieto's boy (or Officer); Furtivo (or Gentleman or Officer) or Fucato (or Officer) or Constable (or Officer)

CAPTAIN (231 lines): any but Phoenix, Fidelio, Lady, Proditor, Tangle, Soldier, Sutor (scenes 4 and 6), Servus, lackey, [Niece]

FIDELIO (187 lines): drawer; Soldier or Servus; [Jeweller's Wife] or [Knight] or [Boy] or [Gentleman] (or drawer); Maid (or Knight)

PRODITOR (159 lines): any but Phoenix, Lussurioso, Infesto, Duke, Fidelio, Falso, Niece, Lady, Captain, guard, lackey, Servus, noble, attendant

JEWELLER'S WIFE (141 lines): any but Phoenix, Fidelio, Duke, Falso, Lussurioso, Infesto, Niece, Lady, Boy, Tangle, Quieto, Knight, Furtivo, Gentleman, guard

DUKE (112 lines): any but Proditor, Lussurioso, Infesto, Phoenix, Fidelio, Falso, Niece, Lady, Jeweller's Wife, Tangle, Quieto, noble, attendant, guard

QUIETO (72 lines): any but Phoenix, Fidelio, Duke, Lussurioso, Infesto, Falso, Niece, Lady, Jeweller's Wife, Tangle, Quieto's boy, Officer, guard

KNIGHT (69 lines): any but Jeweller's Wife, Niece, Falso, Furtivo, Maid, Boy, Drawer, Gentleman, Officer, [Phoenix or Fidelio], [Proditor or Phoenix], [Sutor], [Latronello], [Lady]

NIECE (55 lines): any but Duke, Proditor, Lussurioso, Infesto, Phoenix, Fidelio, Lady, Falso, Tangle, Jeweller's Wife, Quieto, Knight, Latronello, Furtivo, gentleman, guard, [Captain], [Soldier]

FURTIVO (54 lines): any but Falso, Niece, Gentleman, Knight, Jeweller's Wife, Phoenix, Fidelio, Latronello, Fucato, Constable, Officer

LADY (51 lines): any but Proditor, Phoenix, Lussurioso, Infesto, Duke, Fidelio, Niece, Jeweller's Wife, Tangle, Quieto, Captain, lackey, Servus, guard, [Knight], [Groom]

SUITORS (scenes 4 and 6; 39 lines): any but Phoenix, Fidelio, Tangle, Groom, Captain, Falso, Latronello, [Jeweller's Wife], [Boy], [Knight]

OFFICER (37 lines): any but Falso, Phoenix, Fidelio, Latronello, Furtivo, Fucato, Constable, Quieto, Quieto's boy, Maid, [Jeweller's Wife]

GROOM (Sc. 4; 32 lines): any but Phoenix, Fidelio, Tangle, Sutor (scenes 4 and 6), [Proditor], [Lady]

LATRONELLO (28 lines): any but Falso, Sutor (scenes 4 and 6), Tangle, Fucato, Phoenix, Fidelio, Furtivo, Constable, Officer, [Knight or Jeweller's Wife]

SOLDIERS (Sc. 2; 22 lines): any but Captain, [Niece]

MAID (14 lines): any but Phoenix, Knight, Officer, Fidelio, Quieto, Quieto's boy

SUITORS (Sc. 12; 13 lines): any but Phoenix, Tangle, Falso

LUSSURIOSO (11 lines): any but Proditor, Duke, Infesto, Phoenix, Fidelio, Falso, Niece, Lady, Jeweller's Wife, Tangle, Quieto, noble, attendant, guard

GENTLEMAN (10 lines): any but Falso, Furtivo, Niece, Knight, Jeweller's Wife, Officer, drawer, [Proditor]

FUCATO (Sc. 10; 8 lines): any but Falso, Latronello, Furtivo, Phoenix, Fidelio, Constable, Officer

QUIETO'S BOY (Sc. 12; 4 lines): any but Phoenix, Fidelio, Quieto, Officer, Maid

CONSTABLE (Sc. 10; 4 lines): any but Falso, Phoenix, Fidelio, Latronello, Furtivo, Fucato, Officer

INFESTO (4 lines): any but Proditor, Lussurioso, Duke, Phoenix, Fidelio, Falso, Niece, Lady, Jeweller's Wife, Tangle, Quieto, noble, attendant, guard

BOY (Sc. 5; 3 lines): any but Jeweller's Wife, Knight, [Phoenix], [Fidelio]

SERVUS (Sc. 2; 2 lines): any but Captain, Lady, Proditor

DRAWER (Sc. 14; 1 line): any but Gentleman, Knight, Officer

LACKEY (Sc. 8; 1 line): any but Captain, Lady, Proditor, Phoenix, Fidelio

ATTENDANT (Sc. 1; no lines): any but Duke, Proditor, Lussurioso, Infesto, Phoenix, Fidelio, noble

GUARD (Sc. 15; no lines): any but Proditor, Phoenix, Lussurioso, Infesto, Duke, Fidelio, Falso, Niece, Lady, Jeweller's Wife, Tangle, Quieto

NOBLE (Sc. 1; no lines): any but Duke, Proditor, Lussurioso, Infesto, Phoenix, Fidelio, attendant

Most crowded scene: 5.1: 12 characters (+3? mute guards)

NEWS FROM GRAVESEND: SENT TO NOBODY

Text edited by Gary Taylor, annotated and introduced by Robert Maslen

PLAGUE has always served as the most shocking of metaphors for political crisis. Pestilence reenacts the successive stages of the rise of Nazism in Albert Camus' La Peste (1947), while in Mary Shelley's The Last Man (1826) an apocalyptic plague puts an end to conventional forms of government before annihilating all but one of the earth's inhabitants. Plague is also the most urban of catastrophes. The need to contain it demarcates the boundaries of a city as remorselessly as a siege. In Daniel Defoe's A Journal of the Plague Year (1722) refugees from London are recognized wherever they go as residents of the infected city, despite all their efforts to disguise their provenance. Meanwhile those who choose to stay behind resort to listing the dead of each parish with obsessive accuracy, as if numbers had the power to preserve the city's identity in the face of depopulation and economic ruin. The modest pamphlet News from Gravesend (1604), written by Thomas Dekker and Thomas Middleton in response to the outbreak of 1603, shares with these later texts an acute awareness of the politics of plague and a horrified sensitivity to its redefinition of the urban community. Its authors make use of grotesque anecdotes and monstrous metaphors as vehicles for sometimes aggressive social satire. Their subject is the acute division between rich and poor which was aggravated by plague in the early years of the seventeenth century. The pamphlet anatomizes the social diseases of seventeenth-century London as minutely as it scrutinizes the physical symptoms of pestilence.

One of the peculiarities of texts associated with plague is their resistance to classification in terms of genre. Boccaccio's Decameron, which opens with its aristocratic narrators sequestering themselves from a plague-infested populace, ranges through every shade of comedy, tragedy and satire in its efforts to reconstruct the world abandoned by the storytellers. The Journal of the Plague Year masquerades as the memoirs of a London saddler, but incorporates demographic statistics, dramatic dialogue and investigative journalism into its account of the catastrophe. La Peste mixes the conventions of realist narrative with the experimental dislocations of modernism. It is as if plague had the power to disrupt the hierarchy of the imagination as easily as it disrupts the organization of a state. The Elizabethan precursors of News from Gravesend are as heterogeneous as its successors. William Bullein's Dialogue against the Fever Pestilence (1564) is a lively fusion of genres which combines factual reportage with medical tract and moral interlude with tall tales told by travellers, in the course of recounting the adventures of a citizen and his wife as they flee from the afflicted capital. The Dialogue ends with the moral interlude in the ascendant: the citizen repents and dies, humbly submitting to the will of Providence. In the process the text brings the epidemic under control. The plague becomes the instrument of divine authority, and death takes on the role of God's obedient junior minister. Bullein's text is modelled on the pastorals of Baptista Mantuanus (1498), but the pamphlets of Middleton and Dekker derive from a more recent and more unsettling model, the prose of Thomas Nashe.

Nashe's works are riddled with disease: from Summer's Last Will and Testament (1592), where Summer dies to the mournful accompaniment of the cry of the plague victims, 'Lord have mercy upon us', to the hallucinations that torment the bedridden fever-sufferer in The Terrors of the Night (1594). Nashe was familiar with Bullein's Dialogue, but his own uneasy medley of disparate genres has more disturbing implications. In The Unfortunate Traveller (1594) the narrative veers vertiginously from one geographical location to the next and from one genre to another. Chronicle history lapses into anecdote, epic is undercut by farce, romance by journalistic voyeurism, and in the process the workings of Providence, which lend a semblance of coherence to the muddle of European politics, rapidly recede into obscurity. The text is punctuated by plagues. Its presiding monarch is Henry VIII, the 'fever quartane of the French', and its protagonist Jack Wilton sets out on his travels to escape the sweating sickness in the English camp only to encounter the 'moist scorching steam' of bubonic plague in Rome. An incident that occurs during the Roman epidemic horrifically confirms the inaccessibility of Providence. Heraclide, having lost her husband and children in the plague, is raped and murdered by the robber Esdras despite an impassioned plea for divine protection. Jack Wilton can find no justification for her agony; when Esdras dies towards the end of the book Jack has nothing better to say than that 'Strange and wonderful are God's judgements'. The Unfortunate Traveller ultimately fails to provide arbitrary suffering with a convincing providential function.

Thomas Dekker's first plague pamphlet, The Wonderful Year (1603), shares the witty eclecticism of Nashe's satires. Like The Unfortunate Traveller it veers from comic to tragic, from elegaic lyricism to graveyard humour as it charts the 'chances, changes, and strange shapes that this protean climacterial year hath metamorphosed himself into'. The pamphlet passes few judgements on the behaviour of London's citizens during the epidemic. Instead Dekker anthropomorphizes the plague—or as he says 'anthropophagizes' it—into a flesh-eating lord of misrule, the hero of the pamphlet and its villain, who stands conventions on their heads and plays ghastly practical jokes on a powerless public.

But Dekker later became increasingly critical of the role of the authorities and the flight of the rich from the stricken capital. In 1625 he wrote a pamphlet designed as an active intervention in the city's affairs. The title of A Rod for Runaways proclaims its desire to scourge the retreating backsides of the wealthy fugitives. It is dedicated to a surgeon who is responsible for the only worthwhile works of art produced during an epidemic—the restoration of the sick to life; and it proposes that a guard be set at the city gates to prevent officials from abandoning their civic duties. News from Gravesend prepares the way for the radical interventionism of A Rod for Runaways. From the carnivalesque metamorphoses recounted in The Wonderful Year it turns its attention to the actions of the ruling classes during the plague and presents itself as a witness on behalf of the ordinary citizen. In doing so it records a subtle shift of power within London and within Jacobean society as a whole for which the plague provides a lurid backdrop.

The authors of News from Gravesend must have known they were playing a dangerous game. Any imitator of Nashe would have been aware that his works had been burned by the church authorities in 1599. And writers who chose to discuss the origins of plague had been recently warned of the state's intolerance of such discussions. In November 1603, the month before the composition of News from Gravesend, Henoah Clapham was jailed for preaching that the plague could not be cured by natural means and that government efforts to contain it were not only futile but blasphemous. News from Gravesend, then, with its echoes of Nashe and its speculations on the metaphysical origins of the plague, had good reasons for appearing anonymously.

At the same time it made clever use of its anonymity. The pamphlet is divided into two roughly equal parts: an Epistle Dedicatory in prose, and an account of the plague in octosyllabic couplets. This even-handed distribution of prose and verse lays unusual emphasis on the dedication, and hence on the social status of the text. The epistle is addressed to a non-existent knight, 'Sir Nicholas Nemo, alias Nobody' (8–9), the only responsible nobleman left in the city. At the centre of the pamphlet is a vacuum waiting to be filled: the vacuum left by the flight of the rich from the epidemic and the subsequent breakdown of the patronage system. The letter is signed by 'Somebody', one of a company of professional writers who have been left stranded, without a place, without an occupation, looking for a new readership to replace the aristocratic readers who have deserted them. In The Wonderful Year Dekker describes a dedication as a 'livery' like the ones worn by companies of players to protect them from the charge of vagrancy. But according to News from Gravesend, during the plague it is the rich who are the vagrants, and the ordinary countryfolk, the 'russet boor and leathern hind', who police their movements in the absence of any effective legislation against their flight (813). The pamphlet pours scorn on the aristocratic livery which traditionally lent a text its respectability: 'Out upon't! the fashion of such dedications is more stale than kissing' (11–15). Instead it offers itself to Nobody 'like a Whitefriars punk' (14–16), a whore whose illegitimate services contribute more to the city's economy than all the 'empty-fisted Maecen-asses' who ran away (2–3).

This literary whoredom is reinforced by the merciless scrutiny of the diseased body with which the text is filled. As his name implies, Somebody regards the bodies of the plague victims as material evidence of the government's irresponsibility, and the swelling plague-sores as physical manifestations of a deep-rooted moral corruption among the civic authorities. And the text's insistence on its joint authorship—the verses that make up the second half of the pamphlet repeatedly refer to the writers as 'we' and 'us'—implies that it articulates the indignation of the bulk of the London populace; that the Londoners themselves, in fact, comprise a single composite body. Internal evidence suggests that Dekker wrote most of the pamphlet and that Middleton's contribution is concentrated in about a hundred lines of poetry (972–1078), but Somebody's plural identity remains implicit throughout.

The transference of power by which the 'russet boor' polices the wealthy vagrant is only one of many effected by the plague in the epistle. The recurring implication is that the flight of the rich has proved that they are no longer necessary to the economy of London. 'Somebody' drives the point home when he describes his recent survey of maps of the world. In theory, printed maps gave the poorest of educated readers access to territories which had traditionally been colonized only by the wealthy, and Somebody's reading of 'universal maps' (37–9) gives the ordinary Londoner equal status with the aristocratic privateer. With the cartographers' help he crosses the world 'in a shorter time than a sculler can row from Queenhithe to Wapping' (40–3), and gets to know Constantinople 'as perfectly as Jobbin the malt-man's horse of Enfield knows the way to London' (46–8). The point of the survey is to demonstrate that the rich throughout the globe have ceased to patronize writers. In the process it suggests that the unique status accorded to the rich in official histories—'the white paper-gallery of a large chronicle' (60–2)—has no practical basis; and that the impressive coats of arms of noble houses are therefore effectively 'senseless' (60–1), devoid of meaning, like the empty motto 'Nec quidquam nec cuiquam' ('nothing dedicated to Nobody') which decorates the pamphlet's title-page.

So far the argument resembles Nashe's deflation of the pretensions of chronicle history in The Unfortunate Traveller. But Somebody's engagement with the emptiness of aristocratic posturings has a more direct bearing on practical government than the misadventures of Jack Wilton. Nashe's protagonist returns at last to the service of the monarch; but Somebody dissociates himself forever from the patronage of the ruling classes. Instead he joins forces with writers who cater for other classes of reader, the

'rhymesters, play-patchers, jig-makers, ballad-mongers, and pamphlet-stitchers' who are the 'yeomanry' of the authors' company (153-7), and urges them to follow him in expunging the names of 'dukes, earls, lords and ladies' from their dedications (174-6). This is no empty threat. It is a statement of the urgent need for a reformation of the social structure, the replacement of an outmoded semi-feudal economic system with a system of mutual help which will enable the urban community to tackle emergencies like the plague both efficiently and humanely. In an energetic passage, Somebody compares the ruling classes to a ship's officers who have abandoned their crew in the middle of a sea battle: 'when the pilot, boatswains, master and master's mates, with all the chief mariners that had charge in this goodly argosy of government leapt from the stern . . . [and] suffered all to sink or swim, crying out only "Put your trust in God, my bullies, and not in us!"' (185-96). At the same time, under the guise of praising the one responsible aristocrat, Nobody, he lists the policies which ought to have been put into effect: a proper food supply for quarantined households, a disciplined body of surgeons standing by to administer to the sick, and adequate land set aside for the burial of plague victims. These are policies similar to those recommended by the Privy Council in their book of national plague orders, Orders thought meet by her Majesty and her Privy Council to be executed throughout the Counties of this Realm in such . . . places as are . . . infected with the plague, first issued in 1583; but Somebody's ironic restatement of them supports the findings of the historian Paul Slack, who argues that very few of these policies were implemented in the capital during the 1603 epidemic.

The last part of the epistle demonstrates the ease with which the displacement of the ruling classes might be accomplished. It presents itself as the latest news from Winchester, the town to which the London law courts moved for the duration of the epidemic, and is largely taken up with tricks played by the locals on the unfortunate lawyers. By adapting their prices to the demand created by the sudden influx of Londoners, the people of Winchester contrive to snatch the legal and economic initiative away from the capital: 'having the law in their own hands, they ruled the roost how they listed; insomuch, that . . . Winchester now durst (or at least hoped to) stand upon proud terms with London' (391-409). The transference of the law courts from the capital to the provinces results in the transference of power from gentlemanly lawyers to the landlords, tradesmen, and servants who supply their needs. The epistle ends with a mocking threat to make use of the new solidarity between different classes of writers to have the 'limping prose' of the dedication converted into the popular ballad form, the perfect medium for the dissemination of gossip (432-5). In this way the news of the discomfiture of the rich will quickly spread throughout the urban population, 'that it shall do any true-born citizen's heart good to hear such doings sung to some filthy tune' (435-8). The Wonderful Year represented the plague as a monstrous carnival during which the social order was temporarily reversed. The dedication of News from Gravesend suggests that the respect and even the economic ascendancy once enjoyed by the wealthy fugitives might be less easy to reinstate than they might think.

The poem that makes up the second half of the pamphlet exhibits shifts in tone that enact a still more dramatic series of reversals. The effect of these sudden shifts in tone and topic is to make all its conclusions open-ended, guarding it from possible accusations of either condemning or endorsing government policies. The verses begin by invoking the art of 'Physic' as their muse as if to affirm the efficacy of natural methods of combatting the epidemic. Hence a reader might initially assume that the pamphlet aligns itself with the national plague orders of 1583, whose stress on the incarceration of infected households implied that the plague was a natural disease like any other and that it spread by contagion. But after a few lines the poem abruptly changes tack and points out that medicine has proved powerless in the face of the epidemic: 'Sick is Physic's self to see | Her aphorisms proved a mockery' (486-7). At line 492 the poem effectively begins again, invoking tragedy instead of physic as its muse, and begging her to infuse its verse with the power to move the ruling classes, 'Till rich heirs meeting our strong verse | May not shrink back before it pierce | Their marble eye-balls' (508-10). Once again the official version of events has been replaced with an assault on the irresponsible rich.

Further abrupt transitions follow. The next section (523-730) begins with an account of one current theory of the plague's transmission, the theory of miasma, which held that the disease was communicated by a corruption of the air. But the passage concludes that miasma has nothing to do with the present epidemic, since if plague were transmitted by the atmosphere then its effects would be universal: 'Then rivers would drink poisoned air; | Trees shed their green and curlèd hair; | Fish swim to shore full of disease | (For pestilence would fin the seas)' (567-70). The poem espouses a more dangerous theory—dangerous because it seems to corroborate Henoch Clapham's opinion that the pestilence was a supernatural visitation. It argues that the causes of the plague are internal ones, that 'every man within him feeds | A worm, which this contagion breeds' (621-2) and that God has inflicted the plague on England as a punishment for 'some capital offence' (627). The ensuing catalogue of possible offences lays responsibility squarely at the door of England's governors:

Whether they be princes' errors
Or faults of peers, pull down these terrors, . . .
The courtier's pride, lust, and excess,
The churchman's painted holiness,
The lawyer's grinding of the poor . . . (639-45)

Despite the poem's earlier assertion that every man bears some responsibility for the disaster, the catalogue implies that the ruling classes have a near monopoly on guilt, as they do on so much else.

As one might expect, the sting of the accusation is swiftly drawn; the list of abuses ends with a celebration of the crowning of James I, an event Dekker and Middleton commemorated in The Magnificent Entertainment. Briefly the miasma of James's fame supplants the miasma of infection, and restores, as it spreads across Europe, the damaged credibility of princes. But the following section, entitled simply 'The horror of the plague' (732–1067), reads like the script of a hideous alternative entertainment, made up of a series of miniature tragedies which have spilled out of the confined space of the theatre to infect the bodies of every class of citizen. At one point Somebody compares the pest-house, the hospital set aside for treating cases of the plague, to a private playhouse which has proved unequal to the task of containing the tragedy of the epidemic:

These are the tragedies, whose sight
With tears blot all the lines we write.
The stage, whereon the scenes are played,
Is a whole kingdom. What was made
By some (most provident and wise)
To hide from sad spectators' eyes
Acts full of ruth, a private room
To drown the horror of death's doom,
That building now no higher rear:
The pest-house standeth everywhere,
For those that on their biers are borne
Are numbered more than those that mourn. (934–45)

The tragic players described in 'The horror of the plague' range from the city itself to the bizarre parade of tormented citizens in Middleton's section of the poem (972–1078), whose plague-sores offer a commentary on their vices. For Middleton, pestilence provides the 'aptest' of deaths for the self-indulgent rich (988), who perish in horrified contemplation of the correspondence between the deformity of their lives and the physical repulsiveness of death by plague. Middleton's characters—a usurer, a drunkard, and a lecher—find themselves forced to inspect the corruption of their minds and bodies as they die, like the dying duke in The Revenger's Tragedy. The usurer 'must behold | His pestilent flesh' as it mimicks the coins which have been his consuming passion (980–1); the drunkard must 'view' the symptoms of plague as they mockingly reproduce the symptoms of alcoholism; and the lecher's dying vision is the most appallingly complex of all. With merciless clarity he notes the resemblance between the heat of his lust in the past, the fire of his present fever, and the flames of hell which await him after death—all of which make him 'freeze with horror' (1032)—while the pimps and whores who have catered to his sexual tastes celebrate their immunity from contagion by getting drunk, protected as they are from plague by the prior infection of syphilis. This morbid celebration combines with the carnival mounted by the lecher's conscience as he watches the 'horrid shapes' of his former misdeeds dancing round his deathbed in a hideous parody of the coronation entertainments (1058–67). Where Dekker chooses to examine the corporate reaction of the urban population to the plague, Middleton transfers our attention from the general to the particular, from the city to specific citizens, and in doing so anticipates the terrible isolation that afflicts the rich at the moment of death in the comedies and tragedies he wrote for the stage.

The penultimate section (1069–126) praises the efforts of the physicians to combat the disease by natural means, and urges the public to take moral and spiritual action to help them in their struggle: 'Only this antidote apply: | Cease vexing heaven, and cease to die' (1119–20). But the poem ends by proposing that plague is as much a product of economic collapse as of moral or physical delinquency. The last section, 'The necessity of a plague' (1128–63), argues that the epidemic constitutes a devastating final solution to the breakdown of the city's economic structure, which stems both from overpopulation and from the unproductive lives of its superfluous inhabitants. Before the plague can cease, individual citizens—from the wealthiest to the most indigent—must follow the example of the pamphlet's industrious authors and set to work to reconstruct the shattered fortunes of the capital. In this way the poem returns to the argument of the epistle, which contended that plague and economic ruin are two sides of the same coin, and that clear-sighted writers like Middleton and Dekker occupy the vanguard of a new, dynamic urban community, where the analysis and treatment of social ills take precedence over pandering to the appetites of the idle rich. News from Gravesend finishes with a pun that knits the writers' vision of a new society to the nation's inflated hopes for its new monarch. The poets pray 'That this last line may truly reign: | The plague's ceased; heaven is friends again' (1162–3), and so forges a material link between the last line of the poem and the incipient Stuart dynasty. The pamphlet ends as it began, with its plural author acting both as the mock-heroic spokesman for his devastated city and as the visionary advocate of a healthier, more democratic political regime.

SEE ALSO

Textual introduction and apparatus: Companion, 474
Authorship and date: Companion, 346
Other Middleton–Dekker works: Caesar's Fall, 328; Meeting, 183; Magnificent, 219; Patient Man, 280; Banquet, 637; Roaring Girl, 721; Gypsy, 1723

News from Gravesend: Sent to Nobody

Nec quidquam nec cuiquam.

The Epistle Dedicatory

To him that (in the despite and never-dying dishonour of all empty-fisted Maecen-asses) is the gracious, munificent, and golden rewarder of rhymes, singular paymaster of songs and sonnets, unsquint-eyed surveyor of heroic poems, chief rent-gatherer of poets and musicians, and the most valiant confounder of their desperate debts, and (to the comfort of all honest Christians) the now-only only-supper-maker to ingles and players' boys, Sir Nicholas Nemo, alias Nobody:

Shall I creep like a drowned rat into thy warm bosom, my benefic patron, with a piece of some old musty sentence in my mouth, stol'n out of Lycosthenes' Apophthegms, and so accost thee? Out upon't! The fashion of such dedications is more stale than kissing. No, no, suffer me, good Nobody, to dive, like a Whitefriars punk, into thy familiar and solid acquaintance at the first dash, and instead of 'Worshipful sir' come upon thee with 'Honest Jew, how dost?' Wonder not that out of the whole barrel of pickled patrons, I have only made choice of thee, for I love none really but thee and myself. For us two do I only care, and therefore I conjure thee, let the payment of thine affection be reciprocal.

They are rhymes that I have boiled in my leaden inkpot for thine own eating. And now, rarest Nobody, taste the reason why they are served up to thee (in the tail of the plague) like caviar or a dish of anchovies after supper. Know then, monsieur verse-gilder, that I have sailed (during this storm of the pestilence) round about the vast island of the whole world, which when I found to be made like a football—the best thing in it, being but a bladder of man's life, lost with a little prick—I took up my foot and spurned at it, because I have heard that none but fools make account of the world. But mistake me not, thou spur-royal of the muses, for it was neither in Sir Francis Drake's nor in Ca'ndish's voyage that I swam through so much salt water, but only with two honest cardmakers (Peter Plancius and Gerard Mercator) who in their universal maps (as in a barber's looking-glass, where a number of most villainous ungodly faces are seen in a year, and especially now at Christmas) did (like country fellows—that is to say, very plainly) and in a shorter time than a sculler can row from Queenhithe to Wapping, make a brave discovery unto me as well of all the old rain-beaten as of the spick-and-span new-found worlds, with every particular kingdom, dukedom, and popedom in their lively colours, so that I knew Constantinople as perfectly as Jobbin the malt-man's horse of Enfield knows the way to London, and could have gone to the great Turk's seraglio (where he keeps all his wenches) as tolerably, and far more welcome, than if I had been one of his eunuchs. Prester John and the Sophy were never out of mine eye (yet my sight was not a pin the worse). The Sultan of Motto Nec quidquam nec cuiquam 'Nothing dedicated to nobody'

- 3 Maecen-asses Maecenas (c.70–8 BC) was a famous Roman patron of the arts; the plural form puns on 'asses'
- 7 desperate debts 'bad' debts, unlikely ever to be paid
- 8 only-supper-maker sole provider of square meals
- 9 ingles companions; homosexual lovers
- 9 players' boys boy-actors. The placing of players' boys alongside 'ingles' may refer to the idea (spread by vociferous critics of the stage and endorsed by some playwrights) that the acting of women's parts by boys in the Elizabethan theatre encouraged sodomy.
- 11 Nemo Nobody
- 11 benefic beneficent
- 11–12 old musty sentence worn-out aphorism or saying
- 12–13 Lycosthenes' Apophthegms An adaptation by Conrad Lycosthenes

- (1518–61) of Erasmus' Apophthegmata, which was widely used in schools.
- 15 Whitefriars punk prostitute operating from the sanctuary of the former Whitefriars nunnery
- 17–18 Honest Jew a term of affection
- 19 pickled patrons (substitutes 'patrons' for 'herrings', which were pickled in barrels)
- 21 conjure urge, beg
- 27 verse-gilder one who gives money for verses
- 30 football i.e. soccer ball
- 34 spur-royal gold coin worth fifteen shillings
- 35 Sir... voyage Sir Francis Drake (1540?–96) sailed round the world from 1577 to 1580; Sir Thomas Cavendish (1555?–92) did it from 1586 to 1588.
- 37 cardmakers mapmakers, cartographers
- Peter Plancius and Gerard Mercator Peter Plancius (1552–1622) published his first Orbis terrarum typus in 1590;

- Mercator (1512–94) published one 'universal map' in 1538 and another in 1569.
- 42 sculler oarsman
- from Queenhithe to Wapping a distance of about a mile and a half, rowing down the Thames. Queenhithe was one of the chief watergates of the city; Wapping was the place where pirates were hanged.
- 46 lively colours maps of the world were often coloured after printing. Peter Plancius' widely-distributed maps were bordered with lively engravings of the four continents.
- 47 malt-man's a maker of malt. The distance from Enfield to Shoreditch church in London was about 10 miles.
- 49 seraglio harem
- 51 Prester John a legendary Christian king of Asia
- Sophy ruler of Persia.

Egypt I had with a wet finger; from whence, I travelled as boldly to the courts of all the kings in Christendom as if I had been an ambassador (his pomp only excepted).

Strange fashions did I pick (like worms) out of the fingers of every nation, a number of fantastic popinjays and apes (with faces like men) itching till they had got them. And (besides fashions) many wonders, worthy to be hung up (like shields with senseless bald impreses) in the white paper-gallery of a large chronicle. But this made me fret out worse than gummed taffeta: that neither in any one of those kingdoms (no, nor yet within the walls and waterworks of mine own country) could I either find or hear (for I gave a crier a King Harry groat to make an oyez), no nor read, of any man, woman or child left so well by their friends, or that carried such an honest mind to the commonwealth of the Castalians, as to keep open house for the seven poor liberal sciences, nor once (which even the rich cubs and fox-furred curmudgeons do) make them good cheer so much as at Christmas, when every cobbler has license (under the broad seal of hospitality) to sit cheek by jowl at the table of a very alderman's deputy.

What woodcocks then are these seven wise masters to answer to that worm-eaten name of 'liberal', seeing it has undone them? It's a name of the old fashion. It came up with the old religion, and went down with the new. Liberality has been a gentleman of a good house, and an ancient house, but now that old house (like the players' old hall at Dowgate) is fall'n to decay, and to repair it requires too much cost. My seven Latin-sellers have been liberal so long to others that now they have not a rag (or almost nothing but rags) left for themselves. Yea, and into such pitiful predicaments are they fallen that most of our gentry (besides the punies of the Inns of Court and Chancery) takes them for the seven deadly sins, and hate them worse than they hate whores. How much happier had it been for them to have changed their copies, and from sciences been bound to good occupations, considering that one London occupier (dealing uprightly with all men) puts up more in a week than seven Bachelors of Art (that every day go barely a-wooing to them) do in a year.

Hath not the plague, incomparable Nobody (and therefore 'incomparable', because with an Aeneas-like glory thou hast redeemed the golden tree of poesy, even out of the hellish scorn that this world, out of her Luciferan pride, hopes to damn it with)—hath it not, I say, done all men knight's service in working the downfall of our greatest and greediest beggars? Dicite lo Pæan, you young sophisticated fry of the universities! Break Priscian's pate (if he cross you) for joy. For had not the plague stuck to you in this case, six of your seven academical sweethearts (if I said all seven, I should not lie upon them) had long ere this (but that some doctors withstood it) been begged (not for wards—yet some of them have lodged, I can tell you,

53 with a wet finger with ease; as easily as turning the pages of a book after wetting one's finger with the tongue 56 Strange fashions It was proverbial that Englishmen picked up different styles of clothing from all over the world in the course of their travels.
worms ticks or mites
 57 popinjays parrots
 60 senseless bald impreses meaningless devices or mottoes used on coats-of-arms
 61 white paper-gallery a reference to pages of coats-of-arms printed in colour on one side of the paper in some books of heraldry and chronicles 62 fret out worse than gummed taffeta Taffeta was gummed to make it glossy, but the process damaged the fabric.
 64 waterworks sea-walls, piers, defences against force of water
 65 King Harry groat coin worth four pence from the reign of Henry VIII
 66 oyez 'hear ye', the call of a London crier
 68 Castalians those who have drunk from the fountain of Castalia on Mount Parnassus, sacred to the muses. In this case, university-educated writers.
 69 seven poor liberal sciences The seven liberal arts or 'sciences' were the seven parts of the educational curriculum.
 70 cubs troublesome youngsters fox-furred curmudgeons wealthy usurers (often depicted wearing fur gowns)
 70-1 make them good cheer entertain them 73 alderman's magistrate in charge of one of the London districts or 'wards' 74 woodcocks suckers, dupes

seven wise masters (punning on the title of a still-popular old jestbook, The Seven Wise Masters of Rome)
 77 the old religion Catholicism (as opposed to the 'new', Protestantism)
 79-80 the players' old hall at Dowgate Dowgate was one of the wards or administrative divisions of London. There may once have been a hall which served as a theatre on the street called Dowgate.
 81 seven Latin-sellers the seven liberal arts, here characterized as vendors of intellectual goods. The phrase may incorporate a pun on 'latten', a mixed metal of yellow colour.
 85 punies new students; freshmen
 85-6 the Inns of Court and Chancery institutions where the law was studied 86-7 seven deadly sins sins punishable by damnation according to the Catholic church; here mockingly associated with the seven liberal arts
 88-9 changed their copies altered their style or behaviour
 89 occupations trades, businesses
 90 occupier merchant, tradesman; also a term for a pimp
 91 puts up pockets
 92 barely bareheaded, hat in hat like a beggar
 95 Aeneas-like The hero Aeneas carried a golden tree or bough as an offering to the goddess of the underworld, Proserpina, when he visited hell (Aeneid 6.136 ff.).

 99 knight's service sterling service; a good turn 100 greatest and greediest beggars unemployed young men educated at university who follow the muses, that is, write for a living. Perhaps with particular reference to playwrights, since players were condemned as 'sturdy beggars' by the anti-theatrical lobby, and theatres were forced to close in times of plague
Dicite lo Pæan 'shout hurrah' (Ovid, Ars amatoria, 2.1)
 100-1 young sophisticated fry youngsters who play games with logic 101 Priscian's (AD 419-518) author of a Latin grammar much used in schools and universities
pate head
 103 six...sweethearts It is not clear which of the liberal arts is here being exempted from the charge of folly.
 104 lie upon them tell a lie about them; perhaps puns on 'lie with them'
 105-7 been begged...for Since the mentally ill ('fools') were wards in Chancery, 'to beg for a fool' was to petition the Court of Wards for his custody, which involved not only the charge of the person but also the complete control of such a one's estate.
 106 wards (a) someone under another person's protection; (b) 'fool'

in the Knight's Ward) but for mere Stones and Chesters. Fools, fools, and jesters! Because, whereas some of their chemical and alchemical raw disciples have learned (at their hands) to distil gold and silver out of very tavern bushes, old greasy knaves of diamonds, the dust of bowling alleys—yea, and, like Aesop's Gallus Gallinaceus, to scrape precious stones even out of dunghills—yet they themselves (poor harlotries) had never the grace nor the face to carry one penny in their own purses.

But to speak truth, my noble curer of the poetical madness for nothing, where should they have it? Let them be sent into the courts of princes, there they are so lordly that (unless they were bigger and taller of their hands than so many of the Guard) everyone looks over them, or if they give them anything, it's nothing but good looks. As for the city, that's so full of craftsmen there is no dealing with their mysteries. The nine muses stand in a brown study, when they come within their liberties, like so many mad wenches taken in a watch and brought before a bench of brown bills. O cives, cives! quærenda pecunia primum! Virtus post Nummos: 'first open your purses, and then be virtuous; part not with a penny.' The rich misers hold their own by this canon law. And for those (whom in English we call poor snakes), alas, they are barred (by the statute against beggars) from giving a dandiprat or a bawbee. In the camp there is nothing to be had but blows and provant, for soldiers had never worse doings. My sweet captain bestows his pipe of rich trinidado (taking the muses for Irish chimney-sweepers), and that's his talent. 135

Being in this melancholy contemplation, and having wept a whole inkhorn full of verses in bewailing the miseries of the time, on the sudden I started up, with my teeth bit my writings (because I would eat my words), condemned my pen-knife to the cutting of powder-beef and brewes, my paper to the drying and inflaming of tobacco, and my retirements to a more gentleman-like recreation, viz. Duke Humphrey's walk in Paul's—swearing five or six poetical furious oaths, that the goose-quill should never more gull me to make me shoot paper bullets into any stationer's shop or to serve under the weather-beaten colours of Apollo, seeing his pay was no better. Yet rememb'ring what a notable good fellow thou wert, the only Atlas that supports the Olympian honour of learning, and (out of thy horn of abundance) a continual benefactor to all scholars (thou matchless Nobody!), I set up my rest, and vowed to consecrate all my blotting papers only to thee. And not content to dignify thee with that love and honour of myself, I summoned all the rhymesters, play-patchers, 107 the Knight's Ward One of the better apartments in the Counter, a debtors' prison in London. It was occupied by prisoners with the means to pay for their upkeep.

Stones and Chesters Stone was a professional jester; Charles Chester a well-known braggart of the 1590s.

109 chemical...disciples amateur practitioners of the sciences of chemistry and alchemy. Alchemists hoped to 'distil gold and silver' (110-11) out of base metals. Here innkeepers (who make money from alcohol) and gamblers (who make money from cards and bowling alleys) are identified as the most successful alchemists in Jacobean England.

110-11 tavern bushes Many taverns advertised themselves with a bush instead of a sign.

111 greasy knaves of diamonds gambling with cards

112 Aesop's Gallus Gallinaceus Aesop (6th century BC) was a Greek writer famous for his animal fables. In his fable of gallus gallinaceus or 'the dunghill cock', a cock failed to recognize the value of a jewel it dug out of the dung on which it lived.

114 harlotries knaves or whores

119 taller of their hands more accomplished fighters

120 looks over them (pun on 'overlooks them')

123 mysteries skills, sometimes secret ones, involved in practising trade and manufacturing crafts

124 brown study daze

come within their liberties enter the district over which they (the craftsmen) have jurisdiction

125 mad wenches prostitutes taken in a watch arrested in a night

126 bench of brown bills panel of night watchmen, who carried long-handled weapons called 'brown bills'

126-7 O cives...Nummos 'O citizens, citizens! Seek money first of all! Virtue after Wealth' (Horace, Epistles, 1.1.53-4)

130 poor snakes poor people

they i.e. the rich

131 statute against beggars Act 'for the suppressing of rogues, vagabonds and sturdy beggars' (1598)

dandiprat small coin worth three half-pence

132 bawbee Scottish coin worth about half a penny

In the camp among the military

133 provant soldiers' rations

134 trinidado the best tobacco, imported from Trinidad

135 Irish chimney-sweepers seem to have been common in London. Chimney-sweepers were often associated with smoking, perhaps because tobacco was thought to offer some protection against the lung diseases to which their work made them vulnerable.

talent wealth; i.e. that's all he can afford

140 pen-knife used continually to trim the tip of a pen made from a goose-quill as it became blunt in the course of writing

140-1 powder-beef and brewes salted beef, and bread soaked in the broth made from it

143 Duke Humphrey's walk in Paul's one of the aisles in St Paul's cathedral, where the tomb of Humphrey Duke of Gloucester was supposed to stand: a popular meeting-place for gallants, i.e. fashionable, idle men

144 poetical furious oaths swearing outrageous oaths was a necessary skill for gallants goose-quill pen made from the quill of a goose

145 gull trick, con

bullets possible pun on 'billets', small documents or papers, which could also be written 'bullets'. Probably a reference to offering manuscripts to a publisher

146-7 colours of Apollo military flag of Apollo, god of poetry

148 good fellow good companion, usually a drinking partner

Atlas in Greek mythology, a Titan condemned to carry the heavens on his head and hands

149 Olympian Mount Olympus was the home of the Greek gods.

150 horn of abundance cornucopia, the horn of the goat Amalthea which suckled the infant Zeus. A metaphor for limitless fertility or generosity, the cornucopia was also used by early modern writers to signify writerly inventiveness.

151 set up my rest staked everything

154-5 play-patchers...pamphlet-stitchers perhaps those who cobble together plays and pamphlets from other people's work

The Epistle Dedicatory.

155 jig-makers, ballad-mongers, and pamphlet-stitchers (being the yeomanry of the company) together with all those whom Theocritus calls the muses' birds (being the Masters and head Wardens) and before them all made an encomiastical oration in praise of Nobody (scilicet your proper self), pronouncing them asses, and threat'ning to have them pressed to serve at sea in the Ship of Fools, if ever hereafter they taught their lines (like water spaniels) to fetch any thing that were thrown out of them, or to dive into the unworthy commendations of Lucius Apuleius, or any Golden Ass of them all, being for their pains clapped only on the shoulder and sent away dropping, whenas thy leathern bags stand more open than seacoal sacks, more bounteously to reward them.

170 I had no sooner cut out thy virtues in these large cantles but all the synagogue of scribes gave a plaudite, crying out viva voce, with one loud throat, that all their verses should henceforth have more feet and take longer strides than if they went upon stilts, only to carry thy glorious praises over the earth, and that none but Nobody should lick the fat of their inventions; that dukes, earls, lords and ladies should have their ill-liberal names torn out of those books whose authors they sent away with a flea in their ear, and the style of Nobody in capital roman letters bravely printed in their places.

180 Hereupon crowding their heads together, and amongst themselves canvassing more and more thy inexplicable worth, all of them (as inspired) burst suddenly forth and sung extemporal odes in thine honour and palinodes in recantation of all former good opinions held of niggardly patrons—one of them magnifying thee, for that in this pestiferous shipwreck of Londoners, when the pilot, boat-swains, master and master's mates, with all the chief mariners that had charge in this goodly argosy of government leapt from the stern, struck all the sails from the mainyard to the mizzen, never looked to the compass, never sounded in places of danger, nor so much as put out their close-fights when they saw a most cruel man-of-war pursue them, but suffered all to sink or swim, crying out only 'Put your trust in God, my bullies, and not in us!', whilst they either hid themselves under hatches or else scrambled to shore in cockboats, yet thou, undaunted Nobody, then, even then, didst stand stoutly to thy tackling, step courageously to the helm, and manfully run up and down, encouraging those (with comfortable words) whose hearts lay coldly in their bellies. Another lifted thee up above the third heaven for playing the constable's part so rarely—and not as your common constables (charging poor sick wretches that had neither meat nor money 'in the King's name' to keep their houses, that's to say, to famish and die), but discharging whole baskets full of victuals (like volleys of shot) in at their windows, thou, only thou, most charitable Nobody, madest them as fat as butter and preserved'st their lives. A third extolled thy martial discipline in appointing ambushes of surgeons and apothecaries to lie close in every ward, of purpose to cut off any convoy that brought the plague succour. A fourth swore at the next impression of The Chronicles to have thy name, with the year of our Lord (and certain hexameter verses underneath) all in great golden letters, wherein thy fame should be consecrated to eternal memory for carefully purchasing convenient plots of ground only for

- 155 jig-makers, ballad-mongers writers of popular verses often set to music.
- 156 yeomanry junior members of a guild, or company; in this case, writers of plays, jigs, ballads, and pamphlets
- 157 Theocritus Greek poet (c.270 BC) the muses' birds i.e. bad but arrogant poets (Theocritus, idyll 7.47–8: 'I hate the birds of the muses, who struggle to rival Homer with their cackling')
- 157–8 Masters and head Wardens chief officials of a guild
- 158–9 encomiastical oration formal speech of praise
- 159–60 scilicet your proper self 'that is, your own self'
- 161 the Ship of Fools title of a popular book by Alexander Barclay (1475?–1552), published in 1509. It was a translation of Sebastian Brandt's Narrenschiff (1494).
- 162 water spaniels spaniels trained to put up birds from water for marksmen to shoot at, as opposed to 'land spaniels' which sought out game on land
- 164 Lucius Apuleius author (AD c.155) of The Golden Ass, the story of a writer who is changed by magic into a randy donkey
- 166 dropping drooping, disconsolate; with a pun on dripping, as a spaniel would after chasing something thrown into water

- 167 seacoal sacks sacks for carrying coal ('seacoal' was ordinary, mineral coal as opposed to charcoal)
- 169 cantles sections
- 170 plaudite shout of approval
- 171 viva voce loudly
- 175 inventions i.e. verses
- 177 with a flea in their ear proverbial: with biting words. An attack on aristocratic dedicatees who refuse to reward authors for dedicating books to them
- 178 style correct form of address
- in capital roman letters in a modern typeface, as opposed to Gothic type or 'black letter'
- 181 canvassing discussing
- 183 palinodes poems or songs in which something that has been said is retracted; versified recantations
- 188 argosy large merchant-ship
- 191 sounded To 'sound' is to measure the depth of the water in shallow or rocky places, using a lead weight attached to a knotted rope or cord
- 192 close-fights canvas cloths or wooden gratings designed to screen a ship's crew from an enemy
- man-of-war fighting ship
- 194 bullies friends, mates

- 196 cockboats small boats carried on shipboard
- 197–8 tackling block and tackle, and ropes used to control the sails
- 201 the third heaven the paradise to which St Paul was lifted (2 Corinthians 12:2)
- 202 rarely well
- 203–4 'in the King's name' the phrase by which Jacobean constables asserted their authority to arrest offenders
- 204 keep their houses stay indoors (the usual period of quarantine for plague was forty days)
- 205 famish starve
- 210 lie close lie hidden (in ambush)
- ward administrative division of the city
- 212 The Chronicles A Summary of English Chronicles, by John Stow (1525–1605), was first published in 1565, and continued to be republished in an abridged form until 1618. Stow's The Chronicles of England (1580) was reprinted and expanded (as The Annals of England) in 1592 and 1601.
- 213–14 hexameter verses verses of six metrical feet
- 214 great golden letters extremely rare printing with gold ink and a 40-point titling font

burials (and those out of the City too, as they did in Jerusalem) to the intent that threescore (contrary to an Act of Common Council against inmates) might not be pestered together in one little hole where they lie and rot, but that a poor man might for his money have elbow-room, and not have his guts thrust out to be eaten up with paltry worms, lest when in hot and dry summers (that are yet not dreamed on), those musty bodies putrefying, the inavoidable stench of their strong breath be smelled out by the sun—and then there's new work for clerks and sextons.

Thus had everyone a flirt at thy praises. If thou hadst been begged to have played an anatomy in Barber Surgeons' Hall, thy good parts could not have been more curiously ripped up. They dived into the very bowels of thy hearty commendations. So that I—that (like a match) scarce gave fire before to the dankish powder of their apprehensions—was now burnt up myself in the flames of a more ardent affection towards thee, kindled by them. For presently the court broke up and (without a quarter dinner) all parted, their heads being great with child and aching very pitifully till they were delivered of hymns, hexasticons, paeans, and such other panegyricall stuff, which everyone thought seven year till he had brought forth, to testify the love that he bore to Nobody. In advancement of whose honour—and this was sworn upon a pen and inkhorn instead of a sword; yet they all write Tam marti quàm mercurio, but how lawfully let the heralds have an eye to't—they vowed and swore very terribly to sacrifice the very lives of their invention. And when they wanted ink (as many of them do, wanting money) or had no more (like a Chancery man) but one pen in all the world, parcel of their oath was to write with their blood and a broomstick before they would sit idle.

Accept therefore (for handsel-sake) these curtal rhymes of ours, thou capon-feaster of scholars. I call them News from Gravesend. Be it known unto thy non-residence that I come not near that Gravesend which takes his beginning in Kent, by twenty miles at least. But the end of those graves do I shoot at, which were cast up here in London to stand as landmarks for every parish, to teach them how far they were to go, laying down (so well as I can) the manner how death and his army of pestilent archers entered the field, and how every arrow that they drew did almost cleave a heart in sunder. Read over but one leaf, dear Nobody, and thou put'st upon me an armour of proof against the rankling teeth of those mad dogs (called book-biters) that run barking up and down Paul's churchyard and bite the muses by the shins. Commend thou my labours, and I will labour only to commend thee—for, thy humour being pleased, all the mewing critists in the world shall not fright me. I know the stationers will wish me and my papers burnt (like heretics) at the Cross, if thou dost (now) but enter into their shops by my means. It would fret their hearts to see thee at their stalls reading my News. Yet therein they deal doubly, and like notable dissemblers, for all the time of this plaguy alarum they marched only under thy colours, desired none but thy company, none but thyself wert welcome to them, none but Nobody (as they all cried out to thine immortal commendations) bought books off them. Nobody was their best and most bounteous customer. Fie on this hollow-hearted world! Do they shake thee off now? Be wise, and come not near them by twelve score at least; so shalt thou not need to 217-18 as they did in Jerusalem The tomb that belonged to Joseph of Arimathea, where Christ was buried, stood outside the walls of Jerusalem.

218-19 Act of Common Council The Court of Common Council passed several laws against filling houses with inmates—that is, with more than one family or household.

226-7 new work for clerks and sextons new graves to be dug (by sextons) and burial services read (by clerks), as a result of the contagion spread by sloppily buried corpses

228 flirt sharp blow; rap

229 have played an anatomy served as a subject for anatomical demonstrations

236 court assembly

236-7 quarter dinner dinner held once a quarter

239 hexasticons groups of six lines of verse paeans songs of praise or thanksgiving panegyricall stuff material for praising Nobody 244 Tam marti quàm mercurio 'Dedicated as much to Mars (the god of war) as to Mercury (the god of learning)'. A motto legitimately used by writers such as George Gascoigne (1539?-1577), who had served in the army.

246 invention creativity

247 wanted lacked

248 Chancery man attorney or clerk at the Inns of Chancery. Chancery lawyers acted for the poor, and were considered to be of a lower social status than those of the Inns of Court; hence the Chancery man's poverty.

249 parcel part

251 for handsel-sake as a handsel, i.e. a thing given in advance, as a promise of future gifts

curtal rhymes octosyllabic couplets. A 'curtal' was a horse with its tail docked.

252 capon-feaster of scholars one who feasts academics with chickens

253 Gravesend a town in Kent at the mouth of the Thames, visited by ships entering and leaving the port of London. In 1568 Sir Robert Martyn proposed that ships from infected harbours should be quarantined there for forty days, and this proposal was sporadically put into practice from then on. The German traveller Thomas Platter visited Gravesend in 1599, and reported that 'there is very little to be seen'.

255-6 the end...shoot at a metaphor from archery: 'I mean the graves'

257 landmarks objects set up to mark a boundary line

260-1 every arrow...almost almost every arrow

262 armour of proof armour whose resistance to bullets had been proved by having bullets fired at it

263-4 book-biters pun on 'backbiters', slanderers

264 Paul's churchyard the churchyard of St Paul's Cathedral, where most London printers and booksellers had their shops

267 humour inclination, taste
critists critics

269 the Cross Paul's Cross in Paul's churchyard, where books offensive to the church authorities were burned, as they were on one famous occasion in 1599: see Microcynicon

272 deal doubly engage in double-dealing

273 alarum a call to arms

274 colours banner, flag

280 twelve score Few archers could hit a target at twelve score (240) yards.

care what disgraces they shoot at thee. But leaving them to their old tune of 'What new books do you lack?', prick up thine ears like a March hare (at the sudden cry of a kennel of hounds) and listen what news the post that's come from Winchester Term winds out of his horn.

O that thou hadst taken a lease there, happy Nobody, but for one month! The place had, for thy sake, been well spoken of for ever. Many did heartily pray—especially watermen and players, besides the drawers, tapsters, butchers, and innholders, with all the rest of the hungry commonalty of Westminster—for thy going thither. Ten thousand in London swore to feast their neighbours with nothing but plum porridge and mince pies all Christmas (that now for anger will not bestow a crust on a beggar) upon condition that all the judges, serjeants, barristers and attorneys had not set a foot out of doors, but that thou only (in pomp), saving them that labour, hadst rode that journey, so greedily did they thirst after thy preferment. For hadst thou been there, those black buckram tragedies had never been seen that there have been acted. Alas! It's a beastly thing to report. But—truth must out!—poor dumb horses were made mere jades, being used so villainously that they durst neither whinny nor wag tail. And though the riders of them had grown never so choleric and chaffed till they foamed again, an ostler to walk them was not to be had for love or money. Neither could the geldings (even of gentlemen) get leave (for all they sweat till they dropped again) to stand as they had wont at rack and manger—no, no, 'twas enough for their masters to have that honour; but now, against all equity, were they called (when thy little thought of any such matter) to a dear reckoning for all their old wild oats.

A conspiracy there was amongst all the innkeepers that Jack Straw (an ancient rebel) should choke all the horses—and the better to bring this to pass, a bottle of hay was sold dearer than a bottle of wine at London. A truss cost more than Master Mayor's truss of Forditch, with the sleeves and belly-piece all of bare satin to boot. Which knavery being smelled out, the horsemen grew politic, and never sat down to dinner, but their nags were still at their elbows. So that it grew to be as ordinary a question to ask 'What shall I pay for a chamber for myself and my gelding all night?' (because they would not be jaded any more) as in other country towns '—for my wife and myself'. For a beast and a man were entertained both alike, and that in such wonderful sort that they'll speak of it in aeternam rei memoriam. For most of their rooms were fairly built (out of the ground, but not out of the dirt) like Irish hovels, hung round about with cobweb-lawn very richly, and furnished no alderman's parlour in London like them. For here's your bed, there a stable, and that a hog-sty, yet so artificially contrived that they stand all under one roof, to the amazement of all that behold them.

But what a childishness is it to get up thus upon their hobby-horses! Let them bite o' the bridle, whilst we have about with the men. As for the women, they may laugh and lie down; it's a merry world with them, but somebody pays for it. O Winchester! Much mutton hast thou to answer for, which thou hast made away (being sluttishly fried out in steaks, or in burnt carbonadoes). Thy maid-servants best know how, if they were called to an account. It was happy for some that four of the returns were cut off, for if they had held together many a one had never returned from thence his own man. O beware! Your 282 'What...lack?' 'What do you lack?' was a familiar seller's cry.

 283 March hare March is the mating season for hares, when they are said to go mad.
 284 post letter-bearer, who blows a horn to signal his arrival
 285 Winchester Term During the plague of 1604 the Michaelmas term (beginning 10 October; one of the four terms during which the London law courts were in session) was held at Winchester.
 289 watermen oarsmen who ferry passengers up and down the Thames drawers, tapsters those who draw liquor for customers at a tavern 291 commonalty the common people; those below the rank of gentry
 299 black buckram tragedies buckram was a coarse cloth; black buckram the traditional wear for tragedies
 302 made mere jades To make a horse a jade is to exhaust it by working it too hard; 'to make a jade of' people is to fool them. The passage refers to the exorbitant prices charged for the upkeep of horses while the lawcourts met at Winchester.

303-4 they durst...tail proverbial: the horses didn't dare to draw attention to themselves
 307-8 for all...dropped again despite the fact that they worked till the sweat dripped off them
 308-9 stand...at rack and manger live in plenty, want for nothing 314 Jack Straw one of the leaders of the Rising of the Commons in 1381. Here his name refers to the triumph of the commons over the gentry at Winchester, where the cost of straw for gentlemen's horses was artificially raised by innkeepers.
 315-16 bottle of hay bundle of hay
 317 truss...truss puns on two meanings of truss: 'a bundle' and 'a closely fitting jacket or breeches'
Forditch may refer to Fordwich near Canterbury 318 belly-piece the part of the jacket that covers the belly
 320 politic cunning
 321 ordinary (a) frequent or regular; (b) a regular daily meal or allowance of food
 324 jaded conned

327 in aeternam rei memoriam 'in perpetual remembrance of the thing'
 329 cobweb-lawn very fine linen: mockingly refers to the cobwebs bedecking the seedy chambers made available to gentlemen at Winchester 334-5 get...hobby-horses play the fool. A hobby-horse was a figure of fun in a morris dance.
 335 bite o' the bridle restrain themselves 336 have about with have a go at 337 laugh and lie down a card game (with a sexual quibble), in which the women are collecting all the winnings
 338 mutton (a) women's genitals; (b) whores 340 sluttishly sloppily; a 'slut' is a whore carbonadoes meat scored across and grilled 342-3 four...cut off There were eight returns in Michaelmas term (10th October-28th November); that is, eight days on which the Sheriffs' reports were returned to the law courts. In 1603 the first four of these returns did not take place at Winchester.

345 Winchester goose is ten times more dangerous to surfeit upon than your St Nicholas Shambles capon.

350 You talk of a plague in London, and red crosses set upon doors, but ten plagues cannot melt so many crosses of silver out of lawyers' purses as the Winchesterians (with a hey-pas! repas!) juggled out of theirs to put into their own. Patient they were, I must needs confess, for they would pocket up anything, came it never so wrongfully, insomuch that very good substantial householders have oftentimes gone away with cracked crowns and never complained of them that gave them. If ever money were current (a currendo, of running away), now was the time. It ran from the poor clients to the attorneys and clerks of bands in small troops (here ten, and there twenty), but when the leaguers of Winchester cried 'Charge, charge!', the lawyers paid for't; they went to the pot full dearly, and the townsmen still carried away all the noble and royal victories. So that, being puffed up with an opinion that the Silver Age was crept into the world again, they denied (in a manner) the King's coin, for a penny was no money with them. Whensoever there shall come forth a prest for soldiers, thither let it be sent, for by all the opinion of the best captains that had a charge there, and have tried them, the men of Winchester are the only serviceable men this day in England. The reason is, they care no more to venture among small shots than to be at the discharging of so many cans of beer. Tush! 'tis their desire to see those that enter upon them to come off soundly, that when they are gone all the world may bear witness they came to their cost.

375 And being thus night and day employed, and continually ent'ring into action, it makes them have mighty stomachs, so that they are able to soak and devour all that come in their way. A rapier and a cloak have been eaten up at a supper as clean (and carried away well, too) as if they had been but two rabbit-suckers. A nag served but one servingman to a breakfast, whilst the saddle and bridle were brewed into a quart of strong beer.

This intolerable destroying of victuals being looked into, the inhabitants laid their heads together and agreed among themselves (for the general good of the whole town) to make it a town of garrison. And seeing the desperate termers, that strove in law together, in such a pitiful pickle, and every day so dirty that when they met their counsel they looked like the black guard fighting with the Inns of Court, that therefore all the householders should turn Turk and be victuallers to the camp. By this means, having the law in their own hands, they ruled the roost how they listed; insomuch, that a common jug of double beer scorned to kiss the lips of a knight under a groat. Six hours' sleep could not be bought under five shillings. Yea, in some places a night's lodging was dearer than the hire of a courtesan in Venice twice so long. And having learned the tricks of London sextons, there they laid four or five in a bed, as here those other knaves of spades thrust nine and ten into one grave—beds keeping such a jostling of one another in every room that in the day time the lodgings looked like so many upholsters' shops, and in the night time like the Savoy, or St Thomas' hospital. At which, if any guest did but once bite his lip or grumble, he was cashiered the company for a mutinous fellow; the place was not for him; let him trudge. A number stood with petitions ready to give money for the reversion of it, for Winchester now durst (or at least hoped to) stand upon proud terms with London. And this, thou beloved of all men, is the very pith and marrow of the 345 Winchester goose a swelling in the groin caused by syphilis. The brothels of Southwark came within the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Winchester.

346 St Nicholas Shambles capon The poulterers of London moved to St Nicholas Shambles in 1603. A capon is a castrated cockerel.

347 red crosses (used to mark the doors of houses infected by plague)

348-9 crosses of silver coins stamped with the figure of a cross

350 hey-pas! repas! terms used by jugglers

354 cracked crowns broken heads; also, worthless coins. Coins were stamped with a ring inside which the sovereign's head was placed. A coin containing a crack extending inside the ring was unfit for currency.

356 current (a currendo, of running away) The writer claims that the word 'current' is derived from the Latin verb currere, to run, because currency is always escaping from people's grasp.

357-8 clerks of bands 'bands' are collars such as lawyers wore. 'Clerks of bands' may mean unqualified attorneys who acted on behalf of those who could not afford to hire lawyers educated at the Inns of Court.

359 leaguers members of a league or gang
Charge, charge! a battle-cry; also puns on charging for room, board, and other services

360 went...dearly paid a lot for a drink

361 noble and royal (pun on two coins)

362-3 the Silver Age in classical mythology, the second of the seven ages of the world; i.e. the people of Winchester would not take anything less than silver for their services

363-4 denied...King's coin refused to accept legal currency, by regarding a penny as worthless

365 prest forced enlistment

367 had a charge commanded troops

368 the only serviceable men the only men fit for military service

370 small shots musket bullets, as opposed to cannon balls

372 come off soundly pay dearly for it

376-7 mighty stomachs (a) great courage; (b) inordinate greed

380 rabbit-suckers young rabbits

386 town of garrison town under military command

387 termers those who attend the law courts in term-time

389 black guard lowest-paid domestic servants; scullions, kitchen-boys etc., whose work involved getting dirty

391 turn Turk become apostates, i.e. change their profession

victuallers suppliers of food

395 groat coin worth four pennies. The usual price of a quart of best beer was a penny.

399-400 knives of spades refers to the practices of London sextons or gravediggers who crammed nine or ten bodies into one grave to save money and labour, and who therefore cheated their customers as gamblers cheat their opponents at cards

403-4 the Savoy, or St Thomas' hospital two London hospitals

405 cashiered thrown out of (literally, dismissed from military or domestic service in disgrace)

408 reversion of it right of obtaining it at some future time best and latest news (except the unmasking of certain treasons) that came with the post from Winchester, where if thou hadst hired a chamber—as would to heaven thou hadst!—thou wouldst never have gone to any barber’s in 415 London whilst thou hadst lived, but have been trimmed only there, for they are the true shavers; they have the right Neapolitan polling.

To whose commendations, let me glue this piece more:
that it is the most excellent place for dispatching of old 420 suits in the world—for a number of riding suits (that had lain long in lavender) were worn out there, only with serving amongst the hot shots that marched there up and down. Let Westminster therefore, Temple Bar, and Fleet Street, drink off this draught of rosa solis to fetch life into 425 them again after their so often swooning that those few jurors that went thither (if any did go thither) have ta’en an oath never to sit at Winchester ordinary again, if they can choose, but rather to break their fasts in the old abbey behind Westminster with pudding pies and furmenty.

Deliver copies of these Newses, good Nobody, to none of thy acquaintance (as thou tender’st me), and thou shalt command any service at my hands. For I have an intent to hire three or four ballad-makers who, I know, will be glad for sixpence and a dinner to turn all this limping 435 prose into more perfectly-halting verse, that it shall do any true-born citizen’s heart good to hear such doings sung to some filthy tune. And so farewell. Turn over a new leaf, and try if I handle the plague in his right kind.

Devoted to none but thyself,
440 Somebody

Newses from Gravesend

To sickness and to queasy times
We drink a health in wholesome rhymes.
Physic, we invoke thy aid,
445 Thou that (born in heaven) art made

A lackey to the meanest creature;
Mother of health, thou nurse of nature,
Equal friend to rich and poor,
At whose hands kings can get no more Than empty beggars; O thou wise 450
In nothing but in mysteries!
Thou that hast of earth the rule,
Where (like an academe, or school)
Thou read’st deep lectures to thy sons,
Men’s demigods, physicians, 455
Who thereby learn the abstruse powers
Of herbs, of roots, of plants, of flowers,
And suck from poisonous stinking weed
Preservatives, man’s life to feed.
Thou nearest to a god—for none 460
Can work it, but a god alone—
O grave enchantress, deign to breathe
Thy spells into us, and bequeath
Thy sacred fires, that they may shine
In quick and virtual medicine. 465
Arm us to convince this foe,
This king of dead men, conquering so,
This hungry plague, cater to death,
Who eats up all, yet famisheth.
Teach us how we may repair 470
These ruins of the rotten air,
Or if the air’s pollution can
So mortal strike through beast and man,
Or if in blood corrupt Death lie,
Or if one dead cause others die. 475
Howe’er, thy sovereign cures disperse,
And with that glory crown our verse,
That we may yet save many a soul
(Perchance, now merry at his bowl)
That ere our tragic song be done 480
Must drink this thick contagion.
But—O grief!—why do we accite
The charms of Physic? Whose numbed sprite
Now quakes, and nothing dare or can,
Checked by a more dread magician. 485
Sick is Physic’s self to see
Her aphorisms proved a mockery.

412 treasons In November 1603 Lord Grey of Wilton, Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh were tried for treason at Winchester.

415 trimmed cheated. Barbers were supposed to be inveterate cheats.

416–17 the right Neapolitan polling ‘Polling’ means both the cutting of hair and extortion. Naples was associated with syphilis, whose treatment caused loss of hair. Presumably, the inhabitants of Winchester sent Londoners home with the clap as well as with empty pockets.

419–20 dispatching of old suits bringing old lawsuits to a conclusion

422 hot shots cannon balls heated up so as to set fire to any combustible substance they struck; hence, hotheads, troublemakers

423–4 Temple Bar, and Fleet Street streets adjacent to the Inns of Court, where business would have been badly affected by the lawyers’ absence

424 rosa solis a medicine originally made with the juice of the plant sundew, and later with brandy

429 furmenty a dish made of wheat boiled in milk, seasoned with sugar and spice
437–8 Turn . . . leaf (The verses began on a new page.)

442 queasy unhealthy

453 academe academy

465 virtual effective

466 convince defeat

468 cater caterer

471 rotten air plague was sometimes thought to have been caused, or at least aggravated, by corrupt atmospheric conditions

472 Or if whether

479 at his bowl drinking. It was widely believed that heavy drinking could protect the body against plague.

482 accite summon, call on

483 sprite spirit

487 aphorisms (alluding to various medical treatises with that title, including the Aphorismes of the ancient Greek medical writer Hippocrates)

For, whilst she's turning o'er her books
 And on her drugs and simples lookes,
 490 She's run through her own armèd heart,
 Th'infection flying above art.
 Come, therefore, thou the best of nine (Because the saddest), every line
 That drops from sorrow's pen is due 495 Only to thee; to thee we sue.
 Thou tragic maid, whose fury's spent
 In dismal and most black ostent,
 In uproars and in fall of kings,
 Thou of empire's change that sings,
 500 Of dearths, of wars, of plagues, and laughs
 At funerals and epitaphs,
 Carouse thou to our thirsty soul
 A full draught from the Thespian bowl,
 That we may pour it out again
 505 And drink, in numbers, juice to men,
 Striking such horrors through their ears
 Their hair may upright stand with fears
 Till rich heirs meeting our strong verse
 May not shrink back before it pierce
 510 Their marble eyeballs, and there shed
 One drop (at least) for him that's dead.
 To work which wonder, we will write
 With pens pulled from that bird of night,
 The shrieking owl; our ink we'll mix
 515 With tears of widows, black as Styx;
 The paper where our lines shall meet
 Shall be a folded winding-sheet;
 And that the scene may show more full,
 The standish is a dead man's skull.
 520 Inspire us therefore how to tell
 The horror of a plague, the hell.

The cause of the plague

Nor drops this venom from that fair
 And crystal bosom of the air,
 525 Whose ceaseless motion clarifies
 All vaporous stench that upward flies,
 And with her universal wings
 Thick poisonous fumes abroad she flings
 Till (like to thunder), rudely tossed,
 530 Their malice is (by spreading) lost.
 Yet must we grant that—from the veins
 Of rottenness and filth that reigns

O'er heaps of bodies slain in war,
 From carrion (that endangers far),
 From standing pools, or from the wombs
 535 Of vaults, of muckhills, graves, and tombs,
 From bogs, from rank and dampish fens,
 From moorish breaths and nasty dens—
 The sun draws up contagious fumes
 Which, falling down, burst into rheums 540 And thousand maladies beside,
 By which our blood grows putrefied.
 Or, being by winds not swept from thence,
 They hover there in clouds condense
 Which, sucked in by our spirits, there flies
 545 Swift poison through our arteries,
 And (not resisted) straight it chokes
 The heart with those pestiferous smokes.
 Thus Physic and Philosophy
 Do preach, and (with this) salves apply, 550 Which search, and use with speed. But now
 This monster breeds not thus. For how (If this be proved) can any doubt
 But that the air does (round about)
 In flakes of poison drop on all,
 555 The sore being spread so general?
 Nor dare we so conclude. For then Fruits, fishes, foul, nor beasts nor men Should 'scape untainted. Grazing flocks
 Would feed upon their graves; the ox
 560 Drop at the plough; the travelling horse
 Would for a rider bear a corse;
 Th'ambitious lark (the bird of state),
 Whose wings do sweep heaven's pearlèd gate,
 As she descended then would bring 565 Pestilent news under each wing;
 Then rivers would drink poisoned air;
 Trees shed their green and curlèd hair;
 Fish swim to shore full of disease
 (For pestilence would fin the seas),
 570 And we should think their scaly barks,
 Having small speckles, had the marks.
 No soul could move. But sure there lies
 Some vengeance more than in the skies.
 Nor (as a taper, at whose beams
 575 Ten thousand lights fetch golden streams,
 And yet itself is burnt to death)
 Can we believe that one man's breath

489 simples medicines

492 best of nine best of the nine muses

497 ostent appearance

503 Thespian bowl Thespis (6th century bc) was credited with being the founder of Greek tragedy. The Thespian bowl is therefore the cup of tragedy.

505 numbers metre, verse juice bodily fluids, necessary to combat disease

514 shrieking owl considered a bad omen

515 Styx in Greek and Roman mythology,

one of the rivers of the underworld

517 winding-sheet cloth in which corpses

were wrapped

519 standish ink-stand

534 far from a distance

537 dampish vaporous

538 moorish breaths fumes from swamps

540 rheums colds

542 grows putrefied festers; becomes putrid

or gangrenous

544 condense thick

545 spirits breath

549 Philosophy natural science

550 salves remedies

556 sore... general the disease being spread so universally

562 corse corpse

563 lark (considered ambitious because it soars heavenwards as it sings)

572 marks otherwise known as tokens: physical symptoms of plague

575-7 taper... death a taper which is used to light ten thousand candles but which burns up as it does so

580 Infected, and being blown from him,
His poison should to others swim—
For then who breathed upon the first?
Where did th'imbulkèd venom burst?
Or how 'scaped those that did divide
The self-same bits with those that died?
585 Drunk of the self-same cups, and lay
In ulcerous beds as close as they?
Or those who, every hour (like crows)
Prey on dead carcasses, their nose
Still smelling to a grave, their feet
590 Still wrapped within a dead man's sheet?—
Yet, the sad execution done,
Careless among their cans they run,
And there (in scorn of death or fate)
Of the deceased they wildly prate,
595 Yet snore untouched, and next day rise
To act in more new tragedies.
Or (like so many bullets flying)
A thousand here and there being dying,
Death's text-bill clapped on every door,
600 Crosses on sides, behind, before,
Yet he (i'th' midst) stands fast—from whence Comes this? You'll say, 'From providence'.
'Tis so, and that's the common spell
That leads our ignorance (blind as hell), 605 And serves but as excuse to keep
The soul from search of things more deep.
No, no, this black and burning star (Whose sulphured drops do scald so far)
Does neither hover o'er our heads, 610 Nor lies it in our bloods, nor beds;
Nor is it stitched to our attires,
Nor like wild balls of running fires
Nor thunderbolts, which where they light
Do either bruise or kill outright,
615 Yet by the violence of that bound Leap off, and give a second wound.
But this fierce dragon, huge and foul,
Sucks virid poison from our soul,
Which, being spit forth again, there reigns 620 Showers of blisters and of blains,
For every man within him feeds

A worm, which this contagion breeds.
Our heavenly parts are plaguy sick,
And there such leprous spots do stick
That God in anger fills his hand
625 With vengeance, throwing it on the land.
Sure, 'tis some capital offence,
Some high high treason doth incense Th'eternal king, that thus we are Arraigned at death's most dreadful bar,
630 Th'indictment writ on England's breast—
When other countries, better blest,
Feel not the judge's heavy doom,
Whose breath (like lightning) doth consume
And (with a whip of planets) scourges
635 The veins of mortals, in whom surges
Of sinful blood, billows of lust,
Stir up the pow'rs to acts unjust.
Whether they be princes' errors
Or faults of peers, pull down these terrors,
640 Or (because we may not err Let's sift it in particular)
The courtier's pride, lust, and excess,
The churchman's painted holiness,
The lawyer's grinding of the poor,
645 The soldier's starving at the door
(Rag'd, lean, and pale through want of blood, Sold cheap by him for country's good),
The scholar's envy, farmer's curse—
When heav'n's rich treasurer doth disburse
650 In bounteous heaps (to thankless men)
His universal blessings, then
This delving mole for madness eats
Even his own lungs, and strange oaths sweats
Because he cannot sell for pence
655 Dear years in spite of providence.
Add unto these the city-sin (Brought by seven deadly monsters in)
Which doth all bounds and blushing scorn,
Because 'tis in the freedom born.
660 What trains of vice (which even hell hates)
But have bold passage through her gates?
Pride in diet, pride in clothing,
Pride in building, pure in nothing—

582 th'imbulkèd contained in the body burst i.e. first break out 584 bits portions of food 589 smelling to seeking out graves by the smell of the corpses
592 cans jugs of beer
599 text-bill placard serving as an advertisement
603 common spell usual story 607 black and burning star refers to the plague, or its unknown cause, as a star or planet which has an evil influence on human affairs
608 sulphured sulphurous
618 virid green
620 blains swellings, sores

623 heavenly parts eternal soul; intellect and conscience
624 spots sins
633 doom sentence
635 whip of planets refers to the theological view that the Providential Will intervened in human affairs both directly (through miracles etc.) and indirectly, through astrological conjunctions
641 because so that
642 sift analyse
644 painted fake 647 Rag'd 'in rags' (not necessarily the same thing as 'ragged') 653 delving burrowing: applied to the rich farmer who works the soil

656 Dear years that is, the produce of 'dear years' or years when grain was in short supply. The farmer who wants to sell
'Dear years in spite of Providence' is one who wants to treat every year as a year of shortages by selling his produce at the highest possible price, thus usurping Providence's prerogative of controlling the seasons.
657 city-sin (punning on 'citizen')
658 seven deadly monsters i.e. the Seven Deadly Sins
660 the freedom a district of London which enjoyed special privileges: exemption from certain taxes, etc.

News from Graues ende.

665	And that she may not want disease, She sails for it beyond the seas. With Antwerp will she drink up Rhine, With Paris act the bloodiest scene, Or in pied fashions pass her folly,	The sound of bells, the unknown coasts Of death's vast kingdom, and sail o'er With fresher wind to happier shore. For now the maiden isle hath got A royal husband (heavenly lot).	710
670	Mocking at heaven, yet look most holy. Of usury she'll rob the Jews; Of luxury, Venetian stews. With Spaniards, she's an Indianist; With barbarous Turks, a sodomist.	Fair Scotland does fair England wed, And gives her for her maidenhead A crown of gold, wrought in a ring With which she's married to a king. Thou beldam (whisperer of false rumours),	715
675	So low her antique walls do stand, These sins leap o'er, even with one hand. And he—that all in modest black, Whose eyeball strings shall sooner crack Than seem to note a tempting face,	Fame, cast aside those antic humours: Lift up thy golden trump, and sound Even from Tweed's utmost crystal bound And from the banks of silver Thames To the green ocean, that King James	720
680	Measuring streets with a dove-like pace— Under that oily visor wears The poor man's sweat and orphan's tears. Now whether these particular fates, Or general moles (disfiguring states),	Has made an island (that did stand Half-sinking) now the firmest land. Carry thou this to Neptune's ear That his shrill Tritons it may bear So far, until the Danish sound	725
685	Whether one sin alone, or whether This main battalion joined together, Do dare these plagues, we cannot tell, But down they beat all human spell. Or, it may be, Jehovah looks	With repercussive voice rebound, That echoes (doubling more and more) May reach the parchèd Indian shore, For 'tis heav'n's care so great a wonder Should fly upon the wings of thunder.	730
690	But now upon those audit books Of forty-five years' hushed account For hours misspent (whose sums surmount The price of ransomed kings), and there, Finding out grievous debts, doth clear	The horror of the plague
695	And cross them under his own hand, Being paid with lives through all the land. For since his maiden-servant's gone And his new viceroy fills the throne, Heaven means to give him (as his bride)	O thou my country, here mine eyes Are almost sunk in waves that rise From the rough wind of sighs, to see A spring that lately courted thee In pompous bravery, all thy bowers Gilt by the sun, perfumed with flowers, Now like a loathsome leper lying, Her arbors with'ring, green trees dying, Her revels and May merriments Turned all to tragic dreariments. And thou, the mother of my breath, Whose soft breast thousands nourisheth, Altar of Jove, thou throne of kings, Thou fount, where milk and honey springs,	735
700	A nation new and purified. Take breath awhile, our panting muse, And to the world tell gladder news Than these of burials; strive awhile To make thy sullen numbers smile.	Apostrophe ad civitatem
705	Forget the names of graves and ghosts,		745

667 Rhine wine from the Rhine region
668 Paris...scene refers to the St Bartholomew's Day massacre of 1572, when Protestants were massacred by Catholics. Christopher Marlowe (1564-1593) wrote a play about it in the early 1590s, The Massacre at Paris, so the 'scene' had been 'acted' on the English stage. 'Scene' puns on 'Seine'.
669 pied fashions motley fashions; the kind of parti-coloured clothes worn by professional jesters her Paris's
672 stews brothels
673 Indianist possibly a smoker of tobacco, known as the Indian weed 674 sodomist sodomite 678 eyeball strings the muscles, nerves or tendons of the eye. These were supposed to crack at death.

681 visor mask
684 moles blemishes on the skin
686 main battalion the body of an army
687 dare provoke
688 spell (a) charm; (b) explanation
691 forty-five...account Elizabeth I died in the forty-fifth year of her reign. Despite war with Spain, fighting in Ireland and occasional rebellions, this was widely spoken of as a period of unbroken peace.
694-5 clear And cross them pay them and cross them out in the audit-book 697 his maiden-servant's gone the death of Elizabeth I, the virgin queen 698 new viceroy i.e. James I 706 sound of bells (tollèd at funerals)

710 lot fortune, luck
711 Scotland...wed (James I united the kingdoms of Scotland and England)
715 beldam old woman
716 antic humours absurd activities
717 trump trumpet
718 Tweed's river in Scotland
723 Neptune's Roman god of the sea, whose servants are the Tritons
725 sound channel or strait (with pun on 'noise')
726 repercussive reverberating
740 May merriments traditional pastimes which took place in the month of May 741 dreariments mournful expressions
742.n Apostrophe ad civitatem words addressed to the City (of London)

Europe's jewel, England's gem,
 Sister to great Jerusalem,
 Neptune's minion ('bout whose waist
 The Thames is like a girdle cast), 750 Thou that (but health) canst nothing want,
 Empress of cities, Troynovant!
 When I thy lofty towers behold (Whose pinnacles were tipped with gold,
 Both when the sun did set and rise, 755 So lovely wert thou in his eyes)
 Now like old monuments forsaken
 Or (like tall pines) for winter shaken;
 Or, seeing thee gorgeous as a bride
 Even in the height of all thy pride
 760 Disrobed, disgraced, and when all nations
 Made love to thee in amorous passions,
 Now scorned of all the world; alone,
 None seek thee, nor must thou seek none,
 But like a prisoner must be kept 765 In thine own walls, till thou hast wept
 Thine eyes out, to behold thy sweet Dead children heaped about thy feet—
 O dearest! say, how can we choose
 But have a sad and drooping muse
 770 When corpses do so choke thy way
 That now thou look'st like Golgotha.
 But thus, the alt'ring of a state
 Alters our bodies and our fate,
 For princes' deaths do even bespeak
 775 Millions of lives; when kingdoms break,
 People dissolve, and (as with thunder)
 Cities' proud glories rend asunder.
 Witness thy walls, whose stony arms
 But yesterday received whole swarms
 780 Of frighted English. Lord and loon, Lawyer and client, courtier, clown,
 All sorts did to thy buildings fly
 As to the safest sanctuary,
 And he that through thy gates might pass,
 785 His fears were locked in towers of brass.
 Happy that man; now happier they

That from thy reach get first away—
 As from a shipwreck to some shore;
 As from a lost field, drowned in gore;
 As from high turrets, whose joints fail;
 790 Or rather, from some loathsome jail.
 But note heav'n's justice: they, by flying
 That would cozen death and save a dying,
 How like to chaff abroad they're blown,
 And (but for scorn) might walk unknown.
 795 Like to plumed ostriches they ride,
 Or like sea-pageants, all in pride
 Of tacklings, flags, and swelling sails,
 Borne on the loftiest wave, that vails
 His purple bonnet, and in dread
 800 Bows down his snowy curled head,
 So from th'infected city fly
 These swallows in their gallantry,
 Looking that wheresoe'er they light
 Gay summer (like a parasite)
 805 Should wait on them, and build 'em bowers,
 And crown their nests with wreathèd flowers,
 And swains to welcome them should sing
 And dance, as for their Whitsun king.
 Feather of pride, how art thou tossed!
 810 How soon are all thy beauties lost!
 How eas'ly golden hopes unwind!
 The russet boor and leathern hind
 That two days since did sink his knee
 And (all uncovered) worshipped thee,
 815 Or being but poor and meanly clothed
 Was either laughed to scorn or loathed,
 Now thee he loathes and laughs to scorn,
 And though upon thy back be worn
 More satin than a kingdom's worth 820 He bars his door and thrusts thee forth.
 And they whose palate land nor seas,
 Whom fashions of no shape, could please,
 Whom princes have (in ages past)
 For rich attires and sumptuous waste
 825 Never come near, now sit they round
 And feed (like beggars) on the ground,

748 minion lover
 751 Troynovant New Troy, the name given to London by its legendary founder, Brutus 771 Golgotha 'the place of the skull', where Christ was crucified 774 bespeak order in advance
 780 loon rogue, idler
 781 clown peasant
 785 towers of brass proverbially, the safest place of all. The friar and magician Roger Bacon (c.1214–c.1294) was said to have had a plan to wall England round with brass.
 789 lost field military defeat
 793 cozen death... dying cheat death by keeping from him what they owe him: that is, a 'dying'

795 (but for scorn) if it were not for the contempt in which they are held (or possibly, in which they hold other people)
 796 plumed ostriches (the ostrich was an emblem of pride)
 797 sea-pageants ships displaying all their finery
 799 vails removes, as a sign of respect
 803 gallantry ostentatious clothing
 805 parasite servant, sycophant
 808 swains country folk
 809 Whitsun king On Whit Sunday, the seventh Sunday after Easter, festivals called 'Whitsun ales' were held, presided over by a Whitsun king or lord.
 813 The russet boor and leathern hind Countryfolk (here metaphorically associated with animals hunted by the rich for sport, the 'boar' and the 'hind') wore clothes made of leather and of russet, which was coarse homespun woollen cloth. 'Boor' and 'hind' were also terms for peasants, farm labourers.

 815 uncovered hatless, a sign of respect
 825 sumptuous waste wasteful extravagance; perhaps punningly refers to the sumptuary laws which had been more or less rigidly enforced in England since the reign of Edward III, regulating the expenditure on clothing permissible for different social classes. The implication is that the rich who have spent more on their clothes than princes have been committing offences against the Elizabethan sumptuary laws.

My verse must run through thy cold heart:
 Thy wife has played the woman's part
 And lain with death. But—spite on spite!— 915 Thou must endure this very night
 Close by her side the poorest groom
 In self-same bed and self-same room.
 But ease thy vexed soul. Thus behold:
 There's one who, in the morn, with gold
 920 Could have built castles; now he's made
 A pillow to a wretch that prayed
 For ha'p'ny alms with broken limb.
 The beggar now is above him.
 So he that yesterday was clad 925 In purple robes, and hourly had (Even at his finger's beck) the fees
 Of barèd heads and bending knees,
 Rich men's fawnings, poor men's prayers
 (Though they were but hollow airs),
 930 Troops of servants at his calling,
 Children (like to subjects) falling
 At his proud feet—lo, now he's taken
 By death, he lies of all forsaken.
 These are the tragedies, whose sight
 935 With tears blot all the lines we write.
 The stage, whereon the scenes are played,
 Is a whole kingdom. What was made
 By some (most provident and wise)
 To hide from sad spectators' eyes
 940 Acts full of ruth, a private room
 To drown the horror of death's doom,
 That building now no higher rear:
 The pest-house standeth everywhere,
 For those that on their biers are borne
 945 Are numbered more than those that mourn.
 But you grave patriots, whom fate
 Makes rulers of this wallèd state,
 We must not lose you in our verse,
 Whose acts we one day may rehearse
 950 In marble numbers that shall stand Above time's all-destroying hand—
 Only, methinks, you now do err

In flying from your charge so far.
 So coward captains shrink away;
 So shepherds do their flocks betray;
 955 So soldiers, and so lambs, do perish;
 So you kill those you're bound to cherish.
 Be therefore valiant, as you're wise:
 Come back again. The man that dies Within your walls is even as near 960 To heav'n, as dying anywhere;
 But if—O pardon our bold thought!—
 You fear your breath is sooner caught Here than aloof, and therefore keep Out of death's reach, whilst thousands weep
 965 And wring their hands for thousands dying,
 No comfort near the sick man lying,
 'Tis to be feared (you petty kings),
 When back you spread your golden wings,
 A deadlier siege (which heaven avert) 970 Will your replenished walls ingirt.
 'Tis now the beggars' plague, for none
 Are in this battle overthrown
 But babes and poor. The lesser fly
 Now in this spider's web doth lie.
 975 But if that great and goodly swarm
 (That has broke through, and felt no harm)
 In his envenomed snares should fall,
 O pity! 'twere most tragical.
 For then the usurer must behold
 980 His pestilent flesh, whilst all his gold Turns into tokens, and the chest
 They lie in, his infectious breast.
 How well he'll play the miser's part
 When all his coin sticks at his heart!
 985 He's worth so many farthings then
 That was a golden god 'mongst men.
 And 'tis the aptest death—so please
 Him that breathed heaven, earth, and seas—
 For every covetous rooting mole
 990 (That heaves his dross above his soul
 And doth in coin all hopes repose)
 To die with corpse stamped full of those.

Pest-
house

913 played the woman's part According to misogynistic tradition, the role played by women in marriage was that of the unfaithful partner.
 921–2 wretch . . . limb a man who begged for charity by displaying his injuries
 925 purple splendid, gaudy
 926 beck gesture
 929 hollow airs meaningless sounds
 940 ruth sorrow
private room refers to the so-called 'private' theatres such as the Blackfriars, more expensive than 'public' theatres like the Globe and therefore playing to a more restricted audience 943 pest-house The London pest-house, a hospital in which plague victims were sequestered, was built in Bath Street in 1594–5.

 947 this wallèd state the city of London
 950 marble numbers commendatory verses carved on a marble monument 964 aloof at a distance
 968 petty miniature
 969 golden wings presumably, wealth
 970 deadlier siege at present the plague assaults only the poor ('Tis now the beggars' plague'); but if it should attack (or lay siege to) the rich, the results would be more dreadful still. The next section of the poem describes what would happen.
 971 ingirt enclose
 972 'Tis . . . plague From this line until line 1078 internal evidence for Middleton's authorship is most abundant.

982 tokens physical symptoms of plague
 986 farthings coins of lower value than a penny; the sense is that the plague-stricken usurer is not worth much 989 breathed God 'breathed' heaven, earth, and seas in two senses: they were created by his command (he literally breathed them into existence), and he gave the breath of life to all the creatures in them.
 990 covetous rooting mole one who is as blindly obsessed with gold as a mole is obsessed with other kinds of earth
 991 dross worthless earth, rubbish; here material possessions valued more highly than the salvation of his immortal soul
 993 of those i.e. of sores that resemble coins

And clip thee round about the bed
Whilst thousand horrors grasp thy head.

The cure of the plague

And therefore this infectious season
That now arrests the flesh for treason
Against heaven's everlasting king (Anointed with th'eternal spring
Of life and power), this stroke of force
That turns the world into a corse,
Feeding the dust with what it craves,
Emptying whole houses to fill graves,
These speckled plagues (which our sins levy)
Are as needful as they're heavy.
Whose cures to cite, our muse forbears,
Though he the Daphnean wreath that wears (Being both poesy's sovereign king
And God of medicine) bids us sing
As boldly of those policies,
Those onsets and those batteries
By physic cunningly applied
To beat down plagues so fortified,
And of those arms defensitive
To keep th'assaulted heart alive,
And of those wards and of those sleights
Used in these mortal single fights,
As of the causes that commence
This civil war of pestilence,
For poets' souls should be confined Within no bounds; their tow'ring minds Must (like the sun) a progress make Through art's immensive zodiac,
And suck (like bees) the virtuous power
That flows in learning's seven-fold flower,
Distilling forth the same again
In sweet and wholesome juice to men.
But for we see the army great
Of those whose charge it is to beat
This proud invader, and have skill
In all those weapons that do kill

Such pestilent foes, we yield to them
The glory of that stratagem—
To whose oraculous voice repair,
For they those Delphic prophets are
That teach dead bodies to respire
By sacred Aesculapian fire.
We mean not those pied lunatics,
Those bold fantastic empirics,
Quacksalvers, mushroom mountebanks
That in one night grow up in ranks
And live by pecking physic's crumbs.
O, hate those venomous broods; there comes Worse sores from them, and more strange births,
Than from ten plagues or twenty dearths.
Only this antidote apply:
Cease vexing heaven, and cease to die.
Seek therefore (after you have found Salve natural for the natural wound
Of this contagion) cure from thence
Where first the evil did commence,
And that's the soul. Each one purge one,
And England's free, the plague is gone.

The necessity of a plague

Yet to mix comfortable words,
Though this be horrid, it affords
Sober gladness and wise joys,
Since desperate mixtures it destroys.
For if our thoughts sit truly trying
The just necessity of dying,
How needful (though how dreadful) are Purple plagues or crimson war.
We would conclude (still urging pity):
A plague's the purge to cleanse a city.
Who amongst millions can deny
(In rough prose, or smooth poesy)
Of evils 'tis the lighter brood—
A dearth of people, than of food!
And who knows not, our land ran o'er
With people, and was only poor

1066 clip surround
1074 corse corpse
1077 speckled spotty
1080 the Daphnean wreath laurel wreath worn by the god Apollo in honour of the nymph Daphne, who changed into a laurel bush when he tried to rape her. Apollo was the Roman god of poetry and of medicine.
1084 onsets assaults
batteries attacks
1087 arms defensitive defensive weapons 1089 wards parries (with a sword)
sleights tricks
1093–6 poets' souls . . . zodiac refers to Sir Philip Sidney's definition of the poetic imagination in his Defence of Poesy (1595), where the poet is described as 'freely ranging only within the zodiac of his own wit'

1094 tow'ring soaring (a metaphor from falconry)
1096 immensive vast 1098 learning's seven-fold flower The flower of learning has seven parts because it consists of the seven liberal arts (see note to 68–70).
1107 oraculous prophesying
1108 Delphic The Delphic oracle was the supreme oracle of Greece, presided over by Apollo.
1109 respire breathe again
1110 Aesculapian fire Aesculapius was the classical god of healing, who was snatched by Apollo from the fire that consumed his mother.
1111 pied lunatics fools in their traditional parti-coloured or 'pied' suit
1112 fantastic empirics quacks who make outrageous claims for their medicines

1113 Quacksalvers bogus practitioners mushroom mountebanks charlatans who spring up overnight, like mushrooms 1117 strange births deformed babies or monstrous new-born animals, read by many as signs of God's judgement
1118 dearths bad harvests leading to food shortages
1122 Salve natural cures based on natural principles, as opposed to magic or miracles
1125 purge cleanse
1131 desperate mixtures dangerous combinations of elements. The body was supposed to be composed of four humours; a 'desperate mixture' was a dangerous imbalance of the constituent elements of the body which caused disease or death.
1137 purge purifying agent, enema

1105
1110
1115
The cure
1125
1130 1135
1140

Newes from Graues-ende.

1145	In having too too many living, And wanting living—rather giving Themselves to waste, deface and spoil, Than to increase (by virtuous toil) The bankrupt bosom of our realm, Which naked births did overwhelm.	Is such a plague. So it may please Mercy's distributor to appease His speckled anger, and now hide Th'old rod of plagues, no more to chide And lash our shoulders and sick veins With carbuncles and shooting blains.	1155
1150	This begets famine and bleak dearth, When fruits of wombs pass fruits of earth; Then famine's only physic, and The med'cine for a riotous land	Make us the happiest amongst men, Immortal by our prophes'ing pen, That this last line may truly reign: The plague's ceased; heaven is friends again.	1160

1145 wanting living unemployed

1147 increase make prosperous

1149 naked births children born destitute

1152 physic medicine

1155 Mercy's distributor God

1156 speckled anger anger as expressed in the marks of the plague

1157 rod stick used to punish children or criminals

1159 carbuncles spot or boil shooting blains agonizing sores

1161 prophes'ing prophesying

1162 last line (a) final line of verse; (b) dynasty which will never be superseded

THE NIGHTINGALE AND THE ANT and FATHER HUBBURD'S TALES

Edited by Adrian Weiss

THIS EDITION presents two versions of Middleton's work to illustrate its evolution from manuscript to the final printed form as seen in the second edition (CREEDE 2). The reconstructed manuscript version, The Nightingale and the Ant, is printed in a single typeface to replicate the 'look' of a manuscript so as to recreate (to a limited extent) the 'manuscript reading experience'. In contrast, the final completed version, Father Hubburd's Tales, exploits the typographical variations of a printed edition and includes textual materials specific to printed editions such as a title-page text and prefatory letters. The reader is encouraged to read the two versions in sequence in order to appreciate the significant differences that occurred both in the text and in Middleton's concept of his work.

While the movement from manuscript to printed edition always involved the introduction of typographical and layout variations and the addition of prefatory texts, the evolution of this work represents an exceptional case: the first edition (CREEDE 1) represents a transitional stage between the manuscript version and the final expanded version as seen in CREEDE 2. Middleton's text was entered in the Stationers' Register on 3 January 1604 with the variant title The Nyghtingale and the Ante. A Jove surgit opus. The Ovidian epigraph also appears in Wisdom of Solomon, and clearly must have come from Middleton's manuscript since it does not appear in either printed edition. As a general rule, the appearance of such a variant title in the Register entry is evidence that a manuscript whose title-page had not yet been modified for the printing project was presented at Stationers' Hall for licensing. The printed editions bear the variant titles The Ant and the Nightingale, or Father Hubburd's Tales (CREEDE 1) and Father Hubburd's Tales, or the Ant and the Nightingale (CREEDE 2). The re-ordering of the two sections of the title in CREEDE 2 reflects the final prominence of the title character Oliver Hubburd.

In preparing The Nightingale and the Ant for printing, Middleton expanded the text in two stages. For the first edition, Middleton added 'The Epistle Dedicatory', 'To the Reader', and the interpolated prose transition to the first tale (276–90; throughout this edition, line references are to Father Hubburd's Tales). The two prefatory texts reveal a significant change in Middleton's original concept of his work as found in the manuscript version. Both characters have suffered outrageous injustices in human society—Philomel, who was transformed into a nightingale after being raped by Tereus, and the ant, who possesses a magical ability to transform himself into a human, in his experiences as a ploughman and a soldier. But their sympathetic interaction is permeated by an elegaic, stoic tone which mutes the satire.

In contrast, 'The Epistle Dedicatory' introduces the character Oliver Hubburd as well as a new mode of satire in his angry and vicious railing against Christopher Clutch-Fist about the latter's treatment of poets and their books. Only in the caustic sarcasm of 'To the Reader' does Middleton reveal that Oliver Hubburd is actually the ant (75–7). However, the reader of CREEDE 1 is left puzzled about the cause of Oliver's anger and, more importantly, why he attacks Clutch-Fist's treatment of poets and their books—because CREEDE 1 contains no reference whatever to poets and expensively bound books. Something obviously is missing. (A reader of this edition is encouraged to experience the incongruity by skipping over the following three sections in a first reading of the final version. The Textual Introduction contains a more detailed analysis of the relationship of the versions.) Three sections were added to the body of the text in CREEDE 2: the transitional verses which introduce the new third tale (1073–92), The Scholar's Tale (1093–257), and its concluding stanza (1258–66). The final paragraph of the third tale solves the mystery by identifying Oliver Hubburd as a poet whose expensively bound book was torn apart by Clutch-Fist. In short, the sections added in CREEDE 1 and CREEDE 2 were undoubtedly conceived of as a single unit by Middleton and absolutely must appear together to make sense. That leaves an ultimately unanswerable question: why did Middleton agree to the printing of an incomplete version of his expanded work in the first edition? Regardless, the additions fundamentally change the concept of the work seen in the manuscript version both in terms of content as well as narrative structure.

Narrative Structure

The narrative structure of the manuscript version is simple and straightforward. Middleton is identified as the author, and presumably as the omniscient narrator, of the text by his 'posie' as recorded in the Stationers' Register—'A Jove Surgit Opus' (i.e., 'the work is inspired by Jove'). The text presents a self-contained work in which the ant's tales as ploughman and soldier are framed by a verse narrative where the interaction between the nightingale and the ant is portrayed.

Normally, prefatory letters added to a manuscript for print publication are extraneous to the work. However, in this case, 'The Epistle Dedicatory' and 'To the Reader' become part of the work and fundamentally modify its narrative structure as well as its basic fiction (as noted above). Verbal echoes, repetition of subject matter and specific details in the prefatory letters and The Scholar's Tale, and aspects of narrative structure show that Thomas Nashe's Pierce Penniless his Supplication to the Devil (1592) provided Middleton with the inspiration for his expansion of the manuscript version.

Pierce Penniless launches into his sweeping kaleidoscopic excoriation of society's vices abruptly without benefit of either a dedication or an epistle to the reader. The rambling narrative leads to the main text, Pierce's supplication to the devil. Sixty-eight pages later (in the second edition of Pierce, 1592, sig. I2^v; 128 pages later in G. B. Harrison's edition), having momentarily purged his revulsion at corruption in the world, Pierce finally turns to the reader, 'Gentle reader tandem aliquando, I am at leisure to talk to thee' and explains the situation which occasioned his supplication. The out-of-place epistle (Harrison, 128-137) wanders onto the subject of unappreciative patrons and concludes with a digression in which Pierce upbraids 'heavenly Spenser' for failing to include a dedication (among the dozen or so accidentally appended to the Faerie Queen) to 'Amyntas' (135-136), which Pierce then provides before breaking 'off this endless argument of speech abruptly' (137).

Obviously, the dedicatory verse to Amyntas and the epistle to the reader belong at the front of Pierce's book. This notion of clarifying the beginning at the end is duplicated in the expansions in Father Hubbard's Tales. But Middleton's adaptation of the structural concept is more sophisticated than in Pierce, where the concluding section simply provides the preliminary texts which conventionally begin a book: given the rambling, digressive structure of Pierce, this final section of Pierce is not at all essential and its absence would not be detected by even the most critical and perceptive reader. In contrast, the conclusion of The Scholar's Tale is utterly essential. In Father Hubbard's Tales, the reader is abruptly plunged, in the dedication to Sir Christopher Clutch-Fist, into a Pierce-like satirical quagmire of anger and threats of revenge with no introductory explanation whatever. Until the revelations of the final paragraph of The Scholar's Tale, the invective of the dedication floats untethered to any circumstance. Structurally, Middleton's narrative folds back on itself, providing the information which grounds the dedication in specific causative details.

The approach and function of the dedication are also clearly indebted to Pierce. In his belated epistle to the reader, Pierce considers the issue of finding 'a good patron', who 'will pay for all', to whom his work can be dedicated, and adds some advice: 'wherefore I would counsel my friends to be more considerate in their Dedications, and not cast away so many months labour on a clown that knows not how to use a scholar' (Harrison, 131). This is exactly the mistake made by the ant as Oliver Hubbard the poet in dedicating his 'elaborate poetical building' (1241) to Clutch-Fist, whose appreciation of poetry goes no farther than the scavangeable materials used to make an expensive book. Middleton took his cue for 'The Epistle Dedicatory' from Pierce's earlier attack on such patrons and how he would handle them: 'if I be evil untreated, or sent away with a flea in mine ear, let him look that I will rail on him soundly, not for an hour or a day while the injury is fresh in my memory, but in some elaborate polished poem, which I will leave to the world when I am dead to be a living image to all ages of his beggarly parsimony and ignoble illiberality' (Harrison, 61). In Father Hubbard's Tales, the dedication does just that, especially in combination with Oliver's concluding sarcastic reference at the end of the book to 'Sir Christopher Clutch-Fist, whose bountiful virtue I blaze in my first epistle' (1248-9). However, Middleton overlooked—or perhaps intentionally created—a significant structural contradiction. Oliver's Epistle could only have been written after the concluding event of the final paragraph of The Scholar's Tale. After fainting at the sight of his 'book dismembered very tragically' (1252-4), Oliver awakens in his original form as an ant in which, he reports, 'ever since I have kept me' (1256-7). How, then, did the ant write a dedicatory epistle that appears in a printed book?

The Verse Frame

The combination of a verse frame and prose tales is Middleton innovation in a long tradition of framed tales stretching back to Boccaccio's Decameron, which had many imitators in Elizabethan prose fiction. The choice of Philomel as the spokes-bird of justice who presides over the ant's tales is traditional. From Ovid's depiction of her transformation into a nightingale in The Metamorphoses onward, Philomel (a royal victim of rape by her brother-in-law, King Tereus of Thrace) was a conventional symbol of the injustice suffered by the weak at the hands of the strong and mighty. Middleton embodies in Philomel the ideal of justice balanced by mercy and truth in a four-stanza section (138-61) after Philomel has caught the ant in her beak to kill him as a suspected spy. In contrast to 'many silken men' placed in positions of judgement by their wealth and rank who 'condemn at random' and 'often kill before the cause they know', Philomel's 'mercy was above her heat (i.e., emotions)'. Her patience permits the ant to explain himself and thus gain his escape from impending death. The two discover a common bond as oppressed individuals. Philomel's story of her rape occasions the ant's tales about his victimization in society in his human transformations.

Interestingly, Philomel engages in a twenty-line eulogy of Thomas Nashe, the muck-racking pamphleteer who epitomizes everything that the aristocracy found crude and characteristic of commoners (252-70). Nonetheless, she forbids him 'to rail like Nashe' (252; i.e., vent his anger and bitterness) in his tales, requiring him to assume a virtuous stance of stoic patience and resignation. As a result, the characteristic components of vicious satire—anger, bitterness, envy, and the desire for revenge—are entirely absent from the manuscript version with its two tales. Philomel remains a sympathetic, commiserating auditor, and the ant narrates his tales as the naïve, almost cheerful victim of the world's vices.

However, the additions in CREEDE 1 and CREEDE 2 fundamentally change the tone of the manuscript version of the work by framing it with the very kind of vicious satiric invective that is characteristic of Nashe's satire. The expanded version begins and ends with the greed-driven Oliver's anger and desire for revenge upon Clutch-Fist. The impact upon the verse frame is momentary. The new transitional verses that appear at 1073–92 in CREEDE 2 (inserted after 1075 of the manuscript version) occasion a shift in Philomel's character. To this point, she has condemned the greed-driven lawyers, aldermen, wealthy bourgeois, and military officers responsible for the ant's victimization. But in response to the ant's decision to become a scholar, she castigates him for his choice: 'I thought, thou'dst leaped into a law-gown... No academe makes a rich alderman' (1087–90). Philomel's implicit approval of the vice of greed as a motivation for the ant is inconsistent with her character. However, Philomel's consolation ('Tis better be a little ant | Than a great man and live in want', 1262–3) in the new transitional verses (1259–66) at the end of The Scholar's Tale is a return to her previous role.

The Ploughman's Tale

Middleton chooses a journalistic approach with the narrative told from the viewpoint of the fully-developed personality of the simple ploughman who struggles to comprehend the actions that he observes following the death of the old landlord. The ploughman's world obviously is turned topsy-turvy, but he cannot yet appreciate the long-term impact of the change until he and his fellows are summoned to London to witness the pawning of the estate by the young profligate heir for the velvet finery and dissolute lifestyle of the London gallant. In the remainder of the tale, which occurs between the end of September (Michaelmas Term) and early January (Hilary Term), Middleton zooms in on the forces and agents which contribute to the decay of the old land-based agrarian society that was structured according to the hierarchical network of reciprocal obligations of landlord and tenant (see G. R. Hibbard, 15–23). The ant as ploughman, however, is unaware of the broader implications of these specific events as he searches for words to explain what he observes in similes and metaphors that are drawn from his own experience and are mediated by continual contrasting glances at the old way of life exemplified in the deceased old landlord's regime and values. The end result is verbal exaggeration akin to the virulent description of the extremes of vice in formal satires such as Microcynicon. But the ploughman (and later, the soldier) lacks the heightened emotional revulsion from vice that is characteristic of formal satire.

At stage centre are the lawyers, merchants, and scribes who negotiated the transition from old to new and thus were the frequent targets of satiric attack in the literature of the period. However, Middleton refrains from directly attacking them, couching his criticism in an eyewitness report from the simple perspective of the ploughman—whose spontaneous responses to the events that he witnesses are more effective than any direct satire. Middleton observes stylistic decorum in that the ploughman's verbal virtuosity, the peculiar strength of the narrative here as well as in The Soldier's Tale, is confined to the rhetorical low style appropriate to the uneducated classes of society. Without exception, the ploughman's wit consists of exploiting homophonic verbal associations (e.g., 'husbandman'/'husband', 293–7; etc.). His similes and metaphors reflect his pragmatic experience. In his effort to verbally convey the size of the profligate heir's breeches, he moves from 'as deep as the middle of winter' to 'the roadway between London and Winchester' to 'might very well put all his lands in them', and finally, 'you may imagine they were big enough when they would outreach a thousand acres' (386–91). Indeed, the land has been traded for the breeches. His pragmatic approach to life is the standard by which he measures the transactions: 'a dash of the pen stood for a thousand acres' (485–6), the largest denomination imaginable to the ploughman. Similarly, the mercer and merchant, the villainous agents destroying the ploughman's world, march away from the meeting 'heavier by a thousand acres' (541–2), the young heir 'a great man in both their books' (345) by virtue of the mortgage bonds. While this kind of wordplay and punning cannot compare with Nashe's verbal virtuosity, Middleton's characterization is quite successful within the rhetorical stylistic constraints of the ploughman's character.

Likewise, Middleton has the ploughman walk the high road by disassociating him from any negative reactions such as anger or even resentment at his exploitation by the heir. He unquestioningly accepts the principle that rank has privilege. His concluding description of the profligate heir's headlong plunge into 'all that might be in dissolute villainy' (722–3) remains on a detached level untainted by negative emotions. The ugliness of the vice being described is somehow magnified by the modesty of the ploughman's simple response: 'we did so much blush at his life and were so ashamed of his base courses that ever after we loathed to look after them' (724–6). The implicit moral judgement is far more damning than anything possible either in formal verse satire as seen in Microcynicon or in Nashe's kind of prose satire where the satirist's violent revulsion is almost as repulsive as the vice that he attacks.

Moreover, the ploughman and his mates reaffirm their natural dignity when their unfamiliarity with the quill is laughed at by the lawyer, scrivener, and mercer—middle-class bourgeois whose livelihood depends upon the written word. The ploughmen, however, live in another tradition, that of the old world where the visual image was far more important than the written sign in communicating truths, such as those fundamental to salvation which blazoned the stained-glass windows of churches and cathedrals. The new world's privileging of writing over visual image provides the ploughmen with an opportunity to 'bite their thumbs' at their oppressors as they legally witness the mortgage (488) by signing with emblems denoting the destruction of their world (i.e., the upside-down plough, 499-504) and the cause (i.e., the unbridled colt, 504-12). The ploughmen walk away from the ceremony with a sense of self-affirmation. The exploiters' perception that they are little more than beasts of burden obscures the fact that the ploughmen are men with souls and wit. From their view, they have mocked the others and maintained their dignity in a situation in which they were powerless. Nonetheless, the exploitive power contained in the word 'fines' is real. The lawyer's announcement of the actual amount of these fees renders their existence as ploughmen intolerable and they revert to the form of ants (731-7). As Philomel reminds them, they are better off as lowly ants who do not pay rent to support the profligate heir's dicing and whoring (755-76).

The Soldier's Tale

Although this tale deals with real military injustices (see Read, 429-463), Middleton chooses to temper the seriousness of the narrative by maintaining the focus upon the humorous aspect of the stereotypical soldier of the 'miles gloriosus' comic tradition which stretches back to Terence. As such, the ant's narrative style changes to bragging, boasting, and exaggeration in his accounts of his experience which exhibit the delightful flow of punning homophonic associations (e.g., 'for I thought, at first, that they had gathered something for me, but I found, at last, they did only but gather about me', 959-62) that characterize the verbal display sustained throughout the first two tales. The ant's decision to become a soldier is clearly tainted: 'not contented long (a vice cleaving to all worldlings) with this little estate of an ant, but stuffed with envy and ambition, as small as I was, desired to venture into the world again' (812-15). The choice to become a soldier held the promise of 'War's sweating fortunes' which included wages, shares in spoils, and glory.

The shift from the persona of the humble ant begins immediately with the soldier's crude reference ('the first that brought up prick-song') to Philomel's 'pitiful ravishment', a most insensitive comment, but in keeping with his character as a soldier (810-13). Once in the field, the ant's early near-escapes are appropriately exaggerated: 'the bullets came within a hair of my coxcomb even like a barber scratching my pate, and perhaps took away the left limb of a vermin, and so departed' (919-21). When his luck runs out, the maiming that results is beyond the usual level of exaggeration and renders him a ludicrous physical improbability. Lacking a right arm to counterpoise the remaining left leg with a crutch and produce forward movement, any kind of erect physical movement is impossible, except for hopping (987-8). The maiming becomes the vehicle for Middleton's exposure of the lack of charity in Christian society.

In regard to his military service, his commanders have spent his pay on gunpowder (941-4), and thus reward his sacrifice of limbs with nothing more than a begging passport, a legal instrument conferred by military representatives of the government. However, as the conclusion of the tale indicates, the ant assumes that the approaching watch would have no respect for his begging passport (1040-5). The society at large treats him with similar disrespect, mocking his crab-like locomotion as he scoots sideways on his stomach (960-7). Charity itself becomes a target in the persona of Mistress Charity, whom he encounters after strategically placing himself in Finsbury Fields with a southerly view down Windmill Hill for prospective alms-givers (985-1023). But after his comic 'premeditated speech', delivered in praise of her beauty in the fashion of a courtly lover (997-1005), the 'warm-lapped' Mistress Charity arrogantly casts her penny distastefully on the ground just as she would brush away a flea. The maimed soldier is merely an annoyance to her, not a suffering human being. The amazing aspect of the ant as a soldier is his boundless optimism in the face of these ever-worsening circumstances. Although he finally falls 'into passionate, but not railing speeches' about his rejection at the hands of society, he reminds himself that others have suffered greater misfortunes, and decides 'to be constant in calamity and valiant against the battering siege of misery' (1028-40). But his commitment to stoic virtue is unsustainable against the onslaught of injustice in the form of the approaching watch, so the soldier escapes by transforming himself back into an ant.

As part of his characterization of the ant as a soldier, Middleton interrupts the forward flow of the narrative with the 'starchwoman' digression (852-900). Such digressions, which usually expose underworld practices, occur commonly in the pamphlet literature (Nashe inserts several in Pierce). Behind the digression lies the symbiotic codependency between soldiers and prostitutes. The subsequent narrative is replete with sexual doubles entendres driven by the soldier's adolescent fascination with bawds posing as starchwomen engaged in the seduction of young wives. In this instance, the young wife is the adolescent's ideal fantasy, promising not only 'all C's else' (i.e., cunt, sex) but also providing the requested money as well. As a soldier, the ant does not sense the possibility that Philomel will find both his adolescent fascination with the subject, and the subject itself, a stark reminder of her own human experience as a rape victim at the hands of king Tereus. Nonetheless, she overlooks his attitude and rewards the ant with the promised canzonet. After all, he is just an ant.

In general, Middleton's characterization of the ploughman and the soldier transforms the literary tradition of the satiric prose pamphlet by creating a new kind of satiric voice. The ant's naive, stoic narratives, untainted by anger or resentment, displace the invective of satire, leaving only the details of his victimization for Philomel's and the reader's judgement. In the final analysis, the ant is unequipped to survive in the corrupt world of human society.

The Scholar's Tale

The Scholar's Tale is fundamentally different from the previous two because the ant himself as Oliver Hubbard becomes the target of Middleton's satire rather than functioning as the golden mean, or standard against which the vices of the world are to be measured. His inflated self-esteem and greed-driven anger emerge as the vices which are most satirized in the tale.

At first, the ant as Oliver Hubbard the scholar exhibits (or seems to) the sober, pragmatic values that have dominated his narratives as ploughman and soldier. He seems cast in the mold of Nashe's Pierce Penniless, the poverty-stricken scholar who appeals to Lucifer for redress. But Oliver's greed creates a fundamental contrast. Pierce pursued learning as a good in itself rather than as a means to an end, and his anger is a reaction to a corrupt society in general. Unlike Pierce's railing, Oliver's harangue reveals a distortion of scholarly values: 'Yet for all my weighty and substantial arguments, being able to prove anything indeed by logic, I could prove myself never the richer, make the best syllogism I could' (1123-6). For Oliver, learning is thus a means to the end of acquiring wealth, a way 'out of penurious scarcity' which promises 'future advancement' (1141-3).

This flaw in Oliver's motivation causes the radical shift in the tone of the narrative when he addresses Philomel: 'But shall I tell you lady? O, here let me sigh out a full point and take leave of... my wealthy hopes' and turns to the subject of his 'fall' into the study of poetry (1144-240). The tale thus abruptly switches from a historical account of his studies to the railing and ranting of a disgruntled satirist driven by the very vices (i.e., greed and envy) which he attacks. The subsequent events which lead up to the concluding paragraph are thus left untold.

As the anger aroused by the memory of his downfall into using poetry as a means to wealth surges into consciousness, his 'bursting into extremities' constitutes the material of his satiric harangue as he is swept into the nightmarish world of unresolved passions where the distinction between the real and the imaginary collapses, where the passion-driven Oliver eventually argues with, rails against, and finally pleads with the poetic personification of gold as if it were a real, present person and, in self-hatred, ends up exclaiming 'Why do I lose myself in seeking thee?' (1231-2). Middleton's tracing of the ant's rapid disintegration into this state of madness is masterful, a foreshadowing of his later dramatic power in depicting characters such as De Flores.

Despite Oliver's negative passions, the portrait remains sympathetic because he still is nothing more than a simple ant who has wandered into a trap. At the same time, his vice is real and worth excoriating. The problem has resulted from his naïve, bookish misunderstanding of patronage in the Golden Age of Augustan Rome when, he believes, kings 'Hung jewels at the ear of every rhyme' (1164). Translated into his own frame of reference, 'In those golden days... a virtuous writer... might have... expended more by the revenue of his verse than any riotous elder brother upon the wealthy quarterages of three times three hundred acres', an echo of his experience as a ploughman (1154-9). He overlooks the reality of patronage both in ancient Rome and contemporary England in dedicating himself to poetry in the desperate hope of material advancement.

The situation is complicated by his unrealistic opinion of his talents as a poet. For example, he introduces his rhyming doggerel about the demise of the 'Golden Age' with his critical judgement: 'the excellent report of these lines' (1159). However, within these few lines occur outrageous instances of the mangling of the central conceit. Middleton's combination of defective rhetoric and Oliver's inflated opinion of his talents is similar to Marston's satiric technique in The Metamorphosis of Pygmalion's Image and Certain Satires (see Weiss, 1972). Overall, this section of the tale is a virtuoso performance in the 'vices', or misuses, of rhetorical tropes and figures as Oliver juggles various topoi (e.g., subjects-adjuncts, cause-effect) to produce the stream of ludicrous images.

Middleton took the idea for the major conceit of the ant's harangue and verses directly from a passage in Pierce: 'By which means, the mighty controller of fortune and imperious subverter of destiny, delicious gold, the poor man's God and idol of princes (that look pale and wan through long imprisonment), might at length be restored to his powerful monarchy and eftsoun be set at liberty to help his friends that have need of him' (Harrison, 18). Oliver's primary wish is that gold 'be let free to every virtuous and therefore poor scholar' (1195-6) and to 'keep company with a scholar that truly knows how to use thee' (1239-40). Nashe's 'long imprisonment' generates Oliver's observation that 'Gold lies now as prisoner in an usurer's great iron chest' (1171-2). Middleton plays with other elements of Nashe's conceit as well.

Given the quality of his verse, we can assume that Oliver's study of poetry followed the same method as his study of logic and was based upon the notion that simple hard work produces good poetry. He terms the process 'musical rhyming study' (1242-3). That is exactly what he has done, and because he has mastered the technique of 'running rhymes in rattling rows' (in Sir Philip Sidney's terms), he considers himself an accomplished poet worthy of patronage. This illusion looms over the project: he thinks that the product—that 'elaborate poetical building'—merits patronage because it is 'industriously heaped with weighty conceits, precious phrases and wealthy numbers' (1241-8). Despite his experience with Clutch-Fist, Oliver never realizes that a poet does not build a book like a husbandman builds a barn or a haystack. Ultimately, Oliver's understanding of good poetry is no better than the ‘poor latinless authors’ ridiculed by Nashe: ‘They no sooner spy a new ballad and his name to it that compiled it, but they put him in for one of the learned men of our time’ (Harrison, 60).

The Nyghtingale and the Ante

Although Clutch-Fist is a parsimonious patron worthy of condemnation, Oliver’s desire for revenge in ‘The Epistle Dedicatory’ stems directly from his undiminished esteem for the worthiness of his own ‘industriously heaped’ poems. But Clutch-Fist’s opinion of Oliver’s verse is not the issue; rather, Oliver’s thwarted greed frames the Epistle, beginning with the salutation ‘Most guerdonless sir... the muses’ bad paymaster that owest’ (10–11) for all the works dedicated to him, and ends with the sarcastic advice ‘make your men break their pates, and give them ten groats apiece’ (43–6). It is true that Oliver chose the wrong patron, but the sad fact is that his poetry is unworthy of even ten groats. In the end, he departs the world of humans in this self-deluded state, believing that he is justified in blazoning to the world the truth about Clutch-Fist, ‘a clown that knows not how to use a scholar’ in Nashe’s words. But Oliver should not have become a scholar to ‘get rich’ in the first place—that is the first cause of all ensuing effects. Nonetheless, Oliver retains Philomel’s sympathy as well as the reader’s. As Philomel observes (1259–64), he is better off as an ant.

The concluding verses common to both versions (1267–82) evoke a paranoia about the danger of satirically attacking those in positions of power and rank. Philomel feels ‘betrayed’ after noticing that ‘all the birds’, having awakened at dawn, perhaps have overheard part of ‘their pretty chat’. Her fear is that ‘they abroad will blab our words’. The ants understand the danger and ‘held their tongues’ after returning to work. Perhaps Middleton’s own experience with the burning of Microcynicon and the ensuing ban on satires (1599) underlies this concluding scenario. It is a reminder that the fictional world of a satire intersects with reality. Middleton defends himself against criticism with a traditional ‘apology’ in ‘To the Reader’. His ‘mirth’ is ‘harmless’, and the ‘very bitterest’ in him is nothing worse than a wholesome ‘frost’ (68–72). The satire in the work, in short, is meant to be funny although it will indeed touch tender spots in some readers—as satire always does. The only readers who will miss this point are ‘some riotous vomiting Kit or some gentleman-swallowing Malkin’ (73–4). Finally, the salutation—‘Yours, if you read without spelling or hacking’—cautions the reader against trying to ‘hack’ (i.e., interpret) the descriptions of characters in an attempt to link them with real-world counterparts. That, indeed, is the real danger in publishing a satire.

SEE ALSO

Textual introduction and apparatus: Companion, 476
Authorship and date: Companion, 348

The Nyghtingale and the Ant

A Jove surgit opus

	The west-sea’s goddess in a crimson robe, Her temples circled with a coral wreath, Waited her love, the light’ner of earth’s globe; The wanton wind did on her bosom breathe, 5 The nymphs of springs did hallowed water pour; Whate’er was cold helped to make cool her bower.
	And now the fiery horses of the sun Were from their golden-flaming car untraced, And all the glory of the day was done, Save here and there some light moon-clouds en- 10 chased; A parti-coloured canopy did spread Over the sun and Thetis’ amorous bed.
	Now had the shepherds folded in their flocks, The sweating teams uncoupled from their yokes. 15 The wolf sought prey, and the sly-murdering fox Attempts to steal, fearless of rural strokes. All beasts took rest that lived by lab’ring toil;
		Only such ranged as had delight in spoil.
		Now in the pathless region of the air The winged passengers had left to soar, 20 Except the bat and owl, who bode sad care, And Philomel, that nightly doth deplore, In soul-contenting tunes, her change of shape, Wrought first by perfidy and lustful rape.
		This poor musician, sitting all alone 25 On a green hawthorn, from the thunder blest, Carols in varied notes her antique moan, Keeping a sharpened briar against her breast: Her innocence this watchful pain doth take, To shun the adder and the speckled snake. 30
		These two, like her old foe the Lord of Thrace, Regardless of her dulcet changing song, To serve their own lust have her life in chase. Virtue by vice is offered endless wrong.

The Nyghtingale and the Ante

135 'Else would not soothing glossers oil the son,
Who, while his father lived, his acts did hate.
They know all earthly day with man is done
When he is circled in the night of fate.
So, the deceased they think on no more,
But whom they injured late, they now adore.

140 'But there's a manly lion now can roar,
Thunder more dreaded than the lioness;
Of him let simple beasts his aid implore,
For he conceives more than they can express.
The virtuous politic is truly man;
Devil, the atheist politician.

145 'I guessed thee such a one: but tell thy tale.
If thou be simple, as thou hast expressed,
Do not with coined words set wit to sale,
Nor with the flatt'ring world use vain protest.
Sith man thou sayst thou wert, I prithee tell,
150 While thou wert man, what mischiefs thee befell.'

'Princess! You bid me buried cares revive',
Quoth the poor ant, 'Yet sith by you I live,
So let me in my daily lab'rings thrive
As I myself do to your service give.
155 I have been oft a man, and so to be,
Is often to be thrall to misery.

'But if you will have me my mind disclose,
I must entreat you that I may set down
The tales of my black fortunes in sad prose.
160 Rhyme is uneven, fashioned by a clown.
I first was such a one: I tilled the ground,
And amongst rurals verse is scarcely found.'

'Well, tell thy tales, but see thy prose be good.
For if thou Euphuize, which once was rare
165 And of all English phrase the life and blood,
In those times for the fashion past compare,
I'll say thou borrow'st, and condemn thy style,
As our new fools that count all following vile.

'Or if in bitterness thou rail like Nashe—170 (Forgive me, honest soul, that term thy phrase
"Railing", for in thy works thou wert not rash,
Nor didst affect in youth thy private praise;
Thou hadst a strife with that Trigemini:
Thou hurt'st not them till they had injured thee.

175 'Thou wast indeed too slothful to thyself,
Hiding thy better talent in thy spleen.
True spirits are not covetous in pelf;
Youth's wit is ever ready, quick, and keen.
Thou didst not live thy ripened autumn day,
180 But wert cut off in thy best blooming May.

'Else hadst thou left, as thou indeed hast left,
Sufficient test, though now in others' chests,
T'improve the baseness of that humorous theft,
Which seems to flow from self-conceiving breasts.
185 Thy name they bury, having buried thee;

Drones eat thy honey: thou wert the true bee.

'Peace keep thy Soul.)—And now to you, Sir Ant:
On with your prose, be neither rude nor nice;
In your discourse let no decorum want;
See that you be sententious and concise,
190 And, as I like the matter, I will sing
A canzonet to close up everything.'

The Ant's Tale when he was a Ploughman.

I was sometimes, most chaste Lady Nightingale, or rather,
Queen Philomel the ravished, a brow-melting husband-195 man. To be man and husband is to be a poor master of many rich cares, which, if he cannot subject and keep under, he must look forever to undergo as many miseries as the hours of his years contain minutes. Such a man I was and such a husband, for I was linked in marriage.
200 My havings was small and my means less, yet charge came on me ere I knew how to keep it; yet did I all my endeavours, had a plough and land to employ it, fertile enough if it were manured, and for tillage I was never held a truant.
205

But my destruction and the ruin of all painful hus-bandmen about me began by the prodigal downfall of my young landlord, whose father, grandfather, and great-grandfather for many generations had been lords of the town wherein I dwelt and many other towns near adjoining; 210 to all which belonged fair commons for the comfort of the poor, liberty of fishing, help of fuel by brush and underwood never denied, till the old devourer of virtue, honesty, and good neighbourhood—Death—had made our landlord dance after his pipe, which is so common 215 that every one knows the way though they make small account of it. Well, die he did, and as soon as he was laid in his grave, the bell might well have tolled for hospitality and good housekeeping; for whether they fell sick with him and died and so were buried, I know not, but I am 220 sure in our town they were never seen since, nor that I can hear of in any other part; especially about us they are impossible to be found.

Well, our landlord being dead, we had his heir, gentle enough and fair conditioned, rather promising at first his father's virtues than the world's villainies, but he was so accustomed to wild and unfruitful company about the court and London (whither he was sent by his sober father to practise civility and manners) that in the country he would scarce keep till his father's body was laid in the cold 230 earth. But as soon as the hasty funeral was solemnized, from us he posted, discharging all his old father's servants (whose beards were even frost-bitten with age) and was attended only by a monkey and a marmoset, the one being an ill-faced fellow as variable as Newfangle for fashions, 235 the other an imitator of anything, however villainous, but utterly destitute of all goodness. With this French page and Italianate servingman was our young landlord only waited on, and all to save charges in servingmen to pay it out in harlots. And we poor men had news of a far greater 240 expense within less than a quarter, for we were sent for to London and found our great landlord in a little room about the Strand, who told us that, whereas we had lived 245 tenants at will and might in his forefather's days been hourly turned out, he, putting on a better conscience to usward, intended to make us leases for years; and for advice 'twixt him and us, he had made choice of a lawyer, a mercer, and a merchant to whom he was much 250 beholden, who that morning were appointed to meet in the Temple Church.

Temple and church, both one in name, made us hope of a holy meeting; but there is an old proverb, "The nearer the Church, the farther from God." To approve which saying, we met the mercer and the merchant that, 255 loving our landlord or his land well, held him a great man in both their books. Some little conference they had; what the conclusion was we poor men were not acquainted with; but being called at their leisure and when they pleased to think upon us, told us they were 260 to dine together at the Horn in Fleet Street, being a house where their lawyer resorted; and if we would there attend them, we should understand matter much for our good;
and in the mean time they appointed us near the old Temple Garden to attend their counsellor, whose name 265 was master Prospero—not the great rider of horse (for I have heard there was once such a one), but a more cunning rider who had rid many men till they were more miserable than beasts, and our ill hap it was to prove his hackneys. Well, though the issue were ill, on we went to 270 await his worship, whose chamber we found that morning fuller of clients than I could ever see suppliants to heaven in our poor parish church (and yet we had in it three hundred households); and I may tell it with reverence, I never saw more submission done to God than to that great 275 lawyer. Every suitor there offered gold to this gowned idol, standing bareheaded in a sharp-set morning (for it was in booted Michaelmas term), and not a word spoke to him but it was with the bowing of the body and the submissive flexure of the knee. Short tale to make, he was informed 280 of us what we were and of our coming up, when, with an iron look and shrill voice, he began to speak to the richest of our number, ever and anon jerking out the word 'fines', which served instead of a full point to every sentence.

But that word 'fines' was no fine word, methought, 285 to please poor labouring husbandmen that can scarce sweat out so much in a twelvemonth as he would demand in a twinkling. At last, to close up the lamentable tragedy of us ploughmen, enters our young landlord, so 290 metamorphosed into the shape of a French puppet that, at the first, we started and thought one of the baboons had marched in in man's apparel. His head was dressed up in white feathers like a shuttlecock, which agreed so well with his brain (being nothing but cork), that two 295 of the biggest of the guard might very easily have tossed him with battledores and made good sport with him in his majesty's great hall. His doublet was of a strange cut, and to show the fury of his humour, the collar of it rose up so high and sharp as if it would have cut his throat 300 by daylight. His wings, according to the fashion now, was as little and diminutive as a puritan's ruff, which showed he ne'er meant to fly out of England nor do any exploit beyond sea, but live and die about London though he begged in Finsbury. His breeches, a wonder to see, were full as deep as the middle of winter or the roadway between London and Winchester, and so large 305 and wide withal that I think within a twelvemonth he might very well put all his lands in them, and then you may imagine they were big enough when they would outreach a thousand acres. Moreover, they differed so far from our fashioned hose in the country and from his 310 father's old gascoynes that his back part seemed to us like a monster, the roll of the breeches standing so low that we conjectured his house of office, sir-reverence, stood in his hams.

All this while his French monkey bore his cloak of three-pounds-a-yard, lined clean through with purple velvet, which did so dazzle our coarse eyes that we thought we should have been purblind ever after, what with the prodigal aspect of that and his glorious rapier and hangers, all bossed with pillars of gold, fairer in show than 315 the pillars in Paul's or the tombs at Westminster; beside, it drunk up the price of all my ploughland in very pearl, which stuck as thick upon those hangers as the white measles upon hog's flesh. When I had well viewed that gay gaudy cloak and those unthrifty wasteful hangers, 320 I muttered thus to myself: 'That is no cloak for the rain sure, nor those no hangers for Derrick.' When, of a sudden casting mine eyes lower, I beheld a curious pair of boots of King Philip's leather in such artificial wrinkles, sets, and pleats as if they had been starched lately and came 325 new from the laundresses—such was my ignorance and simple acquaintance with the fashion, and I dare swear my fellows and neighbours here are all as ignorant as myself. But that which struck us most into admiration:
upon those fantastical boots stood such huge and wide 330 tops which so swallowed up his thighs that had he sworn, as other gallants did, this common oath: 'Would I might sink as I stand!', all his body might very well have sunk down and been damned in his boots. Lastly, he walked the chamber with such a pestilent jingle that his spurs 335 over-squeaked the lawyer and made him reach his voice three notes above his fee. But after we had spied the rowels of his spurs, how we blessed ourselves!—they did so much and so far exceed the compass of our fashion that they looked more like the forerunners of wheelbarrows.

Thus was our young landlord accoutred in such a strange and prodigal shape that it amounted to above two year's rent in apparel. At last approach the mercer and the merchant, two notable arch-tradesmen who had 340 fitted my young master in clothes whilst they had clothed themselves in his acres, and measured him out velvet by the thumb whilst they received his revenues by handfuls; for he had not so many yards in his suit as they had yards and houses bound for the payment, which now 345 he was forced to pass over to them or else all his lands should be put to their book and to their forfeiting neck-verse. So my youngster was now at his pension, not like a gentleman pensioner, but like a gentleman scrivener.

The Nyghtingale and the Ante

360 Whereupon entered Master Bursebell the royal scrivener with deeds and writings hanged, drawn, and quartered for the purpose. He was a valiant scribe. I remember his pen lay mounted between his ear like a Tower gun, but not charged yet till our young master's patrimony shot off, which was some third part of an hour after. By 365 this time the lawyer, the mercer, and the merchant were whispering and consulting together about the writings and passage of the land in very deep and sober conference.

But our 'wiseacres' all the while, as one regardless of either land or money, not hearkening or inquisitive after 370 their subtle and politic devices, held himself very busy about the burning of his tobacco pipe (as there is no gallant but hath a pipe to burn about London) though we poor simple men ne'er heard of the name till that time; and he might very fitly take tobacco there, for the 375 lawyer and the rest made him smoke already. But to have noted the apish humour of him and the fantastical faces he coined in the receiving of the smoke, it would have made your ladyship have sung nothing but merry jigs for a twelvemonth after—one time winding the pipe like a horn 380 at the pie-corner of his mouth, which must needs make him look like a sow-gelder, and another time screwing his face like one of our country players, which must needs make him look like a fool; nay, he had at least his dozen of faces, but never a good one amongst them all—neither 385 his father's face, nor the face of his grandfather, but yet more wicked and riotous faces than all the generation of him.

Now their privy whisperings and villainous plots began to be drawn to a conclusion when presently they called 390 our smoky landlord in the midst of his draught, who in a valiant humour dashed his tobacco pipe into the chimney corner, whereat I started, and beckoning his marmoset to me, asked him if those long white things did cost no money; to which the slave replied very proudly: 'Money!
395 Yes sirrah, but I tell thee my master scorns to have a thing come twice to his mouth.' 'Then', quoth I, 'I think thy master is more choice in his mouth than in any member else: it were good if he used that all his body over—he would never have need, as many gallants have, 400 of any sweating physic.' 'Sweating physic?', replied the marmoset, 'What may thy meaning be? Why, do not you ploughmen sweat too?' 'Yes', quoth I, 'most of any men living. But yet there is difference between the sweat of a 405 ploughman and the sweat of a gentleman, as much as between your master's apparel and mine. For when we sweat, the land prospers and the harvest comes in, but when a gentleman sweats, I wot how the gear goes then.'
No sooner were these words spoken but the marmoset 410 had drawn out his poinard halfway to make a show of revenge, but at the smart voice of the lawyer he suddenly whipped it in again.

Now was our young master with one penful of ink doing a far greater exploit than all his forefathers, for 415 what they were a-purchasing all their lifetime, he was now passing away in the fourth part of a minute; and that which many thousand drops of his grandfather's brows

did painfully strive for, one drop now of a scrivener's inkhorn did easily pass over. A dash of a pen stood for a thousand acres—how quickly they were dashed in the 420 mouth by our young landlord's prodigal fist! It seemed he made no more account of acres than of acorns. Then were we called to set our hands for witnesses of his folly, which we poor men did witness too much already. And because we were found ignorant in writing and never 425 practised in that black art (which I might very fitly term so because it conjured our young master out of all), we were commanded, as it were, to draw any mark with a pen, which should signify as much as the best hand that ever old Peter Bales hung out in the Old Bailey. To conclude, I 430 took the pen first of the lawyer, and turning it arsy-versy like no instrument for a ploughman, our youngster and the rest of the faction burst into laughter at the simplicity of my fingering. But I, not so simple as they laughed me for, drew the picture of a knavish emblem, which was A 435 Plough with the Heels Upward, signifying thereby that the world was turned upside down since the decease of my old landlord, all hospitality and good housekeeping kicked out of doors, all thriftiness and good husbandry tossed into the air, ploughs turned into trunks, and corn into apparel.
440 Then came another of our husbandmen to set his mark by mine; he, holding the pen clean at the one side towards the merchant and the mercer showing that all went on their sides, drew the form of an unbridled colt so wild and unruly that he seemed with one foot to kick up the earth 445 and spoil the labours of many toiling beasts, which was fitly alluded to our wild and unbridled landlord, which (like the colt) could stand upon no ground till he had no ground to stand upon.

These marks, set down under the shape of simplicity, 450 were the less marked with the eyes of knavery, for they little dreamed that we ploughmen could have so much satire in us as to bite our young landlord by the elbow.
Well, this ended, master Bursebell the calfskin scrivener was royally handled—that is, he had a royal put in his 455 hand by the merchant. And now I talk of calfskin: 'tis great pity, Lady Nightingale, that the skins of harmless and innocent beasts should be as instruments to work villainy upon, entangling young novices and foolish elder brothers which are caught like woodcocks in the net of 460 the law; for 'tis easier for one of the greatest fowls to slide through the least hole of a net than one of the least fools to get from the lappet of a bond.

By this time the squeaking lawyer began to reiterate that cold word 'fines' which struck so chill to our hearts 465 that it made them as cold as our heels, which were almost frozen to the floor with standing. 'Yea', quoth the merchant and the mercer, 'you are now tenants of ours; all the right, title, and interest of this young gentleman, your late landlord, we are firmly possessed of, 470 as you yourselves are witnesses. Wherefore, this is the conclusion of our meeting: such fines as master Prospero here, by the valuation of the land, shall out of his proper judgement allot to us, such are we to demand at your hands. Therefore we refer you to him to wait his answer

475 at the gentleman's best time and leisure.' With that they stifled two or three angels in the lawyer's right hand—
'right hand' said I? Which hand was that, trow ye? For it is impossible to know which is the right hand of a lawyer because there are but few lawyers that have right hands, 480 and those few make much of them. So, taking their leaves of my young landlord that was and that never shall be again, away they marched, heavier by a thousand acres at their parting than they were before at their meeting.

The lawyer then, turning his Irish face to usward, willed 485 us to attend his worship the next term, when we should further understand his pleasure. We poor souls thanked his worship and paid him his fee out in legs, when, in sight of us, he embraced our young gentleman (I think, for a fool) and gave him many riotous instructions how 490 to carry himself, which he was prompter to take than the other to put into him: told him he must acquaint himself with many gallants of the Inns of Court and keep rank with those that spend most, always wearing bountiful disposition about him, lofty and liberal; his lodging must 495 be about the Strand, in any case, being remote from the handicraft scent of the City; his eating must be in some famous tavern, as the Horn, the Mitre, or the Mermaid, and then after dinner, he must venture beyond sea, that is, in a choice pair of noblemen's oars to the Bankside where 500 he must sit out the breaking up of a comedy or the first cut of a tragedy; or rather (if his humour so serve him), to call in at the Blackfriars where he should see a nest of boys able to ravish a man. This said, our young gooscap, who was ready to embrace such counsel, thanked him for 505 his fatherly admonitions (as he termed them), and told him again that he should not find him with the breach of any of them, swearing and protesting he would keep all those better than the ten commandments. At which word he buckled on his rapier and hangers, his monkey-face 510 casting on his cloak by the book; after an apish congee or two, passed downstairs without either word or nod to us, his old father's tenants.

Nevertheless, we followed him, like so many russet servngmen, to see the event of all and what the issue 515 would come to, when, of a sudden, he was encountered by a most glorious-spangled gallant which we took at first to have been some upstart tailor because he measured all his body with a salutation from the flow of the doublet to the fall of the breeches. But at last we found him to 520 be a very fantastical sponge that licked up all humours, the very ape of fashions, gesture, and compliment—one of those indeed (as we learned afterward) that fed upon young landlords, riotous sons, and heirs till either he or the Counter in Wood Street had swallowed them up; and 525 would not stick to be a bawd or pander to such young gallants as our young gentleman, either to acquaint them with harlots or harlots with them, to bring them a whole dozen of taffeta punks at a supper; and they should be none of these common Molls neither, but discontented 530 and unfortunate gentlewomen whose parents being lately deceased, the brother ran away with all the land, and they, poor squalls, with a little money which cannot hold out long without some comings in; but they will rather venture a maidenhead than want a headtire; such shuttlecocks as these which, though they are tossed and 535 played withal, go still like maids all white on the top;

or else decayed gentlemen's wives, whose husbands (poor souls) lying for debt in the King's Bench, they go about to make monsters in the King's Head tavern, for this is a general axiom: all your luxurious plots are always begun 540 in taverns to be ended in vaulting houses; and after supper when fruit comes in, there is small fruit of honesty to be looked for—for you know that the eating of the apple always betokens the fall of Eve.

Our prodigal child, accompanied with this soaking 545 swaggerer and admirable cheater (who had supped up most of our heirs about London like poached eggs), slips into Whitefriars nunnery whereas, the report went, he kept his most delicate drab of three hundred a year—
some unthrifty gentleman's daughter who had mortgaged 550 his land to scriveners sure enough from redeeming again.
For so much she seemed by her bringing up, though less by her casting down. Endued she was (as we heard) with some good qualities, though all were converted then but to flattering villainies. She could run upon the lute very well, 555 which in others would have appeared virtuous but in her lascivious, for her running was rather jested at because she was a light runner besides. She had likewise the gift of singing very deliciously, able to charm the hearer, which so bewitched away our young master's money that he 560 might have kept seven noise of musicians for less charges, and yet they would have stood for servingmen too, having blue coats of their own. She had a humour to lisp often like a flatt'ring wanton and talk childish like a parson's daughter, which so pleased and rapt our old landlord's 565 lickerish son that he would swear she spoke nothing but sweetmeats and her breath then sent forth such a delicious odour that it perfumed his white-satin doublet better than sixteen milliners.

Well, there we left him with his devouring cheater and 570 his glorious cockatrice, and being almost upon dinnertime, we hied us and took our repast at thrifty Mother Walker's, where we found a whole nest of pinching bachelors crowded together upon forms and benches in that most worshipful three-halfpenny ordinary, where 575 presently they were boarded with hot Monsieur Mutton-and-Porridge (a Frenchman by his blowing); and next to them, we were served in order, everyone taking their degree. And I tell you true, lady, I have known the time when our young landlord's father hath been a 580 three-halfpenny eater there; nay more, was the first that acquainted us with that sparing and thrifty ordinary, when his riotous son hath since spent his five pound at a sitting. Well, having discharged our small shot (which was like hail-shot in respect of our young master's 585 cannon-reckonings in taverns), we plodded home to our ploughs, carrying these heavy news to our wives, both of the prodigality of our old landlord's son as also of our oppressions to come by the burden of uncharitable fines. And, most musical Madam Nyghtingale, do but 590

595 imagine now what a sad Christmas we all kept in the country without either carols, wassail-bowls, dancing of Sellinger's Round in moonshine nights about maypoles, shoeing the mare, hoodman-blind, hot-cockles, or any of our old Christmas gambols; no, not so much as choosing king and queen on Twelfth Night. Such was the dullness of our pleasures, for that one word 'fines' robbed us of all our fine pastimes.

600 This sour-faced Christmas thus unpleasantly past over, up again we trotted to London—in a great frost, I remember, for the ground was as hard as the lawyer's conscience. And arriving at the luxurious Strand some three days before the term, we inquired for our bountiful landlord, or the fool in the full, at his neat and curious lodging. But answer was made us by an old chambermaid that our gentleman slept not there all the Christmastime, but had been at court and at least in five masques. Marry now, as she thought, we might find him at master Poopees his ordinary with half-a-dozen of gallants more at dice. 605 'At dice? At the devil!', quoth I, 'for that is a dicer's last throw!' Here I began to rail like Thomas Nashe against Gabriel Harvey, if you call that railing; yet I think it was but the running a tilt of wits in booksellers' shops on both sides of John of Paul's churchyard, and I wonder how John escaped unhorsing. But when we were entered the door of the ordinary, we might hear our lusty gentleman shoot off a volley of oaths some three rooms over us, cursing the dice and wishing the pox were in their bones, crying out for a new pair of square ones, for the other belike had cogged with him and made a gull of him. When, 620 the host of the ordinary coming downstairs, met us with this report after we had named him: 'Troth, good fellows, you have named now the most unfortunatest gentleman living—at passage, I mean; for I protest, I have stood by myself as a heavy eyewitness and seen the beheading of five hundred crowns, and what pitiful end they all made!' With that he showed us his embossed girdle and hangers new-pawned for more money, and told us beside (not without tears), his glorious cloak was cast away three 630 hours before overboard, which was, off the table. At which lamentable hearing, we stood still in the lower room and durst not venture upstairs for fear he would have laid all us ploughmen to pawn too; and yet I think all we could scarce have made up one throw. But to draw to an end as his patrimony did, we had not lingered the better part of an hour, but down came the host fencing his glittering rapier and dagger as if he had been newly 635 shoulder-clapped by a pewter-buttoned sergeant and his weapons seized upon. At last, after a great peal of oaths on all sides, the court broke up and the worshipful bench of dicers came thundering downstairs, some swearing, some laughing, some cursing, and some singing, with such a confusion of humours that, had we not known before what rank of gallants they were, we should have 640 thought the devils had been at dice in an ordinary. The first that appeared to us was our most lamentable landlord dressed up in his monkey's livery cloak (that he seemed now rather to wait upon his monkey than his monkey upon him), which did set forth his satin suit so excellent scurvily that he looked for all the world like a French lord in dirty boots; when, casting his eye upon us, being desirous (as it seemed) to remember us now if we had any money, broke into these fantastical speeches: 'What, my whole warren of tenants?'—thinking indeed to make conies of us—'my honest nest of ploughmen, the only 655 kings of Kent! More dice, ho! then, i'faith, let's have another career, and vomit three dice in a hand again.' With that I plucked his humour at one side and told him we were indeed his father's tenants, but his (we were sorry) we were not. And as for money to maintain his dice, we had not sufficient to stuff out the lawyer. Then replied our gallant in a rage, tossing out two or three new-minted oaths: 'These ploughmen are politicians, I think; they have wit, the whoresons; they will be tenants, I perceive, longer than we shall be landlords!' And fain he would have swaggered with us but that his weapons were at pawn. So, marching out like a turned gentleman, the rest of the gallants seemed to cashier him and throw him out of their company like a blank die—the one having no black pips, nor he no white pieces. Now was our gallant the true picture of the prodigal, and having no rents to gather now, he gathered his wits about him, making his brain pay him revenues in villainy. For it is a general observation that your sons and heirs prove seldom wisemen till they have no more land than the compass 670 of their noddles. To conclude, within few days' practice, he was grown as absolute in cheating and as exquisite in pandarism that he outstripped all Greene's books Of the Art of Cony-catching; and where before he maintained his drab, he made his drab now maintain him; proved the only true captain of vaulting-houses and the valiant champion against constables and searchers, feeding upon the sin of Whitefriars, Picket-hatch, and Turnbull Street. Nay, there was no landed novice now but he could melt him away into nothing, and in one twelvemonth make him hold all his land between his legs, and yet but straddle easily neither. No wealthy son of the city but, within less than a quarter, he could make all his stock not worth a Jersey stocking. He was all that might be in dissolute villainy and nothing that should be in his forefathers' 690 honesty. To speak troth, we did so much blush at his life and were so ashamed of his base courses that ever after we loathed to look after them.

But returning to our stubble-haired lawyer, who reaped his beard every term-time (the lawyer's harvest), we found the mercer and the merchant crowded in his study amongst a company of law books, which they jostled so often with their coxcombs that they were almost together by the ears with them; when, at the sight of us, they took an habeas corpus and removed their bodies into a bigger 700 room. But there we lingered not long for our torments, for the mercer and the merchant gave fire to the lawyer's tongue with a rope of angels, and the word 'fines' went off with such a powder that the force of it blew us all into the country, quite changed our ploughmen's shapes, and so we became little ants again. 705

The Nyghtingale and the Ante

710 This, Madam Nyghtingale, is the true discourse of our rural fortunes, which, how miserable, wretched, and full of oppression they were, all husbandmen's brows can witness that are fined with more sweat still year by year; and I hope a canzonet of your sweet singing will set them forth to the world in satirical harmony.

715 The remorseful nyghtingale, delighted with the ant's quaint discourse, began to tune the instrument of her voice, breathing forth these lines in sweet and delicious airs.

The Nyghtingale's Canzonet.

Poor little ant,
Thou shalt not want
720 The ravished music of my voice!
Thy shape is best,
Now thou art least;
For great ones fall with greater noise,
And this shall be the carriage of my song:
725 Small bodies can have but a little wrong.

Now thou art securer
And thy days far surer;
Thou pay'st no rent upon the rack
To daub a prodigal landlord's back,
730 Or to maintain the subtle running
Of dice and drabs, both one in cunning;
Both pass from hand to hand to many,
Flatt'ring all, yet false to any;
Both are well linked, for, throw dice how you can,
735 They will turn up their pips to every man.

Happy art thou and all thy brothers
That never feel'st the hell of others:
The torment to a luxur due,
Who never thinks his harlot true;
740 Although upon her heels he stick his eyes,
Yet still he fears that though she stands, she lies.

Now are thy labours easy,
Thy state not sick or queasy;
All drops thou sweat'st are now thine own;
745 Great subsidies be as unknown
To thee and to thy little fellow ants;
Now none of you under that burden pants.

Lo, for example, I myself, poor worms,
That have outworn the rage of Tereus' storms,
750 Am ever blessed now in this downy shape
From all men's treachery or soul-melting rape;
And when I sing Tereu, Tereu
Through every town and so renew
The name of Tereus, slaves, through fears,
755 With guilty fingers bolt their ears;
And all ravishers do rave and e'en fall mad,
And then such wronged souls as myself are glad.

So thou, small wretch, and all thy nest,
Are in those little bodies blest,
760 Not taxed beyond your poor degree

With landlord's fine and lawyer's fee.
But tell me, pretty toiling worm,
Did that same ploughman's weary form
Discourage thee so much from others,
That neither thou, nor those thy brothers,
765 In borrowed shapes durst once again
Venture amongst perfidious men?

Ant.

'Yes lady', the poor ant replied,
'I left not so, but then I tried
770 War's sweating fortunes, not alone
Condemning rash all states for one,
Until I found by proof and knew by course
That one was bad, but all the rest were worse.'

Nyghtingale.

775 Didst thou put on a rugged soldier then,
A happy state because thou fought'st 'gainst men?
Prithee discourse thy fortunes, state, and harms.
Thou wast, no doubt, a mighty man-at-arms.

The Ant's Tale when he was a Soldier.

780 Then thus: most musical and prickle-singing madam (for, if I err not, your ladyship was the first that brought up prick-song, being nothing else but the fatal notes of your pitiful ravishment), I, not contented long (a vice cleaving to all worldlings) with this little estate of an ant, but stuffed with envy and ambition, as small as I was, desired to venture into the world again, which I may rather term the upper hell, or frigida gehenna, the cold-charitable hell wherein are all kind of devils too, as your gentle devil, your ordinary devil, and your gallant devil; and all these can change their shapes too, as today in cowardly white, tomorrow in politic black, a third day in jealous yellow; for believe it, sweet lady, there are devils of all colours. Nevertheless I, covetous of more change, leaped out of this little skin of an ant and hung my skin on the hedge, taking upon me the grisly shape of a dusty soldier. Well made I was, and my limbs valiantly hewn out for the purpose: I had a mazard, I remember, so well-lined in the inside with my brain it stood me in better stead than a double headpiece, for the brain of a soldier, differing from all other sciences, converts itself to no other use but to line, fur, and even quilt the coxcomb, and so makes a pate of proof. My face was well-leavened which made my looks taste sour, the true relish of a man of war; my cheeks, dough-baked, pale, wan, and therefore argued valour and resolution; 805 but my nose somewhat hard-baked and a little burnt in the oven, a property not amiss in a soldier's visage who should scorn to blush but in his nose. My chin was well thatched with a beard which was a necessary shelter in winter and a fly-flap in summer, so brushy and spreading that my lips could scarce be seen to walk abroad, but played at all-hid and durst not peep forth for starting a hair. To conclude, my arms, thighs, and legs were so sound, stout, and weighty (as if they had come all out of the timber yard) that my very presence only was able to 815 still the bawlingest infant in Europe. And I think, madam, this was no unlikely shape for a soldier to prove well: here was mettle enough, for four shillings a week, to do valiant service till it was bored as full of holes as a skimmer.

820 Well, to the wars I betook me, ranked myself amongst desperate hot-shots—only, my carriage put on more civility, for I seemed more like a spy than a follower, an observer rather than a committer of villany. And little thought I, madam, that the camp had been supplied with harlots too as well as the Curtain, and the guarded tents as wicked as garden tenements, trulls passing to and fro in the washed shape of laundresses as your bawds about London in the manner of starchwomen, which is the most unsuspected habit that can be to train out a mistress.

830 And if your ladyship will not think me much out of the way, though I take a running leap from the camp to the Strand again, I will discover a pretty knavery of the same breeding between such a starchwoman and a kind wanton mistress, as there are few of those ballassed vessels nowadays but will have a love and a husband.

835 The woman crying her ware by the door (a most pitiful cry and a lamentable hearing that such a stiff thing as starch should want customers), passing cunningly and slyly by the stall, not once taking notice of the party you wot on, but being by this some three or four shops off. ‘Mass’, quoth my young mistress to the weathercock her husband, ‘such a thing I want, you know.’ Then she named how many puffs and purls lay in a miserable case for want of stiffening. The honest, plain-dealing jewel her husband sent out a boy to call her (not ‘bawd’, by her right name, but ‘starchwoman’); into the shop she came, making a low counterfeit curtsy, of whom the mistress demanded if the starch were pure gear and would be stiff in her ruff, saying, she had often been deceived before when the things about her have stood as limber as eelskins. The woman replied as subtly: ‘Mistress’, quoth she, ‘take this paper of starch of my hand, and if it prove not to your mind, never bestow penny with me!’—which paper, indeed, was a letter sent to her from the gentleman, her exceeding favourite. ‘Say you so?’ quoth the young dame, ‘and I’ll try it i’faith.’ With that she ran upstairs like a spinner upon small cobweb ropes, not to try or arraign the starch, but to construe and parse the letter (whilst her husband sat below by the counter like one of these brow-bitten catchpoles that wait for one man all day, when his wife can put five in the Counter before him), wherein she found many words that pleased her. Withal the gentleman writ unto her for a certain sum of money, which no sooner was read but was ready to be sent; wherefore, laying up the starch and that and taking another sheet of clean paper in her hand, wanting time and opportunity to write at large, with a penful of ink, in the very middle of the sheet writ these few quaint monosyllables: ‘Coin, Cares, and Cures, and all C’s else are yours.’ Then rolling up the white money like the starch in that paper very subtly and artificially, came tripping downstairs with these colourable words: ‘Here’s goodly starch indeed! Fie, fie—trust me husband—as yellow as the jaundice! I would not have betrayed my puffs with it for a million! Here, here, here!’ (giving her the paper of money). With that the subtle starchwoman, seeming sorry that it pleased her not, told her, within few days she would fit her turn with that which should like her (meaning, indeed, more such sweet news from her lover). These and suchlike, madam, are the cunning conveyances of secret, privy, and therefore unnoted harlots that so avoid the common finger of the world when less committers than they are publicly pointed at.

880 So, likewise in the camp, whither now I return borne on the swift wings of apprehension, the habit of a laundress shadows the abomination of a strumpet, and our soldiers are like glovers, for the one cannot work well nor the other fight well without their wenches. This was the first mark of villainy that I found sticking upon the brow of War. But after the hot and fiery copulation of a skirmish or two, the ordnance playing like so many Tamburlaines, the muskets and calivers answering like drawers, ‘Anon, anon, sir, I cannot be here and there too’—that is, in the soldier’s hand and in the enemy’s belly—I grew more acquainted and, as it were, entered into the entrails of black-livered policy. Methought indeed, at first, those great pieces of ordnance should speak English, though now by transportation turned rebels; and what a miserable and pitiful plight it was, lady, to have so many thousands of our men slain by their own countrymen the cannons—I mean not the harmless canons of Paul’s, but those cannons that have a great singing in their heads.

895 Well, in this onset I remember I was well smoked but neither arm nor leg perished, not so much as the loss of a petty finger, for when I counted them all over, I missed not one of them, and yet sometimes the bullets came within a hair of my coxcomb even like a barber scratching my pate, and perhaps took away the left limb of a vermin, and so departed; another time shouldering me like a bailiff against Michaelmas term and then shaking me by the sleeve as familiarly as if we had been acquainted seven years together. To conclude, they used me very courteously and gentleman-like awhile, like an old cunning bowler to fetch in a young kettling gamester, who will suffer him to win one sixpenny-game at the first, and then lurch him in six pounds afterward; and so they played with me, still training me with their fair promises into far deeper and deadlier battles where, like villainous cheating bowlers, they lurched me of two of my best limbs, viz. my right arm and right leg, that so, of a man of war, I became in show a monster of war, yet comforted in this because I knew war begot many such monsters as myself in less than a twelvemonth.

910 Now I could discharge no more, having paid the shot dear enough, I think, but rather desired to be discharged, to have pay and be gone: whereupon I appeared to my captain and other commanders, kissing my left hand which then stood for both (like one actor that plays two parts), who seemed to pity my unjoined fortunes and plaster my wounds up with words, told me I had done valiant service in their knowledge; marry, as for pay, they must go on the score with me, for all their money was thumped out in powder. And this was no pleasing salve to a green sore, madam; 'twas too much for me, lady, 935 to trust calivers with my limbs and then cavaliers with my money. Nevertheless, for all my lamentable action of one arm like old Titus Andronicus, I could purchase no more than one month's pay for a ten-month's pain and peril; nor that neither, but to convey away my miserable 940 clamours that lay roaring against the arches of their ears, marry, their bountiful favours were extended thus far: I had a passport to beg in all countries.

The Nyghtingale and the Ante

Well, away I was packed, and after a few miseries by the way, at last I set one foot into England again (for 945 I had no more then to set), being my native though unnatural country for whose dear good I pawned my limbs to bullets, those merciless brokers that will take the vantage of a minute, and so they were quite forfeited, lost, and unrecoverable. When I was on shore, the people 950 gathered, which word 'gathering' put me in hope of good comfort that afterward I failed of. For I thought, at first, they had gathered something for me, but I found, at last, they did only but gather about me, some wondering at me as if I had been some sea monster cast ashore, some 955 jesting at my deformity, whilst others laughed at the jests.
One amongst them, I remember, likened me to a sea-crab because I went all of one side; another fellow vied it and said I looked like a rabbit cut up and half-eaten because my wing and leg (as they termed it) were departed. Some 960 began to pity me, but those were few in number, or at least their pity was as penniless as Pierce, who writ to the devil for maintenance. Thus passing from place to place like the motion of Julius Caesar or the city Nineveh, though not altogether in so good clothes, I overtook the city from 965 whence I borrowed my first breath and in whose defence
I spent and laid out my limbs by whole sums to purchase her peace and happiness, nothing doubting but to be well entreated there, my grievous maims tenderly regarded, my poor broken estate carefully repaired, the ruins of my 970 blood built up again with redress and comfort. But woe the while, madam! I was not only unpitied, succourless, and rejected, but threatened with the public stocks, loathsome jails, and common whipping-posts, there to receive my pay (a goodly reward for my bleeding service) if I were 975 once found in the city again.

Wherefore I was forced to retire towards the Spital and Shoreditch, which, as it appeared, was the only Cole Harbour and sanctuary for wenches and soldiers; where I took up a poor lodging o' trust till the Sunday, hoping 980 that then Master Alms and Mistress Charity would walk abroad and take the air in Finsbury.

At which time I came hopping out from my lodging like old lame Giles of Cripplegate; but when I came there, the wind blew so bleak and cold that I began to be quite 985 out of hope of Charity, yet, like a torn map of misery, I waited my single halfpenny fortunes; when, of a sudden, turning myself about and looking down the Windmill Hill,
I might espy afar off a fine-fashioned dame of the city with her man bound by indenture before her; whom no sooner 990 I caught in mine eyelids, but I made to with all possible speed, and with a premeditated speech for the nonce, thus most soldier-like I accosted her:

'Sweet lady, I beseech your beauty to weigh the estate of a poor unjointed soldier that hath consumed the moiety, 995 or the one half of his limbs, in the dismembering and devouring wars that hath cheated me of my flesh so notoriously. I protest I am not worth at this instant the small revenue of three farthings, besides my lodging unpleased and my diet unsatisfied. And had I ten thousand limbs, I would venture them all in your sweet quarrel 1000 rather than such a beauty as yourself should want the least limb of your desire.'

With that, as one being rather moved by my last words of promise than my first words of pity, she drew her white bountiful hand out of her marry-muff and quited
1005 a single halfpenny, whereby I knew her then to be cold Mistress Charity both by her chill appearance and the hard frozen pension she gave me. She was warm lapped, I remember, from the sharp injury of the biting air: her visage was benighted with a taffeta mask to fray away 1010 the naughty wind from her face, and yet her very nose seemed so sharp with cold that it almost bored a hole quite through. This was frost-bitten Charity: her teeth chattered in her head and leaped up and down like virginal-jacks, which betrayed likewise who she was. And you would 1015 have broken into infinite laughter, madam (though misery made me leaden and pensive), had you been present to have seen how quickly the muff swallowed her hand again, for no sooner was it drawn forth to drop down her pitiful alms but, for fear the sun and air should have 1020 ravished it, it was extempore whipped up again. This is the true picture of Charity, madam, which is as cold as ice in the middle of July.

Well, still I waited for another fare. But then I bethought myself again that all the fares went by water o' Sundays 1025 to the bear-baiting, and o' Mondays to Westminster Hall, and therefore, little to be looked for in Moorfields all the week long.

Wherefore I sat down by the rails there and fell into these passionate, but not railing speeches: 'Is this the farthest reward for a soldier? Is valour and resolution, 1030 the two champions of the soul, so slightly esteemed and so basely undervalued? Doth reeling fortune not only rob us of our limbs, but of our living? Are soldiers then both food for cannon and for misery?' But then, in the midst of my passion, calling to memory the peevish turns of many famous popular gallants whose names were writ even upon the heart of the world (it could not so much as think without them, nor speak but in the discourse of them), I 1040 began to outdare the very worst of cruel and disaster chances and determined to be constant in calamity and valiant against the battering siege of misery. But note the cross star that always dogged my fortunes. I had not long rested there but I saw the tweering constable of Finsbury with his bench of brown billmen making towards me, 1045 meaning indeed to stop some prison hole with me, as your soldiers, when the wars have done with them, are good for nothing else but to stop holes withal; at which sight,

Father Hubburds Tales, or

1050 I scrambled up of all two, took my skin off the hedge, cozened the constable, and slipped into an ant again.

The Nightingale.

1055 'O, 'twas a pretty quaint deceit'
(The Nightingale began to sing),
'To slip from those that lie in wait,
Whose touch is like a raven's wing,
Fatal and ominous, which, being spread
Over a mortal, aims him dead.

1060 'Alas, poor emmet! thou wast tossed
In thousand miseries by this shape,
Thy colour wasted, thy blood lost,
Thy limbs broke with the violent rape
Of hot impatient cannons, which desire
To ravish lives, spending their lust in fire.

1065 'O, what a ruthless sight it is to see,
Though in a soldier of the mean'st degree,
That right member perished,
Which thy body cherished;
That limb dissevered, burnt, and gone,
Which the best part was borne upon;

And then the greatest ruth of all,
Returning home in torn estate,
Where he should rise, there most to fall,
Trode down with envy, bruised with hate:
Yet wretch, let this thy comfort be,
That greater worms have fared like thee.' 1075

By this the day began to spring
And seize upon her watchful eyes,
When more tree-choristers did sing,
And every bird did wake and rise;
Which was no sooner seen and heard, 1080
But all their pretty chat was marred.

And then she said,
'We are betrayed,
The day is up, and all the birds,
And they abroad will blab our words.' 1085
With that she bade the ants farewell,
And all they likewise Philomel.

Away she flew,
Crying Tereu!
And all the industrious ants in throngs 1090
Fell to their work, and held their tongues.

FINIS.

Father Hubburd's Tales

Or, The Ant and the Nightingale

The Epistle Dedicatory.

5 To the true general patron of all muses, musicians, poets, and picture-drawers, Sir Christopher Clutch-Fist, knighted at a very hard pennyworth, neither for eating musk-melons, anchovies, or caviar, but for a costlier exploit and a hundred-pound feat of arms, Oliver Hubburd, brother to the nine waiting-gentlewomen, the muses, wisheth the decrease of his lands and the increase of his legs, that his calves may hang down like gamashoes.

Most guerdonless sir, pinching patron, and the muses' 10 bad paymaster, thou that owest for all the pamphlets, histories, and translations that ever have been dedicated to thee since thou wert one-and-twenty and couldst make water upon thine own lands—but beware, sir! You cannot 15 carry it away so, I can tell you, for all your copper-gilt

3 Sir Christopher Clutch-Fist perhaps with reference to William, second Baron Compton, of Compton Wynyates, Warwickshire (see Adams, pp. xxiii–xxxi). Middleton had dedicated Ghost to Compton, but apparently failed to merit his patronage in the form of the usual 'tip' of £3 for a dedication; Adams argues that the references to Clutch-Fist in the third tale may be autobiographical. Interestingly enough, Spenser's Proserpina, or Mother Hubburd's Tale was dedicated to Lady Compton.

4–5 musk-melons...caviar delicacies which may refer to Compton's fondness for personal display and fine living

6 hundred-pound feat of arms allusion to the wholesale selling of knighthoods by James I during his progress to London for his coronation in 1603 and thereafter

7–8 decrease...calves satiric inversion of standard dedication terminology, in which an increase in lands is wished upon the dedicatee

9 gamashoes loose drawers or stockings worn outside the legs over the other clothing

10 guerdonless i.e., not giving a reward or payment

15 copper-gilt copper-plated, i.e., cheap imitation of gold-plated (see 39–41)

spurs and your brood of feathers. For there are certain line-sharkers that have coursed the countries to seek you out already, and they nothing doubt but to find you here this Candlemas term which, if it should fall out so (as I hope your worship is wiser than to venture up so soon to the chambers of London), they have plotted together with the best common play-plotter in England to arrest you at the muses' suit (though they shoot short of them) and to set one of the sergeants of poetry, or rather the Poultry, to claw you by the back, who with one clap on your shoulder will bruise all the taffeta to pieces. Now, what the matter is between you, you know best yourself, sir. Only, I hear that they rail against you in booksellers' shops very dreadfully that you have used them most unknighly in offering to take their books and would never return so much as would pay for the covers, beside the gilding too, which stands them in somewhat, you know, and a yard and a quarter of broad sixpenny ribbon—the price of that you are not ignorant of yourself because you wear broad shoestring. And they cannot be persuaded but that you pull the strings off from their books and so maintain your shoes all the year long; and think, verily, if the book be in folio, that you take off the parchment and give it to your tailor but save all the gilding together, which may amount in time to gild you a pair of spurs withal. Such are the miserable conceits they gather of you because you never give the poor muse-suckers a penny. Wherefore, if I might counsel you, sir, the next time they came with their gilded dedications, you should take the books, make your men break their pates, then give them ten groats apiece, and so drive them away.

Your worship's, if you embrace my counsel,
Oliver Hubburd.

Title-page of CREEDE 2.

- 16 brood of feathers large, ostentatious feathers in a hat
- 17 line-sharkers OED cites this passage but cannot explain the meaning. The context suggests an inferior class of plagiarizing poets who have dedicated books of patchwork poems to Clutch-Fist. countries i.e., counties
- 19 Candlemas term February 2, the time appointed for the sessions of certain law courts, and the payment of rents and wages. Clutch-Fist apparently travelled to London during court terms to attend to legal matters rather than using the local courts, partly to avoid local bias and partly for a visit to the city.
- 22 best... play-plotter the reference may be to Anthony Munday. Francis Meres refers to him as 'Anthony Mundaye our best plotter' (Palladis Tamia, 1598). Henslowe's Diary, May 1602, records that Munday, Middleton, and others were working together on the play Caesar's Fall.

- 24 sergeants... Poultry A sergeant was a sheriff's officer who made arrests; the Poultry was one of two city prisons. The line-sharkers have plotted to have Clutch-Fist arrested for debt, i.e., failure to remunerate them for their dedications and the materials scavenged from their books.
- 26 taffeta shoulder-padding in Clutch-Fist's outer garment
- 28 rail abuse verbally
- 32-3 yard... ribbon very expensive ribbon at six pennies (the price of a play quarto) per yard, perhaps a half-inch in width. In a large book such as a folio (see note to l. 38), several such ribbons were stitched into the spine of the book at the top. A reader inserted the ribbons between pages as place markers.
- 38 folio the largest size of printed book in which the large printed sheet was folded once to form the leaves of the book. The gilding, ribbon, and parchment

- here indicate the most expensive kind of binding (see notes to ll. 1243-5).
- 39-40 gilding... spurs the very thin gold leaf impressed on the cover of the book (see note to l. 1244). Clutch-Fist scrapes off the gold leaf and saves it until he has enough for gold-plating a pair of spurs.
- 41 conceits conception, image
- 42 muse-suckers i.e., poets ('line-sharkers'), who nurse at the breasts of the muses
- 44 gilded dedications The first letter of a dedicatory epistle frequently was printed with a large block capital, as was the 'M' in 'Most guerdonless sir...' in both editions of Middleton's text. In very rare instances, the letter was printed in gold ink, thereby 'gilding' the dedication; figuratively, loading it with exaggerated praise.
- 45 pates heads
- groats a paltry, insulting sum of money, usually the lowest going price; in context, probably less than a penny

Father Hubburds Tales, or

To the Reader.

50 Shall I tell you what, reader?—But first I should call you gentle, courteous, and wise. But 'tis no matter, they're but foolish words, of course, and better left out than printed.
For if you be so, you need not be called so; and if you be not so, there were law against me for calling you out of 55 your names. By John of Paul's Churchyard I swear (and that oath will be taken at any haberdasher's), I never wished this book better fortune than to fall into the hands of a true-spelling printer and an honest-minded bookseller;
and if honesty could be sold by the bushel like oysters, 60 I had rather have one Bushel of honesty than three of money.

Why I call these Father Hubburd's Tales is not to have them called in again, as the Tale of Mother Hubburd: the world would show little judgement in that, i'faith, and I 65 should say then plena stultorum omnia, for I entreat here neither of ragged bears or apes, no, nor the lamentable downfall of the old wife's platters. I deal with no such metal: what is mirth in me is as harmless as the quarterjacks in Paul's that are up with their elbows four times an 70 hour and yet misuse no creature living. The very bitterest in me is but like a physical frost that nips the wicked blood a little and so makes the whole body the wholesomer; and none can justly except at me but some riotous vomiting Kit or some gentleman-swallowing Malkin. Then, to condemn 75 these tales following because Father Hubburd tells them in the small size of an ant is even as much as if these two words, God and Devil, were printed both in one line, to skip it over and say that line were naught because the devil were in it. Sat sapienti. And I hope there be many 80 wisemen in all the twelve Companies.

Yours, if you read without spelling or hacking,
T.M.

The Ant and the Nightingale

The west-sea's goddess in a crimson robe,
Her temples circled with a coral wreath,
85 Waited her love, the light'ner of earth's globe;
The wanton wind did on her bosom breathe,
The nymphs of springs did hallowed water pour;
Whate'er was cold helped to make cool her bower.

And now the fiery horses of the sun
90 Were from their golden-flaming car untraced,
And all the glory of the day was done,
Save here and there some light moon-clouds en-chased;

A parti-coloured canopy did spread 95 Over the sun and Thetis' amorous bed.

Now had the shepherds folded in their flocks,
The sweating teams uncoupled from their yokes.
The wolf sought prey, and the sly-murdering fox
Attempts to steal, fearless of rural strokes.
100 All beasts took rest that lived by lab'ring toil;
Only such ranged as had delight in spoil.

Now in the pathless region of the air
The winged passengers had left to soar,
Except the bat and owl, who bode sad care,
105 And Philomel, that nightly doth deplore,
In soul-contenting tunes, her change of shape,
Wrought first by perfidy and lustful rape.

This poor musician, sitting all alone
On a green hawthorn, from the thunder blest, 110 Carols in varied notes her antique moan,
Keeping a sharpened briar against her breast:
Her innocence this watchful pain doth take,
To shun the adder and the speckled snake.

55 John of Paul's a haberdasher situated in Paul's Churchyard
60 Bushel of honesty a complimentary pun on the name of the publisher of the first edition, Thomas Bushell
63 called in again the process whereby the High Commission, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, or the Privy Council banned a book and ordered all copies to be brought to Stationers' Hall or the Bishop's residence Tale of Mother Hubburd Although Edmund Spenser published a viciously satiric poem with this subtitle in 1591, no record is extant of it being called in. While an ape is a major figure in the poem, it contains no mention of 'ragged bears' or 'old wife's platters'.
65 plena stultorum omnia from Cicero's Epistolae ad Familiares: 'All things are full of fools', or 'fools are everywhere'
67-8 platters... metal i.e., the old wife's plates are metal (pewter?)
68-9 quarter-jacks the 'jacks' are the figures who strike a bell on the quarter-hour as part of a large, tower-mounted, public clock; typically a hammer is raised by the arm of the figure and brought down onto a bell 71-2 physical frost... wholesomer The notion that satire is like a physical purgative is also found in Thomas Dekker's epistle in The Wonderful Year (1603): 'If you read, you may happily laugh; 'tis my desire you should, because mirth is both physical and wholesome against the plague...'

73 Kit loose woman
74 Malkin female personal name applied typically to a woman of the lower-class; a lewd woman
79 Sat sapienti shortened version of 'verbum sapienti sat est', or, 'a word to the wise is sufficient'
80 Companies the various trades were organized into twelve major and 32 minor self-regulating guilds, or 'companies' 81 hacking the mangling of words or sense, i.e., twisting or misinterpreting the author's words; currently 'computer-hacking', i.e., decoding the mechanisms which protect against illegal entry to computer systems 84 goddess the sea-nymph Thetis

91 untraced to free [horses] from the traces, or the leather straps or ropes by which the collar of a draught-animal is connected with the splinter-bar or swingletree 93 enchased inlaid with gold, gems, etc.
94 parti-coloured multi-coloured, i.e., a rainbow
99 rural strokes blows from the clubs or implements of farmers protecting their livestock
106 change of shape after being raped by Tereus, Philomel was transformed into a nightingale
111 sharpened briar Philomel sang all night with a thorn pressed against her breast in order to stay awake and remain vigilant against predators (snakes)

The Ant, and the Nightingale.

115	These two, like her old foe the Lord of Thrace, Regardless of her dulcet changing song, To serve their own lust have her life in chase. Virtue by vice is offered endless wrong. Beasts are not all to blame, for now and then We see the like attempted amongst men.	Pass them to mend, for none can them amend But heaven's lieutenant and earth's Justice-King. "Stern will, hath will." "No great one wants a friend." "Some are ordained to sorrow, some to sing." And with this sentence let thy griefs all close: "Whoe'er are wronged, are happier than their foes."	150
120	Under the tree whereon the poor bird sat, There was a bed of busy, toiling ants, That in their summer, winter's comfort got, Teaching poor men how to shun after-wants; Whose rules if sluggards could be learned to keep, They should not starve awake, lie cold asleep.	So much for such. Now to the little ant In the bird's beak and at the point to die. Alas for woe, friends in distress are scant! None of his fellows to his help did hie. They keep them safe; they hear, and are afraid: 'Tis vain to trust in the base number's aid.	155
130	One of these busy brethren, having done His day's true labour, got upon the tree, And with his little nimble legs did run. Pleased with the hearing, he desired to see What wondrous creature nature had composed, In whom such gracious music was enclosed.	Only himself unto himself is friend. With a faint voice his foe he thus bespake: 'Why seeks your gentleness a poor worm's end? O, ere you kill, hear the excuse I make! I come to wonder, not to work offence: There is no glory to spoil innocence!	165
135	He got too near, for the mistrustful bird Guessed him to be a spy from her known foe. Suspicion argues not to hear a word; What wiseman fears not that's inured to woe? Then blame not her. She caught him in her beak, About to kill him ere the worm could speak.	'Perchance you take me for a soothing spy By the sly snake or envious adder fee'd. Alas, I know not how to feign and lie, Or win a base intelligencer's meed, That now are Christians, sometime Turks, then Jews, Living by leaving heaven for earthly news.	170
140	But yet her mercy was above her heat. She did not—as a many silken men Called by much wealth, small wit, to judgement's seat— Condemn at random. But she pitied then When she might spoil: would great ones would do so, Who often kill before the cause they know.	'Trust me: I am a little emmet born to work, Oft-times a man, as you were once a maid. Under the name of man much ill doth lurk, Yet of poor me, you need not be afraid. Mean men are worms on whom the mighty tread; Greatness and strength your virtue injured.'	175
145	O, if they would, as did this little fowl, Look on their lesser captives with even ruth, They should not hear so many sentenced howl, Complaining Justice is not friend to Truth, But they would think upon this ancient theme: "Each right extreme, is injury extreme!"	With that she opened wide her horny bill, The prison where this poor submissive lay; And seeing the poor ant lie quivering still, 'Go wretch', quoth she, 'I give thee life and way. The worthy will not prey on yielding things. Pity's enfeoffed to the blood of kings!	180

114 Lord of Thrace King Tereus, husband of Procne, Philomel's sister
 115 dulcet sweet to the ear, pleasing, soothing, gentle 123 after-wants their industrious summer activity aims at supplying the winter's necessities. The ant colony was commonly used analogically as an ideal paradigm for the harmonious structuring of human society.
 124 learned taught
 137 worm frequently used in the sense of 'poor wretch'
 138 mercy in this and the following stanza, Philomel embodies the ideal in Middleton's attack on injustice in human society heat passion, anger

 145 ruth pity, compassion
 151 heaven's lieutenant . . . earth's Justice-King The reference is ambiguous. In the Christian mythos, Jesus Christ, the son of God, has the responsibility and the power of judging the living and the dead and is the only one who can ultimately 'amend' all earthly injustice. The possibility that the referent is James I is diminished by the later reference to him as the 'manly lion' (222).
 154 sentence sententia, or a wise, witty saying 168 soothing flattering, smooth-talking

 169 fee'd hired for a fee
 171-3 intelligencer's . . . earthly news a spy or informer, presumably a Christian, who has no moral qualms about posing as an infidel, thereby sinning mortally and putting his soul in danger of damnation
 174 emmet ant
 181 submissant one who submits
 185 enfeoffed put in possession of the fee-simple or fee-tail of lands, tenements etc. Pity and mercy are the obligation of kings.

Father Hubburds Tales, or

‘For I was once, though now a feathered veil
Cover my wrongèd body, queen-like clad;
This down about my neck was erst a rail
Of byss embroidered. Fie on that we had!
190 Unthrifths and fools and wrongèd ones complain
Rich things were theirs, must ne’er be theirs again.

‘I was, thou know’st, the daughter to a king,
Had palaces and pleasures in my time.
Now mine own songs I am enforced to sing.
195 Poets forget me in their pleasing rhyme;
Like chaff they fly, tossed with each windy breath,
Omitting my forced rape by Tereus’ death!

‘But ’tis no matter: I myself can sing
Sufficient strains to witness mine own worth.
200 They that forget a queen, soothe with a king;
Flattery’s still barren, yet still bringeth forth;
Their works are dews, shed when the day is done,
But sucked up dry by the next morning’s sun.

‘What more of them? They are like Iris’ throne,
205 Commixed with many colours in moist time:
Such lines portend what’s in that circle shown;
Clear weather follows showers in every clime,
Averting no prognosticator lies,
That says, “Some great ones fall, their rivals rise.”

‘Pass such for bubbles; let their bladder-praise
210 Shine and sink with them in a moment’s change:
They think to rise when they the riser raise.
But regal wisdom knows it is not strange
For curs to fawn; base things are ever low;
215 The vulgar eye feeds only on the show.

‘Else would not soothing glossers oil the son,
Who, while his father lived, his acts did hate.
They know all earthly day with man is done
When he is circled in the night of fate.
220 So, the deceased they think on no more,

But whom they injured late, they now adore.

‘But there’s a manly lion now can roar,
Thunder more dreaded than the lioness;
Of him let simple beasts his aid implore,
225 For he conceives more than they can express.
The virtuous politic, is truly man;
Devil, the atheist politician.

‘I guessed thee such a one: but tell thy tale.
If thou be simple, as thou hast expressed,
Do not with coined words set wit to sale,
230 Nor with the flatt’ring world use vain protest.
Sith man thou sayst thou wert, I prithee tell,
While thou wert man, what mischiefs thee befell.’

‘Princess! You bid me buried cares revive’,
235 Quoth the poor ant, ‘Yet sith by you I live,
So let me in my daily lab’rings thrive
As I myself do to your service give.
I have been oft a man, and so to be,
Is often to be thrall to misery.

‘But if you will have me my mind disclose,
240 I must entreat you that I may set down
The tales of my black fortunes in sad prose.
Rhyme is uneven, fashioned by a clown.
I first was such a one: I tilled the ground,
And amongst rurals verse is scarcely found.’ 245

‘Well, tell thy tales, but see thy prose be good.
For if thou Euphuize, which once was rare
And of all English phrase the life and blood,
In those times for the fashion past compare,
250 I’ll say thou borrow’st, and condemn thy style,
As our new fools that count all following vile.

‘Or if in bitterness thou rail like Nashe—
(Forgive me, honest soul, that term thy phrase
“Railing”, for in thy works thou wert not rash,

188–9 rail | Of byss a collar or neckerchief of finely embroidered linen
192 king King Pandion of Athens
195–7 Poets...death The sense of the passage is that poets are fickle and only write about the latest ‘newsworthy’ events. Hence, they forget about Philomel’s rape and now write about Tereus’ death.
196 chaff husks of wheat and other grains separated from the edible part by threshing or winnowing; the wind blows away the lighter chaff
200 queen...king presumably a reference to the displacement of grief about Elizabeth’s death by the joy of James’s recent accession to the throne soothe i.e., flatter the king
204 Iris’ throne the rainbow

208 prognosticator one who foretells the future (principally the weather for the coming year) in almanacs, which are the satiric target of Middleton The Owl’s Almanac
210 bladder-praise praise that is inflated and insincere, like a bladder (or balloon) filled with hot air
216 glossers literally one who glosses a text by explaining words and meaning; here, a flatterer or brown-noser
222–3 manly lion...lioness a reference contrasting James I to Elizabeth I 225 he conceives James I had published treatises on witchcraft and kingship which revealed his theological and political knowledge as well as his commitment to the pursuit of virtuous politics.
230 coined words a reference to the fad

of ‘coining’, or inventing, new words; many authors, including Shakespeare, engaged in the practice; here, an exercise in showing off one’s supposed genius 247 Euphuize to write in the outdated, highly affected, and ornate style introduced by John Lyly in Euphues, The Anatomy of Wit (1578) and Euphues and His England (1580) rare considered choice or exquisite; fashionable 251 new fools...vile the ‘coiners’ (l. 230) who scorn the imitation of literary models from the past
252 Nashe Thomas Nashe, a famous pamphleteer of the 1590s, noted for his particularly virulent and imaginative satiric writing.

The Ant, and the Nightingale.

255 Nor didst affect in youth thy private praise;
Thou hadst a strife with that Trigemini:
Thou hurt'st not them till they had injured thee.

'Thou wast indeed too slothful to thyself,
Hiding thy better talent in thy spleen.
260 True spirits are not covetous in pelf;
Youth's wit is ever ready, quick, and keen.
Thou didst not live thy ripened autumn day,
But wert cut off in thy best blooming May.

'Else hadst thou left, as thou indeed hast left,
265 Sufficient test, though now in others' chests,
T'improve the baseness of that humorous theft,
Which seems to flow from self-conceiving breasts.
Thy name they bury, having buried thee;
Drones eat thy honey: thou wert the true bee.

'Peace keep thy Soul.)—And now to you, Sir Ant:
270 On with your prose, be neither rude nor nice;
In your discourse let no decorum want;
See that you be sententious and concise,
And, as I like the matter, I will sing
275 A canzonet to close up everything.'

With this, the whole nest of ants, hearing their fellow was free from danger, like comforters when care is over, came with great thanks to harmless Philomel and made a ring about her and their restored friend, serving instead of a dull audience of stinkards 280 sitting in the penny-galleries of a theatre and yawning upon the players, whilst the ant began to stalk like a three-quarter sharer and was not afraid to tell tales out of the villainous school of the world, where the devil is the schoolmaster, and the usurer, the under-usher; the scholars, young dicing landlords that pass 285 away three hundred acres with three dice in a hand, and after the decease of so much land in money, become sons and heirs of bawdy-houses; for it is an easy labour to find heirs without land, but a hard thing indeed to find land without heirs. But for fear I interrupt this small actor in less than decimo sexto, I leave, and give the ant leave to tell his tale.

The Ant's Tale when he was a Ploughman.

I was sometimes, most chaste Lady Nightingale, or rather, Queen Philomel the ravished, a brow-melting husbandman. To be man and husband is to be a poor master of many rich cares, which, if he cannot subject and keep under, he must look forever to undergo 295 as many miseries as the hours of his years contain minutes. Such a man I was and such a husband, for I was linked in marriage. My havings was small and my means less, yet charge came on me ere I knew how to keep it; yet did I all my endeavours, had a plough and land to employ it, fertile enough if it were manured, and for 300 tillage I was never held a truant.

But my destruction and the ruin of all painful husbandmen about me began by the prodigal downfall of my young landlord, whose father, grandfather, and great-grandfather for many generations had been lords of the town wherein I dwelt and many 305 other towns near adjoining; to all which belonged fair commons for the comfort of the poor, liberty of fishing, help of fuel by brush and underwood never denied, till the old devourer of virtue, honesty, and good neighbourhood—Death—had made our landlord dance after his pipe, which is so common that every one knows the way though they make small account of it. Well, die he did, and as soon as he was laid in his grave, the bell might well have toll'd for hospitality and good housekeeping; for whether they fell sick with him and died and so were buried, I know not, but I am sure in our town they were never seen since, nor that I can 315 hear of in any other part; especially about us they are impossible to be found.

Well, our landlord being dead, we had his heir, gentle enough and fair conditioned, rather promising at first his father's virtues than the world's villainies, but he was so accustomed to wild and 320

256 Trigemini literally 'triple birth', a reference to the brothers Gabriel, Richard, and John Harvey. Nashe waged an ongoing literary battle with Gabriel in a series of pamphlets culminating in Nashe's Have with you to Saffron Walden (1596), a masterpiece of personal invective that destroyed any pretension that Harvey had to respectability. The Bishop of London called in the pamphlets in the famous decree of 1599 which banned satire and forbade publication of their works in the future.
260 pelf wealth, possessions
263 cut off...May Nashe probably died in (or before) 1601 when he was thirty-four years old, roughly equivalent to 'summer' in terms of Elizabethan life expectancy. Middleton obviously had great respect for Nashe and believed that he would have gone on to produce noteworthy writings in his 'autumn' years.
266 T'improve to prove humorous theft an obscure reference to a purported theft of Nashe's work, possibly from his papers after his death,

by Samuel Rowlands
271 nice affected, too refined 272 decorum adherence to the literary requirements of genre 273 sententious laden with meaning, matter, wisdom
275 canzonet literally, a short song 280 penny-galleries unexplainable reference, either intentionally erroneous, or possibly due to compositorial omission of 'two' during setting. 'Groundlings' paid the fee of one penny for the privilege of standing on the open ground in front of the stage; a twopenny fee was required for admittance to the lowest level of seating rooms or 'galleries'.
281 three-quarter sharer an individual who owned three-quarters of a share of stock in an acting company 284 under-usher assistant to a schoolmaster or head teacher 289 decimo sexto literally 'sixteen'; a very small book format in which each sheet is folded to produce sixteen leaves containing thirty-two printed pages. The term was used to refer to the boy actors of Paul's and Blackfriars who competed with the adult acting companies; the ant is even smaller than a decimo sexto.

293 husbandman one who tills or cultivates the soil; in Middleton's time, a tenant or renter; in the socio-economic hierarchy, just below the gentleman farmer who owned the land that he tilled 306 commons rations, allowance of victuals, daily fare; the Christian duty of almsgiving in the form of feeding the poor, the period's equivalent of the modern
'soup kitchen'
307-8 liberty...underwood the deceased landlord permitted tenants to fish on his estate, presumably in stocked ponds, as well as to gather wood for cooking and heating
309-10 Death...dance reference to the dance macabre, a familiar emblematic image of the grim reaper playing upon a recorder while leading his newly-dead charges in a serpentine dance

unfruitful company about the court and London (whither he was sent by his sober father to practise civility and manners) that in the country he would scarce keep till his father's body was laid in the cold earth. But as soon as the hasty funeral was solemnized, from us he posted, discharging all his old father's servants (whose beards were even frost-bitten with age) and was attended only by a monkey and a marmoset, the one being an ill-faced fellow as variable as Newfangle for fashions, the other an imitator of anything, however villainous, but utterly destitute of all goodness. With this French page and Italianate servingman was our young landlord only waited on, and all to save charges in servingmen to pay it out in harlots. And we poor men had news of a far greater expense within less than a quarter, for we were sent for to London and found our great landlord in a little room about the Strand, who told us that, whereas we had lived tenants at will and might in his forefather's days been hourly turned out, he, putting on a better conscience to usward, intended to make us leases for years; and for advice 'twixt him and us, he had made choice of a lawyer, a mercer, and a merchant to whom he was much beholden, who that morning were appointed to meet in the Temple Church.

Temple and church, both one in name, made us hope of a holy meeting; but there is an old proverb, "The nearer the Church, the farther from God." To approve which saying, we met the mercer and the merchant that, loving our landlord or his land well, held him a great man in both their books. Some little conference they had; what the conclusion was we poor men were not acquainted with; but being called at their leisure and when they pleased to think upon us, told us they were to dine together at the Horn in Fleet Street, being a house where their lawyer resorted; and if we would there attend them, we should understand matter much for our good; and in the mean time they appointed us near the old Temple Garden to attend their counsellor, whose name was master Prospero—not the great rider of horse (for I have heard there was once such a one), but a more cunning rider who had rid many men till they were more miserable than beasts, and our ill hap it was to prove his hackneys. Well, though the issue were ill, on we went to await his worship, whose chamber we found that morning fuller of clients than I could ever see suppliants to heaven in our poor parish church (and yet we had in it three hundred households); and I may tell it with reverence, I never saw more submission done to God than to that great lawyer. Every suitor there offered gold to this gowned idol, standing bareheaded in a sharp-set morning (for it was in booted Michaelmas term), and not a word spoke to him but it was with the bowing of the body and the submissive flexure of the knee. Short tale to make, he was informed of us what we were and of our coming up, when, with an iron look and shrill voice, he began to speak to the richest of our number, ever and anon jerking out the word 'fines', which served instead of a full point to every sentence.

But that word 'fines' was no fine word, methought, to please poor labouring husbandmen that can scarce sweat out so much in a twelvemonth as he would demand in a twinkling. At last, to close up the lamentable tragedy of us ploughmen, enters our young landlord, so metamorphosed into the shape of a French puppet that, at the first, we started and thought one of the baboons had marched in in man's apparel. His head was dressed up in white feathers like a shuttlecock, which agreed so well with his brain (being nothing but cork), that two of the biggest of the guard might very easily have tossed him with battledores and made good sport with him in his majesty's great hall. His doublet was of a strange cut, and to show the fury of his humour, the collar of it rose up so high and sharp as if it would have cut his throat by daylight. His wings, according to the fashion now, was as little and diminutive as a puritan's ruff, which showed he ne'er meant

322 practise civility common custom of the provincial gentry aimed at learning 'city manners'
 327 marmoset any small monkey. Middleton's coat of arms bore a marmoset.
 328 Newfangle allusion to Nicholas Newfangle, the 'Vice' in the old interlude Like will to Like (1568)
 330 French page French pages were held in high estimation Italianate implies 'immoral' or 'depraved'
 333 quarter a quarter of a year; in England and Ireland the quarter days on which rents were paid were Lady Day (25 March), Midsummer Day (24 June), Michaelmas (29 September), and Christmas
 334 the Strand street running west from Middle Temple; fashionable area for lodgings
 335 tenants at will tenants who hold property at the pleasure of the lessor 337 usward archaic form of the modern 'toward us' 339 mercier merchant who deals in textile fabrics—silks, velvets, and other costly materials 340 Temple Church lawyers and their clients used the Round in Temple Church as a meeting place (like the middle aisle of St Paul's)

 345 books the young landlord's 'great' debts are noted in both the merchant's and the mercer's account books
 348 Horn pub in Fleet Street near the Temple
 352 Temple Garden small landscaped park between the Temple buildings and the Thames
 353 Prospero . . . horse reference to a famous equestrian trainer
 356 hackneys horses kept for hire 363 booted Michaelmas term the term or session of the High Court of Justice in England, and also of Oxford, Cambridge, and various other universities, beginning soon after the feast of St Michael (29 September); one of the four quarter-days of the English business year; hence, an allusion to the footwear of persons who rode to London on law business in winter 368 jerking speaking spasmodically

fines a fee (as distinguished from rent) paid by the tenant or vassal to the landlord on some alteration of the tenancy, as on the transfer or alienation of the tenant right 377 shuttlecock small spherical piece of cork fitted with a crown or circle of feathers, used in the game of battledore and shuttlecock; similar to that used in badminton
 379 battledores small rackets used to hit the shuttlecock back and forth between players
 380 doublet close-fitting vest-like garment, with or without sleeves, worn by men; the length varied according to fashion, as did the ornamental aspects of its design
 383 wings wing-like projections on the shoulders of a doublet
 384 ruff stiffly starched, pleated cloth worn around the neck. The Puritan's short ruffs were the target of ridicule.

385 to fly out of England nor do any exploit beyond sea, but live and die about London though he begged in Finsbury. His breeches, a wonder to see, were full as deep as the middle of winter or the roadway between London and Winchester, and so large and wide withal that I think within a twelvemonth he might very well put 390 all his lands in them, and then you may imagine they were big enough when they would outreach a thousand acres. Moreover, they differed so far from our fashioned hose in the country and from his father's old gascoynes that his back part seemed to us like a monster, the roll of the breeches standing so low that we 395 conjectured his house of office, sir-reverence, stood in his hams.
All this while his French monkey bore his cloak of three-pounds-a-yard, lined clean through with purple velvet, which did so dazzle our coarse eyes that we thought we should have been purblind ever 400 after, what with the prodigal aspect of that and his glorious rapier and hangers, all bossed with pillars of gold, fairer in show than the pillars in Paul's or the tombs at Westminster; beside, it drunk up the price of all my ploughland in very pearl, which stuck as thick upon those hangers as the white measles upon 405 hog's flesh. When I had well viewed that gay gaudy cloak and those unthrifty wasteful hangers, I muttered thus to myself: 'That is no cloak for the rain sure, nor those no hangers for Derrick.'
When, of a sudden casting mine eyes lower, I beheld a curious pair of boots of King Philip's leather in such artificial wrinkles, sets, and pleats as if they had been starched lately and came new from 410 the laundresses—such was my ignorance and simple acquaintance with the fashion, and I dare swear my fellows and neighbours here are all as ignorant as myself. But that which struck us most into admiration: upon those fantastical boots stood such huge and wide tops which so swallowed up his thighs that had he sworn, 415 as other gallants did, this common oath: 'Would I might sink as I stand!', all his body might very well have sunk down and been damned in his boots. Lastly, he walked the chamber with such a pestilent jingle that his spurs over-squeaked the lawyer and made him reach his voice three notes above his fee. But after we had spied the rowels of his spurs, how we blessed ourselves!—they 420 did so much and so far exceed the compass of our fashion that they looked more like the forerunners of wheelbarrows.

Thus was our young landlord accoutred in such a strange and prodigal shape that it amounted to above two year's rent in apparel. At last approach the mercer and the merchant, two notable 425 arch-tradesmen who had fitted my young master in clothes whilst they had clothed themselves in his acres, and measured him out velvet by the thumb whilst they received his revenues by handfuls; for he had not so many yards in his suit as they had yards and houses bound for the payment, which now he was forced 430 to pass over to them or else all his lands should be put to their book and to their forfeiting neck-verse. So my youngster was now at his pension, not like a gentleman pensioner, but like a gentleman scrivener. Whereupon entered Master Bursebell the royal scrivener with deeds and writings hanged, drawn, and quartered 435 for the purpose. He was a valiant scribe. I remember his pen lay mounted between his ear like a Tower gun, but not charged yet till our young master's patrimony shot off, which was some third part of an hour after. By this time the lawyer, the mercer, and the merchant were whispering and consulting together about the writings 440 and passage of the land in very deep and sober conference.

But our 'wiseacres' all the while, as one regardless of either land or money, not hearkening or inquisitive after their subtle and politic devices, held himself very busy about the burning of his tobacco pipe (as there is no gallant but hath a pipe to burn 445 about London) though we poor simple men ne'er heard of the name till that time; and he might very fitly take tobacco there, for the lawyer and the rest made him smoke already. But to have noted the apish humour of him and the fantastical faces he coined in the receiving of the smoke, it would have made your ladyship 450

386 Finsbury open fields north of the city wall, accessible through Cripple-gate and Moorgate; used for recreation by Londoners (walking, archery, etc.), and frequented by beggars
breeches padded pants-like garment covering the loins and thighs; later reaching to the knees or just below
393 gascoynes wide breeches reaching to the knee; in Pierce Penniless, Nashe mentions 'their Dad, goes sagging every day in his round Gascoynes of white cotton, and hath much ado (poor penny-father) to keep his unthrifit elbows in reparations' (10); the sons 'do nothing but devise how to spend and ask counsel of the Wine and Capons, how they may quickliest consume their patrimonies'
395 sir-reverence colloquial mangling of 'Save Reverence', an apologetic phrase used here to ask pardon for referring to the 'house of office' (i.e., anus)
hams part of the leg at the back of the knee . . . by extension: the back of the thighs; the thigh and buttock collectively 396-7 of three-pounds-a-yard made of extremely expensive cloth

399 purblind dim-sighted
400 hangers loop or strap on a sword-belt from which the sword was hung, often richly ornamented bossed studded, ornamented; roughly equivalent to modern 'embossed' 406 Derrick the common hangman at Tyburn
408 King Philip's leather soft Spanish leather, considered superior to English leather 420 rowels small serrated disk at the end of a spur
432 neck-verse a verse (usually the beginning of the fifty-first psalm) presented to a condemned criminal who claimed 'benefit of clergy' (i.e., literacy); by reading it, he might save his neck from the noose 434 scrivener professional writer or scribe; a notary; an important professional in an age when writing literacy lagged significantly behind reading literacy. The growing dependency upon credit records by landowners and merchants required the expertise of the scrivener in drawing up 'articles' and 'bonds', or the documents in which the particulars were legally stated and witnessed. In this instance, the lawyer, who presumably could perform the function, hires the scrivener to do it, much in the same manner as many law offices today retain full-time legal secretaries.

435 hanged, drawn, and quartered The executed criminal was first hanged by the neck but cut down before expiring, laid out and gutted like an animal, and then the body was cut into four pieces. (Public executions were a common form of entertainment at the time.)
445 tobacco pipe The smoking of tobacco in clay pipes had become extremely fashionable during the sixteenth century, and controversy raged about both the beneficial and ill effects of 'drinking tobacco'. James I is thought to be the author of the famous pamphlet A Counter-blast to Tobacco (1604).
449 coined i.e., 'invented' various contortions of the face while smoking have sung nothing but merry jigs for a twelvemonth after—one time winding the pipe like a horn at the pie-corner of his mouth, which must needs make him look like a sow-gelder, and another time screwing his face like one of our country players, which must needs make him look like a fool; nay, he had at least his dozen of faces, but never a good one amongst them all—neither his father's face, nor the face of his grandfather, but yet more wicked and riotous faces than all the generation of him.

Now their privy whisperings and villainous plots began to be drawn to a conclusion when presently they called our smoky landlord in the midst of his draught, who in a valiant humour dashed his tobacco pipe into the chimney corner, whereat I started, and beckoning his marmoset to me, asked him if those long white things did cost no money; to which the slave replied very proudly: 'Money! Yes sirrah, but I tell thee my master scorns to have a thing come twice to his mouth.' 'Then', quoth I, 'I think thy master is more choice in his mouth than in any member else: it were good if he used that all his body over—he would never have need, as many gallants have, of any sweating physic.' 'Sweating physic?', replied the marmoset, 'What may thy meaning be? Why, do not you ploughmen sweat too?' 'Yes', quoth I, 'most of any men living. But yet there is difference between the sweat of a ploughman and the sweat of a gentleman, as much as between your master's apparel and mine. For when we sweat, the land prospers and the harvest comes in, but when a gentleman sweats, I wot how the gear goes then.' No sooner were these words spoken but the marmoset had drawn out his poinard halfway to make a show of revenge, but at the smart voice of the lawyer he suddenly whipped it in again.

Now was our young master with one penful of ink doing a far greater exploit than all his forefathers, for what they were a-purchasing all their lifetime, he was now passing away in the fourth part of a minute; and that which many thousand drops of his grandfather's brows did painfully strive for, one drop now of a scrivener's inkhorn did easily pass over. A dash of a pen stood for a thousand acres—how quickly they were dashed in the mouth by our young landlord's prodigal fist! It seemed he made no more account of acres than of acorns. Then were we called to set our hands for witnesses of his folly, which we poor men did witness too much already. And because we were found ignorant in writing and never practised in that black art (which I might very fitly term so because it conjured our young master out of all), we were commanded, as it were, to draw any mark with a pen, which should signify as much as the best hand that ever old Peter Bales hung out in the Old Bailey. To conclude, I took the pen first of the lawyer, and turning it arsy-versy like no instrument for a ploughman, our youngster and the rest of the faction burst into laughter at the simplicity of my fingering. But I, not so simple as they laughed me for, drew the picture of a knavish emblem, which was A Plough with the Heels Upward, signifying thereby that the world was turned upside down since the decease of my old landlord, all hospitality and good housekeeping kicked out of doors, all thriftiness and good husbandry tossed into the air, ploughs turned into trunks, and corn into apparel. Then came another of our husbandmen to set his mark by mine; he, holding the pen clean at the one side towards the merchant and the mercer showing that all went on their sides, drew the form of an unbridled colt so wild and unruly that he seemed with one foot to kick up the earth and spoil the labours of many toiling beasts, which was fitly alluded to our wild and unbridled landlord, which (like the colt) could stand upon no ground till he had no ground to stand upon.

These marks, set down under the shape of simplicity, were the less marked with the eyes of knavery, for they little dreamed that we ploughmen could have so much satire in us as to bite our young landlord by the elbow. Well, this ended, master Bursebell the calfskin scrivener was royally handled—that is, he had a royal put in his hand by the merchant. And now I talk of calfskin: 'tis great pity, Lady Nightingale, that the skins of harmless and innocent beasts should be as instruments to work villainy upon, entangling young novices and foolish elder brothers which are caught like woodcocks in the net of the law; for 'tis easier for one of the greatest fowls to slide through the least hole of a net than one of the least fools to get from the lappet of a bond.

By this time the squeaking lawyer began to reiterate that cold word 'fines' which struck so chill to our hearts that it made them as cold as our heels, which were almost frozen to the floor with standing. 'Yea', quoth the merchant and the mercer, 'you are now tenants of ours; all the right, title, and interest of this young gentleman, your late landlord, we are firmly possessed of, as you

451 jigs songs or ballads of lively, jocular, or mocking (often scurrilous) character
 452 pie-corner corner of Giltspur Street and Cock Lane in West Smithfield where cook shops were located. The simile apparently is based upon the fact that the intersection of the two streets formed an acute angle.
 453 sow-gelder one who gelds or spays sows, i.e., removes the ovaries
 464 slave derogatory term for servant
 469 sweating physic medical prescription to induce sweating; probably a reference to a treatment for syphilis
 476 gear indefinite noun, i.e., stuff, matter, things, business 477 marmoset see note to l. 327–8
poinard dagger

495 Peter Bales famous calligraphist and shorthand writer (1547?–1610?), widely known for his feat of engraving, in Latin, the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments on a penny which he presented to Queen Elizabeth in 1575. He kept a writing school in the Old Bailey.
 496 arsy-versy backwards
 499 emblem A drawing or picture expressing a moral fable or allegory. Emblem books, originating in Italy, became popular in Middleton's age, the foremost of these being Geoffrey Whitney's A Choice of Emblems. Typically, a detailed woodcut or engraving containing allegorical subject matter was accompanied by an explanation, often in verse, of the moral point of the image. The ant's explanation of the marks made by himself and his partner performs the latter function.

 504 trunks short breeches; the heels or blades of the upside-down plough look like upside-down breeches 517 calfskin scrivener the most expensive vellum was made from calfskin; hence, Bursebell's fees are high royally . . . royal a royal was a gold coin worth ten shillings (i.e., two royals to the pound); the ant's typical kind of punning 524 lappet a loose or overhanging part of a garment, forming a flap or fold; the edge of a folded paper to which a seal is affixed. The implication here is that once one has been caught in the folds of the paper containing the bond, it was impossible to escape.

yourself are witnesses. Wherefore, this is the conclusion of our meeting: such fines as master Prospero here, by the valuation of the land, shall out of his proper judgement allot to us, such are we to demand at your hands. Therefore we refer you to him to wait his answer at the gentleman's best time and leisure.' With that they stifled two or three angels in the lawyer's right hand—'right hand' said I? Which hand was that, trow ye? For it is impossible to know which is the right hand of a lawyer because there are but few lawyers that have right hands, and those few make much of them. So, taking their leaves of my young landlord that was and that never shall be again, away they marched, heavier by a thousand acres at their parting than they were before at their meeting.

The lawyer then, turning his Irish face to usward, willed us to attend his worship the next term, when we should further understand his pleasure. We poor souls thanked his worship and paid him his fee out in legs, when, in sight of us, he embraced our young gentleman (I think, for a fool) and gave him many riotous instructions how to carry himself, which he was prompter to take than the other to put into him: told him he must acquaint himself with many gallants of the Inns of Court and keep rank with those that spend most, always wearing bountiful disposition about him, lofty and liberal; his lodging must be about the Strand, in any case, being remote from the handicraft scent of the City; his eating must be in some famous tavern, as the Horn, the Mitre, or the Mermaid, and then after dinner, he must venture beyond sea, that is, in a choice pair of noblemen's oars to the Bankside where he must sit out the breaking up of a comedy or the first cut of a tragedy; or rather (if his humour so serve him), to call in at the Blackfriars where he should see a nest of boys able to ravish a man. This said, our young goosecap, who was ready to embrace such counsel, thanked him for his fatherly admonitions (as he termed them), and told him again that he should not find him with the breach of any of them, swearing and protesting he would keep all those better than the ten commandments. At which word he buckled on his rapier and hangers, his monkey-face casting on his cloak by the book; after an apish congee or two, passed downstairs without either word or nod to us, his old father's tenants.

Nevertheless, we followed him, like so many russet servingmen, to see the event of all and what the issue would come to, when, of a sudden, he was encountered by a most glorious-spangled gallant which we took at first to have been some upstart tailor because he measured all his body with a salutation from the flow of the doublet to the fall of the breeches. But at last we found him to be a very fantastical sponge that licked up all humours, the very ape of fashions, gesture, and compliment—one of those indeed (as we learned afterward) that fed upon young landlords, riotous sons, and heirs till either he or the Counter in Wood Street had swallowed them up; and would not stick to be a bawd or pander to such young gallants as our young gentleman, either to acquaint them with harlots or harlots with them, to bring them a whole dozen of taffeta punks at a supper; and they should be none of these common Molls neither, but discontented and unfortunate gentlewomen whose parents being lately deceased, the brother ran away with all the land, and they, poor squalls, with a little money which cannot hold out long without some comings in; but they will rather venture a maidenhead than want a headtire; such shuttlecocks as these which, though they are tossed and played withal, go still like maids all white on the top; or else decayed gentlemen's wives, whose husbands (poor souls) lying for debt in the King's Bench, they go about to make monsters in the King's Head tavern, for this is a general axiom: all your luxurious plots are always begun in taverns to be ended in vaulting houses; and after supper when fruit comes in, there is small fruit of honesty to be looked for—for you know that the eating of the apple always betokens the fall of Eve.

Our prodigal child, accompanied with this soaking swaggerer and admirable cheater (who had supped up most of our heirs about London like poached eggs), slips into Whitefriars nunnery whereas, the report went, he kept his most delicate drab of three hundred a year—some unthrifty gentleman's daughter who had

536 angels another gold coin worth about ten shillings; so called because it bore the image of the Archangel Michael right hand the ant puns on 'right vs. wrong', i.e., lawyers have no concern for morality 544 Irish face coarse
 547 paid... legs a courteous bow involved bending the legs
 551 Inns of Court the four law schools and lodgings of lawyers, located some distance along Fleet Street to the west of St Paul's Cathedral
 555-6 Horn, the Mitre... Mermaid local pubs near the Temple in Fleet Street and Bread Street, frequented by gallants, lawyers, writers
 557 oars i.e., rent an expensive launch to cross the Thames to Bankside, the location of theatres (the Globe, the Rose, the Hope, the Swan), the bull- and bear-baiting pits, and the Paris Garden; otherwise, it was a long walk east to London Bridge for the crossing

558 breaking up disruption, disintegration
 559 cut excision or omission of a part 560 Blackfriars... boys a private theatre just east of the Inns of Court area, the venue of a company of boy actors (The Children of the Queen's Revels) famous for their ability to perform seductive female roles
 561 goosecap fool, simpleton
 567 casting... book putting on his cloak with exaggerated courtly formality
congee ceremonial bow upon taking leave of a person 570 russet coarse homespun woollen cloth of reddish-brown, grey, or neutral colour, used for the dress of peasants and country folk 571 event from Latin eventus, 'the outcome, or issue'. Middleton has the ant comically combine the term and its English meaning: 'event of all and what the issue would come to'.
 579 Counter debtors' prison
 583 taffeta punks overdressed prostitutes
 584 Molls prostitutes

586 squalls small or insignificant persons; usually a term of derision 592 King's Bench debtors' prison monsters i.e., cuckolds, emblematically imaged as a man with horns in his forehead that are visible to all but himself
 593 luxurious lustful
 594 vaulting houses slang for brothels
 595 honesty chastity
 598 swaggerer quarrelsome bully 600 Whitefriars nunnery previously a monastic precinct just east of the Inner Temple. Although the church had been pulled down, the privilege of sanctuary from officers of the law continued, so the area attracted prostitutes and criminals; hence the slang usage of 'nunnery' = 'brothel'.
 601 drab prostitute
 602-4 gentleman's... again i.e., the father had squandered his estate, leaving the daughter destitute and hence a candidate for prostitution

mortgaged his land to scriveners sure enough from redeeming again. For so much she seemed by her bringing up, though less by her casting down. Endued she was (as we heard) with some good qualities, though all were converted then but to flattering villainies. She could run upon the lute very well, which in others would have appeared virtuous but in her lascivious, for her running was rather jested at because she was a light runner besides. She had likewise the gift of singing very deliciously, able to charm the hearer, which so bewitched away our young master's money that he might have kept seven noise of musicians for less charges, and yet they would have stood for servingmen too, having blue coats of their own. She had a humour to lisp often like a flatt'ring wanton and talk childish like a parson's daughter, which so pleased and rapt our old landlord's lickerish son that he would swear she spoke nothing but sweetmeats and her breath then sent forth such a delicious odour that it perfumed his white-satin doublet better than sixteen milliners.

Well, there we left him with his devouring cheater and his glorious cockatrice, and being almost upon dinner-time, we hied us and took our repast at thrifty Mother Walker's, where we found a whole nest of pinching bachelors crowded together upon forms and benches in that most worshipful three-halfpenny ordinary, where presently they were boarded with hot Monsieur Mutton-and-Porridge (a Frenchman by his blowing); and next to them, we were served in order, everyone taking their degree. And I tell you true, lady, I have known the time when our young landlord's father hath been a three-halfpenny eater there; nay more, was the first that acquainted us with that sparing and thrifty ordinary, when his riotous son hath since spent his five pound at a sitting. Well, having discharged our small shot (which was like hail-shot in respect of our young master's cannon-reckonings in taverns), we plodded home to our ploughs, carrying these heavy news to our wives, both of the prodigality of our old landlord's son as also of our oppressions to come by the burden of uncharitable fines. And, most musical Madam Nightingale, do but imagine now what a sad Christmas we all kept in the country without either carols, wassail-bowls, dancing of Sellinger's Round in moonshine nights about maypoles, shoeing the mare, hoodman-blind, hot-cockles, or any of our old Christmas gambols; no, not so much as choosing king and queen on Twelfth Night. Such was the dullness of our pleasures, for that one word 'fines' robbed us of all our fine pastimes.

This sour-faced Christmas thus unpleasantly past over, up again we trotted to London—in a great frost, I remember, for the ground was as hard as the lawyer's conscience. And arriving at the luxurious Strand some three days before the term, we inquired for our bountiful landlord, or the fool in the full, at his neat and curious lodging. But answer was made us by an old chambermaid that our gentleman slept not there all the Christmastime, but had been at court and at least in five masques. Marry now, as she thought, we might find him at master Poope's his ordinary with half-a-dozen of gallants more at dice. 'At dice? At the devil!', quoth I, 'for that is a dicer's last throw!' Here I began to rail like Thomas Nashe against Gabriel Harvey, if you call that railing; yet I think it was but the running a tilt of wits in booksellers' shops on both sides of John of Paul's churchyard, and I wonder how John escaped unhorsing. But when we were entered the door of the ordinary, we might hear our lusty gentleman shoot off a volley of oaths some three rooms over us, cursing the dice and wishing the pox were in their bones, crying out for a new pair of square ones, for the other belike had cogged with him and made a gull of him. When, the host of the ordinary coming downstairs, met us with this report after we had named him: 'Troth, good fellows, you have named now the most unfortunatest gentleman living—at passage, I mean; for I protest, I have stood by myself as a heavy eyewitness and seen the beheading of five hundred crowns, and what pitiful end they all made!' With that he showed us his embossed girdle and hangers new-pawned for more money, and told us beside (not without tears), his glorious cloak was cast away three hours before overboard, which was, off the table. At which lamentable hearing, we stood still in the lower room and durst not venture upstairs for fear he would have laid all us ploughmen to pawn too; and yet I think all we could scarce have made up one throw. But to draw to an end as his patrimony did, we had not lingered the better part of an hour, but down came the host fencing his glittering rapier and dagger as if he had been newly shoulder-clapped by a pewter-buttoned serjeant and his weapons seized upon. At last, after a great peal of oaths on all sides, the court broke up and the worshipful bench of dicers came thundering downstairs, some swearing, some laughing, some cursing, and some singing, with such a confusion of humours that, had we not known before what

607 run upon the lute smoothly and gracefully play arpeggios, or notes of a chord plucked individually in very rapid succession
 609 light runner loose woman; easily persuaded to sexual activity
 612 noise of musicians a consort or ensemble, as in 'The King's Noise'
 616 lickerish lecherous
 621 cockatrice mythical beast able to kill with a glance; colloquially, a whore or mistress able to bewitch or 'kill' with her eyes
 623 forms benches without back rests
 624 three-halfpenny ordinary public eating house, or 'pub', where meals were provided at a fixed price, here one of the cheapest; other literary references cite twelve-penny and eighteen-penny ordinaries. Fashionable gallants frequented the more expensive class of ordinary where dinner was usually followed by gambling.

 632 hail-shot buckshot or pellets, contrasted with cannon balls
 639 Sellinger's Round old country dance
 640-1 shoeing the mare... hot-cockles several social games
 641 gambols a leap or spring in dancing; a caper, a frisk
 648 term Hilary Term, which usually commenced on January 13
 652 masques type of social dramatic entertainment in which the roles are played by members of a social gathering rather than by professional actors 655-8 Nashe... unhorsing suggests that the booksellers' shops which respectively sold Thomas Nashe's and Gabriel Harvey's pamphlets were on either side of the haberdasher John of Paul's shop in St Paul's churchyard 663 cogged 'fixing' dice by filing some corners round to raise the probability of certain numbers coming up

 666 passage game at dice played by two opponents casting three dice 668 crowns gold coin worth five shillings bearing an image of a crown
 669 girdle belt
 670 hangers see note to l. 400
 677-9 down... seized the host, likened to the serjeant who has arrested the landlord, carries the latter's weapons

685 rank of gallants they were, we should have thought the devils had been at dice in an ordinary. The first that appeared to us was our most lamentable landlord dressed up in his monkey's livery cloak (that he seemed now rather to wait upon his monkey than his monkey upon him), which did set forth his satin suit so 690 excellent scurvily that he looked for all the world like a French lord in dirty boots; when, casting his eye upon us, being desirous (as it seemed) to remember us now if we had any money, broke into these fantastical speeches: 'What, my whole warren of tenants?'— thinking indeed to make conies of us—'my honest nest of plough-695 men, the only kings of Kent! More dice, ho! then, i'faith, let's have another career, and vomit three dice in a hand again.' With that I plucked his humour at one side and told him we were indeed his father's tenants, but his (we were sorry) we were not. And as for money to maintain his dice, we had not sufficient to stuff out the 700 lawyer. Then replied our gallant in a rage, tossing out two or three new-minted oaths: 'These ploughmen are politicians, I think; they have wit, the whoresons; they will be tenants, I perceive, longer than we shall be landlords!' And fain he would have swaggered with us but that his weapons were at pawn. So, marching out like 705 a turned gentleman, the rest of the gallants seemed to cashier him and throw him out of their company like a blank die—the one having no black pips, nor he no white pieces. Now was our gallant the true picture of the prodigal, and having no rents to gather now, he gathered his wits about him, making his brain pay him revenues in villainy. For it is a general observation that your 710 sons and heirs prove seldom wisemen till they have no more land than the compass of their noddles. To conclude, within few days' practice, he was grown as absolute in cheating and as exquisite in pandarism that he outstripped all Greene's books Of the Art of Cony-catching; and where before he maintained his drab, he 715 made his drab now maintain him; proved the only true captain of vaulting-houses and the valiant champion against constables and searchers, feeding upon the sin of Whitefriars, Pickt-hatch, and Turnbull Street. Nay, there was no landed novice now but he could melt him away into nothing, and in one twelvemonth make 720 him hold all his land between his legs, and yet but straddle easily neither. No wealthy son of the city but, within less than a quarter, he could make all his stock not worth a Jersey stocking. He was all that might be in dissolute villainy and nothing that should be in his forefathers' honesty. To speak troth, we did so much blush at his life and were so ashamed of his base courses that ever after we loathed to look after them. 725

But returning to our stubble-haired lawyer, who reaped his beard every term-time (the lawyer's harvest), we found the mercer and the merchant crowded in his study amongst a company of law books, which they jostled so often with their coxcombs that they 730 were almost together by the ears with them; when, at the sight of us, they took an habeas corpus and removed their bodies into a bigger room. But there we lingered not long for our torments, for the mercer and the merchant gave fire to the lawyer's tongue with a rope of angels, and the word 'fines' went off with such a powder 735 that the force of it blew us all into the country, quite changed our ploughmen's shapes, and so we became little ants again.

This, Madam Nightingale, is the true discourse of our rural fortunes, which, how miserable, wretched, and full of oppression they were, all husbandmen's brows can witness that are fined with 740 more sweat still year by year; and I hope a canzonet of your sweet singing will set them forth to the world in satirical harmony.

The remorseful nightingale, delighted with the ant's quaint discourse, began to tune the instrument of her voice, breathing 745 forth these lines in sweet and delicious airs.

The Nightingale's Canzonet.

Poor little ant,
Thou shalt not want
The ravished music of my voice!
Thy shape is best,
750 Now thou art least;

For great ones fall with greater noise,
And this shall be the carriage of my song:
Small bodies can have but a little wrong.

Now thou art securer
And thy days far surer;
Thou pay'st no rent upon the rack
To daub a prodigal landlord's back,

755

Or to maintain the subtle running
Of dice and drabs, both one in cunning;
760 Both pass from hand to hand to many,
Flatt'ring all, yet false to any;
Both are well linked, for, throw dice how you can,
They will turn up their pips to every man.

692 warren a group of game animals or fowls such as rabbits, partridges, etc.
693 conies rabbits, hares; figuratively, gullible dupes, easily swindled or conned 694 only kings of Kent the Kentish boasted that Kent had never been conquered; here, 'only' in the sense of 'the very'
695 career literally, a short gallop at full speed; charge at a tournament; figuratively, a quick game
704 turned changed circumstances, i.e., lost his money and possessions cashier dismiss 706 black pips a blank die has no black spots or 'pips' white pieces i.e., coins, money
711 noddles back of the head
713 pandarism functions of a pimp

Greene's books Robert Greene (d. 1592), a famous Elizabethan pamphleteer renowned for his series of pamphlets about London con-artists: A Notable Discovery of Cozenage (1591), The Second Part of Cony-catching (1591), The Third and Last Part of Cony-catching (1592), and A Disputation between a He Cony-catcher and a She Cony-catcher (1592).
717 Pickt-hatch area north of Aldersgate; favourite haunt of prostitutes and thieves
718 Turnbull Street street (i.e., Turnmill Street) running north from Smithfield; the most notorious, disreputable street in London
722 Jersey stocking Jersey was famous for the knitting of stockings
727-8 stubble-haired... harvest contorted

analogy between the 'stubble', or stalks, left in the ground after reaping, and the short bristly growth of the lawyer's recently shaven beard. Literally, he shaved at the beginning of the term-time during which he 'reaped' his 'harvest' of fees.
730 coxcombs caps worn by a professional fool, like a cock's comb in shape and colour; ludicrous appellation for the head
732 habeas corpus legal term meaning 'you may take the body'; another instance of the ant's comic malapropistic verbal mimicry
743 quaint clever, ingenious
753 carriage meaning carried by words; in the musical sense, a refrain

765 Happy art thou and all thy brothers
That never feel'st the hell of others:
The torment to a luxur due,
Who never thinks his harlot true;
Although upon her heels he stick his eyes,
770 Yet still he fears that though she stands, she lies.

Now are thy labours easy,
Thy state not sick or queasy;
All drops thou sweat'st are now thine own;
Great subsidies be as unknown
775 To thee and to thy little fellow ants;
Now none of you under that burden pants.

Lo, for example, I myself, poor worms,
That have outworn the rage of Tereus' storms,
Am ever blessed now in this downy shape
780 From all men's treachery or soul-melting rape;
And when I sing Tereu, Tereu
Through every town and so renew
The name of Tereus, slaves, through fears,
With guilty fingers bolt their ears;
785 And all ravishers do rave and e'en fall mad,
And then such wronged souls as myself are glad.

So thou, small wretch, and all thy nest,
Are in those little bodies blest,
Not taxed beyond your poor degree
790 With landlord's fine and lawyer's fee.
But tell me, pretty toiling worm,
Did that same ploughman's weary form
Discourage thee so much from others,
That neither thou, nor those thy brothers,
795 In borrowed shapes durst once again
Venture amongst perfidious men?

Ant.

'Yes lady', the poor ant replied,
'I left not so, but then I tried
800 War's sweating fortunes, not alone
Condemning rash all states for one,
Until I found by proof and knew by course
That one was bad, but all the rest were worse.'

Nightingale.

805 Didst thou put on a rugged soldier then,
A happy state because thou fought'st 'gainst men?

Prithee discourse thy fortunes, state, and harms.
Thou wast, no doubt, a mighty man-at-arms.

The Ant's Tale when he was a Soldier.

Then thus: most musical and prickle-singing madam (for, if I err 810 not, your ladyship was the first that brought up prick-song, being nothing else but the fatal notes of your pitiful ravishment), I, not contented long (a vice cleaving to all worldlings) with this little estate of an ant, but stuffed with envy and ambition, as small 815 as I was, desired to venture into the world again, which I may rather term the upper hell, or frigida gehenna, the cold-charitable hell wherein are all kind of devils too, as your gentle devil, your ordinary devil, and your gallant devil; and all these can change their shapes too, as today in cowardly white, tomorrow in politic 820 black, a third day in jealous yellow; for believe it, sweet lady, there are devils of all colours. Nevertheless I, covetous of more change, leaped out of this little skin of an ant and hung my skin on the hedge, taking upon me the grisly shape of a dusty soldier. Well made I was, and my limbs valiantly hewn out for the purpose: I 825 had a mazard, I remember, so well-lined in the inside with my brain it stood me in better stead than a double headpiece, for the brain of a soldier, differing from all other sciences, converts itself to no other use but to line, fur, and even quilt the cockcomb, and so makes a pate of proof. My face was well-leavened which 830 made my looks taste sour, the true relish of a man of war; my cheeks, dough-baked, pale, wan, and therefore argued valour and resolution; but my nose somewhat hard-baked and a little burnt in the oven, a property not amiss in a soldier's visage who should scorn to blush but in his nose. My chin was well thatched with a 835 beard which was a necessary shelter in winter and a fly-flap in summer, so brushy and spreading that my lips could scarce be seen to walk abroad, but played at all-hid and durst not peep forth for starting a hair. To conclude, my arms, thighs, and legs were so sound, stout, and weighty (as if they had come all out 840 of the timber yard) that my very presence only was able to still the bawlingest infant in Europe. And I think, madam, this was no unlikely shape for a soldier to prove well: here was mettle enough, for four shillings a week, to do valiant service till it was bored as full of holes as a skimmer.

Well, to the wars I betook me, ranked myself amongst desperate 845 hot-shots—only, my carriage put on more civility, for I seemed more like a spy than a follower, an observer rather than a commit-ter of villany. And little thought I, madam, that the camp had been supplied with harlots too as well as the Curtain, and the guarded tents as wicked as garden tenements, trulls passing to and fro in 850 the washed shape of laundresses as your bawds about London in

767 luxur lecher
810 prickle-singing Philomel sang pricked by the thorn at her breast; the thorn's function was to keep her alert and awake.
811 prick-song literally, a song sung from notes written down, or 'pricked', in musical notation on paper rather than being sung from memory. In context, the ant exploits the homophonic association between 'pricked' and 'prick', i.e., penis, to attribute the notes of Philomel's song
to her rape by Tereus.
816 frigida gehenna literally 'frozen hell';

reference to 2 Kings 23:10
816-17 cold-charitable hell ant's comic play with the translation of frigida gehenna
825 mazard head
837 all-hid possibly a reference to a game such as 'hide and seek' 842 mettle high-spirited temperament;
implicit pun on 'metal' 844 skimmer a shallow metal utensil usually perforated with holes, used in skimming off the surface of a liquid; like a sieve
846 hot-shots reckless, hot-headed men

849 Curtain playhouse in Shoreditch just north-west of the Spitalfields, outside the city wall; a haunt of prostitutes (Middleton's father owned a tenement house near by)
850 garden tenements haunts of prostitutes and fallen women
trulls prostitutes 851-2 laundresses... starchwomen apparently prostitutes and bawds posed as such for easy access to male lodgings under the guise of collecting and delivering bed linens

855 the manner of starchwomen, which is the most unsuspected habit that can be to train out a mistress. And if your ladyship will not think me much out of the way, though I take a running leap from the camp to the Strand again, I will discover a pretty knavery of the same breeding between such a starchwoman and a kind wanton mistress, as there are few of those ballasted vessels nowadays but will have a love and a husband.

860 The woman crying her ware by the door (a most pitiful cry and a lamentable hearing that such a stiff thing as starch should want customers), passing cunningly and slyly by the stall, not once taking notice of the party you wot on, but being by this some three or four shops off. 'Mass', quoth my young mistress to the weathercock her husband, 'such a thing I want, you know.' Then she named how many puffs and purls lay in a miserable case for want of stiffening. The honest, plain-dealing jewel her husband sent out a boy to call her (not 'bawd', by her right name, but 'starchwoman'); into the shop she came, making a low counterfeit curtsy, of whom the mistress demanded if the starch were pure gear and would be stiff in her ruff, saying, she had often been deceived before when the things about her have stood as limber as eelskins. The woman replied as subtly: 'Mistress', quoth she, 'take this paper of starch of my hand, and if it prove not to your mind, never bestow penny with me!'—which paper, indeed, was 875 a letter sent to her from the gentleman, her exceeding favourite. 'Say you so?' quoth the young dame, 'and I'll try it i'faith.' With that she ran upstairs like a spinner upon small cobweb ropes, not to try or arraign the starch, but to construe and parse the letter (whilst her husband sat below by the counter like one of these 880 brow-bitten catchpoles that wait for one man all day, when his wife can put five in the Counter before him), wherein she found many words that pleased her. Withal the gentleman writ unto her for a certain sum of money, which no sooner was read but was ready to be sent; wherefore, laying up the starch and that and 885 taking another sheet of clean paper in her hand, wanting time and opportunity to write at large, with a penful of ink, in the very middle of the sheet writ these few quaint monosyllables: 'Coin, Cares, and Cures, and all C's else are yours.' Then rolling up the white money like the starch in that paper very subtly and artificially, came tripping downstairs with these colourable words: 'Here's goodly starch indeed! Fie, fie—trust me husband—as yellow as the jaundice! I would not have betrayed my puffs with it for a million! Here, here, here!' (giving her the paper of money). With that the subtle starchwoman, seeming sorry that it pleased her not, told her, within few days she would fit her turn with that which should like her (meaning, indeed, more such sweet news from her lover). These and suchlike, madam, are the cunning conveyances of secret, privy, and therefore unnoted harlots that so avoid the common finger of the world when less committers than they are publicly pointed at. 900

So, likewise in the camp, whither now I return borne on the swift wings of apprehension, the habit of a laundress shadows the abomination of a strumpet, and our soldiers are like glovers, for the one cannot work well nor the other fight well without their wenches. This was the first mark of villainy that I found sticking upon the brow of War. But after the hot and fiery copulation of a skirmish or two, the ordnance playing like so many Tamburlaines, the muskets and calivers answering like drawers, 'Anon, anon, sir, I cannot be here and there too'—that is, in the soldier's hand and in the enemy's belly—I grew more acquainted and, as it were, entered into the entrails of black-livered policy. Methought indeed, at first, those great pieces of ordnance should speak English, though now by transportation turned rebels; and what a miserable and pitiful plight it was, lady, to have so many thousands of our men slain by their own countrymen the cannons—I mean not the harmless canons of Paul's, but those cannons that have a great singing in their heads. 915

Well, in this onset I remember I was well smoke-dried but neither arm nor leg perished, not so much as the loss of a petty finger, for when I counted them all over, I missed not one of them, and yet sometimes the bullets came within a hair of my coxcomb even like a barber scratching my pate, and perhaps took away the left limb of a vermin, and so departed; another time shouldering me like a bailiff against Michaelmas term and then shaking me by the sleeve as familiarly as if we had been acquainted seven years together. To conclude, they used me very courteously and gentleman-like awhile, like an old cunning bowler to fetch in a 920

853 train out teach young wives about having adulterous affairs 856 kind foolish
 857 ballasted variant (obs.) of 'ballusted'; here, weighted down with a husband
 860 stiff thing bawdy reference to erection 862 wot on know of 864 weathercock easily turned by the wind, i.e., her deceitful verbal expressions 865 puffs parts of a garments sewn in such a way as to appear inflated or puffed-up purls fringes or pleats
 870 gear stuff, i.e., high quality starch
 870-2 ruff...eelskins double entendre linking vagina (i.e., 'ruff') and limp penis
 873 paper of starch starch rolled up in paper like flat, thin pastry dough
 877 spinner spider
 880 catchpoles sheriff's deputies or sergeants who arrest criminals

881 Counter debtors' prison; probably a pun on female genitalia
 888 all C's else allusion to 'cunt'
 890 colourable specious, feigned, plausible-sounding 896 like please
 903 glovers glove makers or sellers
 907 ordnance cannon, artillery
Tamburlaines reference to the towering hero of Christopher Marlowe's two plays of that name 908 calivers lightweight muskets that could be aimed and fired without a rest drawers bartenders
 911 black-livered policy In the psychophysiology of the time, the liver processed the digested fluid (chyle) from the stomach into the four humours, of which melancholia had the qualities of black, semi-excremental, sour, thick, and heavy. Its preponderance in the body produced a lean and pale appearance, a grim and frowning visage, and a mind given to envy, obstinacy, churlishness, and greed. The melancholic, or 'malcontent', was a politically dangerous type driven by a sense of injustice or unrequited merit and often plotted ('made policy') for revenge or the destruction of the good fortune enjoyed by others.

 913 transportation the sale and export of ordnance to foreign countries
 916 canons clergymen (including clerks in minor orders) living with others in a clergy-house, i.e., in one of the houses within the precincts, or 'close', of a cathedral; often choir members
 922 pate head
 923 vermin e.g., lice, fleas

930 young kettling gamester, who will suffer him to win one sixpenny-game at the first, and then lurch him in six pounds afterward; and so they played with me, still training me with their fair promises into far deeper and deadlier battles where, like villainous cheating bowlers, they lurch'd me of two of my best limbs, viz. my right arm and right leg, that so, of a man of war, I became in show a monster of war, yet comforted in this because I knew war begot 935 many such monsters as myself in less than a twelvemonth.

Now I could discharge no more, having paid the shot dear enough, I think, but rather desired to be discharged, to have pay and be gone: whereupon I appeared to my captain and other commanders, kissing my left hand which then stood for both (like 940 one actor that plays two parts), who seemed to pity my unjointed fortunes and plaster my wounds up with words, told me I had done valiant service in their knowledge; marry, as for pay, they must go on the score with me, for all their money was thumped out in powder. And this was no pleasing salve to a green sore, 945 madam; 'twas too much for me, lady, to trust calivers with my limbs and then cavaliers with my money. Nevertheless, for all my lamentable action of one arm like old Titus Andronicus, I could purchase no more than one month's pay for a ten-month's pain and peril; nor that neither, but to convey away my miserable 950 clamours that lay roaring against the arches of their ears, marry, their bountiful favours were extended thus far: I had a passport to beg in all countries.

Well, away I was packed, and after a few miseries by the way, at last I set one foot into England again (for I had no more then to 955 set), being my native though unnatural country for whose dear good I pawned my limbs to bullets, those merciless brokers that will take the vantage of a minute, and so they were quite forfeited, lost, and unrecoverable. When I was on shore, the people gathered, which word 'gathering' put me in hope of good 960 comfort that afterward I failed of. For I thought, at first, they had gathered something for me, but I found, at last, they did only but gather about me, some wondering at me as if I had been some sea monster cast ashore, some jesting at my deformity, whilst others laughed at the jests. One amongst them, I remember, likened me to a sea-crab because I went all of one side; another fellow vied 965 it and said I looked like a rabbit cut up and half-eaten because my wing and leg (as they termed it) were departed. Some began to pity me, but those were few in number, or at least their pity was as penniless as Pierce, who writ to the devil for maintenance.

Thus passing from place to place like the motion of Julius Caesar 970 or the city Nineveh, though not altogether in so good clothes, I overtook the city from whence I borrowed my first breath and in whose defence I spent and laid out my limbs by whole sums to purchase her peace and happiness, nothing doubting but to be well entreated there, my grievous maims tenderly regarded, 975 my poor broken estate carefully repaired, the ruins of my blood built up again with redress and comfort. But woe the while, madam! I was not only unpitied, succourless, and rejected, but threatened with the public stocks, loathsome jails, and common whippingposts, there to receive my pay (a goodly reward for my bleeding 980 service) if I were once found in the city again.

Wherefore I was forced to retire towards the Spital and Shoreditch, which, as it appeared, was the only Cole Harbour and sanctuary for wenches and soldiers; where I took up a poor lodging o' trust till the Sunday, hoping that then Master Alms and Mistress 985 Charity would walk abroad and take the air in Finsbury.

At which time I came hopping out from my lodging like old lame Giles of Cripplegate; but when I came there, the wind blew so bleak and cold that I began to be quite out of hope of Charity, yet, like a torn map of misery, I waited my single halfpenny 990 fortunes; when, of a sudden, turning myself about and looking down the Windmill Hill, I might espy afar off a fine-fashioned dame of the city with her man bound by indenture before her;
whom no sooner I caught in mine eyelids, but I made to with all possible speed, and with a premeditated speech for the nonce, 995 thus most soldier-like I accosted her:

'Sweet lady, I beseech your beauty to weigh the estate of a poor unjointed soldier that hath consumed the moiety, or the one half of his limbs, in the dismembering and devouring wars

928 kettling inexperienced 929 lurch overwhelmingly outscore an opponent. In bowling games played for wagers, the highly skilled player intentionally loses the first game and proceeds to win subsequent games until the inexperienced player has no more money.
943 score record of a debt; 'put it on the tab'
946 cavaliers gentlemen trained for military service on horseback; officers 947 Titus Andronicus The hero of Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus whose right hand is cut off in the third act; hence, subsequent manual activities are severely curtailed, but not nearly so much as his daughter's (i.e., both hands cut off).
951-2 passport to beg soldiers or sailors carrying such a passport were exempted from the act of 1598 which classified wandering beggars as rogues who were to be whipped and extradited to the parish of their birth

952 countries i.e., counties
957 vantage advantage
964-5 likened... sea-crab Certain species of crabs crawl sideways rather than forward; the image suggests that the soldier pulled himself sideways while prone on the ground, but the exaggerated image of his maiming defies any clear insight into his exact method of locomotion. He also mentions 'I came out hopping' (987), presumably with a stick for support.
965-6 vied it matching, raising, or calling the bet of an opponent in a card game such as stud poker in the confidence that one's hand will win; outdo another 969 penniless as Pierce In Nashe's Pierce Penniless his Supplication to the Devil, the poverty-stricken Pierce, who has devoted his life to learning, writes to Lucifer suggesting that the removal of the souls of a number of usurers and misers who have encroached on Lucifer's prerogatives would put more gold in circulation and thus help impoverished

but deserving individuals like Pierce.
970-1 motion of... Nineveh two popular puppet shows; the maimed soldier's physical movements are jerky and unnatural like those of puppets 980 pay i.e. punishment
982-3 Spital and Shoreditch St Mary Spittle, a hospital north of the city wall on Bishopsgate Street, accessible through Bishopsgate; Shoreditch is immediately to the north. Nashe claimed that 'every second house' in the area was a brothel (Pierce Penniless).
983 Cole Harbour site in Upper Thames Street near Allhallows church which had acquired the right of sanctuary 988 Cripplegate city gate providing access to Finsbury Field; west of Bishopsgate and Moorgate; supposedly named after St Giles, the patron saint of cripples 992 Windmill Hill the north-south road leading past the windmills that had been erected in Finsbury Field during the reign of Elizabeth

The Ant, and the Nightingale

1000 that hath cheated me of my flesh so notoriously. I protest I am not worth at this instant the small revenue of three farthings, besides my lodging unpleased and my diet unsatisfied. And had I ten thousand limbs, I would venture them all in your sweet quarrel rather than such a beauty as yourself should want the least limb of your desire.'

1005 With that, as one being rather moved by my last words of promise than my first words of pity, she drew her white bountiful hand out of her marry-muff and quoited a single halfpenny, whereby I knew her then to be cold Mistress Charity both by her chill appearance and the hard frozen pension she gave me. She was warm lapped, I remember, from the sharp injury of the biting air: her visage was benighted with a taffeta mask to fray away the naughty wind from her face, and yet her very nose seemed so sharp with cold that it almost bored a hole quite through.
1015 This was frost-bitten Charity: her teeth chattered in her head and leaped up and down like virginal-jacks, which betrayed likewise who she was. And you would have broken into infinite laughter, madam (though misery made me leaden and pensive), had you been present to have seen how quickly the muff swallowed her hand again, for no sooner was it drawn forth to drop down her pitiful alms but, for fear the sun and air should have ravished it, it was extempore whipped up again. This is the true picture of Charity, madam, which is as cold as ice in the middle of July.

1020 Well, still I waited for another fare. But then I bethought myself again that all the fares went by water o' Sundays to the bearbaiting, and o' Mondays to Westminster Hall, and therefore, little to be looked for in Moorfields all the week long.

1025 Wherefore I sat down by the rails there and fell into these passionate, but not railing speeches: 'Is this the farthest reward for a soldier? Is valour and resolution, the two champions of the soul, so slightly esteemed and so basely undervalued? Doth reeling fortune not only rob us of our limbs, but of our living?
Are soldiers then both food for cannon and for misery?' But then, in the midst of my passion, calling to memory the peevish turns of many famous popular gallants whose names were writ even upon the heart of the world (it could not so much as 1035 think without them, nor speak but in the discourse of them), I began to outdare the very worst of cruel and disaster chances and determined to be constant in calamity and valiant against the battering siege of misery. But note the cross star that always dogg'd my fortunes. I had not long rested there but I saw the tweering constable of Finsbury with his bench of brown billmen making towards me, meaning indeed to stop some prison hole with me, as your soldiers, when the wars have done with them, are good for nothing else but to stop holes withal; at which sight, I scrambled up of all two, took my skin off the hedge, cozened the constable, and slipped into an ant again. 1040 1045

The Nightingale.

'O, 'twas a pretty quaint deceit'
(The Nightingale began to sing),
1050 'To slip from those that lie in wait,
Whose touch is like a raven's wing,
Fatal and ominous, which, being spread
Over a mortal, aims him dead.

'Alas, poor emmet! thou wast tossed
1055 In thousand miseries by this shape,
Thy colour wasted, thy blood lost,
Thy limbs broke with the violent rape
Of hot impatient cannons, which desire
To ravish lives, spending their lust in fire. 1060

'O, what a ruthful sight it is to see,
Though in a soldier of the mean'st degree,
That right member perished,
Which thy body cherished;
1065 That limb dissevered, burnt, and gone,
Which the best part was borne upon;
And then the greatest ruth of all,
Returning home in torn estate,
Where he should rise, there most to fall,
Trode down with envy, bruised with hate: 1070
Yet wretch, let this thy comfort be,
That greater worms have fared like thee.'

1002 unpleased unpaid bill 1008 marry-muff cylindrical piece of clothing made from fur or silk into which the hands were inserted from either end, similar in function to gloves quoited as in playing at quoits, a game played with 'a heavy flattish ring of iron, slightly convex on the upper side and concave on the under, so as to give it an edge capable of cutting into the ground when it falls, if skilfully thrown'. The sense is that Mistress Charity threw the coin on the ground rather than handing it to the ant.
1011 lapped wrapped in layers of clothing 1012 benighted covered, hidden from the light
fray frighten away

1016 virginal-jacks the keys of a virginal, a small keyboard instrument (a predecessor of the harpsichord) popular in aristocratic homes
1025-6 bear-baiting Bears were pitted against mastiffs at the Bear Garden in Southwark (across the Thames by the Globe) in a very popular form of entertainment which left the bears in what could be described as a 'ragged' condition (see 'To the Reader').
1027 Moorfields marshy area north of Moorgate between Finsbury Field on the west and Spitalfields on the east; haunt of beggars
1029 railing verbally abusive 1034-5 peevish turns the reference to
'reeling fortune' (1032) evokes the common image of the whimsical, unpredictable turning of Fortune's wheel which brings low those in high places. In the context of the de casibus literary tradition, only the 'peevish' or downward turns of Fortune 'were writ upon the heart of the world' as in the collection of histories in The Mirror for Magistrates.

1042 tweering spying billmen members of the watch who carried spears or pikes with hooked points, or 'bills'. The ant uses the term 'bench' here and in the dicing episode to indicate a group, an obscure association.
1046 cozened cheated, defrauded through deceit
1061 ruthful pitiful

1075 So here thou left'st, bloodless and wan,
Thy journeys thorough man and man;
These two crossed shapes, so much oppressed,
Did fray thy weakness from the rest.

Ant.

1080 No, madam, once again my spleen did thirst
To try the third, which makes men blessed or curst;
That number, three, many stars wait upon,
Ushering clear hap or black confusion.
Once more I ventured all my hopes to crown,
But, aye me, leaped into a scholar's gown.

Nightingale.

1085 A needy scholar? Worse than worst,
Less fate in that than both the first:
I thought, thou'dst leaped into a law-gown, then
There had been hope to have swept up all again.
But a lank scholar? Study how you can,
1090 No academe makes a rich alderman.
Well, with this comfort yet thou mayst discourse:
When fates are worst, then they can be no worse.

The Ant's Tale when he was a Scholar.

1095 You speak oracle, madam. And now suppose, sweet lady, you see me set forth like a poor scholar to the university, not on horseback but in Hobson's wagon, and all my pack contained in less than a little hood-box; my books not above four in number, and those four were very needful ones too, or else they had never been bought; and yet I was the valiant captain of a grammar school 1100 before I went, endured the assault and battery of many unclean lashes, and all the battles I was in stood upon points much, which, once let down, the enemy (the schoolmaster) would come rearward and do such an exploit 'tis a shame to be talked of. By this time, madam, imagine me slightly entertained to be a poor 1105 scholar and servitor to some Londoner's son, a pure cockney that must hear twice a week from his mother, or else he will be sick ere the Sunday of a university-mullygrub. Such a one, I remember, was my first puling master by whose peevish service I crept into an old batteler's gown and so began to be a jolly fellow. There was the first point of wit I showed, in learning to keep myself 1110 warm; to the confirming of which, you shall never take your true philosophers without two nightcaps at once, and better, a gown of rug with the like appurtenances; and who be your wisemen, I pray, but they? Now as for study and books, I had the use of my young master's, for he was all day a courtier in the tennis-court tossing 1115 of balls instead of books, and only holding disputation with the court-keeper how many dozen he was in. And when any friend of his would remember him to his book with this old moth-eaten sentence, nulla dies sine linea, 'True', he would say, 'I observe it well, for I am no day from the line of the racket-court.'

Well, in the mean time, I kept his study warm and sucked the honey of wit from the flowers of Aristotle, steeped my brain in the smart juice of logic, that subtle virtue, and yet for all my weighty and substantial arguments, being able indeed to prove anything by logic, I could prove myself never the richer, make 1120 the best syllogism I could. No, although I daily rose before the sun, talked and conversed with midnight, killing many a poor farthing-candle that sometimes was ungently put to death when it might have lived longer, but most times living out the full course and hour and the snuff dying naturally in his bed. Nevertheless, 1130 I had entered as yet but the suburbs of a scholar and sat but upon the skirts of learning. Full often I have sighed when others have snorted, and when baser trades have securely rested in their linens, I have forced mine eyes open and even gagged them with capital letters, stretching them upon the tenters of a broad text-1135 line when night and sleep have hung pound-weights of lead upon my eyelids.

How many such black and ghastly seasons have I passed over, accompanied only with a demure watching-candle that blinked upon Aristotle's works and gave even sufficient glimmering to read 1140

1096 Hobson's wagon Thomas Hobson drove a freight wagon between London and Cambridge weekly from 1564 to 1630. John Milton immortalized him in two poems. Several extant invoices and letters from bookseller Thomas Chard of London (1580s) to his Cambridge buyer refer to delivery via Hobson's wagon.

1097 hood-box box for storing a hood (i.e., head-covering)

1099-103 valiant captain ... talked of Students progressed through the eight forms of the English grammar school before graduation; the curriculum focused upon the mastery of Latin grammar and rhetoric, followed by Greek. The ant was the chief misbehavior and hence the recipient of corporal punishment consisting of an undoing of the 'points', or laces, which attached the breeches to the doublet, thus exposing his buttocks for whipping with various instruments such as a stick or a bundle of birch twigs.

1101 lashes whipping

1105 servitor lowest rank of student:

very poor students earned their keep as servants of well-off students

1107 university-mullygrub A mullygrub was a state of depression. Here, the ant's employer, a newly arrived student, experiences severe homesickness for his mother. Nashe satirizes the type as 'A young heir or cockney, that is his mother's darling'.

1108 puling whining or complaining like an infant

1109 batteler's rank of student below commoners; not entitled to commons, but had to purchase food from the cook and butler

1113 rug coarse woollen material

1117 was in apparently a fee for balls paid by the dozen

1119 sentence sententia, a wise saying nulla dies sine linea 'no day without a line'; a reference to drawing that originated with Pliny, recorded in an anecdote about the ancient Greek painter Apelles; alternately, since the context is 'his book', a reference to the practice in the Elizabethan grammar school of requiring students to memorize new lines of a classical text each day. The standard assignment beginning in the fourth form was the memorization of several lines of Ovid's Metamorphoses, the whole to be completed by the end of the eighth form.

1124 substantial containing substance or significant matter

1126 syllogism formal logical argument containing a major and a minor premise which share a common element (the 'middle term'), and together either affirm or deny the third part, the conclusion, which also contains the middle term

1128 farthing-candle candle costing a farthing, a coin (usually silver) worth one-quarter of a penny

1135 tenters wooden framework on which cloth was stretched after being milled, so that it would set or dry evenly without shrinking (a familiar sight to Londoners, given the large number of tenters situated just north of the city wall through Moorgate)

The Ant, and the Nightingale

by, but none to spare. Hitherto my hopes grew comfortable upon the spreading branches of art and learning, rather promising future advancement than empty days and penurious scarcity. But shall I tell you, lady? O, here let me sigh out a full point and take my leave of all plenteous hours and wealthy hopes, for in the spring of all my perfections, in the very pride and glory of all my labours, I was unfruitfully led to the lickerish study of poetry, that sweet honey-poison that swells a supple scholar with unprofitable sweetness and delicious false conceits until he burst into extremities and become a poetical almsman, or at the most, one of the Poor Knights of Poetry, worse by odds than one of the Poor Knights of Windsor. Marry, there was an age once, but alas, long since dead and rotten, whose dust lies now in lawyers' sandboxes! In those golden days, a virtuous writer might have lived, maintained himself, better upon poems than many upon ploughs, and might have expended more by the year by the revenue of his verse than any riotous elder brother upon the wealthy quarterages of three times three hundred acres, according to the excellent report of these lines:

There was a Golden Age! who murdered it?
How died that Age, or what became of it?
Then poets, by divinest alchemy,
Did turn their ink to gold; kings in that time
Hung jewels at the ear of every rhyme.
But O, those days are wasted, and behold
The Golden Age that was, is coined to gold.
And why time now is called an iron man,
Or this an Iron Age, 'tis thus expressed:
The Golden Age lies in a iron chest.

Or,
Gold lies now as prisoner in an usurer's great iron-barred chest, where the prison-grates are the locks and the keyholes, but so closely mewed, or rather damned up, that it never looks to walk abroad again unless there chance to come a speedy rot among usurers, for, I fear me, the piddling gout will never make them away soon enough, for your rank money masters live their threescore and ten years as orderly as many honest men; and it is a great pity, Lady Philomel, that the gout should be such a long courtier in a usurer's great toe, revelling and domineering above thirty years together in his rammish blood and his fusty flesh. And I wonder much, madam, that gold, being the spirit of the Indies, can couch so basely under wood and iron, two dull slaves, and not muster up his legion of angels, burst through the wide bulk of a coffer, and so march into bountiful and liberal bosoms, shake hands with virtuous gentlemen, industrious spirits, and true deserving worthies, detesting the covetous clutches and loathsome fangs of a goat-bearded usurer, a sable-soul broker, and an infectious law-fogger.

O, but I chide in vain, for gold wants eyes,
And like a whore cares not with whom it lies.

Yet that which makes me most admire his baseness are these verses following wherein he proudly sets forth his own glory, which he vaunts so much of, that I shame to think any ignoble spirit or copper disposition should fetter his smooth golden limbs in boisterous and sullen iron, but rather be let free to every virtuous and therefore poor scholar (for poverty is niece to virtue); so should each elegant poem be truly valued, and divine Poesy sit crowned in gold as she ought, where now she only sits with a paper on her head as if she had committed some notorious trespass, either for railing against some brawling lawyer, or calling some justice of peace a wiseman; and how magnificently Gold sings of his own fame and glory, these his own verses shall stand for witnesses.

————— Know I am Gold,
The richest spirit that breaths in earth or hell,
The soul of kingdoms and the stamp of souls;
Bright angels wear my livery, sovereign kings
Christen their names in gold and call themselves
Royal and sovereign after my gilt name.
All offices are mine, and in my gift
I have a hand in all: the statist's veins
Flow in the blood of gold, the courtier bathes
His supple and lascivious limbs in oil
Which my brow sweats. What lady brightly sphered
But takes delight to kiss a golden beard?
Those pleaders, forenoon players, act my parts
With liberal tongues and desperate fighting spirits
That wrestle with the arms of voice and air;
And lest they should be out, or faint, or cold,
Their innocent clients hist them on with gold.

1143 penurious indigent, destitute
1147 lickerish sweet, tempting, attractive 1149 conceits imaginative, fanciful, ingenious, witty expressions of some idea, concept, or poetic image
1152 Poor Knights of Windsor pensions and apartments in Windsor Castle were allotted to a certain number of impoverished military men
1154 sandboxes box with perforated top used for sprinkling sand to blot wet ink
1158 quarterages quarterly rents 1173 mewed shut up, concealed 1175 piddling trifling, petty gout a disease (usually in males) characterized by painful inflammation of the smaller joints, especially that of the great toe 1180 rammish rank, strong, highly disagreeable (smell, taste); figuratively, lascivious or lustful fusty mouldy or stale-smelling 1183 angels pun on the coin and heavenly angels

1192 he i.e., Gold, who is now personified as a poet writing praises of himself 1198-9 paper on her head obscure reference, probably to some form of punishment for naughty students such as being required to wear a 'dunce's cap' and sit in the corner
1207-9 angels... Royal and sovereign pun on the three coins

1209 sovereign gold coin worth about 10-11 shillings
1214 lady brightly sphered figurative reference to the nine heavenly spheres of the Elizabethan cosmos. Poets frequently 'ensphered' their ladies in the eighth sphere, that of the fixed stars, in their poems of courtship and praise. This represents the highest location in creation. Hence, even highly esteemed and beloved ladies, praised usually for their ethereal virtue among other qualities, bow to greed if enough gold is offered.
1216 pleaders, forenoon players lawyers
1220 hist sound made to urge on a dog or other animal

Father Hubburds Tales, or

What holy churchman's not accounted even,
That prays three times to me, ere once to heaven?
Then, to let shine the radiance of my birth,
I am the enchantment both in hell and earth.

1225 Here's golden majesty enough, I trow. And, Gold, art thou so powerful, so mighty, and yet snaffled with a poor padlock? O base 1230 drudge and too unworthy of such an angel-like form, much like a fair, sleek-faced courtier without either wit or virtue; thou that throwest the earthen bowl of the world, with the bias the wrong 1235 way, to peasantry, baseness, ingentility, and never givest desert his due or shakest thy yellow wings in a scholar's study! But why do I lose myself in seeking thee, when thou art found of few but illiterate hinds, rude boors, and hoary penny-fathers that keep 1240 thee in perpetual durance, in vaults, under false boards, subtlecontrived walls, and in horrible dark dungeons; bury thee most unchristian-like, without 'Amen' or the least noise of a priest or clerk, and make thee rise again at their pleasure many a thousand time before Doomsday; and yet, will not all this move thee once to forsake them and keep company with a scholar that truly knows how to use thee?

By this time I had framed an elaborate poetical building, a neat, choice, and curious poem, the first fruits of my musical rhyming study, which was dispersed into a quaint volume, fairly bound up in principal vellum, double-filleted with leaf-gold, strung most 1245 gentleman-like with carnation silk ribbon; which book, indus-triously heaped with weighty conceits, precious phrases, and wealthy numbers, I, Oliver Hubburd, in the best fashion I might, presented to Sir Christopher Clutch-Fist, whose bountiful virtue I blaze in my first Epistle. The book he entertained but, I think, for 1250 the cover's sake because it made such a goodly show on the backside. And some two days after, returning for my remuneration, I 1226 snaffled simple form of bridle-bit, having less restraining power than one provided with a curb (the chain or strap passing under the horse's lower jaw) 1229 bowl ball used in the game played on a bowling green bias to throw the bowl in such a way as to cause it to follow an oblique or curved trajectory; similar to 'putting english' on a cue ball or controlling the spin of a baseball to produce a curved trajectory,

i.e., 'throwing a curve-ball'
1233 penny-fathers misers
1243 quaint ornate, expensive, finely crafted

1244 principal vellum the finest grade of leather parchment made from hides of calves, lambs, or kids; usually used for writing, painting, or binding books double-filleted two lines forming rectangular frames around the perimeter of the book's cover; made by impressing strips of extremely thin ('leaf') gold upon the vellum
1245 carnation silk ribbon expensive pinkish or flesh-coloured ribbon (see note to l. 32-3) 1245-7 industriously heaped . . . wealthy numbers The ant measures the value of his 'elaborate poetic building' quan-titatively in terms of detailed 'conceits', ornate images, and profusion of stanzas.

1249 first Epistle i.e., Epistle Dedicatory at the beginning of Father Hubburd's Tales 1250-1 backside unclear reference to some aspect of the book 1251 remuneration Oliver expected a reward for dedicating the book to Clutch-Fist.
1255 prospect sight
swooned fainted

might espy (O lamentable sight! madam) my book dismembered very tragically, the cover ripped off (I know not for what purpose), and the carnation silk strings pulled out and placed in his Spanish-leather shoes; at which ruthless prospect I fell down and swooned, 1255 and when I came to myself again, I was an ant, and so ever since I have kept me.

The Nightingale.

'There keep thee still;
1260 Since all are ill,
Venture no more;
'Tis better be a little ant
Than a great man and live in want,
And still deplore.
1265 So rest thee now,
From sword, book, or plough.'
By this the day began to spring
And seize upon her watchful eyes,
When more tree-choristers did sing,
1270 And every bird did wake and rise;
Which was no sooner seen and heard,
But all their pretty chat was marred.
And then she said,
'We are betrayed,
1275 The day is up, and all the birds,
And they abroad will blab our words.'
With that she bade the ants farewell,
And all they likewise Philomel.
Away she flew,
1280 Crying Tereu!
And all the industrious ants in throngs
Fell to their work, and held their tongues.

FINIS.

THE MEETING OF GALLANTS AT AN ORDINARY; OR, THE WALKS IN PAUL'S

Edited by Paul Yachnin

Thy spring shall in all sweets abound,
Thy summer shall be clear and sound,
Thy autumn swell the barn and loft
With corn and fruits—ripe, sweet and soft;
And in thy winter, when all go,
Thou shalt depart as white as snow.

—Masque of Heroes (1619)

IN Harmony's perfectly flowing song of blessing for the new year of 1619 in Middleton's Masque of Heroes, there is one detail that causes a slight disruption for the modern reader. This disruption, not metrical but semantic, consists in the prediction that summer will be 'clear and sound'. 'Clear' seems like a straightforward reference to the weather, but the meaning of 'sound' is at first obscure for us. In contrast, what any hearer in the early seventeenth century would have grasped instantly was that Harmony's blessing represented a poetic attempt to ward off the plague. In this context, 'sound' means 'healthy' (as in 'sound of limb'), and 'clear' is not a reference to the weather at all, but rather expresses a wish that the atmosphere will be clear of the corruption which was often thought to precipitate the plague. 'This sickness of the plague', Thomas Lodge wrote in 1603, 'is commonly engendered of an infection of the air, altered with a venomous vapour, dispersed and sowed in the same.' In 1619, by the way, Middleton and his audience were fortunate because, although there was virulent plague in Rouen and two ships from there were quarantined at Tilbury for twenty-five days, there was no epidemic that year in England. The year of Lodge's A Treatise of the Plague, however, was not 'clear and sound'. The bubonic epidemic of 1603-4, toward the end of which time Middleton wrote The Meeting of Gallants at an Ordinary, killed more than one-sixth of the population of London. The most recent great epidemic had taken place ten years earlier, when Middleton was thirteen. The years from 1597 to 1600 were 'clear', although there were still a few plague-deaths annually during all those years. There was also sickness on the Continent: Lisbon in 1599, Spain in 1601, the Low Countries in 1602. In summer 1602, authorities prevented refugees from the contaminated city of Amsterdam from landing in England, and in September trade with the port town of Yarmouth and with Amsterdam was suspended by the Lord Mayor of London.

In spite of these and other precautions, however, the sickness eventually began to take hold in the city, first in the suburbs (deaths were reported in Southwark, south of the Thames, in early March) and then in London itself. By April, orders had been given both to restrict the movement of 'rogues and vagabonds' and to provide charity among the infected poor. The deaths for the week ending 26 May were thirty, but by July 1603 the weekly rate of mortality for London and the Liberties had reached the hundreds, and during the last week of that month, more than a thousand people died from the disease.

The new King celebrated his coronation on 25 July, but arrived at and departed from Westminster by water and, once crowned, left the city to return to Hampton Court about fifteen miles west of London. The toll in the city and out-parishes rose through the summer to a peak of over three thousand for the week ending 1 September. Michaelmas Term, the autumn session of the law courts (10 October to 28 November), was relocated to the town of Winchester. As The Meeting of Gallants tells us, St Paul's was deserted of the splendidly attired would-be courtiers who frequented it in healthier times ('What, Signor Jinglespur, the first gallant I met in Paul's, since the one-and-thirty day, or the decease of July' [124-5]). John Chamberlain, who lived his adult life in the neighbourhood of the Cathedral, wrote: 'Paul's grows very thin, for every man shrinks away and I am half ashamed to see myself left alone.' Eventually, the sickness began to abate, the weekly toll dropping below a thousand for the week ending 20 October. By Christmas, weekly deaths from the pestilence had fallen to fewer than a hundred. Hilary Term (23 January to 12 February) took place back in London. It was just around this time that Middleton, with help from Dekker, wrote The Meeting of Gallants.

Plague changed the face of life in the city. Although the English had had three hundred years' experience of recurrent bubonic plague, each new epidemic provided a grim surprise for whose physical and psychological effects no one could adequately prepare. Public life was disrupted. Those who could afford to, fled the city, the runaways often including doctors, ministers of the Church, and public officials; regular commerce diminished (businesses where the infection was detected were closed for a minimum of twenty-eight days). There was a feeling of panic. Thomas Lodge was besieged by crowds of citizens who mistook his house for that of a charlatan whose advertisements promised immunity from infection: 'everyone that read them came flocking to me, conjuring me by great proffers and persuasions to store them with my promised preservatives and relieve their sick with my cordial waters'. The terror aroused by the sickness could not be relieved, even with all the nostrums, prayer meetings, and public health measures carried out by the authorities. The terror was in part a result of the extreme speed and brutality of the sickness. Leeds Barroll explains its typical course:

The bacillus of the bubonic plague, once it has penetrated the body of a human being, is vigorous and aggressive. It reproduces itself rapidly and spreads throughout the entire biological system. . . . the onset is sudden. Body temperature rises to at least 102°F, pulse increases, the victim breathes faster than usual and needs to lie down. . . . severe headache also strikes in the early stages. There are pains in the back and legs, and often in places where the lymph glands are located: the groin, the armpits, or the neck. A victim who tries to walk at this juncture is not well coordinated, often staggering as if drunk. Victims also begin to feel very thirsty. . . . accumulations of bacilli in the bloodstream begin to obstruct the tiny dilated capillaries, causing hemorrhage and bruises on the skin. . . . One's skin becomes hot and dry. Miniature blisters begin to appear on the hands, feet, and chest, becoming small, poxlike skin eruptions or coalescing into carbuncles sometimes as large as an inch in diameter. Sometimes, too, ulcers form on the skin near the lymph glands, and these ulcers may eat deeply enough into the skin to cause hemorrhage as the vein or artery is exposed. . . . Victims either become apathetic or go into wild deliriums marked by an impulse to wander or even run away. . . . frequently sufferers may experience air hunger that causes them to wish to leave an enclosed room in order to sit or lie down outside. . . . Death comes from heart failure.

In addition to the sheer impressiveness of the physical deterioration of one's neighbours and family members, the plague terrified on account of the mystery of its origin, the invisibility of its spread and the apparent randomness with which it selected its victims. 'How often', Dekker wrote in The Wonderful Year (1603), 'hath the amazed husband waking, found the comfort of his bed lying breathless by his side! His children at the same instant gasping for life!' Questions about the origin and capriciousness of the plague added a distinctly private, spiritual dimension to the worrying public concerns about the prevention of large assemblies of people, the disposal of corpses, the danger of the infected evading quarantine, and the problems of crushing poverty and food shortages brought on by the disruption in trade, especially the trade in woollen cloth which was England's primary export. (Cloth was thought to carry the infection; in fact, it often did carry infective fleas.) Writers such as Dekker and Middleton, having been cut off from their regular source of income as dramatists on account of the prohibition against theatrical performances, turned their energy toward writing for the popular press. While a physician-poet such as Lodge might publish his advice on how to treat the actual disease, Dekker and Middleton articulated the moral and spiritual questionings aroused by the epidemic. So in News from Gravesend (1604), mostly by Dekker with a section by Middleton, we have the following:

Can we believe that one man's breath
 Infected, and being blown from him,
 His poison should to others swim,
 For then who breathed upon the first?
 Where did the imbulked venom burst?
 Or how 'scaped those that did divide
 The selfsame bits with those that died?
 Drunk of the selfsame cups, and lay
 In ulcerous beds, as close as they?

Dekker struggles with the fact that the plague exists rather than with the practical problems of its cure and control. How is it that some die and some survive? Where does the plague come from and how is the sickness passed from one person to another? In the end, the pamphlet concludes that the plague's origins are metaphysical rather than physical. In this view, and because the author loses sight of the problem of the randomness of mortality, the sickness is made to make moral sense because it is said to be a divine punishment visited upon a sinful nation ('God in anger fills his hand | With vengeance, throwing it on the land'), and the fundamental remedy therefore must lie in prayer rather than in any medical innovation:

Only this antidote apply:
 Cease vexing Heaven, and cease to die.
 . . . Each one purge one,
 And England's free, the plague is gone.

In The Meeting of Gallants, Middleton takes a tack different from that of News from Gravesend. The latter pamphlet develops a highly typical view. 'The plague', Lodge wrote in a similar vein, 'is a manifest sign of the wrath of God conceived against us'. It is important to remember, incidentally, that Dekker and Middleton were friends and collaborators and, in particular, that each man's part in News from Gravesend has not been definitively established. At any rate, The Meeting of Gallants differs from News from Gravesend because, first of all, it is not a theoretical inquiry into the causes and nature of the plague. Instead, since The Meeting of Gallants consists of a dramatized debate between personified causes of death (War, Famine, and Pestilence) and concludes with a series of 'tales', its view of the moral significance of the plague is implicit rather than explicit; its handling of the meaning of the sickness is woven into the dialogue and dramatically-framed narratives rather than proffered straightforwardly.

The Meeting of Gallants opens with a spirited verbal contest between personified versions of Death; this allegorical flying leads to a scene in Paul's Cathedral set in the present time (January–February 1604) of Middleton's original readers and replete with local details of the very horror they had just endured; finally, the scene shifts to an 'ordinary', or tavern, where a series of tales about the plague is recounted. The overall effect of this arrangement of material is to put in question any conventional theodicy. Rather than suppressing the problem of the apparent arbitrariness with which the plague chooses its victims, The Meeting of Gallants's jests highlight the capriciousness and consequent moral senselessness of the scourge. In this respect, Middleton's view is like the Earl of Gloucester's in The History of King Lear (1605–6) since the 'gods' of 'War, Famine and the Pestilence' do precisely 'kill us for their sport'. On the other hand, Middleton, though he gives full weight to the fear of random and invisible death, takes a much drier, tougher, and funnier view. We witness the 'gods' having their sport rather than seeing only the suffering of their victims. Furthermore, the debate is funny in itself, although chillingly or even infuriatingly funny. War, Famine, and Pestilence are represented as arrogant aristocrats who thoughtlessly place their interests over the interests of the people whom they destroy. Each wishes to be seen as the sovereign bringer of death, so each accuses the others of striking in peace-time, or of killing worthless victims ('a tailor is the farthest man thou kill'st', 13), or of destroying an insufficient number, or of taking life too quickly or too painfully ('Not worthy to be named a torturing death', 103). Pestilence actually seems to enlist her victims as her allies or subjects, cataloguing their sufferings as testimonials to her dignity:

Beware, War, how thou speakest of me,
I have friends here in England, though some dead,
Some still can show where I was born and bred;
Therefore be wary in pronouncing me.
Many have took my part, whose carcases
Lie now ten fathom deep: many alive
Can show their scars in my contagious quarrel:
War, I surpass the fury of thy stroke.

How many swarms
Of bruised and cracked people did I leave,
Their groins sore pierced with pestilential shot,
Their armpits digged with blains, and ulcerous sores
Lurking like poisoned bullets in their flesh?
Othersome shot in the eye with carbuncles,
Their lids as monstrous as the Saracens'.

Middleton's gallows humour also distinguishes him from his colleague Dekker. Whereas Dekker voices a moving sympathy which sometimes shades into maudlin sentimentality, Middleton is characteristically tougher-minded in his treatment of loss and fear. It is not, of course, that Dekker is humourless; on the contrary, Middleton no doubt followed the example of The Wonderful Year in concluding with what his collaborator refers to as 'a merry epilogue to a dull play, certain tales . . . cut out in sundry fashions'; and indeed Dekker himself contributed some of the tales to The Meeting of Gallants. But while the 'merry tales' in The Wonderful Year culminate in a description of a poor servant boy who lay 'grovelling and groaning on his face . . . there continued all night, and died miserably for want of succour', Middleton's story-telling Host has an untender, funny and realistic point of view. In the following passage, at the conclusion of The Meeting of Gallants, Middleton is able to use the boisterous Host both to convey the horror and the normative Christian response to that horror (a response characteristic of Dekker and many others), and also to critique such responses as inadequate for the purposes of the living:

Men on horseback riding thither [to the country], strangely stricken in the midst of their journeys, forced either to light off or fall off and die. And for certain and substantial report, many the last year were buried near unto highways in the same order, in their clothes as they were, booted and spurred even as they lighted off. Rolled into ditches, pits and hedges so lamentably, so rudely and unchristianlike, that it would have made a pitiful and remorseful eye bloodshot to see such a ruthless and disordered object, and a true heart bleed outright—but not such a one as mine, gallants, for my heart bleeds nothing but alegar. How commonly we saw here the husband and the wife buried together, a weeping spectacle containing much sorrow, how often were whole households emptied to fill up graves, and how sore the violence of that stroke was that struck ten persons out of one house, being a thing dreadful to apprehend and think upon, with many marvellous and strange accidents. But let not this make you sad, gallants. Sit you merry still. Here, my dainty bullies, I'll put you all in one goblet, and wash all these tales in a cup of sack.

It might be useful, finally, to imagine the state of mind of typical Londoners in February 1604. They had just witnessed appalling events, had heard perhaps too many theodicy rationalizations of the senseless suffering, had seen and been touched by that suffering (for few could have lived through the summer and autumn of 1603 without some momentous loss), and perhaps also felt some guilt for having survived at all when so many others had not. To readers in that state of mind, The Meeting of Gallants must have provided an acerbic tonic—a witnessing of the pestilence which neither sentimentalized nor suppressed nor rationalized what had happened; and which nonetheless did not slight the fact that the survivors had cause and need to be 'merry still'.

SEE ALSO

Textual introduction and apparatus: Companion, 491
Authorship and date: Companion, 349
Other Middleton–Dekker works: Caesar's Fall, 328; Gravesend, 128; Magnificent, 219; Patient Man, 280; Banquet, 637; Roaring Girl, 721; Gypsy, 1723

The Meeting of Gallants at an Ordinary; or, The Walks in Paul's

A Dialogue between War, Famine, and the Pestilence, blazing their several Evils

THE GENIUS OF WAR

Famine and Pestilence, cowards of hell,
That strike in peace, when the whole world's unarmed:
5 Tripping up souls of beggars, limbless wretches,
Hole-stopping prisoners, miserable catchpoles,
Whom one vocation stabs, dare you Furies
Confront the ghost of crimson passing War?
Thou bleak-cheeked wretch, one of my plenteous wounds
Would make thee a good colour.

10 FAMINE I defy
Thy blood and thee, 'tis that which I destroy;
I'll starve thee, War, for this.

WAR Alas, weak Famine;
Why, a tailor is the farthest man thou kill'st
That lives by bread; thou dar'st not touch a farmer, 15 No, nor his griping son-in-law that weds
His daughter with a dowry of stuffed barns,
Thou run'st away from these, such makes thee fly,
And there thou light'st upon the labourer's maw,
Break'st into poor men's stomachs, and there drivest
The sting of hunger like a dastard.

20 FAMINE Bastard.
Peace, War, lest I betray thy monstrous birth:
Thou know'st I can derive thee.

PESTILENCE And I both.

WAR
And I repugn you both, you hags of realms,
Thou witch of Famine, and drab of plagues:
25 Thou that mak'st men eat slovenly, and feed
On excrements of beasts, and at one meal
Swallow a hundred pound in very dove's dung.

FAMINE

Therein thou tell'st my glory and rich power.

WAR

And thou.

PESTILENCE

Beware, War, how thou speak'st of me,
I have friends here in England, though some dead,
30 Some still can show where I was born and bred;
Therefore be wary in pronouncing me.
Many have took my part, whose carcasses
Lie now ten fathom deep; many alive
Can show their scars in my contagious quarrel.
35 War, I surpass the fury of thy stroke.
Say that an army forty thousand strong
Enter thy crimson lists, and of that number,
Perchance the fourth part falls, marked with red death?
Why, I slay forty thousand in one battle,
40 Full of blue wounds, whose cold clay bodies look Like speckled marble.

As for lame persons, and maim'd soldiers,
There I outstrip thee too. How many swarms
Of bruised and cracked people did I leave,
45 Their groins sore pierced with pestilential shot,
Their armpits digged with blains, and ulcerous sores
Lurking like poisoned bullets in their flesh?
Othersome shot in the eye with carbuncles,
Their lids as monstrous as the Saracens'.
50

WAR

Thou plaguy woman, cease thy infectious brags,
Thou pestilent strumpet, base and common murd'ress,
What men of mark or memory have fell
In thy poor purple battle? Say thou'st slain
Four hundred silkweavers, poor silkworms, vanished
55 As many tapsters, chamberlains, and ostlers,

Title Ordinary an eating-house or tavern where meals were provided at a fixed price
the Walks in Paul's Paul's Walk was the middle aisle, or nave, of the church; from 1550 to 1650 it was used as a meeting-place for all kinds of people.
1 blazing proclaiming
6 catchpoles a petty officer of justice; esp. a warrant officer who arrests for debt
7 Whom one vocation stabs ? who are all summoned by the call of Death
8 passing surpassing, excellent 13 tailor tailors were said to be effete and cowardly farthest most powerful

15 griping avaricious
16 stuffed barns probably referring to the hoarding of foodstuffs in anticipation of a rise in prices—a common and reviled practice. In Black Book, 578, Middleton has the Devil 'shift' into 'the habit of a covetous barn-cracking farmer'.
18 maw stomach
20 dastard despicable coward
22 derive to show the derivation or pedigree
23 repugn to fight against, to resist or repel
24 drab prostitute
32 pronouncing proclaiming authoritatively
38 lists place of combat 42 speckled bearing the marks of moral or physical infection

47 blains inflammatory swellings
49 carbuncles inflammatory, malignant tumour, caused by inflammation of the skin
50 Saracens' belonging to Turks or Muslims; see Breton, Wonders Worth the Hearing (1602): 'a Sarazins face . . . his eyes like a Smithes forge'
55 vanished caused to disappear
56 tapsters those who draw the beer in public houses chamberlains attendants at an inn ostlers those who tend to horses at an inn

The Meeting of Gallants At an Ordinarie.

Darest thou contend with me, thou freckled harlot,
 And match thy dirty glories with the splendour
 Of kingly tragedies acted by me?
 60 When I have dyed the green stage of the field
 Red with the blood of monarchs and rich states,
 How many dukes and earls have I drunk up
 At one courageous rouse? O summer-devil,
 Thou wast but made as ratsbane to kill bawds,
 65 To poison drunkards, vomiting out their souls
 Into the bulk of hell, to infect the corps Of pewter-buttoned sergeants. Such as these Venom whole realms; and as physicians say,
 Poisons with poison must be forced away.

PESTILENCE

70 War, twit not me with double-damnèd bawds,
 Or prostituted harlots, I leave them
 For my French nephew, he reigns over these:
 I'll show you both how I excel you both.
 Who ever read that usurers died in war
 75 Grasping a sword, or in an iron year, Languished with famine? But by me surprised
 Even in their countinghouses, as they sat
 Amongst their golden hills: when I have changed
 Their gold into dead tokens, with the touch 80 Of my pale-spotted and infectious rod,
 When with a sudden start and ghastly look,
 They have left counting coin, to count their flesh,
 And sum up their last usury on their breasts,
 All their whole wealth, locked in their bony chests.

WAR

85 Are usurers then the proudest acts thou played'st?
 Pack-penny fathers, covetous rooting moles,
 That have their gold thrice higher than their souls:
 Is this the top of all thy glorious laughers,
 To aim them at my princely massacres?
 90 Poor dame of Pestilence, and hag of Famine,
 I pity your weak furies.

FAMINE

O I could eat you both,

I am so torn with hunger and with rage.
 What, is not flinty Famine, gasping dearth,
 Worthy to be in rank with dusty War
 And little Pestilence? Are not my acts 95 More stony-pitiless than thine, or thine?
 What is't to die stamped full of drunken wounds,
 Which makes a man reel quickly to his grave,
 Without the sting of torments, or the sense
 Of chewing death by piecemeal? Undone and done, 100 In the fourth part of a poor short minute?
 'Tis but a bloody slumber, a red dream,
 Not worthy to be named a torturing death.
 Nor thine, thou most infectious city dame,
 That for thy pride art plagued, bear'st the shape
 105 Of running Pestilence; those which thou strikest
 Wear death within few days upon their hearts,
 Or else presage amendment. When I reign,
 Heaven puts on a brass, to be as hard in blessing
 As the earth fruitless in increasing. O
 110 I rack the veins and sinews, lank the lungs,
 Freeze all the passages, plough up the maw:
 My torment lingers like a suit in law.
 What are you both to me? Insolent evils.
 Join both your furies, they weigh light to mine.
 115 And what art thou, War, that so want'st thy good?
 But like a barber-surgeon that lets blood.

WAR Out, Lenten harlot.
 PESTILENCE
 Out on you both, and if all matter fails,
 I'll show my glory in these following tales.
 120

Finis

The Meeting of Gallants at an Ordinary
Where the Fat Host tells Tales at the upper end of the Table
 SIGNOR SHUTTLECOCK What, Signor Jinglespur, the first gallant I met in Paul's, since the one-and-thirty day, or the decease of July, 125 and I may fitly call it the decease, for there deceased above three hundred that day—a shrewd prologue, marry, to the tragedy that followed. And yet I speak somewhat improperly

61 states aristocrats
 63 rouse bout of drinking summer-devil both an ironic phrase (like 'fair weather friend') and a reference to the fact that plague was most active during summer
 64 bawds panders
 66 bulk hold of a ship or main body or nave of a church corps punning on the corps, 'body', of sergeants and the bodies of the individual officers
 68 Venom to injure by means of venom 72 French nephew the so-called 'French disease', i.e., syphilis
 75 iron harsh, cruel 79 tokens spots on the body indicating disease, esp. the plague
 86 Pack-penny fathers old misers

88 laughters subjects or matters for laughter
 97 stamped crushed by stamping
 100 chewing also corroding, wearing down
 106 running suppurating
 109 brass a type of hardness, insensibility;
 also a sepulchral tablet of brass... laid down on the floor or set up against the wall of a church
 111 lank make shrunken or shrivelled 112 plough up the maw tear up the stomach
 117 barber-surgeon barbers were also practitioners in surgery and dentistry 118 Lenten Famine is 'Lenten' because of Lent's association with fasting.
 123 Host here an innkeeper upper... Table the best company occupies the upper end, as distinct from the part of the table below the salt-cellar

124 SHUTTLECOCK small piece of cork, or similar light material, fitted with a crown or circle of feathers, used in the games of battledore, shuttlecock, and badminton.
 In Hubburd, 376-8, Middleton describes a gallant whose 'head was dressed up in white feathers like a shuttlecock, which agreed... well with his brain, being nothing but cork'.
Jinglespur referring to the fashionable wearing of spurs; in Hubburd, 417-18, one gallant 'walked the chamber with such a pestilent jingle, that his spurs over-squeaked the lawyer' 126-7 deceased above three hundred 1,396 died of plague during the last week of July 1603 (the Bills of Mortality provide only the weekly death-toll) 127 shrewd malignant, ominous

The Meeting of Gallants At an Ordinarie.

- 130 to call it a prologue, because those that died were all out of their parts. What, dare you venture, Signor, at the latter end of a fray now? I mean not at a fray with swords and bucklers, but with sores and carbuncles. I protest, you are a strong-mettled gentleman, because you do not fear the dangerous featherbeds of London, nor to be tossed in a perilous blanket, or to lie in the fellows of those sheets that two dead bodies were wrapped in some three months before. Nay, I can tell you, there is many an honest house in London well stocked before with large linen, where now remains not above two sheets and a half, and so the good man of the house driven to lie in the one sheet for shift, till the pair be washed and dried: for you know, ten wound out of one house must for shame carry five pair of sheets with them, being confined and put to board-wages—the only knight's policy to save charges in victuals. But soft, Signor, what may he be that stalked by us now in a ruinous suit of apparel, with his page out at elbows? 'Tis a strange sight in Paul's, Signor, methinks, to see a broken page follow a seam-rent master.
- 135
140
145
150
155
- SIGNOR JINGLESPUR What, do you wonder at that sight now? 'Tis a limb of the fashion, and as commendable to go ragged after a plague as to have an ensign full of holes and tatters after a battle. And I have seen five hundred of the same rank in apparel, for most of your choice and curious gallants came up in clothes, because they thought it very dangerous to deal with satin this plague-time, being devil enough without the plague. Besides, there hath been a great dearth of tailors, the property of whose deaths were wonderful, for they were taken from hell to heaven. All these were motives sufficient to persuade gentlemen, as they loved their lives, to come up in their old suits, and be very respective and careful how they
- 129–30 out of their parts both out of their bodily parts (i.e., dead) and breaking the illusion of the stagey roles they assumed in life
- 131 bucklers small round shields
- 132 carbuncles boil-like sores
- 133 dangerous featherbeds On 19 January 1604, the Venetian Ambassador observed that the plague showed signs of increasing because of the carelessness with which the bedding and clothes of plague-victims were being used by the living. In fact, while the cloth itself was harmless, cotton and wool often harboured infective fleas.
- 134 tossed in a perilous blanket The proverbial punishment of being tossed in a blanket is exacerbated here by the peril of infection.
- 138 two sheets and a half i.e., one and a half pairs
- 142 board-wages wages which allowed servants only to keep themselves supplied with food
- 145 out at elbows proverbial
- 148 limb of the fashion a punning phrase, referring to the page's elbow, the page himself (limb=young rascal), and the page and master together as the apogee of fashion
- 149 ensign flag
- 151 curious careful as to the standard of excellence
- 152 clothes i.e., their own clothes
- 153 satin playing on Satan
- 156 hell the tailor's 'hell', into which cuttings were thrown
- 158 respective careful
- 159–60 Birchen Lane running north from Lombard Street to Cornhill, was occupied chiefly by drapers and second-hand clothes dealers
- 161 Charybdis...Scylla the monstrous whirlpool and the six-headed monster between which Odysseus must pass; the names and the perils are here reversed (Charydis is the whirlpool that 'swallows' ships)
- 162 bombast cotton wool used as padding for clothes
- 164 wings...doublets A doublet was a closely fitting garment for the upper body; 'wings' at the armholes hid the points which tied the sleeves to the garment, and 'skirts' were the flared bottom to which the hose were attached.
- 165 liberties areas in the City not under its authority
St Tooles Parish St Olave's Parish; James Bamford, the minister of the parish, wrote that 2,640 died between 7 May and 13 October
- 160 make themselves new ones. And to venture upon a Birchen Lane hose and doublet, were even to shun the villainous jaws of Charybdis and fall into the large swallow of Scylla, the devouring catchpole of the sea: for their bombast is wicked enough in the best and soundest season, and there is as much peril between the wings and the skirts of one of their doublets as in all the liberties of London, take St Tooles Parish, and all the most infected places of England.
- 165
170
175
180
185
- Well, I have almost marred their market, for gentlemen especially, those that love to smell sweet, for they are the worst milliners in a kingdom, and their suits bear the mustiest perfume of anything breathing, unless it were an usurer's nightcap again. And indeed that scent's worse than the strong breath of Ajax, where his sevenfold shield is turned to a stool with a hole in it. But see yonder, Signor Stramazon and Signor Kickshaw now of a sudden alighted in Paul's with their dirty boots. Let's encounter them at the fifth pillar; in them you shall find my talk verified, and the fashion truly pictured. What, Signor, both well met upon the old worn brass, the moon hath had above six great bellies since we walked here last together, and lain in as often. Methinks, Signors, this middle of Paul's looks strange and bare, like a long-haired gentleman new polled, washed and shaved. And I may fitly say shaved, for there was never a lusty shaver seen walking here this half year; especially if he loved his life, he would revolt from Duke Humphrey, and rather be a wood-cleaver in the country than a chest-breaker in London. But what gallants march up a pace now, Signors, how are the high ways filled to London?
- SIGNOR SHUTTLECOCK Every man's head here is full of the Proclamation, and the honest black gentleman the Term hath
- 172 Ajax playing on 'a jakes', a privy
- 173 Stramazon a vertical downward cut in fencing Kickshaw from French quelque chose; a trifle
- 177 the old worn brass The condition of the brass is explained in Black Book, 86–7: 'with their heavy trot and iron stalk | They have worn off the brass in the mid-walk'.
- 180 polled cropped or sheared
- 183 Duke Humphrey Duke Humphrey's Walk was a part of St Paul's Church on the south side of the nave, where there was a monument supposed to be that of Duke Humphrey of Gloucester. From the custom of persons in want of a dinner taking themselves to St Paul's to see if they could meet with someone who would invite them arose the phrase 'to dine with Duke Humphrey', which meant to do without dinner.
- 184 wood-cleaver wood-cutter chest-breaker a breaker of money-chests, a spendthrift
- 187–8 Proclamation probably that issued 11 January 1604 announcing the king's intention to summon Parliament
- 188 Term the period appointed for the sitting of the courts of law. Hilary Term was held at Westminster from 23

The Meeting of Gallants

- 190 kept a great hall at Westminster again. All the taverns in Kings Street will be emperors—inns and alehouses at least marquises apiece. Now cooks begin to make more coffins than carpenters, and bury more whole meat than sextons; few bells are heard
- 195 knights besides old John Clapper's, the bellman's. And, gentlemen, 'twas time for you to come, for I know many an honest tradesman that would have come down to you else, and set up their shops in the country, had you not ventured up the sooner; and he that would have braved it, and been a vainglorious silken ass all the last summer, might have made a suit of satin cheaper in the plague-time, than a suit of marry-muff in the
- 200 term-time. There was not so much velvet stirring as would have been a cover to a little book in octavo, or seamed a lieutenant's buff-doublet. A French-hood would have been more wondered at in London than the Polonians with their long-tailed gaberdines. And which was most lamentable, there was never a gilt spur to be seen all the Strand over, never a feather wagging in all Fleet Street, unless some country fore-horse came by, by mere chance, with a rain-beaten feather in his costrill, the street looking for all the world like a Sunday morning at six
- 205 of the clock, three hours before service, and the bells ringing all about London as if the Coronation day had been half a year long.
- SIGNOR STRAMAZON Trust me, gentlemen, a very sore discourse.
- SIGNOR SHUTTLECOCK I could tell you now the miserable state and
- 210 pitiful case of many tradesmen whose wares lay dead on their hands by the burying of their servants, and how those were held especially very dangerous and perilous trades that had any woollen about them, for the infection being for the most part a Londoner, loved to be lapped warm, and therefore was said to skip into woollen clothes, and lie smothering in a shag-haired rug, or an old-fashioned coverlid. To confirm which, I have
- 215 heard of some this last summer that would not venture into an upholsterer's shop amongst dangerous rugs and feather-bed-ticks, no, although they had been sure to have been made aldermen when they came out again. Such was their infectious conceit of a harmless necessary coverlid, and would stop their foolish noses when they passed through Watling Street by a rank of woollen drapers. And this makes me call to memory the strange and wonderful dressing of a coach that scudded through London the ninth of August, for I put the day in my table-book because it was worthy the registering.
- 220 This fearful, pitiful coach was all hung with rue from the top to the toe of the boot, to keep the leather and the nails from infection. The very nostrils of the coach-horses were stopped with herb-grace, that I pitied the poor beasts being almost windless, and having then more grace in their noses than their master had in all his bosom, and thus they ran through Cornhill just in the middle of the street, with such a violent trample as if the Devil had been coachman.
- SIGNOR KICKSHAW A very excellent folly, that the name of the plague should take the wall of a coach, and drive his worship down into the channel.
- 225 But see how we have lost ourselves. Paul's is changed into gallants, and those which I saw come up in old taffeta doublets yesterday are slipped into nine yards of satin today.
- SIGNOR STRAMAZON And, Signors, we in especial care have sent our pages to inquire out a pair of honest clean tailors, which are hard to be found because there was such a number of botchers the last summer. And I think it one of Hercules's Labours to find two whole tailors about London that hath not been plagued for their stealing, or else for sowing of false seeds, which peep out before their seasons.
- 230 SIGNOR JINGLESPUR But what, dare you venture to an ordinary? Hark, the quarter-jacks are up for eleven. I know an honest host about London that hath barrelled up news for gallants, like
- January to 12 February; Michaelmas Term, 10 October–28 November, had in part been adjourned to Winchester on account of plague in London.
- 189 Westminster the courts of law
- 189–90 Kings Street main thoroughfare from the Court of St James's to Westminster; narrow and ill-paved
- 191 coffins in cookery, a pie crust
- 192 sextons church-officers responsible for the upkeep of the building, also for bell-ringing and grave-digging
- 193 John Clapper's a generic name for a bellman
- 199 marry-muff a cheap fabric
- 201 octavo one of the smaller formats in printing, each page being one eighth of a sheet
- 202 buff-doublet a close-fitting leather garment with detachable sleeves
- French-hood a head covering for women, pleated, of velvet, tissue, or other silk
- 203 Polonians the Polish ambassador and his retinue were in London in December 1603
- 203–4 gaberdines long coats, worn loose or girdled, with longsleeves
- 205 Strand running west from Temple Bar to Charing Cross; fashionable residential area
- 206 Fleet Street running west from the bottom of Ludgate Hill to Temple Bar; the Inns of Court and houses of many nobles along the Strand made Fleet Street a fashionable suburb
- 207 costrill head
- 209 bells ringing the bells rang for those dead from plague
- 210 Coronation day the coronation of King James took place 25 July 1603
- 214–15 wares . . . servants i.e., the wares were thought to be infectious and so were unsaleable
- 219 shag-haired shaggy, having a long, rough nap
- 222–3 feather-bed-ticks cases or covers containing feathers or the like, forming mattresses or pillows
- 225 conceit idea
- 226 Watling Street ran east from the south-east corner of St Paul's Churchyard; the principal inhabitants were drapers, retailers of woollen cloths.
- 230 table-book pocket notebook
- 231 rue In The Herbal (1597), John Gerard writes, 'The leaves of rue eaten with the kernels of walnuts or figs stamped together and made into a mass or paste, is good against all evil airs, the pestilence or plague'.
- 232 boot uncovered space on or by the steps on each side
- 234 herb-grace another name for rue
- 236 Cornhill running east from the end of the Poultry past the Royal Exchange to Leadenhall Street
- 240–1 take . . . channel City streets, usually unpaved, slanted down from the walls of the houses to a channel running down the centre; the wall-side was cleaner and so to be preferred, but here 'his worship' rides in the muddy channel because of his fear of the infection.
- 242–3 Paul's . . . gallants i.e., Paul's is full of gallants
- 247 botchers tailors who do repairs; unskilful workmen
- 250 sowing of false seeds playing on sow/sew and seed/seam
- 253 quarter-jacks mechanical figures of men which strike the quarter-hours on a bell outside a clock

The Meeting of Gallants At an Ordinarie.

255 pickled oysters; marry, your ordinary will cost you two shillings, but the tales that lie in brine will be worth sixpence of the money. For you know 'tis great charges to keep tales long, and therefore he must be somewhat considered for the laying out of his language. For blind Gue, you know, has sixpence at the 260 least for groping in the dark.

SIGNOR STRAMAZON Yea, but Signor Jinglespur, you see we are altogether unfurnished for an ordinary till the tailor cut us out and new mould us. And to rank amongst gallants in old apparel, why their very apish pages would break jests upon our elbows, 265 and domineer over our worn doublets most tyrannically.

SIGNOR JINGLESPIR Puh, Signor Stramazon, you turn the bias the wrong way, you doubt where there is no doubt. I will conduct you to an ordinary where you shall eat private amongst Essex gentlemen of your fashioned rank in apparel, who as yet wait 270 for fresh clothes, as you for new tailors, and account it more commendable to come up in seam-rent suits and whole bodies, than to have infectious torn bodies and sound suits.

SIGNOR KICKSHAW If it be so, Signor (hark! a quarter strikes) we are for you. We will follow you, for I love to hear tales when a 275 merry corpulent host bandies them out of his flop-mouth. But how far must we march now like tattered soldiers, after a fray, to their nuncheons?

SIGNOR SHUTTLECOCK Why, if you throw your eyes but a little before you, you may see the sign and token that beckons his guest to 280 him. Do you hear the clapper of his tongue now?

SIGNOR STRAMAZON 'Sfoot, the mad bulchin squeaks shriller than the saunce bell at Westminster.

SIGNOR SHUTTLECOCK Nay, now you shall hear him ring lustily at our entrance. Stop your ears if you love them, for one of his 285 words will run about your brains louder than the drum at the Bear Garden.

Entering into the Ordinary

HOST What, gallants, are you come, are you come? Welcome, gentlemen, I have news enough for you all, welcome again, and 290 again: I am so fat and pury, I cannot speak loud enough, but I am sure you hear me, or you shall hear me. Welcome, welcome, gentlemen, I have tales and quails for you. Seat yourselves, gallants. (Enter boys and beards with dishes and platters.) I will be with you again in a trice ere you look for me.

SIGNOR SHUTTLECOCK Now, Signors, how like you mine host? Did 295
I not tell you he was a mad, round knave, and a merry one, too? And if you chance to talk of fat Sir John Oldcastle, he will tell you he was his great-grandfather, and not much unlike him in paunch, if you mark him well by all descriptions. And see 300 where he appears again; he told you he would not be long from you. Let his humour have scope enough, I pray, and there is no doubt but his tales will make us laugh ere we be out of our porridge. How now, mine Host?

HOST O my gallant of gallants, my top and top gallant, how many horses hast thou killed in the country with the hunting of 305 harlotries? Go to, was I with you, you mad wags? And I have been a merry knave this six-and-forty years, my bullies, my boys.

SIGNOR KICKSHAW Yea, but my honest-larded Host, where be these tales now? 310

HOST I have them at my tongue's end, my gallant bullies of five-and-twenty, my dainty liberal landlords, I have them for you.
You shall never take me unprovided for, gentlemen, I keep them like anchovies to relish your drink well. Stop your mouths, gallants, and I will stuff your ears, I warrant you, and first I 315 begin with a tipsy vintner in London.

Of a Vintner in London, dying in a humour

This discourse that follows, gentlemen-gallants, is of a light-headed vintner who, scorning to be only drunk in his own cellar, would get up betimes in the morning to be down of his 295 nose thrice before evening. He was a man of all taverns, and excellent musician at the sackbut, and your only dancier of the canaries. This strange wine-sucker had a humour this time of infection to feign himself sick, and indeed he had swallowed down many tavern-tokens and was infected much with the 300 plague of drunkenness. But howsoever, sick he would be, for the humour had possessed him, when to the comforting of his poor heart, he poured down eleven shillings in Rose of Solace, more than would have cheered all the sick persons in the pest-house. And yet for all that he felt himself ill at his stomach 330

259 blind Gue a contemporary clown 266-7 bias the wrong way referring to the game of bowls; bowls either contained an off-centre lead weight or were shaped so that they ran obliquely 272 bodies punning on 'bodice' 275 flop-mouth variant of flap-mouth: a mouth with broad, hanging lips
276 tattered punning on 'tottered', unsteady 277 nuncheons light refreshment taken between meals; a lunch 281 'Sfoot God's foot
bulchin bull-calf 282 saunce bell sanctus bell, rung at the Sanctus at Mass; in post-Reformation times often used to summon the people to church
285-6 drum . . . Garden The Bear Garden, on the Bankside, Southwark (next to the Globe) was the primary arena for bear-baiting.

290 pury short-winded, also fat
293 beards men
297 Sir John Oldcastle an allusion to Shakespeare's Falstaff, originally named Oldcastle. Oldcastle's descendants, the Cobham family, forced the change of name by 1598, but 'Oldcastle' evidently persisted in the public mind.
302-3 ere . . . porridge before we have finished our soup
305-6 hunting of harlotries pursuing harlots or, more generally, jests and scurrility
312 liberal generous, high-born 317 humour eccentric or unusual temperament, a sense popularized by Ben Jonson's 'humour' comedies
320 betimes early 320-1 down of his nose the phrase is difficult, but context makes clear that it means 'drunk'

322 sackbut both a musical instrument like a trumpet and also a butt of sack (i.e., a cask of wine)
323 canaries both a lively dance and also a light sweet wine from the Canary Islands 324-5 swallowed . . . tavern-tokens taverntokens were given in change by a tavernkeeper, and could be used to buy drinks;
hence, the phrase means to get drunk 328 Rose of Solace rosa solis ('rose of the sun'), a cordial made from or flavoured with the plant sundew and also containing spirits such as brandy 329-30 pest-house The London pest-house was in the parish of St Giles-without-Cripplegate. Infected persons were also housed in private buildings appropriated for the purpose or, more usually, shut in their own dwellings along with the healthy.

The Meeting of Gallants

335 afterwards, wherefore his request was, reporting himself very feeble, to have two men hired with sixpence apiece to transport him over the way to his friend's house. But when he saw he was deluded and had nobody to carry him, he flung his gown about himself as courageously as the best stalker in Europe. Where being alighted not long after, he rounded one in the ear in private, and bade that the great bell should be tolled for him, the great bell of all, and with all possible speed that might be. 340 That done, he gagged open the windows, and when the bell was tolling, cried, 'Louder yet; I hear thee not, Master Bell.' Then, strutting up and down the chamber, spake to the audience in this wise:

345 'Is't possible a man should walk in such perfect memory and have the bell toll for him? Sure I never heard of any that did the like before me.'

Thus, by tolling of the great bell, all the parish rang of him, diverse opinions went of him, and not without cause or matter to work upon. In conclusion, within few days after, he was 350 found to be the man indeed whose part he did but play before. His pulses were angry with him, and began to beat him, all his pores fell out with him, the bell tolled for him in sadness, rung out in gladness, and there was the end of his drunken madness. Such a ridiculous humour of dying was never heard of before, 355 and I hope never shall be again, now he is out of England.

SIGNOR STRAMAZON This was a strange fellow, mine Host, and worthy Stow's Chronicle.

HOST Nay, gallants, I'll fit you, and now I will serve in another as good as vinegar and pepper to your roast beef.

360 SIGNOR KICKSHAW Let's have it; let's taste on it, mine Host, my noble fat actor.

How a young fellow was even bespoke and jested to death by harlots

365 There was a company of intolerable light women assembled together, who all the time of infection lived upon citizens' servants—young novices that made their masters' bags die of the plague at home, whilst they took sanctuary in the country. Mistake me not, I mean not the best rank of servants, but underlings and boggish sots such as have not wit to distinguish 370 companies, and avoid the temptation of harlots, which make men more miserable than Derrick. These light-heeled wagtails, who were armed (as they term it) against all weathers of plague and pestilence, carrying always a French supersedeas about them for the sickness, were determined, being half tipsy and as light now in their heads as anywhere else, to execute a jest 375 upon a young, unfruitful fellow which should have had the banns of matrimony asked between him and a woman of their religion, which would have proved bane indeed, and worse than ratsbane—to have been coupled with a harlot. But note the event of a bespeaking jest: these women gave it out that 380 he was dead, sent to the sexton of the church in all haste to have the bell rung out for him, which was suddenly heard, and many coming to enquire of the sexton, his name was spread over all the parish (he little dreaming of that dead report being as then in perfect health and memory). On the morrow, as the 385 custom is, the searchers came to the house where he lay to discharge their office, asking for the dead body and in what room it lay. Who, hearing himself named, in such a cold shape almost struck dead indeed with their words, replied, with a hasty countenance (for he could play a ghost well), that he 390 was the man. At which, the searchers started, and thought he had been new risen from under the table, when, vomiting out some two or three deep-fetched oaths, he asked what villain it was which made that jest of him. But whether the conceit struck cold to his heart or whether the strumpets were witches, 395 I know not (the next degree to a harlot is a bawd or a witch), but this youngster danced the shaking of one sheet within few days after, and then the searchers lost not their labours, and therefore I conclude thus:

'That Fate lights sudden that's bespoke before;
A harlot's tongue is worse than a plague-sore.'

[SIGNOR JINGLESPUR] Well rhymed, my little round and thick Host, have you any more of these in your fat budget?

HOST I have them, my gallant bullies, and here comes one fitly for sauce to your capon. 405

Of one that fell drunk off from his horse, taken for a Londoner, dead

In a certain country town not far off, there was a boon companion lighted amongst good fellows, as they call good fellows nowadays, which are those that can drink best, for your 410 excellent drunkard is your notable gallant, and he that can pass away clear without paying the host in the chimney corner, he 334 nobody to carry him No one was willing to touch him because he was thought to be sick with plague.

336 stalker robber; also an actor, the sense of Middleton's use in Black Book, 415-18: 'The spindle-shank spiders... went stalking over his head as if they had been conning of Tamburlaine'
337 rounded whispered
357 Stow's Chronicle John Stow's Chronicles of England, first published in 1580
358 fit provide what is fit
362 bespoke bespeak: to speak (a person) into some state
364 light unchaste
369 boggish inclined to bluster or brag

369-70 distinguish companies distinguish between good and bad company 371 Derrick the hangman at Tyburn, c.1600 wagtails harlots
373 supersedeas writ commanding the stay of legal proceedings; used figuratively for 'Something which stops, stays, or checks'. For the idea that syphilis protects one from plague, see Black Book, 366-9: 'Sergeant Carbuncle, one of the plague's chief officers, dares not venture within three yards of an harlot because Monsieur Dry-bone the Frenchman is a ledger before him.'
377-8 woman of their religion i.e., a prostitute

380 event outcome
386 searchers officers responsible for examining corpses in order to determine if the person had died of plague
390 hasty quick-tempered
397 danced... sheet playing on the popular ballad 'Can you dance the shaking of the sheets?'
403 budget wallet
412 host... chimney corner The joke is perhaps that the chimney corner was the place of the old and infirm—a depiction of an innkeeper quite unlike the high-spirited Host.

The Meeting of Gallants

415 is the king of cans and the emperor of alehouses. This fellow, tying his horse by the bridle upon the red lattice of the window, could not bridle himself so well, but afterward proved more beast than his horse, being so overwhelmed with whole cans, hoops, and such drunken devices that his English crown weighed lighter by ten grains at his coming forth than at his 420 entering in. And it was easier now for his horse to get up atop of Paul's than he to get up upon his horse. The stirrup played mock holiday with him and made a fool of his foot. At last, with much ado, he fell flounce into the saddle and away he scudded out at town's end, where he thought every tree he saw had been 425 rising up to stop him. So strangely are the senses of drunkards tossed and transported that at the very instant they think the world's drowned again; so this staggering monster imagined he was riding upon a sea-mare. But before he was ten gallops from the town-side, his brain played him a jade's trick and 430 kicked him over. Down he fell. When the horse, soberer than the master, stood still and wondered at him for a beast, but durst not say so much. By and by, passengers passing to and fro, beholding his lamentable downfall, called out to one another to view that pitiful spectacle. People flocked about him more and more, but none durst venture within two poles' length, nor 435 some within the length of Paul's. Everyone gave up his verdict, and all concluding in one that he was some coward Londoner who thought to fly from the sickness, which, as it seemed, made after him amain and struck him beside his horse. Thus all agreed in one tale, some bemoaning the death of the man, 440 othersome wishing that all curmudgeons, penny-fathers, and fox-furred usurers were served of the same sauce, who taking their flight out of London, left poor silkweavers, tapsters, and waterbearers to fight it out against sore enemies. In a word, all the town was in an uproar. The constable standing aloof 445 off, stopping his nose like a gentleman-usher, durst not come within two stones' cast by no means—no, if he might presently have been made constable in the hundred. Every townsman at his wise nonplus, nothing but looking and wondering, yet some wiser than some, and those I think were the watchmen, 450 told them flatly and plainly that the body must be removed in any case, and that extempore. It would infect all the air round about else. These whoresons seemed to have some wit yet, and their politic counsel was took and embraced amongst them, but all the cunning was how to remove him without taking the wind of him. Whereupon, two or three weatherwise stinkards plucked up handfuls of grass and tossed them 455 into the air, and then whooping and hollowing, told them the wind blew sweetly for the purpose, for it stood full on his back-part. Then all agreed to remove him with certain long instruments, sending home for hooks and strong ropes, as if they had been pulling down a house of fire. But this was rather a tilt-boat cast away and all the people drowned within.

 To conclude, these long devices were brought to remove him without a writ; when by mere chance passed by one of the wisest of the town next the constable, for so it appeared after-460 wards by the hotness of his device, who being certified of the story and what they went about to do, brake into these words openly:

'Why, my good fellows, friends and honest neighbours, trow you what you venture upon, will you needs draw the plague to 470 you, by hook or by crook? You will say perhaps your poles are long enough. Why, you never heard or read that long devices take soonest infection, and that there is no vilder thing in the world than the smell of a rope to bring a man to his end, that you all know.

'Wherefore, to avoid all further inconveniences, dangerous and infectious, hearken to my exploit. If you drag him along the fields, our hounds may take the scent of him, a very dangerous matter. If you bury him in the fields, a hundred to one but the ground will be rotten this winter. Wherefore, your only way 480 must be to let him lie as he doth, without moving, and every good fellow to bring his armful of straw, heap it upon him and round about him, and so in conclusion burn out the infection as he lies.'

Every man threw up his old cap at this, straw was brought 485 and thrown upon him by armfuls. All this while, the drowned fellow lay still without moving, dreaming of full cans, tapsters, and beer barrels, when presently they put fire to the straw, which kept such a bragging and a cracking that up started the drunkard like a thing made of fireworks, the flame playing with 490 his nose, and his beard looking like flaming Apollo's, as our

413 cans drinking-vessels

414 red lattice a window of red lattice-work;
a commonplace feature of alehouses

417 hoops the bands on a drinking-pot;
hence the liquor between two bands crown both 'coin' and 'head'; the wordplay continues in the following line in the allusion to the illegal clipping of precious metal coins

419-20 horse... Paul's Morocco, the famous stunt-horse, climbed the stairs to the top of the tower in 1601

427 sea-mare a nonce word (not in OED)

428 jade's trick jade: a horse of inferior breed

438 amain with full force

440 curmudgeons misers

penny-fathers misers

441 fox-furred usurers usurers are often depicted wearing fur

445 gentleman-usher gentleman acting as usher to a person of superior rank

447 constable in the hundred 'high constable', an officer of a large administrative district or hundred, a subdivision of a county or shire, having its own court

448 at his wise nonplus wise = manner, and nonplus = a state in which no more can be said or done; hence, the phrase means 'perplexed'

455 taking the wind a sailing and hunting term meaning to be to the windward of something

457 hollowing shouting

461 pulling... fire Appropriate to the context, the practice of pulling down houses to stop the spread of the fire was used in the suburbs or villages around London rather than in London itself, where it was impractical owing to both the stone construction and proximity of dwellings to each other.

462 tilt-boat a large rowing boat having a tilt or awning, formerly used on the Thames, especially as a passenger boat between London and Gravesend

477 exploit enterprise

491 flaming (a stock epithet for Apollo in Renaissance poetry)

poets please to term it, who burst into these reeling words when he spied the fire hissing about his pate:

‘What, is the top of Paul’s on fire again? Or is there a fire in the Paul-Head? Why then, drawers, quench me with double beer.’

The folks in the town all in amaze, some running this way, some that way, knew him at last by his staggering tongue, for he was no far dweller, though they imagined he had dwelt at London. So, stopping his horse, which ran away from the fiery planet his master as though the Devil had backed him, everyone laughed at the jest, closed it up in an alehouse, where before evening the most part of them were all as drunk as himself.

And now I return to more pleasant arguments, gentlemen-gallants, to make you laugh ere you be quite out of your capon. This that I discourse of now is a pretty, merry accident that happened about Shoreditch, although the intent was sad and tragical, yet the event was mirthful and pleasant. The Goodman (or rather as I may fittier term him, the badman of a house), being sorely pestered with the death of servants, and to avoid all suspicion of the pestilence from his house above all others, did very craftily and subtly compound with the masters of the pest-cart to fetch away by night as they passed by all that should chance to die in his house, having three or four servants down at once, and told them that he knew one of them would be ready for them by that time the cart came by. And to clear his house of all suspicion, the dead body should be laid upon a stall, some five or six houses off, where there they should entertain him and take him in amongst his dead companions. To conclude, night drew onward and the servant concluded his life, and according to their appointment was installed to be made knight of the pest-cart. But here comes in the excellent jest, gentlemen-gallants of five-and-twenty. About the dark and pitiful season of the night, a shipwreck drunkard (or one drunk at the sign of The Ship), new cast from the shore of an alehouse and his brains sore beaten with the cruel tempests of ale and beer, fell founce upon a low stall hard by the house. There being little difference in the carcass, for the other was dead, and he was dead-drunk (the worse death of the twain), there taking up his drunken lodging, and the pest-cart coming by, they made no more ado, but taking him for the dead body, placed him amongst his companions, and away they hurried with him to the pest-house. But there is an old proverb, and now confirmed true—a drunken man never takes harm. To the approbation of which, for all his lying with infectious bedfellows, the next morning a little before he should be buried, he stretched and yawned as wholesomely as the best tinker in all Banbury, and returned to his old vomit again, and was drunk in Shoreditch before evening.

SIGNOR JINGLESPUR This was a pretty comedy of errors, my round Host.

HOST O my bullies, there was many such a part played upon the stage both of the city and the suburbs.

Moreover, my gallants, some did noble exploits whose names I shame to publish, in hiring porters and base vassals to carry their servants out in sacks to Whitechapel and such out-places, to poor men’s houses that work to them, and therefore durst do no otherwise but receive them, though to their utter ruins, and detestable noisomeness, fearing to displease them for their revenge afterwards, as in putting their work from them to others for their utter undoing. How many such pranks think you have been played in the same fashion only to entertain customers, to keep their shops open, and the foreheads of their doors from ‘Lord have mercy upon us’? Many I could set down here and publish them to the world, together with all their strange shifts and uncharitable devices.

Whereof one especially notable and politic may even lead you to the rest and drive you into imagination of many the like. For one to bury four or five persons out of his house, and yet neither the sexton of the same parish nor any else of his neighbours in the street where he dwells in to have intelligence of it (but all things be they never so lurking, break forth at the last). This being the cunning and close practice: politicly to indent with the sexton of some other church (as dwelling in one parish) to see the sexton of another by a pretty piece of silver, to bury all that die in the same house in his churchyard, which void all suspicion of the plague from his shop, which may be at the least some six or seven parish churches off. Or at another to practise the like—nothing but compounding with a ravenous sexton that lives upon dead carcasses. For no trades were so much in use as coffin-makers and sextons; they were the lawyers the last vacation and had their bountiful fees of their grave clients. Wherefore, they prayed as the country folks at Hertford did (if report be no liar) very impiously and 493 hissing hissing or whizzing

pate head

494 Paul’s on fire Paul’s steeple was destroyed by fire in 1561 and was never rebuilt; the church perished in the Great Fire of 1666.

495 Paul-Head tavern near Paul’s Chain, a lane running south from Paul’s Churchyard double strong

498 staggering stammering

506 ere...capon before you have finished the main course

508 Shoreditch parish in north-east London, lying south of Old Street, between City Road and Bethnal Green; a haunt of whores and bad characters generally

522–3 installed...pest-cart a jocular version of formal phrases such as ‘to be installed Knight of the Garter’, with a glance at the stall upon which the servant has been laid

539 tinker craftsman who ‘mend[ed] pots, kettles, and other household utensils’; held in low repute

Banbury market-town in Oxfordshire. Banbury tinkers had a proverbially bad reputation.

returned...vomit (proverbial)

541 comedy of errors probably an allusion to Shakespeare’s play

547 Whitechapel parish in London, east of Aldgate

554–5 foreheads of their doors Authorities marked infected dwellings with a red cross and fastened a paper with the inscription ‘Lord have mercy upon us’ on the lintel; infected houses were quarantined for twenty-eight days.

557 shifts stratagems

563 lurking secretive

564 close covert

565 indent enter into an engagement

565–7 sexton...churchyard The practice is close indeed: probably the citizen contracts with one sexton (i.e., gravedigger), not of the citizen’s own church, to arrange burial with still another sexton further away.

573 vacation period during which law courts are suspended

The Meeting of Gallants

barbarously, that the sickness might last till the last Christmas. And this was their uncharitable meanings and the unchristian effect of their wishes: that they might have the Term kept at Hertford, and the sextons their term still here in London. But 580 Winchester made a goose of Hertford and ended the strife. Thus, like monsters of nature, they wished in their barbarous hearts that their desires might take such effects, and for the greedy lucre of a few private and mean persons to suck up the life of thousands.

585 Many other marvellous events happened, both in the city and elsewhere. As, for example, in Dead Man's Place at St Mary Overies, a man-servant being buried at seven of the clock in the morning, and the grave standing open for more dead commodities, at four of the clock in the same evening, he was 590 got up alive again by strange miracle—which to be true and certain, hundreds of people can testify that saw him act like a country ghost in his white 'peckled sheet. And it was not a thing unknown on the other side that the countries were stricken, and that very grievously, many dying there. Many going thither 595 likewise fell down suddenly and died. Men on horseback riding thither, strangely stricken in the midst of their journeys, forced either to light off or fall off and die. And for certain and substantial report, many the last year were buried near unto highways in the same order, in their clothes as they were,

booted and spurred even as they lighted off. Rolled into ditches, pits and hedges so lamentably, so rudely and unchristianlike, that it would have made a pitiful and remorseful eye bloodshot to see such a ruthless and disordered object, and a true heart bleed outright—but not such a one as mine, gallants, for my heart bleeds nothing but alicant. How commonly we saw here 605 the husband and the wife buried together, a weeping spectacle containing much sorrow, how often were whole households emptied to fill up graves, and how sore the violence of that stroke was that struck ten persons out of one house, being a thing dreadful to apprehend and think upon, with many marvellous and strange accidents. But let not this make you sad, gallants. Sit you merry still. Here, my dainty bullies, I'll put you all in one goblet, and wash all these tales in a cup of sack.

Sit you merry still, gentlemen-gallants, your dish of tales is your best cheer, and to please you, my noble bullies, I would do that I did not this thirty years—caper, caper, my gallant boys, although I crack my shins and my guts sink a handful lower. I'll do't, my lusty lads, I'll do't.

With that, the Host gave a lazy caper and broke his shins for joy, the reckoning was appeased, the room discharged, and so I leave them in Paul's where I found them.
 620 Finis

579 Hertford county town of Hertfordshire, nineteen miles north of London. The inhabitants of Hertford are said to have prayed for the continuation of plague in London so that the law term, with its attendant business, would be moved to their town as it had been in 1592; however, part of Michaelmas Term 1603 was held in Winchester rather than Hertford.

580 Winchester made a goose a quibble: 'Winchester goose' is proverbial for 'a venereal disorder; a prostitute' (Tilley

G366)

586–92 As...sheet The same story appears in Thomas Dekker, The Wonderful Year (1603).

586–7 Dead...Overies an alley led from Deadman's Place to the Globe Playhouse near by; St Mary Overies was an ancient church on the west side of the Borough High Street, Southwark, just over London Bridge. It is now known as Southwark Cathedral.

592 'peckled speckled, spotted

605 allicant wine made at Alicante in Spain

614–22 Sit...them In the 1604 edition, this passage, although clearly intended as the conclusion, precedes the Host's tale of the 'merry accident...about Shoreditch' (506–8). In its position in the present edition, the passage constitutes an ending similar to that of Black Book (822–31). See Textual Notes.

617 crack ? bruise (on the furniture?), or induce cramps

620 reckoning was appeased bill was settled

PLATO'S CAP

Edited by Paul Yachnin

Plato's Cap is one of the most interesting mock-almanacs, or mock-prognostications, of the early seventeenth century. The subgenre of the mock-almanac, together with dramatic satires of the readers and authors of almanacs, represents a significant critique of popular superstition in the early modern period. In addition to Plato's Cap, the play No Wit/Help like a Woman's and the pamphlet The Owl's Almanac are examples of the two satirical forms. While burlesque almanacs developed a sceptical response to questionable beliefs, however, they did not come into being because certain forward-looking writers felt impelled to speak out against the 'science' of prognostication. There was a literature critical of the popularity of astrology and almanacs, but it argued on behalf of an austere faith that refused to spy on God's providence. In contrast with these Christian polemical texts, the mock-almanac, as well as the almanac itself, was a creation of the book-trade. Almanacs were periodical publications which owed their existence to market-place demand. For this reason, the re-use of certain elements was normal practice. The same predictions, the same practical information, the same engravings, and the same words of wisdom appeared again and again from one year to the next. Mock-almanacs also recirculated certain standard material. An important difference between the two forms was that whereas almanacs were marketed on the strength of the reputations of their authors, burlesque almanacs were anonymous, and for this reason were a commodity of the book-trade even more than the almanacs themselves. As a creation of the market in popular literature, the subgenre of the almanac parody was an authorless adjunct to the huge industry in legitimate almanacs.

Almanacs and mock-almanacs were texts in which high and low culture met. By 1600, almanacs were the most popular and populist of English books, even though, with their use of Latin and their conjuring with exotic authorities, they held out to their readers the attractions of elite culture and exotic knowledge. Burlesque almanacs attacked these pretensions, satirizing what 'Adam Fouleweather' calls 'the authentical censures of Albumazar and Ptolomey', and affirming the value of popular, native culture, everyday forms of language and normal ways of understanding the world. That is the underlying point of satirical prognostications which 'predict' what is already the normal state of affairs. 'But when the sun enters into Virgo', Adam Eavesdropper says, 'take heed, maids, that you have no daughters. I fear me there will be but a few virgins in the Whitefriars for I find by strange art that in suchlike places this year maidenheads will be cheaper than mackerels.'

Anonymity, the recirculation of conventional material, and the hybridization of high and low culture are central to an historical understanding of any mock-almanac, but an account of Plato's Cap needs also to consider Middleton's particular handling of the conventions of the form. While he did not violate the rules of the subgenre, he did play innovatively within its formal boundaries in order to create something original and expressive of his literary ambitions. The question that faced Middleton was twofold: how to make his mark in a form that prescribed anonymity? how to write in an original fashion when mock-almanacs depended on the repetition of material? To a large degree, he overcame the limitations of the form and made an original contribution to the subgenre. Indeed the issues are not all that different from those that concern historians of the Elizabethan and Jacobean drama, that much more extensive body of work which also was largely authorless, commercialized, conventional, and culturally hybrid. How did writers of Middleton's time make a name for themselves in commodified literary forms which enforced the alienation of the makers from the texts that they made?

A gentleman and for several years a student at Oxford, Middleton dedicated two early publications to wealthy aristocrats in an attempt to win patronage and perhaps high-level notice. Both these texts bear his name. They represent a bid to enter a patronage system that was distinct, at least notionally, from the business of writing for the commercial theatre and the popular press. But with Plato's Cap, Middleton descended to a lower level in the literary factory. The primary fact about the pamphlet is anonymity. When, in 1604, readers bought Plato's Cap from Jeffrey Chorlton's stall at the North door of St. Paul's, they were not looking for the work of a particular author. The title-page that no doubt was pinned up near the stall advertised 'PLATOES Cap. | Cast at this Yeare 1604, | being Leape-yeere', and identified the publisher and the place and date of publication. It made no mention of the author. Currency, social and astrological satire, and low price, rather than the mystique of Middletonian authorship, were the attractions of the pamphlet. This is not to suggest that Middleton was actually disallowed from naming himself on the title-page. It was rather that his name was not important. Nor is it likely that he was distraught at not being named or by not having his name in demand. He might have suffered pangs concerning his general situation, since he was, while not wealthy, yet nevertheless a gentleman who was ambitious in letters and life. More important than analysing his psychology, however, is understanding how his talent and intelligence, and his ambition, altered and enriched the form of the burlesque almanac.

While original in many ways, Plato's Cap did recirculate conventional material. Phrases, sentences, and paragraphs were lifted from a 1591 mock-prognostication, The Fearful and Lamentable Effects of Two Dangerous Comets, by 'Simon Smell-knave'. The Oxford English Dictionary tells us that the word 'plagiarism' was not in use before 1621, but there is no question that people knew what the practice was. In The Ant and the Nightingale, Middleton castigates those who, he claims, have pirated Thomas Nashe's work: 'Thy name they bury, having buried thee; | Drones eat thy honey—thou wert the true bee'. This is a complicated matter, because the use of other writers' work was a legitimate literary practice in certain circumstances, such as Ben Jonson's translation of Tacitus in Cordus's speech on freedom of expression in Sejanus (1605). Legitimate imitation required clear evidence of creative engagement with the imitated work. That is not the case in Plato's Cap, and Middleton's workmanlike use of the earlier pamphlet suggests the degree to which he was re-using rather than inventing the honey of literary imagination.

To be fair to Plato's Cap, however, it needs to be said again that borrowing was standard practice, and it needs to be pointed out that Middleton recirculated less material than did his fellow almanac-satirists. His borrowings are clustered in the concluding section, where they extend the length and broaden the social ambit of the pamphlet. Also, he was not the only writer to imitate Simon Smell-knave's Fearful and Lamentable Effects. Anthony Nixon's The Black Year (1606), as F. P. Wilson has documented, is exhaustively copied from Simon and several other texts. Indeed, not even Fearful and Lamentable Effects is wholly original. Simon himself borrowed from Adam Foulweather's A Wonderful... Astrological Prognostication (1591), although not so extensively as the others borrowed from him. Given the highly commercial conditions of production, what is most surprising is that so much of Plato's Cap is original.

One strength of Middleton's pamphlet is its wit. The usual humour of mock-almanacs depends on prophecies of the obvious: 'Mars being placed near unto the sun showeth that there shall be a great death among people', predicts A Wonderful... Astrological Prognostication, 'old women that can live no longer shall die of age'. Plato's Cap has its share of this: 'The bakers, woodmongers, butchers, and brewers shall fall to a mighty conspiracy this year, so that no man shall have bread, fire, flesh, or drink without credit or ready money.' While these jokes certainly embody a politics of plainness, much of the humour in Plato's Cap is more complex and funnier: 'Many men shall be so venturously disposed that they shall go into brothel-houses and yet come out again as honestly as when they went first in.' Much of it develops Nashe's exuberant and socially engaged style.

According to Middleton's Adam Eavesdropper, the sun's entry into Taurus foretells 'the deposing of Lent and the overthrow of salt salmon... and... the restoring again of heroic-valiant beef, that ancient and surly courtier that never appears without a mess of mustard, his gentleman-usher bareheaded before him'. The passing of the Lenten season becomes a political contest between the ethos of old-fashioned court culture and the survivalist economy of the country: 'Red herring may go hang himself then for a twelvemonth upon the rusty beam of some farmer's chimney, until the hungry ploughboys cut him down and quarter him.'

The value of Plato's Cap depends upon more than its superior sense of humour. While, like other mock-almanacs, it is written in prose and organized according to the astrological calendar, it is also unified poetically by Middleton's interweaving of theme and imagery. The pamphlet thematizes the hybridization of high and low culture that was central to almanacs and mock-almanacs. It does so through a pattern of imagery focused on 'the cap', a pattern that leads from the obtrusively hybrid title through to the mockery of 'foisting John', the well-known hat-maker whose shop in Paul's Churchyard was not far from Chorlton's bookstall. The title, Plato's Cap, yoked together classical with common, elite culture with the culture of the market-place. Plato was the quintessential exotic authority and high-culture figure whereas Adam Eavesdropper's 'button-cap' was old-fashioned and native. In 1593, Henry Chettle remembered Richard Tarlton by 'his suit of russet, his buttoned cap', and mourned his passing as the end of true mirth. The pamphlet develops an opposition between caps and hats - Adam 'put[s] off Plato's Cap' to the reader but 'the true Frenchman seldom doffs his hat'; 'old-fashioned honest cap[s]' are pitted against 'new-fashioned prodigal hat[s]'. This fashion contest between traditional, English, and popular caps and new-fangled, foreign, and courtly hats connects with Englishwomen who wear the fashion of the French bodice and who are 'a scorn and by-jest to all riotous nations'. Presiding over these images of cultural contest is the figure of 'Plato's cap' itself with its yoking of elite and common, foreign and native; it announces the pamphlet's own hybridization and playfully reflects on the commercial nature of mock-almanacs in general. They embody a traditional view of the world, but they do so in the latest fashion.

Plato's Cap also foregrounds authorship and issues of interpretation in ways that are unlike the straightforward style of address typical of mock-almanacs.

The title is a figure of emulation and therefore expressive of Middleton's literary ambition. It derives from a pamphlet by Middleton's friend and collaborator Thomas Dekker. In The Wonderful Year (1603), Dekker wrote: 'Plato's mirabilis annus (whether it be past already, or to come within these four years) may throw Plato's cap at mirabilis, for the title wonderful is bestowed upon 1603.' 'Plato's wondrous year', as Marlowe's Tamburlaine calls it, was thought to be the millennial conjunction when the planets would return to their original positions in the heavens. 'To cast one's cap at something' is to despair of overtaking it; since Plato casts his cap at it, 1604 'caps' even the wondrous year of the celestial return. The title is a boast: it suggests that the pamphlet itself 'caps' the form by outdoing all previous mock-almanacs. Middleton plays with 'cap' as both an actual cap and the pamphlet itself: 'there is great difference between reading and reading well', Adam says in the dedication, 'for those who read well have a good tongue of their own, and spoil nothing in the spelling, and to such I cast up my cap'. 'To cast up one's cap' is to rejoice, so Adam celebrates those who read competently. 'To cast up' also means to publish; hence what is being 'cast' is the pamphlet itself as well as its author's cap. Finally, 'cast up' means to vomit, a sense picked up later in the description of 'wine-suckers' who 'cast it up again before the vintner's face'. Middleton's wordplay is not only a compliment to the reader but also a sly impertinence. His playing on the word 'cast' allows him to vent some hostility towards his readers and to register some ambivalence about the work itself.

Adding to these expressions of ambivalence is the way that comic polysemy helps reconfigure reading practices. The pamphlet attempts to reorient the experience of reading a mock-prognostication from a straightforward relationship between reader and text to a more complex relationship between reader and author mediated by the text. It is not merely that Middleton tries to make the conventional anonymity of the form into a game of guessing the name of the writer. 'Martin Merry-mate' had enticed readers to try to divine Simon Smell-knave's true identity thirteen years before 'Mihell Mercury' pretended not to know the name of the author of Plato's Cap. More pervasive than the attempt to mystify authorship is the pamphlet's emphasis on the process of reading and interpretation. In order to engage the reader with the author rather than directly with the text, Middleton develops a playful, interpretively unstable style. His irony is unlike the straightforward 'wit' of pamphlets such as Fearful and Lamentable Effects. In the following passage, we seem at first to be dealing with a stable set of good/bad oppositions—merchants vs. spend-all, charity vs. self-display, old-fashioned honest caps vs. new-fashioned prodigal hats. But the word 'carped' (contended, prated) sends an interpretive tremor through the neat symmetrical structure, and that tremor (how admirable were the 'carping' merchants?) ramifies backwards through the passage, rippling ironically through a word such as 'profitable' (beneficial or money-making?), raising questions about just how generous was the 'sixpenny dole'. And this ironic reversal of the first interpretation connects the passage with the representation of sharp business practices—of cheating grocers who 'turn the scale with a false finger' and rich men who neglect to build up the 'low, old and rotten' houses of the poor. It is not that the passage undoes itself, revealing a satire 'behind' a merely apparent encomium; rather, Middletonian irony works by leaving intact and available mutually exclusive interpretative possibilities:

And therefore you, the widows of rich, deceased merchants, mercers and grocers, whose husbands in their lifetimes have been large benefactors to hospitals and alms-houses and elevated many profitable buckets in their parish churches, with arms most quaintly painted upon them, beside sixpenny dole at their funerals, and the blue consort of Hospital Boys singing their dirges. You, I say, their weeping widows, this fearful conjunction threatens most, for many riotous spend-all go about to inquire for you. And therefore all you that love yourselves better than a satin suit, and prefer your careful states before a white feather, let my prognosticating skill fray you from such brisk, perfumed woers. Let not a new-fashioned prodigal hat waste and consume that which an old-fashioned honest cap carped and cared for all his lifetime before.

The particular nature of the irony of Plato's Cap had its origins, then, in the position of the author Middleton in the face of an anonymous subgenre. He undertook to reframe the form in terms of some of the emerging conventions of literary writing and reading. Not only does the pamphlet deploy irony in order to suggest a playful and knowing author, but it also develops a degree of reflexiveness on its own nature and conditions of production. It would no doubt be overstating the case to suggest that Middletonian irony transformed the reading experience for the Londoners who purchased the pamphlet in 1604, changing that experience from casual amusement at an authorless pamphlet into engagement with an authored work. No doubt Plato's Cap was read and interpreted in much the same way as were other mock-almanacs, not to mention the many other satirical pamphlets of the period. Nevertheless, it is important to acknowledge that Plato's Cap contributed, to however modest a degree, to the development of specifically literary reading practices, according to which interpretation must always work towards fullness of meaning in the shadow of the figure of the author. To understand how Plato's Cap participated in the growth of the domain of literature is to begin to grasp how Thomas Middleton, even though he was not named in the pamphlet he wrote, nevertheless made his presence felt in this commodified product of the early modern literary market-place.

SEE ALSO

Textual introduction and apparatus: Companion, 492
 Authorship and date: Companion, 349

Plato's Cap

Cast at this year 1604, being leap year

To all those that are laxative of laughter

Gentlemen, I put off Plato's Cap to you, and keep on mine own after the French fashion, for your true Frenchman seldom doffs his hat (but upon large composition) for fear
5 of dismembering his hair, and to speak truth, he that useth that and other things, shall lose much hair by the year, I assure you. I would fain have you merry, because your commons are thin this Lent, and scarce so thick as a good leg of mutton. Your oyster pie is your only reveller 10 now, and domineers in all ordinaries, usurping the place of higher and more ambitious bake-meats. And if your complexions be not too rugged and boisterous, your brows too full of Saturn, that sullen planet that never laughs in a whole twelvemonth together, neither at Mercury's witty shifts, nor at Vulcan's Sellinger's-Round dancing with nimble Venus, till all the states smile at him, if your glances be not too full of iron-moulds, I presume you will fling one smile at our button-cap, and I wish no higher.
15 For

20 A smile is constant and doth gild each style,
But laughter is the fool of every smile.
The wonders we entreat of here have little harm in them. You may take more hurt in a barber's shop, if you sit there fasting, than all my prognosticating comedy or comic prognostication aims at. And if these events chance to happen, they will be but merry ones, for they wish ill to none, but to those that wish ill to themselves, and none can justly except at this, but those that cannot well read it.
25 For there is great difference between reading and reading well, for those that read well have a good tongue of their own, and spoil nothing in the spelling, and to such I cast up my cap, both in Paul's Churchyard, Popeshead Alley, and at Temple Bar.

Yours for a rainy day,
Adam Eavesdropper.

35

Mihell Mercury the 'pothecary in praise of the book.

If I have skill,
This book's not ill,
But chaste and pleasant.
If I knew the author,
I swear by my daughter,
I'd give him a pheasant.
Nor do you wonder,
You writers of thunder,
I know not the poet.

40

'Tis the book's praise I write.
But I would not for a mite
Have he himself know it,
For if he should spy it,
I'd flatly deny it.

45

He would fret, chafe, and nestle,
Stamp more in a minute
Than I in a sennight

50

At home with my pestle.

Therefore my best way
Is not long here to stay,
Because I'm no fighter.

55

This course then I took,
To commend the book,

But not meddle with the writer.
And because his art

60

Title see Introduction

- 1 laxative of laughter unable to contain one's laughter
3 French fashion The French were said to be impudent; what follows suggests that Frenchmen leave on their hats so as to conceal the loss of hair consequent upon syphilis—the so-called 'French disease'.
4 upon large composition by contractual arrangement
8 commons daily fare; 'commons' would naturally be 'thinner' than mutton during Lent since the eating of meat was not permitted
9 oyster pie seafood was standard fare during Lent
10 ordinaries eating-houses or taverns where public meals are provided at a fixed price 11 bake-meats pastries or pies, usually

- containing meat
12 complexions temperaments
13 Saturn the melancholy planet
15 shifts tricks
Sellinger's-Round St Leger's round; a rough country dance; mentioned as one of 'our old Christmas gambols' in Hubburd, 639
16 states high-ranking officials; here, the gods and goddesses
17 iron-moulds spots or discolourations on cloth
18 button-cap old-fashioned round headgear with a slight brim turned up and fastened by buttons; fashionable from the 1520s through 1550s, but replaced by hats in the seventies
28 except take exception
32 Paul's Churchyard the area surrounding St Paul's Cathedral, the centre of the

- book trade
Popeshead Alley lane running south from Cornhill to Lombard Street; occupied early in the seventeenth century by booksellers' shops
33 Temple Bar name of barrier or gateway closing the entrance into London from the Strand
35 Adam a name associated with mock prognostications, and also with populist writings because of the first Adam's association with hard, physical work
36 Mihell Mercury name combining old form of 'Michael', punning on 'my hell'; (as in 'Mihell Money-god' in Black Book, 808) with 'Mercury', which was used to treat syphilis
51 nestle to be uneasy or restless; to fidget
53 sennight a week (seven-night)

Is so pretty and tart
 And his ink so well-favoured,
 I swear by my simples,
 65 A nose full of pimples
 Is very ill-favoured.
 For so he doth prognosticate and shows
 A white flax beard wastes with a fiery nose.
 See where he comes, I dare not stay, I fly,
 70 So
 All envy's poison go with Mercury.

The same hand again.

Plato's Cap

The revolution of this present year 1604 takes his beginning at 75 what time the sun enters into the first minute of Aries, when many a scold shall be found in Ram Alley, whose tongues will never lin jangling until the sun enter into another sign, as the Miter or rather some boozing tap-house, where they must all drink themselves friends again till they are able to speak no more than 80 a drowned rat, and then by that time I hope they will be quiet.
 Next I find that the sun entering into Taurus, it will be exceeding good this year for the Butchers, both in Southwark, Eastcheap and Saint Nicholas Shambles, for he takes his entrance just upon Easter Tuesday, to the deposing of Lent and the overthrow of 85 salt salmon and fresh cod, and to the restoring again of heroic-valiant beef, that ancient and surly courtier that never appears without a mess of mustard, his gentleman-usher bareheaded before him. Red herring may go hang himself then for a twelvemonth upon the rusty beam of some farmer's chimney, until the 90 hungry ploughboys cut him down and quarter him. For Oliver Offal the butcher will be fat and flourish, and Gregory Gizzard the poulter will bring forth his progenies of partridges, plovers, and blackbirds. And what a pitiful sight it will be for poor waiters and trencher-bearers to see wise men and their masters feed upon woodcocks. 95

From thence the sun travels into Gemini, not into Germany (as some mechanic-readers will read Germany for Gemini) and then maids beware of two at once or two at a birth, if you love to preserve your own credits. But you especially this double sign threatens most, that live in merchants' houses amongst wanton 100 springals your fellow servants, and are at midnight at the massacre and sacking of a posset, when your sober master and continent mistress are in their first sleep, and little dream of your cinnamon and sugar which are always the two sweet presenters of a sack-posset, the scene being laid in a bowl or a basin and the actors 105 some half a dozen of silver spoons which seldom are out of their parts until all be eaten. There is much peril and danger in this sign, you damosels of seventeen and one-and-twenty. Therefore if I might counsel you, you should be your own 'pothecaries and preserve your honesties better than Barbaries. Go to bed presently after your master and mistress, save candles and caudles, sleep alone without company till you rise again, and if there be any hurt in this forty weeks after, never trust me again for an almanacmaker. 110

But when the sun rides a progress into Cancer, woe be to you that dwell in Crooked Lane, and sell shoeing-horns, for you shall take no money of those that have kibed heels, for the skin being off, they will rather go to the Skinners and buy them a fur, if they be wise, than hold by the horn while their brows run all of a water.
 In this crabbed sign Cancer, buttered crabs will be good meat, if 120 you have money enough, and a very wholesome dish that can be,
 if you be sound when you eat them.

After this the sun takes a lion's stride and stalks into Leo, and then there will be more lions in the Tower than those that are seen for a penny. In this sign there will start up many false and 125

64 simples medicine composed of only one constituent 68 fiery nose inflamed due to drinking or syphilis
 74 revolution the turning of the year 75 minute one-sixtieth of the arc of one of the twelve astrological signs Aries (the sun enters Aries, the Ram, about 21 March; the new year began on 25 March)
 76 scold woman who disturbs the peace by her constant scolding
Ram Alley narrow court on south side of Fleet Street; claimed the right of sanctuary and hence acquired a bad reputation
 77 lin jangling stop talking
 78 tap-house ale-house 81 Taurus (the sun enters Taurus, the Bull, about 21 April)
 82 Southwark borough on the south side of the Thames between Lambeth and Deptford Eastcheap 'a flesh [i.e., meat] market of butchers there dwelling, on both sides of the street' (Stow, 1.216)
 83 Saint Nicholas Shambles a slaughterhouse and meat-market on the north side of Newgate Street

 87 mess portion
 88 Red herring smoked herring
 89 rusty having the colour of rust beam . . . chimney presumably the horizontal piece of timber over the hearth on which meats and fish were smoked;
 chimney = fireplace
 92 plovers pigeons
 94 trencher-bearers servers 95 woodcocks known as a particularly stupid bird; unsuitable dish for wise men 96 Gemini the Twins, beginning about 21
 May
 97 mechanic-readers unschooled, laborious readers
 101 springals young men
 102 posset hot milk curdled with ale, wine, or other liquor, often with sugar, spices;
 'sacking' refers both to drinking the posset and to adding sack, a sweet, white wine, to the posset 104 presenters actors who speak the prologue of a play
 110 Barbaries inhabitants of Barbary, barbarians, pagans; with a glance at

'barberies' as 'barber shops', suggested by 'pothecaries'; both barber-surgeons and apothecaries were paramedical practitioners and both 'preserved' the health of their clients
 111 caudles warm drinks
 113 forty weeks after the time of gestation 115 progress a state journey made by a royal or noble personage
Cancer the Crab, beginning about 21
 June
 116 Crooked Lane street running from New Fish Street to St Michael's Lane
 117 kibed chapped or ulcerated
 118 Skinners The Company of Skinners prepared and traded in hides and pelts.
 119 hold by rely on horn . . . water horn: shoehorn, suggesting the 'brows' of the cuckold which were said to be horned; here the sufferer sweats in discomfort
 123 Leo beginning about 21 July 124 lions Lions were kept in the Tower of London; from the practice of taking visitors to see these actual lions, the word came also to mean 'sights worth seeing'.

counterfeit coiners that will stamp so long till they stare at the gallows. Many prisoners and wretches will stop holes in the White Lion, to the setting up of the bailiffs and shoulder-clappers.

But when the sun enters into Virgo, take heed, maids, that you have no daughters. I fear me there will be but a few virgins in the Whitefriars for I find by strange art that in suchlike places at this year maidenheads will be cheaper than mackerels, at their first coming in especially. This sign also is a shrewd threatener of you young wanton wenches in the Pawn, that ever and anon cry, 'What do you lack, gentlemen? What is't you buy, see a fine shirt!' Fie! Maidens should not name such a word methinks, without a crimson blush at least, because that linen word is always within an inch of immodesty.

From thence the sun takes a running leap into Libra, and then look well to the grocer lest he turn the scales with a false finger. Have an eye to the chandler's weights, you good housewives that buy your soap and salt butter by the pound and the half pound, for there is craft nowadays in weighing of candles and great policy in the uttering of puddings.

Next the sun takes his journey into the stinging sign Scorpio, and then beware of brokers, usurers, and pettifoggers—the scorpions of a kingdom. Come not in their villainous clutches all that month especially, for they will make you pay well for it, more in one month than you shall be able to recover again a whole twelvemonth after.

But entering into Sagittarius, it will be passing good for the fletchers in Grub Street and all the cavaliered bowyers. Twelve score pricks will be in season and those may shoot at Bunhill that are non-suited at Westminster Hall.

After this the sun mounts into Capricorn and then woe be unto you that are horn-mad and have three acres at Cuckold's Haven. You are well landed then, for one acre there is more than ever you will be able to make away as long as you live. This sign rains jealousy upon men and women, upon old frosty men that have young lusty wives, and upon old rivelled women that have young beardless husbands, for the true poison of jealousy swells the bosoms of unequal bedfellows. And a piece of a unicorn's horn can help any man but a cuckold. Whereby that old moth-eaten proverb is verified, which says, 'one man's meat is another man's poison'. For if he should take it down, he would think it would breed more horns within him. Such is the strange property of invincible jealousy, that is stronger than the great Spanish Armado in eighty-eight.

Next the sun enters into Aquarius, and then there will be good doings for water-men, many wanton meetings at Brentford, freshwater voyages to Blackwall and Greenwich, revelling and domineering among amiable lads and young wenches over the water. But that which I find most lamentable in this watery sign Aquarius, and most to be feared of all those that love valiant liquor, is the single-sole disposition of brewers, that will put too much Thames in their beer, and I fear me make it hop but of one leg, and that so lamely too, that a little thing will make it hop quite into the Thames again. And because ale-brewers and they are brothers, it is as much to be doubted on the other side, that each ale-brewer will play the Jew of Malta, and put but a little malt in the ale. So I hope there will be fewer red noses this year than was of a year a great while amongst the baser rank. And as for tavern-whiffers, I do not think but the honest, 126 stamp...stare 'to stamp and stare' was a phrase indicating rage; here 'stamp' refers primarily to the counterfeiting of coins (counterfeiting might be included under Leo because the 'lion' was a Scottish gold coin down to the reign of King James)

 127-8 White Lion a tavern converted about 1560 into a prison for the county of Surrey
 128 shoulder-clappers sheriff's officers
 129 Virgo the Virgin, beginning about 21 August
 131 Whitefriars a precinct in London that was outside the city's jurisdiction and so became known for lawlessness
 134 the Pawn covered arcade in the Royal Exchange, 'furnished with all sorts of the finest wares in the City' (Stow, 1.193)
 135-8 shirt...immodesty Shirts were undergarments; to wrap up in clean linen meant 'to deliver sordid or uncleanly matter in decent language' (Tilley, who gives the earliest instance as 1678).
 139 Libra the Scales, beginning 23 September
 141 chandler's chandlers were candle-makers and sellers; the word also referred, somewhat contemptuously, to retail dealers in groceries
 144 uttering selling
 145 Scorpio the Scorpion, beginning about

23 October
 146 brokers any kind of intermediary, in commercial, legal or sexual dealings
pettifoggers legal practitioners of inferior status 152 Grub Street running from Fore Street to Chiswell Street, inhabited by bowyers, fletchers, and bowstring-makers; bowyers make bows, fletchers make arrows cavaliered ? a nonce word, possibly suggesting the affected swaggering of the bowyers
 152-3 Twelve score pricks targets placed 240 paces from the archers (the regular distance for archery practice)
 153-4 shoot...Hall shoot with bow and arrow after having been shot down in a lawsuit; Bunhill Fields, north of the city, were used for archery practice, Westminster Hall housed the law courts; 'shoot' and 'suit' were homonyms
 155 Capricorn the He-Goat, begins about 21 December 156 horn-mad enraged at having been made a cuckold three...Haven According to legend, the Miller of Charlton, having discovered King John kissing his wife, demanded compensation, and was granted all the land he could see from his door. He claimed all as far as a point on the Thames below Greenwich, which was thereafter called Cuckold's Point; to have three acres at Cuckold's Haven is to be thoroughly a cuckold.

 160 rivelled wrinkled
 162 unicorn's horn thought to be an antidote against poison
 165 take it down swallow powdered unicorn's horn; also referring to detumescence following ejaculation
 167 Armado the 'Invincible Armada' sent by Philip II of Spain against England in 1588
 169 Aquarius the Water-Carrier, begins 21 January
 170 Brentford town in Middlesex at the junction of the Brent and the Thames, eight miles west of London
 171 Blackwall suburb of London, four miles east of St Paul's Greenwich town in Kent on the south bank of the Thames
 176 Thames in their beer water their beer, so as to reduce the usual quantities of hops and malt in beer and ale respectively 177 little thing ? privy member, private parts 179 doubted feared
 180 Jew of Malta eponymous character in Marlowe's play
 183 tavern-whiffers to whiff = to drink liquor

185 virtuous vintners will take an order, and assuage the desperate and furious humours of their wines with a good, sober quantity of fair, temperate water. Nor can I much blame them, for after the reckoning hath been discharged and all, you should have some cast it up again before the vintner's face and think themselves 190 misreckoned in the pottle, until they see two gallons apparently lie upon the floor before their eyes. And then they will believe it.
And therefore good, sober vintners, I will not condemn, but rather applaud the watering of your wine. For by that honest-profitable policy, those that are your common wine-suckers will surfeit and be sick ten times ere they be drunk once. And so much for the 195 sun's taking barge in Aquarius.

The twelve and last is when he turns golden angler and catches Pisces. And then woe be unto you that are dissolute full-mouthed swearers, for you will never catch haddocks as long as you breath.
For you shall never hear a true fisher indeed swear beyond 200 'codfish', and no oath at all that hath any flesh in it. In this last and finny sign Pisces, there will be odd doings in Old Fish Street.
Lobsters will be no meat for lobcocks, as long as they pass for two shillings apiece. Maids will be no fish for harlots, nor soles for brokers—the one wanting continence and the other conscience.
205 Marry, gudgeons will be your only dish for country gentlemen such as are come to their lands before they come to their wit, and are one-and-twenty year old in acres but scarce seven in discretion or manners. Such as these may fitly dwell at Fisher's Folly when they have made away all their fish ponds in the country. And this 210 shall suffice for the sun's twelve strides into the twelve signs.

*Now for general dispositions, in all ranks of people whatsoever,
bred by variable, womanish and unconstant planets*

215 The great conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter, changed from the watery triplicity to the fiery is to be noted specially (as our pro-gnostigators would have it). Nevertheless, I hope there will be small hurt done by fire this year, because faggots, billets, and charcoal bear such a price that no poor snake is able to purchase them, and the most danger for fire lies in their cottages because 220 for the most part they are low, old and rotten. And as for rich men, they could build up their houses again. But those which most prevent this great and fiery conjunction are usurers and niggards, both which are sure to have no sparkle flying or lying about their houses, for they will have never a coal in their chimneys.

This hot conjunction being but badly affected, shows that those 225 which were widows the last year will be caught up this year, more for wealth and spending-money than for love and honesty. They shall have many gallant suitors that will carry all their lands upon their backs and yet swear they have grounds, backsides, and yards, when they have no more ground than the king's highway, no more 230 backsides than one, and no more yard than what they have in their hose and doublets. And the tailor deceives them of one and a half too, to mend the matter, and by that shift makes the gallants forswear themselves.

Thus shall rich widows be beguiled, if they be not the craftier.
235 And what their first husbands sweat for in honest, profitable labours, these their second, hot lovers will sweat out at dice in ordinaries, or in French balls at the tennis court—to the rotting of many fine cambric shirts and the bandying out of taffeta elbows.
But politic-crafty Mercury ever and anon falling in among the 240 bunch of planets shows that some London widows will be subtle enough for country gentlemen, and either be made lusty jointures or else never join battle with them. Their profitable wits I applaud well, and I hope witty Mercury will be good to their mourning gowns, and not suffer their brittle sex to repent within less than a 245 month after their marriage day again.

And therefore you, the widows of rich, deceased merchants, merciers, and grocers, whose husbands in their lifetimes have been large benefactors to hospitals and alms-houses and elevated

184 an order a particular course of action 189 pottle a measure of capacity for liquids, equal to two quarts; a vessel containing a pottle
197 Pisces the Fishes, beginning about 20
February
197–200 woe . . . it The passage depends on associations between the eating of fish, Lent, and holy living on one side and the eating of flesh (i.e., meat) and carnal sinfulness on the other.
200 'codfish' codfish; playing on 'cod's', a perversion of 'God's' in oaths and exclamations
201 Old Fish Street ran west from Bread Street to Old Change; the location of the fish market and of many taverns
202 lobcocks country bumpkins 203 soles punning on 'soul' and perhaps on 'sol' or 'sou', a French coin 205 Marry a form of Mary, the Virgin, used as an interjection
gudgeons small fish used for bait

208 Fisher's Folly 'folly' preceded by possessive noun or proper noun was a popular name of any costly structure considered to have shown folly in the builder 213 womanish women were commonly thought to be capricious 215 triplicity In astrology, the signs are divided into four triplicities, each named after one of the elements, earth, air, water and fire; the watery triplicity comprises Cancer, Scorpio, and Pisces; the fiery triplicity is Aries, Leo, and Sagittarius.
217 billets pieces of wood used for fuel
218 snake needy or humble person
223 sparkle spark
225 badly affected ill-liked 228–9 suitors . . . backs young heirs who spend the worth of their lands on clothing 229 backsides back premises, back yard, outbuildings; also, posteriors

231 yard 'yard' of land; also playing on 'yard' of cloth and 'yard' = penis 232 hose and doublets stockings and closefitting body-garments
232–4 And . . . themselves The tailor charges them for 'yards' of cloth, but uses less than two to sew their doublets. The gallants are forsworn because they claimed to have 'yards'.
238 French (by association, in the view of Jacobean popular culture, with dissolute pastimes)
239 cambric a fine linen bandying hitting to and fro out of taffeta elbows to be 'out at [or of] elbows' means to be poor and ragged;
taffeta is a kind of silk 242 jointures the male equivalent of a woman's dowry
249–50 elevated many profitable buckets
? paid for the erection of beneficial or useful beams; i.e., contributed towards the refurbishing of their churches

250 many profitable buckets in their parish churches, with arms most quaintly painted upon them, beside sixpenny dole at their funerals, and the blue consort of Hospital Boys singing their dirges. You,
 I say, their weeping widows, this fearful conjunction threatens 255 most, for many riotous spend-all's go about to enquire for you.
 And therefore all you that love yourselves better than a satin suit, and prefer your careful states before a white feather, let my prognosticating skill fray you from such brisk, perfumed wooers. Let not a new-fashioned prodigal hat waste and consume that which an old-fashioned honest cap 260 carp'd and cared for all his lifetime before.

Moreover this dangerous and perilous conjunction portends many sudden and furious tempests this year, one thousand, six hundred and four.
 Tavern pots shall fly from one end of the room to the other and do much hurt if they light upon men's pates.
 265 Many cracked crowns shall pass current through Cheapside by goldsmith stalls, and yet never suspected. Many terrible frays in Smithfield between sergeants and gentlemen. Marry, sergeants will win the day and get the victory, especially if they be six to one. Then there is no remedy, but the Counter in Wood Street must part the fray.
 270 There shall be a dreadful war between the wife and the husband for superiority, in so much that the good man shall be fain to give over first, cry 'mum!' and let her do what she will all the year after.

Shrewd tempests shall arise about Cole Harbour, and many a maid shall be cast away about Westminster. There shall be a battle between the four knaves at cards for superiority, and between the false dice and true 275 for antiquity.

Women that wear long gowns shall be glad to take up their clothes in the street when it rains, although a hundred men stand and look upon them. Yet they shall blush no more to hold them up if it be very 280 dirty than men to make water in broad day at the Pissing Conduit if they have need.

The bakers, woodmongers, butchers, and brewers shall fall to a mighty conspiracy this year, so that no man shall have bread, fire, flesh, or drink without credit or ready money. Barbers shall be mightily 285 out of work this year by reason of the French disease, for many shall lose their hair before they can come to their shops and so put them quite out of work. And beards shall be commodities hard to be gotten but more hard to be kept, for many hairs will start out this year that will never come in again, but perish and drop down by the way. And amongst 290 all other trades and occupations, masons (poor souls) shall be troubled with the stone this year if there chance to be any great buildings, as by my skill I find no less. Marry, I doubt Paul's will scarce have a new steeple this year and in that, I think, I shall be the truest prognosticator 295 that writ almanacs this twenty twelvemonths. The gout, I find, will keep a foul racket this year, and play at tennis in a usurer's puffed toe. But his gaping son and heir shall have little hope of his dying, I'll put him in that comfort, because he may linger yet above seven 300 years longer, and his toe serve out above four 'prenticeships to the gout.

Tailors shall be mightily troubled with the stitch and sew many false seeds which shall peep out before a moon come about. And having a hell of their own, being but a bare board between, woe be to pieces of white fustian linings, for they fall in with their heels upward.
 305 Satin is the chiefest devil there and domineers over all inferior blacks. Velvet that old reveller and brave courtier lies there most tragically dismembered. Poor perpetuano is perpetually damned and, desperate-rash, falls in headlong.
 310

Only in this all tailors are most true,
 They damn false bodice and give them their due.
 And what a lamentable thing it is on the other side that so many of our Englishwomen should wear French bodice and be a scorn 315 and by-jest to all riotous nations.

251 sixpenny (commonly a term of depreciation)
 252 dole the distribution of charity
 252 blue consort of Hospital Boys the 'charity' scholars of Christ's Hospital, on the north side of Newgate, east of the Old Bailey, were often hired to sing at funerals. In Michaelmas Term, 4.4.13, their attendance at Quomodo's funeral suggests his high status and his wife's devotion since they are said to have charged the considerable sum of five pounds for their services.
 256 white feather The landlord's son in Hubbard, 376-7, trades his father's estate for fashionable frivolities, one of which is a hat of 'white feathers'.
 257 fray frighten
 258-9 hat...cap Hats replaced caps as fashionable headgear in the later sixteenth century.
 259 carped contended, prated
 265 cracked crowns punning on damaged coins as well as broken heads
Cheapside on the south side was Goldsmith's Row 267 Smithfield an open space of five acres, lying in the triangle formed by Holborn,

Aldersgate Street, and Charterhouse Street; a usual place of frays
 269 Counter prison for debtors
 274 Cole Harbour a place of sanctuary (and hence of wicked goings-on) in Upper Thames Street
 275 Westminster refers specifically to the Abbey (two miles from St Paul's), but also the village which grew in its neighbourhood, extending in the sixteenth century from Temple Bar to Kensington, and from the Thames to Marylebone, becoming a city in 1540; notorious as a haunt of bad characters
 275-7 battle...antiquity (suggesting the inherent knavery and falsity of games of chance)
 276 knaves jacks
 282 Pissing Conduit Conduits were erected so as to provide water to the public; the little Conduit, or Pissing Conduit, was near the Royal Exchange.
 286 French disease syphilis, one of whose effects was hair loss
 294 new steeple the steeple of St Paul's Cathedral was destroyed by fire in 1561
 297 puffed swollen (due to gout)

300 four 'prenticeships twenty-eight years
 302-3 sew many false seeds the sew/sow, seams/seeds punning implies that tailors will father bastard offspring
 303-4 before...about within a month
 304 hell the tailor's 'hell', into which cuttings were thrown
 305 fustian a coarse cloth made of cotton and flax, used often because, until 1603, only gentry were legally permitted to wear silk linings 306 fall...upward In addition to the sense of an irredeemable fall, this phrase possibly continues the bawdy punning of 'sewing seeds', since 'heels upward' might suggest the proverbial 'light heels' of wanton women.
Satin punning on Satan
 309 perpetuano a durable woollen fabric
 312 false bodice poorly made garment(s); playing on 'bodies', the usual Jacobean spelling of 'bodice'. The spelling permitted a relaxed handling of the singular and plural.
 314 bodice playing on 'bodies'; possibly suggesting that Englishwomen prefer French lovers

But shall I discover to the world wondrous events indeed, and tell you how muscadine in vintners' cellars shall indict their masters this year of commixtion, and arraign them at their own bar. And how bailiffs and marshals' men shall be content to arrest any man, if they can catch him.

Poor men shall be accounted knaves without occasion, and those that flatter least shall speed worst and never be worth three hundred a year, if they should live until Doomsday. Many shall eat upon other men's trenchers and surfeit upon other men's costs, but scarce feed upon Holland cheese in their own chambers.

The palsy shall be a very shrewd disease this year, for some will have it in their heads and shake so long till they have no more wit in their brains than Will the bell-ringer. Some shall have a palsy in their teeth, in so much that they shall eat more in a week than they will be able to pay for in a twelvemonth. Othersome shall be troubled with a palsy in their hands, and those are your riotous elder brothers that can keep nothing fast but will shake all the money out of their hands that comes into them, videlicet, in taverns, tennis-courts, and dicing-houses. And lastly some shall have a palsy in their feet, and will not be able to stand to anything but shake and reel from the stall into the channel—your excellent reel-pots. And so I leave them full in a puddle.

Some there shall be which shall have such a smell in their nostrils that no feast shall escape them without they have share in it.

But consumptions this year are dangerously threatened by the fiery copulation of those two surly and ambitious planets, for some shall be so consumed in their members, as they shall find never a good tongue in their heads, some so consumed in conscience that they will take above forty in the hundred and more too if they can get it, othersome so consumed by in chastity that if the constable should search them, he should find about them very little honesty.

Those that sing basses this year shall love to take liquor soundly and trumpeters that sound trebles shall stare by custom.

There shall be many fortune-tellers that shall shut a knave in a circle, and looking about for a devil, find him locked in their bosoms.

Many strange events shall happen and befall this year in those houses where Virgo is predominant with a master, but wants a mistress to look narrowly unto her. For the influence of the grocers' shops being elevated within a few sweet degrees presageth that some shameless drabs shall be still gadding about the streets for figs, almonds, and confects, and that without regard of either wit or honesty.

Great mists and fogs will arise and fall this year, so that some shall not see but to take their neighbour's bed for their own.
And if watch-candles could tell tales, they would make you laugh, though your wives went to burying.

Many men shall be so venturously disposed that they shall go into brothel-houses and yet come out again as honestly as when they went first in.

Bakers shall thrive by two things this year—scores well paid and millers that are honest, which are as rare to be found nowadays as black swans and white ravens. Long-bearded men shall not be the wisest. Nor the most gravest in looks, the most holy in life.

The haberdashers, by the natural operation of this conjunction, are very fortunate. For old hats new trimmed shall not last long, and new hats for the most part shall have old trimming. And so by this means, foisting John shall thrive better by his knavery than any plain-dealing John about London by the talent of his honesty.
And so I end, wishing all the felts in his shop no more wickeder block than his own pate. And then I am sure they will be so far from good fashion, that no honest man in England would be hired to wear them. And so farewell John, 'tis good luck sometimes, they say, to end with an etc.

FINIS

317 muscadine a form of 'muscatel': a strong sweet wine

318 commixtion mixing together

325 Holland cheese In Pierce Penilesse (1592), Thomas Nashe asks, 'Is it not a pitiful thing that a fellow . . . comes to the eighteen pence ordinary, because he would be seen amongst cavaliers and brave courtiers, living otherwise all the year long with salt butter and Holland cheese in his chamber' (I.170).

326 palsy a disease of the nervous system, characterized by impairment or suspension of muscular action or sensation, especially of voluntary motion, and, in some forms, by involuntary tremors of the limbs

328 Will ? a generic name for a bell-ringer

333 videlicet namely

336 from the stall into the channel from the market stall or shop into the gutter

337 reel-pots drunkards

341 consumptions . . . threatened people are threatened with consumptions (i.e., wasting diseases)

342 planets here Saturn and Jupiter

345 above . . . hundred a usurious rate of interest

349 take liquor soundly drink deeply, consonant with their deep voices

350 trumpeters . . . custom possibly 'trumpeters who imbibe three drinks at one time will commonly rage drunkenly' (punning on sound = get to the bottom (of the glass), trebles = three of something)

351-2 shut . . . circle Magicians protected themselves from the demons they conjured by staying within an enchanted circle; here the fortune-tellers are themselves the knaves.

355 Virgo the Virgin predominant astrological term for the planet and constellation having greatest influence at any one time

356 narrowly with close attention

356-7 influence . . . presageth more playing with astrological terminology

358 drabs slatterns or prostitutes

359 confects sweetmeats made of fruit and/or seed, preserved in sugar

363 watch-candles candles used for 'watching', that is, staying awake, rather than for reading or working

374 new . . . trimming i.e., hats sold as new will be trimmed with second-hand materials

375 foisting cheating

John probably the haberdasher, John of Paul's churchyard; mentioned also in Hubburd, 55 and in Dekker's Gull's Hornbook (1609)

377 felts refers both to the felt material used to make hats and to hats themselves made of any material

378 block a mould for a hat

379 would be hired i.e., you could not pay anyone to wear them

THE BLACK BOOK

Edited by G. B. Shand

I hear say there be obscure imitators, that go about to frame a second part of it, and offer to sell it in Paul's Churchyard, and elsewhere, as from me.... Indeed, if my leisure were such as I could wish, I might haps (half a year hence) write the return of the Knight of the Post from hell, with the Devil's answer to the Supplication: but as for a second part of Pierce Penniless, it is a most ridiculous roguery.

Thomas Nashe's epistle to the second edition of his Pierce Penniless (1592) evidently threw down a gauntlet so alluring that Middleton could not finally refuse to take it up, particularly at a moment when plague-silenced theatres and patronage-denying Clutchfists threatened his income. So The Black Book appeared in 1604, an exuberant sequel by a not-so-obscure imitator whose powers of supplementary invention had already, in The Wisdom of Solomon Paraphrased and The Ghost of Lucrece, been liberally honed on well-known pre-existing texts. As its two 1604 editions would suggest, The Black Book's vigorous prose agreed better with the reading public than had those earlier poetic endeavours at adaptation.

Middleton's pamphlet is simply conceived. In Pierce Penniless a starving writer (Nashe's transparent stand-in) is driven to post a satirical plea to Hell for patronage; in The Black Book Lucifer rises in person at the Globe Theatre to answer Pierce's pitiful supplication. Like a night-walking John Stow, perambulating the civic wards in his Survey of London (1598), Lucifer bustles through the City's underworld, assembling his chief earthly followers and anatomizing their negative contributions to London life with a directness owing much to Nashe and the sharp-pointed satirical tradition of Pietro Aretino in which Nashe consciously wrote. Adding Pierce to his company, Lucifer plays a final scene in which he publishes the details of his last will and testament, including, 'for his redress, | A standing pension to Pierce Penniless' (108-9). This pension, be it noted, takes the ironic form of a rake-off from all the city's bawdy-houses, along with 'the playing in and out of all wenches at thy pleasure' (804). Minuscule though it be, Pierce's percentage of London's booming sex-trade ensures that he will 'never have need to write Supplication again' (806).

Even if no sequel to Pierce Penniless had ever appeared, a turn-of-the-century satirical work called The Black Book was probably inevitable. Robert Greene had promised one in his Disputation Between a He Cony-catcher and a She Cony-catcher (1592), and had titled another pamphlet of that year The Black Book's Messenger. In Pierce Penniless itself, the beleaguered Nashe had warned his detractors, 'Write who will against me, but let him look his life be without scandal; for if he touch me never so little, I'll be as good as The Black Book to him and his kindred.' Middleton's pamphlet is nothing like the gallery of roguish exploits seemingly promised by Greene, but he surely capitalizes on Greene's advance publicity for his title, and in The Black Book's compassion for Pierce, and its implied scorn for the world that has so abused him, it is perhaps possible to catch a shadowy glimpse of the retribution threatened by Nashe. In form, however, Middleton's is more like an earlier pamphlet, The Will of the Devil (c.1548, reprinted three times by 1580). This is a rather nasty little assault on Roman Catholicism, but it does turn from attacking various luminaries of the Catholic hierarchy to speak of current vices, and it is framed as a diabolical will and testament spoken by Beelzebub who, 'sick in body and soul', lists his satirical bequests Item by Item, and ends (in the three reprints) with a guarantee that if his ten detestable commandments be followed 'straight to my kingdom thou shalt be led'. The superficial similarities with the conclusion of The Black Book are obvious.

Numerous other satirical pamphlets generally akin to The Black Book had appeared in the preceding decades, taking both safe and dangerous sides of political, social, and religious issues. It is conventional to speak of how the entertainment energy of these pamphlets regularly subverts the avowed moral intent, but such subversion does not occur here, despite The Black Book's vivid comedy. Middleton sets out, as he says in the opening Epistle, to 'unmask the world's shadowed villainies', to anatomize the 'deceit and luxury' (i.e., lechery) of a world of 'panders, harlots and ruffians', and that is just what he does, assailing the monetary and carnal greed of London society by presenting its members uniformly, from fashionable gallants through mercantile citizens down to bawds, cheats, and thieves, as kinsmen and adherents of the Devil. Even the pamphlet's material design focuses self-reflexively on this end, as Gary Taylor has argued. The Black Book is literally a 'black book', from the solidly inked panel of its woodcut title-page, through the heavy black-letter typeface of its main body of text. Already somewhat archaic by 1604, and thus a potential signifier in itself (harking back to an older and better England), black letter links The Black Book visually to the physical style of earlier satirical pamphlets, and it also glances audaciously at those contemporary theological works which were still appearing in the traditional typeface. But its immediate function here is to help create an appropriate physical vehicle to house the pamphlet's relentlessly black world, a vehicle specifically acknowledged when the Black Book itself asks, in its Epilogue: 'Am I black enough, think you, dressed up in a lasting suit of ink? Do I deserve my dark and pitchy title?' (824-6).

This uniformity of aim and design supports a striking degree of internal cohesion which The Black Book gets mainly from narrative and character rather than from the formal structures of expository rhetoric. Though its satirical descriptions are often enthusiastically expansive, Middleton's pamphlet does not share the digressive anthologizing discursiveness which characterizes other works in this genre (one might cite Pierce Penniless's own tedious anticlimactic discourse on spirits). Theatrically anchored in the consistent voice and experience of its vividly-realized protagonist, and in the economy of its inevitable narrative progress, this text has little time for readerly side-trips which might dilute the force of its satire. If there is anything self-subversive at work, it is the author's apparently deep and angry sympathy with innocent victims, and in particular with the miserable fate of Thomas Nashe himself, whose last days, sometime in 1601, seem to have been passed in exactly the penurious neglect experienced by Pierce, and feared by all professional writers, an obscurity as cold as the hearth of the miserable usurer whose tale Lucifer inserts at 242-86. There is a softness approaching (but never reaching) sentimentality in The Black Book's attitude to Pierce, which paradoxically both anchors and undercuts the satirical anger of the work. It is surely of a piece with Middleton's intimately felt defence of Nashe in The Ant and the Nightingale, and it is tempting to think that we have here a protest not merely over a wronged fellow writer, but over a wronged friend.

As we might expect, The Black Book is highly theatrical in its imagining. Identifying itself as a Moral—the contemporary term for an interlude or play of mores (as Alan Dessen has demonstrated)—it stages Lucifer's arrival in a verse prologue spoken from the platform of the Globe, and proceeds to a first-person narrative of his travels through the London underworld. Lucifer has been given the vivaciously colloquial voice of a fully realized theatrical persona, sophisticated well beyond the similarly spoken styles of Dekker and Greene, and worthy of comparison with Nashe. Sprinkled with reported dialogue, with cant phrases, with contractions and colloquialisms, and with constant narrative connectives, his prose has a breathless forward momentum which is helped along by extensive adverbial compounding (especially using when). These devices, combined with an intensely tactile and visual savouring of descriptive detail, and with highly personalized adjectival choices, produce a story-telling voice so distinctively sustained that the pamphlet might almost be the script for a Jacobean one-man show:

This said, the slave hugged himself and bussed the bawd for joy, when presently I left them in the midst of their wicked smack and descended to my bill-men that waited in the pernicious alley for me, their master constable. And marching forward to the third garden-house, there we knocked up the ghost of Mistress Silver-pin, who suddenly risse out of two white sheets and acted out of her tiring-house window. But having understood who we were, and the authority of our office, she presently, even in her ghost's apparel, unfolded the doors and gave me my free entrance, when in policy I charged the rest to stay and watch the house below whilst I stumbled up two pair of stairs in the dark, but at last caught in mine eyes the sullen blaze of a melancholy lamp that burnt very tragically upon the narrow desk of a half bedstead, which descried all the pitiful ruins throughout the whole chamber (396-410).

Even the extended general set-pieces on usurers, brokers, merchants, and various gallants which form the first third of The Black Book proper are not permitted to slow the pace. Instead, they are integrated into a single, sternly spoken scolding of Lieutenant Frig-beard which is only really interrupted once, where Lucifer turns aside to tell us the story of the 'frozen charity of a usurer's chimney' (242-86). Later, when the building momentum of the action is jeopardized by yet another set-piece, Lucifer actually cuts short his conventional catalogue of the twelve roguish companies in Master Bezzle's ordinary, naming only four of them before abruptly resuming his narrative line: 'and in all, your twelve tribes of villainy, who no sooner understood the quaint form of such an uncustomed legacy but they all pawned their vicious golls to meet there at the hour prefixed' (542-5).

Middleton further exploits his burgeoning playwriting skills here by giving Lucifer a bravura series of lightning-like costume and scene changes which might be the envy of Mephistophilis, and which depend for their satiric impact on the transgressive reputation of both the actor and the stage. Ascending to the Globe platform, Lucifer shifts his shape from flaming devil to constable, and goes first at night to the Picket-hatch brothel of Mistress Wimbleschin, where he locates and summons Lieutenant Frigbeard, then to the adjacent brothel of Mistress Silver-pin, possibly in Rotten Row, where the lamentable Pierce is added to the company. In the morning, metamorphosing into a musty fur-bedecked usurer so miraculously that his watchmen 'staggered and all their bills fell down in a swoon' (473), he proceeds to the Royal Exchange where he summons the 'rammish penny-father' Mihell Moneygod and Master Cog-bill the scrivener. Thence (having switched to a suit and weapons stolen from a Birchin Lane tailor and an unspecified cutler), he marches as a captain to Master Bezzle's ordinary (perhaps, given his later quibble on 'Bezzle-bub', the Devil Tavern in Fleet Street by Temple Bar). Here he finds many more of his followers at dice, and from them he summons a parcel of highway robbers, cutpurses, cheating bowlers and dicers, and even one Barnaby Burning-glass, 'Arch tobacco-taker of England' (777-8). After a briefly-mentioned tour to review his troops in 'many a second house in the city and suburbs' (554-5), and in Paul's Walk, Lucifer assembles these underworld luminaries back at his 'convocation house' (466), Mistress Silver-pin's establishment, which quickly begins to seem more like the stage of the Globe once again, with its tiring-house and its staged finale. Here he takes on one last role, this time costumed in the country nightgown and sick cap of a grain-hoarding Kentish farmer named Dick Devil-barn. He enters feebly between Pierce and Mistress Silver-pin, is helped into 'a wicked chair' (584-6), and proceeds to a climactic series of bequests forming a thin comic veneer over the author's outrage at the vicious practices and values they represent.

The London through which Lucifer bustles in his many shapes is (as usual) gendered female, but as will already be clear, this 'lusty dame and mistress of the land' (341) is no nurturing matron. Rather, Middleton depicts the urban environment Gail Kern Paster has characterized as predatory. The distant or absent City of God is antithetically mirrored by Lucifer's ironic fellowship of parasitic knaves and gulls. Monetary and sexual greed motivate one and all, with perhaps the partial exception of the legitimately needy Pierce. Though this cold and grasping underworld taints all the institutions of the actual city, the Devil's tour is something of a triumphal entry at the backdoor, a regal progress through the sewers, rather than a public visitation of conquest. Comically mediated, contained by the need for disguise and by the unrelieved company of bawds, cheats, and fools, Lucifer is most at home in the city's most marginal and transgressive locales, the stage of the Globe in Southwark, the suburban tenements of Picket-hatch, 'the very skirts of all brothel-houses' (117). And yet, Middleton's satire is not muted, primarily because he inscribes a fictive City of Lucifer so like the actual London as to be virtually indistinguishable from it, and thus endows his satiric characters and events with the disturbing power of actuality.

Middleton's achievement, then, is anything but the 'ridiculous roguery' Nashe feared. Instead, it is a worthy continuation. 'It is the best of the imitations of Nashe's grotesque manner, . . . [but] in a clearer narrative and dramatic framework than Nashe attempts to create' (Rhodes). It is secular, playful, vividly localized and inspired. Witness, finally, its laconic and remarkably layered handling of closure. As he entered into Lucifer's voice by way of a third-person stage direction at the beginning of the Moral, Middleton exits by abruptly dropping his diabolical persona for a brief impersonal narrative, of the sort occasionally preserved in post-production play texts: 'This said, he departed to his molten kingdom, the wind risse, the bottom of the chair flew out, the scrivener fell flat upon his nose, and here is the end of a harmless moral' (818-20). The effect is deft. We see, briefly but vividly, a scene which would have made a wonderful stage finale, following which Middleton completes his departure by immediate transition to an Epilogue in a completely new voice: that of the smugly self-satisfied (and tantalizingly self-referential) Black Book itself.

SEE ALSO

Textual introduction and apparatus: Companion, 493
 Authorship and date: Companion, 350

The Black Book

The Epistle to the Reader; or, The True Character of this Book

To all those that are truly virtuous, and can touch pitch and yet never defile themselves, read the mischievous lives and pernicious practices of villains and yet be never the worse at the end of the book, but rather confirmed the more in their honest estates and the uprightness of their virtues, to such I dedicate myself, the wholesome intent of my labours, the modesty of my phrases, that even blush when they discover vices and unmask the world's shadowed villainies. And I account him as a traitor to virtue who, diving into the deep of this cunning age, and finding there such monsters of nature, such speckled lumps of poison as panders, harlots and ruffians do figure, if he rise up silent again, and neither discover or publish them to the civil rank of sober and continent livers who thereby may shun those two devouring gulls, to wit, of deceit and luxury, which swallow up more mortals than Scylla and Charybdis, those two cormorants and Woolners of the sea, one tearing, the other devouring. Wherefore, I freely persuade myself, no virtuous spirit or judicial worthy but will approve my politic moral where, under the shadow of the Devil's legacies, or his bequeathing to villains, I strip their villainies naked, and bare the infectious bulks of craft, coz'nage and panderism, the three bloodhounds of a commonwealth. And thus far I presume, that none will or can except at this, which I call The Black Book (because it doubly damns the Devil), but some tainted harlot, noseless bawd, obscene ruffian and such of the same black nature and filthy condition that poison the towardly spring of gentility, and corrupt with the mud of mischiefs the pure and clear streams of a kingdom. And to spur-gall such, who reads me shall know I dare, for I fear neither the ratsbane of a harlot nor the poniard of a villain.

T. M.

A Moral

Lucifer, ascending as Prologue to his own play:

Now is hell landed here upon the earth,
When Lucifer, in limbs of burning gold,
Ascends this dusty theatre of the world
To join his powers. And, were it numbered well,
There are more devils on earth than are in hell.
Hence springs my damnèd joy. My tortured spleen Melts into mirthful humour at this fate,
That heaven is hung so high, drawn up so far,
And made so fast, nailed up with many a star,
And hell the very shop-board of the earth,
Where, when I cut out souls, I throw the shreds
And the white linings of a new-soiled spirit,
Pawned to luxurious and adulterous merit.
Yea, that's the sin, and now it takes her turn,
For which the world shall like a strumpet burn.
And for an instance to fire false embraces
I make the world burn now in secret places.
I haunt invisible corners as a spy,
And in adulterous circles there rise I.
There am I conjured up through hot desire,
And where hell rises there must needs be fire.

Title See Introduction for probable origins; here, an exposé of roguish practices; originally, and also pertinent here, an official list of rogues and criminals; also, a book of black arts (cf. Webster, The White Devil, 4.1.33-36: 'And some there are which call it my black book: | Well may the title hold: for though it teach not | The art of conjuring, yet in it lurk | The names of many devils').
2 Character moral nature
3-4 touch pitch . . . defile proverbial
10 discover reveal
18 luxury lechery
19 Scylla and Charybdis fearsome rock and whirlpool off the coast of Sicily cormorants (fig.) avaricious men, usurers; gluttons Woolners Richard Woolner was a notorious Elizabethan glutton
29 noseless a common effect of advanced syphilis
33 spur-gall to scrape severely with spurs

34 ratsbane rat-poison
poniard dagger
37 Moral (a) interlude or play of manners (mores) (b) ironic appropriation of the term for an exposition of the moral teaching contained in a literary composition 38 Lucifer . . . play The entire Moral is conceived theatrically; see Introduction. Cf. the theatrical casting of Dekker's Wonderful Year (Hibbard, 168-171), but note that the voice of Dekker's pamphlet appears not to be a persona or character, but simply that of the author, where the voice of The Black Book, from the Moral until the penultimate sentence of the black-letter text proper, is vividly and consistently Lucifer's.
40 limbs armour
41 theatre of the world with a first glance at the Globe; cf. 60-2
44 spleen the traditional seat of laughter 46 heaven with a reference to the theatrical heavens or shadow, the roof protecting the stage, which continues in 47's carpentry figure: 'nailed up with many a star'

48 hell . . . shop-board the tailor's hell, beneath his shop-board or table, where his scraps were discarded; and playing on 'hell' as the place beneath the stage, leading to references to diabolical trapezies between 57 and 61 49 cut out with the added sense of 'excise' or 'eliminate' souls punning on 'soles', as (a) bottoms of shoes (b) bottoms of stockings or socks 51 merit due reward or punishment, with a glance at meretrix (L. harlot)
52 that's the sin i.e., lechery/adultery
57 adulterous circles (a) glancing, as with 'conjured up', 'where hell rises' and 'vaulted up' in the succeeding three lines, at the stage trap, from which devils consistently appeared; (b) playing on 'vaginas'

60 And now that I have vaulted up so high Above the stage rails of this earthen Globe,
 I must turn actor, and join companies
 To share my comic sleek-eyed villainies,
 For I must weave a thousand ills in one 65 To please my black and burnt affection.
 Why, every term-time I come up to sow Dissension betwixt ploughmen that should sow
 The field's vast womb and make the harvest grow.
 So comes it oft to pass, dear years befall 70 When ploughmen leave the field to till the Hall.
 Thus famine and bleak dearth do greet the land
 When the plough's held between a lawyer's hands.
 I fat with joy to see how the poor swains
 Do box their country thighs, carrying their packets
 75 Of writings, yet can neither read nor write.
 They're like to candles if they had no light,
 For they're as dark within, in sense and judgement,
 As is the Hole at Newgate, and their thoughts
 Are like the men that lie there, without spirit.
 80 This strikes my black soul into ravishing music,
 To see swains plod, and shake their ignorant skulls (For they are naught but skull, their brain but burr, Wanting wit's marrow and the sap of judgement),
 And how they grate with their hard naily soles
 85 The stones in Fleet Street, and strike fire in Paul's.
 Nay, with their heavy trot and iron stalk
 They have worn off the brass in the mid-walk.
 But let these pass for bubbles, and so die,
 For I rise now to breathe my legacy
 90 And make my last will, which I know shall stand
 As long as bawd or villain strides the land.

For which I'll turn my shape quite out of verse,
 Moved with the Supplication of poor Pierce,
 That writ so rarely villainous from hence 95 For spending money to my excellence, Gave me my titles freely, for which giving
 I rise now to take order for his living.
 The black Knight of the Post shortly returns
 From hell, where many a tobacc'nist burns, 100 With news to smoky gallants, riotous heirs,
 Strumpets that follow theatres and fairs,
 Gilded-nosed usurers, base-metalled panders,
 To copper-captains and Pickt-hatch commanders,
 To all infectious catchpoles through the town,
 105 The very speckled vermin of a crown,
 To these and those, and every damnèd one,
 I'll bequeath legacies to thrive upon.
 Amongst the which, I'll give, for his redress,
 A standing pension to Pierce Penniless.

The Black Book

110 No sooner was 'Pierce Penniless' breathed forth but I, the light-burning Sergeant Lucifer, quenched my fiery shape and whipped into a constable's nightgown, the cunning'st habit that could be,
 to search tipsy taverns, roosting inns and frothy alehouses, when, calling together my worshipful bench of bill-men, I proceeded 115 toward Pickt-hatch, intending to begin there first, which, as I may fitly name it, is the very skirts of all brothel-houses. The watchmen, poor night crows, followed, and thought still they had had the constable by the hand when they had the Devil by the gown-sleeve. At last I, looking up to the casements of every 120 suspected mansion, and spying a light twinkling between hope and desperation, guessed it to be some sleepy snuff, ever and anon winking and nodding in the socket of a candlestick as if the

- 61 stage rails There is no indisputable evidence of such a feature on the Globe stage, although stage rails did exist in such private and indoor theatres as Blackfriars.
- 62 join companies While 'to join company' is to get together for travel, the collocation here with 'actor' and 'share' implies, more specifically, joining a theatrical corps; the plural may simply be dictated by the rhyme.
- 63 sleek-eyed fawning, dissembling; cf. Hubburd (1228): 'sleek-faced courtier'
- 66 term-time period appointed for sitting of courts of law
- 70 Hall Westminster Hall, the courts of law
- 73 swains country or farm labourers
- 78 Hole at Newgate the cheapest and worst quarters in London's chief prison
- 82 burr a hollow passage
- 85 Fleet Street where, in Middleton's time, the legal profession was concentrated; the proximity of a multitude of taverns was no doubt mere coincidence
- Paul's St Paul's Cathedral; its 'mid-walk' or centre aisle (87) was heavily frequented by the unemployed (and the shadily employed).
- 93 Supplication of poor Pierce Thomas Nashe's Pierce Penniless His Supplication to the Divell (1592); note the play, here and elsewhere, on purse.
- 94-5 writ . . . excellence wrote from hence to me, asking for spending money
- 96 my titles Nashe's Pierce addresses himself to Lucifer with four lines of the devil's titles and honours.
- 98 Knight of the Post (a) dispatched to hell by Pierce to carry his supplication to Lucifer (see 428-30) (b) a professional giver of false evidence
- 99 tobacc'nist tobacco was already seen as a diabolical plague
- 102 Gilded-nosed from keeping one's nose constantly in one's gold; but Elizabethan usage associated a metallic sheen on the nose with a life of debauchery as well.
- base-metalled continuing the obvious lexical set, in which metallic qualifiers indicate low estate; and with a clear derivation from and play on 'base-metted'; the joke is in the spelling
- 103 copper-captains counterfeit officers
- Pickt-hatch suburban brothel district, just south-east of the intersection of Goswell Road and Old Street
- 104 catchpoles the much-despised warrant officers or bum-bailiffs who made arrests for debt; proximity to 'infectious' suggests a play on 'catch' meaning 'to contract a disease'
- 105 crown both the kingdom and the head
- 111 breathed forth i.e., spoken aloud at the end of the Moral
- 111-12 light-burning etymologically false glance at 'Lucifer' (meaning 'light-bringing' or 'light-bearing')
- 114 roosting (a) harbouring, lodging (b) possibly playing on 'rousting', i.e., 'bellowing, roaring'
- 115 bench common misappropriation of the term for a court of justice, or for a collection of judges or magistrates
- bill-men watchmen armed with bills (pikes or halberds)
- 119-20 by the hand . . . gown-sleeve proverbial (unrecorded variant of Tilley G260)
- 121-2 between hope and desperation i.e., between hope of burning and fear of going out
- 122 snuff (a) burnt wick (b) candle end

125 flame had been a-departing from the greasy body of Simon Snuff the stinkard. Whereupon I, the black constable, commanded my white guard not only to assist my office with their brown bills, but to raise up the house extempore. With that, the dreadful watchmen, having authority standing by them, thundered at the door whilst the candle lightened in the chamber, and so between 130 thund'ring and light'ning the bawd risse, first putting the snuff to an untimely death, a cruel and a lamentable murder, and then, with her fat-sag chin hanging down like a cow's udder, lay reeking out at the window, demanding the reason why they did summon a parley. I told her in plain terms that I had a warrant to search 135 from the sheriff of Limbo.

'How? From the sheriff of Lime Street?' replied Mistress Wimblechin (for so she understood the word Limbo, as if Limbo had been Latin for Lime Street). 'Why then all the doors of my house shall fly open and receive you, master constable.'

140 With that, as being the watchword, two or three vaulted out of their beds at once, one swearing stocks and stones he could not find his stockings, others that they could not hit upon their false bodice when, to speak truth and shame myself, they were then as close to their flesh as they could, and never put them off since 145 they were twelve year old. At last they shuffled up and were shut out at the back part as I came in at the north part. Up the stairs I went to examine the feather beds and carry the sheets before the justice, for there was none else then to carry, only the floor was strewn with busk-points, silk garters and shoe-strings, scattered 150 here and there for haste to make away from me, and the farther such run, the nearer they come to me.

Then, another door opening rearward, there came puffing out of the next room a villainous lieutenant without a band, as if he had been new cut down like one at Wapping, with his cruel garters about his neck, which fitly resembled two of Derrick's necklaces.
155 He had a head of hair like one of my devils in Doctor Faustus when the old Theatre cracked and frightened the audience. His brow was made of coarse bran, as if all the flour had been bolted out to make honest men, so ruggedly moulded with chops and crevices that I wonder how it held together, had it not been pasted 160 with villainy. His eyebrows jetted out like the round casement of an alderman's dining-room, which made his eyes look as if they had been both damned in his head, for if so be two souls had been so far sunk into hell-pits, they would never have walked abroad again. His nostrils were cousin-germans to coral, though of 165 a softer condition and of a more relenting humour. His crow-black mustachios were almost half an ell from one end to the other, as though they would whisper him in the ear about a cheat or a murder, and his whole face in general was more detestable ugly than the visage of my grim porter Cerberus, which showed that 170 all his body besides was made of filthy dust and sea-coal ashes. A down countenance he had, as if he would have looked thirty mile into hell and seen Sisyphus rolling and Ixion spinning and reeling.

Thus, in a pair of hoary slippers, his stockings dangling about his wrists, and his red buttons like foxes out of their holes, he began 175 like the true champion of a vaulting-house, first to fray me with the bugbears of his rough-cast beard, and then to sound base in mine ears like the Bear Garden drum, and this was the humour he put on, and the very apparel of his phrases:

'Why, master constable, dare you balk us in our own mansion, 180 ha? What, is not our house our Cold Harbour, our castle of comedown and lie-down? Must my honest wedded punk here, my glory-fat Audrey, be taken napping, and raised up by the thunder of bill-men? Are we disannulled of our first sleep, and cheated of our dreams and fantasies? Is there not law too for stealing away a 185 man's slumbers, as well as for sheets off from hedges? Come you to search an honest bawdy-house, this seven-and-twenty years in fame and shame? Go to, then, you shall search. Nay, my very boots, too. Are you well now? The least hole in my house, too. Are you pleased now? Can we not take our ease in our inn, but we must 190

126 white guard pale with fear, looking ahead to 'dreadful' (127-8)
130 risse rose 136 Lime Street one of the residential quarters of the merchants of London
136-7 Wimble-chin wimble = nimble 140 With that with the uttering of 'constable'
141 stocks and stones imprecation meaning 'gods of wood and stone' 143 bodice with a play on 'bodies', which in fact was the contemporary spelling to speak truth and shame myself ironic variant of the proverb 'Speak truth and shame the devil'
146 north part the devil's traditional entry point 149 busk-points tagged laces which secured the stays of corsets, etc.
153 band collar, playing on the sense
'group of followers, military regiment' 154 Wapping location of Execution Dock on north bank of the Thames, where pirates were chained up to be drowned by the rising tide cruel garters common term for the hangman's rope, playing on 'crewel', a worsted yarn

155 Derrick's Derrick was the hangman at Tyburn, c.1600
156 Doctor Faustus Performances of the Christopher Marlowe play had a reputation for being accompanied by supernatural events.
157 Theatre James Burbage's playhouse in Shoreditch, which operated from 1576 to 1597
159 chops cracks, fissures
161 casement window, window-frame 163 damned deeply sunk, as in the next clause; with a play on 'dammed' (to which Dyce and Bullen politely emend) 165 cousin-germans near relations 166 relenting literally, melting, turning to liquid; i.e., running; 'humour' is also used here in its liquid sense 167 ell an obsolete unit of measure, 45 inches in England
170 Cerberus many-headed dog guarding the gate of hell
171 sea-coal mineral coal shipped to London

by sea
172 down downcast, directed downwards 173 Sisyphus condemned forever to roll a heavy rock up a steep hill Ixion chained to a revolving burning wheel in hell
175 wrists ankles; insteps
176 vaulting-house brothel fray (a) frighten (b) chafe 177 bugbears hobgoblins rough-cast roughly contrived, coarse (like the lime-and-gravel plaster of the same name)
178 Bear Garden Southwark enclosure where bear-baiting was carried on; its drum was notoriously loud. Compare Meeting, 285-6.
180 balk disappointment (expectations)
181 Cold Harbour sanctuary in Upper Thames Street
182 punk whore
183 glory-fat blubbery; from 'glore', loose or excessive fat
189 hole with obvious sexual sense
190 take our ease in our inn proverbial come out so quickly? Nawd, go to bed, sweet Nawd. Thou wilt cool thy grease anon and make thy fat cake.'

This said, by the virtue and vice of my office I commanded my bill-men downstairs, when in a twinkling discovering myself a little, as much as might serve to relish me and show what stuff I was made of, I came and kissed the bawd, hugged her excellent villainies and cunning rare conveyances. Then, turning myself, I threw mine arms like a scarf or bandoleer cross the lieutenant's melancholy bosom, embraced his resolute phrases and his dissolute humours, highly commending the damnable trade and detestable course of their living, so excellent filthy and so admirable villainous. Whereupon, this lieutenant of Pickt-hatch fell into deeper league and farther acquaintance with the blackness of my bosom, sometimes calling me Master Lucifer the headborough, sometimes Master Devillin the little black constable, then telling me he heard from Limbo the eleventh of the last month, and that he had the letter to show, where they were all very merry. Marry, as he told me, there were some of his friends in Phlegethon troubled with the heart-burning ('Yea, and with the soul-burning, too,' thought I, 'though thou little dream'st of the torment.'). then complaining to me of their bad takings all the last plaguy summer, that there was no stirrings, and therefore undone for want of doings. Whereupon, after many such inductions to bring the scene of his poverty upon the stage, he desired in cool terms to borrow some forty pence of me. I stuffed with anger at that base and lazy petition, knowing that a right true villain and an absolute practised pander could not want silver damnation, but, living upon the revenues of his wits, might purchase the Devil and all. Half conquered with rage, thus I replied to his baseness:

'Why, for shame! A bawd and poor? Why then, let usurers go a-begging, or like an old Greek stand in Paul's with a porringer! Let brokers become whole honest then, and remove to heaven out of Houndsditch! Lawyers turn feeless, and take ten of a poor widow's tears for ten shillings! Merchants never forswear themselves, whose great perjured oaths o' land turn to great winds and cast away their ships at sea, which false perfidious tempest splits their ships abroad and their souls at home, making the one take salt water, and the other salt fire! Let mercers then have conscionable thumbs when they measure out that smooth glittering villaine, and that old reveller velvet, in the days of Monsieur, both which have devoured many an honest field of wheat and barley that hath been metamorphosed and changed into white money! Pooh, these are but little wonders, and may be easily possible in the working. A usurer to cry bread and meat is not a thing impossible, for indeed your greatest usurer is your greatest beggar, wanting as well that which he hath as that which he hath not: then who can be a greater beggar? He will not have his house smell like a cook's shop, and therefore takes an order no meat shall be dressed in it, and because there was an house upon Fish Street Hill burned to the ground once, he can abide by no means to have a fire in his chimney ever since.'

(To the confirming of which, I will insert here a pretty conceit of a nimble-witted gentlewoman that was worthy to be ladified for the jest, who, ent'ring into a usurer's house in London to take up money upon unmerciful interest for the space of a twelvemonth, was conducted through two or three hungry rooms into a fair dining-room by a Lenten-faced fellow, the usurer's man, whose nose showed as if it had been made of hollow pasteboard, and his cheeks like two thin pancakes clapped together. A pitiful knave he was, and looked for all the world as if meal had been at twenty shillings a bushel. The gentlewoman, being placed in this fair room to await the usurer's leisure—who was casting up ditches of gold in his counting-house—and being almost frozen with standing, for it was before Candlemas frost-bitten term, ever and anon turning about to the chimney where she saw a pair of corpulent giganatical andirons that stood like two burgomasters at both corners, a hearth briskly dressed up, and a great cluster of charcoal piled up together like black puddings, which lay for a dead fire, and in the dining-room, too: the gentlewoman wond'ring it was so long a-kindling, at last she caught the miserable conceit of it, and calling her man to her, bade him seek out for a piece of chalk or some peeling of a white wall, whilst in the mean time she conceived the device, when, taking up the six former coals one after another, she chalked upon each of them a satirical letter, which six were these: 'T. D. C. R. U. S.', explained thus: 'These Dead Coals Resemble Usurers' Souls'; then placing them in the same order again, turning the chalked sides inward to try conclusions, which, as it happened, made up the jest the better. By that time

192 cake congeal
 194 discovering revealing
 197 conveyances tricks
 198 bandoleer broad belt worn over the shoulder and across the breast
 204 headborough parish officer identical to petty constable
 205 Devillin variant of 'devil', a young devil; an imp
 206 eleventh the traditional number of transgression
 208 Phlegethon one of the five rivers of fire in Hades; hell
 211-12 last plaguy summer of 1603, a virulent plague year
 212-13 stirrings... doings sexual activity
 215 stuffed became out of breath
 218-19 purchase... all proverbial 221 Greek a cheat, sharper porringer (a) porridge or soup basin (b) a hat similarly shaped

222 brokers dealers in second-hand apparel, based mainly in Houndsditch (as in 223), which ran north-west along the line of the old city moat from Aldgate to Bishopsgate whole wholly, completely 228 salt fire bitter, vexatious fire, i.e., hell fire mercers dealers in costly fabrics 228-9 conscionable scrupulous; equitable 230 satin playing on Satan; the pun is common; but cf. Plato's Cap, 306; and note that Plato's Cap then proceeds to 'Velvet that old reveller'
Monsieur a seemingly gratuitous glance back at François de Valois, brother of Charles IX and Duke of Alençon and Anjou, the conclusion of whose controversial courtship of Elizabeth I (February 1582) continued to be remembered as an English escape from diabolical temptation. Compare Middleton's later animus against the Spanish marriage in Game.

 232 white money silver
 234 cry beg loudly
 239-40 Fish Street Hill running south from East Cheap to Lower Thames Street
 242 conceit ingenious stylistic decoration (acknowledging that this is a digression)
 248 pasteboard wood substitute made by pasting sheets of paper together
 250-1 twenty shillings a bushel about five times the going rate in 1603-4
 254 Candlemas 2 February, in Hilary Term, which Middleton refers to as 'Candlemas term' in Hubburd (19)
 258 black puddings blood sausages
 263 former foremost, front
 267 to try conclusions to experiment

- the usurer had done amongst his golden heaps, and entertaining the gentlewoman with a cough a quarter of an hour long, at last, after a rotten hawk and a hem, he began to spit and speak to her. To conclude, she was furnished of the money for a twelvemonth, but upon large security and most tragical usury. When keeping her day the twelvemonth after, coming to repay both the money and the breed of it—for interest may well be called the usurer's bastard—she found the hearth dressed up in the same order with a dead fire of charcoal again, and yet the Thames was half frozen at that time with the bitterness of the season, when turning the foremost rank of coals, determining again, as it seemed, to draw some pretty knavery upon them too, she spied all those six letters which she chalked upon them the twelvemonth before, and never a one stirred or displaced, the strange sight of which made her break into these words: 'Is it possible,' quoth she, 'a usurer should burn so little here, and so much in hell? Or is it the cold property of these coals to be above a twelvemonth a-kindling?' So much to show the frozen charity of a usurer's chimney.)
- 'And then a broker to be an honest soul, that is, to take but sixpence a month, and threepence for the bill-making. A devil of a very good conscience. Possible too to have a lawyer bribeless and without fee, if his clientless, or female client, please his eye well. A merchant to wear a suit of perjury but once a quarter or so. Mistake me not, I mean not four times an hour. That shift were too short. He could not put it on so soon, I think. And lastly, not impossible for a mercer to have a thumb in folio, like one of the biggest of the guard, and so give good and very bountiful measure. But which is most impossible, to be a right bawd and poor! It strikes my spleen into dullness and turns all my blood into cool lead. Wherefore was vice ordained but to be rich, shining and wealthy, seeing virtue, her opponent, is poor, ragged and needy? Those that are poor are timorous honest and foolish harmless, as your carolling shepherds, whistling ploughmen and such of the same innocent rank, that never relish the black juice of villainy, never taste the red food of murder or the damnable suckets of luxury, whereas a pander is the very oil of villains and the syrup of rogues—of excellent rogues, I mean, such as have purchased five hundreds a year by the talent of their villainy. How many such gallants do I know, that live only upon the revenue of their wits! Some whose brains are above an hundred mile about, and those are your geometrical thieves, which may fitly be called so because they measure the highways with false gallops, and therefore are heirs of more acres than five-and-fifty elder brothers. Sometimes they are clerks of Newmarket Heath, sometimes the sheriffs of Salisbury Plain, and another time they commit brothelery when they make many a man stand at Hockley in the Hole. These are your great head landlords indeed, which call the word robbing the gathering in of their rents, and name all passengers their tenants at will.
- 'Another set of delicate knaves there are, that dive into deeds and writings of lands left to young gull-finches, poisoning the true sense and intent of them with the merciless antimony of the common law, and so by some crafty clause or two shove the true foolish owners quite beside the saddle of their patrimonies, and then they hang only by the stirrups, that is, by the cold alms and frozen charity of the gentlemen-defeaters, who, if they take after me, their great-grandfather, will rather stamp them down in the deep mire of poverty than bolster up their heads with a poor wisp of charity. Such as these corrupt the true meanings of last wills and testaments, and turn legacies the wrong way, wresting them quite awry like Grantham Steeple.
- 'The third rank, quainter than the former, presents us with the race of lusty vaulting gallants, that instead of a French horse practise upon their mistresses all the nimble tricks of vaulting, and are worthy to be made dukes for doing the Somerset so lively. This nest of gallants, for the natural parts that are in them, are maintained by their drawnwork dames and their embroidered mistresses, and can dispend their two thousand a year out of other men's coffers, keep at every heel a man, beside a French lackey (a great boy with a beard) and an English page which fills up the place of an angle. They have their city-horse, which I may well term their stone-horse or their horse upon the stones, for indeed
- 270
275
280
285
290
295 300
- 305
310 315
320
325
330
335
340
- 270-1 cough . . . spit conventional phlegmatic attributes of the usurer in satire (phlegm, in humour theory, is cold, moist, dull, and slothful)
- 288 bill-making writing up the charges or the promissory note
- 292 shift change of clothes, with a play on the article of clothing
- 294 have a thumb in folio give generous measure
- 295 biggest of the guard King James's beefeaters, his household guard, were known for their great size.
- 302 black juice bile, linked with melancholy
- 303 suckets sweetmeats; presumably with an obscene glance at 'sockets'
- 309 geometrical literally, measuring earth
- 310 false gallops (a) canters (b) fig. illicit excursions
- 312-14 Newmarket . . . Hole all three were notorious for highway robbery
- 314 stand halt; with a play on male sexual arousal
- 316-17 tenants at will tenants who occupy a property at the pleasure of the landlord
- 318 delicate precise; given to pleasure
- 319 gull-finches simpletons
- 320 antimony ordinarily an emetic rather than a poison; exploiting the punning link with 'patrimonies' (322)
- 321 clause playing on 'claws'; see Textual Notes
- 329 Grantham Steeple There are numerous contemporary references to the apparent twisting of the steeple of the 13th-century parish church at Grantham.
- 330 quainter more cunning; but also glancing at 'quaint' as 'cunt'
- 331 vaulting gallants gigolos; note the subsequent play on 'vaulting' as both gymnastic and sexual feats
- French horse Venereal diseases were frequently categorized as French, and a 'horse' is a vaulting block; hence a play on 'whores', leading to the ponderous quibbles with 'horse' and 'stones' (339-42).
- 333 Somerset common alteration of 'somersault', but a generic glance at the Seymours as well: Sir Edward, 1st Duke of Somerset, had his marital difficulties in the 1560s; son Edward married without permission in 1582; and grandson William, heir to the dukedom, had apparently begun a torrid affair with Arabella Stuart in 1602
- 334 natural parts (a) native ability (b) genital endowment
- 335 drawnwork ornamental work in fabrics, produced by drawing out some of the threads
- 338 great boy with a beard a very late learner; see Pierce: 'you shall see a great boy with a beard learn his A B C and sit weeping under the rod, when he is thirty years old' (1.179)
- 339 ingle homosexual boy-favourite
- 340 stone-horse stallion

the city, being the lusty dame and mistress of the land, lays all her foundation upon good stone-work, and somebody pays well for't, where'er it lights, and might with less cost keep London Bridge in reparations every fall than Mistress Bridget his wife; for women and bridges always lack mending, and what the advantage of one tide performs comes another tide presently and washes away.

345 'Those are your gentleman gallants, that see the uppermost and never lin galloping till they run over into the fire, so gloriously accounted that they ravish the eyes of all wantons and take them prisoners in their shops with a brisk suit of apparel. They strangle and choke more velvet in a deep-gathered hose than would serve to line through my lord what-call-ye-him's coach.

350 'What need I infer more of their prodigal glisters and their spangled damnations, when these are arguments sufficient to show the wealth of sin, and how rich the sons and heirs of Tartary are? And are these so glorious, so flourishing, so brimful of golden lucifers or light angels, and thou a pander and poor? A bawd and empty, apparelled in villainous packthread, in a wicked suit of coarse hop-bags, the wings and skirts faced with the ruins of dish-clouts? Fie, I shame to see thee dressed up so abominable scurvy. Complain'st thou of bad doings, when there are harlots of all trades and knaves of all languages? Knowest thou not that sin may be committed either in French, Dutch, Italian or Spanish, and all after the English fashion? But thou excuseth the negligence of thy practice by the last summer's pestilence. Alas, poor shark-gull, that put off is idle. For Sergeant Carbuncle, one of the plague's chief officers, dares not venture within three yards of an harlot because Monsieur Dry-bone the Frenchman is a ledger before him.'

360 At which speech the slave burst into a melancholy laugh which showed for all the world like a sad tragedy with a clown in't, and thus began to reply: 'I know not whether it be a cross or a curse, noble Philip of Phlegethon, or whether both, that I am forced to pink four ells of bag to make me a summer suit, but I protest, what with this long vacation and the fidging of gallants to Norfolk and up and down countries, Pierce was never so penniless as poor Lieutenant Frig-beard.'

With those words he put me in mind of him for whom I chiefly changed myself into an officious constable, poor Pierce Penniless, when presently I demanded of this lieutenant the place of his abode, and when he last heard of him, though I knew well enough both where to hear of him and find him. To which he made answer: 'Who? Pierce? Honest Penniless? He that writ the mad-cap's Supplication? Why, my very next neighbour, lying within three lean houses of me at old Mistress Silver-pin's, the only door-keeper in Europe. Why, we meet one another every term-time, and shake hands when the Exchequer opens, but when we open our hands the devil of penny we can see.'

With that I cheered up the drooping slave with the aqua vitae of villainy and put him in excellent comfort of my damnable legacy, saying I would stuff him with so many wealthy instructions that he should excel even Pandarus himself and go nine mile beyond him in panderism, and from thence forward he should never know a true rascal go under his red velvet slops and a gallant bawd indeed below her loose-bodied satin!

390 This said, the slave hugged himself and bussed the bawd for joy, when presently I left them in the midst of their wicked smack and descended to my bill-men that waited in the pernicious alley for me, their master constable. And marching forward to the third garden-house, there we knocked up the ghost of Mistress Silver-pin, who suddenly risse out of two white sheets and acted out of her tiring-house window. But having understood who we were, and the authority of our office, she presently, even in her ghost's apparel, unfolded the doors and gave me my free entrance, when in policy I charged the rest to stay and watch the house below whilst I stumbled up two pair of stairs in the dark, but at last caught in mine eyes the sullen blaze of a melancholy lamp that burnt very tragically upon the narrow desk of a half bedstead, which descried all the pitiful ruins throughout the whole chamber. The bare privities of the stone walls were hid with

- 342 stone-work sexual activity
 344 fall (a) autumn (b) a sexual lapse
 346 presently immediately
 347-8 seethe . . . fire cf. Geoffrey Whitney's emblem, Qui se exultat, humiliabitur, figured as a cauldron which boils over and puts out its own fire (1586)
 348 lin cease
 353 infer report
 354 spangled (a) decorated, glittering (b) speckled, spotted 355 Tartary Tartarus, hell
 357 light angels underweight or clipped gold coins
 359 wings lateral projections on the shoulder of a garment, designed to hide the points attaching the sleeves
 360 dish-clouts dish-rags
 365 shark-gull both knave and dupe
 366 Carbuncle plague sore
 367 yards with a glance, given the context, at 'yard' as 'penis' 368 Dry-bone syphilitic ledger (a) resident (b) ambassador 372 cross vexation
 374 pink decorate fabric by cutting eyelet-holes or figures
 375 long vacation the summer vacation, which began early in 1603 when Trinity Term was adjourned on 23 June because of the plague fidging . . . Norfolk presumably with reference to the restless flight ('fidging') out of London, by those who could afford it, to avoid the plague 376 countries counties
 377 Frig-beard one who rubs or chafes his beard (hence its 'rough-cast' quality, 176-7); and with the bawdy senses of 'frig' in play as well 385 lean houses with a play on 'penthouses'?
Mistress Silver-pin's Joan Silver-pin, who also appears in Gilbert Walker's A manifest detection of the most vyle and detestable use of Diceplay (1552), seems to have been the type of the Tudor whore. Her name may glance at disease through the use of 'pin' to designate a small hard swelling.
 385-6 door-keeper bawd
 387 Exchequer Westminster department concerned with collection and administration of royal revenues
 392 Pandarus the go-between in Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida (1602-3)
 394 slops wide baggy breeches
 395 loose-bodied convenient for concealing pregnancy, and thus commonly associated with the dress of prostitutes
 396 bussed kissed
 398 pernicious alley with a glance at Rotten Row, immediately adjacent to Picket-hatch?
 400 garden-house (a) small house erected on the garden of a previously existing property (b) brothel 401 white sheets like a stage ghost?
 402 tiring-house the actors' interior area (tiring = dressing) behind the upstage façade of the stage platform
 406 pair flights
 408-9 half bedstead a bedstead of half the usual size

two pieces of painted cloth, but so ragged and tattered that one might have seen all nevertheless, hanging for all the world like the two men in chains between Mile End and Hackney. The testern, or the shadow over the bed, was made of four ells of cobwebs, and a number of small spinners' ropes hung down for curtains. The spindle-shank spiders, which show like great lechers with little legs, went stalking over his head as if they had been conning of Tamburlaine. To conclude, there was many such sights to be seen, and all under a penny, beside the lamentable prospect of his hose and doublet which, being of old Kendal green, fitly resembled a pitched field upon which trampled many a lusty corporal. In this unfortunate tiring-house lay poor Pierce upon a pillow stuffed with horse-meat, the sheets smudged so dirtily as if they had been stolen by night out of St Pulcher's churchyard when the sexton had left a grave open and so laid the dead bodies woolward. The coverlet was made of pieces o' black cloth clapped together, such as was snatched off the rails in King's Street at the Queen's funeral. Upon this miserable bed's-head lay the old copy of his Supplication in foul written hand which my black Knight of the Post conveyed to hell, which no sooner I entertained in my hand, but with the rattling and blabbing of the papers poor Pierce began to stretch and grate his nose against the hard pillow, when after a rouse or two he muttered these reeling words between drunk and sober, that is, between sleeping and waking: 'I should laugh, i'faith, if for all this I should prove a usurer before I die and have never a penny now to set up withal. I would build a nunnery in Picket-hatch here and turn the walk in Paul's into a bowling alley. I would have the Thames leaded over, that they might play at cony-holes with the arches under London Bridge. Well,' and with that he waked, 'the Devil is a mad knave still.'

'How now, Pierce?' quoth I. 'Dost thou call me knave to my face?' Whereat the poor slave started up with his hair a-tiptoe. To whom by easy degrees I gently discovered myself, who, trembling like the treble of a lute under the heavy finger of a farmer's daughter, craved pardon of my damnable excellence and gave me my titles as freely as if he had known where all my lordships lay and how many acres there were in Tartary. But at the length, having recovered to be bold again, he unfolded all his bosom to me, told me that the Knight of Perjury had lately brought him a singed letter sent from a damned friend of his, which was thus directed as followeth: 'From Styx to Wood's Close, or the Walk of Picket-hatch'.

After I saw poor Penniless grow so well acquainted with me and so familiar with the villainy of my humour, I unlocked my determinations and laid open my intents in particulars, the cause of my up-rising being moved both with his penetrable petition and his insufferable poverty, and therefore changed my shape into a little wapper-eyed constable, to wink and blink at small faults and, through the policy of searching, to find him out the better in his cleanly tabernacle, and therefore gave him encouragement now to be frolic for the time was at hand, like a pickpurse, that Pierce should be called no more Penniless, like the Mayor's Bench at Oxford, but rather Pierce Penny-fist because his palm shall be pawed with pence. This said, I bade him be resolved and get up to breakfast, whilst I went to gather my noise of villains together and made his lodging my convocation house. With that, in a resulting humour, he called his hose and doublet to him (which could almost go alone, borne like a hearse upon the legs of vermin), whilst I thumped downstairs with my cowheel, embraced Mistress Silver-pin and betook me to my billmen, when, in a twinkling before them all, I leapt out of master constable's nightgown into an usurer's fusty furred jacket, whereat the watchmen staggered and all their bills fell down in a swoon, when I walked close by them, laughing and coughing like a rotten-

411 painted cloth a poor substitute for costly tapestry
 412-13 the two men in chains between Mile End and Hackney presumably an event in the vicinity of Cambridge Heath; criminals were hung in chains at Mile End Green, but I find no other reference to the indecent exposure implied here. Mile End was east of Whitechapel, a mile from Aldgate. The village of Hackney was almost due north of Mile End.
 414 shadow canopy, with playful use of the term for the roof over the stage in public playhouses 415 spinners' spiders'
 416 spindle-shank having long skinny legs
 417 conning memorizing
 418 Tamburlaine Marlowe's play; the conqueror was played by the great Edward Alleyn, whose long-legged martial gait in the role was much remarked on, as for example by Joseph Hall who speaks of 'The stalking steps of his great personage' (Virgideiarius, l.iii.16).
 420 Kendal green green woollen cloth

423 horse-meat horse-feed (chaff was sometimes used as pillow-stuffing by poor country folk); but with a possible echo of Pierce's 'side of bacon that you might lay under your head' (1.216)
 424 St Pulcher's churchyard the quite nearby graveyard of St Sepulchre's, heavily used during plague years, and the usual burial place of criminals executed at Tyburn
 425 woolward wearing wool next to the skin, esp. as a penance; but also, often, in the absence of a clean shirt
 427 King's Street the way to Westminster Abbey, from Charing Cross
 427-8 Queen's funeral 28 April 1603
 428-9 old copy . . . foul written hand the rough copy or foul papers 433 rouse (a) shake (b) draught of liquor
 436 nunnery brothel
 439 cony-holes suggests a bowling game like nine-holes or pigeon-holes; literally, rabbit burrows; and a 'cony' in popular usage might be either a dupe or a loose woman.
 440 Devil . . . knave proverbial

451 Styx like Phlegethon, one of the rivers of hell
Wood's Close a village about three and a half miles north of Islington Walk perhaps playing with 'walk' meaning 'a tract of forest land' 455 in particulars in detail
 456 penetrable capable of penetrating (i.e., affecting) 458 wapper-eyed sore-eyed, blinking
 460 tabernacle referring ironically to the cobweb-canopy over Pierce's bed
 461 at hand . . . pickpurse proverbial
 462-3 Mayor's Bench at Oxford Penniless Bench, a seat at the east end of old Carfax Church, set aside for loungers and paupers; this phrase has been inked over by hand in the Folger copy, perhaps by some overly sensitive mayor!
 464 pawed rudely covered, by the Devil's paw
 465 noise company or band of musicians
 467 in a resulting humour i.e., revived
 469-70 cowheel the cloven hoof of the Devil 472 fusty stale-smelling

475 lunged usurer to see what Italian faces they all made when they missed their constable and saw the black gown of his office lie full in a puddle.

Well, away I scudded in the musty moth-eaten habit, and being upon Exchange-time, I crowded myself amongst merchants, 480 poisoned all the Burse in a minute and turned their faiths and troths into curds and whey, making them swear those things now which they forswore when the quarters struck again, for I was present at the clapping up of every bargain, which did ne'er hold no longer than they held hands together. There I heard news out of all countries in all languages: how many villains were in Spain, 485 how many luxurs in Italy, how many perjurers in France and how many reel-pots in Germany.

At last I met, at half-turn, one whom I had spent mine eyes so long for, an hoary money-master that had been off and on some six-and-fifty years damned in his counting-house, for his 490 only recreation was but to hop about the Burse before twelve to hear what news from the Bank and how many merchants were bankrupt the last change of the moon. This rammish penny-father I rounded in the left ear, winded in my intent, the place and hour, 495 which no sooner he sucked in but smiled upon me in French and replied:

O Monsieur Diabla,
I'll be chief guest at your tabla.

With that we shook hands, and as we parted I bade him bring 500 Master Cog-bill the scrivener along with him, and so I vanished out of that dressing. And passing through Birchin Lane amidst a camp royal of hose and doublets, Master Snip's backside being turned where his face stood, I took excellent occasion to slip into a captain's suit, a valiant buff doublet stuffed with points like a leg of mutton with parsley, and a pair of velvet slops scored thick with lace which ran round about the hose like ringworms, able to make a man scratch where it itched not. And thus accoutred, taking up my weapons o' trust in the same order at the next cutler's I came to, I marched to Master Bezzle's ordinary, where I found a whole dozen of my damned crew sweating as much at dice as many poor 510 labourers do with the casting of ditches, when presently I set in a stake amongst them. Round it went, but the crafty dice having peeped upon me once, knew who I was well enough and would never have their little black eyes off o' me all the while after. At last came my turn about, the dice quaking in my fist before I 515 threw them. But when I jerked them forth, away they ran like Irish lackeys as far as their bones would suffer them, I sweeping up all the stakes that lay upon the table. Whereat some stamped, others swore, the rest cursed and all in general fretted to the gall that a newcomer, as they termed me, should gather in so many fifteens 520 at the first vomit.

Well, thus it passed on, the dice running as false as the drabs in Whitefriars, and when anyone thought himself surest, in came I with a lurching cast and made them all swear round again. But such gunpowder oaths they were that I wonder how the ceiling 525 held together without spitting mortar upon them.

'Swounds, Captain,' swore one to me, 'I think the Devil be thy good lord and master.'

'True,' thought I, 'and thou his gentleman-usher.'

In conclusion, it fattened me better than twenty eighteenpence 530 ordinaries to hear them rage, curse and swear like so many Emperors of Darkness. And all these twelve were of twelve several companies. There was your gallant extraordinary thief, that keeps his college of good-fellows and will not fear to rob a lord in his coach for all his ten trencher-bearers on horseback; your deep-conceited cutpurse, who by the dexterity of his knife will draw 535 out the money and make a flame-coloured purse show like the bottomless pit, but with never a soul in't; your cheating bowler, that will bank false of purpose and lose a game of twelvecence to

475 what...made how they all ran away; an 'Italian face' is a backside
476 full completely, with a playful glance at its actual emptiness 478 scudded ran briskly
479 Exchange-time from 11:00 a.m. to 12:00 noon
480 Burse Royal Exchange
480-1 turned...whey made all their sworn oaths worthless
482 quarters quarter-hours
486 luxurs lechers
487 reel-pots drunkards
488 half-turn 11:30
492 Bank in the usual financial sense, but with a possible glance at the Bankside and its brothels
493 rammish rank
penny-father miser; more particularly a usurer, returning to the idea of interest as the usurer's bastard; presumably this is the 'Mihell Money-god, usurer' who is later named executor of the will (807-11).
494 rounded whispered left ear the Devil's side, naturally winded (a) blew (b) insinuated

495 in French continuing the characterization of the French as 'perjurers' (486)
500 Cog-bill To 'cog' is to cheat; thus 'Cog-bill' will write up false documents of obligation.
501 dressing costume (of a usurer)
Birchin Lane between Lombard Street and Cornhill, occupied mainly by drapers and second-hand clothes dealers 502 camp royal a great body of troops; a great number 502-3 Master...stood i.e., the tailor had his back to the devil, or to the front of his shop (or his head where the sun does not shine?)
504 buff doublet military jacket of oxhide
508 o' trust on the honour system
509 Bezzle's a 'bezzle' is a heavy drinker; also with a possible glance at Beelzebub (as at 593), and hence at the Devil Tavern in Fleet Street ordinary eating-house or tavern 511 casting (a) digging (b) glancing at the casting of dice 516 jerked flung

516-17 Irish lackeys Irishmen here commonly employed as running-footmen.
517 bones legs (dice were made of bone)
519 fretted to the gall fig., chafed to the point of soreness or irritation 520 fifteens playful reference to the common tax of one-fifteenth on personal property
521 vomit cast
523 Whitefriars notorious as the refuge of prostitutes ('drabs')
524 lurching winning
525 gunpowder explosive; easily inflamed
527 'Swounds' 'God's wounds' (one of the most profane of oaths)
530-1 eighteenpence ordinaries costly meals
532-3 twelve several companies glancing at the twelve principal companies or guilds in the City of London
534 college of good-fellows collection of thieves
535 trencher-bearers servants; a trencher is a plate or platter
535-6 deep-conceited exceedingly clever 538 bottomless pit hell soul with a play on sol or sou, French coins

540 purchase his partner twelve shillings in bets, and so share it after the play; your cheverel-gutted catchpole, who like a horse-leech sucks gentlemen; and in all, your twelve tribes of villainy, who no sooner understood the quaint form of such an uncustomed legacy 545 but they all pawned their vicious golls to meet there at the hour prefixed. And to confirm their resolution the more, each slipped down his stocking, baring his right knee, and so began to drink a health half as deep as Mother Hubbard's cellar (she that was called in for selling her working bottle-ale to bookbinders and 550 spurting the froth upon courtiers' noses). To conclude, I was their only captain, for so they pleased to title me, and so they all risse, potulis manibusque applauding my news. Then, the hour being more than once and once reiterated, we were all at our hands again, and so departed.

555 I could tell now that I was in many a second house in the city and suburbs afterward, where my entertainment was not barren nor my welcome cheap or ordinary, and then how I walked in Paul's to see fashions, to dive into villainous meetings, pernicious plots, black humours and a million of mischiefs which are bred in that cathedral womb and born within less than forty weeks after.
560 But some may object, and say, 'What? Doth the Devil walk in Paul's then?'

Why not, sir, as well as a sergeant, or a ruffian, or a murderer?
May not the Devil, I pray you, walk in Paul's as well as the horse go a-top of Paul's? For I am sure I was not far from his keeper. Pooh, 565 I doubt where there is no doubt, for there is no true critic indeed that will carp at the Devil.

Now the hour posted onward to accomplish the effects of my desire, to gorge every vice full of poison that the soul might burst at the last and vomit out herself upon blue cakes of brimstone, 570 when, returning home for the purpose in my captain's apparel of buff and velvet, I struck mine hostess into admiration at my proper appearance, for my polt-foot was helped out with bombast, a property which many worldlings use whose toes are dead and rotten, and therefore so stuff out their shoes like the corners of 575 wool-packs.

Well, into my tiring-house I went, where I had scarce shifted myself into the apparel of my last will and testament, which was the habit of a covetous barn-cracking farmer, but all my striplings of perdition, my nephews of damnation, my kindred and alliance of villainy and sharking, were ready before the hour to receive 580 my bottomless blessing. When entering into a country nightgown with a cap of sickness about my brows, I was led in between Pierce Penniless and his hostess, like a feeble farmer ready to depart England and sail to the kingdom of Tartary, who setting me down in a wicked chair, all my pernicious kinsfolks round about me, and 585 the scrivener between my legs (for he loves always to sit in the Devil's cot-house), thus, with a whey countenance, short stops and earthen-dampish voice, the true counterfeits of a dying cullion, I proceeded to the black order of my legacies.

*The Last Will and Testament of Lawrence Lucifer, the old wealthy bachelor of Limbo,
alias Dick Devil-barn, the griping farmer of Kent.* 590

In the name of Bezzle-bub, amen.

I, Lawrence Lucifer, alias Dick Devil-barn, sick in soul but not in body, being in perfect health to wicked memory, do constitute 595 and ordain this my last will and testament irrevocable, as long as the world shall be trampled on by villainy.

Imprimis, I, Lawrence Lucifer, bequeath my soul to hell and my body to the earth. Amongst you all divide me and share me equally, but with as much wrangling as you can, I pray, and it will 600 be the better if you go to law for me.

As touching my worldly-wicked goods, I give and bequeath them in most villainous order following:

First, I constitute and ordain Lieutenant Frig-beard, Archpander of England, my sole heir of all such lands, closes and gaps as 605 lie within the bounds of my gift. Beside, I have certain houses, tenements and withdrawing-rooms in Shoreditch, Turnbull Street, Whitefriars and Westminster, which I freely give and bequeath to the aforesaid lieutenant and the base heirs truly begot of his villainous body, with this proviso, that he sell none of the land 610 when he lacks money, nor make away any of the houses to impair and weaken the stock, no, not so much as to alter the property of any of them, which is to make them honest against their wills, but to train and muster his wits upon the Mile End of his mazard, rather to fortify the territories of Turnbull Street and enrich the 615 county of Pickt-hatch with all his vicious endeavours, golden

541 cheverel-gutted Cheverel, kid-leather, is noted for its stretchiness; so the phrase
may mean 'pot-bellied' or 'insatiable'.

544 pawned...golls pledged with their hands

547 Mother Hubbard's cellar The fact that Spenser's Mother Hubberds Tale (1591) was satiric, that it excited comment from Harvey and Nashe, and that it was likely called in, all render unnecessary Adams' theory of a second satirical work of the same name in early 1604 (Ghost of Lucrece, xxvi, n.1). If there is little clear connection between the substance of Spenser's poem and Middleton's references, the reason might be that Middleton knew the poem only by reputation. If Hubburd's Clutchfist is Compton, as Adams suggests, there might be a link with the fact that Mother

Hubberds Tale had been dedicated to Lady Compton.

548 called in recalled or confiscated by an official act of censorship

551 potulis manibusque with cups and hands

554 second house a playful glance at Pierce (1.216), where it is ventured that 'every second house in Shoreditch is maintained' by prostitution

563-4 horse...Paul's Morocco, the famed stunt horse, was reputed to have climbed to the top of St Paul's c.1600.

572 polt-foot club-foot bombast cotton-wool stuffing; hence the rhetorical term

575 wool-packs large fleece bags

578 barn-cracking engrossing grain until the barn is filled to splitting

585 wicked with a play on 'wicker'?

587 cot-house shed, shelter short stops of the breath; panting

588 cullion base fellow; lit. testicle

590 Lawrence Lucifer his name in Pierce as well; cf. Tilley D289.

592 griping grasping

599-600 divide...equally a black glance at the Last Supper

605 closes enclosed fields

gaps openings in hedges or walls

607 tenements flats, suites, single rooms let out as separate dwellings withdrawing-rooms rooms to retire to (for illicit activities)

607-8 Shoreditch...Westminster here, all sites of prostitution

614 Mile End the green was a militia training ground

mazard head

enticements and damnable practices. And, lieutenant, thou must dive, as thou usest to do, into landed novices, who have only wit to be lickerish and no more, that so their tenants, trotting up to 620 London with their quarterages, they may pay them the rent, but thou and thy college shall receive the money.

Let no young wriggle-eyed damosel, if her years have struck twelve once, be left unassaulted, but it must be thy office to lay hard siege to her honesty and to try if the walls of her maidenhead 625 may be scaled with a ladder of angels, for one acre of such wenches will bring in more at year's end than an hundred acres of the best harrowed land between Deptford and Dover. And take this for a note by the way: you must never walk without your deuce or deuce-ace of drabs after your boot-heels, for when 630 you are abroad you know not what use you may have for them.
 And lastly, if you be well-fee'd by some riotous gallant, you must practise, as indeed you do, to wind out a wanton velvet cap and bodkin from the tangles of her shop, teaching her (you know how) to cast a cuckold's mist before the eyes of her husband, which is 635 telling him she must see her cousin new come to town, or that she goes to a woman's labour, when thou knowest well enough she goes to none but her own, and being set out of the shop with her man afore her to quench the jealousy of her husband, she by thy instructions shall turn the honest simple fellow off 640 at the next turning and give him leave to see The Merry Devil of Edmonton or A Woman Killed with Kindness, when his mistress is going herself to the same murder. Thousand of such inventions, practices and devices I stuff thy trade withal, beside the luxurious meetings at taverns, ten-pound suppers and fifteen-645 pound reckonings, made up afterwards with riotous eggs and muscadine. All these female vomits and adulterous surfeits I give and bequeath to thee, which I hope thou wilt put in practice with all expedition after my decease, and to that end I ordain thee wholly and solely my only absolute, excellent, villainous heir.

650 Item, I give and bequeath to you, Gregory Gauntlet, high thief on horseback, all such sums of money that are nothing due to you, and to receive them in whether the parties be willing to pay you or no. You need not make many words with them, but only these two, 'Stand and deliver.' And therefore a true thief cannot choose 655 but be wise, because he is a man of so very few words.

I need not instruct you, I think, Gregory, about the politic searching of crafty carriers' packs or ripping up the bowels of wide boots and cloak-bags. I do not doubt but you have already exercised them all. But one thing I especially charge you of, the neglect of which makes many of your religion tender their wine-pipes at Tyburn at least three months before their day: that if you 660 chance to rob a virtuous townsman on horseback with his wife upon a pillion behind him, you presently speak them fair to walk a turn or two at one side where, binding them both together like man and wife, arm in arm very lovingly, be sure you tie them 665 hard enough for fear they break the bonds of matrimony, which if it should fall out so, the matter would lie sore upon your necks the next sessions after, because your negligent tying was the cause of that breach between them.

Now, as for your Welsh hue and cry, the only net to catch thieves 670 in, I know you avoid well enough because you can shift both your beards and your towns well, but for your better disguising henceforward I will fit you with a beard-maker of mine own, one that makes all the false hairs for my devils and all the periwigs that are worn by old courtiers who take it for a pride in their bald 675 days to wear yellow curls on their foreheads when one may almost see the sun go to bed through the chinks of their faces.

Moreover, Gregory, because I know thee toward enough, and thy arms full of feats, I make thee Keeper of Coombe Park, Sergeant of Salisbury Plain, Warden of the standing-places and 680 lastly, Constable of all heaths, holes, highways and cony-groves, hoping that thou wilt execute these places and offices as truly as Derrick will execute his place and office at Tyburn.

Item, I give and bequeath to thee, Dick Dog-man, Grand Catch-pole, over and above thy bare-bone fees that will scarce hang 685 wicked flesh on thy back, all such lurches, gripes and squeezes as may be wrung out by the fist of extortion. And because I take pity on thee, waiting so long as thou usest to do ere thou canst land one fare at the Counter, watching sometimes ten hours together in an ale-house, ever and anon peeping forth and sampling thy 690 nose with the red lattice, let him whosoever that falls into thy clutches at night pay well for thy standing all day. And, cousin Richard, when thou hast caught him in the mousetrap of thy liberty with the cheese of thy office, the wire of thy hard fist be-695 ing clapped down upon his shoulders, and the back of his estate almost broken to pieces, then call thy cluster of fellow vermins together, and sit in triumph with thy prisoner at the upper end of a tavern table where, under the colour of showing him favour, as you term it, in waiting for bail, thou and thy counter-leech may 700 swallow down six gallons of charnico and then begin to chafe that

618 landed novices naive young heirs of lands
 619 lickerish wanton
 620 quarterages quarterly payments
 622 wriggle-eyed fluttery-eyed, flirtacious; or 'rigol-eyed' (round-eyed), innocent 625 angels coins; with a glance at Jacob's ladder 627 between Deptford and Dover from one end of Kent to the other 629 deuce-ace a threesome
 632 wind out lure 632-3 velvet cap and bodkin well-to-do female shopkeeper
 635 cousin playing on 'cozen'; and cf. Five Gallants, where a secret lover is a 'cousin out o'th' country' (I.I.38)

640-1 The Merry... Kindness The first play, anonymous, was written 1599-1603; the second, by Heywood, is from 1603.
 645-6 eggs and muscadine aphrodisiacs;
 'muscadine' is muscatel
 661 Tyburn place of execution for Middlesex criminals
 663 pillion pad or cushion attached to rear of ordinary saddle
 670 Welsh hue and cry A 'hue and cry' is an outcry calling for pursuit of a felon;
 'Welsh' carries connotations of thievery, of lechery, of noisy incomprehensible babble, but may be suggested here by the pun on 'Hugh', a typical Welsh name.

671 avoid escape
 679 Coombe Park in Surrey; yet another regular site for highway robberies, as in Five Gallants, 3.1
 680 Salisbury Plain ditto; see 312-13 684 Dog-man from 'dog', to pursue or track, especially with hostile intent 686 lurches scams
 689 Counter debtors' prison
 690 sampling putting in comparison, matching 691 red lattice formerly a common mark of an ale-house 694 liberty district over which a person's privilege extends 700 charnico sweet Portuguese wine

- he makes you stay so long before Peter Bail comes. And here it will not be amiss if you call in more wine-suckers and damn as many gallons again, for you know your prisoner's ransom will pay for all—this is if the party be flush now, and would not have his credit copped with a scurvy counter.
- 705 Another kind of 'rest you have which is called shoe-penny—that is when you will be paid for every stride you take, and if the channel be dangerous and rough, you will not step over under a noble; a very excellent lurch to get up the price of your legs between Paul's Chain and Ludgate.
- 710 But that which likes me beyond measure is the villainous nature of that arrest which I may fitly term by the name of cog-shoulder, when you clap o' both sides like old Rowse in Cornhill, and receive double fee both from the creditor and the debtor, swearing by the post of your office to shoulder-clap the party the first time he lights upon the lime-twigs of your liberty when, for a little usurer's oil, you allow him day by day free passage to walk by the wicked precinct of your noses, and yet you will pimple your souls with oaths till you make them as well-favoured as your faces, and swear he never came within the verge of your eyelids. Nay more, if the creditor were present to see him arrested on the one side, and the party you wot on over the way at the other side, you have such quaint shifts, pretty hindrances and most lawyer-like delays ere you will set forward, that in the mean time he may make himself away in some by-alley, or rush into the bowels of some tavern or drinking-school, or if neither, you will find talk with some shark-shift by the way and give him the marks of the party, who will presently start before you, give the debtor intelligence, and so a rotten fig for the catchpole—a most witty, smooth and damnable conveyance. Many such running devices breed in the reins of your offices. Beside, I leave to speak of your unmerciful dragging a gentleman through Fleet Street to the utter confusion of his white feather and the lamentable spattering of
- 701 Peter Bail apparently playing on Peter Bales, a well-known scrivener
- 702 damn in your respective bottomless pits
- 704 flush plentifully supplied with money
- 705 credit reputation, financial and general coppered devalued counter (a) counterfeit coin (b) the prison
- 706 'rest arrest shoe-penny punning on cioppini, a current (and etymologically incorrect) pronunciation of chopine—absurdly tall cork-columned shoes favoured by stylish ladies of Venice and Spain, and whimsically appropriate for stepping over dangerous channels or drainage gutters
- 709 noble gold coin worth 6s. 8d.
- 710 Paul's Chain running south from the churchyard to Carter Lane Ludgate with reference to the debtors' prison at the gate
- 712-13 cog-shoulder a cheating (cogging) arrest
- 713 clap (a) strike a bargain, contract (b) seize Rowse suggested by the Bardolph-like description of Dog-man above (i.e. 'rouse'—a draught of drink, a bout of drinking)? The reference might be to an actual catchpole. Dyce speculated that a Cornish wrestler is intended (see Textual Note re 'Cornhill') Cornhill street running east from the end of the Poultry to Leadenhall Street, passing by the Royal Exchange
- 715 shoulder-clap arrest
- 716 lime-twigs twigs smeared with birdlime for catching birds
- 717 usurer's oil money
- 722 wot on know about
- 729 fig something valueless, contemptible
- 730-1 running... reins with a reference to urinary discharge ('running of the reins', i.e., the kidneys, loins), usually associated with gonorrhoea
- 735 black dogs of Newgate a popular name for diabolical catchpoles: Luke Hutton published a rogue pamphlet, The Blacke Dogge of Newgate, in 1596, and a two-part play of that title was written by Day, Hathaway, Went. Smith, and 'the other poet' for Worcester's Men between 24 November 1602 and 26 February 1603.
- 742-3 pageant... places occasions and locations of large public gatherings
- 743 sixpenny rooms probably the lords' rooms
- 744 cut... nim styles of theft
- 746 shave a shaving, by way of a sample Paul's Cross the pulpit
- 750 Bias bowling term, referring to the oblique construction of the bowl
- 751 Hollow-bank with reference to his skill in relieving people of their money
- 752 hooks traps ties obligations, restraints; matches cross-lays cheating wagers
- 754 mistress the small target ball, or jack, in bowls
- 755 rubs impediments by which a bowl is hindered in its proper course; 'rocks' appears to be a fanciful embellishment of the same term
- 766 bunglers and ketlers oafs and tinkers, clumsy folk; especially, here as with 'ketling' in Hubbard (928), unskilled bowlers; and see Five Gallants, where the foolish country cousin of Mistress Newcut, who has 'the leisure to follow all new fashions—ply the brothels, practise salutes and cringes' (2.1.63-4), is named 'Bungler'.

the plain frieze of simplicity thou mayst finely couch the wrought velvet of knavery.

770 Item, I give and bequeath to your cousin-german here, Francis Finger-false, Deputy of Dicing-houses, all cunning lifts, shifts and couches that ever were, are and shall be invented, from this hour of eleven clock upon black Monday until it smite twelve o' clock at Doomsday. And this I know, Francis, if you do endeavour to excel as I know you do, and will truly practise falsely, you may 775 live more gallanter far upon three dice than many of your foolish heirs about London upon thrice three hundred acres.

But turning my legacy to youward, Barnaby Burning-glass, Arch Tobacco-taker of England, in ordinaries, upon stages both common and private, and lastly in the lodging of your drab and 780 mistress: I am not a little proud, I can tell you, Barnaby, that you dance after my pipe so long, and for all counterblasts and tobacco-Nashes, which some call railers, you are not blown away, nor your fiery thirst quenched with the small penny-ale of their contradictions, but still suck that dug of damnation with a long
785 nipple, still burning that rare Phoenix of Phlegethon, tobacco, that from her ashes burnt and knocked out may arise another pipeful. Therefore I give and bequeath unto thee a breath of all religions save the true one, and tasting of all countries save His own, a brain well sooted, where the muses hang up in the smoke like 790 red herrings. And look how the narrow alley of thy pipe shows in the inside, so shall all the pipes through thy body. Besides, I give and bequeath to thee lungs as smooth as jet and just of the same colour, that when thou art closed in thy grave the worms may be consumed with them and take them for black puddings.

795 Lastly, not least, I give and bequeath to thee, Pierce Penniless, exceeding poor scholar, that hath made clean shoes in both universities, and been a pitiful batteler all thy lifetime, full often heard with this lamentable cry at the butt'ry-hatch: 'Ho, Lancelot! A cue of bread and a cue of beer,' never passing beyond the con-

800 fines of a farthing nor once munching commons, but only upon gaudy-days: to thee, most miserable Pierce, or pierced through and through with misery, I bequeath the tithe of all vaulting-houses, the tenth denier of each 'Hey-pass, come aloft!', beside the playing in and out of all wenches at thy pleasure, which I know as thou mayst use it will be such a fluent pension that thou shalt never have need to write Supplication again.

Now, for the especial trust and confidence I have in both you, Mihell Money-god, usurer, and Leonard Lavender, broker or pawn-lender, I make you two my full executors, to the true disposing of all these my hellish intents, wealthy villainies and most pernicious 810 damnable legacies.

And now, kinsmen and friends, wind about me. My breath begins to cool, and all my powers to freeze. And I can say no more to you, nephews, than I have said, only this: I leave you all like ratsbane to poison the realm. And I pray, be all of you as arrant 815 villains as you can be, and so farewell, be all hanged and come down to me as soon as you can.

This said, he departed to his molten kingdom, the wind risse, the bottom of the chair flew out, the scrivener fell flat upon his nose, and here is the end of a harmless moral. 820

FINIS

Epilogue spoken by the Black Book:

Now sir, what is your censure now? You have read me, I am sure. Am I black enough, think you, dressed up in a lasting suit of ink? Do I deserve my dark and pitchy 825 title? Stick I close enough to a villain's ribs? Is not Lucifer liberal to his nephews in this his last will and testament? Methinks I hear you say nothing, and therefore I know you are pleased and agree to all, for Qui tacet consentire videtur. And I allow you wise and truly judicious, because 830 you keep your censure to yourself.

767 frieze coarse woollen cloth couch hide (as in ambush); cf. couches (secret tricks) below (771) 772 eleven at night; see note to 206
black Monday Easter Monday, traditionally an unlucky day; the unspoken implication is that the Antichrist Lucifer, who has evidently been in London for a single day, rose from hell on Easter Sunday!
777 Barnaby an apparent dig either at Barnaby Rich, enemy of tobacco-taking, or at Barnabe Barnes, who sided with Harvey against Nashe, and is attacked in Nashe's Have With You to Saffron Walden (1596)
Burning-glass a lens for igniting fires 781 counterblasts with apparent reference to King James's A counter-blast to tobacco, which however was itself only published in 1604

782 tobacco-Nashes playing on 'ashes', on the supposedly railing attacks of Nashe, and conceivably on 'gnashes'
783 small penny-ale weak ale, hence sold at a penny a gallon 788 His 'God's' or 'Christ's' seems likely, given the parallel with 'true' religion.
794 consumed destroyed
797 batteler a member of the lowest economic rank of undergraduates (specific to Oxford)
798 butt'ry-hatch the half-door over which provisions from the college buttery (bread, butter and ale) are served 799 cue half a farthing (denoted by q in college accounts) 800 munching commons eating at the common table

801 gaudy-days holidays, at Oxford or that is to say (rephrasing 'most miserable Pierce')
803 denier worth about a tenth of an English penny
'Hey-pass, come aloft!' juggler's cry or trick, used here to designate tricks turned in the vaulting-houses; to come aloft is to have an erection, or to mount sexually.
805 fluent generous, flowing
808 Mihell obsolete form of 'Michael', playing on 'my hell'
Lavender 'to lay in lavender' is to pawn.
823 censure judgement
829-30 Qui... videtur legal maxim: he who remains silent will be seen to consent

THE WHOLE ROYAL AND MAGNIFICENT ENTERTAINMENT

Edited by R. Malcolm Smuts

The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment, with the Arches of Triumph describes one of the two or three greatest spectacles of early seventeenth-century England: an event staged before tens of thousands of spectators, involving hundreds of participants and a massive display of ostentation. Expenditures by the Crown alone amounted to over £36,000—a sum comparable to the cost of twenty court masques, or roughly double that of constructing the Whitehall Banqueting House. London's guilds contributed £4,100 more, while the Borough of Westminster and the many peers and gentry who marched in the royal procession invested unknown but substantial sums. Modern scholarship has persistently associated the opulent culture of the Stuart court with indoor theatricals and collections of paintings. In reality, however, great outdoor pageants like James I's coronation procession consumed much more money and reached far more people than the masques of Ben Jonson and Inigo Jones or the portraits of Van Dyck. To understand what royal majesty meant in this period, and how poets contributed to the construction of a public image of kingship, we need to begin with such events.

Thomas Middleton's contribution—a speech for the figure Zeal (ll. 2122–81) at the sixth of eight pageants James encountered along his route—can only be understood within the whole context of which it formed a part. The text that follows this introduction provides the fullest possible account of James's entry that can be reconstructed from the original sources. It combines separate descriptions published shortly after the event by the poets, Thomas Dekker and Ben Jonson, and the London joiner Stephen Harrison, who had overseen construction of the pageant arches, along with additional material from printed and manuscript sources (see textual introduction).

Readers should not approach The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment, however, as a completely accurate description of the entry on 15 March nor even a dramatic script for that event. It derives from three highly shaped texts, crafted by the individuals chiefly responsible for planning the day's arches and pageants. These emphasize poetic and iconographical elements that probably seemed less important to eyewitnesses, while minimizing or omitting other features of the entry, like the fireworks display on the Thames. Our text also presents a more cohesive and unified impression than any spectator could have achieved of events that took place along a route nearly two miles long, before a noisy crowd that sometimes almost drowned out the speeches. Even James must have had trouble absorbing all the speeches and iconographical details amidst the noise and other distractions; spectators who tried to follow the procession on foot must sometimes have failed to get close enough to understand what was going on. This was certainly the case with Gilbert Dugdale, who produced an independent narrative of the entry based on his own observations.

Our text thus provides an ideal reconstruction, rather than an account of what anyone saw or heard on 15 March 1604. That reconstruction is historically important in its own right, since the published accounts were read by many people who had not watched the entry, or who desired a comprehensive summary after the fact. Dekker's volume sold especially well, going through three editions—including one in Edinburgh—within a few months. Any interpretation must, however, begin by recognizing that the relationship between our composite account and the event it records is even more problematical than that of a printed play to an original performance. Instead of taking the textual description at face value, we ought to pose a number of questions concerning the historical traditions that lay behind James's coronation entry, the manner in which such an event was organized and constructed, and the role of theatrical and visual elements within the larger spectacle. Doing this will also serve to bring out differences between our three authors and to situate Middleton in relationship to them.

The Royal Entry Ritual

The royal entry developed during the late Middle Ages from procedures used when a ruler entered his capital or any other large city subject to his authority. By the fifteenth century a set formula had evolved, not only in England but—with important local variations—in several European states, notably France and the Holy Roman Empire. An entry always consisted of a procession by the royal household and nobles attending the monarch, before an audience consisting partly of civic dignitaries and partly of an undifferentiated public. It combined elements of chivalric cavalcade, civic pageant, liturgical ceremony and popular festival, in ways that simultaneously emphasized feudal and religious traditions of monarchy, the corporate structure of urban society and spontaneous popular devotion to the ruler.

The court and nobility processed in a strict order of precedence, with relatively insignificant officials like messengers and footmen placed at the front and the greater officers of state and highest noblemen and women at the rear, around the royal family. The procession therefore provided a mirror of the proper ordering of the social élite under royal authority, that defined both the sovereign's pre-eminence and the precise place of every participant in relation to him. This hierarchical image also embodied a deep sense of tradition. The commission appointed to determine the order of march searched the Crown's archives for precedents, and the great feudal offices of High Constable and Earl Marshal were filled with temporary appointees who marched in the places prescribed by medieval tradition, even though the former had been vacant for centuries. Such archaic features emphasized the deep historical roots of the monarchy, to a society that tended to equate authority with ancient lineages and immemorial custom.

The procession furnished the ruler with an extraordinarily large and splendid entourage, an essential expression of rank and power in late medieval and early modern society. Splendour was conveyed above all by sumptuous costumes, a prominent feature of court life since the twelfth century. Household servants wore standardized but extremely rich liveries. The King's yeomen and messengers sported scarlet coats with embroidered insignia and spangles made of real gold that glistened in the sunlight as they marched. The costumes of courtiers and noblemen were considerably more lavish, often requiring yards of embroidered cloth garnished with pearls and jewels. In April of 1603 one observer reported that some knights and noblemen had spent £4,000 or £5,000 each on suits for James's upcoming coronation—for which the entry was originally planned—so that a relatively poor lord might 'endanger his estate' by striving to keep up. Banners, painted chariots, embroidered velvet saddle cloths and the rich canopy carried over the King rounded out the effect, turning an entry into a massive display of wealth.

If the court and nobility dominated the procession, the civic community of London's guilds took pride of place among the watching crowd. One side of the processional route was reserved for them. Each guild assembled at its appointed place in ceremonial livery, beneath heraldic banners bearing its coat of arms and behind rails draped in blue cloth. In front of the rails stood specially appointed whiffers or marshals. The Mayor, Recorder, and aldermen of London also waited along the route, in crimson robes of office. As the monarch reached them the Recorder always delivered an oration expressing the city's devotion and presented a gift, consisting in 1604 of three gold cups. The King replied with a brief speech of thanks, whereupon the mayor and aldermen joined the procession. In effect the civic community, headed by its chief officers, became the King's host, as if London was a great country house and the mayor its lord. Dekker's text underlines the point by describing the City as the 'court royal' during the entry and equating the sites of the pageants with specific rooms in royal apartments at Whitehall and other palaces. The parallel between the city's hospitality and that of a nobleman's household may also explain the custom of placing tapestries on the outside of houses along the route, as if the city streets had become a gigantic gallery.

The guild representatives, however, formed only a small part of a crowd that John Stow described as consisting of 'the chiefest gentry of every country [county], and great number of strangers from beyond seas . . . [and] such great multitudes of people from all places as the like in London was never seen until that day'. Then as now, great spectacles were international tourist attractions. Wealthier spectators rented space in windows overlooking the route, while their humbler counterparts took whatever vantage point they could find, normally along the side of the street opposite to that occupied by the guilds, which was also railed in but left free for spectators. English crowds customarily greeted public appearances of their rulers with raucous enthusiasm, which James found disconcerting after the more subdued public behaviour he had experienced in Scotland. During the coronation entry, however, he had little choice but to suffer his subjects' loud enthusiasm (no doubt increased by the free wine that flowed all day from the city's water conduits). The tolling of bells from the 123 parish churches in London and its suburbs added further to the noisy air of festive celebration that conveyed, more effectively than any set speeches, popular devotion toward the new king.

Pageants and Iconographic Programmes

Royal entries did not, therefore, require theatrical embellishment to express the majesty of kingship and loyalty of the people. From the Middle Ages, however, a tradition had grown up of accompanying particularly important entries with street pageants, sponsored by the host city or by individual guilds and other corporate groups. These commented allegorically on the meaning of the entry and sometimes alluded to specific political issues. During Elizabeth's coronation entry in 1559 London Protestants, almost certainly after prior consultation with leading figures at court, produced pageants hinting broadly at the Queen's Protestant inclinations and her intention to repudiate her Catholic sister's policies.

For James's coronation entry the City of London produced five pageants, and the Borough of Westminster and the foreign communities of Dutch and Italian merchants one each. We do not know how this apportionment of labour was decided or whether any significant consultation took place between the various civic groups and the court, although planning began very shortly after the new King's accession on 24 March 1603, as David Bergeron has shown. Dekker informs us that the London Corporation appointed a committee of four aldermen and twelve other prominent citizens to supervise its pageants. These luminaries, in turn, set up a bureaucratic structure presiding over a workforce of well over 200. Harrison was put in charge of the construction of the arches that would form the pageant settings; Dekker and Jonson were commissioned to devise the pageants themselves. Initially the entry was planned to coincide with James's coronation on 25 July 1603. An outbreak of plague led, however, to a decision to separate the entry from the coronation and postpone it until the epidemic had subsided. In late January of 1604 the court decided to proceed with the entry on 4 March, a date later pushed back to the fifteenth.

Harrison, Dekker, and Jonson each display a distinctive attitude toward the pageants, suggesting different interpretations of the role of visual and poetic imagery. Harrison's descriptions betray an obvious pride in the visual impression made by the arches and the technical architectural lore that went into their design, especially the science of measurement and a knowledge of the five classical orders. This emphasis seems almost superfluous today, when schoolchildren know how to read scaled drawings and recognize a Corinthian column. Architectural theory and methods of draftsmanship remained relatively esoteric subjects in the England of 1604, however, where buildings were still normally erected through artisanal methods in a vernacular tradition. In his stress on precise measurement and classical proportions, Harrison anticipates a more famous London joiner and self-styled architect, Inigo Jones, whose career as a designer of court masques began one year later. Harrison's prominent use of the squat Tuscan order in the first arch, which he associates with the 'shortness and thickness' of Atlas, provides another intriguing parallel. This order received little prominence in Italian architectural treatises but it fascinated Jones, who used it as the basis for his Covent Garden designs. It is difficult to know how much weight to place on this shared interest; but Harrison's text, with its beautiful engravings, its assertive pride and its determination to preserve a permanent record of ephemeral structures designed and erected by London tradesmen, provides a glimpse into the autodidact artisanal culture from which Jones also emerged. It shows that an interest in European visual culture and architectural classicism was not an exclusively aristocratic taste in Jacobean England.

Harrison oversaw the building of the arches; but as Dekker tells us, the poets devised the underlying 'inventions' or allegorical programmes. The Jacobean pageants deployed a more complex symbolism than Elizabeth's entry pageants, including extensive references to classical sources, that must have made them more difficult for the crowds to decipher. In this respect The Magnificent Entertainment marks a significant transition. It looks back to inherited medieval forms of public display and allegory; but it also anticipates the development of a cosmopolitan, classisizing and relatively exclusive court culture under the early Stuarts.

Revealingly, Dekker consistently plays down the more erudite and exclusive features of the iconographic programme, whereas Jonson emphasizes them in every possible way. Both agree on one point: classical allusions only bewilder the multitude. This observation leads Dekker to adopt a dismissive and almost apologetic tone concerning the learned dimensions of his verse. 'To make a false flourish here with the borrowed weapons of all the old masters of the noble Science of Poesy', he announces at the outset, '... only to show how nimbly we can carve up the whole mess of the poets, were to play the executioner, and to lay out the city's household god on the rack, to make him confess how many pair of Latin sheets we have shaken and cut into shreds to make him a garment' (ll. 278-86). Instead of stressing his own learning, Dekker emphasizes the enthusiastic participation of large numbers of mostly ordinary people in preparing to welcome the King. 'Not a finger but had an office' (l. 393), he writes of the city's preparations of the arches: 'even children, might they have been suffered, would gladly have spent their little strength about the engines that mounted up the frames, such a fire of love and joy was kindled in every breast' (ll. 406-9). He weaves descriptions of the watching 'world of people' into his narrative, evoking its bustle and impatience to catch sight of the King: 'The streets seemed to be paved with men; stalls instead of rich wares were set out with children; open casements filled up with women...' (ll. 414-17). He also includes descriptions of speeches he did not himself write, by the spokesmen for the Dutch and Italian merchants, the Recorder of London, a boy speaking on behalf of St Paul's School, and Middleton. Dekker's text thus provides a relatively full narrative, written as a celebration of civic duty and popular devotion. His own contributions are modestly subsumed within this frame, as facets of a larger, communal event.

By contrast Jonson never provides a narrative of the crowd, although he does emphasize its devotion to the King in the symbolism and speeches he devised for the Fenchurch arch. Jonson thus subsumes the crowd within his visual and poetic 'invention', instead of acknowledging its independent existence. He also takes every opportunity to parade his scholarship. In a theoretical aside he distinguishes between his learned iconography and the crude symbolism of the popular tradition: 'Neither was it becoming, or could it stand with the dignity of these shows, after the most miserable and desperate shift of the puppets, to require a truchman or (with the ignorant painter) one to write, "This is a dog" or "This is a hare", but so to be presented as upon the view they might without cloud or obscurity declare themselves to the sharp and learned. And for the multitude, no doubt but their grounded judgements gazed, said it was fine and were satisfied' (ll. 756-64). In the printed text he does not rely even on 'the sharp and learned' to pick out the full range of his classical allusions but loads his verse with scholarly notes that crowd the margins and sometimes threaten to overwhelm the verse in erudite commentary. Typographically his text looks less like a typical book of Renaissance verse than a work of humanist philology, such as an annotated edition of a classical author. Sometimes Jonson takes an almost perverse delight in abstruseness, as in his use of a pagan goddess who happened to share the name of James's Queen. 'Who this Anna should be (with the Romans themselves) hath been no trifling controversy' (l. 2438.n) his explanatory note begins, before examining several ancient theories and finally arriving at Jonson's own conclusion. Elsewhere the notes take off on long and almost irrelevant tangents, commenting on topics like the primitive Roman custom of using ploughs to mark the bounds of newly founded cities, or the pointed caps worn by Roman priests. This strategy served to dissociate Jonson from the popular medium of street pageants, from city poets like Dekker and Middleton and from his own origins as a Westminster bricklayer's apprentice, linking him instead to the environment of academies and courtly humanism. Although the pageants took place in public, under the patronage of London and Westminster, Jonson does not treat them as a form of popular or civic culture. He presents them instead as products of a classicist high tradition, sheltered by its formidable erudition from the indignity of close contact with the multitude.

If we turn to the speeches and iconographic programmes, the contrast becomes more subtle and complex but nevertheless remains. Middleton emerges as a poet less interested than Jonson in intricate classical learning, but more adept than Dekker at integrating iconographic imagery into a lucid and decorous speech. Only 23, he already displays a remarkably mature and distinctive sense of how to craft panegyric verse for a great public ritual.

The pageants are generally consistent in their ideological and political orientation, stressing common themes that would soon become firmly associated with James's rule, such as the King's defence of the realm's peace and his union of the English and Scottish crowns into a new imperial British monarchy. The one striking exception is the third pageant, sponsored by the Dutch community. As Julia Gasper has shown, this employed a Protestant iconography very different from that used elsewhere in the entry, and implicitly argues against the Anglo-Spanish peace then being negotiated in nearby Westminster. Since there is no firm evidence that Dekker worked on this pageant, however, Gasper's attempt to see it as an expression of his Protestant internationalism is unconvincing. The Catholic Jonson and staunchly Protestant Dekker certainly disagreed over some fundamental issues, but only subtle and inconclusive hints of ideological differences emerge when we compare the pageants they undoubtedly devised. It is probably significant, for example, that Dekker uses more Tudor and medieval imagery than Jonson, whose historical allusions derive almost exclusively from the ancient world. Dekker no doubt felt more comfortable with neo-chivalric and high Elizabethan ideals than Jonson. The pageants themselves did not, however, attempt to link contrasting classical and medieval images of monarchy to divergent policies. They use somewhat different cultural languages but—the Dutch pageant aside—enunciate a fairly uniform message, centring upon the kingdom's joy at James's accession and the anticipation of an age of peace and prosperity under his rule.

We are on firmer ground in identifying contrasting approaches to the construction of iconographic schemes. All three poets combine classical imagery with conventional symbols that can have given plebeian spectators little trouble. By and large, however, Dekker's iconography is more traditional and less complex than Jonson's. In an initial pageant 'laid by' because James did not enter London in the expected place (ll. 362–5), Dekker represents England and Scotland through the familiar figures of St George and St Andrew, holding hands in token of friendship. The fourth arch near St Mildred's-in-the-Poultry employs another conventional image: a Fountain of Virtue that has dried up after the recent death of a 'Phoenix', a standard symbol for Elizabeth I. On the approach of James, a new Phoenix who has risen from the ashes of the old, it begins to flow again, overwhelming the efforts of Detractio and Oblivio to suck it dry. At the next arch a sylvan or wood god presented James with the devotion of Peace and her daughter Plenty, identified by a cornucopia and other relatively transparent emblems of fertility.

Jonson's first arch in Fenchurch Street, by contrast, deployed a more intricate symbology. The central figure of Monarchia Britannica could have been easily identified by her two crowns adorned with the arms of England and Scotland. But it would have been much harder to decipher some of the accompanying figures, and more difficult still to recognize the allusions to passages from Virgil, Ovid, and Claudian conveyed by Latin mottoes. In addition, the arch defines British Monarchy as a complex philosophical ideal, combining political, theological, and geographical elements. She rules with the support of the six daughters of the Genius of London, over a little world divided from the European continent. She also depends upon Divine Wisdom, who is represented holding a dove and a serpent as emblems of innocence and prudence. A speech by the Genius of London does little to clarify this programme but instead adds another, historical layer of imagery. The Genius welcomes James as heir to all who have ruled the island since before the Roman conquest, a king predestined to govern peacefully in a land that has often been subject to wars of conquest. In Basilikon Doron James referred to the bloodless unification of England and Scotland under his rule, after centuries of warfare and failed attempts at conquest, as an act of Providence. Jonson echoes and builds upon this royal claim.

While doing so, however, he also constructs a representation of the zealous devotion of the London populace. The city's devotion is personified by the river Thames—an image justified by a line from Ovid stating that even rivers have felt the power of love. Jonson further symbolizes London's loyalty through the figures of Euphorsyne (Gladness), Sebasis (Veneration), Prothymia (Promptitude), Agrypina (Vigilance), and Agape (Loving Affection). His verses refer to the spectators' 'sparkling eyes' and shouts that 'cleave the air'. Nothing in Dekker's pageants compares to this elaborate representation of public loyalty, in which, as Jonson boasted, 'the very site, fabric, strength, policy, dignity and affections of the city were all laid down to life: the nature and property of these devices being to present always some one entire body or figure consisting of distinct members, and each of those expressing itself in its own active sphere, yet all with that general harmony so connected and disposed, as no one little part can be missing to the illustration of the whole'. Despite his professed disdain for 'the multitude' and its 'grounded judgements', Jonson remained alive to the entry's significance as a civic and public event. He seems far more interested, however, in fashioning appropriate images of the crowd's feelings, supported by a dazzling array of classical citations, than in the actual crowd.

If we turn next to Middleton's speech for Zeal at the sixth arch (ll. 2122–81) we find a subtly different approach. Middleton also manages to integrate a fairly complex symbolic scheme into a speech that blends royal panegyric with references to the public's devotion. He seems far less concerned with precise iconographic detail than Jonson, however, and more intent on elucidating the relationship of symbolic images to the basic themes of his speech. The Fleet Street arch, for which Middleton wrote his speech, was topped by a globe 'filled with all the different degrees and states that are in the land', and by Astraea, the goddess of justice and of the mythical Golden Age, who had often been associated with Elizabeth. Figures representing the four elements turned the globe as James approached, so he could see the image inside it. Below Astraea stood Arete or Virtue and below her Fortuna standing on a turning globe and Invidia or Envy, looking on fearfully. Lower still sat personifications of the particular virtues of Justice, Fortitude, Temperance, and Prudence, and of James's four kingdoms, England, Scotland, France, and Ireland.

Middleton may not have devised this scheme but he crafted a speech that managed to allude to all the symbolic features on the arch, without straying from its central theme of royal virtue and public zeal. That speech revolves around a presentation of the King as the unifying spirit of the body politic and ultimate source of justice and harmony, whose virtues make civil life possible: a theme reflecting the ideal of monarchy James himself had expounded in Basilikon Doron. Zeal begins by alluding to public anxiety and disquiet following Elizabeth's death. Fears of a succession crisis complicated by class animosities had haunted England during the Queen's last years, but in 1603 the political nation quickly united around James, assuring a smooth succession. Zeal attributes this happy outcome entirely to the King himself, wrongly implying that his arrival halted an upsurge of social conflict, and attributing to his 'regal eye' a stability that really owed more to prompt action by the Privy Council and the political nation's horror of civil war. The speech proceeds to credit James with bringing peace not only to the kingdom but the cosmos, by quelling the natural enmity of the four elements of earth, air, fire, and water. Through his high fortune and still higher virtue, he dominates the world. Envy—a vice traditionally associated with popular resentment of the rich and powerful—cannot harm him and so consumes her own venom in frustration. James has united the four kingdoms of France, England, Scotland, and Ireland into an empire whose glories have caused Astraea to return to earth. Middleton probably felt it needless to explain what most schoolboys knew: that in Virgil's Ecloques the return of Astraea meant the renewal of the Golden Age, under the auspices of a wise and just emperor.

With its hyperbolic praise of the King's power to impose peace not only on his people but on nature itself, this speech anticipates many Jacobean masques and panegyrics. In doing so, however, it also manages to highlight public devotion to the King in a way that is not typical of Jacobean court entertainments. 'All estates, whose proper arts | Live by the breath of Majesty' burn with 'holy zeal' to greet James. The 'painted flames' of Zeal's robe are but outward signs of what the city and its people feel. Middleton is thus able to conclude with a decorous allusion to the crowd's zeal, that probably served as a cue for loud acclamations: 'with reverberate shouts our globe shall ring, | The music's close begins thus: God save our King!' Where Jonson represented public devotion through a self-contained structure of symbol and poetry, Middleton deliberately ends by turning outward, gesturing toward the unprogrammed enthusiasm of James's subjects.

The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment is, therefore, not only a composite text but one that sometimes turns out, on close inspection, to be pulling in different directions. This becomes even more apparent if we notice passages in Dugdale's narrative that reveal James's impatience with the crowd. Jonson's discomfort with having to appeal to 'the multitude' corresponded to James's own lack of ease in public, just as his passion for classical learning fit in well with the King's scholarly interests.

In providing a record of the first great public ritual of Stuart monarchy, this text therefore also helps us understand why such lavish outdoor events were so rarely repeated. In James's reign only the creation of Henry as Prince of Wales (1610) and the wedding of Princess Elizabeth (1613) compared in scale and splendour with the 1604 entry. In 1627 Charles cancelled his own coronation entry, for which the city had already erected triumphal arches, so as 'to save the expense'. By then, of course, Jonson had developed a less unwieldy vehicle for the symbology of Stuart kingship in the court masque, with its spectacular stage sets and elite audience.

The true successor to the royal entry was not the masque, however, but the annual Lord Mayor's pageant, which involved a similar processional ceremony and comparable street pageants. If Jonson's erudite approach to the entry pageants anticipates his later development of the masque, Dekker's more tolerant and inclusive attitude found its true heir in the mayoral shows, foremost among them those of Thomas Middleton.

SEE ALSO

Textual introduction and apparatus: Companion, 498

Authorship and date: Companion, 351

Other Middleton–Dekker works: Caesar's Fall, 328; Gravesend, 128; Meeting, 183; Patient Man, 280; Banquet, 637; Roaring Girl, 721; Gypsy, 1723

Other Middleton–Webster works: Caesar's Fall, 328; Quiet Life, 1593; The Duchess of Malfi, 1886

THOMAS DEKKER, STEPHEN HARRISON, BEN JONSON, and THOMAS MIDDLETON

The Whole Royal and Magnificent Entertainment of King James through the City of London, 15 March 1604, with the Arches of Triumph

To the Right Honourable Sir Thomas Bennet Knight, Lord Mayor of this city, the right worshipful the aldermen his brethren, and to those worshipful commoners elected committees for the managing of this business

5 The love which I bear to your honour and worships, and the duty wherewith I am bound to this honourable city, makes me appear in this boldness to you, to whom I humbly consecrate these fruits of my invention, which time hath now at length brought forth and ripened to this 10 perfection. That magnificent royalty and glorious entertainment—which you yourselves for your part, out of a free, a clear and very bounteous disposition, and so many thousands of worthy citizens out of a sincere affection and loyalty of his Majesty, did with the sparing of no cost 15 bestow but upon one day—is here new wrought up again and shall endure forever. For albeit those monuments of your loves were erected up to the clouds and were built never so strongly, yet now their lastingness should live but in the tongues and memories of men, but that the hand 20 of art gives them here a second more perfect being, ad-vanceth them higher than they were before and warrants them that they shall do honour to this city, so long as the city shall bear a name. Sorry I am that they come into the world no sooner, but let the hardness of the labour and 25 the small number of hands that were busied about them make the fault, if it be a fault, excusable. I would not care if these unpainted pictures were more costly to me, so that they might appear curious enough to your lordship and worships; yet in regard that this present age can lay before 30 you no precedent that ever any in this land performed the like, I presume these my endeavours shall receive the more worthy liking of you. And thus dedicating my labours and love to your honourable and kind acceptations, I most humbly take my leave this 16 of June 1604.

35 Most affectionately devoted to your lordship and worships,
Stephen Harrison

This Commentary focuses upon classical sources and issues of rank and precedence.

8 invention the overall scheme of the pageants

25 them the engravings

44 Nimrod's Babylonian ruler, builder of the Tower of Babel

49 Mausolean tomb The tomb of Mausolus, Satrap of Caria in Persia (377–353 BC);
one of the Seven Wonders of the World.

56 Coloss' of the sun celebrated 105-foot-high bronze statue at Rhodes, another of the Seven Wonders

71 Triumphs given in ancient Rome to honour great military exploits

Ode

Babel that strove to wear
A crown of clouds and up did rear 40
Her forehead high,
With an ambitious lust to kiss the sky,
Is now or dust or not at all;
Proud Nimrod's wall
And all his antique monuments, 45
Left to the world as precedents,
Cannot now show (to tell where they did stand)
So much in length as half the builder's hand.

The Mausolean tomb,
The sixteen curious gates in Rome, 50
Which times prefer,
Both past and present; Nero's Theatre
That in one day was all gilt o'er;
Add to these more
Those columns and those pyramids that won 55
Wonder by height, the Coloss' of the sun,
Th'Egyptian obelisks, are all forgotten.
Only their names grow great; themselves be rotten.

Dear friend! What honour then Bestow'st thou on thy countrymen? 60
Crowning with praise
By these thy labours, as with wreaths of bays,
This royal city, where now stand (Built by thy hand)
Her arches in new state, so made 65
That their fresh beauties ne'er shall fade.
Thou of our English triumphs rear'st the fame
'Bove those of old, but above all thy name.

Tho Dekker

Ode

Triumphs were wont with sweat and blood be 70 crowned.
To every brow
They did allow

Title-page from Harrison's Arches of Triumph.

The Kings Entertainment through the Cittie of London.

75	The living laurel which begirted round Their rusty helmets and had power to make The soldier smile, while mortal wound did ache.	as it was marshalled by the Lords in Commission for the Office of Earl Marshal of England Messengers of the Chamber in their Coats Gentlemen Harbingers and Serjeant Porters	100
	But our more civil passages of state, Like happy feast Of inured rest,	Pur- Gentlemen and Esquires, Pur- suyvants the Prince's Servants suyvants at Arms at Arms
80	Which bells and woundless cannons did relate, Stood high in joy, since warlike triumphs bring Remembrance of our former sorrowing.	Gentlemen and Esquires, the Queen's Servants Gentlemen and Esquires, the King's Servants Sewers, the King's Servants Quarter Waiters	105
	The memory of these should quickly fade (For pleasure's stream Is like a dream,	Gentlemen Ushers in Ordinary Clerks Signet Privy Seal	110
85	Passant and fleet as is a shade) Unless thyself, which these fair models bred, Had given them a new life when they were dead.	Council Parliament Crown	115
	Take then, good countryman and friend, that merit Which folly lends, Not judgement sends,	Chaplains having dignities Aldermen of London The Prince's Council at Law	115
90	To foreign shores for strangers to inherit. Perfection must be bold with front upright, Though Envy gnash her teeth whilst she would bite.	The Prince's Serjeant to go with another Serjeant Heralds The King's Advocate and Heralds at Arms the Queen's Attorney at Arms	120
95	John Webster	The King's Attorney and Solicitor Serjeants of the Law The King's Serjeants Masters of the Chancery	120

The True Order of his Majesty's Proceeding through London on Thursday the 15 of March anno domini 1604,

- 86 Passant passing, fleeting
- 87 models of the arches
- 96-199 The True Order . . . follow Public Record Office (London) State Papers Domestic 14, volume 6, item 97. This has been emended in a few places after comparison with the order of the procession printed in Nichols, pp. 325-28. Nichols stated that his Order derived from two manuscripts, one in private hands and the other among the Cotton Manuscripts of the British Museum. We have not attempted to locate these or additional lists that may still be extant. The PRO document was probably a working draft but it agrees with Nichols's Order except in a few relatively minor details. The correct date in the title also suggests that it was compiled not long before the event itself. It therefore seems unlikely that the actual processional order differed significantly from the one here recorded.
- 98-9 Commission for the Office The Earl Marshal was an officer of the Crown responsible for overseeing all matters pertaining to inherited honours, including the ordering of court processions. The office had been vacated by the execution of its holder, the Earl of Essex, for treason in 1601. Its duties were therefore exercised by a commission appointed in February 1604, consisting of the Duke of Lenox, the earls of Nottingham, Suffolk, and Worcester, and Lords Buckhurst and Henry Howard.
- 100 Messengers of the Chamber The order of the procession reflects a strict sense of rank, with lowest officers coming first and those of highest rank grouped around the King. The Messengers of the Chamber, of whom there were normally forty, delivered official messages and orders and occasionally made arrests in the King's name. They wore scarlet coats beautifully embroidered with the initials JR under an imperial crown.
- 101 Gentlemen Harbingers Officers of the Household below stairs under the Lord Steward, a department responsible for the various menial tasks necessary to sustain the court. The harbingers managed the removal of the court from one place to another, for example during summer progresses.
- 104 Gentlemen and Esquires functionaries of the Chamber, which oversaw court ceremony and the personal life of the King. Because they conferred access to the King and were also highly visible, posts in the Chamber, unlike most of those in the Lord Steward's department, tended to be filled by gentlemen and peers. The Gentlemen and Esquires of the Chamber had originated as personal attendants to the King, but by this period had been relegated to a ceremonial role. The Queen and Prince had their own households, with the same structure as the King's but smaller in size.
- 106 Sewers ceremonial officers of the Chamber who served the King when he dined in public
- 107 Quarter Waiters functionaries of the Chamber
- 108 Gentlemen Ushers doorkeepers in the Chamber and its more intimate offshoot, the Privy Chamber (see below, note to l. 145-6)
- 109 Signet a small seal of medieval origin, attached to an office that formed part of the royal bureaucracy for issuing official documents
- 110 Privy Seal another such seal
- 111-13 Council | Parliament | Crown i.e. clerks of the Council, Parliament, and Crown
- 114 Chaplains having dignities Royal chaplains holding other major ecclesiastical offices
- 117 The Prince's Serjeant a legal advisor, subordinate to the chief counsel
- 120 The King's Attorney and Solicitor Edward Coke and Francis Bacon, the senior legal counsellors of the Crown
- 121 Serjeants of the Law barristers with the right to plead in the Court of Common Pleas, the most active of the central common law courts
- 122 King's Serjeants assistant legal counsellors to the Crown
- 123 Masters of the Chancery Judges in Chancery, the kingdom's chief equity court under the jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor.

The Kings entertainment through the City of London.

125	Secretaries for the French and Latin Tongues Knights Bachelors Esquires for the body, sewers, carvers and cupbearers in ordinary		Trumpets sounding Knights and Gentlemen of the Privy Chamber and Bedchamber Knights of the Bath	145
	Pursuivants The Queen's Council at Law	Pursuivants	Knights that have been Lord Ambassador Lords Presidents and Lord Deputies
130	Masters of standing Offices being no Counsellors, viz.	{ Tents Revels Armoury Wardrobe Jewel House Ordinance	The Master of the Jewel House and the Prince's Governor The Dean of the King's Chapel Barons' younger sons Viscounts' younger sons	150
135	Masters of Requests The Chamberlains of the Exchequer		Knights of the Privy Council Knights of the Garter	155
	Barons of the Exchequer and Judges of the laws	Heralds at Arms	Barons' eldest sons Earls' younger sons Viscounts' eldest sons	Heralds at Arms
140	Heralds at Arms The Lord Chief Baron and Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas	Heralds at Arms	Treasurer and Controller amongst Barons according to their creations Barons of the Parliament	160
	The Lord Chief Justice of England The Serjeant Trumpeter with his Mace

- 124 Secretaries for the French and Latin Tongues responsible for official correspondence in those languages. The Latin secretary was Sir Thomas Smith.
- 125 Knights Bachelors knights who were not members of one of the chivalric orders
- 126-7 Esquires . . . ordinary functionaries of the Chamber, six in number
- 129 Masters of standing Offices heads of ancient administrative departments, attached to the Household or Chamber, or independent being no Counsellors not belonging to the Privy Council, the chief administrative and policy-making organ of royal government
- 130 Tents a department of the Chamber
- 131 Revels department of the Chamber responsible for court entertainments and the licensing of plays
- 132 Armoury independent department responsible for armour and small arms
- 133 Wardrobe independent department affiliated with the Household, responsible for procuring and stockpiling cloths and related materials used by the court and issuing official robes to many Crown officials
- 134 Jewel House department of the Chamber that kept the royal jewels
- 135 Ordinance independent department responsible for procuring and storing munitions
- 136 Masters of Requests officers in charge of receiving and forwarding petitions to the King
- 137 Chamberlains of the Exchequer officers of the chief royal treasury
- 138 Barons of the Exchequer judges of the exchequer court, having jurisdiction over taxes: at this date Sir Thomas Fleming and Sir Lawrence Tanfield.
- Judges of the laws presided in the common law courts of King's Bench and Common Pleas
- 139-40 Lord Chief Baron and Lord Chief Justice Sir William Periam and Sir Edward Anderson, who headed the courts of the Exchequer and Common Pleas
- 142 Lord Chief Justice Sir John Popham, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, the highest common law court
- 145-6 Gentlemen of the Privy Chamber and Bedchamber Gentlemen charged with attending upon the King within the more restricted sections of royal palaces, in which he actually lived. The Privy Chamber had emerged from the Chamber under Henry VII. Until 1603 its gentlemen (and ladies under Elizabeth I) were the monarch's chief personal attendants. Its Scottish counterpart was the Bedchamber. In 1603 James incorporated this institution and its Scottish staff within the English Privy Chamber, whose gentlemen thereby lost their intimate connection to the monarch, being displaced to a ceremonial role. James's court above stairs thus had a tripartite structure of Bedchamber, Privy Chamber, and Chamber proper, reflected both in the physical layout of his palaces and the institutional arrangements. The Scots monopoly over the Bedchamber, which lasted until 1618, caused considerable jealousy among English courtiers and office-holders, especially after the Bedchamber staff emerged as brokers of royal patronage, with privileged access to the King's sometimes extravagant bounty.
- 147 Knights of the Bath Sixty knights created and inducted into the Order of the Bath at royal coronations.
- 148 Knights that have been Lord Ambassador knights who had once served in that capacity. Their relatively high ceremonial prestige, reflected by their position in the procession, stemmed from their role as the personal representatives of English monarchs to foreign sovereigns.
- 149 Lords Presidents and Lord Deputies Heads, respectively, of the Councils of the North and of Wales and of royal government in Ireland
- 150 Master of the Jewel House Sir Edward Carey, official keeper of the King's jewels
- 151 Prince's Governor Sir Thomas Chaloner, appointed to take charge of the person and household of the Prince in August 1603
- 152 Dean of the King's Chapel James Montague, titular head of the staff of chaplains
- 155 Knights of the Privy Council members of the Privy Council holding the rank of knight
- 156 Knights of the Garter members of the great chivalric Order of the Garter, established by Edward III and based at Windsor Castle
- 160 Treasurer and Controller financial officers of the household below stairs, reporting to the Lord Steward
- 161 according to their creations The order of march was based on the date at which the baron's titles had been granted, with older titles taking precedence over more recent ones.
- 162 Barons of the Parliament lay members of the House of Lords without higher titles

The Kings entertainment

	The Principal Secretary being a baron		Lord Treasurer and Lord Chancellor together
	Bishops		Lord Mayor of London—Garter Chief	180
165	Marquesses' younger sons		King at Arms—Chief Gentleman Usher
	Earls' eldest sons		The Prince's	The Prince	The Prince's
	Viscounts		Footmen	of Wales	Footmen
	Dukes' younger sons		The Lord	The sword borne by	The Lord
170	Marquesses' eldest sons		High	the Earl Marshal	Great
	Earls		Constable		Chamberlain
	The Lord Admiral and Lord Chamberlain		Gentlemen		Gentlemen
	being not otherwise employed		Pensioners,		Pensioners,
	Dukes' eldest sons		Footmen and	The King's	Footmen and
	Marquesses		Equerries of	Majesty	Equerries of
175	Dukes		the Stable		the Stable
	Serjeants of	Serjeants of	The Master of the Horse leading a spare horse
	Arms but	Arms but	Vice Chamberlain to the King not to pass	not to pass	The Queen's Vice Chamberlain		190
	the swords	the swords
	Clarenceaux and Norroy kings of arms together

163 Principal Secretary Robert Cecil, created Baron Essendon in May of 1603. The Principal Secretary was the more senior of two secretaries of state responsible for both diplomatic and domestic correspondence and a range of related duties. Cecil was at this time the single most powerful and important minister of the King.

171 Lord Admiral Charles Howard, Earl of Nottingham, commander of the royal navy, a post he had held during the famous victory over the Armada in 1588
Lord Chamberlain Thomas Howard, Earl of Suffolk, the administrative head of the Chamber and its offshoot, the Privy Chamber 176–8 Clarenceaux and Norroy kings of arms William Camden, the antiquarian, and Richard St George. Kings of Arms were heralds, responsible for overseeing grants of arms and adjudicating issues relating to rank, under the supervision of the Earl Marshal.

179 Lord Treasurer Thomas Sackville, Earl of Dorset, head of the Exchequer
Lord Chancellor Sir Thomas Egerton. The Lord Chancellor was both the chief judge of the Court of Chancery and head of the administrative department that controlled the Great Seal, needed to authenticate legal writs and some other official documents. The Lord Chancellor and Lord Treasurer were the senior administrative officers of the Crown, since they headed the oldest administrative departments of royal government, dating from the twelfth century.

180 Lord Mayor of London Sir William Bennet. Dugdale describes him wearing 'a crimson velvet gown, bearing his enamelled golden mace upon his shoulder' and states that he 'ushered the King, Queen and Prince... to Temple Bar, [where] he took his leave and received many thanks of the King and Queen, who was after met by the Aldermen and Sheriffs, who came to guard him home'.

180–1 Garter Chief King at Arms the highest ranking herald, William Norroy, who would have worn the robe of crimson satin he received when invested with his post in February 1604. Along with the Chief Gentlemen Usher he was placed here to attend upon the Lord Mayor, who was himself escorting the King through the City.

181 Chief Gentleman Usher in charge of the gentlemen ushers of the Privy Chamber

182–3 Prince of Wales James's eldest son Henry Frederick (1594–1612). Dugdale states: 'The young hopeful Henry Frederick or Frederick Henry, Prince of Wales, smiling as overjoyed, to the peoples' eternal comfort, salute[d] them with many a bend.'

184 Lord High Constable This medieval office had been vacant since 1521, but the Earl of Nottingham was appointed to fill it during the coronation and the entry into London.

185 Earl Marshal The Earl of Worcester, again appointed only for the Coronation and the entry.

186 Lord Great Chamberlain Edward de Vere, Earl of Oxford. This ancient office had long since become purely ceremonial in nature. The Lord High Constable, Earl Marshal and Lord Great Chamberlain were all relics of an earlier stage in the development of both the royal household and royal governance, when both retained many feudal characteristics. Their inclusion at this, the climactic point, of the royal procession reflects a deep sense of tradition rather than the organization of the court in the early seventeenth century. That sense of tradition was itself significant, however. Late in Elizabeth's reign, the Earl of Essex had attempted to revive the prestige of the Earl Marshal's Office as part of a broader reassertion of aristocratic privilege. A manuscript antiquarian treatise, apparently written under his auspices, had canvassed the ancient authority of both the Earl Marshal and the Constable, which arguably included, in the latter case, the right to arrest the King himself in the name of the nobility. The presence of archaic elements in the entry ceremony can legitimately be related to a wider preoccupation with medieval procedures and precedents that profoundly shaped the political culture of James's reign.

Gentlemen Pensioners an elite guard equipped with black uniforms and gilt halberds, recruited from leading gentry families. Established in 1539, they staffed the Presence Chamber, a throne room immediately beyond the privy apartments, and also performed other ceremonial duties.

Equerries functionaries of the royal stable, present as part of the King's escort

186–7 The King's Majesty James rode on a saddle of purple velvet embroidered with pearls and silver twist, beneath a canopy consisting of 38 yards of exceptionally fine yellow cloth worth £10 a yard, fastened to a wooden frame with gilt nails. The canopy was further adorned with gold fringe, ten large plumes and fifty yards of ribbon. In all the saddle, canopy and related paraphernalia cost just over £550 (PRO LC2/4(5)).

188 Master of the Horse Edward Somerset, Earl of Worcester. Head of the King's stables, the Master of the Horse had the right to ride with him during hunts and on other occasions.

189 Vice Chamberlain Sir John Stanhope. The second ranking officer of the Chamber, under the Chamberlain.

190 Queen's Vice Chamberlain Sir George Carew

The Queen's Lord Chamberlain
 Gentlemen Gentlemen
 Ushers Footmen The Queen's Ushers Footmen Majesty Pensioners
 Pensioners Pensioners
 Master of the Horse leading a spare horse
 Ladies according to their degrees, viz.
 duchesses, marquesses, countesses,
 viscountesses, baronesses, knights' wives Maids of honour with the Mother of the Maids
 The Captain of the Guard, with the Guard to follow circles, like the points of so many geometrical needles, through a fixed and adamantine desire to behold this forty-five years' wonder now brought forth by time; their tongues neglecting all language else, save that which spake zealous prayers and unceaseable wishes for his most speedy and longed-for arrival. Inasmuch that the night was thought unworthy to be crowned with sleep, and the day not fit to be looked upon by the sun, which brought not some fresh tidings of his Majesty's more near and nearer approach.

Pag. I THE MAGNIFICENT ENTERTAINMENT Given to King James, Queen Anne his wife, and Henry Frederick the Prince, upon the day of his Majesty's triumphant passage (from the Tower) through his honourable city (and chamber) of London, being the 15 of March 1604. As well by the English as by the strangers: with the speeches and songs delivered in the several pageants.

At the length Expectation (who is ever waking and that so long was great) grew near the time of her delivery, Rumour coming all in a sweat to play the midwife, whose first comfortable words were that this treasure of a kingdom, a man ruler, hid so many years from us, was now brought to light and at hand.

Et populi vox erat una, Venit.

Martial

Templa Deis, mores populis dedit, otia ferro, Astra suis, Caelo sidera,serta Jovi

Martial

And that he was to be conducted through some utter part of this his city to his royal castle the Tower, that in the age of a man, till this very minute, had not been acquainted nor borne the name of a king's court. Which entrance of his in this manner being famed abroad, because his loving subjects the citizens would give a taste of their duty and affection, the device following was suddenly made up as the first service to a more royal and serious ensuing entertainment; and this, as it was then purposed, should have been performed about the bars beyond Bishopsgate.

A DEVICE

(projected down, but till now not published) that should have served at his Majesty's first access to the city.

The sorrow and amazement that like an earthquake began to shake the distempered body of this island, by reason of our late sovereign's departure, being wisely and miraculously prevented, and the feared wounds of a civil sword (as Alexander's fury was with music) being stopped from bursting forth by the sound of trumpets that proclaimed King James, all men's eyes were presently turned to the north, standing even stone still in their

The Device
 Saint George, Saint Andrew, the patrons of both kingdoms, having a long time looked upon each other with 191 Queen's Lord Chamberlain Sir Henry Sydney. The Queen's household was staffed mainly by women but its chief officers were men.

 192-3 The Queen's Majesty Anne of Denmark (1574-1619). Dugdale commented: 'Our gracious Queen Anne, mild and courteous, placed in a chariot of exceeding beauty, did all the way so humbly and with mildness salute her subjects, never ceasing to bend her body to them, this way and that, that women and men in my sight wept with joy.' The chariot—painted, gilt, covered with cloth of gold and topped by ostrich plumes—cost £351 (PRO LC2/4(5)).
 194 horse The horse was equipped with an ornate saddle stuffed with down, covered with two yards of purple tissue cloth costing over £57, adorned with twist laces and fringes of gold, silver, and silk. The material for the saddle cloth cost £20 the yard and so must have been even finer than that used for the King's canopy. The bridle was covered in cloth of gold, fringed with gold and silver lace; there was also a large plume costing £10 (PRO LC2/4(5)).
 195 Ladies rode in two chariots covered in crimson velvet fringed with gold and silk, topped by 18 plumes (PRO LC2/4(5)). Nichols lists them: The Lady Arabella, The Countess of Oxford, The Countess of Northumberland, The Countess of Shrewsbury, The Lady Rich by special commandment, The Countess of Derby, The Countess of Worcester, The Countess of Rutland, The Countess of Cumberland, The Countess of Sussex, The Countess of Bath, The Countess of Southampton the elder, The Countess of Bedford, The Countess of Pembroke, The Countess of Hertford, The Countess of Essex, The Countess of Nottingham, The Countess of Suffolk, The Countess of Dorset, The Lady Lawarre, The Lady Lumlye, the Lady Dacres of the North, The Lady Mordant, The Lady North, The Lady Hunsdon, The Lady Wotton.

 199 Captain of the Guard Sir Thomas Erskine. Like the Gentlemen Pensioners, the Guard belonged to the Chamber.
 205 strangers Foreign residents 207-8 Templa...Jovi Temples he gave the Gods, morals to the people, rest to the sword, immortality to his own kin, to heaven stars, wreaths to Jove (Martial, Epigrams, 9.101.21)

 210 DEVICE design
 212 access entry into 215-16 wisely and miraculously prevented i.e. by the peaceful accession of James I. There had been widespread anxiety over a possible struggle for the succession.
 217 Alexander's...music unidentified allusion
 221 geometrical needles compasses
 223 forty-five years' length of Elizabeth's reign (1558-1603)
 237 Et...Venit And one voice of the people goes up, 'Does he come?' (Martial, Epigrams, 10.6.8)
 239 utter outlying
 246 first service as in a banquet
 249 bars marking the city limits
Bishopsgate on the northern face of the city wall, toward the east. See map, p. 62.
 251 Saint George, Saint Andrew Patron saints of England and Scotland. Dugdale recorded an appearance by the two saints at Jonson's pageant in Fenchurch Street (below, note to l. 453). Was a truncated version of Dekker's pageant transferred there?

countenances rather of mere strangers than of such near neighbours, upon the present aspect of his Majesty's approach toward London were, in his sight, to issue from two several places on horseback and in complete armour, their breasts and caparisons suited with the arms of England and Scotland as they are now quartered, to testify their leagued combination and new sworn brotherhood. 255
 260 These two armed knights, encount'ring one another on the way, were to ride hand-in-hand till they met his Majesty. But the strangeness of this newly-begotten amity flying over the earth, it calls up the Genius of the city, who, not so much amazed as wond'ring at the novelty, 265 intercepts their passage.

And most aptly, in our judgement, might this domesticum numen, the Genius of the place, lay just claim to this preeminence of first bestowing salutations and welcomes on his Majesty—Genius being held inter fictos deos to be 270 god of hospitality and pleasure, and none but such a one was meet to receive so excellent and princely a guest.

Or if not worthy for those two former respects, yet being deus generationis and having a power as well over countries, herbs and trees as over men, and the city 275 having now put on a regeneration or new birth, the induction of such a person might without a warrant from the court of critists pass very current.

To make a false flourish here with the borrowed weapons of all the old masters of the noble science of 280 poesy, and to keep a tyrannical coil in anatomizing Genius from head to foot, only to show how nimbly we can carve up the whole mess of the poets, were to play the executioner, and to lay our city's houshold god on the rack, to make him confess how many pair of Latin sheets 285 we have shaken and cut into shreds to make him a garment. Such feats of activity are stale and common among scholars, before whom it is protested we come not now, in a pageant, to play a master's prize, for nunc ego ventosae plebis suffragia venor.

The multitude is now to be our audience, whose heads 290 would miserably run a-wool-gathering if we do but offer to break them with hard words. But suppose by the way, contrary to the opinion of all the doctors, that our Genius (in regard the place is feminine and the person itself, 295 drawn figura humana, sed ambiguo sexu) should at this time be thrust into woman's apparel. It is no schism: be it so. Our Genius is then a female, antique and reverend both in years and habit: a chaplet of mingled flowers, interwoven with branches of the plane tree crowning her 300 temples; her hair long and white; her vesture a loose robe, changeable and powdered with Stars. And being on horseback likewise, thus furnished, this was the tune of her voice.

GENIUS LOCI

*Stay, we conjure you, by that potent name
 Of which each letter's now a triple charm;* 305
*Stay and deliver us of whence you are,
 And why you bear alone th'ostent of war,
 When all hands else rear olive boughs and palm,
 And halcyonean days assure all's calm;
 When every tongue speaks music, when each pen 310
 (Dulled and dyed black in gall) is white again
 And dipped in nectar, which by Delphic fire
 Being heated, melts into an Orphean choir.
 When Troy's proud buildings show like fairy bowers
 And streets, like gardens, are perfumed with flowers, 315
 And windows glazed only with wond'ring eyes
 (In a king's look such admiration lies!),
 And when soft-handed Peace so sweetly thrives
 That bees in soldiers' helmets build their hives;
 When Joy a-tiptoe stands on Fortune's wheel 320
 In silken robes, how dare you shine in steel?*

258 now quartered on the arms of James I 263 Genius guardian spirit, incarnation of the city's essential character

266–7 domesticum numen household god
 269 inter fictos deos among false or fictitious gods

273 deus generationis god of engendering

277 critists critics

280 coil disturbance, tumult

anatomizing describing minutely.

Almost certainly a glance at Jonson's marginal note explaining the Genius at the Fenchurch arch (below, l. 567), which had appeared in print shortly before the publication of Dekker's text.

282 mess course or serving of food

288 play... prize as in a university play

288–9 nunc... venor 'I am now to hunt for the votes of a fickle public', paraphrasing Horace, Epistles 1.19.37. Dekker inverted the sense by substituting Nunc (now) for Non (not). Probably another barb aimed at Jonson, who liked to call himself the English Horace and who shared Horace's disdain for popularity.

295 figura... sexu As a human figure but of ambiguous sex. Middleton followed this precedent in creating a female Genius for Triumphs of Truth.

296 schism heresy

297 antique ancient, referring both to classical antiquity and the Genius's appearance

298 chaplet wreath

299 plane tree an ornamental tree of Persian origin. Cesare Ripa, Iconologia, describes 'Genio Buono secondo i Gentili' as a youth crowned with a wreath of plane.

301 powdered sprinkled

307 th'ostent the appearance

308 olive boughs and palm conventional symbols of peace

309 halcyonean the halcyon, a mythical bird that builds its nest on the ocean and so has power to calm the waves; hence a symbol of a peace-giver

311 gall bile, venom

312 Delphic sacred to Apollo

313 Orphean of Orpheus, the mythological musician-poet whose lyre charmed even the gods of Hell

314 Troy's London's. The medieval chronicler Geoffrey of Monmouth traced the descent of the British people to a band of Trojans. Although repeatedly disputed, this theory sanctioned poetic allusions to the nation's Trojan origin. Dekker later refers to London as Troynovant (ll. 357, 1535).

buildings an allusion to the appearance of the triumphal route.

fairy bowers Thanks in large part to Spenser, fairies had become patriotic symbols.

319 bees in soldiers' helmets icon of peace, probably derived from emblem 45 in Andrea Alciati, Emblemata Libellas, 'Ex bello pax', showing several bees next to a helmet

- SAINT GEORGE
Lady, what are you that so question us?
- GENIUS
*I am the place's Genius, whence now springs
 A vine whose youngest branch shall produce kings:
 325 This little world of men, this precious stone
 That sets out Europe; this, the glass alone,
 Where the neat sun each morn himself attires
 And gilds it with his repercussive fires;
 This jewel of the land, England's right eye,
 330 Altar of Love and sphere of Majesty;
 Green Neptune's minion, 'bout whose virgin waist
 Isis is like a crystal girdle cast:
 Of this are we the Genius. Here have I Slept, by the favour of a deity,
 335 Forty-four summers and as many springs,
 Not frighted with the threats of foreign kings;
 But held up in that gownèd state I have,
 By twice twelve fathers politic and grave,
 Who with a sheathèd sword and silken law
 340 Do keep, within weak walls, millions in awe.
 I charge you therefore say for what you come?
 What are you?*
- BOTH Knights at arms.
- SAINT GEORGE Saint George.
- SAINT ANDREW Saint Andrew.
- SAINT GEORGE For Scotland's honour I, Both sworn into a league of unity.
- GENIUS
 345 *I clap my hands for joy and seat you both Next to my heart. In leaves of purest gold
 This most auspicious love shall be enrolled.
 Be joined to us and as to earth we bow,
 So to those royal feet bend your steeled brow.
 350 In name of all these Senators on whom*
- 324 vine symbolizing lineage
- 328 repercussive reflected
- 331 Neptune's God of the seas
- 332 Isis Egyptian goddess, protector of the dead and the sick, also associated with royal power
- 335 Forty-four summers since Elizabeth's accession
- 337 gownèd symbolizing peace
- 338 twice twelve alluding to the aldermen of London, of whom there were actually 26
- politic* versed in the mysteries of politics.
- 340 weak walls of London. Foreign visitors sometimes remarked on the absence of strong defences around English cities, attributable to the long domestic peace of the Tudor period.
- 350 Senators the Council of London.
- 357 Troynovant New Troy. See note at 314.
- 358–9 Rerum...Deos Sure saviour of our state, the world's glory, Caesar, from whose safety we win belief that the great
- gods exist (Martial, Epigrams, 2.91.1–2). An early example of the use of Roman imperial imagery to celebrate Jacobean kingship.
- 360–1 Dilexere...amant Boys loved thee before, and young men, and aged sires; but now infants, too, love thee, Caesar (Martial, Epigrams, 9.8.9–10).
- 366 iam...via And the high stages grow in the middle of the street (Martial, de Spectaculis 2.2).
- 368–9 poets...painters a Renaissance commonplace, deriving ultimately from Horace's Art of Poetry
- 371 invention the selection and arrangement of materials for the entertainment
- 378 Aediles Roman municipal officers whose functions included overseeing shows and spectacles
- communi consilio* out of the common council
- 382 Many days glossing over the delay of eight months caused by the plague.
- Virtue builds more than those of antique Rome,
 Shouting a cheerful welcome—since no clime
 Nor age that has gone o'er the head of time
 Did e'er cast up such joys, nor the like sum
 (But here) shall stand in the world, years to come—* 355
*Dread King, our hearts make good what words do want,
 To bid thee boldly enter Troynovant.
 Rerum certa salus, Terrarum gloria Caesar!
 Sospite quo, magnos credimus esse Deos:
 Dilexere prius pueri, iuvenesque senesque,
 Idem
 At nunc infantes te quoque Caesar amant.*
- This should have been the first offering of the city's love, but his Majesty not making his entrance according to expectation it was, not utterly thrown from the altar, but laid by. 365
- Iam Crescunt media Paegmata celsa via.* Martial
- By this time imagine that poets, who draw speaking pictures, and painters, who make dumb poesy, had their heads and hands full, the one for native and sweet invention, the other for lively illustration of what the former should devise; both of them emulously contending, but not striving, with the prop'rest and brightest colours of wit and art, to set out the beauty of the great triumphant day. 375
- For more exact and formal managing of which business, a select number both of aldermen and commoners (like so many Roman Aediles) were communi consilio chosen forth, to whose discretion the charge, contrivings, projects and all other dependences owing to so troublesome a work was entirely and judicially committed. 380
- Many days were thriftily consumed to mould the bodies of these triumphs comely and to the honour of the place, and at last the stuff whereof to frame them was beaten out: the soul that should give life and a tongue 385
- Harrison states: 'These five [actually seven] triumphal arches were first taken in hand in the beginning of April 1603, presently after his Majesty was proclaimed, it being expected that his passage would have been through his honourable city and chamber to his coronation upon Saint James his day following [25 July]. But by reason of the sickness it pleased his Majesty to be solemnly crowned at Westminster, without sight of these triumphs. Notwithstanding, the business being set on foot went on with all expedition till Bartholomewtide [24 August], and then ceased because of the great mortality. Forty days more was given for the preparing of this triumphal arch.'
- 384 stuff material
- 385 soul inner spirit and meaning, contrasted with the outward form, supplied by the workmen to this entertainment being to breathe out of writers' pens, the limbs of it to lie at the hard-handed mercy of mechanicians.

390 In a moment, therefore, of time are carpenters, joiners, carvers, and other artificers sweating at their chisels.

Accingunt Omnes operi.

Virgil

395 Not a finger but had an office: he was held unworthy ever after to 'suck the honeydew of peace' that 'against his coming, by whom our peace wears a triple wreath,' would offer to play the drone. The streets are surveyed: heights, breadths, and distances taken, as it were to make fortifications, for the solemnities. Seven pieces of ground like so many fields for a battle are plotted forth, upon 400 which these arches of triumph must show themselves in their glory; aloft, in the end do they advance their proud foreheads.

*Circum pueri, innuptaeque puellae,
Sacra canunt, funemque manu contingere gaudent.*

405 Virgil

Even children, might they have been suffered, would gladly have spent their little strength about the engines that mounted up the frames, such a fire of love and joy was kindled in every breast.

410 The day for whose sake these wonders of wood climbed thus into the clouds is now come, being so early up (by reason of artificial lights which wakened it) that the sun overslept himself and rose not in many hours after, yet bringing with it into the very bosom of the city a world of people. The streets seemed to be paved with men; stalls instead of rich wares were set out with children; open 415 casements filled up with women.

All glass windows taken down but in their places sparkled so many eyes that had it not been the day the light which reflected from them was sufficient to have made one. He that should have compared the empty and 420 untrodden walks of London, which were to be seen in that late mortally-destroying deluge, with the thronged streets now, might have believed that upon this day began a new creation and that the city was the only workhouse wherein sundry nations were made. 425

A goodly and civil order was observed in marshalling all the companies according to their degrees, the first beginning at the upper end of Saint Mark's Lane and the last reaching above the Conduit in Fleet Street; their seats, being double-railed, upon the upper part whereon they leaned; the streamers, ensigns and bannerets of each particular company decently fixed. And directly against them, even quite through the body of the city, so high as to Temple Bar, a single rail, in fair distance from the other, 430 was likewise erected to put off the multitude. Amongst whose tongues, which in such consorts never lie still, though there were no music, yet as the poet says: 435

Vox diversa sonat, populorum est vox tamen una.

Martial 440

Nothing that they speak could be made anything, yet all that was spoken sounded to this purpose, that still his Majesty was coming. They have their longings. And behold, afar off they spy him, richly mounted on a white jennet, under a rich canopy, sustained by eight Barons of the Cinque Ports, the Tower serving that morning but for 445 his withdrawing chamber, wherein he made him ready, and from thence stepped presently into his City of London, which for the time might worthily borrow the name of his 388 mechanicians practitioners of mechanical crafts. The contrast here between writers and mechanicians seems at odds with the parallel of poets and painters in ll. 368-75. Poets had traditionally enjoyed a higher status than artists and architects because they dealt with ideas rather than manual skills. This distinction had been challenged by several European theorists, especially the Florentine painter and art historian Giorgio Vasari. Dekker's phrase implicitly affirms the traditional superiority of literature over the manual arts.

391 Accingunt...operi All equip themselves for the work (Virgil, Aeneid 2.235)

394-5 suck...wreath Unidentified quotations

394 honeydew a sticky substance found on leaves and stems of plants against in anticipation of 403-4 Circum...gaudent Around it boys and unwedded girls chant holy songs and delight to touch the cable with their hands (Virgil, Aeneid, 2.238-239)

407 engines probably the arches themselves, rather than machines used to erect them

413 overslept The day was overcast.

415 stalls common along London streets

417 casements Street stalls and windows along the route were rented out to gentry and other affluent spectators.

423 mortally-destroying deluge the plague of 1603

427-8 civil...degrees the orderly arrangement of liveried members of the guilds along the route. See Introduction.

429 Saint Mark's Lane in the eastern part of the City near the Tower of London

431 double-railed closed in with a double rail

435 Temple Bar to the west, marking the boundary between London and Westminster along the Strand

439 Vox...una Many voices sounded, but the voice of the people was as one. Adapted from Martial, De spectaculis libri 3, l. 11.

445 jennet a small Spanish horse

445-6 Barons of the Cinque Ports Royal officers responsible for oversight of seven ports and adjacent land along the coast of Kent and Sussex, incorporated under the Crown in the early Middle Ages because of their strategic importance. The Barons of the Cinque Ports had successfully claimed the right to hold the canopy over James at the coronation in the previous year, on the basis of medieval precedent.

447 withdrawing chamber A room or rooms between the privy chamber and bedchamber in the King's apartments in various royal palaces, to which the topography of the city is here being compared.

450 court royal. His passage alongst that court offering itself for more state through seven gates.

This gate of passage then, into which his Majesty made his first entrance, was derived from the Tuscana, being the principal pillar of those five upon which the noble frame of architecture doth stand, for the Tuscan column is the strongest and most worthy to support so famous a work as this fabric was, considering that upon his rustic pillars the goodliest houses, turrets, steeples, etc. within this city were to be borne. And those models stood as a coronet on the forehead or battlements of this great and magnificent edifice.

475

480

485

490

495

The cheeks or sides of the gate were, as it were, doubly guarded with the portraitures of Atlas, King of Mauritania, who, according to his own shortness and thickness, from the symmetry of his foot caused a pillar to be made, whose height with base and capital was six times the thickness in height. And so is this of ours, bearing the name of Tuscana, as we said before, and reaching to the very point of the arch, from whence we did derive Dorica, which bore up the architrave, frieze, and cornice, and was garnished with corbels or croxtels fitting such work, besides the beauty of pyramids, beasts, water, tables and many other enrichments which you may find expressed in the piece itself.

From a gallery directly over the gate the sound of loud music, being the waites and oboes of the city, was sent forth.

Pag. 2

The Device called Londinium

The first pegme was erected in Fenchurch Street, the back of it so leaning on the east end of the church that it overspread the whole street. And thus we describe it.

It was a flat square, builded upright. The perpendicular line of the whole frame (that is to say, the distance from the bottom to the top) as the ground line, is (also in this,
so in all the rest) to be found out and tried by the scale, divided by 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5, and set at the lower end of the piece. By which figures feet are represented, so that in all the descriptions, where mention is to be made of heights, breadths or any other commensurable proportions, you shall find them left thus — with a blank, because we wish you rather to apply them to the scale yourself, than by setting them down to call either your skill or judgement in question.

And note withal that the ground-plot hath not the same scale which the upright hath, for of the two scales which you see annexed the lesser is of the ground and standeth in the ground-plot, the greater for the edifice or building itself.

The Pegme at Fenchurch

Presented itself in a square and flat upright, like to the side of a city; the top thereof, above the vent and crest, adorned with houses, towers and steeples, set off in perspective. Upon the battlements, in a great capital letter, was inscribed,

LONDINIVM

500

505

451 state ceremonial magnificence gates. Arches. Dekker goes on to describe the Fenchurch arch: see Additional Passage B.

453 pegme Arch. Dugdale comments:
'In Fenchurch Street was erected a stately trophy or pageant, at the city's charge, on which stood such a show of workmanship and glory as I never saw the like. Top and topgallant, whereon were shows so embroidered and set out as the cost was incomparable, who speaking speeches to the King of that excellent eloquence and as (while I live)
I commend. The City of London very rarely and artificially made, where no church, house nor place of note but your eye might easily find out, as the Exchange, Cole harbour, Paul's, Bowe Church, etc. There also Saint George and Saint Andrew, in complete armour, met in one combat and fought for the victory, but an old hermit passing by,
in an oration joined them hand-in-hand and so forever hath made them as one heart, to the joy of the King, the delight of the lords, and the unspeakable comfort of the commonalty.' The old hermit, mentioned in none of the other texts, was probably Dekker's Genius: her long robe must have given her a hermit-like appearance, since Dugdale appears to be describing a version of the pageant originally planned for Bishopsgate, which had perhaps been transferred to a site between the Tower and Fenchurch.

464 a blank Dekker often supplies the missing measurement. The use of the scale lent an aura of technical sophistication to the drawings, making them similar to architectural plots.

474 Tuscana The Tuscan order, discussed by Vitruvius and some Renaissance architectural manuals. Normally regarded as the oldest and sturdiest of the classical orders, suitable for barns and outbuildings, it was used by Inigo Jones in the 1630s as the basis for Covent Garden.

480 coronet small crown worn by a nobleman or noblewoman

490 did derive Dorica the Tuscan was replaced by the Doric order above the keystone of the arch

491 architrave, frieze, and cornice parts of the entablature, resting on the columns

492 corbels projecting beams. Large wooden corbels were a peculiar feature of the Tuscan order, prominently used by Jones in St Paul's Church, Covent Garden.

497 waites and oboes city musicians

501 vent crenellated top of the arch

503 perspective Perspective was not well understood by English painters at this date, although it would soon become an innovative feature of Inigo Jones's masque designs. Jonson, who ignores most of the architectural features reported by Harrison, notices this one technical feature which Harrison overlooked.

The device called Londinium, in Fenchurch Street, for pageant 2.

- a Annals liber 14.
 b Camden Britannia, p. 374.
 c Liber 8 Epigrammaton 36.

According to Tacitus: At Suetonius mira constantia, medios inter hosteis Londinium perrexit, cognomento quidem Coloniae non insignis, sed copia negotiatorum, et commatu maxime celebre.^a Beneath that, in a less and different character, was written

CAMERA REGIA

Which title immediately after the Norman conquest it began to have, and by the indulgence of succeeding princes hath been hitherto continued.^b In the frieze over the gate it seemeth to speak this verse:

PAR DOMVS HAEC COELO,
 SED MINOR EST DOMINO.^c

Taken out of Martial, and implying that though this city for the state and magnificence might, by hyperbole, be said to touch the stars and reach up to heaven, yet was it far inferior to the master thereof, who was his Majesty, and in that respect unworthy to receive him. The highest person advanced therein was

MONARCHIA BRITANNICA

and fitly, applying to the above mentioned title of the city, the King's chamber, and therefore here placed as in the proper seat of the empire: for so the glory and light of our kingdom, Master Camden, speaking of London, saith she is, totius Britanniae Epitome, Britannicque imperii sedes, Regumque Angliae Camera, tantum inter omneis eminent, quantum (ut ait ille) inter viburna cupressus. She was a woman richly attired in cloth-of-gold and tissue; a rich mantle; over her state two crowns hanging, with pensile shields through them, the one limned with the particular coat of England, the other of Scotland; on either side also a crown, with the like scutcheons and peculiar coats of France and Ireland. In her hand she holds a sceptre; on her head a fillet of gold interwoven with palm and laurel; her hair bound into four several points, descending from her crowns; and in her lap a little globe, inscribed upon

ORBIS BRITANNICVS

And beneath the word

- 506–9 At...celebre Suetonius, on the other hand, with remarkable firmness, marched straight through the midst of the enemy upon London; which, though not distinguished by the title of the colony, was none the less a busy centre, chiefly through its crowd of merchants and stores (Tacitus, Annals 14.33). The quotation, taken from Tacitus' account of London's destruction in Boadecia's rebellion, seems irrelevant, unless Jonson wanted to justify the use of the Latin form of the city's name.
 511 CAMERA REGIA King's Chamber.
 514.n Camden Britannia William Camden, Britannia sive florentissimorum Rengnorum Anglia, Scotiae, Hiberniae et Insularum adjaentium ex intime antiquitate Chorographica Descriptio (1586 and later editions). Camden was Jonson's tutor at Westminster and lifetime friend.
 516–17 PAR...DOMINO whose summit touches the stars, rivals heaven, but

- is not so great as its lord (Martial, Epigrams, 8.36.12)
 524 MONARCHIA BRITANNICA James's accession created the British monarchy by uniting the crown of Scotland to those of England and Ireland. Britain was still an unfamiliar Latinate name in 1603 and the notion that they should now think of themselves as British rather than English—and Scots as fellow countrymen rather than barbaric foreigners—horrified many of James's new subjects. The King, however, saw the dynastic union of England and Scotland as a providentially ordained event, meant to open the way to a more complete integration of laws, customs, and peoples. His strong feelings on the topic encouraged writers seeking court patronage to compose their own treatises and panegyrics on the union of England and Scotland. Numerous allusions to

- the unification throughout the pageant thus represent James's views, but not necessarily those of the audience.
 528 Master Camden see above note to l. 514.n
 529–31 totius...cupressus 'the epitome of all Britain, the seat of the British empire, the chamber of the English monarchy, so that, as the proverb has it, she rears her head as high among all other cities as the cyresses do among ossiers' (a paraphrase of Virgil's description of Rome, Ecloques, 1.25).
 532 tissue fine cloth
 533 mantle sleeveless garment. The gold robe and crown parallel those of the figure Divine Justice in Ripa's Iconologia state throne
pensile pendant, hanging
 534 limned painted
 536 peculiar particular
 541 ORBIS BRITANNICVS British world

DIVISVS AB ORBE

545 To show that this empire is a world divided from the world, and alluding to that of Claudian Et nostro diducta Britannia mundo^a and Virgil

Et penitus toto divisos orbe Britannos.^b

550 The wreath denotes victory and happiness, the sceptre and crowns sovereignty; the shields, the precedency of the countries and their distinctions. At her feet was set

THEOSOPHIA,

555 or Divine Wisdom, all in white, a blue mantle seeded with stars, a crown of stars on her head. Her garments figured truth, innocence and clearness. She was always looking up. In her one hand she sustained a dove, in the other a serpent: the last to show her subtlety, the first her simplicity, alluding to that text of scripture, Estate ergo prudentes sicut serpentes, et simplices sicut columbae.^c Her word

PER ME REGES REGNANT.^d

565 Intimating how by her all kings do govern and that she is the foundation and strength of kingdoms, to which end she was here placed upon a cube at the foot of the monarchy, as her base and stay. Directly beneath her stood

GENIVS VRBIS^e

570 A person attired rich, reverend and antique, his hair long and white, crowned with a wreath of plane tree, which is said to be arbor genialis; his mantle of purple and buskins of that colour. He held in one hand a goblet, in the other a branch full of little twigs, to signify increase and indulgence. His word

HIS ARMIS

575 pointing to the two that supported him, whereof the one on the right hand was

BOULEVTES

580 figuring the Council of the city, and was suited in black and purple, a wreath of oak^f upon his head; sustaining for his ensigns on his left arm a scarlet robe, and in his

a De Manlio Theodoro Consulo Panegyricus.

b Eclogae I.

c Matthew 10:16.

d Proverbs 8:15.

e Antiqui Genium omnium gignendarum rerum existimarunt Deum: et tam urbibus quam hominibus vel caeteris rebus natum. Lilius Gregorius Geraldus in Syntagma deorum 15. and Rosinus Antiquitatis Romae liber 2 caput 14.

f Civica corona fit e fronde querna, quoniam cibus, victusque antiquissimus querceus capi solitus sit. Rosinus, liber 10 caput 27.

543 DIVISVS AB ORBE divided from the world

546 Et... mundo And Britain, so far removed from our continent (Claudian, Panegyricus dictus Manlio Theodoro Consuli, l. 51)

548 Et... Britannos And the Britons, wholly sundered from all the world (Eclogues 1.66)

553 all in white Ripa, Iconologia prescribes a white robe for Innocence and for one of four possible representations of Truth. The blue mantle and stars have no parallels in Ripa's descriptions of Religione, Sapienza or Chiarezza.
seeded sprinkled

556 dove Ripa depicts Divine Justice (Iustitia Divina) with a dove.

557 serpent Perhaps suggested by Ripa's description of religione finta (feigned religion), who holds a gold cup from which a serpent rises.

558-9 Estate... columbae Be ye wise as serpents and innocent as doves

561 PER... REGNANT By me Kings reign

564 cube Ripa describes the figure Religione as standing on a squared stone, representing 'Christ our Lord, who is the true foundation stone taken from the builders of the old law and placed in the principal corner of His holy Church' (Christo Signor nostro, il quale e la vera pitra anglare, che disse il profeta riprovata da gli Edificatori de la vecchia Legge, & e per esser posta poi nel principal contone della sua santa Chiesa).

567 GENIVS VRBIS Genius (or spirit) of the city

567.n Antiqui... natum The ancients judged that God was the Genius of all created things, innate in men as in cities and other things.

Syntagma deorum Historiae deorum gen- tilium syntagma. Jonson owned Geraldus' Opera Omnia, (1580), which contained this work in volume 1.

Rosinus Antiquitatis Romae Johannes Rosinus, Romae antiquitatis (1583)

570 arbor genialis the nuptial tree, alluding to James's marriage to his kingdom

571 buskins boots worn by actors in Athenian tragedy

574 HIS ARMIS by these arms

578-9 black and purple Ripa represents Council as dressed in dark vestments of reddish colour.

579.n Civica... sit 'the civic crown should be from leaves of oak, inasmuch as nourishment and sustenance were customarily taken in the most ancient times from the oak.' The Romans believed that their remote ancestors subsisted largely on a diet of acorns.

- a Fasciculi virgarum, intra quas obligata securis erat, sic, ut ferrum in summo fasce extaret, Rosinus l. 7 caput 3. Ubi notandum est, non debere praecipitem, et solutam iram esse magistratus. Mora enim allata, et cunctatio, dum sensim virgae soluuntur, identidem consilium mutavit de plectendo. Quando autem vitia quaedam sunt corrigibilia, deplorata alia; castigant virgae, quod revocari valet, immendabile securis praecidunt, Plutarch, Problematae Romanae 82.
- b Octavia, Act 2.
- c Aeneid liber 8.
- d Amores liber 3 clausula 6.
- right hand the fasces,^a as tokens of magistracy, with this inscription:
SERVARE CIVES
 The other on the left hand,
POLEMIVS 585
 The warlike force of the city in an antique coat or armour, with a target and sword; his helm on and crowned with laurel, implying strength and conquest. In his hand he bore the standard of the city, with this word
EXTINGVERE ET HOSTEIS 590
 Expressing by those several mots connected, that with those arms of counsel and strength the Genius was able to extinguish the King's enemies and preserve his citizens, alluding to those verses in Seneca, Extinguere hostem, maxima est virtus ducis. 595
Servare cives, maior est patriae, patri.^b Underneath these in an aback thrust out before the rest lay TAMESIS,
 the river, as running along the side of the city in a skin-coat made like flesh, naked and blue. His mantle of sea green or water colour, thin and bolne out like a sail; bracelets about his wrists of willow and sedge; a crown of sedge and reed upon his head, mixed with water lilies, alluding to Virgil's description of Tiber: 600
Deus ipse loci, fluvio Tyberinus amoeno,
Populeas inter senior se attollere frondes
Visus, eum tenuis glauco velabat amictu
Carbasus, et crineis umbrosa tegebat Arundo.^c
 His beard and hair long and overgrown, he leans his arm upon an earthen pot, out of which water with live fishes are seen to run forth and play about him. His word
FLVMINA SENSERVNT IPSA^d a hemistich of Ovid's, the rest of the verse being quid esset amor 615
 affirming that rivers themselves and such inanimate creatures have heretofore been made sensible of passions and affections, and that he now no less partook the joy of his Majesty's grateful approach to this city than any of those persons to whom he pointed, which were the daughters of the Genius and six in number; who in a 620
- 581 fasces bundles of sticks enclosing an axe, the Roman symbol of magistracy
- 581.n Fasciculi...praecidunt Bundles of sticks in which axes are fastened, so that the heads project from the bundle, to show a magistrate's anger ought not to be rash and ungrounded. While the rods are loosened the magistrates deliberate and delay their anger, so that oftentimes they delay their punishment. Now, since some badness is curable, but other badness is past remedy, the rods correct that which may be amended and the axes cut off the incorrigible (Plutarch, Roman Questions 82, normally published as Moralia 283). We have supplied our own translation of Jonson's Latin for the first two sentences, rather than following the Loeb rendering of Plutarch's original Greek, which differs slightly in emphasis.
- 583 SERVARE CIVES to save citizens
- 587 target shield
- 590 EXTINGVERE...HOSTEIS and to extinguish enemies
- 595-6 Extinguere...patri '—To destroy foes is a ruler's greatest virtue. | —For the father of his country to save citizens is greater still.' An exchange between Nero and Seneca in the Senecan play Octavia (ll. 443-4), after the former ordered the execution of two erstwhile associates.
- 597 aback square tablet or compartment
- 599 TAMESIS Thames
- 602 bolne swelled
- 606-9 Deus...Arundo Before him the very god of the place, Tiberinus of the pleasant stream, seemed to raise his aged head amid the poplar leaves; thin lawn draped him in mantle of grey, and shady reeds crowned his hair (Virgil, Aeneid 8.31-4).
- 612 word motto
- 613-15 FLVMINA...amor what love is, rivers themselves have felt (Amores 3.6.24). Jonson incorrectly cited liber 3, cl. 5.
- 614 hemistich part of a line of verse, divided by a caesura spreading ascent upon several greces help to beautify both the sides. The first

EVPHROSINE

625 or Gladness was suited in green, a mantle of diverse colours, embroidered with all variety of flowers; on her head a garland of myrtle; in her right hand a crystal cruse filled with wine, in the left, a cup of gold; at her feet a timbrel, harp and other instruments, all ensignes of gladness,

Natis in usum laetitia scyphis, etc.^a

And in another place,

Nunc est bibendum, nunc pede libero

Pulsanda Tellus, etc.^b

635 Her word.

HÆC ÆVI MIHI PRIMA DIES^c

as if this were the first hour of her life and the minute wherein she began to be, beholding so long coveted and looked for a presence. The second or Veneration was varied in an ash-coloured suit and dark mantle, a veil over her head of ash colour; her hands crossed before her and her eyes half closed. Her word

640

SEBASIS

MIHI SEMPER DEUS^d

645 implying both her office of reverence and the dignity of her object, who, being as God on earth, should never be less in her thought. The third

PROTHYMIA

650 or Promptitude was attired in a short tucked garment of flame colour, wings at her back; her hair bright and bound up with ribbons; her breast open, virago-like; her buskins so ribboned. She was crowned with a chaplet of trifolium, to express readiness and openness every way. In her right hand she held a squirrel, as being the creature most full of life and quickness; in the left a close round censer, with the perfume suddenly to be vented forth at the sides. Her word

655

QUA DATA PORTA^e

660 taken from an other place in Virgil, where Eolus at the command of Juno lets forth the wind a Horace Carminum liber 1, 27.

b Et Ode 37.

c Statius Sylvae 4, Eucharisticon Domitianum.

d Virgil, Eclogae I.

e Aeneid I.

622 spreading ascent upon several greces several steps that became wider as they ascended 626 embroidered . . . flowers Ripa describes the robes of Contento Armoroso (Amorous Contentment) and Allegrezza (Cheerfulness) as embroidered with flowers and explains in the latter case that this is 'because meadows laugh when covered with flowers'. Like Jonson's figure, Allegrezza holds a crystal goblet containing red wine and a gold cup, 'demonstrating that cheerfulness cannot hide herself but freely communicates' with others. Ripa does not mention the musical instruments or the verses by Horace.

628 cruse small jar or pot

631 Natis . . . scyphis 'Goblets meant for pleasure's service' (line 1)

633-4 Nunc . . . Tellus 'Now is the time to drain the flowing bowl, now with unfettered foot to beat the ground with dancing.' The first lines of an ode celebrating Octavius' final victory over Cleopatra, which effectively ended the civil wars following Caesar's assassination and opened the way for Octavian to become Emperor. The allusion thus suggests a celebration of newly founded imperial authority that overcomes civil discord and brings peace.

636 HÆC . . . DIES 'This is my natal day', Statius' cry of joy upon his first invitation to a great imperial banquet (Sylvae 4.2, 'Eucharisticon ad Imperatorem Augustum Germanicum Domitianum', line 13).

644 MIHI SEMPER DEUS 'For a god he shall always be to me' (line 7); spoken of Augustus, 'the god who has wrought us this peace.'

646 God on earth Compare the opening couplet of the sonnet prefaced to James's Basilikon Doron: 'God gives not kings the style of Gods in vain | For on his throne his sceptre do they sway.' Jonson reinterprets the Roman habit of deifying emperors to conform with James's own theories of kingship.

649 tucked gathered up in folds

650 flame colour bright orange or yellow

651 open uncovered

virago-like virago: a heroine or female warrior

653 trifolium leguminous plant with trifoliate leaves

657 word motto

658 QUA DATA PORTA where passage is given

659 Eolus god charged with keeping the winds locked in a deep cave

- a Aeneid I. ac venti velut agmine facto
 b Metamorphoses I. Qua data porta ruunt, et terras turbine perflant^a c De Quarto Consulatu Honorii Augusti Panegyricus. and showed that she was no less prepared with promptitude and alacrity than the winds were, upon the least gate that shall be opened to his high command. 665
 d Publilius Syrus, Sententiae Mimi. The fourth
- AGRYPNIA
- or Vigilance in yellow, a sable mantle seeded with waking eyes, and silver fringe; her chaplet of heliotropium or turnsole; in her one hand a lamp or cresset, in her other a 670 bell. The lamp signified search and sight, the bell warning, the heliotropium care and respecting her object. Her word SPECULAMUR IN OMNEIS
 alluding to that of Ovid, where he describes the office of Argus, 675
Ipse procul montis sublime cacumen Occupat, unde sedens partes speculatur in omneis^b and implying the like duty of care and vigilance in herself.
 The fifth
- AGAPE
- or Loving Affection, in crimson fringed with gold, a mantle of flame colour, her chaplet of red and white roses; in her hand a flaming heart. The flame expressed zeal, the red and white roses a mixture of simplicity with love; her robes freshness and fervency. Her word 685 NON SIC EXCVBIÆ^c out of Claudian, in following Nec circumstantia pila Quam tutatur amor.
 inferring that though her sister before had protested 690 watchfulness and circumspection, yet no watch or guard could be so safe to the estate or person of a prince as the love and natural affection of his subjects, which she in the city's behalf promised. The sixth
- OMOTHYMIA
- or Unanimity in blue, her robe blue and buskins, a chaplet of blue lilies, showing one truth and entireness of mind.
 In her lap lies a sheaf of arrows bound together, and she herself sits weaving certain small silver twists. Her word
 FIRMA CONSENSVS FACIT. 700
Auxilia humilia firma, etc.^d intimating that even the smallest and weakest aids by consent are made strong; herself personating the unan-

661-2 ac...perflant when lo! the winds, as if in armed array, rush forth where passage is given, and blow in storm blasts across the world (Aeneid 1.82, 3)

668 seeded sprinkled

669-70 heliotropium or turnsole plant whose flowers turn to follow the sun.
 (In Sejanus Jonson used the turnsole to symbolize a sycophant.)

670 cresset iron vessel containing oil or pitch, which can be lit to provide light

676-7 Ipse...omneis There he perched himself apart upon a high mountain top, where at his ease he could keep watch on every side (Ovid, Metamorphoses

1.666-7)

683-5 flame...fervency See Middleton's reference to 'Holy Zeal's immaculate fires' in l. 2170.

683-4 red and white roses symbols of the houses of York and Lancaster, whose union in the Tudor line ended the dynastic wars of the fifteenth century 686 NON SIC EXCVBIÆ Neither watch nor guard (line 281)

688-9 Nec...amor a continuation of the quotation from l. 686: 'nor yet a hedge of spears can secure thee safety; only the people's love can do that'. Claudian goes on to extol the power of love, by which 'the elements, not united by violence, are forever at harmony among themselves'.

 The equation of royal authority and love—which brings peace both to society and nature—foreshadows another theme of Jacobean symbology, employed by Jonson in several masques.

696 buskins boots
chaplet wreath

700 FIRMA CONSENSVS FACIT United feeling makes strength. The full line reads Auxilia humilia firma consensus facit, united feeling makes strength out of humble aids (line 4).

imity or consent of soul in all inhabitants of the city to his service.

a Claudian De Consulata Stilichonis, liber 3.

705 These are all the personages or live figures, whereof only two were speakers (Genius and Tamesis); the rest were mutes. Other dumb complements there were, as the arms of the kingdom on the one side, with this inscription

HIS VIREAS

With these mayst thou flourish.

On the other side the arms of the city, with

HIS VINCAS

With these mayst thou conquer.

715 In the centre or midst of the pegme there was an aback or square, wherein this elogy was written:

Maximus hic rex est, et luce serenior ipsa

Principe quae talem cernit in urbe ducem;

Cuius Fortunam superat sic unica virtus,

720 Unus ut is reliquos vincit utraque viros.

Praeceptis alii populos, multaue fatigant

Lege; sed exemplo nos rapit ille suo.

Cuique frui tota fas est uxore marito,

Et sua fas simili pignora nosse patri.

725 Ecce ubi pignoribus circumstipata coruscis

It comes, et tanto vix minor ANNA viro.

Haud metus est, regem posthac ne proximus heres,

Neu successorem non amet ille suum.

730 This and the whole frame was covered with a curtain of silk painted like a thick cloud, and at the approach of the King was instantly to be drawn. The allegory being that those clouds were gathered upon the face of the city through their long want of his most wished sight but now, as at the rising of the sun, all mists were dispersed and fled. When suddenly upon silence made to the musics, a voice was heard to utter this verse Totus adest oculis, aderat qui mentibus olim^a signifying that he now was really objected to their eyes, who before had been only, but still, present in their minds.

735

740

Thus far the complimentary part of the first, wherein was not only laboured the expression of state and magnificence, as proper to a triumphal arch, but the very site, fabric, strength, policy, dignity and affections of the city were all laid down to life: the nature and property of these devices being to present always some one entire body or figure consisting of distinct members, and each of those expressing itself in their own active sphere, yet all with that general harmony so connected and disposed as no one little part can be missing to the illustration of the whole; where also is to be noted that the symbols used are

750

715 aback square tablet or compartment
717-28 Maximus... suum This King is the greatest, and more serene than the sun itself which beholds him as such a leader in the city. And as unique virtue can overcome Fortune, just so this man by himself overcomes all the rest of mankind. Other rulers weary their people with commands and many laws, but he carries us along by his own example. It is right for the husband to enjoy his wife; and it is right for the same father to recognize his offspring. Behold his consort comes, surrounded by a brilliant retinue, Queen Anne, scarcely less magnificent than her great husband. There is no fear that the next heir does not love the King, nor that the King does not love the successor.

737 Totus... olim Full before thine eye is he who was long before thy mind (De Consulata Stilichonis 3.(24).5).

738 objected presented

749 illustration meaning

751 hieroglyphics symbols having a hidden meaning emblems images expressing moral meanings

- a As being the first, free and natural government of this island, after it came to civility.
- b In respect they were all conquests and the obedience of the subject more enforced.
- c Rather than the city should want a founder, we choose to follow the received story of Brute, whether fabulous or true, and not altogether unwarranted in poetry, since it is a favour of antiquity to few cities to let them know their first authors. Besides, a learned poet of our time, in a most elegant work of his, Coniugium Tamesis et Isis, celebrating London, hath this verse of her: Aemula maternae tollens sua lumina Troia. Here is also an ancient rite alluded to in the building of cities, which was to give them their bounds with a plough, according to Virgil Aeneid liber 10. Interea Aeneas urbem designat Aratro. And Isidore liber 15, caput 2 Urbs vocata ab orbe, quod antiquae civitates in orbem fiebant; vel ab urbo parte aratri, quo muri designabantur, unde est illud. Optavitque locum regno et concludere sulco.
- d Primigenius sulcus dicitur, qui in condenda nova urbe, tauro et vacca designationis causa imprimitur; Hitherto respects that of Camden Britannia, p. 368, speaking of this city, quicumque autem condiderit, vitali genio, constructam fuisse ipsius fortuna docuit.
- e For so all happy days were. Pliny caput 40 liber 7 Naturalis Historia, to which Horace alludes, liber 1, ode 36. Cressa ne careat pulchra dies nota. And the other Pliny Epistola: 2, liber 6, O diem laetum, notandumque mihi candidissimo calculo. With many other in many places. Martial liber 8 epigramma 45; liber 9, epigramma 53; liber 10, epigramma 38; liber 11, epigramma 37. Statius, liber 4, Silvae, 6. Persius, Satura 2. Catullus, epigramma 69, etc.
- f The Parcae or Fates, Martianus calls them scribas ac libarias superum whereof Clotho is said to be the eldest, signifying in Latin Evocatio.
- or impresa, but a mixed character, partaking somewhat of all and peculiarly apted to these more magnificent inventions, wherein the garments and ensigns deliver the nature of the person, and the word the present office. 755
Neither was it becoming, or could it stand with the dignity of these shows, after the most miserable and desperate shift of the puppets, to require a truchman or (with the ignorant painter) one to write, 'This is a dog' or 'This is a hare', but so to be presented as upon the view they might without cloud or obscurity declare themselves to the sharp and learned. And for the multitude, no doubt but their grounded judgements gazed, said it was fine and were satisfied. 760
- The speeches of gratulation* 765
- GENIUS
- Time, Fate and Fortune have at length conspired
To give our age the day so much desired.
What all the minutes, hours, weeks, months and years
That hang in file upon these silver hairs
Could not produce beneath the Briton^a stroke,
The Roman, Saxon, Dane, and Norman^b yoke,
This point of time hath done. Now London rear
Thy forehead high and on it strive to wear
Thy choicest gems. Teach thy steep towers to rise Higher with people. Set with sparkling eyes
Thy spacious windows, and in every street
Let thronging joy, love and amazement meet.
Cleave all the air with shouts, and let the cry Strike through as long and universally
As thunder, for thou now art blissted to see That sight for which thou didst begin to be.
When Brutus^c plough first gave thee infant bounds,
And I, thy GENIUS, walked auspicious rounds
In every furrow,^d then did I forlook
And saw this day marked white^e in Clotho's^f book.* 770
775
780
785

752 impresa images, usually accompanied by an appropriate motto

753-4 inventions devices

754 ensigns badges, standards

755 office function

758 shift expedient

truchman interpreter

759 ignorant painter Jonson alludes to a proverbial story of a painter so clumsy that in his picture a dog could not be distinguished from a hare. He therefore placed a label under each figure.

763 grounded low, base: perhaps alluding to the groundlings who stood in the open pit of a popular theatre.

765 gratulation congratulation, welcome

770 Briton...stroke violent rule of the ancient Britons

772 This point of time hath That which this time has

782.n Coniugium Tamesis et Isis 'The Marriage of the Thames and Isis' Aemula...Troia lifting up her eyes, which are jealous of the Trojan motherland Interea Meanwhile Aeneas had marked out the bounds of the city with a plough (Aeneid 5.725). Jonson incorrectly cited Aeneid 10.

Urbs...sulco 'City [urbs] is so-called from orb (orbe), because ancient civic foundations were circular; or from the beam [urbs] of the plough, by which walls were described, from whence comes this: And he chose a site and enclosed it by a furrow.' The phrase after the colon is from Aeneid 3.109.

784.n Primigenius...imprimitur the furrow is said to be primigenius [of the origins] which is impressed upon the ground by a bull and a heifer to describe the outline of a new city quicumque...docuit whosoever it was who founded the city, her very fortune has taught us that she was built under the auspices of a life-giving spirit [vitali genio—an allusion to the Genius in the pageant]

785.n Cressa...nota Let this fair day not lack a mark of white (Horace, 1.36)

O diem...calculo It was a day of exquisite happiness, which I shall ever distinguish with the whitest mark (Pliny, Epistola 2.11).

scribas...superum the scibes and copyists of the gods.

The several circles^a both of change and sway
 Within this isle, there also figured lay,
 Of which the greatest, perfectest and last
 Was this, whose present happiness we taste.
 790 Why keep you silence, daughters? What dull peace
 Is this inhabits you? Shall office cease Upon th'aspect of him, to whom you owe
 More than you are or can be? Shall Time know That article wherein your flame stood still,
 795 And not aspired? Now heaven avert an ill
 Of that black look. Ere pause possess your breasts
 I wish you more of plagues: 'Zeal when it rests Leaves to be Zeal.' Up thou tame river, wake,
 And from thy liquid limbs this slumber shake.
 800 Thou drown'st thyself in inofficious sleep
 And these thy sluggish waters seem to creep,
 Rather than flow. Up, rise and swell with pride Above thy banks. 'Now is not every tide.'

TAMESIS

To what vain end should I contend to show
 805 My weaker powers, when seas of pomp oe'rflow
 The city's face and cover all the shore
 With sands more rich than Tagus'^b wealthy ore?
 When in the flood of joy that comes with him
 He drowns the world, yet makes it live and swim 810 And spring with gladness. Not my fishes here, Though they be dumb, but do express the cheer
 Of these bright streams. No less may these^c and I Boast our delights, albe't we silent lie.

GENIUS

Indeed, true gladness doth not always speak:
 815 'Joy bred and born but in the tongue is weak.'
 Yet lest the fervour of so pure a flame
 As this my city bears might lose the name,
 Without the apt eventing of her heat,
 820 Know greatest James (and no less good than great)
 In the behalf of all my virtuous sons
 Whereof my eldest^d there thy pomp foreruns,
 (A man without my flatt'ring, or his pride,
 As worthy as he's blest^e to be thy guide)
 825 In his grave name, and all his brethren's right,
 Who thirst to drink the nectar of thy sight,
 The council, commoners and multitude—
 Glad that this day so long denied is viewed—
 I tender thee the heartiest welcome yet,
 That ever king had to his empire's seat.^f
 830 Never came man more longed for, more desired,
 And being come, more reverenced, loved, admired.

- a Those before mentioned of the Briton, Roman, Saxon, etc. and to this register of the Fates allude those verses of Ovid Metamorphoses 15: Cornes illic molimine vasto. Ex are, et solido rerum tabularia ferro: Qua neque concussum coeli, neque fulminis iram, Nec metuunt ulla tuta atque; aeterna ruinas. Invenies illic incisa adamante perenni Fata etc.
- b A river dividing Spain and Portugal and by the consent of poets styled aurifer.
- c Understanding Euphrosyne, Sebasis, Prothymia, etc.
- d The Lord Mayor who for his year hath senior place of the rest, and for the day was chief serjeant to the King.
- e Above the blessing of his present office, the word had some particular allusion to his name, which is Benet and hath, no doubt, in time been the contraction of Benedict.
- f The city, which title is touched before.

786.n Cornes...Fata Thou shalt there behold the records of all that happens on tablets of brass and solid iron, a massive structure, tablets which fear neither the crashings of the sky, nor the lightnings' fearful power, nor any destructive shocks which may befall, being eternal and secure. There shalt thou find engraved on everlasting adamant thy descendants' fates (Metamorphoses 15.809-13)

787 figured represented

789 taste experience

791 office duty

792 th'aspect (seeing) the face

794 flame spirit

804 vain worthless

818 eventing venting

821 foreruns foretells

826 council, commoners and multitude

The Common Council of London, the Common Hall of London (consisting of all guild members, enjoying the freedom of the city) and the unprivileged.

827 so long denied because of plague

828 tender offer

a	To the Prince.	Hear and record it: 'In a prince it is No little virtue to know who are his.'
b	An attribute given to great persons, fitly above other humanity, and in frequent use with all the Greek poets, especially Homer. Iliad α—διος Ἀχιλλεύς. And in the same book—καὶ ἀντίθειον Πολουφῆμον.	With like devotions ^a do I stoop t' embrace This springing glory of thy Godlike ^b race; His country's wonder, hope, love, joy and pride. How well doth he become the royal side Of this erected and broad-spreading tree, Under whose shade may Britain ever be. And from this branch may thousand branches more Shoot o'er the main and knit with every shore In bonds of marriage, kindred and increase, And style this land the navel ^c of their peace. This is your servant's wish, your city's vow, Which still shall propagate itself with you, And free from spurs of hope that slow minds move: He seeks no hire that owes his life to love. And here she ^d comes that is no less a part In this day's greatness than in my glad heart. Glory of queens and glory of your name, ^e Whose graces do as far outspoke your fame As fame doth silence when her trumpet rings, You daughter, sister, wife ^f of several kings; Besides alliance and the style of mother, In which one title you drown all your other. Instance be that fair shoot, ^g is gone before, Your eldest joy and top of all your store, With those ^h whose sight to us is yet denied But not our zeal to them, or aught beside This city can to you. For whose estate She hopes you will be still good advocate To her best lord. So, whilst you mortal are, No taste of sour mortality once dare Approach your house; nor Fortune greet your Grace But coming on, and with a forward face.	835 840 845 850 855 860 865
c	As Lactantiatius calls Parnassus, Umbilicum terrae .
d	To the Queen.
e	An emphatical speech and well reinforcing her great- ness, being by this match more than either her brother, father etc.
f	Daughter to Frederick II King of Denmark and Norway; sister to Christian IV now there reigning; and wife to James our sovereign.
g	The Prince Henry Frederick.
h	Charles Duke of Rothberg and the Lady Elizabeth.

Pag. 3 Too short a time (in their opinions that were glued there together so many hours to behold him) did his Majesty dwell upon this first place. Yet too long it seemed to other happy spirits that higher up in these Elysian fields 870 awaited for his presence. He sets on therefore, like the sun in his zodiac, bountifully dispersing his beams amongst particular nations, the brightness and warmth of which was now spent first upon the Italians and next upon the Belgians: the space of ground, on which their magnificent 875 arches were builded, being not unworthy to bear the name of the great hall to this our court royal, wherein was to be heard and seen the sundry languages and habits of strangers, which under princes' roofs render excellent harmony.

In a pair of scales do I weigh these two nations 880 and find them neither in hearty love to his Majesty, in advancement of the city's honour, nor in forwardness to glorify these triumphs, to differ one grain.

To dispute which have done best were to doubt that 885 one had done well. Call their inventions therefore twins, or if they themselves do not like that name (for happily

832 In a prince Martial, Epigrams, 8.15.8:

Principus est virtus maxima nosse suos

838 erected elevated, upright

843.n Umbilicum terrae navel of the world

847 He seeks Claudian, Panegyricus de vi

Consulatus Honorii l. 610: Non quaerit praetium vitam qui debet amori.

848 is which is

858 whose...denied Princess Elizabeth and

Prince Charles were not present

860 can can give estate state or condition

862 her best lord James

865 coming...face i.e. may Fortune never turn her back on you

869 Elysian fields in classical mythology, the dwelling place of the blessed after death

873-4 Italians...Belgians communities of foreign merchants that erected the arches. Belgians here means Dutch.

876 great hall Traditionally the largest and most public room in a palace, under the Lord Steward's jurisdiction; thus an appropriate place for strangers to pay homage to the king.

they are emulous of one glory) yet thus may we speak of them.

Ovid *Facies non omnibus una,
Nec diversa tamen, qualem decet esse sororum.*
Because whosoever (fixis oculis) beholds their proportions,

Virgil Expleri mentem nequit, ardesitque tuendo.
Gracious Street The street upon whose breast this Italian jewel was worn was never worthy of that name which it carries till this hour, for here did the King's eye meet a second object that enticed him by tarrying to give honour to the place. And thus did the quaintness of the engine seem to discover itself before him.

The Italians' Pageant

900 The building took up the whole breadth of the street, of which the lower part was a square, garnished with four great columns, in the midst of which square was cut out a fair and spacious high gate, arched, being twenty-seven foot in the perpendicular line, and eighteen at the ground line. Over the gate in golden characters these verses (in a long square) were inscribed:

905 *Tu Regere Imperio populos Iacobe memento, Hae tibi erunt artes, pacique imponere morem,
Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos.*
910 And directly above this was advanced the arms of the Kingdom, the supporters fairly cut out to the life; over the lion, some pretty distance from it, was written,
IACOBO REGI MAGN.

915 And above the head of the unicorn, at the like distance, this:

HENRICI VII ABNEP

In a large square erected above all these, King Henry the seventh was royally seated in his imperial robes, to whom King James (mounted on horseback) approaches and receives a sceptre; over both their heads these words being written,

920 HIC VIR, HIC EST.

925 Between two of the columns on the right hand was fixed up a square table, wherein in lively and excellent colours was limned a woman, figuring Peace; her head securely leaning on her left hand, her body modestly bestowed (to the length) upon the earth. In her other hand was held an olive branch, the ensign of peace; her word was out of Virgil, being thus,

Deus nobis haec otia fecit. 930

Beneath that piece was another square table, reaching almost to the bases of the two columns, in which two seeming sea personages were drawn to the life, both of them lying, or rather leaning, on the bosom of the earth, naked; the one a woman, her back only seen; the other a man, his hand stretching and fast'ning itself upon her shoulder. The word that this dead body spake was this

I Decus I Nostrum.

940 Upon the left-hand side of the gate, between the other two columns, were also two square tables, in the one of which were two persons portrayed to the life, naked and wild in looks; the word,

Expectate solo Trinobanti.

945 And over that in another square, carrying the same proportion, stood a woman upright, holding in her hand a shield, beneath whom was inscribed in golden characters,

Spes o fidissima rerum.

950 And this was the shape and front of the first great square, whose top being flat was garnished with pilasters, and upon the roof was erected a great pedestal, on which stood a person carved out to the life, a woman, her left hand leaning on a sword with the point downward and her right hand reaching forth a diadem, which she seemed, by bowing of her knee and head, to bestow upon his Majesty.

955 On the four corners of this upper part stood four naked portraitures in great, with artificial trumpets in their hands.

960 In the arch of the gate was drawn, at one side, a company of palm trees, young and as it were but newly springing, over whose branches two naked winged angels, flying, held forth a scroll which seemed to speak thus,

Spes altera.

965 On the contrary side was a vine, spreading itself into many branches and winding about olive and palm trees; two naked winged angels hanging likewise in the air over

889-90 Facies...sororum They have not all the same appearance, and yet not altogether different; as it should be with sisters (Ovid, Metamorphoses 2.13-14)

891 fixis oculis with fixed eyes

892 Expleri...tuendo 'cannot satiate her soul, but takes fire as she gazes...' (Virgil's description of Dido falling in love, Aeneid 1.713)

893.n Gracious Street ran from Cornhill south toward London Bridge

897 quaintness cleverness, ingenuity engine arch

907-9 Tu...superbos Paraphrasing Aeneid 6.851: 'O James, to rule the nations with thy sway—these be thine arts—to crown Peace with Law, to spare the humbled, and to tame in war the proud!' James had quoted the original Virgilian lines at the very end of Basilikon Doron as a summation of the 'craft' of kingship.

913 IACOBO REGI MAGN. Of Great James's Reign

916 HENRICI VII ABNEP Great-grandson of Henry VII (from whom James derived his claim to the English throne)

922 HIC...EST This is the man, this is he

925 limned painted

930 Deus...fecit It is a god who wrought for us this peace (Eclogues 1.6). Like Jonson in the Fenchurch pageant, Dekker here uses a Latin tag to evoke an image of royal authority as both sacred and peace-giving.

938 I Decus I Nostrum glory of our age... (paraphrasing Ovid, Ex ponto 2.8.25:

parce, precor, saeculi decus indelible nostri)

943 Expectate solo Trinobanti Sole expectation of the Trinobanti—a term for the citizens of London, probably based on a marginal note in Stow's Survey of London, 1.2.

947 Spes o fidissima rerum surest hope of the state

963 Spes altera Virgil, Aeneid 12.168: magnae spes altera Romae ('second hope of great Rome'). In Virgil the phrase is dynastically applied to Ascanius, the son and heir of Aeneas; in Renaissance emblem books it is often applied more generally to life springing from death (stalks of wheat shedding grains upon ground littered with bones, etc.)

The arch for the Italians' Pageant (pageant 3) in Gracechurch Street.

them, and holding a scroll between them filled with this inscription,

Uxor tua, sicut vitis abundans,

970 Et filii tui, sicut palmites olivarum.

If your imaginations, after the beholding of these objects, will suppose that his Majesty is now gone to the other side of this Italian trophy, do but cast your eyes back, and there you shall find just the same proportions which the forepart or breast of our arch carrieth, with equal number of columns, pedestals, pilasters, limned pieces and carved statues. Over the gate, this distichon presents itself.

Nonne tuo imperio satis est Iacobe potiri?

980 Imperium in Musas, aemule quaeris? Habes.

Under which verses a wreath of laurel seemed to be ready to be let fall on his Majesty's head as he went under it, being held between two naked antique women, their bodies stretching at the full length to compass over the arch of the gate. And above those verses, in a fair azure table, this inscription was advanced in golden capitals:

985 EXPECTATIONI ORBIS TERRARVM

REGIB. GENITO NVMEROSISS

REGVM GENITORI FAELICISS

REGI MARTIGENARVM AVGVSTISS

990 REGI MVSARVM GLORIOSISS

Itali statuerunt laetitiae et cultus Signum

On the right hand of this back part, between two of the columns, was a square table in which was drawn a Woman, crowned with beautiful and fresh flowers, a caduceus in her hand, all the notes of a plenteous and lively Spring being carried about her. The soul that gave life to this speaking picture was,

995

Omnis feret omnia Tellus.

Above this piece in another square was portrayed a triton, his trumpet at his mouth, seeming to utter thus much:

1000

Dum caelum stellis.

Upon the left hand of this back part in most excellent colours, antiquely attired, stood the four kingdoms—England, Scotland, France and Ireland—holding hands together, this being the language of them all:

1005

Concordes stabili Fatorum numine.

969–70 Uxor...olivarum Psalm 128:3:

'Your wife shall be as a fruitful vine | And thy children will be like olive shoots.' (Dekker, who was probably quoting from memory, substituted palmites for nobellae, with little effect on the meaning.)

973 trophy Arch

977 distichon couplet

978–9 Nonne...Habes Do you not see it is enough that James acquires your power? Do you seek jealousy for a ruler of the Muses? You have him!

986–90 EXPECTATIONI...GLORIOSISS To the expectation of the world, To him who is by many kings engendered, To the most happy father of kings, To the most august of warrior kings, To the most glorious King of the Muses

991 Itali...Signum Italians erect a sign of their joy and devotion

995 caduceus wand, carried by an ancient herald and by Mercury

998 Omnis...Tellus Every land shall bear all fruits (Virgil, Ecloques 4.39)

1000 triton sea deity, son of Poseidon and Amphirrite

1002 Dum caelum stellis 'While the sky breeds its stars.' From Tibullus, 1.4.66: 'Supported by the Muses a man shall live as long as earth breeds oaks, the sky its stars and rivers water.'

1007 Concordes...numine Voicing in

The middle great square that was advanced over the frieze of the gate held Apollo with all his ensigns and properties belonging unto him, as a sphere, books, a caduceus, an octahedron, with other geometrical bodies, and a harp in his left hand; his right hand with a golden wand in it, pointing to the battle of Lepanto fought by the Turks, of which his Majesty hath written a poem; and to do him honour Apollo himself doth here seem to take upon him to describe. His word,

1010

Fortunate Puer.

These were the mutes and properties that helped to furnish out this great Italian theatre, upon whose stage the sound of no voice was appointed to be heard but of one, and that in the presence of the Italians themselves, who in two little opposite galleries under and within the arch of the gate, very richly and neatly hung, delivered thus much Latin to his Majesty:

1015

The Italians' Speech in Latin

1025

Salve, rex magne, salve. Salutem Maiestati tuae Itali, faelicissimum adventum laeti, faelices sub te futuri, precamur. Ecce hic omnes, exigui munere, pauculi numero: sed magni erga maiestatem tuam animi, multi obsequii. At nec Atlas, qui coelum sustinet, nec ipsa coeli convexa, altitudinem attingant meritorum regis optimi. Hoc est eius quem de teipso expressisti doctissimo (Deus!) et admirabili penicillo: Beatissimos populos, ubi et philosophus regnat et rex philosophatur. Salve, rex nobilissime, salve, vive, rex potentissime, faeliciter. Regna, rex sapientissime, faeliciter, Itali optamus omnes, Itali clamamus omnes, omnes, omnes.

1030

The Italians' Speech in English

All hail mighty monarch! We the Italians, full of joy to behold your most happy presence, and full of hopes to enjoy a felicity under your royal wing, do wish and pray for the health of your Majesty. Behold here we are all: mean in merit, few in number, but towards your sovereign self in our loves great, in our duties more. For neither Atlas, who bears up heaven, no nor the arched roof itself of heaven, can by many, many degrees reach to the top and glorious height of a good and virtuous king's deservings. And such a one is he whom (good God!) most lively, most wisely and in wonderful colours, you did then pencil down in your own person, when you said that those

1035

1040

1045

unison the fixed will of Destiny (Virgil, Ecloques, 4.47)

1013 Lepanto great naval victory of a combined Christian fleet over the Ottoman navy in the Mediterranean 1571

1014 poem Published as 'The Lepanto of James VI, King of Scotland' in His Majesties Poetical Exercises at Vacant Hours (Edinburgh, 1591).

1017 Fortunate Puer Happy lad (Virgil, Ecloques 5.49)

1038 All hail The translation appeared in the second edition of Magnificent Entertainment; it is not clear who was responsible for it.

1050 people were blessed where a philosopher rules and where the ruler plays the philosopher. All hail, thou royalest of kings. Live, thou mightiest of princes, in all happiness.
Reign, thou wisest of monarchs, in all prosperity. These are the wishes of us Italians, the hearty wishes of us all; 1055 thus we cry, all, all, even all.

Pag. 4 Having hoisted up our sails and taken leave of this Italian shore, let our next place of casting anchor be upon the land of the seventeen provinces, where the Belgians, attired in the costly habits of their own native country, 1060 without the fantastic mixtures of other nations, but more richly furnished with love, stand ready to receive his Majesty; who, according to their expectation, does most graciously make himself and his royal train their princely guests. The house which these strangers have builded to 1065 entertain him in is thus contrived.

The Pageant of the Dutchmen, by the Royal Exchange.

The foundation of this was, as it were by fate, laid near unto a royal place, for it was a royal and magnificent labour. It was bounded in with the houses on both 1070 sides the street, so proudly (as all the rest also did) did this extend her body in breadth. The passage of state was a gate, large, ascending eighteen foot high, aptly proportioned to the other limbs and twelve foot wide, arched; two lesser posterns were, for common feet, cut 1075 out and opened on the sides of the other.

Within a small frieze, (and kissing the very forehead of the gate) the aedifice spake thus:

Unicus a Fato surgo non degener haeres.

1080 Whilst lifting up your eye to an upper larger frieze, you may there be enriched with these golden Capitals:

IACOBO, ANGL. SCOT. FRANC. HIBERN.
REGI OPT. PRINC. MAX. BELGAE ded.

1055 even all. Dugdale describes a further incident that occurred during this pageant: see Additional Passage C.

1058 seventeen provinces Of the Netherlands, north and south

1066 The Pageant of the Dutchmen Dugdale continues: 'Along Cornhill they [the royal procession] trooped with great majesty, but his Highness being right over the Exchange smiled looking toward it, belike remembering his last being there, the grace of the merchants and the rudeness of the multitude, and casting his eye up to the third trophy or pageant, admired it greatly. It was so goodly top and top many storeys, and so high as it seemed to fall forward.
On the top you might behold the sea dolphins as dropping from the clouds on the earth, or looking to behold the King; pictures of great art, cost and glory, as a double ship that being two was so cunningly made as it seemed but one, which figured Scotland and England in one, with the arms of both in one scutcheon, sailing on two seas at once. Here was a speech of wonder delivered too: but the glory of this show was in my eye as a dream, pleasing to the affection, gorgeous and full of joy, and so full of show and variety that when I held down my head as wearied with looking so high, methought it was a grief to me to awaken so soon.'

Royal Exchange Main commercial market of London, in Cornhill.

1068 royal place the Exchange

1069 bounded in with the houses i.e. the arch took up the full street, abutting the houses on either side

1071 passage of state ceremonial passage, through which James would pass

1074 common feet the passage of ordinary pedestrians

1078 Unicus...haeres I rise by Fate your ownly heir, but one not unworthy

1081-2 IACOBO...ded. To James, the Great and Best King of England, Scotland,

But bestowing your sight upon a large azure table, lined quite through with characters of gold, likewise you may for your pains receive this inscription:

ORBIS RESTITVTOR. PACIS FVND. RELIG.

PROVVG. D. IAC. P. F. REGI. P. P.

D. ANNAE REGIAE CONIVG. SOR. FIL.

NEPTI. ET D. HENRI CO. I.FIL. PRINC.

IVVENT.

IN PVBL. VRBIS ET ORBIS LAETITIA,

SECVLIQVE FAELICITAT. XVII. BELGIAE

PROV. MERCATORES BENIGNE REGIA HAC

IN VRBE EXCEPTI, ET

S.M. VESTRAE OB ANTIQ. SOCIALE FOEDVS,

ET D. ELIZ. BENEFICENT. DEVOTI.

FAVSTA OMNIA ET FOELICIA AD IMPERII

AETERNITAT. PRECANTVR.

Above which (being the heart of the trophy) was a spacious square room left open, silk curtains drawn before it, which upon the approach of his Majesty being put by, seventeen young damsels, all of them sumptuously adorned after their country fashion, sat as it were in so many chairs of state, and figuring in their persons the seventeen provinces of Belgia, of which every one carried 1100 in a scutcheon (excellently pencilled) the arms and coat of one.

Above the upper edge of this large square room and over the first battlement, in another front advanced for the purpose, a square table was fastened upright, in which was drawn the lively picture of the King in his imperial robes, a crown on his head, the sword and sceptre in his hands. Upon his left side stood a woman, her face fixed upon his, a burning heart in her right hand, her left hanging by, a heron standing close unto her. Upon his 1110 other side stood upright, with her countenance directed likewise upon him, another woman, winged, and in a

France and Ireland, the Belgians give 1086-98 ORBIS RESTITVTOR...

PRECANTVR Restorer of the world,
founder of peace, champion of religion, Prince James Defender of the Faith; to the King, Father of the Country; To Lady Anne, wife, sister and granddaughter of kings and to Lord Henry, Prince, glory of the city and the world, who brought happiness to the age, we merchants of the Seventeen Provinces, who have been kindly received into this royal city, are devoted to your majesty, thanks to an ancient treaty of alliance and the benevolence of Lady Elizabeth. Dedicated as we are we pray that everything will be glorious and prosperous for the everlasting duration of your kingdom.

1099 trophy arch

1104 chairs of state throne-like chairs under canopies

1106 scutcheon heraldic shield
pencilled coloured, painted

The arch for the Dutch pageant (pageant 4), by the Royal Exchange.

frieze beneath them, which took up the full length of this square, this inscription set out itself in golden words:

Utroque Satellite Tutus.

Suffer your eyes to be wearied no longer with gazing up so high at those sunbeams, but turn them aside to look below through the little posterns whose state swelled quickly up to a greatness, by reason of two columns that supported them on either side. In a table over the right-hand portal was in perfect colours drawn a serpent pursued by a lion; between them, adders and snakes chasing one another, the lion scornfully casting his head back to behold the violence of a black storm that heaven poured down to overtake them. The sound that came from all this was thus:

Sequitur gravis ira feroces.

The opposite body to this (on the other side and directly over the other portal, whose pomp did in like manner lean upon and uphold itself by two main columns) was a square piece, in which were to be seen sheep browsing, lambs nibbling, birds flying in the air, with other arguments of a serene and untroubled season, whose happiness was proclaimed in this manner:

Venit alma cicuribus aura.

Directly above this, in a square table, were portrayed two kings, reverently and antequely attired, who seemed to walk upon these golden lines:

Nascitur in nostro Regum par nobili Rege

Alter Iesiades, alter Amoniades.

From whom lead but your eye in a straight line to the other side, over the contrary postern, and there in a second upper picture you may meet with two other kings, not fully so antique but as rich in their ornaments; both of them, out of golden letters, composing these words:

Lucius ante alios, Edwardus, et inde IACOBUS

Sextus, et hic sanxit, sextus et ille fidem.

And these were the nerves by which this great triumphal body was knit together, in the inferior parts of it. Upon the shoulders whereof, which were garnished with rows of pilasters that supported lions rampant, bearing up banners, there stood another lesser square, the head of which wore a coronet of pilasters also; and above them, upon a pedestal, curiously closed in between the tails of two dolphins, was advanced a woman, holding in one hand a golden warder and pointing with the forefinger of the other hand up to heaven. She figured Divine Providence, for so at her feet was written

Provida Mens Coeli.

Somewhat beneath which was to be seen an imperial crown, two sceptres being fastened crosswise unto it, and delivering this speech

Sceptra hac concredidit uni.

At the elbows of this upper square stood, upon the four corners of a great pedestal, four pyramids, hollow and so neatly contrived that in the night time, for anger that the sun would no longer look upon these earthly beauties, they gave light to themselves and the whole place about them; the windows from whence these artificial beams were thrown being cut out in such a fashion that (as Ovid, describing the palace of the sun, says)

Clara micante auro, flammisque; imitante pyropo.

So did they shine afar off like crysolites, and sparkled like carbuncles. Between those two pyramids that were lifted up on the right hand stood Fortitude, her pillar resting itself upon this golden line:

Perfero curarum pondus, discrimina temno.

Between the two pyramids on the other side, Justice challenged her place, being known both by her habit and by her voice that spake thus:

Auspice me dextra solium regale perennat.

We have held his Majesty too long from ent'ring this third gate of his Court Royal. It is now high time that those eyes, which on the other side ache with rolling up and down for his gladsome presence, should enjoy that happiness. Behold, he is in an instance passed through; the objects that there offer themselves before him being these.

1120 Utroque...Tutus due to both followers secure

1132 Sequitur...feroces strong rage pursues the fierce

1140 Venit...aura A favourable breeze comes to the meek

1144-5 Nascitur...Amoniades 'There is born in our time one equal to the noble King of Kings, another son of Jesse, another son of Amon.' Jesse was the biblical father of David; Amon a North African god, sometimes equated with Jupiter. Iesiades can also mean 'descendant of Jesse' and, in association with the title King of Kings, strongly suggests the Messiah. This couplet is probably meant to be interpreted in conjunction with its counterpart on the opposite side of the arch (ll. 1151-2) to represent the roles played by various kings—including the Messiah

Himself—in the origins of Christianity, its establishment in ancient Britain and subsequent purification during the Scottish and English Reformations.

1151-2 Lucius...fidem 'Lucius before all and then Edward and James, both the former and the latter the Sixth of that name; each preserved the faith inviolable.' In legend, Lucius was the first Christian King of Great Britain in about AD 180; Edward VI (r. 1547-1552) presided over the institution of a fully Protestant Church in England; James was the first Protestant King of Scotland, where he ruled as James VI

1164 Provida...Coeli Foreseeing mind of heaven

1165-6 imperial crown A crown closed at the top, unlike the open crowns of medieval kings. Its use here implies the creation of a new British Empire from the old kingdoms of England and Scotland. Imperial crowns had been used in English royal iconography, however, since at least the fifteenth century, as a symbol of the Crown's independence from any foreign secular jurisdiction.

1168 Sceptra...uni either 'this crown causes both sceptres to give allegiance to one man' or, more probably, 'this man causes both sceptres to give allegiance to one crown'.

1177 Clara...pyropo Bright with glittering gold and bronze that show like fire (Ovid, Metamorphoses 2.2)

1178 crysolites green gems, emeralds

1179 carbuncles rubies

1182 Perfero...temno I bear with patience a weight of cares, I spurn divisions.

1186 Auspice...perennat The royal throne keeps me safe, thanks to an auspicious sign.

1195 Our Belgic statue of triumph wears on her back as much riches as she carried upon her breast, being altogether as glorious in columns, standing on tiptoe, on as lofty and as proud pyramids; her walks encompassed with as strong and as neat pilasters; the colours of her garments are as bright, her adornments as many. For:

1200 In the square field, next and lowest, over one of the portals were the Dutch country people toiling at their husbandry: women carding of their hemp, the men beating it, such excellent art being expressed in their faces, their stoopings, bendings, sweatings, etc., that nothing is 1205 wanting in them but life (which no colours can give) to make them be thought more than the works of painters.

Lift up your eyes a little above them and behold their Exchange, the countenances of the merchants there being so lively that bargainers seem to come from their lips.

1210 But instead of other speech this is only to be had:

PIO INVICTO,

R. IACOBO,

QVOD FEL. EIVS AVSPICIIS VNIVERSVM
BRIT. IMPERIVM PACAT, MARE TVTVM
1215 PORTVS APERIT.

Over the other portal, in a square proportioned to the bigness of those other, men, women and children in Dutch habits are busy at other works: the men weaving, the women spinning, the children at their hand-looms, etc.
1220 Above whose heads you may with little labour walk into the mart, where as well the frau as the burger are buying and selling, the praise of whose industry (being worthy of it) stands published in gold, thus:

1225 QVOD MVTVIS COMMERCII, ET ARTIFICVM, NAVTARVMQVE SOLERTIA
CRESCAT, DESIDIA EXVLAT, MVTVAQVE
AMICITIA CONSERVETVR.

Just in the midst of these four squares and directly over the gate, in a large table whose feet are fastened to the frieze, is their fishing and shipping lively and sweetly set 1230 down; the skipper, even though he be hard tugging at his net, loudly singing this:

Quod celebre hoc emporium prudenti industria suos,

Quovis Terrarum Negotiatores emittat, exteros

1235 Humaniter admittat, foris famam, domi divitias augeat.

Let us now climb up to the upper battlements, where at the right hand Time stands; at the left (in a direct line) his daughter Truth; under her foot is written, Sincera. And under his, Durant.

1240 Sincera Durant.

1208 Exchange (of Amsterdam), a famous centre of international commerce, symbolizing Dutch prosperity and enterprise

1211-15 PIO...APERIT To the un-conquered, pious and upright King James, because under his happy auspices peace has been brought to the entire British empire, the sea has been made safe, the ports have been opened.

1218 habits costumes

1221 frau...burger housewife...townsman

1224-7 QVOD...CONSERVETVR Because by mutual commerce industry, navigation and ingenuity grow, idlen-ness is banished and mutual friendship preserved.

1233-5 Quod...augeat Let this crowded market-place with prudent industry send its merchants through the world and admit foreigners with kindness. Let it increase our fame abroad and our wealth

In the midst of these two, three other persons are ranked together: Art, Sedulity, and Labour; beneath whom, in a frieze roving along the whole breadth of that square, you may find these words in gold:

Artes Perfecit Sedulitate Labor.

1245

As on the foreside, so on this, and equal in height to that of Divine Providence, is the figure of a woman advanced, beneath whom is an imperial crown, with branches of olive fixed crosswise unto it, and gives you this word:

Sine caede et sanguine.

1250

And thus have we bestowed upon you all the dead colours of this picture, wherein notwithstanding was left so much life as can come from art. The speaking instrument was a boy attired all in white silk, a wreath of laurel about his temples. From his voice came this sound:

1255

Sermo ad Regem

Quae tot Sceptra tenes forti, Rex maxime, dextra,

Provida mens summi; numinis illa dedit.

Aspice ridentem per gaudia plebis Olympum,

Reddentem et plausus ad sua verba suos,

1260

Tantus honos paucis, primi post secula mundi

Obtigit, et paucis tantum onus incubuit,

Nam regere imperiis populum faelicibus unum,

Ardua res, magnis res tamen apta viris.

At non unanimes nutu compescere gentes,

1265

Non hominis pensum, sed labor ille Dei,

Ille ideo ingentes qui temperat orbis habenas,

Adiungit longas ad tua fraena manus.

Et menti de mente sua praelucet, et artem

Regnandi, regnum qui dedit ille, docet.

1270

Crescentes variis cumulat virtutibus annos,

Quas inter pietas, culmina summa tenet.

Hac proavos reddis patriae, qui barbara gentis

Flexere inducto numine corda ferae.

Hac animos tractas rigidos, subisique rebelles,

1275

Et leve persuades quod trahis ipse iugum,

Illi fida comes terram indignata profanam,

At nunc te tanto rege reversa Themis.

Assidet et robusta soror, ingentibus ausis

Pro populo carum tradere prompta caput.

1280

Quin et regis amor, musae et dilectus Apollo,

Regali gaudent subdere plectra manu.

Aurea et ubertas solerti nata labore,

Exhibet aggestas ruris et urbis opes.

Sunt haec dona poli, certa quae prodita fama

1285

Miratum ut veniat, sed uterque polus.

at home.

1239-40 Durant...Durant Endure | The Pure Endure.

1245 Artes...Labor Labour perfects the arts
by application

1250 Sine...sanguine Without slaughter and blood

1251 dead (because lacking the ability to speak or move). Speech gives life to art by actively communicating meaning.

1290 Venimus et Belgae, partiis gens exul ab oris
Quos fovit tenero mater Eliza sinu.
Matri sacratum, patri duplicamus amorem,
Poscimus et simili posse favore frui.
Sic diu Panthaici tibi proferat altis aevum,
Sceptra per innumeros qui tibi tradit avos.
Sic regina tui pars altera, et altera proles,
Spes populi longum det capiatque decus.

1295 Which verses utter thus much in English prose:
 Great King, those so many scepters which even fill thy right hand are all thine own only by the providence of heaven. Behold, heaven itself laughs to see how thy subjects smile and thunders out loud plaudits, to hear their aves. This honour of sovereignty, being at the beginning of the world bestowed but upon few, upon the heads of few were the cares of a crown set; for to sway only but one empire (happily) as it is a labour hard, so none can undergo the weight but such as are mighty. But (with a beck as it were) to control many nations (and those of different dispositions too) O! the arm of man can never do that, but the finger of God. God therefore, that guides the chariot of the world, holds the reigns of thy kingdom in his own hand. It is he whose beams lend a light to thine. It is he that teaches thee the art of ruling, because none but he made thee a king. And therefore, as thou grow'st in years thou waxest old in virtues, of all thy virtues Religion sitting highest. And most worthy, for by Religion the hearts of barbarous nations are made soft. By Religion Rebellion has a yoke cast about her neck and is brought to believe that those laws to which thou submittest even thy royal self are most easy. With Religion Justice keeps company, who once fled from this profane world, but hearing the name of King James she is again returned. By her side sits her sister Fortitude, whose life is ready (in heroic actions) to be lavishly spent for the safety of thy people. Besides, to make these virtues full Apollo and the Muses resign, the one his golden lyre, the other their laurel, to thy royal hands, whilst Plenty (daughter to Industry) lays the blessings both of country and city in heaps at thy feet. These are the gifts of heaven, the fame of them spreading itself so far that (to wonder at them) both the poles seem to come together. We, the Belgians, likewise come to that intent: a nation banished

1300 from our own cradles, yet nursed and brought up in the tender bosom of princely mother Eliza. The love which we once dedicated to her (as a mother) doubly do we vow it to you, our sovereign and father, entreating we may be sheltered under your wings now, as then under hers; our prayers being that he who through the loins of so many grandfathers hath brought thee to so many kingdoms, may likewise multiply thy years and lengthen them out to the age of a phoenix; and that thy Queen, who is one part of thyself, with thy progeny, who are the second hopes of thy people, may both give to and receive from thy kingdom immortal glory.

1335 Whilst the tongues of the strangers were employed in extolling the gracious aspect of the King and his princely behaviour towards them, his Majesty, by the quickness of Time and the earnestness of Expectation, whose eyes ran a thousand ways to find him, had won more ground and was gotten so far as to St Mildred's Church in the Poultry, close to the side of which a scaffold was erected, where, at the city's cost, to delight the Queen with her own country music, nine trumpets and a kettle drum did very sprightly and actively sound the Danish march, whose cunning and quick stops, by that time they had touched the last lady's ear in the train, behold, the King was advanced up so high as to Cheapside, into which place (if Love himself had entered and seen so many gallant gentlemen, so many ladies and beautiful creatures, in whose eyes glances, mixed with modest looks, seemed to dance courtly measures in their motion) he could not have chosen to have given the room any other name than the Presence Chamber.

1360 The stately entrance into which was a fair gate in height eighteen foot, in breadth twelve; the thickness of the passage under it being twenty-four. Two posterns stood wide open on the two sides, either of them being four foot wide and eight foot high. The two portals that jutted out before these posterns had their sides open four several ways and served as pedestals of rustic to support two pyramids, which stood upon four great balls and four great lions: the pedestals, balls and pyramids, devouring in their full upright height, from the ground line to the top, just sixty foot. But burying this mechanic body in silence, 1296 Great King The translation is again taken from the second edition of Dekker's tract, Whole Magnificent Entertainment.

1300 aves salutations

1329-30 banished from our own cradles (because of Spanish conquest and tyranny)

1333 entreating The Netherlands remained at war with Spain and feared desertion by its ally, England. The Protestant imagery of both speech and arch iconography—which contrasts with the more classical and religiously neutral tenor of the rest of the pageant—implicitly emphasized the ideological bonds between British and Dutch in the face of Catholic

Spain, as did allusions to the Elizabethan alliance and Spanish oppression.

1346 had won more ground Dugdale again records a speech at this point of the procession missing from all other accounts: see Additional Passage D.

1347 the Poultry street connecting Cheapside and Cornhill

1349 her own country Denmark

1354 Cheapside the main commercial street of London

1359-60 Presence Chamber room in royal palaces, adjacent to the privy chamber, containing the King's throne

1361.n Soper Lane running south from Cheapside. Dugdale comments: "There was cost both curious and comely, but the devices of that afar off I could not conjecture, but by report it was exceeding. It made no huge high show like the other, but as pompous both for glory and matter: a stage standing by, on which were enacted strange things, after which an oration delivered of great wisdom. Both the sides of this pageant were decked gallantly and furnished as all the broad street as the King passed showed like a paradise."

1367 rustic unfinished stone

1371 mechanic erected by manual labour

The arch in Soper Lane, for pageant 5.

let us now take note in what fashion it stood attired. Thus then it went apparelled.

The Device at Soper Lane end

1375 Within a large compartment mounted above the forehead of the gate, over the frieze, in capitals was inscribed this title:

NOVA FÆLIX ARABIA.

1380 Under that shape of Arabia this island being figured, which two names of 'New' and 'Happy' the country could by no merit in itself challenge to be her due, but only by means of that secret influence accompanying his Majesty wheresoever he goes and working such effects.

1385 The most worthy personage advanced in this place was Arabia Britannica, a woman attired all in white, a rich mantle of green cast about her, an imperial crown on her head, and a sceptre in one hand; a mound in the other, upon which she sadly leaned; a rich veil under the crown, shadowing her eyes, by reason that her countenance (which till his Majesty's approach could by no worldly object be drawn to look up) was pensively dejected; her ornaments were marks of chastity and youth; the crown, mound, and sceptre, badges of sovereignty.

1395 Directly under her in a cant by herself, Fame stood upright, a woman in a watchet robe, thickly set with open eyes and tongues; a pair of large golden wings at her back; a trumpet in her hand; a mantle of sundry colours traversing her body: all these ensigns displaying but the property of her swiftness and aptness to disperse rumours.

1400 In a descent beneath her, being a spacious concave room, were exalted five mounts, swelling up with different ascensions, upon which sat the five senses, drooping: viz.

- 1. Auditus, Hearing
- 2. Visus, Sight
- 3. Tactus, Feeling
- 4. Olfactus, Smelling
- 5. Gustus, Taste

1410 apparelled in robes of distinct colours proper to their natures, and holding scutcheons in their hands, upon which were drawn hieroglyphical bodies to express their qualities.

1415 Some pretty distance from them (and as it were in the midst before them) an artificial laver or fount was erected, called the Fount of Arete (Virtue), sundry pipes (like veins) branching from the body of it, the water receiving liberty but from one place, and that very slowly.

At the foot of this fount two personages, in greater shapes than the rest, lay sleeping; upon their breasts stuck their names, Detractio, Oblivio. The one holds an open cup, about whose brim a wreath of curled snakes were winding, intimating that whatsoever his lips touched was poisoned. The other held a black cup covered, in token of an envious desire to drown the worth and memory of noble persons. 1420 1425

Upon an ascent, on the right hand of these, stood the three Charities or Graces, hand in hand, attired like three sisters.

Aglaiā
Thalia
Euphrosine
}

 Figuring {
 {
 Brightness or Majesty
 Youthfulness, or flourishing
 Cheerfulness or gladness.

They were all three virgins, their countenances labouring to smother an innated sweetness and cheerfulness that apparelled their cheeks, yet hardly to be hid. Their garments were long robes of sundry colours, hanging loose; the one had a chaplet of sundry flowers on her head, clustered here and there with the fruits of the earth; the second, a garland of ears of corn; the third, a wreath of vine branches, mixed with grapes and olives. 1435

Their hair hung down over their shoulders, loose and of a bright colour, for that epithite is properly bestowed upon them by Homer in his hymn to Apollo: 1440

PULCHRICOMEÆ CHARITES

"The bright-haired Graces"

They held in their hands pencilled shields. Upon the first was drawn a rose, on the second, three dice; on the third, a branch of myrtle. 1445

Figuring {
 {
 Pleasantness Accord Flourishing

In a direct line against them stood the three hours, to whom in this place we give the names of Love, Justice, and Peace. They were attired in loose robes of light colours painted with flowers, for so Ovid apparels them:

Conveniunt pictis incinctae vestibus Horae. 1455

Wings at their feet expressing their swiftness, because they are lackeys to the Sun: Iungere equos Tytan velocibus imperat Horis (Ovid).

Each of them held two goblets: the one full of flowers, as ensign of the spring, the other full of ripened figs, the cognisance of summer. 1460

Upon the approach of his Majesty (sad and solemn music having beaten the air all the time of his absence, and now ceasing), Fame speaks.

FAMA

*Turn into ice mine eyeballs, whilst the sound
Flying through this brazen trump may back rebound* 1465

1378 NOVA FÆLIX ARABIA Happy New Arabia
 1385 Arabia Britannica British Arabia
 1386 mantle loose sleeveless cloak
 1394 cant niche
 1395 watchet light blue 1397 sundry several 1403 ascensions risings

1410 scutcheons heraldic shields
 1411 hieroglyphical emblematic
 1414 laver basin of a fountain
 1426 ascent step or rise
 1433 innated inward
 1436 chaplet wreath
 1441 epithite title
 1445 pencilled coloured, painted

1451 against opposite to 1455 Conveniunt...Horae The hours assemble, clad in dappled weeds (Ovid, Fasti 5.217)
 1457-8 Iungere...Horis Titan bade the swift hours to yoke his steeds (Ovid, Metamorphoses 2.118.)

- To stop Fame's hundred tongues, leaving them mute
As in an untouched bell or stringless lute.
For Virtue's fount, which late ran deep and clear, 1470 Dries and melts all her body to a tear.
You Graces! and you hours that each day run
On the quick errands of the golden sun,
O say! to Virtue's fount what has befall,
That thus her veins shrink up.
- CHARITES HORAE We cannot tell.
EUPHROSINE
- 1475 Behold the five-fold guard of sense, which keeps
The sacred stream, sit drooping. Near them sleep
Two horrid monsters. Fame! summon each sense,
To tell the cause of this strange accident.
- 1480 Hereupon Fame sounding her trumpet, Arabia Britannica looks cheerfully up, the senses are startled, Detraction and Oblivion throw off their iron slumber, busily bestowing all their powers to fill their cups at the fount with their old malicious intention to suck it dry; but a strange and heavenly music suddenly striking through their ears, 1485 which, causing a wildness and quick motion in their looks, drew them to light upon the glorious presence of the King;
they were suddenly thereby daunted and sunk down. The fount in the same moment of time flowing fresh and abundantly through several pipes, with milk, wine and 1490 balm, whilst a person (figuring Circumspection) that had watched day and night, to give note to the world of this blessed time which he foresaw would happen, steps forth on a mounted stage extended thirty foot in length from the main building, to deliver to his Majesty the interpretation of this dumb mystery.
1495 This presenter was a boy, one of the choristers belonging to Paul's.
His Speech
Great monarch of the West, whose glorious stem 1500 Doth now support a triple diadem,
Weighing more than that of thy grand grandsire Brute;
Thou that mayst make a king thy substitute,
And dost, besides the red rose and the white,
With the rich flower of France thy garland dight, 1505 Wearing above kings now or those of old
A double crown of laurel and of gold,
O let my voice pass through thy royal ear
And whisper thus much, that we figure here
A new Arabia, in whose spiced nest
1510 A phoenix lived and died in the sun's breast.
Her loss made Sight in tears to drown her eyes;
The ear grew deaf; Taste like a sick man lies,
Finding no relish; every other sense
Forgot his office, worth and excellence;
1515 Whereby this Fount of Virtue 'gan to freeze, Threatened to be drunk by two enemies,
- Snaky Detraction and Oblivion;
But at thy glorious presence both are gone,
Thou being that sacred phoenix that dost rise
From th'ashes of the first: beams from thine eyes 1520
So virtually shining that they bring
To England's new Arabia, a new spring.
For joy whereof, nymphs, senses, hours and fame,
Echo loud hymns to his imperial name.
- At the shutting up of this speech his Majesty (being ready 1525 to go on) did most graciously feed the eyes of beholders with his presence, till a song was spent: which to a loud and excellent music, composed of violins and an other rare artificial instrument, wherein besides sundry several sounds effused (all at one time) were also sensibly 1530 distinguished the chirpings of birds, was by two boys (choristers of Paul's) delivered in sweet and ravishing voices.
- Cantus
Troynovant is now no more a city. 1535
O great pity! Is't not pity?
And yet her towers on tiptoe stand,
Like pageants built on Fairyland,
And her marble arms,
1540 Like to magic charms,
Bind thousands fast unto her,
That for her wealth and beauty daily woo her,
Yet for all this, is't not pity?
Troynovant is now no more a city.
- 2
Troynovant is now a summer arbour, 1545
Or the nest wherein doth harbour
The eagle, of all birds that fly
The Sovereign, for his piercing eye.
If you wisely mark,
1550 'Tis besides a park
Where runs (being newly born)
With the fierce lion, the fair unicorn,
Or else it is a wedding hall
Where four great kingdoms hold a festival. 1555
- 3
Troynovant is now a bridal chamber,
Whose roof is gold, floor is of amber,
By virtue of that holy light
That burns in Hymen's hand, more bright 1560
Than the silver moon
Or the torch of noon.
Hark what the echoes say!
Britain til now ne'er kept a holiday:
For Jove dwells here: And 'tis no pity, 1565
If Troynovant be now no more a city.
- Nor let the screw of any wresting comment upon these words,

1478 accidence accident1501 Brute mythical founder of Britain1502 king ... substitute privilege of an emperor, who alone outranks a king1510 phoenix (often symbolizing Elizabeth)1521 virtually with virtue or power1530 effused spread1535 Troynovant New Troy, i.e. London (an allusion to the claim of Geoffrey of Monmouth that the British descended from a band of Trojans).

1548 eagle (symbol of kingship)1553 lion ... unicorn heraldic supporters of the royal arms1567 wresting perverting or distorting

Troynovant is now no more a city,

1570 enforce the author's invention away from his own clear, straight and harmless meaning, all the scope of this fiction stretching only to this point: that London, to do honour to this day wherein springs up all her happiness, being ravished with unutterable joys, makes no account (for the 1575 present) of her ancient title, to be called a city, because that during these triumphs she puts off her formal habit of trade and commerce, treading even thrift itself underfoot, but now becomes a reveller and a courtier. So that, albeit in the end of the first stanza 'tis said,

1580 Yet for all this, is't not pity

Troynovant is now no more a city.

by a figure called castigatio or the mender, here follows presently a reproof, wherein titles of summer arbour, the eagle's nest, a wedding hall, etc., are thrown upon her, 1585 the least of them being at this time by virtue of poetical heraldry, but especially in regard of the state that now upholds her, thought to be names of more honour than that of her own. And this short apology doth our verse make for itself, in regard that some (to whose settled 1590 judgement and authority the censure of these devices was referred) brought, though not bitterly, the life of those lines into question. But appealing with Machaetas to Philip, now these reasons have awakened him, let us follow King James, who having passed under this our 1595 third gate is by this time graciously receiving a gratulatory oration from the mouth of Sir Henry Montagu, Recorder of the city; a square low gallery, set round about with pilasters, being for that purpose erected some four foot from the ground and joined to the front of the Cross 1600 in Cheap; where likewise stood all the Aldermen, the Chamberlain, Town Clerk and Council of the city.

The Recorder's Speech

High Imperial Majesty, it is not yet a year in days since with acclamation of the people, citizens and nobles, 1605 auspiciously here at this Cross was proclaimed your true succession to the crown. If then it was joyous with hats, hands and hearts, lift up to heaven to cry 'King James!'

1592-3 Machaetas to Philip According to Plutarch, Philip of Macedon had almost fallen asleep while hearing a case in which he awarded damages against Machaetas. When Machaetas appealed Philip indignantly demanded to whom.
Machaetas replied, 'from Philip badly informed to Philip better informed'. Philip refused to rehear the case but paid the damages out of his own funds after being convinced that he had made the wrong judgement.

1596 Sir Henry Montagu grandson of the Lord Chief Justice Montagu and a member of the Middle Temple; nominated by James for the post of Recorder 25
May 1603; knighted 23 July; later Chief Justice of the King's Bench (1616), Lord High Treasurer (1620), and Lord Privy
Seal (1628).

Recorder Chief legal officer of London, responsible for representing the City to the court. 'But here his Grace might see the love of his subjects, who at that time are exceeding in the shows.
Passing by the Cross, beautifully gilded and adorned, there the Recorder and aldermen on a scaffold delivered him a gallant oration: and withal a cup of beaten gold.' (Dugdale)

1603 not yet a year (since the coronation, 25 July 1603)

1606 If then it was joyous if the proclamation was joyously received then

1606-7 hats, hands and hearts throwing of hats in the air and lifting up of hands and hearts to heaven

1607 lift lifted

1609 bridegroom to marry the realm

what is it now to see King James? Come, therefore, O worthiest of kings, as a glorious bridegroom through your royal chamber. But to come nearer, Adest quem querimus. 1610 Twenty and more are the sovereigns we have served since our conquest but, conqueror of hearts, it is you and your posterity that we have vowed to love and wish to serve whilst London is a city. In pledge whereof my Lord Mayor, the aldermen and commons of this city, wishing a golden 1615 reign unto you, present your greatness with a little cup of gold.

At the end of the oration three cups of gold were given in the name of the Lord Mayor and the whole body of the city to his Majesty, the young Prince and the Queen. 1620

All which, but above all (being gifts of greater value)
the loyal hearts of the citizens being lovingly received, his Grace was (at least it was appointed he should have been) met on his way near to the Cross by Sylvanus dressed up in green ivy, a cornett in his hand, being attended on by 1625 four other sylvans in ivy likewise, their bows and quivers hanging on their shoulders, and wind instruments in their hands.

Upon sight of his Majesty they make a stand, Sylvanus breaking forth into this abrupt passion of joy. 1630

SYLVANUS Stay, sylvans, and let the loudest voice of music proclaim it, even as high as heaven, that he is come.

Alter Apollo redit, novus en, iam regnat Apollo.

Which acclamation of his was borne up into the air and there mingled with the breath of their musical instru- 1635 ments, whose sound being vanished to nothing, thus goes our speaker on.

SYLVANUS Most happy Prince pardon me, that being mean in habit and wild in appearance (for my richest livery is but leaves, and my stateliest dwelling but in the woods) thus 1640 rudely with piping Sylvans I presume to intercept your royal passage. These are my walks: yet stand I here not to cut off your way but to give it a full and a bounteous welcome, being a messenger sent from the Lady Eirene, my mistress, to deliver an errand to the best of all these worthies, your 1645 royal self. Many kingdoms hath the Lady sought out to abide in, but from them all hath she been most churlishly

1610 Adest...querimus He is here whom we seek

1624 Sylvanus god of the woods. Dugdale continues: 'So he [James] passed on to the pageant at the Little Conduit, very artificial indeed, of no exceeding height but pretty and pleasing in the manner of an arbor, wherein were placed all manner of wood inhabitants, diverse shows of admiration, as pompions, pomegranates and all kind of fruit, which the lords highly commended, where after strange musics hath given plenty of harmony he passed towards Fleet Street through Ludgate.'

1626 sylvans forest gods

1633 Alter...Apollo Another Apollo returns, for look a new Apollo reigns

1644 Eirene Peace

The arch at the Little Conduit, for pageant 5.

banished: not that her beauty did deserve such unkindness, but that, like the eye of heaven, hers were too bright and there were no eagles breeding in those nests that could truly behold them.

At last here she arrived, Destiny subscribing to this warrant, that none but this land should be her inheritance.
In contempt of which happiness, Envy shoots his poisoned stings at her heart but his adders, being charmed, turn their dangerous heads upon his own bosom. Those that dwell far off pine away with vexing to see her prosper, because all the acquaintance which they have of her is this, that they know there is such a goodly creature as Eirene in the world, yet her face they know not; whilst all those that here sleep under the warmth of her wings adore her by the sacred and celestial name of Peace, for number being (as her blessings are) infinite.

Her daughter Euporia, well known by the name of Plenty,
is at this present with her, being indeed never from her side.
Under yonder arbour they sit, which after the daughter's name is called Hortus Euporiae, Plenty's Bower. Chaste are they both and both maidens, in memory of a Virgin to whom they were nurse children, for whose sake, because they were bound to her for their life, me have they charged to lay at your imperial feet, being your hereditary due, the tribute of their love. And with it thus to say:

That they have languished many heavy months for your presence, which to them would have been (and proud they are that it shall be so now) of the same operation and influence that the sun is to the spring, and the spring to the earth. Hearing therefore what treble preferment you have bestowed upon this day, wherein besides the beams of a glorious sun, two other clear and gracious stars shine cheerfully on these her homely buildings, into which, because no duty should be wanting, she hath given leave even to strangers to be sharers in her happiness, by suffering them to bid you likewise welcome. By me (once hers, now your vassal) she entreats, and with a knee sinking lower than the ground on which you tread do I humbly execute her pleasure, that ere you pass further you would deign to walk into yonder garden. The Hesperides live not there but the Muses, and the Muses no longer than under your protection. Thus far am I sent to conduct you thither, prostrately begging this grace (since I dare not, as being unworthy, lackey by your royal side), in that yet these my green followers and myself may be joyful forerunners of your expected approach. Away, Sylvans.

And being, in this their return, come near to the arbour, they gave a sign with a short flourish from all their cornetts that his Majesty was at hand, whose princely eye, whilst it was delighting itself with the quaint object before it, a sweet pleasure likewise courted his ear in the shape of music sent from the voices of nine boys, all of them choristers of Paul's, who in that place presenting the nine Muses, sang the ditty following to their viols and other instruments.

But, lest leaping too bluntly into the midst of our garden at first we deface the beauty of it, let us send you round about it and survey the walls, alleys and quarters of it as they lie in order.

This being the fashion of it:

The passages through it were two gates, arched and grated arbour-wise, their height being eighteen foot, their breadth twelve from the roof, and so on the sides, down to the ground; cucumbers, pompions, grapes and all other fruits growing in the land hanging artificially in clusters.
Between the two gates a pair of stairs were mounted with some twenty ascents. At the bottom of them on two pillars were fixed two satyrs carved out in wood;
the sides of both the gates, being strengthened with four great French terms standing upon pedestals, taking up in their full height twenty foot.

The upper part also carried the proportion of an arbour, being closed with their round tops, the midst whereof was exalted above the other two, Fortune standing on the top of it. The garnishments for the whole bower being apples, pears, cherries, grapes, roses, lillies, and all other both fruits and flowers, most artificially moulded to the life. The whole frame of this summer banquetting house stood, at the ground line, upon forty-four foot; the perpendicular stretching itself to forty-five. We might that day have called it the music room, by reason of the change of tunes that danced round about it; for in one place were heard a noise of cornetts, in a second a consort; the third (which sat in sight) a set of viols, to which the Muses sang.

The principal persons advanced in this bower were Eirene (Peace) and Euporia (Plenty), who sat together.

Eirene

Peace was richly attired, her upper garment of carnation hanging loose, a robe of white under it powdered with stars and girt to her; her hair of a bright colour, long and hanging at her back but interwoven with white ribbons and jewels. Her brows were encompassed with a wreath compounded of the olive, the laurel and the date tree.
In one hand she held a caduceus, or Mercury's rod, the god of eloquence; in the other ripe ears of corn gilded; on her

1668 Virgin Elizabeth I 1679 two other... stars Queen Anne and Prince Henry 1681 wanting missing
1682 suffering allowing 1687 Hesperides daughters of Hesperus who, accompanied by a watchful dragon, guard the garden of the Isles of the Blest,
in the far west

1691 lackey run in the manner of a footman or lackey
1696 cornetts trumpets
1697 quaint beautifully made 1701 ditty song
1711 pompions pumpkins
1714 ascents steps
1717 terms busts or statues like those of the god Terminus

1719 proportion part, used to stand for the whole 1733 Peace Ripa gives several formulas, none corresponding exactly to Dekker's figure. One, based on a medal of Ves-pasian, holds a caduceus in one hand and ears of corn in the other 1736 powdered sprinkled, spangled 1737 girt fastened about the waist lap sat a dove, all these being ensigns and furnitures of Peace.

Euporie

Plenty, her daughter, sat on the left hand in changeable colours, a rich mantle of gold traversing her body, her hair large and loosely spreading over her shoulders; on her head a crown of poppy and mustard seed, the antique badges of fertility and abundance; in her right hand a cornucopia, filled with flowers, fruits etc.

Chrusos

Directly under these sat Chrusos, a person figuring Gold, his dressing a tinsel robe of the colour of gold.

Argurion

And close by him Argurion, Silver, all in white tinsel, both of them crowned and both their hands supporting a globe between them, in token that they commanded over the world.

Pomona

Pomona, the goddess of garden fruits, sat at the one side of Gold and Silver, attired in green, a wreath of fruitages circling her temples, her arms naked, her hair beautiful and long.

Ceres

On the other side sat Ceres, crowned with ripened ears of wheat, in a loose straw-coloured robe.

In two large descents a little below them were placed at one end,

The nine Muses	}	Clio	} With musical instruments in their hands, to which they sung all the day.
		Enterpe
		Thalia
		Melpomene
		Terpsicore
		Erato
The seven liberal arts	}	Polymnia	} Holding shields in their hands, expressing their several offices
		Uranio
		Calliope
		At the other end
		Grammar Logic
		Rhetoric
Music
Arithmetic Geometry
Astrology

Upon the very upper edge of a fair large frieze, running quite along the full breadth of the arbor and just at their feet, were planted ranks of artificial artichokes and roses.

To describe what apparel these arts and muses wore were a hard labour and when it were done all were but idle. Few tailors know how to cut out their garments. They have no wardrobe at all; not a mercer nor merchant, though they can all write and read very excellently well, will suffer them to be great in their books. But (as in other countries, so in this of ours) they go attired in such thin clothes that the wind every minute is ready to blow through them. Happy was it for them that they took up their lodging in a summer arbour and that they had so much music to comfort them. Their joys (of which they do not every day taste) being notwithstanding now infinitely multiplied in this, that where before they might have cried out till they grew hoarse and none would hear them, now they sing:

Aderitque vocatus Apollo.

Chorus in full voices answering it thus:

Ergo alacris sylvas, et caetera rura voluptas

Panaque pastoresque tenet, Driadasque puellas,

Nec lupus insidias pecori, nec retia cervis

Ulla dolum meditantur, amat bonus otia Daphnis;

Ipsi laetitia voces ad sidera iactant

Intonsi montes: ipsae iam carmina rupes,

Ipsa sonant arbusta, Deus, Deus, ille!

Sylvanus (as you may perceive by his office before) was but sent of an errand; there was another of a higher calling, a traveller and one that had gone over much ground, appointed to speak to his Majesty: his name Vertumnus, the master gardener, and husband to Pomona. To tell you what clothes he had on his back were to do him wrong, for he had, to say truth, but one suit. Homely it was, yet meet and fit for a gardener. Instead of a hat his brows were bound about with flowers, out of whose thick heaps here and there peeped a queen apple, a cherry, or a pear. This boon-grace he made of purpose to keep his face from heat because he desired to look lovely; yet the sun found him out and by casting a continual eye at him, whilst the old man was dressing his arbour, his cheeks grew tawny, which colour, for the better grace, he himself interpreted blushing. A white head he had and sunburned hands. In the one he held a weeding hook, in the other a grafting knife, and this was the tenor of his speech: that he was bound to give thanks to heaven, in that the arbour 1746 Plenty Perhaps loosely modelled after Ripa's Abondanza, who is dressed in green adorned with gold and holds a cornucopia.

changeable showing different colours under different aspects 1754 tinsel material interwoven with gold or silver thread, so as to sparkle 1756 white silver
 1762 fruitages fruits

1765 Ceres Roman goddess of agriculture
 1805 Aderitque... Apollo Apollo will be present at thy call (Virgil, Aeneid 3.395)
 1807-13 Ergo... ille Therefore frolic glee seizes the woods and all the countryside and Pan and the shepherds, and the Dryad maids. The wolf plans no ambush for the flock and nets no snare for the stag; kindly Daphnis loves peace. The very mountains, with woods unshorn, joyously fling their voices starward; the very rocks, the very groves ring out the song. A god is he, a god (Virgil, Ecloques 5.58-64).

 1817 Vertumnus Roman god of the changing season and developing vegetation
 1824 boon-grace a shade worn on the front of a cap to protect the complexion from the sun

1835	and trees which growing in that fruitful Cynthian garden began to droop and hang down their green heads and to uncurl their crisped forelocks, as fearing and in some sort feeling the sharpness of autumnian malice, are now on the sudden by the divine influence apparelled with a fresh and more lively verdure than ever they were before.	Fair as thyself has got. CHORUS A new new sun is got.	4	1880
1840	The nine muses that could expect no better entertainment than sad banishment, having now lovely and amiable faces; arts that were threatened to be trod under foot by barbarism, now—even at sight of his Majesty, who is the Delian patron both of the muses and arts—being likewise advanced to most high preferment, whilst the very rural and sylvan troops danced for joy. The Lady, therefore, of the place, Eirene (his mistress), in name of the Praetor, Consuls and Senators of the city, who carefully prune this garden (weeding out all hurtful and idle branches that hinder the growth of the good) and who are indeed	ONE O this is he! Whose new beams make our spring, Men glad, and birds to sing Hymns of praise, joy and glee.	5	1885
1845	Ergatai Pistoï , faithful labourers in this piece of ground, she doth in all their names (and he in behalf of his lady) offer themselves, this arbour, the bowers and walks, yea her children Gold and Silver, with the loving and loyal hearts of all those the sons of peace, standing about him, to be disposed after his royal pleasure. And so wishing his happy arrival at a more glorious bower, to which he is now going, yet welcoming him to this and praying his Majesty not to forget this poor arbour of his lady, music is commanded to carry all their prayers for his happy reign, with the loud amen of all his subjects, as high as heaven.	CHORUS Sing, sing, O this is he!	6
1850		ONE That in the north First rising, shone so far Bright as the morning star At his gay coming forth.	7	1890
1855		CHORUS See, see, he now comes forth.	8
1860		ONE How soon joys vary! Had still he stayed! O then Happy both place and men, But here he list not tarry.	9	1895
	Cantus	CHORUS O grief! he list not tarry.	10
	ONE Shine, Titan, shine. Let thy sharp rays be hurled Not on this under world, For now tis none of thine	ONE No, no, his beams Must equally divide Their heat to orbs beside, Like nourishing silver streams.	11	1900
1865	These first four lines were sung by one alone, the single lines following, by a chorus in full voices.	CHORUS Joys slide away like streams.	12	1905
	CHORUS No, no, 'tis none of thine.	ONE Yet in this lies Sweet hope: how far soever He bides, no clouds can sever His glory from our eyes.	13
1870	ONE But in that sphere, Where what thine arms enfold Turns all to burnished gold, Spend thy gilt arrows there.	CHORUS Dry, dry your weeping eyes.	14	1910
1875	CHORUS Do, do, shoot only there.	ONE And make heaven ring His welcomes shouted loudly, For heaven itself looks proudly That earth has such a king.	15	1915
	ONE Earth needs thee not: Her childbed days are done And she another sun	CHORUS Earth has not such a king.

1833 Cynthian Pertaining to Cynthia, goddess of the moon and of chastity, often a symbol of Elizabeth. We have found no other references to Cynthian gardens.

1843 Delian from Delos (sacred to Apollo)
1844 preferment advancement, office
1846 Praetor Roman official

1850 Ergatai Pistoï faithful workmen (Greek)
1901 divide (between England and Scotland)

1920 His Majesty dwelt here a reasonable long time, giving both good allowance to the song and music, and liberally bestowing his eye on the workmanship of the place. From whence at the length departing, his next entrance was, as it were, into the closet or rather the privy chamber to this our court royal, through the windows of which he might behold the cathedral temple of Saint Paul, upon whose 1925 lower battlements an anthem was sung by the choristers of the church, to the music of loud instruments. Which being finished, a Latin oration was viva voce delivered to his grace by one of Master Mulcaster's scholars at the door of the free school founded by the Mercers.

Oratio habita, et ad Regem, et coram Rege prae schola Paulina.

(...)

1930 *Brevis ero, ne ingratus sim, Rex serenissime, licet et plane, et plene putem Regem tam prudentem, in tam profusa suorum laetitia, ita se hodie patientia contra taedium armavisse, ne 1935 ullius toe dii ipsum posset toedere. Aedificium hoc magno sumptu suo extractum Dominus Johannes Collettus Ecclesiae Paulinae Decanus, sub Henrico septimo, maiestatis tuae prudentissimo abavo, erudiendae pueritiae consecravit, ut huius 1940 scholae infantia tuo in Regnum Anglicanum iure coetanea existat. Tanta magnificentia conditum parique magnificentiae dotatum fidelissimae Merceroꝝ huius urbis primariae semper, hodie etiam Praetoriae societati tuendum testamento moriens commendavit. Quae societas, et demortui fundatoris spei, et nostrae educationis studio fidem suam sanctissime exolvit.
1945 Hic nos cum multis aliis erudimur, qui communi nomine totius pueritiae Anglicanae, a Domino Rege, licet sponte sua ad omnia optima satis incitato, humillime tamen contendimus, ut quemadmodum sua aetatis ratione, in omni re adultioribus 1950 prospicit, ita in summae spei Principis Henrici gratiam tenerioribus, parique cum ipso aetate pueris, in scholarum cura velit etiam consulere. Virgae enim obsequium, sceptri obedientiam et parit, et praeterea inquit preceptor meus. Quique metu didi-cit iuvenis parere puerque, grandibus imperiis officiosus erit.
1955 Habent scholae Anglicanae multa, in quibus Regiam maiestatis correctionem efflagitant, ne inde in Academiis implumes evolent unde in Rempublicam implumiores etiam e prima nuditate emittantur. Quod malum a preceptore nostro accepimus: qui annos iam quatuor supra quinquaginta publice, privatimque 1960 erudiendae pueritiae praefuit, et haec scholarum errata, cum aliquo etiam dolore suo, et passim, et sparsim deprehendit.
Nostra haec schola fundatorem Collettum hominem tam pium;
tutores Merceroꝝ homines tam fidos consequuta, quam esset foelix, si placeret, Domino etiam Regi, quod Regibus Angliae, 1965 ad summam apud suos charitatem saepissime profuit, huic Merceroꝝ principi societati, fratrem se, et concivem adscribere. Quantum huic urbi ornamentum, quantum societ-* *ati honestamentum, quantum scholae nostrae emolumentum?

Quantus etiam Regi ipsi honos inde accederet, mavult, qui hoc vult alias inter alia per otium Regi suo apperire, quam hodie cum taedio et praeter aream eidem explicare. Omnipotens Deus Jesus Christus et cum eo, ac per eum noster et Pater et Deus, 1970 serenissimum Regem Jacobum, honoratissimam Reginam An-nam, nobilissimum Principem Henricum, reliquamque Regiae stirpis ad omnia summa natam sobolem diu nobis ita incolumes tueatur, ut cum huius vitae secundissimum curriculum confe-1975 ceritis, beatissimam vitae caelestis aeternitatem consequamini.
Dixi.*

THE ORATION DELIVERED at Paul's School by one of Master Mulcaster's Scholars

1980 Most gracious sovereign, my speech shall not be long for fear it appear loathsome, yet do I fully and freely believe that a king so crowned with wisdom as yourself hath this day put on such strong armour of patience to bear off tediousness in this so main and universal meeting of joy in his subjects, that the extension and stretching 1985 out of any part of time can by no means seem irksome unto him. This building received her foundation from the liberal purse of John Colet (Dean of Paul's Church under Henry VII, great grandfather to your Majesty) and was by him consecrated to learning for the erudition of youth, 1990 to the intent that the infancy of this school may now, by your right to the kingdom of England, grow up to a full and ripe age. Which work of his, so magnificent for the building, so commendable for the endowments, he by last will and testament bequeathed to the faithful Society and 1995 Brotherhood of the Mercers, always the chiefest and now this year, by reason of a Lord Mayor who is a member amongst them, more than the chiefest of the companies of this city. Which Society have most religiously performed all rites both due to the hopes of our deceased founder and 2000 to the ornaments of our education. Within these walls we, with many other, suck the milk of learning, and in the general name of all the youth in England most humbly entreat of our lord the King (who of himself, we know, is forward enough to advance all goodness) that as by 2005 reason of his manly years his chiefest care is spent about looking to and governing men, so (notwithstanding) in favour of that his royal son Henry, prince of unspeakable hopes, he would a little suffer his eye to descend and behold our school, and therein to provide that those who 2010 are but green in years and of equal age with that his princely issue may likewise receive a virtuous education.
For the obedience which is given to the rod brings along with it obedience to the sceptre, nay (as our master tells us) it goes even before it.

Quique metu didicit iuvenis parere puerque,

1918 liberally graciously

1921 closet small, intimate room privy chamber room in the palace adjacent to the bedchamber (see l. 145-6).

1927 Mulcaster's Richard Mulcaster, master of St Paul's grammar school and former master of the Merchant Taylors' School 1928 free school (held in the chapel of the Mercers' Company on the north side of Cheapside)

1988 John Colet (1467?-1519) dean of St Paul's, scholar and educational reformer;

one of those responsible for reforming English grammar school curricula along humanist lines

2016-17 Quique...erit Whosoever has learned as a youth and as a boy to obey out of fear will be dutiful in greater tasks

Grandibus imperiis officiosus erit.

2020 Our schools of England are in many limbs deformed, whose crookedness require the hand of a king to set them straight, lest out of these young nests those that are there bred, flying without their feathers into universities, should afterward light upon the branches of the commonwealth more naked than at first, by reason they were not perfectly fledged. Which evil hath been discovered by the obser-
2025 vation of our teacher, who now by the space of more than fifty-four years, both publicly and privately, hath instructed youth, and with no little grief of his own hath both here and abroad sifted out these gross vices that are mingled amongst schools. O how happy therefore should this our nursery of learning be if—after having first met with Colet, a founder so religious, and secondly the Mer-
2030 cers our patrons, men so faithful and virtuous—our lord the King would now at last also be pleased (considering many kings of England by doing so have won wonderful love from their subjects) to suffer his royal name to be rolled amongst the citizens of London, by vouchsafing to be free of that worthy and chiefest Society of Mercers. What glory should thereby rise up to the city? What dignity to that Society? To this our school what infinite benefit? What honour besides our sovereign himself might 2040 acquire, he that makes this wish now, wisheth rather (in fitter place and at fitter hours) to discover to his prince, than now, clean beyond his aim, to overshoot himself by tediousness. The Almighty etc.

Pag. 6 Our next arch of triumph was erected above the Conduit in Fleet Street, into which (as into the long and beauteous gallery of the city) his Majesty being entered, afar off (as if it had been some swelling promontory, or rather some enchanted castle guarded by ten thousand harmless spirits) did his eye encounter another tower of pleasure.

Presenting itself

2050 Fourscore and ten foot in height and fifty in breadth; the gate twenty foot in the perpendicular line and fourteen in the ground line. The two posterns were answerable to these that are set down before. Over the posterns riss up in proportionable measures two turrets, with battlements on the tops. The midst of the building was laid open to the world, and great reason it should be so, for the globe of the world was there seen to move, being filled with all the degrees and states that are in the land: and these were the mechanical and dead limbs of this carved body. 2060

As touching those that had the use of motion in it and for a need durst have spoken, but that there was no stuff fit for their mouths, the principal and worthiest was Astraea (Justice), sitting aloft, as being newly descended from heaven, gloriously attired; all her garments being thickly strewed with stars, a crown of stars on her head, a silver veil covering her eyes. Having told you that her name was Justice, I hope you will not put me to describe what properties she held in her hands, sithence every painted cloth can inform you. 2065

Directly under her, in a cant by herself, was Arete (Virtue) enthroned, her garments white, her head crowned, and under her Fortuna, her foot treading on the globe that moved beneath her: intimating that his Majesty's fortune was above the world, but his virtues above his fortune. 2070 2075

Invidia

Envy, unhandsomely attired all in black, her hair of the same colour, filleted about with snakes, stood in a dark and obscure place by herself, near unto Virtue but making show of a fearfulness to approach her and the light; yet still and anon casting her eyes sometimes to the one side beneath—where on several greces sat the four cardinal virtues: 2080

Viz. $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \textit{Justitia} \\ \textit{Fortitudo} \\ \textit{Temperantia} \\ \textit{Prudentia} \end{array} \right\}$ In habiliments, fitting to their natures.

and sometimes throwing a distorted and repining countenance to the other opposite seat, on which his Majesty's four kingdoms were advanced: 2090

Viz. $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \textit{England} \\ \textit{Scotland} \\ \textit{France} \\ \textit{Ireland} \end{array} \right\}$

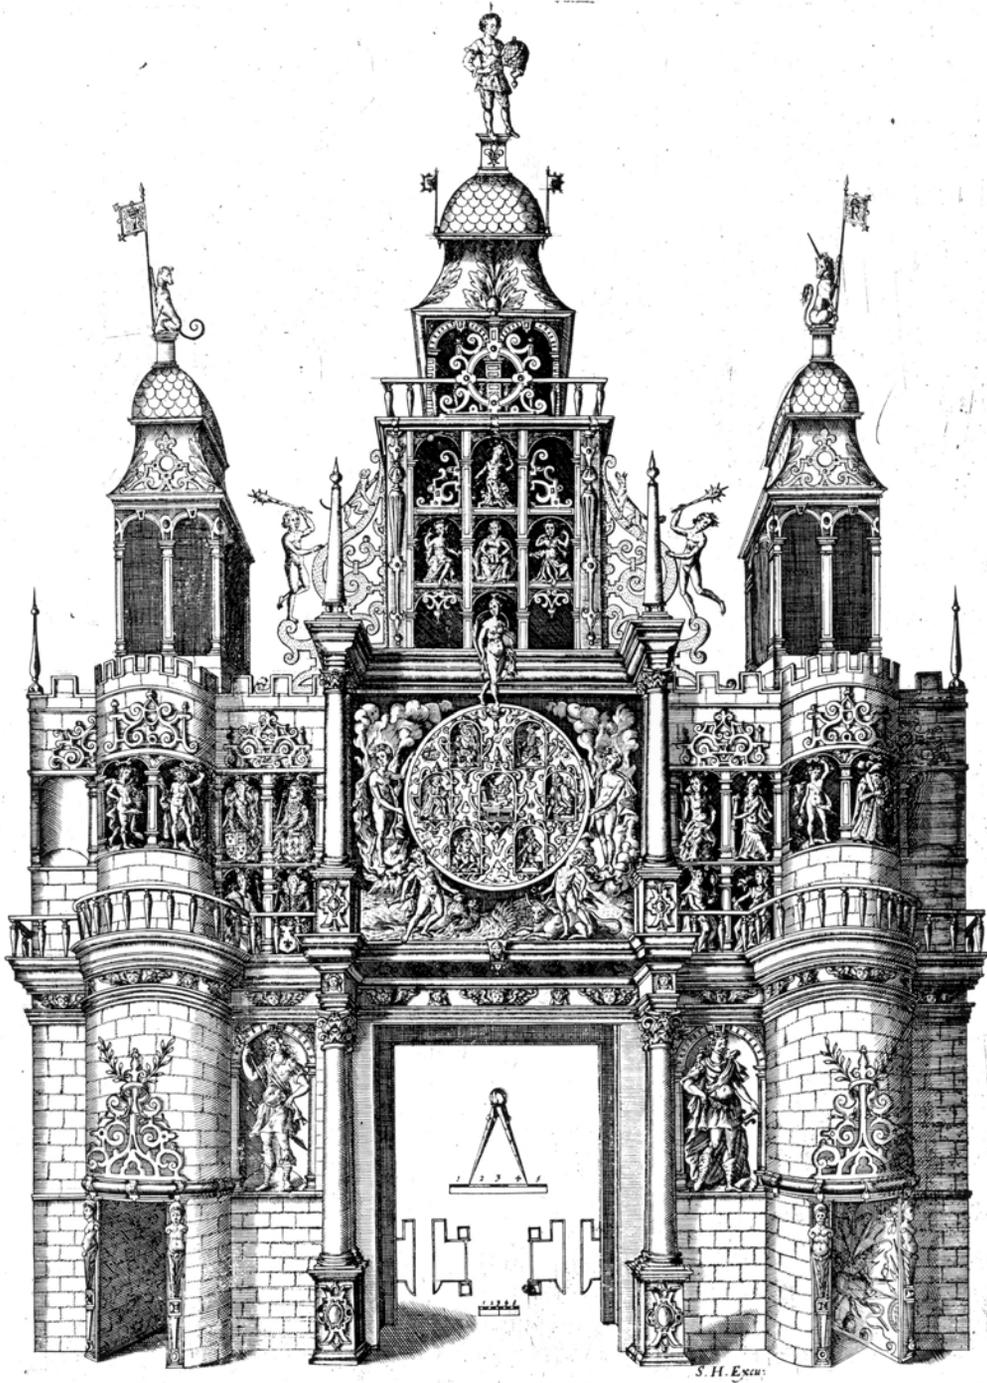

all of them in rich robes and mantles, crowns on their heads and sceptres with pencilled scutcheons in their hands, lined with the coats of the particular kingdoms.

2025 our teacher Mulcaster (1530?-1611; then probably seventy-four years old); first headmaster of the Merchant Taylors' School and subsequently of St Paul's (1596-1608)

2044 etc. The text concludes: 'Almighty God Jesus Christ, and with him and through him our both Father and God, long safeguard amongst us our most serene King James, most honoured Queen Anne, most noble Prince Henry and the rest of the royal lineage, destined for the highest purposes; and when you [James and his family] shall have drawn to the end of the most fortunate course of this life, may you attain a blessed eternity of heavenly life.'

2045 Our next arch Despite its nearly un- decipherable syntax, Dugdale's description conveys the court's admiration for this pageant: 'When he [James] came to the trophy in Fleet Street the lords considered that the same for royalty was so richly beautified and so plenteous of show that with the breadth of the street it seemed to them to have gone back again, and [were] but then at the Cross in Cheap, but otherwise saluted, as with variety of speeches and all sundry sorts of musics by the city appointed two [too?], as that at the Little Conduit and all else but the Exchange and Gracious Street; on top of this pageant was placed a globe of a goodly preparation.'

2060 degrees and states ranks and condi- tions
2065 Astraea goddess of justice, said to have left the earth at the end of the Golden Age from disgust at the vices of mankind. Her return will herald return of the Golden Age.
2070 properties props—scales of justice and a sword
2072 cant niche
2083 greces steps
2097 pencilled scutcheons painted shields
2098 lined with the coats covered with heraldic arms

The arch in Fleet Street, for pageant 6.

2100 For very madness that she beheld these glorious objects,
she stood feeding on the heads of adders.

The four elements in proper shapes, artificially and aptly expressing their qualities, upon the approach of his Majesty went round in a proportionable and even circle, touching that cantle of the Globe (which was open) to the full view of his Majesty, which being done, they bestowed themselves in such comely order, and stood so, as if the engine had been held up on the tops of their fingers.

2105 Upon distinct ascensions, neatly raised within the hollow womb of the globe, were placed all the states of the land, from the nobleman to the ploughman, among whom there was not one word to be heard, for you must imagine as Virgil saith:

Astraea *Magnus ab integro seclorum nascitur ordo.
Iam redit et virgo redeunt Saturnia regna.*

2115 Aeglogues 4
That it was now the golden world, in which there were few praters.

All the tongues that went in this place was the tongue of Zeal, whose personage was put on by W. Bourne, one of the servants to the young Prince.

2120 And thus went his speech
The populous globe of this our English isle
Seemed to move backward at the funeral pile
Of her dead female majesty. All states, 2125 From nobles down to spirits of meaner fates,
Moved opposite to nature and to peace,
As if the same had been th'Antipodes.
But see the virtue of a regal eye,
Th'attractive wonder of man's majesty.
2130 Our globe is drawn in a right line again,
And now appear new faces and new men.
The elements (earth, water, air and fire),
Which ever clipped a natural desire
To combat each with other, being at first 2135 Created enemies to fight their worst—
See at the peaceful presence of their king
How quietly they move, without their sting:

Earth not devouring, fire not defacing,
Water not drowning, and the air not chasing,
But propping the quaint fabric that here stands, 2140 Without the violence of their wrathfull hands.

Mirror of times, lo where thy fortune sits
Above the world and all our human wits,
But thy high virtue above that. What pen,
Or art, or brain can reach thy virtue then?
2145 At whose immortal brightness and true light
Envy's infectious eyes have lost their sight.
Her snakes not daring to shoot forth their stings
'Gainst such a glorious object, down she flings

Their forks of venom into her own maw, 2150 Whilst her rank teeth the glittering poisons chew;
For 'tis the property of Envy's blood
To dry away at every kingdom's good,
Especially when she had eyes to view 2155 These four main virtues figured all in you:
Justice in causes, Fortitude 'gainst foes, Temp'rance in spleen, and Prudence in all those;

And then so rich an empire, whose fair breast
Contains four kingdoms by your entrance blessed,
By Brute divided but by you alone
2160 All are again united and made one.
Whose fruitfull glories shine so far and even
They touch not only earth but they kiss heaven,
From whence Astraea is descended hither;
Who, with our last Queen's spirit, fled up thither,
2165 Foreknowing on the earth she could not rest
Till you had locked her in your rightfull breast.
And therefore all estates, whose proper arts
Live by the breath of majesty, had hearts

Burning in holy Zeal's immaculate fires, 2170 With quenchless ardours and unstained desires,
To see what they now see, your powerful grace
Reflecting joys on every subject's face.
These painted flames and yellow burning stripes
2175 Upon this robe being but as shows and types
Of that great zeal. And therefore in the name

2103 proportionable well proportioned 2104 cantle section
2106 comely becoming
2108 distinct ascensions steps
2113–14 Magnus . . . regna 'The great line of the centuries begins anew. Now the virgin returns, the reign of Saturn returns' (Virgil, Ecloques 5.5–6). The virgin here is Astraea and the context a prophecy that a child is about to be born who will rule over a united world and restore the golden age. This prophecy was subsequently connected to the imperial mission of Rome, the peace of Augustus and—by Christian writers beginning with the Emperor Constantine—with the birth of Christ. The tradition was adapted by later European monarchs, esp. the Habsburg Emperor Charles V and his son Philip

II of Spain, and by many Elizabethan apologists, who identified the return of the virgin goddess of justice with the Queen. The iconography of the arch is therefore grounded in a deep, multi-layered tradition of religious and imperial imagery. The theme remained prominent in the culture of the early Stuart court, e.g. in Jonson's masque, The Golden Age Restored.
2119 Zeal Described by Ripa as a man in a priest's garments, holding a lash in one hand and a lamp in the other. Middleton's figure evidently wore a gown decorated with an image of flames. The appearance of Zeal here complements the reference to the city's zeal at the Fenchurch arch (ll. 797–8).
W. Bourne also known as William Birde, an actor with the Admiral's Men

2120 young Prince Henry 2124 states ranks
2127 the same Nature and peace
th'Antipodes opposite side of the globe, hence exact opposites 2132 elements The theory that all things in nature derive from combinations of these elements was given its classic expression by Aristotle.
2133 clipped embraced 2140 quaint well-made
2150 maw stomach
2151 chew pronounced 'chaw'
2160 Brute Mythical ancient king of Britain, who divided his realm among his sons 2164 Astraea is descended heralding the return of the Golden Age
2167 her Astraea, who is also Justice
2168 arts skills

Of this glad city, whither no Prince ever came
 More loved, more longed for, lowly I entreat
 You'd be to her as gracious as you're great.
 2180 So with reverberate shouts our globe shall ring,
 The music's close being thus: God save our King!
 If there be any glory to be won by writing these lines,
 I do freely bestow it (as his due) on Thomas Middleton, in whose brain they were begotten, though they were 2185 delivered here: Quae nos non fecimus ipsi, vix ea nostra voco.
 But having pieced up our wings now again with our own feathers, suffer us a while to be pruning them, and to lay them smooth whilst this song, which went forth at the sound of oboes and other loud instruments, flies along 2190 with the train.

Cantus

[FIRST SINGER]

Where are all these honours owing?
 Why are seas of people flowing?
 Tell me, tell me, Rumour,
 2195 Though it be thy humour
 More often to be lying
 Than from thy breath to have truth flying:
 Yet alter now that fashion
 And without the stream of passion 2200 Let thy voice swim smooth and clear:
 When words want gilding, then they are most dear.

[RUMOUR]

'Behold where Jove and all the States
 Of heav'n, through heaven's seven silver gates,
 All in glory riding,
 2205 Backs of clouds bestriding,
 The Milky Way do cover;
 Which starry path being measured over,
 The deities convent
 In Jove's high court of Parliament.'

2245 In the highest point of all was erected a Janus head, and over it written

IANO QUADRIFRONTI SACRVM.

Which title of Quadrifrons is said to be given him,^a as he respecteth all climates and fills all parts of the world with his majesty; which Martial would seem to allude unto in 2250 that hendecasyllable,

Et lingua pariter locutus omni.^b

2185 Quae...voco That which we do not ourselves make we will never call ours 2212 Temple Bar marking the boundary between London and Westminster along the Strand
 2218 The Device Dugdale describes it as 'neither great nor small but finely furnished. Some compared it to an Exchange shop, it shined so in that dark place and was so pleasing to the eye, whereon a young man, an actor of the city, so delivered his mind and the manner of all in an oration that a thousand give him his due deserving commendations.' Dekker's description appears as Additional Passage E.

 2221-2 Ianus Quadrifrons Janus of four faces.
 2224 supporters the lion and unicorn
 (introduced in James's reign)

[FIRST SINGER]

—Rumour—thou dost lose thine aims

This is not Jove, but one as great, King James. 2210
 And now take we our flight up to Temple Bar, the other end of this our gallery, where by this time his Majesty is upon the point of giving a gracious and princely farewell to the Lord Mayor and the city, but that his eye meeting a 2215 seventh beautiful object is invited by that to delay awhile his lamented departure.

The Device called Templum Jani, Temple of Janus.

Pag. 7

The seventh and last pegme within the city was erected at Temple Bar, being adjoined close to the gate. The building was in all points like a temple, and dedicated to Ianus 2220 Quadrifrons.

Beneath that four-faced head of Janus was advanced the arms of the kingdom, with the supporters cut out to the life, from whence being removed they now are placed 2225 in the Guildhall.

The walls and gates of this temple were brass, the pillars silver, their capitals and bases gold. All the frontispiece, downward from those arms, was beautified and supported by twelve rich columns, of which the four lowermost, 2230 being great Corinthian pillars, stood upon two large pedestals, with a fair vauz over them instead of architrave, frieze and cornice. Above them eight columns more were likewise set, two and two, upon a large pedestal: for as our work began for his Majesty's entrance with rustic, so did we think it fit that this our temple should end with the most famous column, whose beauty and goodliness is derived both from the Tuscan, Doric, Ionic and Corinthian, and received his full perfection from Titus Vespasian, who 2240 advanced it to the highest place of dignity in his Arch Triumphant, and (by reason that the beauties of it were a mixture taken from the rest) he gave it the name of composita or Italica.

a Bassus apud Macro: liber 1. Saturae caput 9.

b Liber 8, Epigrammaton, 2.

2232 vauz projecting band over the lower columns
 2239 Titus Vespasian Roman emperor, AD
 69-79
 2246 IANO...SACRVM sacred to Janus of the four faces
 2250 hendecasyllable verse line of eleven syllables 2251 Et...omni And, speaking alike with every tongue (Epigrams, 8.2.5).

The arch at Temple Bar, for pageant 7.

Others have thought it by reason of the four elements which broke out of him, being Chaos, for Ovid is not afraid to make Chaos and Janus the same, in those verses:

2255 Me Chaos antiqui (nam sum res prisca) vocabant;
Adspice, etc.^a

But we rather follow (and that more particularly) the opinion of the ancients,^b who have entitled him Quadrifrons in regard of the year, which under his sway is divided into four seasons—spring, summer, autumn, winter—and adscribe unto him the beginnings and ends of things. See Marcus Cicero^c Cumque in omnibus rebus vim haberent maximam prima et extrema, principem in sacrificando Janum esse voluerunt, quod^d ab eundo nomen est deductum: ex quo transitiones perviae Iani, foresque in liminibus profanarum aedium, Januae nominantur, etc. As also the charge and custody of the whole world, by Ovid:

2270 Quicquid ubique vides coelum, mare, nubila, terras,
Omnia sunt nostra clausa patentque manu:
Me penes est unum vasti custodia mundi,
Et ius vertendi cardinis omne meum est.^e

About his four heads he had a wreath of gold, in which was graven this verse.

2275 TOT VULTVS MIHI NEC SATIS PVTAVI^f
signifying that though he had four faces, yet he thought them not enough to behold the greatness and glory of that day. Beneath, under the head was written

2280 ET MODO SACRIFICO CLVSIVS ORE VOCOR.^g

For being open he was styled Patulcius, but then upon the coming of his Majesty, being to be shut, he was to be called Clusius. Upon the outmost front of the building was placed the entire arms of the kingdom with the Garter, crown and supporters, cut forth as fair and great as the life, with an hexastich written underneath, all expressing the dignity and power of him that should close that temple.

2285 QVI DVDVM ANGVSTIS TANTVM REGNAVIT
IN ORIS
PARVOQVE IMPERIO SE TOTI PRÆBVIT ORBI ESSE REGENDO PAREM, TRIA REGNA (VT
NVLLA DEESSET
2290 VIRTVTI FORTVNA) SVO FELICITER VNI
IVNCTA SIMVL SENSIT: FAS VT SIT CREDERE VOTIS
NON IAM SANGVINEA FRVITVROS PACE
BRITANNOS.

2255-6 Me... Adspice The ancients called me Chaos, for a being from of old am I; observe the long, long ages of which my song shall tell (Ovid, Fasti, I.103, 4).

2262-6 Cumque... nominantur Also, as the beginning and the end are the most important parts of all affairs, they held that Janus is the leader in a sacrifice, the name being derived from eundo [going], hence the names jani for archways and januae for the front doors of secular buildings (Cicero, De Natura Deorum,

2.27).

2268-71 Quicquid... est What'er you see anywhere—sky, sea, clouds, earth—all things are closed and opened by my hand. The guardianship of this vast universe is in my hands alone, and none but me may rule the wheeling pole (Fasti, I.117-20)

2274 TOT... PVTAVI he deemed his many faces were not enough for him (Epigrams, 8.2.3)

2278 ET... VOCOR for on his sacrificial lips

a Fasti, liber 1.

b Lege Marlianum liber 4, caput 8. Albricus, in deorum imagine.

c De natura deorum, liber 2.

d quasi Eanus.

e Fasti, ibid.

f Martial, liber 8, Epigrammaton 2.

g Ovid, Fasti, I.

I'm now Clusius called (Fasti, I.130) 2284 hexastich group of six lines of verse 2287-92 QVI... BRITANNOS He who has reigned so long within narrow bounds and in a small kingdom now shows himself equal to ruling the world, and he now senses that three kingdoms (so that no good fortune should be lacking to his Virtue) are happily joined under his single care; and Britons, who are about to enjoy peace, not bloodshed, rightly believe in their prayers.

a Liber 2 Epistularum 1 ad Augusto. b So Cephisodotus hath feigned him. See Pausanius in Boeoti. et Phil. in Imag. contrary to Aristophanes Theognetus Lucian and others, that make him blind and deformed. c Silius Italicus.	In a great frieze below, that ran quite along the breadth of the building, were written these two verses out of Horace IVRANDASQVE SVVM PER NOMEN PONIMVVS ARAS NIL ORITVRVM ALIAS, NIL ORTVM TALE FATENTES^a The first and principal person in the Temple was IRENE or Peace. She was placed aloft in a cant, her attire white, semined with stars; her hair loose and large; a wreath of olive on her head; on her shoulder a silver dove. In her left hand she held forth an olive branch with a handful of ripe ears, in the other a crown of laurel, as notes of victory and plenty. By her stood PLVTVS or Wealth, a little boy, bare headed, his locks curled and spangled with gold, of a fresh aspect;^b his body almost naked, saving some rich robe cast over him; in his arms a heap of gold ingots to express riches, whereof he is the god. Beneath her feet lay ENYALIVS or Mars, grovelling, his armour scattered upon him in several pieces, and sundry sorts of weapons broken about him. Her word to all was UNA TRIVMPHIS IN NVMERIS POTIOR. pax optima rerum Quas homini novisse datum est, pax una Triumphis Innumeris potior.^c signifying that peace alone was better, and more to be coveted than innumerable triumphs. Besides, upon the right hand of her, but with some little descent, in a hemicycle was seated ESYCHIA or Quiet, the first handmaid of peace, a woman of a grave and venerable aspect, attired in black; upon her head an artificial nest, out of which appeared storks' heads to manifest a sweet repose. Her feet were placed upon a cube, to show stability, and in her lap she held a perpendicular or level, as the ensign of evenness and rest. On the top of it sat a halcyon or kingfisher. She had lying at her feet TARACHE	2295 2300 2305 2310 2315 2320 2325 2330
--	---	---

2295-6 IVRANDASQVE...FATENTES
betimes set up alters to swear by in your name, and confess that naught like you will hereafter arise or has arisen ere now (Horace, Epistles, 2.1.16-17)

2298 IRENE This figure does not correspond to any of those Ripa describes to represent Peace.

2299 cant niche

2300 semined sprinkled loose and large loose and flowing

2305 PLVTVS Ripa represents Wealth by a female figure.

2307.n Cephisodotus Athenian sculptor of the fourth century BC
Pausanius Greek writer of the second century AD, best known for a travelogue, translated into Latin as de situ Graeciae libri decem. In Boeti is book 9. Jonson in this note is reviewing personifications of wealth by ancient poets to justify his own, unconventional choice of a boy.

Theognetus author of Hellenistic comedies of which only fragments survive.

2315 UNA...POTIOR One more powerful in numerous triumphs

2316-18 pax...potior Peace is the best thing that man may know; peace alone is better than a thousand triumphs (Punica, 11.592-94). A passage from an oration by the Carthaginian, Hanno, urging his countrymen to make peace with Rome instead of pressing the advantage given by Hannibal's victories in the Second Punic War. He was shouted down but the ultimate outcome proved him right.

2322 hemicycle semi-circular recess

2323 ESYCHIA a composite of Ripa's two figures for Quiete, one of which stands on a square and holds a perpendicular, while the other has a stork's nest on her head

2328 perpendicular plumb line or similar instrument

2331 TARACHE The multi-coloured garments and disordered hair correspond to Ripa's description of Confusione and are said to represent disordered actions and many varied thoughts which confuse the intellect.

or Tumult, in a garment of diverse but dark colours, her hair wild and disordered, a foul and troubled face. About her lay staves, swords, ropes, chains, hammers, stones and suchlike, to express turmoil. The word was

PERAGIT TRANQVILLA POTESTAS

Quod violenta nequit mandataque fortius urget Imperiosa quies.^a

Claudian

To show the benefits of a calm and facile power, being able to effect in a state that which no violence can. On the other side the second handmaid was or Liberty, her dressing white and somewhat antique, but loose and free; her hair flowing down her back and shoulders. In her right hand she bore a club, on her left a hat, the characters of freedom and power. At her feet a cat was placed, the creature most affecting and expressing liberty. She trod on or Servitude, a woman in old and worn garments, lean and meagre, bearing fetters on her feet and hands; about her neck a yoke to insinuate bondage, and the word

ELEVThERIA

DOVLOSIS

NEC VNQVAM GRATIOR

alluding to that other of Claudian

Nunquam libertas gratior extat, Quam sub Rege pio^b and intimated that liberty could never appear more graceful and lovely than now under so good a prince. The third handmaid was or Safety, a damsel in carnation, the colour signifying cheer and life. She sat high. Upon her head she wore an antique helm and in her right hand a spear for defence; in her left a cup for medicine; at her feet was set a pedestal, upon which a serpent, rolled up, did lie. Beneath was or Danger, a woman despoiled and almost naked; the little garment she hath left her of several colours, to note her various disposition. Besides her lies a torch out and a sword broken, the instruments of her fury, with a net and wolf-skin, the ensigns of her malice, rent in pieces. The word

SOTERIA

PEIRA

TERGA DEDERE METVS

borrowed from Martial^c and implying that now all fears have turned their backs and our safety might become security, danger being so wholly depressed and unfurnished of all means to hurt. The fourth attendant is a De Manlio Theodoro Consulo Panegyricus.

EVDAIMONIA

b De Laudibus Stilichonis, liber 3.

c Liber 12 Epistulae 6.

2334 staves shafts of lances

2336 PERAGIT TRANQVILLA POTESTAS Quiet authority accomplishes

2337-8 Quod...quies Quiet authority accomplishes what violence cannot, and that mandate compels more which comes from a commanding calm (ll. 240-1)

2343 ELEVThERIA Very similar to Ripa's Liberta, who holds a sceptre instead of a club, however. Jonson perhaps felt the sceptre an inappropriate emblem for Liberty in a royal entry.

2350 DOVLOSIS similar to the first of three formulas for Servitu in Ripa

2354 NEC VNQVAM GRATIOR and not at any time more pleasing

2356-7 Nunquam...pio Never does liberty show more fair than beneath a pious king (De Laudibus Stilichonis, 3.114-15)

2361 SOTERIA Ripa gives five possible

formulas for Sicurezza or Sicurta, none corresponding very exactly to Jonson's, though all but one hold a spear.

2368 despoiled stripped of possessions

2374 TERGA DEDERE METVS fear has turned its back

2379 EVDAIMONIA The caduceus and cornucopia belong to Ripa's Felicita or Felicitas Publica.

- a Eclogae 4. 2380
- b Aeneid liber 11.
- c One of the three flamines that as some think Numa Pompilius first instituted, but we rather with Varro take him of Romulus' institution, whereof there were only two, he and Dialis, to whom he was next in dignity. He was always created out of the nobility and did perform the rites to Mars, who was thought the Father of Romulus. 2385
- d Scaliger in Coniectura in Varro saith Totus Pileus, vel potius velamenta, Flammeum dicebatur, unde Flamines dicti. 2390
- e To this looks that other conjecture of Varro liber 4: de lingua Latina Flamines, quod licio in Capite velati erant semper, ac caput cinctum habebant filo, Flamines dicti. 2395
- f Which in their attire was called stroppus, in their wives' inarculum.
- g Scaliger ibid in Coniectura: Pone enim regerebant apicem, ne gravis esset summis aestatis caloribus. Amentis enim, quae offendices dicebantur sub mentum adductis, religabant; ut cum vellent, regerent, et pone pendere permitterent. 2400
- or Felicity, varied on the second hand and apparelled richly in an embroidered robe and mantle; a fair golden tress. In her right hand a caduceus, the note of peaceful wisdom; in her left a cornucopia filled only with flowers, as a sign of flourishing blessedness, and crowned with a garland of the same. At her feet 2385
- DYSPRAGIA
- or Unhappiness, a woman bareheaded; her neck, arms, breast and feet naked; her look hollow and pale; she holds a cornucopia turned downward with all the flowers fallen out and scattered; upon her sits a raven, as the augury of ill fortune; and the soul was 2390
- REDEVNT SATVRNIA REGNA.
- out of Virgil,^a to show that now those golden times were returned again, wherein peace was with us so advanced, rest received, liberty restored, safety assured and all blessedness appearing in every of these virtues her particular triumph over her opposite evil. This is the dumb argument of the frame, and illustrated with this verse of Virgil, written in the under frieze: 2395
- NVLLA SALVS BELLO
PACEM TE POSCIMVS OMNES.^b 2400
- The speaking part was performed, as within the temple where there was erected an altar, to which at the approach of the King appears the Flamen 2405
- MARTIALIS^c
- and to him
- GENIVS VRBIS
- The Genius we attired before. To the Flamen we appoint this habit: a long crimson robe to witness his nobility; his tippet and sleeves white, as reflecting on purity in his religion; a rich mantle of gold with a train, to express the dignity of his function; upon his head a hat^d of delicate wool, whose top ended in a cone and was thence called apex, according to that of Lucan, liber 1 2410
- Atollensque apicem generoso vertice flamen.* 2415
- This Apex was covered with a fine net^e of yarn which they named apiculum, and was sustained with a bowed twig^f of pomegranate tree. It was also in the hot time of summer to be bound with ribbons and thrown behind them as Scaliger^g teacheth. In his hand he bore a golden 2420

2381 mantle sleeveless robe
 2391 soul meaning—i.e. the inner life or spirit of the emblem
 2392 REDEVNT SATVRNIA REGNA Saturn's reign returns (indicating the return of the Golden Age)
 2400-1 NVLLA...OMNES No safety is in war; for peace we pray thee one and all (l. 362)
 2403 altar 'with burning incense upon it' (Harrison)
 2404 Flamen Roman priest
 2412.n Totus...dicti This cap or rather small covering used to be called the flameum, from which the term flamines is derived (Joseph Scaliger [1540-1609], Coniectura in T. Varronem de lingua latina [Paris, 1565], a work of humanist scholarship by one of the greatest classicists of the period). This etymology is no longer considered correct.

 2415 Atollensque...flamen And the flamen, raising aloft on his high-borne head the pointed cap (Pharassalia, 1.604). The context—an augury of future anguish and bloodshed for the Roman state—seems singularly inappropriate. Jonson was presumably interested only in the technical description of the flamen's cap.
 2416.n de lingua...dicti From the Latin language Flamines, because they were allowed to always have a covering on their head, and having their head girded with a band of wool were called Flamines. (The meaning here is clarified by Jonson's note to l. 2412, explaining that the cap was called a flameum.) 2420.n Pone...mitterent They used to put the pointed cap behind, so that it might deflect the heat of the oppressive summer. These hats they tied by means of ribbons (amentis) which were called offendices when drawn under the chin; and when they wanted they would push them back and allow them to hang behind.

censer with perfume, and censing about the altar, having first kindled his fire on the top, is interrupted by the Genius.

GENIUS

*Stay, what art thou that in this strange attire
Dar'st kindle stranger and unhallowed fire Upon this altar?*

2425 FLAMEN *Rather what art thou
That darest so rudely interrupt my vow?
My habit speaks my name.*

GENIUS A flamen?

FLAMEN *Yes,
And Martialis^a called.*

GENIUS *I so did guess
By my short view, but whence didst thou ascend Hither? or how? or to what mystic end?*

2430

FLAMEN *The noise and present tumult of this day
Roused me from sleep and silence where I lay Obscured from light; which, when I waked to see,
I wond'ring thought what this great pomp might be.*

2435

*When (looking on my calendar) I found
The Ides of March^b were entered, and I bound With these to celebrate the genial feast
Of Anna^c styled Perenna, Mars^d his guest;
Who, in this month of his, is yearly called
To banquet at his altars and installed
A Goddess^e with him, since she fills the year,
And knits the oblique scarf that girts the sphere.^f
Whilst four-faced Janus turns his vernal look^g Upon their meeting hours, as if he took High pride and pleasure.*

2445

GENIUS *Sure thou still dost dream,
And both thy tongue and thought rides on the stream
Of fantasy: Behold here he nor she Have any altar, fane or, deity.*

2450

*Stoop, read but this inscription:^h and then view
To whom the place is consecrate. 'Tis true
That this is Janus' Temple, and that now
He turns upon the year his freshest brow;
That this is Mars his month, and these the Ides Wherein his Anne was honoured. Both the tides,* 2455

*Titles, and place we know; but these dead rites
Are long since buried and new power excites More high and hearty flames. Lo, there is he Who brings with him a greater Anneⁱ than she,
Whose strong and potent virtues have defaced^j*

2460

Stern Mars his statues, and upon them placed His and the world's blessed blessings:^k This hath brought Sweet Peace to sit in that bright state she ought, Unbloody or untroubled; hath forced hence

a Of Mars, whose rites (as we have touched before) this flamen did specially celebrate.

b With us the 15 of March, which was the present day of this triumph, and on which the great feast of Anna Perenna (among the Romans) was yearly and with such solemnity remembered: Ovid Fasti 3 Idibus est Annae festum geniale Perrenae, Haud procul a ripis, etc.

c Who this Anna should be, with the Romans themselves hath been no trifling controversy. Some have thought her fabulously the sister of Dido; some, a nymph of Numicius; some Io; some Themis; others an old woman of Bouillae that fed the seditious multitude in monte sacro with wafers and fine cakes in time of their penury, to whom afterward (in memory of the benefit) their peace being made with the nobles, they ordained this feast. Yet they that have thought nearest have missed all these and directly imagined her the Moon. And that she was called Anna, Quia mensibus impleat annum. (Ovid ibid). To which, the vow that they used in her rites somewhat confirmingly alludes; which was, ut Annare, et perennare commode liceret (Macrobius Saturnalia liber 1 caput 12).

d So Ovid ibid. Fasti makes Mars speaking to her: Mense meo coleris, iunxi mea tempora tecum.

e Nuper erat dea facta, etc. ibid Ovid.

f Where is understood the meeting of the zodiac in March, the month wherein she is celebrated.

g That face wherewith he beholds the spring.

h Written upon the altar, for which we refer you to the page 272.

i The Queen, to answer which in our inscription we spake to the King MARTE MAIORI.

j The Temple of Janus we apprehend to be both the house of war and peace: of war when it is open, of peace when it is shut; and that there, each over the other is interchangeably placed, to the vicissitude of times.

k Which are peace, rest, liberty, safety, etc. and were his actively but the world's passively.

2430 mystic religious

2436.n Idibus...ripis On the Ides is held the jovial feast of Anna Perenna, not far from thy banks, O Tiber, who comes from afar (Ovid, Fasti, 3.523-4)

2438.n in monte sacro onto the sacred mount Quia...annum because she fills the measure of the year by her months (Fasti, 3.653)

ut...liceret that throughout the year and for years to come it shall be permitted. (The point is that the name Anna derives from annare.)

Mense...tecum Thou art worshipped in my month, I have joined my season to thine (Fasti, 3.679)

2441.n Nuper...facta She was lately made a goddess (Fasti, 3.677)

2443 vernal springtime

2448 fane temple

2458.n MARTE MAIORI Greater than Mars

- a Somewhat a strange epithet in our tongue, but proper to the thing, for they were only masculine odours which were offered to the altars. Virgil Eclogae 8: Verbenasque adole pinguis, et mascula tura. And Pliny, Naturalis Historia, liber 12, caput 32 speaking of these, hath Quod ex eo rotunditate guttae pendit masculum vocamus, cum alias non fere mas vocetur ubi non sit foemina; religioni tributum ne sexus alter usurparetur. Masculum aliqui putant a specie testium dictum. See him also, liber 34, caput 2: and Arnobius liber 7 Adversus Gentes. Non si mille tu pondera masculi turis incendas, etc. 2465
- b According to Romulus his institution, who made March the first month and consecrated it to his Father, of whom it was called Martius: Varro, Festii in Fragmentae Martius mensis initium annis fuit, et in Latio, et post Roman conditam etc. And Ovid, Fasti 3: A te principium Romano dicimus anno: primus de patrio nomine mensis erit. Vox rata fit; etc. See Macrobius, liber 1 Saturnalia caput 12 and Solin in Polybius Historia caput 3: Quod hoc mense mercedes exoluerint magistris, quas completus annus deberi fecisset, etc. 2470
- c Some to whom we have read this have taken it for a tautology, thinking time enough expressed before, in 'years' and 'months'. For whose ignorant sakes we must confess to have taken the better part of this travail in noting, a thing not usual, neither affected of us, but where there is necessity, as here, to avoid their dull censures: where in 'years' and 'months' we alluded to that is observed in our former note; but by 'time' we understand the present, and that from this instant we should begin to reckon and make this the first of our time. Which is also to be helped by emphasis. 2485
- d In which he was slain in the Senate. 2490
- All tumults, fears, or other dark portents
That might invade weak minds; hath made men see
Once more the face of welcome liberty;
And doth (in all his present acts) restore
That first pure world, made of the better ore.
Now innocence shall cease to be the spoil
Of ravenous greatness, or to steep the soil
Of rais'd peasantry with tears and blood.
No more shall rich men, for their little good,
Suspect to be made guilty, or vile spies
Enjoy the lust of their so murd'ring eyes.
Men shall put off their iron minds and hearts,
The time forget his old malicious arts
With this new minute, and no print remain
Of what was thought the former age's stain.
Back, flamen, with thy superstitious fumes
And cense not here; thy ignorance presumes
Too much in acting any ethnic rite
In this translated temple. Here no wight
To sacrifice, save my devotion, comes
That brings instead of those thy masculine^a gums,
My city's heart, which shall for ever burn
Upon this altar, and no time shall turn
The same to ashes. Here I fix it fast:
Flame bright, flame high, and may it ever last Whilst I, before the figure of thy peace,
Still tend the fire and give it quick increase
With prayers, wishes, vows; whereof be these
The least and weakest: that no age may lose
The memory of this so rich a day,
But rather that it henceforth yearly may Begin our spring, and with our spring the prime
And first account of years, of months,^b of Time:^c
And may these Ides as fortunate appear
To thee as they to Caesar^d fatal were.
Be all thy thoughts born perfect and thy hopes
In their events still crowned beyond their scopes.
Let not wide heaven that secret blessing know
To give, which she on thee will not bestow.
Blind Fortune be thy slave, and may her store
(The less thou seek'st it) follow thee the more.* 2500

2468 better ore gold2473 Suspect to be made guilty be accused of guilt, in order to furnish an excuse for confiscating their property. Jonson may have been thinking of Tacitus's description of Rome during the unstable period following Nero's overthrow: 'Nobility, wealth, the refusal of the acceptance of office, were grounds for accusation' (History, 1.2).2481 ethnic pagan2482 translated transferred from one condition to another wight being2484.n Verbenasque . . . tura burn rich herbs and masculine gums (frankincense) (Eclogues, 8.65).Quod . . . dictum Frankincense that hangssuspended in a globular drop we call male frankincense, although in other connections the term 'male' is not usually employed where there is no female; but it is said to have been due to religious scruple that the name of the other sex was not employed in this case. Some people think that male frankincense is so called from its resemblance to the testes. (Pliny, Natural History, 12.32.61. Jonson incorrectly cited 12.14). Jonson's note exemplifies his passion for accurate detail in borrowing from classical sources. He also referred to 'masculine odors' in describing a religious rite in Sejanus (5.91).Non . . . incendas Not if you burn a thousand weights of masculine gum.2492 lose pronounced 'leese'2496.n Martius . . . conditam The month of Mars was the beginning of the year, both in Latium and after its foundation in Rome (Varro, Sexti Pompeii Festii Librorum Fragmenta).A te . . . etc. We name the beginning of the Roman year after thee; the first month shall be called by my father's name. The promise was kept, etc. (l. 75) Quod . . . fecisset 'Because in this month they paid off all their commercial debts (mercedes) to the magistrates—those debts that is which the complete year had caused to become due.' An alternative etymology, the idea being that Martius (March) derived from mercedes.

2505 Much more I would: but see, these brazen gates
 Make haste to close, as urgèd by thy fates;
 Here ends my city's office, here it breaks;
 Yet with my tongue and this pure heart she speaks
 A short farewell; and lower than thy feet, 2510 With fervent thanks, thy royal pains doth greet.
 Pardon if my abruptness breed dis-ease:
 He merits not t'offend, that hastes to please.

Over the altar was written this Inscription:

2515 D. I. O. M.
 BRITANNIARVM. IMP.
 PACIS. VINDICI. MARTE. MAIORI. P. P.
 F. S. AVGVSTO. NOVO. GENTIVM. CON-IVNCTARVM. NVMINI. TVTELARI.

2520 D. A.
 CONSERVATRICI. ANNÆ. IPSÆ. PERENNÆ.
 DEABVSQVE. VNIVERSIS. OPTATORI. SVI FORTVNATISSIMI. THALAMI. SOCIÆ. ET CONSORTI. PVLCHERRIMÆ. AVGVSTISSIMÆ.

2525 ET
 H. F. P.
 FILIO. SVO. NOBILISSIMO. OB. AD-
 VENTVM. AD VRBEM. HANC. SVAM. EX-PECTATISSIMVM. GRATISSIMVM. CE-
 2530 LEBRATISSIMVM. CVIVS. NON. RADII. SED SOLES. POTIVS. FVNESSIMAM. NVPER.
 ÆRIS. INTEMPERIEM. SERENARVNT

S. P. Q. L.
 VOTIS. X. VOTIS. XX. ARDENTISSIMIS.

2535 L. M.
 HANC. ARAM.
 P.

And upon the Gate being shut,

2505 brazen gates (of the temple)
 2515–37 D.I.O.M. . . . P To Lord James the Best and Greatest (D[omino] I[acobo] O[ptimo] M[aximo]), Emperor of the Britons, guarantor of peace, greater than Mars, father of his country, saviour of the faith (P[atri] P[atriæ] F[idei] S[ervatori]), new Augustus, protecting guardian of all the people; To Lady Anne (D[ominae] A[mae]) Anna Perenna herself, more desirable than all the pagan goddesses, associate of his most blessed wedding chamber and most beautiful and most distinguished consort and |

 To Prince Henry Frederick (H[enrico] F[rederico] P[rincipi]) his most noble son whose arrival in the city has been long awaited and is most welcome and most spectacularly celebrated, and who—not like the sun's rays but more like the sun itself—has lately cleared the funereal and most intemperate air. The Senate and People of London (S[enatus] P[opulusque] L[ondenensis]) by their ten—no twenty—most heartfelt pledges, gladly to the deserving (L[ibens] M[erito]), a traditional formula for a thank offering), have set up (P[osuit]) this altar.

a Paraphraste in Arati Phaenomena.

IMP. IACOBVS MAX.

CÆSAR AVG. P. P.

PACE POPVLO BRITANNICO

TERRA MARIQVE PARTA

IANVM CLVSIT. S. C.

2540

2545

Pag. 8

Thus hath both court, town and country reader our portion of device for the city. Neither are we ashamed to profess it, being assured well of the difference between it and pageantry. If the mechanic part yet standing give it any distaste in the wry mouths of the time, we pardon them, for their own ambitious ignorance doth punish them enough. From hence we will turn over a new leaf with you, and lead you to the pegme in the Strand, a work thought on, begun and perfected in twelve days.

2550

The invention was a rainbow: the moon, sun and those seven stars, which antiquity hath styled the Pleiades, or Vergilia, advanced between two magnificent pyramids of seventy foot in height, on which were drawn his Majesty's several pedigrees, English and Scottish. To which body (being framed before) we were to apt our soul. And finding that one of these seven lights, Electra, is rarely or not at all to be seen—as Ovid liber 4, Fasti affirmeth:

2555

Pleiades incipient humeros relevare paternos:

Quae septem dici, sex tamen esse solent.

And by and by after,

2565

Sive quod Electra Troiae spectare ruinas

Non tulit: ante oculos opposuitque manum.

And Festus Avienus^a

Fama vetus septem memorat genitore creatas

Longaevae: sex se rutila inter sidera tantum

Sustollunt, etc.

2570

And beneath

... cerni sex solas carmine Myntes

Asserit: Electram coelo abscessisse profundo, etc.

2540–4 IMP... S. C. 'James the greatest emperor, Caesar Augustus Father of his Country. Because peace has been brought forth for the British people on land and sea, a decree of the Senate (S[enatus] C[onsulto]) closes the gate.' This appears to allude to a famous prophecy in the Aeneid (1.284–97) concerning the rise of the Julian dynasty and the establishment of world peace under its auspices: 'From this noble line shall be born the Trojan Caesar, who shall limit his empire with the ocean, his glory with the stars, a Julius, a name descended from the great Julius. Him in days to come shalt thou, anxious no more, welcome to heaven, laden with eastern spoils; he too shall be invoked in vows. Then shall wars cease and the rough ages soften; hoary Faith and Vesta, Quirinus with his brother Remus, shall give laws. The gates of war, grim with iron and close-fitting bars, shall be closed; within impious rage, sitting on savage arms, his hands fast bound behind with a hundred brazen knots, shall roar in the ghastliness of blood-stained lips.'

2549 pageantry showy display (here contrasted with Jonson's learning and poetry)

mechanic part physical remains of the pageant

2553 pegme stage. Dugdale implies that this was a failure: 'In the Strand was also another of small motion, a pyramid fitly beseeeming time and place, but the day far spent and the King and states, I am sure, wearied with the shows—as the stomach may glutton the daintiest [courses]—stayed not long but passed forward to the place appointed.'

2555 invention design. Dekker's summary is printed as Additional Passage F.

2560 apt adapt

soul Literary and intellectual meaning.

2563–4 Pleiades... solent Pleiades will commence to lighten the burden that rests on their father's shoulders; seven are they usually called, but six they usually are (Ovid, Fasti, 4.169–70).

2566–7 Sive... manum or whether it be that Electra could not brook to behold the fall of Troy, and so covered her eyes with her hand (Ovid, Fasti, 4.177–8).

2568 Festus Avienus Rufus Festus Avienius, Roman poet of the fourth century

2569–71 Fama... Sustollunt Ancient rumour proclaims their father Longavus created them seven: but only six hold themselves among the reddish stars.

2573–4 cerni... profundo He brought it about that only six are able to be seen and he says that one of them, Electra, retired to the deepest sky.

2575 We ventured to follow this authority and made her the speaker, presenting her hanging in the air in figure of a comet, according to Anonymus: Electra non sustinens videre casum pronepotum fugerit; unde et illam dissolutis crinibus propter luctum ire asserunt, et propter comas quidam 2580 Cometen appellant.

The Speech

ELECTRA

*The long laments,^a I spent for ruin'd Troy
Are dried, and now mine eyes run tears of joy.
No more shall men suppose Electra dead,
2585 Though from the consort of her sisters fled Unto the Arctic circle,^b here to grace
And gild this day with her serenest^c face
And see my daughter Iris^d hastes to throw
Her roseate wings, in compass of a bow, 2590 About our state as sign^e of my approach,
Attracting to her seat from Mithra's^f coach
A thousand different and particular hues,
Which she throughout her body doth diffuse.
The sun, as loth to part from this half sphere,
2595 Stands still, and Phoebe labours to appear In all as bright (if not as rich) as he;
And for a note of more serenity
My six fair sisters^g hither shift their lights,
To do this hour the utmost of her rites,
2600 Where lest the captious or profane might doubt
How these clear heavenly bodies come about,
All to be seen at once, yet neither's light
Eclipsed or shadowed by the other's sight.
Let ignorance know, great King, this day is thine,
2605 And doth admit no night, but all do shine
As well nocturnal as diurnal fires
To add unto the flame of our desires.
Which are (now thou hast closed up Janus' gates,^h
And giv'n so general peace to all estates)
2610 That no offensive mist or cloudy stain
May mix with splendour of thy golden reign;
But, as thou'st freed thy chamberⁱ from the noise
Of war and tumult, thou wilt pour those joys
Upon this place,^j which claims to be the seat^k
2615 Of all thy kingly race, the cabinet
To all thy counsels and the judging chair*

2577-80 Electra...appellant Electra fled, not bearing to see her grandson's death, and this is why people say that she went, hair streaming behind her, because of her grief. And because of her hair (comas) some people call her the comet.
2582.n pars...orbem others say that while bitterly weeping over the burning of Idaeian Troy and mourning the deaths of countless of her own people Electra offered herself as a grieving star.
2586.n Sed...constitisse But after Troy had been captured and her descendants through Dadanus overthrown, moved by grief she [Electra] left them and took her place in the circle called Arctic (Myths of Hyginus, 2, 21).

2587.n Anima sphaerae solis the soul of the sphere of the sun
2588.n Nascitur...scilicet Iris arises from water and fair weather [serenitate], evidently from the refraction of the sun's rays
2590.n indicem...montes the sign of peace. The unloosed day bursts out and clears the sky. The clouds return to the mountain heights.
2591.n torquentem cornua Mithran Mithra brandishing her horns
Te...Mithran The Nile venerates

- a Festus Avienus Paraphrases: pars ait Idaeae deflentem incendia Troiae, Et numerosa suae lugentem funera gentis, Electram tetris moestum dare nubibus orbem. Besides the reference to antiquity, this speech might be understood by allegory of the town here that had been so ruined with sickness, etc.
- b Hyginus: Sed postquam Troia fuit capta, et progenies eius quae a Dardano fuit eversa, dolore permotam ab his se removisse, et in circulo qui Arcticus dicitur constitisse, etc.
- c 'Electra' signifies 'Serenity itself' and is compounded of ἥλιος which is the sun and αἰθριος that signifies serene. She is mentioned to be Anima sphaerae solis by Proclus, Commentarii in Hesiod.
- d She is also feigned to be the mother of the rainbow: Nascitur enim Iris ex aqua et serenitate, e refractione radiorum scilicet: Aristotle In Meteorologia.
- e Valerius Flaccus Argonauticon 1, makes the rainbow indicem serenitatis. Emicuit reserata dies, coelumque resolvit Arcus, et in summos redierunt nubila montes.
- f A name of the sun: Statius, Thebais, liber 1, torquentem cornua Mithran, And Martianus Capella liber 3 De Nuptiis Mercurii et Philologiae, Te Serapim Nilus, Memphis veneratur Osirin; Dissona sacra Mithran, etc.
- g Alcyone, Celaeno, Taygete, Asterope, Merope, Maia, which are also said to be the souls of the other spheres, as Electra of the sun (Proclus ibid. in commentarii): Alcyone Veneris. Celaeno Saturni. Taygete Lunae. Asterope Iovis. Merope Martis. Maia Mercurii.
- h Alluding back to that of our temple.
- i London.
- j His city of Westminster, in whose name, and at whose charge, together with the Duchy of Lancaster, this arch was erected.
- k Since here they not only sat being crowned, but also first received their crowns.

you Serapis and the city of Memphis venerates you Osiris and clamourous rituals venerate you Mithra 2595 Phoebe the moon
2598.n Proclus...Mercurii Proclus in the same in the commentary. Of the planet Venus, Alcyone, Caelano of Saturn. Taygete of the Moon. Asterope of Jupiter. Merope of Mars. Maia of Mercury.
2606 diurnal daytime
2615 cabinet small private room, often adjacent to a bedroom; hence a place where the king may receive secret or intimate advice.
2616 judging chair magistrate's seat

The Kings entertainment

- a Horace Carminae liber 4, Ode 9: Ducentis ad se cuncta pecuniae.
- b For our more authority to induce her thus, see Festus Avienus paraphrases in Arat. speaking of Electra: Nonnumquam Oceanus tamen istam surgere ab undis, In convexa poli, sed sede carere sororum; Atque os discretum procul edere, detestatam, Germanosque choros sobolis lachrimare ruinas, Diffusamque comas cerni, crinisque soluti Monstrari effigie, etc.
- c All comets were not fatal; some were fortunately ominous, as this to which we allude, and wherefore we have Pliny's testimony (Naturalis Historia, liber 2, caput 23): Cometes in uno totius orbis loco colitur in templo Romae, admodum faustus Divo Augusto iudicatus ab ipso, qui incipiente eo, apparuit ludis quos faciebat Veneri Genetrici, non multo post obitum patris Caesaris, in collegio ab eo instituto. Namque his verbis id gaudium prodidit. Iis ipsis ludorum meorum diebus, sidus crinitum per septem dies in regione coeli, quae sub septentrionibus est, conspectum. Id oriebatur circa undecimam horam diei, clarumque et omnibus terris conspicuum fuit. Eo sidere significari vulgus credit, Caesaris animam inter deorum immortalium numina receptam: quo nomine id insigne simulacro capitis eius, quod mox in foro consecravimus adiectum est. Haec ille in publicum, interiore gaudio sibi illum natum, seque in eo nasci interpretatus est. Et si verum fatemur, salutare id terris fuit.
- To this thy special kingdom. Whose so fair
And wholesome laws in every court shall strive
By equity and their first innocence to thrive. 2620
The base and guilty bribes of guiltier men Shall be thrown back, and Justice look as when She loved the earth, and feared not to be sold
For that which worketh all things to it, gold.^a
The dam of other evils, avarice,
Shall here lock down her jaws, and that rude vice 2625
Of ignorant and pitied greatness, pride,
Decline with shame; ambition now shall hide
Her face in dust, as dedicate to sleep,
That in great portals wont her watch to keep.
All ills shall fly the light; thy court be free 2630
No less from envy than from flattery.
All tumult, faction, and harsh discord cease,
That might perturb the music of thy peace.
The querulous nature shall no longer find Room for his thoughts. One pure consent of mind 2635
Shall flow in every breast, and not the air,
Sun, moon or stars shine more serenely fair.
This from that loud, blessed oracle I sing
Who here, and first, pronounced thee Britain's king.
Long mayst thou live and see me thus appear, 2640
As ominous a comet,^b from my sphere
Unto thy reign, as that did auspicate^c
So lasting glory to Augustus' state.

2645 And thus have we (lowly and aloof) followed our sovereign through the seven triumphal gates of this his court royal, which name, as London received at the rising of the sun, so now at his going from her, even in a moment she lost that honour. And being, like an actor on a stage, stripped out of her borrowed majesty, she resigns her former shape and title of city; nor is it quite lost, considering it went along with him to whom it is due. For such virtue is begotten in princes that their very presence hath power to turn a village to a city and to make a city appear great as a kingdom. Behold how glorious a flower happiness is, but how fading. The minutes that lackey at the heels of Time 2655 run not faster away than do our joys. What tongue could have expressed the raptures on which the soul of the city was carried beyond itself, for the space of many hours? What wealth could have allured her to have closed her eyes at the coming of her king, and yet see her bridegroom 2660 is but stepped from her, and in a minute (nay in shorter time than a thought can be born) is she made a widow. All her consolation being now to repeat over by rote those honours, which lately she had perfectly by heart, and to tell of those joys which but even now she really beheld. 2665

2621 Justice Astraea, alluding to the Golden Age when she lived on earth
2622 feared not to be sold Jonson suggests that the selling of justice for gold ended the Golden Age.
2623.n Ducentis...pecuniae Money that leads all things to herself 2628 dedicate devoted
2641 ominous portentous 2641.n Nonnumquam...etc. Sometimes that one [Electra] rises from the waters of the ocean into the convex sky, but avoids the seat of her sisters and shows her face apart from afar. Despising the twin chorus of the Pleiades, she weeps for the ruins of her Trojan race. She is distinguished by her spreading locks, by the image of her loosened hair, etc.

2642.n Cometes...fuit The only place in the whole world where a comet is the object of worship is a temple at Rome. His late majesty Augustus had deemed this comet very propitious to himself; as it had appeared at the beginning of his rule at some games which, not long after the decease of his father Caesar, as a member of the college founded by him he was celebrating in honour of Mother Venus. In fact he made public the joy it gave him in these very words: 'On the very days of my Games a comet was visible for seven days in the northern part of the sky. It was rising about an hour before sunset, and was a bright star, visible in all lands. The common people believed that this star signified the soul of Caesar received among the spirits of the immortal gods, and on this account the emblem of a star was added to the bust of Caesar that we shortly afterwards dedicated in the Forum.' This was his public utterance, but privately he rejoiced because he interpreted the comet as having been born for his own sake and containing his own birth within it; and to confess the truth it did have a health-giving influence over the world (Natural History, 2.93, 4).

2655 lackey run attending

The Kings entertainment

- Yet thus of her absent beloved do I hear her gladly and heartily speaking.
In freta dum Fluvii Current; dum montibus umbrae, Lustrabunt Convexa, Polus dum sidera pascit, Semper Honos, Nomenque tuum Laudesque manebunt.
 2670
- Virgil
- As touching those five [arches] which the city builded, the arbour in Cheapside and the temple of Janus at Temple Bar were both of them begun and finished in six weeks.
 2675 The rest were taken in hand first in March last, after his Majesty was proclaimed, upon which, at that time, they wrought till a month after St James his day following, and then gave over by reason of the sickness. At this second setting upon them, six weeks more were spent.
- 2680 The city elected sixteen committees, to whom the managing of the whole business was absolutely referred: of which number four were aldermen, the other grave commoners.
- There were also committees appointed as overseers and surveyors of the works:
 2685 Artificium Operariumque in hoc tam celebri apparatu, summa.
summa
- The city employed in the framing, building and setting up of their five arches these officers and workmen:
 2690 A clerk that attended on the committees.
 Two officers that gave summons for their meetings etc.
 A clerk of the works.
 Two master carpenters.
 2695 Painters.
- Of which number, those that gave the main direction and undertook for the whole business were only these seven.
 William Friselfield
 George Mosse
 2700 John Knight
 Paul Isacson
 Samuel Goodrick
 Richard Wood
 George Heron
 2705 Carvers 24
- Over whom Stephen Harrison, joiner, was appointed chief, who was the sole inventor of the architecture, and from whom all directions for so much as belonged to carving, joining, molding, and all other work in those five pageants of the city (painting excepted) were set down. 2710
 Joiners 80
 Carpenters 60
 Turners 6
 Labourers to them 6
 Sawyers 12 2715
 Labourers during all the time, and for the day of the Triumph 70
- Besides these there were other artificers, as plumbers, smiths, molders.
- To the Reader*
- Reader, you must understand that a regard being had that his Majesty should not be wearied with tedious speeches, a great part of those which are in this book set down were left unspoken. So that thou dost here receive them as they should have been delivered, not as they were. 2720
- FINIS. 2725
- Lectori Candido.*
- Reader, the limbs of these great triumphal bodies, lately disjointed and taken in sunder, I have thou seest (for thy sake) set in their apt and right places again, so that now they are to stand as perpetual monuments, not to be shaken in pieces or to be broken down by the malice of that envious destroyer of all things, time. Which labours of mine, if they yield thee either profit or pleasure, thou art, in requital thereof, to pay many thanks to this honourable city, whose bounty towards me, not only in making choice of me to give directions for the entire workmanship of the five triumphal arches builded by the same, but also in publishing these pieces, I do here gladly acknowledge to have been exceeding liberal. 2730
- Nor shall it be amiss in this place to give thee intelligence of some matters, by way of notes, which were not fully observed nor freely enough set down in the printed book of these triumphs, amongst which these that follow are chiefest. 2735
- His Majesty departed from the Tower between the hours of eleven and twelve, and before five had made his royal passage through the city, having a canopy borne over him by eight knights. 2745
- The first object that his Majesty's eye encountered after his entrance into London was part of the children of Christ's Church Hospital, to the number of three hundred, 2750
- 2668-70 In...manebunt While rivers run into the sea, while on the mountains shadows move over the slopes, while heaven feeds the stars, ever shall thy honour, thy praises, thy name endure.
- 2675 March last March 1603, when Elizabeth died and James was first proclaimed
- 2677 month after St James his day c.25 August
- 2678-9 second setting presumably in February and March 1604, after the entry was rescheduled
- 2686-8 Artificium...summa The directors of the workmanship and workmen in that so famous and sumptuous undertaking.
- 2726 Lectori Candido To the candid reader
- 2727 triumphal bodies the arches
- 2742-3 printed book Dekker's Magnificent Entertainment
- 2745 the Tower The royal family entered the Tower on March 12, being greeted by a Latin oration (printed in Nichols, pp. 329-332). Dugdale supplies additional detail: see Additional Passage A.
- 2751 Christ's Church Hospital A hospital established in the mid-Tudor period for the care of orphans and poor children. It normally housed around 600 children at any time and was a crucial link in the city's well-organized system of poor relief.

who were placed on a scaffold erected for that purpose in Barking Churchyard by the Tower.

2755 The way from the Tower to Temple Bar was not only sufficiently gravelled, but all the streets lying between those two places were on both sides, where the breadth would permit, railed in at the charges of the City, Paul's Churchyard excepted.

2760 The liveries of the companies, having their streamers, ensigns and bannerets spread on the tops of their rails before them, reached from the middle of Mark Lane to the pegme at Temple Bar.

2765 Two marshals were chosen for the day to clear the passage, both of them being well mounted and attended on by six men (suitably attired) to each marshal.

2770 The conduits of Cornhill, of Cheap and of Fleet Street that day ran claret wine very plentifully, which by reason of so much excellent music, that sounded forth not only from each several pegme but also from diverse other places, ran the faster and more merrily down into some bodies' bellies.

As touching the oration uttered by Sir Henry Mountague, Recorder of the City, with the gifts bestowed on the King, the Queen and the Prince (being three cups of gold), as also all such songs as were that day sung in the several arches, I refer you to the book in print where they are set down at large. 2775

And thus much you shall understand, that no manner of person whatsoever did disburse any part towards the charge of these five triumphs, but only the mere citizens, being all freemen; heretofore the charge being borne by 2780 fifteens and the Chamber of London (as may appear by ancient precedents) but now it was levied amongst the companies. The other two arches erected by merchant strangers (viz. the Italians and Dutchmen) were only their 2785 own particular charge.

The City elected sixteen committees to whom the managing of the whole business was absolutely referred, of which number four were aldermen, the other twelve commoners, viz. one out of each of the twelve companies. 2790 Other committees were also appointed as overseers and surveyors of the work. Farewell.

ADDITIONAL PASSAGES

A Dugdale's account of the events at the Tower (see ll. 2745–8):

The Tower was emptied of his prisoners, and I beheld the late Sir Walter Raleigh, the late Lord Cobham, the late Lord Gray [and] 5 Markham, with others conveyed, some to the Marshelsea, others to the gatehouse, and others appointed prisoners. The Tower itself prepared with that pomp as eye never saw, such glory in the hangings, such majesty in the ornaments of the chambers, and such necessary provision as when I beheld it I could no less than 10 say

God gives King James the place
And glory of the day,
As never king possessed like place,

That came the northern way:

And since the heavens will have it so,
What living soul dares answer no. 15

Upon the Thames the water works for his entertainment were miraculous, and the fireworks on the water passed pleasing, as a castle or fortress builded on two barges, seeming as a settled 20 fort of an island, planted with much munition of defence: and two pinnaces, ready rigged, armed likewise to assault the castle, that had you beheld the managing of that fight with onset on the castle, repulse from the castle and then the taking of it in, it was a show worthy the sight of many princes: being there placed at 25 the cost of the Cinque Ports, whereat the King all pleased made

2754 Tower to Temple Bar the route through the City of London, as far as the boundary with the Borough of Westminster on the Strand

2759 liveries of the companies ceremonial costume of the London guilds. Dugdale comments: 'the companies of London, in their liveries, placed in street double railed for them and the passengers, the whiffers they in their costly suits and chains of gold walking up and down'.

2762 pegme a stage or framework for a pageant. The Latinate word consistently used by Harrison, Dekker, and Jonson.

2766 conduits for water. Dugdale states, 'not a conduit betwixt the Tower and Westminster but ran wine, drink who will', and that near Ludgate 'the conduits dealt so plentifully both before and after he [James] was passed as many were shipped to the Isle of Sleep, that had no leisure for snorting to behold the day's triumph'.

Cornhill . . . Cheap . . . Fleet Street see map, p. 62

2772 Sir Henry Montagu nominated for the office of Recorder by James on 25 May 1603

2776 book in print Dekker's Magnificent Entertainment

2780 five the number of pageants had been increased from five to seven during the course of preparations. Harrison evidently forgot to emend his text.

2781 freemen of the guilds and City of London.

2782 fifteens a standard tax

Chamber of London the City's central treasury

2784 companies guilds. The guilds were assessed twice, for £2500 and £400.

Memorials of the Guild of Merchant Taylors of the Fraternity of St John the Baptist in the City of London (London, 1875) reproduces the original assessment list, recording payments by 298 members, ranging from £5 6s. 8d. down to 6s., for a total contribution of £320 6s. 4d.

2789–90 commoners i.e. citizens of London who were not aldermen

2790 twelve companies the twelve great guilds or companies, from whose membership the Lord Mayor and aldermen were always chosen

A.8 hangings tapestries

14 northern way from Scotland

21 pinnaces small ships

answer that their love was like the wild fire unquenchable. And I pray God it may ever be so.

Well from the Tower he came. Here cost was quite careless, desire that was fearless and content flourished in abundance: but so royally attended as if the gods had summoned a Parliament and were all in their steps of triumph to Jove's high court.

B Dekker's description of the Fenchurch arch and pageant follows on from l. 451:

His passage alongst that court offering itself for more state through seven gates, of which the first was erected at Fenchurch.

Thus presenting itself:

Fenchurch It was an upright flat-square (for it contained fifty foot in the perpendicular, and fifty foot in the groundline) the upper roof thereof (on distinct greces) bore up the true models of all the notable houses, turrets and steeples within the city. The gate under which his Majesty did pass was twelve foot wide and eighteen foot high; a postern likewise (at one side of it) being four foot wide and eight foot in height. On either side of the gate stood a great French term of stone, advanced upon wooden pedestals; two half pilasters of rustic standing over their heads. I could shoot more arrows at this mark, and teach you without the carpenter's rule how to measure all the proportions belonging to this fabric, but an excellent hand being at this instant curiously describing all the seven, and bestowing on them their fair prospective limbs, your eye shall hereafter rather be delighted in beholding those pictures, than now be wearied in looking upon mine.

The personages (as well mutes as speakers) in this pageant were these: viz.

- 1 The highest person was The Britain Monarchy.
- 2 At her feet sat Divine Wisdom.
- 3 Beneath her stood The Genius of the City, a man.
- 4 At his right hand was placed a personage, figuring The Counsel of the City.
- 5 Under all these lay a person representing Thamesis the River.

Six other persons (being daughters to Genius) were advanced above him, on a spreading ascent, of which the first was

- 1 Gladness.
- 2 The second, Veneration.
- 3 The third, Promptitude.
- 4 The fourth, Vigilance.
- 5 The fifth, Loving affection.
- 6 The sixth, Unanimity.

Of all which personages, Genius and Thamesis were the only speakers, Thamesis being presented by one of the children of Her Majesty's Revels: Genius by Master Alleyn, servant to the young Prince. His gratulatory speech

(which was delivered with excellent action, and a well-tuned audible voice) being to this effect:

That London may be proud to behold this day, and therefore in name of the Lord Mayor and aldermen, the council, commoners and multitude, the heartiest welcome is tendered to his Majesty, that ever was bestowed on any king, etc.

Which banquet being taken away with sound of music, there, ready for the purpose, his Majesty made his entrance into this his Court Royal. Under this first gate, upon the battlements of the work, in great capitals was inscribed thus:

LONDINIVM.

And under that, in a smaller (but not different) character was written,

CAMERA REGIA:

The King's Chamber.

Dugdale describes an incident during the Italians' Pageant (see ll. 866-1055):

Through [the arch] our King and his train passed, and at the corner of the street stood me one, an old man with a white beard, of the age of three score and nineteen, who had seen the change of four kings and Queens and now beheld the triumphs of the fifth, which by his report exceeded all the rest. Wherefore as hopeful never to behold the like, yet he would of his own accord do that which should show his duty and old love. That was to speak a few lines that his son had made him, which lines were to this purpose, he himself attired in green.

Peerless of honour, hear me speak a word.

Thy welcomed glory and enthroned renown

Being in peace, of earthly pomp and state

To furnish forth the beauties of thy crown.

Age thus salutes thee, with a downy pate.

Threescore and nineteen is thy servant's years,

That hath beheld thy predecessors four,

All flourishing green, whose deaths the subjects' tears,

Mingled with mine, did many times deplore:

But now again, since that our joys are five,

Five hundred welcomes I do give my King,

And may thy change, to us that be alive,

Never be known a fifth extreme to bring.

My honest heart be pattern of the rest.

Whoever prayed for them before, now thee,

Both them and thine, of all joy be possessed,

Whose lively presence we all bless to see,

And so pass on. God guide thee on thy way,

Old Hinde concludes, having no more to say.

But the narrow way and the pressing multitude so overshadowed him, and the noise of the show, that opportunity was not favourable to him, so that the King passed by. Yet noting his zeal I have publicly imprinted it, that all his fellow subjects may see this old

The waits and oboes of London

60

C

5

10

15

20

25

30

B.15 term a statue or bust atop a pillar or pedestal, from which it appears to spring 44-5 Master Alleyn Edward Alleyn (1566-1626), renowned Elizabethan actor, head of the Lord Admiral's Company, and co-owner, with his father-in-law, Philip Henslowe, of the Fortune Theatre. Alleyn retired from the stage about this time; his appearance in the pageant may have been his last as an actor. In James's reign he became a patron of poets, Dekker among them.

35 man's forwardness, who missed of his purpose by the concourse of people. Beside, the King appointed no such thing but at several stays and appointed places.

D Dugdale's account of a speech at the Conduit (see l. 1346):
Still the street stood railed and the liveries of all the companies on both sides guarding the way, and the strong stream of people violently running in the midst toward Cheapside, there 5 our triumphant rides garnished with troops of royalty and gallant personages, and passing by the great Conduit on the top thereof stood a prentice in a black coat, a flat cap servant-like, as walking before his master's shop. Now whether he spake this or no, I heard not it, but the manner of his speech was this, coming to me at the 10 third or second hand.

What lack you gentlemen? What will you buy? Silks, satins, taffetas, etc.?

But stay, bold tongue, stand at a giddy gaze;
Be dim, mine eyes. What gallant train are here
15 That strikes minds mute, and puts good wits in maze?
O 'tis our King, royal King James I say.

Pass on in peace and happy be thy way!
Live long on Earth, England's great Crown to sway!
Thy city, gracious King, admires thy fame
20 And on their knees prays for thy happy state;
Our women for thy Queen Anne, whose rich name
Is their created bliss, and sprung of late.
If women's wishes may prevail thus being,
They wish you both long lives, and good agreeing.

25 Children for children pray before they eat,
At their uprising and their lying down:
Thy sons and daughters, princely all, complete,
Royal in blood, children of high renown.

But generally together they incline,
30 Praying in one, great King, for thee and thine.

Whether he were appointed or of his own accord I know not, but howsoever forward love is acceptable, and I would the King had heard them, but the sight of the trophy at Soper Lane end made him the more forward.

E Dekker's account of the arch and pageant at Temple Bar (see l. 2218):

The building being set out thus:

5 The front or surface of it was proportioned in every respect like a temple, being dedicated to Janus, as by this inscription over the Janus head may appear:

Iano Quadrifronti Sacrum

The height of the whole edifice, from the ground line to the top, was fifty-seven foot, the full breadth of it eighteen 10 foot, the thickness of the passage twelve.

The personages that were in this temple are these:

1. The principal person, Peace.

2. By her stood Wealth.

3. Beneath the feet of Peace lay Mars (War) grovelling. 15

4. And upon her right hand (but with some little descent) was seated Quiet, the first handmaid of Peace.

5. She had lying at her feet Tumult.

6. On the other side was the second handmaid, Liberty, at whose feet lay a cat. 20

7. This person trod upon Servitude.

8. The third handmaid was Safety.

9. Beneath her was Danger.

10. The fourth attendant was, Felicity.

11. At her feet, Unhappiness. 25

Within the Temple was an Altar, to which, upon the approach of the King, a flamen appears, and to him, the former Genius of the city.

The effect of whose speech was, that whereas the flamen came to perform rites there in honour of one Anna, a 30 goddess of the Romans, the Genius vows that none shall do sacrifice there but himself, the offering that he makes being the heart of the city, etc.

Dekker's account of the pageant in the Strand (see l. 2555): F
The city of Westminster and Duchy of Lancaster, perceiving what preparation their neighbour city made to entertain her sovereign, though in greatness they could not match her, yet in greatness of love and duty they gave 5 testimony that both were equal; and in token they were so, hands and hearts went together, and in the Strand, erected up a monument of their affection.

The invention was a rainbow, the moon, sun and the seven stars, called the Pleiades, being advanced between 10 two pyramids: Electra (one of those seven hanging in the air, in figure of a comet) was the speaker, her words carrying this effect:

That as his Majesty had left the city of London happy, by delivering it from the noise of tumult, so he would 15 crown this place with the like joys, which being done, she reckons up a number of blessings that will follow upon it.

The work of this was thought upon, begun and made perfect in twelve days.

C.36 King...thing The incident reveals James's discomfort with the sort of unplanned spontaneous expressions of popular loyalty that Elizabeth had often welcomed.

THE PATIENT MAN AND THE HONEST WHORE

Edited by Paul Mulholland

THE popularity of The Patient Man and the Honest Whore in its own time renders the play exceptional in the canons of either of the collaborating playwrights. Among their dramatic works, only Dekker's Shoemakers' Holiday and Middleton's Game at Chess can lay claim to surpass the attention generated by this comedy. Its multiple editions in the space of just over thirty years, a citation of a revival by 'Her Majesty's servants with great applause' on the title-page of the 1635 edition, and Dekker's studied duplication of successful elements in his sequel very likely written close on the original play's heels, all point to a remarkable stirring of interest. A contemporary theatregoer, Edward Pudsey, apparently in the habit of jotting down memorable phrases from plays he had attended, saw fit to record in his commonplace book seventeen brief passages drawn from The Patient Man and the Honest Whore's final six scenes. Pudsey's citations range from the ribald, 'Made haste as though my looks had worked with him to give him a stool' (12.38–9), to the sententious, 'Wisely to fear is to be free from fear' (15.11), and share company with others from plays by Jonson, Marston, Chapman, Dekker, and Shakespeare.

The Patient Man and the Honest Whore was probably first performed at the Fortune Theatre some time between April (when the theatres reopened after an extended plague outbreak) and October 1604 (before the Stationers' Register entry in early November). If the allusion at 10.31–2 to relief of the siege of Ostend (11 September 1604) is not a revision, composition and early performances can be dated even more accurately. The later revival cited above presumably concerns a staging by Queen Henrietta's company at the Phoenix Theatre, although the possibility that Queen Anne's company mounted it prior to Charles I's accession, at the Phoenix or the Red Bull, cannot be ruled out. Despite the play's early theatrical success, few productions are on record since the seventeenth century. The first of these was staged with sly irony at the intimate Boulevard Theatre, part of the Raymond Revue Bar complex, in the heart of London's Soho by the Six O Six Theatre Company, 13 November to 5 December 1992. Director Gordon Anderson set the action in 1950s bohemian Soho accompanied by a jazz-blues musical score. The choice of venue, in which 'bump and grind' music occasionally intruded from next door, and its surrounding district provided a concrete context for matters raised chiefly in the Bellafront plot, a locale that could accommodate the play's diversity of characterization, and an environment that, in the director's words, helped to circumvent an overly reverential response to a Jacobean text. A second production played at Shakespeare's Globe Theatre on London's Bankside, 13 August to 18 September 1998. This adaptation by director, Jack Shepherd, and the Globe's artistic director, Mark Rylance, who also played Hippolito, compressed The Patient Man and the Honest Whore and Dekker's sequel, The Honest Whore, Part 2, into what Time Out termed a three-hour 'spare rib to Dekker's T-bone steak'. Reminiscent of its Six O Six predecessor, designer Hayden Griffin set the first part in 1950s Soho, and the second a decade later. Generally favourable reviews regularly singled out Rylance, Lilo Baur (likened by one critic to Anna Magnani) as a 'fragile, beautiful, poignant, but also tough and sexy' Bellafront, and Sonia Ritter as an embittered Infelice. Although advance publicity promised an adaptation that would eliminate the Candido plot, much of it survived. Appreciative commendations garnered by Marcello Magni (Candido) and Kathryn Pogson (Viola) vindicated retention of these scenes. In a complementary venture the Globe also presented 'staged readings' (with a different cast) of the two plays uncut on 6 and 13 September 1998. A seed sown by this editor in conversation with director/dramatist Peter Hinton some years ago seems to have germinated into a substantially adapted revival at the Ludger-Duvernay Theatre of Canada's National Theatre School, Montreal, 7–11 December 2004. This graduating-class production, styled by Hinton as 'Kill Bill meets Coronation Street', among other changes, switched the gender of the central blocking character from Duke to Duchess in a 'gritty yet noble evocation of early seventeenth-century London'. Three productions within a relatively brief time-span augur well for theatrical exposure in the future.

The title of this Dekker–Middleton collaboration underwent several alterations in the course of its early history; and editorial convention since 1840 has assigned the play the title, The Honest Whore, Part 1. Although this serves to distinguish it from its sequel, there can be little doubt that the comedy was not known as Part 1 at the time of its writing and first performance any more than other works that have generated sequels were known as Part 1 at the point of their original release, publication, or performance. By adopting The Patient Man and the Honest Whore, this edition—the first to do so—aims to recover a title that on the testimony of contemporaries had currency at or near the time of the play's original stage performance. This title restores the balance of the play, giving a unified double paradox where the editorially conventional title provides a single paradox and a consequent sense of incompleteness. Henslowe's entry concerning an advance for 'the patient man and the honest whore' in addition to providing the earliest record of the play very likely situates its main interests in the circumstances of theatrical production.

The proverbial expression cited at 2.74, 'he who cannot be angry is no man', establishes the paradoxical basis of 'the patient man' and the terms by which he is intended to match 'the honest whore'. Patience is conventionally seen as a feminine attribute, as, for example, in Dekker's Patient Grissil, and is incompatible with common conceptions of virility. In Candido the play explores the unusual and unlikely combination of patience and manhood just as in Bellafront it explores the unusual and unlikely combination of honesty and whoredom. The other male characters are more conventionally susceptible to rage. Most appear in circumstances in which they succumb to the promptings of hot blood and surrender rational control. Seen against such eruptions Candido's imperturbable patience calls in question violent, aggressive behaviour construed as a sign of manliness as well as its ideological construction in proverbial form.

At the base of the various stratagems bent on provoking Candido to anger lies a problematic of gender construction and identity. The male characters who try to rouse a choleric outburst from him seek a confirmation of his male identity in terms consonant with those they recognize in themselves. Most of the characters who strive to strike sparks of anger from Candido reveal elsewhere a capacity for aggressive sparring among themselves that sets off their impulse to locate a corresponding capacity in him. Similar interests inform Viola's actions. Her longing for an expression of anger from her husband registers her adherence to the conventional codes that define manhood and patriarchal authority within and beyond marriage. Further, Viola, in accordance with patriarchal convention, defines her own position as wife in relation to the self-definition provided by her husband. His submissive and yielding nature gives rise to domineering and imperious qualities in her. Candido's design, however, entails a redefinition of the codes of virility and of spousal relations. Bellafront too engages in a struggle to redefine the terms by which honesty is conventionally understood.

The contrasting actions of the play's title—the often farcical story of a linen-draper who weathers an escalating series of assaults calculated to move his immovable patience and the moral study of a whore's conversion to honesty—are framed by a melodramatic-romantic plot involving a villainous duke and thwarted lovers. No source has been identified for any of these actions or characters; but some isolated elements appear to derive from The Bachelor's Banquet (1603), an anonymous translation of a French work, Les Quinze joies de mariage, that in setting out women's wiles to achieve dominance in marriage self-congratulatingly promotes bachelorhood. In its exuberant accounts of wives' extra-marital sexual adventures the work's distinctly lubricious quality pitched at voyeurism is shared by erotic elements of especially the play's initial brothel scene (Sc. 6). The title of Chapter 6, 'The humour of a woman that strives to master her husband', provides a telling perspective on Viola's unacknowledged intentions. Pioratto's account of Candido's entertainment of 'certain Neapolitan lords' (4.30–47) corresponds to strategies employed by a wife who deliberately impedes attempted preparations to feast the husband's friends. And the situation of Viola's refusal to surrender the key to a chest in which Candido's gown is locked, and subsequent exchanges between Candido and George (7.196–221), may also have been prompted by material in this chapter of The Bachelor's Banquet.

Structural, figurative, and thematic parallels and other devices link the various plots and confer coherence on the play's diverse elements. Imagery, styles of language, idioms, and terms associated with one action or setting emerge in another and invite a transfer of values and attitudes. Preparatory to the main brothel scene, for example, imagery drawn from prostitution invades the linen-draper's shop as the three gallants haggle over a virgin piece of lawn in terms borrowed from procuring (5.20–45). The reverse also occurs: the courtesan Bellafront contemptuously disparages a client through reference to apparel (6.129–31), and Fluello likens her skin to satin and lawn (6.210–11). After Bellafront has renounced whoredom, Hippolito's servant keeps the trade comically in view through a range of bawdy references and by playfully impersonating a brothel door-keeper prior to her entrance disguised as a page in Scene 10. Two related threads of imagery—involving the whore's body treated as vendible merchandise or as a beast of burden for hire—run through the play. The implied moral condemnation is extended by repeated associations of whoredom with disease and the brothel and whores with damnation and hell.

A further skein of imagery centres on the relationship between body and soul. The debate between Bellafront and Hippolito is founded on this question. In his encounter with the bravoes, Crambo and Poh, Candido wishes all souls were as 'innocent white' as his cloth. And in a similar vein Fustigo's plays on 'cousin' and 'cozen' at 2.133–46 and 7.168–85 are answered in the Bellafront plot with Roger's remark to Madonna Fingerlock at 8.52.

Bellafront's conversion from whoredom to citizen values and attitudes is the first and most dramatically charged of several metamorphoses. Candido's example of patience in the face of knockabout farcical incitements and more serious assaults on his equanimity brings about a corresponding change in Viola; and in a parallel transformation, the ruthless, revenge-play Duke undergoes in the final scene an alteration of character that renders him gentle and benevolent. (Both changes are significantly connected with Bethlehem/Bedlam.) Infelice and Hippolito at different points are supposed dead and 'return' to life. At the end of Scene 10 Bellafront speaks of being 'new born' and therein articulates the thematic correlative of rebirth that accompanies her own, Hippolito's, and, at least by implication, Infelice's transformations. Changes of smaller magnitude but of a similar order occur in other characters.

The play sets individual integrity, bonds of family and friendship, generosity of spirit, and trust fostered in such relations, against forms of self-interest. Pursuit of personal advantage above concern for others—rampant in the dealings of characters in each plot—is ultimately represented as a species of madness. In addition, patience bolstered by reason, tolerance, and faith in the reforming and regenerative power of love wins the day against uncontrolled, generally self-serving, passion. As Alexander Leggatt has pointed out, the play concerns itself ‘with social structures and institutions: marriage, the family, the shop, the hospital’. Candido stands as a figure central to each. His constancy serves as a reference point marking the tides of change witnessed elsewhere; and, although at times he is made to appear foolish, his selfless patience and reason finally overcome challenges that spring from interests and factions that cut across society. Patience underpins his devotion and duty to his wife, his apprentices, and his shop, and rides out successive provocations dreamed up by Viola and others. His ‘conversion’ to a prentice in Scene 12 in a modest way parallels Bellafront’s conversion from whoredom; both characters are mistreated and suffer abuse of various kinds in the same section of the play.

Bellafront’s progress through her action partakes of most of the essential features associated with the myth of the penitent harlot observed in stories of Mary Magdalen and other figures cast in a similar mould such as Thaïs, Pelagia, and Mary of Egypt. That Middleton’s wife’s name may have been Mary Magdalen points to a range of possible connections in this regard. The version of the saint’s life current in the Middle Ages and Renaissance conflated several distinct women who figure in the Gospel accounts of Christ’s ministry—the unnamed sinner of Luke 7:39–50; Mary of Bethany, Lazarus’s sister; and the Mary Magdalen present at the Resurrection—augmented and elaborated from legend. Apart from her appearance in medieval Corpus Christi cycles, two dramatizations of events from the life of Mary Magdalen survive: the Digby saint’s play, Mary Magdalen (c.1480–1520), and Lewis Wager’s interlude, The Life and Repentance of Mary Magdalen (c.1550–66). In addition, two lost fifteenth-century plays bearing the saint’s name are known and may be supplemented by a lost Mary Magdalen Mask. In the Digby play as in The Patient Man and the Honest Whore the central female character encounters the individual who will change her life as she awaits the arrival of more clients.

Like her hallowed predecessors, Bellafront is a beautiful and much sought-after prostitute. The dramatic suddenness of her transformation from a sinful life accords precisely with the mythic pattern and, as with Mary Magdalen, Thaïs, and Pelagia, is effected by a male of exemplary moral standing. Also like the saintly models, Bellafront after her conversion renounces the temptations and material rewards of whoredom (in a song at the beginning of Scene 9 and subsequently at the asylum in Scene 15). She too undergoes a period of suffering and deprivation which may be linked to penance for her earlier transgressions. Mortification of the flesh is typically associated with the penitent whore’s life of denial and is connected with the inevitable withering of the flower of youth; although not physically represented in the play, it is featured in Hippolito’s account of a prostitute’s wretched prospects and accordingly reflects on Bellafront’s perilous state. Similarly, tales of the archetypal figures give special attention to the women’s deaths, dwelling on the ravages of time and care on their former beauty and their release from physical torment. Hippolito’s citation of the deaths of harlots in Scene 6 and his later meditations on the supposed death of Infelice accompanied by a skull as a memento mori in Scene 10 coordinate with reports of the degeneration of the body in the hagiography of the penitent whore, though his remarks do not extend so far as to register deliverance from fleshly affliction common in lives of the saints.

Thomas Coryat with Margarita Emiliana, a Venetian courtesan, from Coryat’s Crudities (1611).

The twelfth-century canonist Gratian disallowed marriage to a whore who persisted in her trade, but permitted such a marriage for the purpose of reformation. Marriage thus offered a means by which a prostitute could escape her plight, and an at least potentially more appealing and realizable alternative to the asceticism of the saints. The notion appears to underlie Tim’s ‘Uxor non est meretrix’ (a wife is not a whore) in A Chaste Maid in Cheapside. Although Erasmus in ‘Of the young man and the evil-disposed woman’ leaves his reformed prostitute in the care of ‘a faithful honest matron’, the colloquy was published in an English translation entitled A Modest Mean to Marriage. And Robert Greene in 'The Conversion of an English Courtesan', a partial reworking of the Erasmus dialogue and a possible influence on The Patient Man and the Honest Whore, marries his wayward and rebellious young woman to the young man who brings about her conversion.

Mary Magdalen's submission to carnality and subsequent repentance undoubtedly augmented her prominence and popularity. In contrast to the remote figure of purity and human perfection represented by the Virgin, the Magdalen through her fall and conversion was perceived as both more accessibly human and a reassuring comfort in offering the promise of grace to sinners. The qualities that made Mary Magdalen appealing very likely contributed potently to the popularity in its own time of the Dekker-Middleton play.

As a prostitute Bellafront pursues capitalist interests that challenge the roles normally available to women and threaten the patriarchal status quo. She has won a measure of economic and personal independence and is 'in bonds to no man' (6.310). But mercenary interests, especially on the part of panders and bawds at least as far back as Roman comedy, are generally treated as reprehensible. Roger and Bellafront's bilking of their clients of the price of a pottle of wine in Scene 6 and the haggling between Roger and Mistress Fingerlock over their respective fees in Scene 8, while entertaining, conform to the Plautine pattern. The reformed harlot makes no further reference to money in the context of competitive materialism. Misogyny, much of it directed at Bellafront, links up with a fear of women and traditional attitudes that associate women's beauty and supposed frailty with the perils and degradation of the flesh, attitudes evoked also by her saintly antecedents. From a condition of intense remorse Bellafront herself articulates the conventional position, 'Women at best are bad; make them not worse' (9.114), poignantly tempered moments later by her citation of male agency: 'You love to make us lewd, but never chaste' (9.123). Self-contempt at this point appears to resonate with the process of her adjustment to a patriarchal world which demands surrender of her independence and self-control and her submission to abuse in recompense for earlier transgressions. Although not acted upon, her intention to return to her father (10.202-4) signals her reintegration into such a world and looks forward to her embrace of the subservient role of Matteo's wife.

The opening of the first brothel scene, Scene 6, has been justly admired by Peter Ure and other critics for its wealth of suggestive realistic detail. Bellafront's skittish exchanges with Roger, her sharply observed racy denunciations, and her plangent wit constitute a freshly realized exercise in verisimilitude. This coarse, sharply etched realism shifts into a more formal, stylized mode in the process of the whore's conversion, however. Blank verse supersedes her sprightly vernacular prose and, except for her feigned 'mad' speech in Scene 15, persists to play's end. In later scenes with Roger and Mistress Fingerlock, and with the gallants, the continued high tone underscores her distance from the world she has forsaken. Bellafront's contrasting modes of speech substantially account for the problem of sustaining the illusion of continuity of character: the stereotypes of 'whore' and 'convert' upon which her two natures are founded produce discontinuous styles.

Hippolito's lecture in Scene 6, which makes of her life a case history, awakens Bellafront to the perils and the inevitable decline that await her, and succeeds in deflecting her attention from her body to her soul. His apparent invulnerability to her charms throws her off guard and thereby prepares the ground for his sermonizing in concert, ironically, with her own romantic attraction to him to have their effect. In answer, her sexual vanity leads her to interpret his cool detachment in kind as she wonders what 'blemish' he has discovered 'Eclipsing all [her] beauties' (6.494). Bellafront's transformation to honesty involves a radical change in character—a change the violence of which partakes of the kind of stylization that attends her alteration in speech. Her sudden romantic interest drives out whatever malignant forces had her in their grip, and renders her particularly susceptible to Hippolito's persuasive rhetoric; her reprise of his arguments in subsequent scenes bespeaks the depth of his influence. The precise point at which she subdues the whore that had taken possession of her effectively coincides with her application of Hippolito's sword in a gesture of suicide—in light of her romantic interest, her erstwhile profession, and her surroundings, a gesture loaded with ironically apt sexual suggestion.

Bellafront threatens a return to whoredom if Hippolito refuses to save her soul; but a hitherto unvoiced course of action springs from his spurning of her and demonstrates that her honesty was not after all in jeopardy—a revelation that in turn interrogates the intent of her threat. Further surprises are in store: in place of her declared intention to leave 'this undoing city' and return to her father, she next appears as a newly admitted inmate at Bethlehem Monastery.

Although it confers honesty on Bellafront, marriage to Matteo also heaps on her a legion of new tribulations, which Dekker explores in The Honest Whore, Part 2. While romance convention informs this match (which duplicates the conclusion of the Hippolito/Infelice action), it nevertheless carries deeper implications in its reflection of traditional attitudes: the stigma that tenaciously clings to the reclaimed whore permits a match only with a figure distinctly less appealing than her rescuer—an abiding reminder of the difficulty of successfully negotiating a move from the margins of society closer to its centre.

Once her conversion has taken hold, Bellafront's unshakable resolve and perseverance resonate with the long-suffering Candido's, especially in light of the misogyny and anti-matrimonial sentiment that rumble ominously in several characters' utterances and give some measure of her ordeal. Various critics have interpreted the suffering Bellafront endures as penance for her earlier transgressions and evidence of Dekker's conservative subscription to the prevailing morality. Placement of her transformation early in the action highlights the trials consequent upon it. In the play's closing moments Candido frames a defence of his position in terms reminiscent of Senecan stoicism (particularly as set out in Of Anger) in which he likens his patience to Christ's. Bellafront, in her Magdalen-like career, stands with the linen-draper as a model of Christian fortitude. The late association of Candido with Christ fulfils a series of hints among which is the application of the term, 'lamb', to both characters. Bellafront's transformation from 'mutton'—slang for 'whore'—to 'lamb' accordingly grafts spiritual rebirth onto the reductive view of the body.

The Bethlehem of the final scene combines the asylum of Bedlam—the first of many representations on the English stage—with the monastery from which it historically sprang; it accordingly aims to link the shelter and treatment of the insane with spiritual healing. Several of the play's central characters here experience disorientation or a violently altered frame of mind; the madhouse in part emblemizes their subjective experience. Viola's desperate final bid to satisfy her humour involves a substitution of one madness (insanity) for another (rage). Unable to stir Candido to anger, she has him committed to Bedlam presumably in the hope that an externally imposed designation will bring the wished-for madness into being and appease her longing. Bedlam is double-edged, however, and more clearly exhibits the unreason of this, as of other selfish acts. Viola's inordinate craving is matched by the Duke's irrational rejection of Hippolito. The Duke gives personal animosity rein over family and state interests (to the extent of arranging the murder of Hippolito). With Viola the question of the usurpation of male authority in the family and the shop is explored, and probes the interests of the wife as a figure normally bound within the marginal confines, set in contrast to whoredom, of woman's subordination. Substitution takes a variety of forms and operates on several levels in the play: Bellafront finally takes Matteo, her original seducer, as her husband in place of Hippolito; and in different ways dynamic character changes witnessed in Bellafront, the Duke, and Viola involve the substitution of one humour and/or set of attitudes or values for another.

The abundant references to and analogies with madness anticipate and find resolution in this final scene. Caught between his master and his mistress on a social and entrepreneurial level, George's position carries political dimensions that parallel the circumstances of those surrounding the Duke. Like George, who rebels against Viola, Doctor Benedict finally follows his own lights against the will of his would-be master and pursues instead a course sympathetic to Hippolito's interests. The Sweeper's remarks touching all manner of inmates from citizens' sons to courtiers, Puritans, whores, and merchants' wives make clear the general reference of Bedlam: 'we have blocks for all heads' (15.146). As with other plays that explore this opposition, notably The Changeling, the world of the insane stands in parodic relation to the allegedly sane world, but despite the administration of whips and punishments is more humane and tolerant. The asylum accordingly provides an appropriate setting for the settlement of transgressions of various descriptions initiated in the world at large. Candido's figure, 'the world's upside down' (12.69), carries implications for circumstances beyond his own. But however laudable and successful may be his forbearance in effecting his wife's transformation and in redefining the terms of manhood, the play shrinks in the end from whole-heartedly endorsing it as the Duke remarks in closing, 'Twere sin all women should such husbands have, | For every man must then be his wife's slave.' Although the Duke proposes to use him as an example to 'teach our court to shine', Candido's accommodation into the play world is conditional on a recognition that he is unique.

Sir Philip Sidney's hearse carried by fourteen yeomen, the corners of the pall held by four of his friends. From Thomas Lant, The Funeral Roll of Sir Philip Sidney (1587).

SEE ALSO

Music: Companion, 137
 Textual introduction and apparatus: Companion, 507
 Authorship and date: Companion, 351
 Other Middleton-Dekker works: Caesar's Fall, 328; Gravesend, 128; Meeting, 183; Magnificent, 219; Banquet, 637; Roaring Girl, 721; Gypsy, 1723

THOMAS DEKKER and THOMAS MIDDLETON

The Patient Man and the Honest Whore

[for Prince Henry's Men at The Fortune]

THE PERSONS OF THE PLAY

Gasparo Trebazzi, DUKE of Milan
 INFELICE, daughter to the Duke
 HIPPOLITO, in love with Infelice
 MATTEO, Hippolito's friend
 BELLAFRONT, the honest whore
 CASTRUCCIO }
 PIORATTO } gallants
 FLUELLO }
 SINEZI }
 DOCTOR Benedict
 CANDIDO, a linen-draper
 Viola, Candido's WIFE
 GEORGE, journeyman to Candido

FUSTIGO, brother to Candido's Wife
 TWO PRENTICES to Candido
 ROGER, servant to Bellafront
 Mistress Fingerlock, a BAWD
 CRAMBO }
 POH } bravoes
 SERVANT to Hippolito
 SERVANT to Doctor Benedict
 PORTER
 Father ANSELMO
 SWEEPER
 Three MADMEN OFFICERS, Gentlemen

Sc. 1

Enter at one door a funeral, a coronet lying on the hearse, scutcheons and garlands hanging on the sides, attended by Gasparo Trebazzi, Duke of Milan, Castruccio, Sinezi, Pioratto, Fluello, and others. At another door enter Hippolito in discontented appearance, Matteo, a gentleman, his friend, labouring to hold him back

 DUKE [seeing Hippolito]
 Behold yon comet shows his head again!
 Twice hath he thus at cross-turns thrown on us

1.0.2 scutcheons shields with armorial bearings 1 comet i.e. Hippolito; comets were regarded as ominous

 2 cross-turns presumably points in the procession's progress where its path is intersected by another and there is a change of direction; Hippolito speaks of meeting it at next turn at 1.70.

Scene 1 The humours of the patient man. The longing wyfe and the honest whore.

Prodigious looks; twice hath he troubled
The waters of our eyes. See, he's turned wild.
Go on in God's name.

5 ALL THE MOURNERS On afore there, ho.
DUKE
Kinsmen and friends, take from your manly sides
Your weapons to keep back the desp'rate boy
From doing violence to the innocent dead.

HIPPOLITO
I prithee, dear Matteo.—

MATTEO Come, you're mad.

HIPPOLITO [to Duke]
10 I do arrest thee, murderer! Set down,
Villains, set down that sorrow, 'tis all mine.

DUKE
I do beseech you all, for my blood's sake,
Send hence your milder spirits, and let wrath
Join in confederacy with your weapons' points.

15 If he proceed to vex us, let your swords
Seek out his bowels: funeral grief loathes words.

ALL THE MOURNERS
Set on.

HIPPOLITO
Set down the body!

MATTEO O my lord,
You're wrong! I'th'open street? You see she's dead.

HIPPOLITO
I know she is not dead.

DUKE Frantic young man,
20 Wilt thou believe these gentlemen?—Pray speak.—
Thou dost abuse my child, and mock'st the tears
That here are shed for her. If to behold
Those roses withered that set out her cheeks,
That pair of stars that gave her body light
25 Darkened and dim for ever, all those rivers
That fed her veins with warm and crimson streams
Frozen and dried up: if these be signs of death,
Then is she dead. Thou unreligious youth,
Art not ashamed to empty all these eyes
30 Of funeral tears—a debt due to the dead
As mirth is to the living? Sham'st thou not To have them stare on thee? Hark, thou art cursed Even to thy face, by those that scarce can speak.

HIPPOLITO
My lord—

DUKE What wouldst thou have? Is she not dead?

HIPPOLITO
35 O, you ha' killed her by your cruelty.

DUKE
Admit I had, thou kill'st her now again,

And art more savage than a barbarous Moor.

HIPPOLITO
Let me but kiss her pale and bloodless lip.

DUKE O, fie, fie, fie!

HIPPOLITO
Or if not touch her, let me look on her. 40

MATTEO
As you regard your honour—

HIPPOLITO Honour? Smoke!

MATTEO
Or if you loved her living, spare her now.

DUKE
Ay, well done, sir; you play the gentleman.
[To other Mourners] Steal hence. [To Matteo] 'Tis nobly done. [To Mourners] Away. [To Matteo] I'll join My force to yours to stop this violent torment.— 45 Pass on.

Exeunt with funeral [all but Duke, Hippolito, and Matteo]

HIPPOLITO
Matteo, thou dost wound me more.

MATTEO
I give you physic, noble friend, not wounds.

DUKE
O, well said, well done, a true gentleman!
Alack, I know the sea of lovers' rage
Comes rushing with so strong a tide it beats 50
And bears down all respects of life, of honour,
Of friends, of foes. Forget her, gallant youth.

HIPPOLITO
Forget her?

DUKE Nay, nay, be but patient,
Forwhy death's hand hath sued a strict divorce
'Twixt her and thee. What's beauty but a corpse? 55
What but fair sand-dust are earth's purest forms?
Queens' bodies are but trunks to put in worms.

MATTEO [to Duke] Speak no more sentences, my good lord, but slip hence. You see they are but fits; I'll rule him,
I warrant ye. Ay, so, tread gingerly, your grace is here 60 somewhat too long already. [Exit Duke] [Aside] 'Sblood, the jest were now, if having ta'en some knocks o'th' pate already, he should get loose again, and like a mad ox toss my new black cloaks into the kennel. I must humour his lordship.—[To him] My Lord 65
Hippolito, is it in your stomach to go to dinner?

HIPPOLITO Where is the body?

MATTEO The body, as the Duke spake very wisely, is gone to be wormed.

HIPPOLITO
70 I cannot rest; I'll meet it at next turn.

3 Prodigious ominous, portentous
23 set out adorned, set off
24 stars i.e. eyes 41 Honour? Smoke! in reference to the expression, 'smoke of honour' = vain delusions of honour
47 physic medicine

51 respects considerations
54 Forwhy because 56 sand-dust ashes, the mouldered remains of a dead body
58 sentences sententious sayings, maxims
62-3 having ta'en...already Matteo refers to his effort of restraining Hippolito.

64 black cloaks mourning garments
(metonymy for 'mourners')
65 kennel gutter
66 stomach inclination
69 wormed eaten by worms

- I'll see how my love looks.
Matteo holds him in's arms
 MATTEO How your love looks?—Worse than a scarecrow.
 Wrestle not with me: the great fellow gives the fall for a ducat.
- 75 HIPPOLITO I shall forget myself.
 MATTEO Pray, do so; leave yourself behind yourself, and go whither you will. 'Sfoot, do you long to have base rogues, that maintain a Saint Anthony's fire in their noses by nothing but twopenny ale, make ballads of 80 you? If the Duke had but so much mettle in him as is in a cobbler's awl, he would ha' been a vexed thing: he and his train had blown you up but that their powder has taken the wet of cowards. You'll bleed three pottles of alicant, by this light, if you follow 'em; and then 85 we shall have a hole made in a wrong place, to have surgeons roll thee up like a baby in swaddling clouts.
 HIPPOLITO What day is today, Matteo?
 MATTEO Yea, marry, this is an easy question; why today is—let me see—Thursday.
 90 HIPPOLITO O, Thursday.
 MATTEO Here's a coil for a dead commodity.—'Sfoot, women when they are alive are but dead commodities, for you shall have one woman lie upon many men's hands.
 95 HIPPOLITO She died on Monday then.
 MATTEO And that's the most villainous day of all the week to die in. An she was well, and ate a mess of water-gruel on Monday morning—
 HIPPOLITO Aye, it cannot be 100 Such a bright taper should burn out so soon.
 MATTEO O yes, my lord. So soon? Why I ha' known them that at dinner have been as well, and had so much health that they were glad to pledge it, yet before three o'clock have been found dead—drunk.
 HIPPOLITO
 105 On Thursday buried! And on Monday died!
 Quick haste, by'r Lady. Sure her winding sheet
- Was laid out fore her body; and the worms
 That now must feast with her were even bespoken,
 And solemnly invited like strange guests.
 MATTEO Strange feeders they are indeed, my lord, and like 110 your jester or young courtier, will enter upon any man's trencher without bidding.
 HIPPOLITO
 Cursed be that day for ever that robbed her
 Of breath, and me of bliss! Henceforth let it stand Within the wizard's book—the calendar—
 115 Marked with a marginal finger, to be chosen
 By thieves, by villains, and black murderers,
 As the best day for them to labour in.
 If henceforth this adulterous bawdy world
 Be got with child with treason, sacrilege, 120 Atheism, rapes, treacherous friendship, perjury,
 Slander (the beggar's sin), lies (sin of fools),
 Or any other damned impieties,
 On Monday let 'em be deliverèd.
 I swear to thee, Matteo, by my soul,
 125 Hereafter weekly on that day I'll glue Mine eyelids down, because they shall not gaze
 On any female cheek. And being locked up
 In my close chamber, there I'll meditate
 On nothing but my Infelice's end, 130 Or on a dead man's skull draw out mine own.
 MATTEO You'll do all these good works now every Monday because it is so bad; but I hope upon Tuesday morning
 I shall take you with a wench.
 HIPPOLITO
 If ever, whilst frail blood through my veins run, 135 On woman's beams I throw affection,
 Save her that's dead, or that I loosely fly
 To th' shore of any other wafting eye,
 Let me not prosper, heaven! I will be true
 Even to her dust and ashes. Could her tomb 140 Stand whilst I lived so long that it might rot,
 That should fall down, but she be ne'er forgot.

73-4 great fellow...ducat Matteo either alludes mockingly to himself, warning Hippolito of his prowess at wrestling, or sardonically advises him to wrestle with the Duke (instead of himself), who will overthrow him for a modest fee.
 74 ducat an Italian silver coin worth about 4s. 8d. in 1608 (with a possible pun on 'Duke')
 78 Saint Anthony's fire erysipelas, a local inflammation producing a deep red colour on skin
 80 mettle spirit (punning on the 'metal' of the cobbler's awl) 82 train (a) retinue; (b) line of gunpowder laid as a fuse but except 82-3 their...cowards i.e. the duke's dangerous power (powder = 'gunpowder') has been dampened by the urine of cowards

among his retinue
 83 pottles liquid measure (= two quarts)
 84 allicant Spanish wine from Alicante
 91 coil fuss, commotion
 92 dead commodities unsaleable merchandise, with a pun on dead commodity = dead thing, 1.91
 96 most villainous perhaps because Monday is the first day of the week; or because Monday is proverbially unlucky, as in 'Monday's child is full of woe'
 97 mess dish, portion water-gruel thin gruel made with water instead of milk
 99 Aye alas
 103 health with a pun on 'a toast drunk in a person's honour'
 105-6 Thursday...haste A lapse of several weeks between the death of a prominent aristocrat and burial of the embalmed body was not unusual at this time.

 106 by'r Lady by our Lady (an oath)
 111 enter upon (a) dispossess; (b) begin an attack on 112 trencher plate and the food it bears (metonymy for 'subsistence')
 116 marginal finger the pointing hand printed in the margins of books to draw attention to particular passages
 120 with treason by treason
 129 close private
 130 Infelice's Infelice: Italian for 'unhappy' or 'unlucky' 131 draw out (a) delineate, trace out; (b) prolong, extend 134 take catch, come upon 135 frail liable to sin
 136 beams glances 137 that if
 138 wafting guiding; signalling

145 MATTEO If you have this strange monster, honesty, in your belly, why so jig-makers and chroniclers shall pick something out of you; but an I smell not you and a bawdy house out within these ten days, let my nose be as big as an English bag-pudding. I'll follow your lordship, though it be to the place aforementioned. Exeunt

Sc. 2 Enter Fustigo in some fantastic sea-suit at one door; a Porter meets him at another

FUSTIGO How now, porter, will she come?
 PORTER If I may trust a woman, sir, she will come.
 FUSTIGO [giving money] There's for thy pains. God-a-mercy, if ever I stand in need of a wench that will come with a wet finger, porter, thou shalt earn my money before any clarissimo in Milan. Yet, so God sa' me, she's mine own sister, body and soul, as I am a Christian gentleman. Farewell, I'll ponder till she come. Thou hast been no bawd in fetching this woman, I assure thee.

10 PORTER No matter if I had, sir; better men than porters are bawds.
 FUSTIGO O God, sir, many that have borne offices. But porter, art sure thou went'st into a true house?
 PORTER I think so, for I met with no thieves.

15 FUSTIGO Nay, but art sure it was my sister Viola?
 PORTER I am sure by all superscriptions it was the party you ciphered.
 FUSTIGO Not very tall?
 PORTER Nor very low—a middling woman.

20 FUSTIGO 'Twas she, faith, 'twas she; a pretty plump cheek like mine?
 PORTER At a blush, a little very much like you.
 FUSTIGO Gods-so, I would not for a ducat she had kicked up her heels, for I ha' spent an abomination this voyage—marry, I did it amongst sailors and gentlemen.— [Giving money] There's a little modicum more, porter, for making thee stay; farewell, honest porter.

25 PORTER I am in your debt, sir; God preserve you.
 FUSTIGO Not so, neither, good porter. Exit [Porter]

Enter Viola, Candido's Wife
 God's lid, yonder she comes.— [To her] Sister Viola, I am glad to see you stirring. It's news to have me here, is't not, sister?
 WIFE Yes, trust me. I wondered who should be so bold to send for me. You are welcome to Milan, brother.
 FUSTIGO Troth, sister, I heard you were married to a very rich chuff, and I was very sorry for it that I had no better clothes, and that made me send; for you know we Milaners love to strut upon Spanish leather. And how does all our friends?
 WIFE Very well. You ha' travelled enough now, I trow, to sow your wild oats.
 FUSTIGO A pox on 'em!—Wild oats? I ha' not an oat to throw at a horse. Troth, sister, I ha' sowed my oats, and reaped two hundred ducats if I had 'em here. Marry, I must entreat you to lend me some thirty or forty till the ship come. By this hand, I'll discharge at my day, by this hand.
 WIFE These are your old oaths.
 FUSTIGO Why, sister, do you think I'll forswear my hand?
 WIFE Well, well, you shall have them. Put yourself into better fashion, because I must employ you in a serious matter.
 FUSTIGO I'll sweat like a horse if I like the matter.
 WIFE You ha' cast off all your old swaggering humours?
 FUSTIGO I had not sailed a league in that great fish-pond, the sea, but I cast up my very gall.
 WIFE I am the more sorry, for I must employ a true swaggerer.
 FUSTIGO Nay, by this iron, sister, they shall find I am powder and touch-box if they put fire once into me.
 WIFE Then lend me your ears.
 FUSTIGO Mine ears are yours, dear sister.
 WIFE I am married to a man that has wealth enough, and wit enough.
 FUSTIGO A linen-draper, I was told, sister.

143 honesty chastity
 144 jig-makers ballad-writers
 147 bag-pudding a haggis-like pudding made from an animal's stomach stuffed and boiled
 2.0.1 Fustigo from the Italian fustigone, a fumbler, a propper; a close-prying fellow; a clumsy fellow
 2 come with a pun on the bawdy sense, 'reach orgasm'
 3 God-a-mercy God have mercy (i.e. God reward you), an expression of thanks
 4-5 with a wet finger easily, with little effort; without hesitation, readily. Underlying sexual innuendo suggests digital stimulation; or perhaps finger is a e-phemism for 'penis'. The phrase may derive from a licked finger used to facilitate page-turning; here it may denote a finger moistened as a 'come-on'.

 6 clarissimo Italian grandee sa' save
 13 a true house He seems to mean, 'the right house'; but the Porter understands true in the sense 'honest'.
 22 blush glance (punning on a blush of the cheek)
 23 Gods-so a corruption either of the oath, 'by God's soul', or of cazzo, Italian slang for 'penis'
 23-4 kicked up her heels died (proverbial: Tilley H392)

24 abomination disgusting amount
 30 God's lid 'by God's (eye-)lid' (a common oath)
 36 chuff (a) miser; (b) with a possible reference to 'chough', a small, chattering member of the crow family
 38 Spanish leather highly valued and commonly associated with effeminate opulence
 46 discharge repay (punning on the sense, 'unload', in reference to ship)
 53 matter with a sexual pun
 59 iron sword
 60 touch-box box for carrying touch (priming powder) used in fire-arms
 61 lend...ears proverbial (Tilley E18)

WIFE Very true, a grave citizen; I want nothing that a wife can wish from a husband. But here's the spite: he has not all things belonging to a man.

FUSTIGO God's my life, he's a very mandrake, or else, God bless us, one o' these whiblins—and that's worse—and then all the children that he gets lawfully of your body, sister, are bastards by a statute.

WIFE O, you run over me too fast, brother. I have heard it often said that he who cannot be angry is no man.

FUSTIGO 'Slid, would he had been at sea with us, he should ha' been moved and moved again, for I'll be sworn, la, our drunken ship reeled like a Dutchman.

WIFE No loss of goods can increase in him a wrinkle, no crabbed language make his countenance sour, the stubbornness of no servant shake him; he has no more gall in him than a dove, no more sting than an ant. Musician will he never be—yet I find much music in him—but he loves no frets; and is so free from anger that many times I am ready to bite off my tongue because it wants that virtue which all women's tongues have—to anger their husbands. Brother, mine can by no thunder turn him into a sharpness.

FUSTIGO Belike his blood, sister, is well brewed then.

WIFE I protest to thee, Fustigo, I love him most affectionately, but—I know not; I ha' such a tickling within me, such a strange longing; nay, verily I do long.

FUSTIGO Then you're with child, sister, by all signs and tokens; nay, I am partly a physician, and partly something else. I ha' read Albertus Magnus, and Aristotle's Emblems.

WIFE You're wide o'th' bow-hand still, brother; my longings are not wanton, but wayward. I long to have my patient husband eat up a whole porcupine, to the intent the bristling quills may stick about his lips like a Flemish mustachio, and be shot at me; I shall be leaner than the new moon, unless I can make him horn-mad.

FUSTIGO 'Sfoot, half a quarter of an hour does that: make him a cuckold.

WIFE Puh, he would count such a cut no unkindness.

FUSTIGO The honest citizen he. Then make him drunk and cut off his beard.

WIFE Fie, fie; idle, idle! He's no Frenchman to fret at the loss of a little scald hair. No, brother, thus it shall be—you must be secret.

FUSTIGO As your midwife, I protest, sister, or a barber-surgeon.

WIFE Repair to the Tortoise here in St Christopher's Street; I will send you money; turn yourself into a brave man: instead of the arms of your mistress, let your sword and your military scarf hang about your neck.

FUSTIGO I must have a great horseman's French feather too, sister.

WIFE O, by any means, to show your light head, else your hat will sit like a coxcomb. To be brief, you must be in all points a most terrible, wide-mouthed swaggerer.

FUSTIGO Nay, for swaggering points let me alone.

WIFE Resort then to our shop, and in my husband's presence kiss me, snatch rings, jewels, or anything—so you give it back again, brother, in secret.

66 want lack
 68 things with an inevitable but presumably unintended sexual pun
 69 God's my life God save my life mandrake Although famed as an aphrodisiac and associated with sexual potency, the dominant sense here is apparently a 'bugger' or 'sodomite', i.e. a homosexual (Daalder and Moore).
 70 whiblins cheaters or double-dealers: i.e. bigamists (Daalder and Moore)
 71 gets begets
 72 bastards by a statute in reference to the Bigamy Act of 1603, which protected the interests of children by a previous marriage. If Candido were discovered to have had children by an earlier, unknown marriage, Viola's children, hitherto thought to have been begotten lawfully, would be disinherited. This consequence explains why Fustigo considers a whiblin worse than a mandrake (Daalder and Moore).
 73 run over read, interpret
 74 he... no man proverbial (Tilley M172)
 75 man in print exemplary man (as might be depicted in a book; proverbial: Tilley M239) 76 save except

78 la exclamation, used here to introduce or call attention to an emphatic statement
 79 Dutchman commonly associated with drunkenness
 82-3 no more gall... than a dove proverbial (Tilley D574)
 85 frets a common pun on (a) the metal bars on the necks of guitars and similar instruments; and (b) vexations
 90 brewed diluted
 92 tickling craving
 95-6 something else Fustigo evades the anticipated 'fool' familiar from the proverbial 'Every man is either a fool or a physician to himself' (Tilley M125).
 96-7 Albertus Magnus... Aristotle's Emblems authorities commonly cited by pretenders to knowledge. Fustigo presumably refers to the work on the secrets of women, Secreta Mulierum, by Albertus Magnus; Emblems is his ignorant error for Problems, a work ascribed to Aristotle and published in an English translation in 1595.
 98 wide o'th' bow-hand far from the mark (literally, on the left or bow-hand side; proverbial: Tilley B567) 102-3 leaner than the new moon presumably because her longing so obsesses her that she has no appetite

 103 horn-mad mad with rage (with a play on the horns of the new moon); the term's occasional association with cuckoldry prompts Fustigo's response 106 cut with a sexual pun on 'cunt'
 110 scald 'scabby' or 'scurvy', contemptuous and suggesting a symptom of venereal disease (associated with the French)
 112-13 midwife... barber-surgeon in allusion to the popular perception of midwives and barbers as purveyors of news and gossip 114 Repair go St Christopher's Street Although Milan is the nominal setting, this name may derive from Christopher Street, London, running between Finsbury Square and Clifton Street.
 115 brave finely arrayed
 118-20 feather... head Fustigo wants a feather as a token of bravado; but Viola regards a feather as a mark of a fool.
 121 coxcomb fool's cap
 122 swaggerer quarreller
 123 let me alone leave it to me

FUSTIGO By this hand, sister.
 WIFE Swear as if you came but new from knighting.
 FUSTIGO Nay, I'll swear after four hundred a year.
 130 WIFE Swagger worse than a lieutenant among freshwater soldiers, call me your love, your ingle, your cousin, or so, but 'sister' at no hand.
 FUSTIGO No, no, it shall be 'cousin', or rather 'coz'—that's the gulling word between the citizens' wives and their 135 madcaps that man 'em to the Garden; to call you one o'my naunts, sister, were as good as call you arrant whore. No, no, let me alone to cousin you rarely.
 WIFE He's heard I have a brother, but never saw him;
 therefore put on a good face.
 140 FUSTIGO The best in Milan, I warrant.
 WIFE Take up wares, but pay nothing; rifle my bosom, my pocket, my purse, the boxes, for money to dice withal;
 but, brother, you must give all back again in secret.
 FUSTIGO By this welkin that here roars I will, or else let me 145 never know what a secret is. Why, sister, do you think I'll cony-catch you, when you are my cousin? God's my life, then I were a stark ass. If I fret not his guts, beg me for a fool.
 WIFE Be circumspect, and do so then. Farewell.
 150 FUSTIGO The Tortoise, sister, I'll stay there. Forty ducats!
 WIFE
 Thither I'll send. Exit [Fustigo]
 —This law can none deny,
 Women must have their longings, or they die. Exit

Sc. 3

Enter Gasparo the Duke, Doctor Benedict, two Servants

DUKE [to Servants]
 Give charge that none do enter; lock the doors;
 And fellows, what your eyes and ears receive,
 Upon your lives trust not the gadding air
 To carry the least part of it. [To Doctor] The glass,
 The hour-glass.
 DOCTOR Here my lord.
 5 DUKE Ah, 'tis near spent.

But Doctor Benedict, does your art speak truth?
 Art sure the soporiferous stream will ebb,
 And leave the crystal banks of her white body
 Pure as they were at first, just at the hour?
 DOCTOR
 Just at the hour, my lord.
 DUKE Uncurtain her. 10
 [The Servants draw back curtains, revealing Infelice, as dead]
 Softly! See, doctor, what a coldish heat Spreads over all her body.
 DOCTOR Now it works.
 The vital spirits that by a sleepy charm
 Were bound up fast and threw an icy crust
 On her exterior parts now 'gin to break. 15
 Trouble her not, my lord.
 DUKE [to Servants] Some stools!—[To Doctor] You called For music, did you not? [Music sounds] O ho, it speaks,
 It speaks! Watch, sirs, her waking; note those sands.—
 Doctor, sit down. A dukedom that should weigh Mine own down twice, being put into one scale, 20
 And that fond desperate boy, Hippolito,
 Making the weight up, should not at my hands
 Buy her i'th' t'other, were her state more light
 Than hers who makes a dowry up with alms.
 Doctor, I'll starve her on the Apennine 25
 Ere he shall marry her. I must confess Hippolito is nobly born; a man—
 Did not mine enemy's blood boil in his veins—
 Whom I would court to be my son-in-law.
 But princes whose high spleens for empery swell 30
 Are not with easy art made parallel.
 SECOND SERVANT
 She wakes, my lord.
 DUKE Look, Doctor Benedict.—
 I charge you on your lives, maintain for truth
 Whate'er the doctor or myself aver;

128 new from knighting alluding to James I's profuse creation of knights 129 after four hundred a year i.e. in the manner of one of such an income 130 freshwater untrained; unskilled 131 ingle minion, bosom friend
 132 at no hand on no account
 133-6 cousin... naunts terms commonly used for convenience in illicit romantic or sexual dealings; my naunts = mine aunts ('aunt' regularly carried the sense 'bawd' or 'whore') 135 man escort
the Garden the Bear Garden or Paris Garden, on the Bankside in Southwark 137 cousin a pun on 'cozen' = cheat
 141 rifle plunder, rob
 144 welkin sky, in allusion to the vault of the heavens above the stage welkin... roars Although the reference suggests the possibility of an accompanying sound effect of thunder, the oath is more likely an instance of Fustigo's swaggering, and the roaring its echo or that of his laughter from the heavens over the stage.

 146 cony-catch cheat
 147 fret not his guts do not vex him deeply (recalls 2.85, adding guts as in musical strings)
 147-8 beg me for a fool take me for a fool (proverbial: Tilley F496); originally in reference to the practice of petitioning the Court of Wards for custody of wealthy idiots whose inheritance fell to the disposition of their guardians
 152 Women... longings proverbial (Tilley W723)
 3.7 soporiferous sleep-inducing
 8 crystal conventionally associated with purity

10 Uncurtain her The Duke calls for the drawing of a curtain which has concealed the still-sleeping Infelice from view in a discovery space.
 19-24 A dukedom... alms The Duke proclaims his high valuation of his daughter and low appraisal of Hippolito: even if Hippolito's worth were added to twice the value of his dukedom in one scale, the total would in his estimate be insufficient to purchase Infelice endowed with an estate poorer than a pauper's in the other.
 21 fond foolish, mad
 24 hers... alms i.e. a beggar's
 25 Apennine the chain of mountains running down the centre of Italy 30 high spleens resolute spirits or minds empery absolute dominion
 31 made parallel equalled, made to conform

- 35 For you shall bear her hence to Bergamo.
 INFELICE [awakening]
 O God, what fearful dreams?
 DOCTOR Lady.
 INFELICE Ha!
 DUKE Girl.
 Why, Infelice, how is't now, ha? Speak.
 INFELICE
 I'm well—What makes this doctor here?—I'm well.
 DUKE
 Thou wert not so even now; sickness' pale hand
 40 Laid hold on thee even in the midst of feasting;
 And when a cup crowned with thy lover's health
 Had touched thy lips, a sensible cold dew
 Stood on thy cheeks, as if that death had wept
 To see such beauty alter.
 INFELICE I remember
 45 I sat at banquet, but felt no such change.
 DUKE
 Thou hast forgot, then, how a messenger
 Came wildly in with this unsavoury news:
 That he was dead?
 INFELICE What messenger? Who's dead?
 DUKE
 Hippolito. Alack, wring not thy hands.
 INFELICE
 50 I saw no messenger, heard no such news.
 DOCTOR
 Trust me, you did, sweet lady.
 DUKE La, you now!
 BOTH SERVANTS
 Yes, indeed, madam.
 DUKE La, you now!
 [Aside to Servants] 'Tis well, good knaves!
 INFELICE
 You ha' slain him, and now you'll murder me.
 DUKE
 55 Good Infelice, vex not thus thyself;
 Of this the bad report before did strike
 So coldly to thy heart that the swift currents
 Of life were all frozen up—
 INFELICE It is untrue;
 'Tis most untrue, O most unnatural father!
 DUKE
 And we had much to do by art's best cunning
 To fetch life back again.
 60 DOCTOR Most certain, lady.
 DUKE [to Infelice]
 Why, la, you now, you'll not believe me?—Friends, Sweat we not all? Had we not much to do?
 SECOND SERVANT Yes, indeed, my lord, much.
- DUKE
 Death drew such fearful pictures in thy face
 That were Hippolito alive again,
 65 I'd kneel and woo the noble gentleman
 To be thy husband. Now I sore repent
 My sharpness to him and his family.
 Nay, do not weep for him; we all must die.—
 Doctor, this place where she so oft hath seen
 His lively presence hurts her, does it not?
 70 DOCTOR
 Doubtless, my lord, it does.
 DUKE It does, it does.
 Therefore, sweet girl, thou shalt to Bergamo.
 INFELICE
 Even where you will; in any place there's woe.
 DUKE
 A coach is ready. Bergamo doth stand
 75 In a most wholesome air; sweet walks, there's deer—
 Ay, thou shalt hunt and send us venison,
 Which, like some goddess in the Cyprian groves, Thine own fair hand shall strike.—Sirs, you shall teach her
 To stand, and how to shoot; ay, she shall hunt.—
 80 Cast off this sorrow. In, girl, and prepare
 This night to ride away to Bergamo.
 INFELICE
 O most unhappy maid. Exit
 DUKE [to Servants] Follow her close.
 No words that she was buried, on your lives,
 Or that her ghost walks now after she's dead.
 85 I'll hang you if you name a funeral.
 FIRST SERVANT
 I'll speak Greek, my lord, ere I speak that deadly word.
 SECOND SERVANT
 And I'll speak Welsh, which is harder than Greek.
 DUKE
 Away, look to her. Exeunt [Servants]
 Doctor Benedict,
 90 Did you observe how her complexion altered
 Upon his name and death? O, would 'twere true.
 DOCTOR
 It may, my lord.
 DUKE May? How? I wish his death.
 DOCTOR
 And you may have your wish; say but the word,
 And 'tis a strong spell to rip up his grave.
 95 I have good knowledge with Hippolito;
 He calls me friend. I'll creep into his bosom
 And sting him there to death; poison can do't.

35 Bergamo the capital of the province of this name in northern Italy, 30 miles north-east of Milan

38 makes does

42 sensible perceptible

62 Sweat we not all did we not all suffer severely

69 we all must die proverbial (Tilley M505)

77–8 hunt . . . groves a curious collocation of Venus, who is associated with Cyprus, and Diana, goddess of the hunt

87 Greek i.e. unintelligibly (proverbial: Tilley

G439)

94 rip up dig

95 good knowledge considerable intimacy

96 creep into his bosom work my way into his confidence (proverbial: Tilley B546)

Scene 3 The humours of the patient man. The longing wyfe and the honest whore.

DUKE
Perform it; I'll create thee half mine heir.
DOCTOR
It shall be done, although the fact be foul.
DUKE
100 Greatness hides sin. The guilt upon my soul! Exeunt

Sc. 4 Enter Castruccio, Pioratto, and Fluello
CASTRUCCIO Signor Pioratto, Signor Fluello, shall's be merry? Shall's play the wags now?
FLUELLO Ay, anything that may beget the child of laughter.
CASTRUCCIO Truth, I have a pretty sportive conceit new crept into my brain will move excellent mirth.
5 PIORATTO Let's ha't, let's ha't; and where shall the scene of mirth lie?
CASTRUCCIO At Signor Candido's house, the patient man, nay, the monstrous patient man. They say his blood is immovable, that he has taken all patience from a man, and all constancy from a woman.
10 FLUELLO That makes so many whores nowadays.
CASTRUCCIO Ay, and so many knaves too.
PIORATTO Well, sir?
15 CASTRUCCIO To conclude, the report goes he's so mild, so affable, so suffering, that nothing indeed can move him. Now do but think what sport it will be to make this fellow, the mirror of patience, as angry, as vexed, and as mad as an English cuckold.
20 FLUELLO O, 'twere admirable mirth, that; but how will't be done, signor?
CASTRUCCIO Let me alone, I have a trick, a conceit, a thing, a device, will sting him, i'faith, if he have but a thimbleful of blood in's belly, or a spleen not so big as a tavern token.
25 PIORATTO Thou stir him? Thou move him? Thou anger him? Alas, I know his approved temper. Thou vex him? Why, he has a patience above man's injuries; thou mayst sooner raise a spleen in an angel than rough humour in him. Why, I'll give you instance for it.
30 This wonderfully tempered Signor Candido upon a time invited home to his house certain Neapolitan lords of curious taste and no mean palates, conjuring his wife, of all loves, to prepare cheer fitting for such honourable trencher-men. She—just of a woman's nature, covetous to try the uttermost of vexation, and thinking at last to get the start of his humour—willingly neglected the preparation, and became unfurnished, not only of dainty, but of ordinary dishes. He, according to the mildness of his breast, entertained the lords, and with courtly discourse beguiled the time, as much as a citizen might do. To conclude, they were hungry lords, for there came no meat in; their stomachs were plainly gulled, and their teeth deluded, and, if anger could have seized a man, there was matter enough i'faith to vex any citizen in the world! If he were not too much made a fool by his wife!

40 FLUELLO Ay, I'll swear for't. 'Sfoot, had it been my case, I should ha' played mad tricks with my wife and family. First I would ha' spitted the men, stewed the maids, and baked the mistress, and so served them in.
50 PIORATTO
Why 'twould ha' tempted any blood but his.—
And thou to vex him? Thou to anger him
With some poor shallow jest?
CASTRUCCIO 'Sblood, Signor Pioratto—you that disparage my conceit—I'll wage a hundred ducats upon the head on't, that it moves him, frets him, and galls him.
55 PIORATTO Done, 'tis a lay: join golls on't [shaking hands with Castruccio].—Witness, Signor Fluello.
[Fluello shakes hands with them]
CASTRUCCIO Witness; 'tis done:
60 Come, follow me; the house is not far off.
I'll thrust him from his humour, vex his breast,
And win a hundred ducats by one jest. Exeunt

Enter [Viola,] Candido's Wife; [she discovers] George, and two Prentices in the shop

Sc. 5

WIFE Come, you put up your wares in good order here, do you not, think you? One piece cast this way, another that way! You had need have a patient master indeed.
GEORGE [aside] Ay, I'll be sworn, for we have a curst mistress.
5 WIFE You mumble? Do you mumble? I would your master or I could be a note more angry: for two patient folks

99 fact deed, crime
4.0.1 Castruccio The term in Tuscan dialect means 'pig-sty'; but the name may be associated with the Italian, strucio, ostrich—possibly intended to emblemize the character's ostentatious dress (an additional play on 'castrated' is possible).
1 shall's i.e. shall us = shall we 9 blood disposition, temper
12 That i.e. the loss of constancy
18 mirror paragon
22 conceit idea
24 spleen regarded as the seat of anger
25 tavern token small copper or brass piece circulated within a tavern or eating house as small change

27 approved tried, tested
33 curious delicate, fastidious
34 of all loves for love's sake
35 trencher-men feeders, eaters; trencher may mean 'knife' or 'plate' 37 get the start of gain superiority over humour disposition, temperament willingly wilfully 43 meat food
50 spitted thrust through with a spit; stabbed stewed with a sexual pun derived from stews = brothel 51 baked possibly carrying the innuendo, 'made pregnant' served them in dished them up (possibly with the sexual innuendo, 'sexually penetrated them') 56 upon the head rashly, precipitately 58 lay bet

golls hands (a cant term)
59 Witness bear witness
5.0.1-2 Enter...shop Candido's Wife presumably enters from a stage door and proceeds to initiate the 'opening up' of the shop in the discovery space; merchandise associated with the draper's trade would likely be set in view.
4 curst perversely disagreeable or cross, shrewish
7 note sign, token

in a house spoil all the servants that ever shall come under them.

10 FIRST PRENTICE [aside] You patient! Ay, so is the devil when he is horn-mad.

Enter Castruccio, Fluello, and Pioratto

ALL THREE IN THE SHOP Gentlemen, what do you lack? What is't you buy? See fine hollands, fine cambrics, fine lawns.

15 GEORGE What is't you lack?
SECOND PRENTICE What is't you buy?
CASTRUCCIO Where's Signor Candido, thy master?
GEORGE Faith, signor, he's a little negotiated; he'll appear presently.

20 CASTRUCCIO Fellow, let's see a lawn, a choice one, sirrah.
GEORGE The best in all Milan, gentlemen, and this is the piece. I can fit you gentlemen with fine calicoes, too, for doublets, the only sweet fashion now, most delicate and courtly, a meek, gentle calico, cut upon two double affable taffetas—ah, most neat, feat, and unmatchable.

25 FLUELLO A notable voluble-tongued villain.
PIORATTO I warrant this fellow was never begot without much prating. [George presents the cloth]
CASTRUCCIO What, and is this she, sayst thou?

30 GEORGE Ay, and the purest she that ever you fingered since you were a gentleman. Look how even she is, look how clean she is, ha!—as even as the brow of Cynthia, and as clean as your sons and heirs when they ha' spent all.

35 CASTRUCCIO Puh, thou talk'st—pox on't, 'tis rough.
GEORGE How? Is she rough? But if you bid pox on't, sir, 'twill take away the roughness presently.
FLUELLO Ha, signor, has he fitted your French curse?
GEORGE Look you, gentleman, here's another. Compare

40 them, I pray, compara Virgilium cum Homero: compare virgins with harlots.
CASTRUCCIO Puh, I ha' seen better, and as you term them, evener and cleaner.
GEORGE You may see further for your mind, but trust me,

45 you shall not find better for your body.
Enter Candido
CASTRUCCIO [aside to Gallants]
O, here he comes; let's make as though we pass.—
[Aloud] Come, come, we'll try in some other shop.
CANDIDO How now? What's the matter?

GEORGE The gentlemen find fault with this lawn, fall out with it, and without a cause, too.

CANDIDO Without a cause!
And that makes you to let 'em pass away!—
Ah, may I crave a word with you, gentlemen?

FLUELLO
He calls us.

CASTRUCCIO
Makes the better for the jest.

CANDIDO
I pray come near; you're very welcome, gallants. Pray pardon my man's rudeness, for I fear me He's talked above a prentice with you.—Lawns! Look you, kind gentlemen; this—no—ay, this—
Take this upon my honest-dealing faith
To be a true weave, not too hard nor slack,
But e'en as far from falsehood as from black.

CASTRUCCIO Well, how do you rate it?
CANDIDO Very conscionably, eighteen shillings a yard.
CASTRUCCIO That's too dear. How many yards does the whole piece contain, think you?

65 CANDIDO Why, some seventeen yards, I think, or thereabouts. How much would serve your turn, I pray?
CASTRUCCIO Why, let me see—would it were better, too—
CANDIDO Truth, 'tis the best in Milan, at few words.
CASTRUCCIO Well, let me have then—a whole pennyworth.

70 CANDIDO Ha, ha! You're a merry gentleman.
CASTRUCCIO A penn'orth, I say.
CANDIDO Of lawn?
CASTRUCCIO Of lawn, ay, of lawn, a penn'orth. 'Sblood, dost not hear? A whole penn'orth. Are you deaf?

75 CANDIDO
Deaf? No, sir; but I must tell you,
Our wares do seldom meet such customers.
CASTRUCCIO Nay, an you and your lawns be so squeamish, fare you well. [Offering to leave] CANDIDO Pray stay; a word, pray, signor. For what purpose is it, I beseech you?

80 CASTRUCCIO 'Sblood, what's that to you? I'll have a pennyworth.
CANDIDO A pennyworth! Why you shall: I'll serve you presently.

85 SECOND PRENTICE 'Sfoot, a pennyworth, mistress!

11 horn-mad mad with rage (with a quibble on the devil's horns)
13–16 What... buy? traditional street cries
18 negotiated engaged
21 best... Milan Milan was famous for ribbons, hats, lace and other items of haberdashery. The nominal setting in Milan which bears unmistakable features of London may be designed to play off 'the best on sale in town' against 'the finest imports'.
22 piece playing on the sense 'woman' or 'girl' (picked up by Castruccio at 5.29) calicoes cotton cloths imported from the East

23 doublets close-fitting body-garments, with or without sleeves, worn by men 25 affable presumably, 'supple' feat neat, trim
32, 33 clean pure, clear of obstructions; with a pun on the sense 'stripped of money' in 5.33
32 Cynthia Diana, maiden goddess of chastity
36–7 bid pox... roughness in reference to an effect of venereal disease (causing hair to fall out)

38 fitted applied, inserted (an image from venereal disease)
French Syphilis, or the pox, was known as the French disease.
40 compara... Homero compare Virgil with Homer (Latin); adapted from William Lily's Latin Grammar, Part 2, sig. E8
44 for your mind according to your taste or liking
61 black The traditional whiteness of the best lawns (5.57) is contrasted with its opposite.
85 presently immediately

Scene 5 The humours of the patient man. The longing wyfe and the honest whore.

WIFE
A pennyworth! Call you these gentlemen?
CASTRUCCIO [directing Candido]
No, no, not there.
CANDIDO What then, kind gentleman?
What, at this corner here?
CASTRUCCIO No, nor there neither;
90 I'll have it just in the middle, or else not.
CANDIDO
Just in the middle!—Ha!—You shall too. What,
Have you a single penny?
CASTRUCCIO Yes, here's one.
CANDIDO
Lend it me, I pray.
FLUELLO An exc'cellent-followed jest.
WIFE
What, will he spoil the lawn now?
CANDIDO Patience, good wife.
[Candido starts to cut the cloth]
WIFE
95 Ay, that patience makes a fool of you.—Gentlemen,
You might ha' found some other citizen
To have made a kind gull on besides my husband.
CANDIDO
Pray, gentlemen, take her to be a woman;
Do not regard her language.—[To Wife] O kind soul,
100 Such words will drive away my customers.
WIFE Customers with a murrain! Call you these customers?
CANDIDO Patience, good wife.
WIFE Pox o'your patience.
105 GEORGE 'Sfoot, mistress, I warrant these are some cheating companions.
CANDIDO
Look you, gentleman, there's your ware. I thank you;
I have your money here. Pray know my shop;
Pray, let me have your custom.
110 WIFE Custom, quoth 'a!
CANDIDO Let me take more of your money.
WIFE You had need so.
PIORATTO [aside to Castruccio]
Hark in thine ear: thou'st lost an hundred ducats.
CASTRUCCIO [aside to Pioratto]
115 Well, well, I know't. Is't possible that homo
Should be nor man nor woman? Not once moved?
No, not at such an injury, not at all!

Sure he's a pigeon, for he has no gall.
FLUELLO [to Candido]
Come, come, you're angry, though you smother it:
You're vexed, i'faith—confess.
CANDIDO Why, gentlemen,
Should you conceit me to be vexed or moved? 120
He has my ware, I have his money for't,
And that's no argument I am angry; no,
The best logician cannot prove me so.
FLUELLO
O, but the hateful name of a pennyworth of lawn,
And then cut out i'th'middle of the piece! 125
Pah, I guess it by myself: 'twould move a lamb—
Were he a linen-draper, 'twould, i'faith.
CANDIDO
Well, give me leave to answer you for that.
We are set here to please all customers,
Their humours and their fancies, offend none; 130
We get by many, if we leese by one.
Maybe his mind stood to no more than that;
A penn'orth serves him; and 'mongst trades 'tis found,
Deny a penn'orth, it may cross a pound.
O, he that means to thrive with patient eye 135
Must please the devil if he come to buy.
FLUELLO
O wondrous man, patient 'bove wrong or woe!
How blest were men, if women could be so.
CANDIDO
And to express how well my breast is pleased,
And satisfied in all—George, fill a beaker— 140
Exit George
I'll drink unto that gentleman who lately
Bestowed his money with me.
WIFE God's my life,
We shall have all our gains drunk out in beakers,
To make amends for pennyworths of lawn.
Enter George [with a beaker of wine]
CANDIDO
Here, wife, begin you to the gentleman. 145
WIFE
I begin to him?
[She spills the wine]
CANDIDO George, fill't up again.—
'Twas my fault, my hand shook.
Exit George [with the beaker]

93 Lend it me, I pray i.e. to cut a piece of cloth the size of a coin
97 gull fool, simpleton
101 murrain plague
106 companions fellows
114–15 homo...woman Although normally masculine, the Latin 'homo' ('man' or 'human being'), depending on its reference, could also be feminine in gender.

117 pigeon...gall proverbial (Tilley D574)
120 conceit imagine
126 Pah exclamation of disgust
126–7 I guess...linen-draper Fluello registers his admiration of Candido's patience: he reckons that his provocation would have angered a linen-draper as mildly disposed as a lamb.

126 by myself i.e. by my example
131 leese lose
132 stood to was resolutely fixed on (i.e.
Candido's loss in this transaction)
134 cross thwart, prevent 140 beaker large open cup or goblet
145 begin i.e. drinking

PIORATTO How strangely this doth show!
 A patient man linked with a waspish shrew.
 FLUELLO [aside]
 A silver and gilt beaker; I have a trick
 150 To work upon that beaker; sure 'twill fret him;
 It cannot choose but vex him. [Aside to Castruccio]
 Signor Castruccio,
 In pity to thee I have a conceit
 Will save thy hundred ducats yet; 'twill do't,
 And work him to impatience.
 CASTRUCCIO [aside to Fluello] Sweet Fluello, 155 I should be bountiful to that conceit.
 FLUELLO [aside to Castruccio]
 Well, 'tis enough.
Enter George [with a beaker of wine]
 CANDIDO Here, gentleman, to you,
 I wish your custom; you're exceeding welcome.
 CASTRUCCIO
 I pledge you, Signor Candido;
 [He drinks]
 Here to you, that must receive a hundred ducats.
 PIORATTO
 160 I'll pledge them deep, i'faith, Castruccio.
 [He drinks]
 Signor Fluello.
 FLUELLO Come, play't off; to me—
 I am your last man.
 CANDIDO George, supply the cup.
 [George refills the beaker]
 FLUELLO So, so, good honest George.—
 [He drinks]
 165 Here, Signor Candido, all this to you.
 [He offers the beaker]
 CANDIDO
 O, you must pardon me, I use it not.
 FLUELLO
 Will you not pledge me then?
 CANDIDO Yes, but not that:
 Great love is shown in little.
 FLUELLO Blurt on your sentences!—
 'Sfoot, you shall pledge me all.
 CANDIDO Indeed, I shall not.
 FLUELLO
 170 Not pledge me? 'Sblood, I'll carry away the beaker
 then.

CANDIDO
 The beaker? O, that at your pleasure, sir!
 FLUELLO
 Now by this drink, I will.
 CASTRUCCIO [to Candido] Pledge him, he'll do't else.
 FLUELLO [finishing his wine]
 So, I ha' done you right, on my thumb-nail.
 What, will you pledge me now?
 CANDIDO You know me, sir;
 I am not of that sin.
 FLUELLO Why then, farewell;
 175 I'll bear away the beaker, by this light.
 CANDIDO That's as you please, 'tis very good.
 FLUELLO Nay, it doth please me, and as you say, 'tis a very good one. Farewell, Signor Candido.
 PIORATTO Farewell, Candido. 180
 CANDIDO
 You're welcome, gentlemen.
 CASTRUCCIO Heart! Not moved yet?
 I think his patience is above our wit.
Exeunt [Gallants]
 GEORGE I told you before, mistress, they were all cheaters.
 WIFE [to Candido] Why, fool, why, husband, why, mad-185 man, I hope you will not let 'em sneak away so with a silver and gilt beaker, the best in the house too.—[To Prentices] Go, fellows, make hue and cry after them.
 CANDIDO Pray let your tongue lie still; all will be well.—
 Come hither, George, hie to the constable, 190 And in calm order wish him to attach them.
 Make no great stir, because they're gentlemen,
 And a thing partly done in merriment.
 'Tis but a size above a jest thou know'st,
 Therefore pursue it mildly. Go, begone.
 The constable's hard by; bring him along. 195
 Make haste again. Exit George WIFE O, you're a goodly patient woodcock, are you not now? See what your patience comes to: everyone saddles you and rides you—you'll be shortly the com-200 mon stone-horse of Milan. A woman's well holped up with such a meacock! I had rather have a husband that would swaddle me thrice a day than such a one that will be gulled twice in half an hour. O, I could burn all the wares in my shop for anger.
 CANDIDO
 205 Pray wear a peaceful temper, be my wife,
 That is, be patient; for a wife and husband

155 I should...conceit i.e. if your idea proves successful, I'll reward you 161 play't off toss it off, finish it to me Fluello asks for the beaker to be passed to him after Pioratto has finished his drink (in order to follow through with his plan of taking the beaker to vex
 Candido).
 163 supply fill
 166 I use it not i.e. I am unaccustomed to such drinking. Candido has already pledged them (5.156) and refuses to drink more.

 168 Blurt on 'snort on' or 'a fig for' (an exclamation of contempt)
 sentences wise sayings
 169 all i.e. (by drinking) all the wine 173 on my thumb-nail i.e. to the last drop; alluding to the practice of drinking supernaculum, in which the emptied glass was turned up over the left thumbnail to show that no liquor remained 193 a size one measure

196 again back
 197 woodcock fool, 'birdbrain' 200 stone-horse stallion (and therefore in general demand)
 holped helped 201 meacock effeminate person; coward, weakling
 202 swaddle beat 206-7 a wife...between them probably derived from Genesis 2:24 or Matthew 19:5-6

Scene 5

The Honeft Whore

Share but one soul between them; this being known,
 Why should not one soul then agree in one?
 WIFE
 Hang your agreements! But if my beaker be gone—
Exit

Enter Castruccio, Fluello, Pioratto, and George

210 CANDIDO O, here they come.
 GEORGE The constable, sir, let 'em come along with me,
 because there should be no wond'ring; he stays at door.
 CASTRUCCIO Constable?—Goodman Abram!
 FLUELLO Now Signor Candido, 'sblood, why do you attach 215 us?
 CASTRUCCIO 'Sheart! Attach us!
 CANDIDO Nay, swear not, gallants,
 Your oaths may move your souls, but not move me.
 You have a silver beaker of my wife's.
 FLUELLO
 You say not true: 'tis gilt.
 220 CANDIDO Then you say true.
 And being gilt, the guilt lies more on you.
 CASTRUCCIO
 I hope you're not angry, sir.
 CANDIDO Then you hope right,
 For I am not angry.
 PIORATTO No, but a little moved.
 CANDIDO
 I moved! 'Twas you were moved, you were brought hither.
 225 CASTRUCCIO
 But you, out of your anger and impatience,
 Caused us to be attached.
 CANDIDO Nay, you misplace it;
 Out of my quiet sufferance I did that,
 And not of any wrath. Had I shown anger,
 I should have then pursued you with the law
 230 And hunted you to shame; as many worldlings
 Do build their anger upon feebler grounds—
 The more's the pity—many lose their lives
 For scarce so much coin as will hide their palm,
 Which is most cruel. Those have vexed spirits 235 That pursue lives. In this opinion rest:
 The loss of millions could not move my breast.

FLUELLO
 Thou art a blest man, and with peace dost deal;
 Such a meek spirit can bless a commonweal.

CANDIDO
 Gentlemen, now 'tis upon eating time,
 Pray part not hence, but dine with me today. 240

CASTRUCCIO
 I never heard a courtier yet say nay
 To such a motion. I'll not be the first.

PIORATTO Nor I.

FLUELLO Nor I.

CANDIDO
 The constable shall bear you company. 245
 George, call him in. Let the world say what it can,
 Nothing can drive me from a patient man.
*Exeunt [George at one door,
 the others at another door]*

*Enter Roger with a stool, cushion, looking-glass, and chafing-dish; those being set down, he pulls out of his pocket a vial with white colour in it, and two boxes, one with white, another red, painting.
 He places all things in order and a candle by them, singing with the ends of old ballads as he does it.
 At last Bellafront, as he rubs his cheek with the colours, whistles within* Sc. 6

ROGER Anon, forsooth.
 BELLAFRONT [within] What are you playing the rogue about?
 ROGER About you, forsooth; I'm drawing up a hole in your white silk stocking. 5 BELLAFRONT [within] Is my glass there? And my boxes of complexion?
 ROGER Yes, forsooth, your boxes of complexion are here,
 I think—yes, 'tis here: here's your two complexions—and if I had all the four complexions, I should ne'er set 10 a good face upon't. Some men, I see, are born under hard-favoured planets as well as women. Zounds, I look worse now than I did before, and it makes her face glisten most damnably. There's knavery in daubing, I 15 hold my life, or else this is only female pomatum.

212 because so that 213 Abram lunatic, madman; an Abraham-man feigned madness for the purpose of begging.
 214 attach arrest
 234 spirits Very likely pronounced 'sprites', as also at 5.238.
 239 now 'tis i.e. 'now that it is'
 247 from from being 6.o.2 chafing-dish used for heating the curling-iron and the poking-stick (poker,

6.16)
 o.4 painting cosmetic pigment 10 four complexions four temperaments or humours (sanguine, phlegmatic, choleric, melancholy), quibbling also on complexion meaning 'face', 'natural skin colour', and 'cosmetic pigment' 10-11 set a good face upon't (in reference to his own face, which he has been daubing with red and white cosmetics) improve its appearance (proverbial: Tilley

F17); with a play on face = complexion 11-12 born...planets proverbial (Tilley
 P386)
 12 hard-favoured playing on (a) ugly, of disagreeable appearance, and (b) ill disposed, unlucky
 Zounds corruption of 'by God's wounds'
 (a strong oath)
 14 glisten sparkle, glitter
 15 pomatum scented ointment

*Enter Bellafront not full ready, without a gown.
She sits down; with her bodkin curls her hair;
colours her lips*

BELLAFRONT Where's my ruff and poker, you block-head?

ROGER Your ruff and your poker are engendering together upon the cupboard of the court, or the court-cupboard.

20 BELLAFRONT Fetch 'em.—Is the pox in your hams, you can go no faster?

[She throws an object at him]

ROGER Would the pox were in your fingers, unless you could leave flinging. Catch!

[He throws an object at her]

Exit

BELLAFRONT I'll catch you, you dog, by and by. Do you grumble?

She sings

25 Cupid is a god,
As naked as my nail;
I'll whip him with a rod,
If he my true love fail.

[Enter Roger with ruff and poker]

ROGER There's your ruff. Shall I poke it?

30 BELLAFRONT Yes, honest Roger—no, stay; prithee, good boy, hold here.

[Roger holds looking-glass and candle]

[She sings]

Down, down, down, down, I fall

Down, and arise I never shall.

35 ROGER Troth, mistress, then leave the trade if you shall never rise.

BELLAFRONT What trade, Goodman Abram?

ROGER Why, that of down and arise, or the falling trade.

BELLAFRONT I'll fall with you by and by.

40 ROGER If you do, I know who shall smart for't: troth, mistress, what do I look like now?

[He holds up the looking-glass to Bellafront]

BELLAFRONT Like as you are: a panderly sixpenny rascal.

ROGER I may thank you for that; no, faith, I look like an old proverb, 'Hold the candle before the devil.'

BELLAFRONT Ud's life, I'll stick my knife in your guts an you prate to me so!—Wha-at?

45

She [paints her face and] sings

Well met, pug, the pearl of beauty, umh, umh.

How now, sir knave, you forget your duty, umh, umh.

Marry-muff, sir, are you grown so dainty? Fa, la, la, (etc.)

Is it you, sir? The worst of twenty; fa la, la, leera la. Pox on you, how dost thou hold my glass?

50

ROGER Why, as I hold your door: with my fingers.

BELLAFRONT Nay, pray thee, sweet honey Roger, hold up handsomely.

[She sings]

Sing, pretty wantons, warble, (etc.)

We shall ha' guests today, I lay my little maidenhead, my nose itches so.

55

ROGER I said so too last night, when our fleas twinged me.

BELLAFRONT So poke my ruff now.—My gown, my gown; have I my fall? Where's my fall, Roger?

ROGER Your fall, forsooth, is behind.

60

One knocks

BELLAFRONT God's my pittikins, some fool or other knocks.

ROGER Shall I open to the fool, mistress?

BELLAFRONT And all these baubles lying thus? Away with it quickly. [They gather up the paints etc.] Ay, ay, knock and be damned, whosoever you be.—So, give the fresh salmon line now, let him come ashore; he shall serve for my breakfast, though he go against my stomach.

65

Roger fetches in Fluello, Castruccio, and Pioratto

FLUELLO [to Bellafront] Morrow, coz.

CASTRUCCIO [to Bellafront] How does my sweet acquaintance?

70

PIORATTO [to Bellafront] Save thee, little marmoset; how dost thou, good pretty rogue?

BELLAFRONT Well, God-a-mercy, good pretty rascal.

15.1 gown overgarment, often made of costly fabrics; but possibly in reference to a 'night-gown', a less elaborate, warmer outer garment not restricted to night-time wear. Bellafront would presumably be dressed in a kirtle, consisting either of a floor-length dress or of a bodice and skirt, over which a gown was commonly worn.

15.2 bodkin curling iron

16 poker poking-stick (a small steel rod which was heated and used for setting the pleats of a ruff)

18 court-cupboard a movable sideboard or cabinet used for the display of plate and storage of fruit, wine, spoons, and linen

24 grumble growl faintly

26 naked as my nail proverbial (Tilley N4)

29 ruff...poke it with a bawdy innuendo

32-3 Down...shall The concluding refrain of 'Sorrow, sorrow stay' from John Dowland's Second Book of Songs or Ayres (1600); see Companion, p. 137.

33 arise prosper

36 Abram lunatic; see 5.213 and note.

37 down...falling trade with sexual innuendoes; falling trade can also mean 'failing business' and 'declining path'

38 fall with assail with blows; settle with. Bellafront makes a forced pun on Roger's falling as she does with catch, 6.23.

41 sixpenny so named for the sixpences he receives for procuring clients; explained at 8.88-9

43 Hold...devil i.e. 'help the devil by holding a candle while he works' (proverbial: Tilley C42); Roger refers to himself holding a candle and mirror (emblematic of vanity) for Bellafront.

45 Wha-at expressing Bellafront's prolonged disdain

46 pug (a) a term of endearment; (b) courtesan, harlot

48 Marry-muff a derisive exclamation (originally a kind of cheap fabric)

51 hold your door conventional function of a pander (i.e. control access to your body)

56-62 nose itches...fool 'If your nose itches you will kiss a fool' (proverbial: Tilley N224).

59 fall falling band or collar

60 fall punning on 'sexual fall' behind punning on 'in the past'

61 pittikins a diminutive of 'pity'

64-5 knock and be damned in reference to the brothel as hell (proverbial?)

65-6 fresh salmon fool, prey (often with a sexual suggestion)

67 stomach (a) appetite, taste; (b) abdomen (punning on go = copulate)

71 marmoset monkey (a term of endearment or playful reproach)

FLUELLO Roger, some light, I prithee.
 75 ROGER You shall, signor, for we that live here in this vale of misery are as dark as hell. Exit for a candle
 CASTRUCCIO Good tobacco, Fluello?
 FLUELLO Smell.
Enter Roger [with a candle]
 PIORATTO It may be tickling gear, for it plays with my nose 80 already.
 ROGER Here's another light angel, signor.
 BELLAFRONT What, you pied curtal, what's that you are neighing?
 ROGER I say, God send us the light of heaven, or some 85 more angels.
 BELLAFRONT Go fetch some wine, and drink half of it.
 ROGER I must fetch some wine, gentlemen, and drink half
 of it?
 FLUELLO [offering money] Here, Roger.
 90 CASTRUCCIO [offering money] No, let me send, prithee.
 FLUELLO Hold, you cankerworm.
 ROGER You shall send both, if you please, signors.
 PIORATTO Stay, what's best to drink o' mornings?
 ROGER Hippocras, sir, for my mistress, if I fetch it, is most 95 dear to her.
 FLUELLO Hippocras! [Giving money] There, then, here's a teston for you, you snake.
 ROGER Right, sir; here's three shillings and sixpence for a pottle and a manchet. Exit 100 CASTRUCCIO Here's most Herculean tobacco; ha' some, acquaintance?
 BELLAFRONT Faugh, not I.—Makes your breath stink like the piss of a fox. Acquaintance, where supped you last night?
 105 CASTRUCCIO At a place, sweet acquaintance, where your health danced the canaries, i'faith: you should ha' been there.

BELLAFRONT I there among your punks! Marry, faugh, hang 'em; scorn't. Will you never leave sucking of eggs 110 in other folks' hens' nests?
 CASTRUCCIO Why, in good troth, if you'll trust me, acquaintance, there was not one hen at the board; ask Fluello.
 FLUELLO No, faith, coz, none but cocks. Signor Malavolta drunk to thee. 115
 BELLAFRONT O, a pure beagle; that horse-leech there?
 FLUELLO And the knight, Sir Oliver Lolloio, swore he would bestow a taffeta petticoat on thee, but to break his fast with thee.
 BELLAFRONT With me! I'll choke him then. Hang him, 120 mole-catcher! It's the dreaming'st snotty-nose.
 PIORATTO Well, many took that Lolloio for a fool; but he's a subtle fool.
 BELLAFRONT Ay, and he has fellows; of all filthy, dry-fisted knights, I cannot abide that he should touch me. 125
 CASTRUCCIO Why, wench, is he scabbed?
 BELLAFRONT Hang him, he'll not live to be so honest, nor to the credit to have scabs about him; his betters have 'em.
 But I hate to wear out any of his coarse knighthood, because he's made like an alderman's night-gown, faced 130 all with cony before, and within nothing but fox. This sweet Oliver will eat mutton till he be ready to burst, but the lean-jawed slave will not pay for the scraping of his trencher.
 PIORATTO Plague him! Set him beneath the salt, and let 135 him not touch a bit till every one has had his full cut.
 FLUELLO Sordello, the gentleman usher, came in to us too—marry, 'twas in our cheese, for he had been to borrow money for his lord, of a citizen.
 CASTRUCCIO What an ass is that lord, to borrow money of 140 a citizen.

79 tickling i.e. an effect of tobacco gear stuff
 81 angel (a) in reference to the candle as an angel bringing light to the vale of misery;
 (b) beautiful creature, who is wanton
 (light)
 82 curtal (a) horse with a docked tail;
 (b) rogue who wears a short cloak 85 angels with a pun on the gold coin so named 86 fetch some wine one of the duties of a whore's attendant
 87-8 I must . . . of it Roger is presumably waiting for money.
 94 Hippocras a spiced and sweetened wine so named for the cloth bag known as Hippocrates' sleeve through which it was strained
 97 teston sixpence
 99 pottle liquid measure (= two quarts) manchet small loaf or roll of the finest wheaten bread
 100 Herculean strong, powerful 106 danced the canaries punning on the Spanish dance and sweet Canary wine

 108 punks prostitutes Marry, faugh common expression of contempt (cf. the character, Mary Faugh, in Marston's Dutch Courtesan)
 109-10 sucking . . . nests i.e. characterizing
 Castruccio as a weasel or cuckoo.
 112 board table
 114 Malavolta playing on the lavolta, a lively dance 116 beagle a term of abuse (possibly with sexual innuendo)
horse-leech a term of abuse: (a) aquatic sucking worm, commonly used medically; (b) rapacious, insatiable person 117 Lolloio Possibly derived from the Italian, lóglio, a darnel or cockle in corn. Middleton may have recalled it in writing Changeling.
 121 mole-catcher term of abuse (probably with sexual innuendo associated with phallic suggestion of mole)
 124 dry-fisted miserly
 126 scabbed syphilitic

128 credit honour, trustworthiness 130 night-gown dressing gown (with a pun on knighthood)
faced covered, trimmed
 131 cony . . . fox playing on the proverbial innocence and foolishness of a rabbit (cony) and the cleverness and ruthlessness of a fox; cf. a wolf in sheep's clothing.
cony rabbit fur
 131-2 This sweet Oliver alluding to a popular ballad, now lost, 'O sweet Oliver, leave me not behind thee' (proverbial: Tillye O40)
 132 eat mutton enjoy, use prostitutes 135 the salt A register of social rank:
 persons of higher station were seated above the central large salt-cellar at table while those of inferior status were positioned below it.
 136 cut slice or portion (with a bawdy pun on cut = cunt)
 138 in our cheese at the end of our meal

- BELLAFRONT Nay, God's my pity, what an ass is that citizen to lend money to a lord!
Enter Matteo and [after him] Hippolito, who, saluting the company, as a stranger walks off. Roger comes in sadly behind them with a pottle-pot, and stands aloof off
- 145 MATTEO Save you, gallants. Signor Fluello, exceedingly well met, as I may say.
 FLUELLO Signor Matteo, exceedingly well met too, as I may say.
 MATTEO And how fares my little pretty mistress?
 BELLAFRONT E'en as my little pretty servant; sees three court dishes before her, and not one good bit in them. [To Roger] How now? Why the devil stand'st thou so? Art in a trance?
 ROGER [coming forward] Yes, forsooth.
 BELLAFRONT Why dost not fill out their wine?
 155 ROGER Forsooth, 'tis filled out already: all the wine that the signor has bestowed upon you is cast away. A porter ran a-tilt at me, and so faced me down that I had not a drop.
 BELLAFRONT I'm accursed to let such a withered artichoke-faced rascal grow under my nose. Now you look like an old he-cat going to the gallows.—I'll be hanged if he ha' not put up the money to cony-catch us all.
 ROGER No, truly, forsooth, 'tis not put up yet.
 BELLAFRONT How many gentlemen hast thou served thus?
 165 ROGER None but five hundred, besides prentices and servingmen.
 BELLAFRONT Dost think I'll pocket it up at thy hands?
 ROGER Yes, forsooth, I fear you will pocket it up.
 BELLAFRONT [to Matteo] Fie, fie, cut my lace, good servant, 170 I shall ha' the mother presently, I'm so vexed at this horse-plum.
 FLUELLO Plague, not for a scald pottle of wine.
 MATTEO Nay, sweet Bellafront, for a little pig's wash!
 CASTRUCCIO [giving money] Here, Roger, fetch more.—A 175 mischance, i'faith, acquaintance.
 BELLAFRONT [to Roger] Out of my sight, thou ungodly puritanical creature.
- ROGER For the t'other pottle?—Yes, forsooth.
 BELLAFRONT [aside to Roger] Spill that too. Exit [Roger]
 What gentleman is that, servant—your friend? 180
 MATTEO Gods-so, a stool, a stool.
 [Hippolito comes forward]
 If you love me, mistress, entertain this gentleman respectively, and bid him welcome.
 BELLAFRONT He's very welcome.—Pray sir, sit.
 HIPPOLITO Thanks, lady. 185
 FLUELLO Count Hippolito, is't not?—Cry you mercy, signor, you walk here all this while, and we not heed you? Let me bestow a stool upon you, beseech you. You are a stranger here; we know the fashions o'th' house.
 CASTRUCCIO Please you be here, my lord. 190
 [He offers] tobacco
 HIPPOLITO No, good Castruccio.
 FLUELLO You have abandoned the court, I see, my lord, since the death of your mistress. Well, she was a delicate piece.—[To Bellafront] Beseech you, sweet.—[To Hippolito] Come, let us serve under the colours of your acquaintance still, for all that. Please you to meet here at the lodging of my coz, I shall bestow a banquet upon you. 195
 HIPPOLITO
 I never can deserve this kindness, sir.
 What may this lady be whom you call coz? 200
 FLUELLO Faith, sir, a poor gentlewoman, of passing good carriage; one that has some suits in law, and lies here in an attorney's house.
 HIPPOLITO Is she married?
 FLUELLO Ha, as all your punks are: a captain's wife, or so.—Never saw her before, my lord? 205
 HIPPOLITO Never; trust me, a goodly creature.
 FLUELLO By gad, when you know her as we do, you'll swear she is the prettiest, kindest, sweetest, most bewitching honest ape under the pole. A skin—your satin is not more soft, nor lawn whiter. 210
 HIPPOLITO Belike, then, she's some sale courtesan.
 FLUELLO Troth, as all your best faces are, a good wench.
 HIPPOLITO Great pity that she's a good wench.

143.2 walks off withdraws or retires to the rear or another part of the stage
 143.4 aloof off at a distance
 149 servant lover
 157 faced me down browbeat me
 161 gallows i.e. where stray animals were hanged 162 put up pocketed
cony-catch cheat
 163 put up stowed away (Roger quibbles on the meaning of Bellafront's term as below at 6.168).
 167 pocket it up put up with it
 168 pocket it up i.e. in reference to the swindle, in accordance with which Roger will hand the money over to Bellafront 169 cut my lace i.e. cut my stays (so I can breathe more freely and forestall swooning)

 170 the mother hysteria
 171 horse-plum small red variety of plum (term of contempt)
 172 scald paltry, contemptible
 173 pig's wash swill of a brewery given to pigs (contemptuously used in reference to weak, inferior liquor)
 183 respectively (a) attentively; (b) respectfully
 186 Cry you mercy I beg your pardon, forgiveness
 190 Please... my lord Castruccio presumably merely offers tobacco, though he might also offer Hippolito his stool.
 191–214 No, good Castruccio... good wench Bellafront and Matteo are presumably dallying or talking apart, as signalled by Matteo's non-sequitur statement at 6.215.

 201 passing exceedingly 202 carriage demeanour suits in law i.e. the pretence of law business in term-time would provide a conventional cover for prostitution 205 captain's wife i.e. a husband away at sea used as a cover for prostitution
 212 sale courtesan (with a quibble on 'sale cloth'—meaning either 'cloth for sale' or 'inferior cloth'—making light of Fluello's likening of Bellafront's skin to fabrics)
 214 good wench prostitute (Hippolito plays on the literal sense, 'virtuous woman')

- 215 MATTEO [to Bellafront] Thou shalt have it, i'faith, mistress.—How now signors? What? Whispering? [To Hippolito] Did not I lay a wager I should take you within seven days in a house of vanity?
- 220 HIPPOLITO You did, and I beshrew your heart, you have won.
- MATTEO How do you like my mistress?
- HIPPOLITO Well, for such a mistress; better, if your mistress be not your master. I must break manners, gentlemen, fare you well.
- 225 MATTEO 'Sfoot, you shall not leave us.
- BELLAFRONT The gentleman likes not the taste of our company.
- ALL THE GALLANTS Beseech you stay.
- HIPPOLITO Trust me, my affairs beckon for me; pardon me.
- 230 MATTEO Will you call for me half an hour hence here?
- HIPPOLITO Perhaps I shall.
- MATTEO Perhaps? Faugh! I know you can; swear to me you will.
- HIPPOLITO Since you will press me, on my word, I will. Exit
- 235 BELLAFRONT What sullen picture is this, servant?
- MATTEO It's Count Hippolito, the brave count.
- PIORATTO As gallant a spirit as any in Milan, you sweet Jew.
- FLUELLO O, he's a most essential gentleman, coz.
- 240 CASTRUCCIO Did you never hear of Count Hippolito, acquaintance?
- BELLAFRONT Marry-muff o'your counts, an be no more life in 'em!
- MATTEO He's so malcontent, sirrah Bellafront. An you be honest gallants, let's sup together, and have the count with us.—Thou shalt sit at the upper end, punk.
- 245 BELLAFRONT Punk? You soused gurnet!
- MATTEO King's truce! Come, I'll bestow the supper to have him but laugh.
- 250 CASTRUCCIO He betrays his youth too grossly to that tyrant melancholy.
- MATTEO All this is for a woman.
- BELLAFRONT A woman?—Some whore! What sweet jewel is't?
- 255 PIORATTO Would she heard you.
- FLUELLO Troth, so would I.
- CASTRUCCIO And I, by heaven.
- BELLAFRONT Nay, good servant, what woman?
- MATTEO Pah!
- BELLAFRONT Prithee tell me, a buss and tell me. I warrant he's an honest fellow, if he take on thus for a wench. Good rogue, who?
- MATTEO By th'Lord, I will not, must not, faith, mistress.—Is't a match, sirs? This night at th' Antelope; for there's best wine and good boys. 265
- ALL THE GALLANTS It's done; at th' Antelope.
- BELLAFRONT I cannot be there tonight.
- MATTEO Cannot? By th'Lord, you shall.
- BELLAFRONT By the Lady, I will not. Sha-all!
- FLUELLO Why then, put it off till Friday: woo't come then, coz? 270
- BELLAFRONT Well.
- Enter Roger*
- MATTEO You're the waspishest ape.—Roger, put your mistress in mind—your scurvy mistress here—to sup with us on Friday next. You're best come like a madwoman, without a band, in your waistcoat, and the linings of your kirtle outward, like every common hackney that steals out at the back gate of her sweet knight's lodging. 275
- BELLAFRONT Go, go, hang yourself!
- CASTRUCCIO It's dinner-time, Matteo, shall's hence?
- ALL THE GALLANTS Yes, yes.—Farewell, wench.
- BELLAFRONT Farewell, boys. Exeunt [Gallants]
- Roger, what wine sent they for?
- ROGER Bastard wine, for if it had been truly begotten, it would not ha' been ashamed to come in. Here's six shillings to pay for nursing the bastard. 285
- BELLAFRONT A company of rooks! O, good sweet Roger, run to the poulter's and buy me some fine larks.
- ROGER No woodcocks?
- BELLAFRONT
- Yes, faith, a couple, if they be not dear. 290
- Enter Hippolito*
- ROGER
- I'll buy but one; there's one already here. Exit
- HIPPOLITO
- Is the gentleman, my friend, departed, mistress?
- BELLAFRONT
- His back is but new turned, sir.
- HIPPOLITO Fare you well.
- BELLAFRONT
- I can direct you to him.
- HIPPOLITO Can you, pray?
- BELLAFRONT
- If you please stay, he'll not be absent long. 295

238 Jew playful use of a conventional term of opprobrium

239 essential thorough, entire

244 sirrah often used in reference to women

247 soused gurnet pickled gurnet (gurnard), (term of abuse)

248 King's truce a cry for the discontinuance of a game

260 buss kiss

264 Antelope possibly in allusion to, or suggestive of, the Antelope Inn on the west side of West Smithfield, London

269 Sha-all signifying Bellafront's protracted indignation; cf. Wha-at (6.45)

270 woo't wilt

276 band collar

waistcoat A waist-length undergarment; worn without a covering garment, it was considered a sign of dishabille and frequently associated with prostitutes.

277 kirtle A floor-length garment worn as a dress over petticoats and occasionally with an outer gown. The linings outward presumably signify that the garment was put on in the dark or that the wearer was inebriated.

hackney prostitute

284 Bastard wine a sweet Spanish wine, with a play on the sense, 'illegitimate offspring', at 6.284-6.

285 come in i.e. to a brothel

287 rooks fools, gulls

291 there's one quibbling on a second sense of woodcock = fool, simpleton

HIPPOLITO	I care not much.	As ever a poor gentlewoman could be.
BELLAFRONT	Pray sit, forsooth.	HIPPOLITO	This were well now, to one but newly fledged,
HIPPOLITO	I'm hot.		And scarce a day old in this subtle world: 330
	If I may use your room, I'll rather walk.		'Twere pretty art, good birdlime, cunning net;
BELLAFRONT	At your best pleasure.—Whew!—[Calling offstage]		But come, come, faith, confess: how many men
	Some rubbers there!		Have drunk this selfsame protestation
HIPPOLITO	Indeed, I'll none—indeed, I will not, thanks.	BELLAFRONT	From that red 'ticing lip?
300	Pretty fine lodging. I perceive my friend		Indeed, not any.
	Is old in your acquaintance.	HIPPOLITO	'Indeed', and blush not?
BELLAFRONT	Troth, sir, he comes	BELLAFRONT	No, in truth, not any. 335
	As other gentlemen, to spend spare hours.	HIPPOLITO	'Indeed', 'in truth'—How warily you swear!
	If yourself like our roof, such as it is,		'Tis well, if ill it be not; yet, had I
	Your own acquaintance may be as old as his.		The ruffian in me, and were drawn before you
HIPPOLITO	Say I did like; what welcome should I find?		But in light colours, I do know indeed
305			You would not swear 'indeed', but thunder oaths
BELLAFRONT	Such as my present fortunes can afford.		That should shake heaven, drown the harmonious
HIPPOLITO	But would you let me play Matteo's part?		spheres,
BELLAFRONT	What part?		And pierce a soul that loved her maker's honour
HIPPOLITO	Why, embrace you, dally with you, kiss.		With horror and amazement.
	Faith, tell me, will you leave him, and love me?	BELLAFRONT	Shall I swear?
BELLAFRONT	I am in bonds to no man, sir.		Will you believe me then?
310	HIPPOLITO	HIPPOLITO	Worst then of all;
	Why then,		Our sins by custom seem at last but small. 345
	You're free for any man; if any, me.		Were I but o'er your threshold, a next man,
	But I must tell you, lady, were you mine,		And after him a next, and then a fourth,
	You should be all mine: I could brook no sharers;		Should have this golden hook and lascivious bait
	I should be covetous, and sweep up all.		Thrown out to the full length. Why, let me tell you,
315	I should be pleasure's usurer; faith, I should.		I ha' seen letters sent from that white hand
BELLAFRONT	O fate!		Tuning such music to Matteo's ear. 350
HIPPOLITO	Why sigh you, lady? May I know?	BELLAFRONT	Matteo! That's true, but if you'll believe
BELLAFRONT	'T has never been my fortune yet to single		My honest tongue, my eyes no sooner met you
	Out that one man whose love could fellow mine,		But they conveyed and led you to my heart.
	As I have ever wished it. O my stars!	HIPPOLITO	O, you cannot feign with me! Why, I know, lady,
320	Had I but met with one kind gentleman		This is the common fashion of you all,
	That would have purchased sin alone to himself		To hook in a kind gentleman, and then
	For his own private use, although scarce proper,		Abuse his coin, conveying it to your lover;
	Indifferent handsome, meetly legged and thighed,		And in the end you show him a French trick,
	And my allowance reasonable, i'faith,		And so you leave him, that a coach may run
325	According to my body, by my troth,		Between his legs for breadth. 360
	I would have been as true unto his pleasures,	BELLAFRONT	O, by my soul,
	Yea, and as loyal to his afternoons,		Not I! Therein I'll prove an honest whore,
			In being true to one, and to no more.
		HIPPOLITO	If any be disposed to trust your oath,
			Let him; I'll not be he. I know you feign 365

298 rubbers towels
 322 scarce proper hardly good-looking 323 meetly fairly well, tolerably
 331 birdlime sticky substance applied to tree twigs for catching birds
 334 'ticing enticing
 335 Indeed an interjection associated with

Puritans (and hence hypocrisy)
 345 Our sins . . . small derived from St Augustine's 'Consuetudo peccati tollit sensum peccandi': the custom of sinning takes away the feeling of sin; proverbial (Tilley C934)

359 show . . . trick infect him with venereal disease
 360-1 a coach . . . breadth in allusion to an effect of venereal disease (French trick, 6.359)
 362 honest chaste

Scene 6

the pasyent man & the onest hore

All that you speak; ay, for a mingled harlot
 Is true in nothing but in being false.
 What, shall I teach you how to loathe yourself?
 And mildly too, not without sense or reason?
 BELLAFRONT
 370 I am content; I would fain loathe myself,
 If you not love me.
 HIPPOLITO Then if your gracious blood
 Be not all wasted, I shall assay to do't.
 Lend me your silence, and attention.—
 You have no soul:
 That makes you weigh so light; heaven's treasure
 375 bought it,
 And half a crown hath sold it. For your body,
 It's like the common shore, that still receives
 All the town's filth. The sin of many men
 Is within you; and thus much, I suppose, 380 That if all your committers stood in rank, They'd make a lane, in which your shame might dwell,
 And with their spaces reach from hence to hell.
 Nay, shall I urge it more? There has been known
 As many by one harlot maimed and dismembered 385 As would ha' stuffed an hospital; this I might Apply to you, and perhaps do you right.
 O, you're as base as any beast that bears;
 Your body is e'en hired, and so are theirs.
 For gold and sparkling jewels, if he can,
 390 You'll let a Jew get you with Christian.
 Be he a Moor, a Tartar, though his face
 Look uglier than a dead man's skull,
 Could the devil put on a human shape,
 If his purse shake out crowns, up then he gets:
 395 Whores will be rid to hell with golden bits.
 So that you're crueller than Turks, for they Sell Christians only; you sell yourselves away.
 Why, those that love you, hate you, and will term
 you
 Lickerish damnation; wish themselves half sunk
 400 After the sin is laid out, and e'en curse
 Their fruitless riot—for what one begets
 Another poisons; lust and murder hit.
 A tree being often shook, what fruit can knit?

BELLAFRONT
 O me unhappy!
 HIPPOLITO I can vex you more:
 A harlot is like Dunkirk, true to none,
 405 Swallows both English, Spanish, fulsome Dutch,
 Back-doored Italian, last of all the French;
 And he sticks to you, faith, gives you your diet,
 Brings you acquainted first with monsieur doctor,
 And then you know what follows.
 BELLAFRONT Misery.
 410 Rank, stinking, and most loathsome misery.
 HIPPOLITO
 Methinks a toad is happier than a whore.
 That with one poison swells, with thousands more
 The other stocks her veins.—Harlot? Fie, Fie!
 415 You are the miserablist creatures breathing,
 The very slaves of nature. Mark me else:
 You put on rich attires, others' eyes wear them;
 You eat but to supply your blood with sin,
 And this strange curse e'en haunts you to your graves:
 From fools you get, and spend it upon slaves.
 420 Like bears and apes you're baited and show tricks
 For money, but your bawd the sweetness licks.
 Indeed, you are their journeywomen, and do
 All base and damned works they list set you to;
 So that you ne'er are rich—for do but show me,
 425 In present memory or in ages past,
 The fairest and most famous courtesan,
 Whose flesh was dear'st, that raised the price of sin
 And held it up, to whose intemperate bosom
 Princes, earls, lords—the worst has been a knight, 430 The mean'st a gentleman—have offered up Whole hecatombs of sighs, and rained in showers
 Handfuls of gold; yet for all this, at last Diseases sucked her marrow, then grew so poor
 That she has begged, e'en at a beggar's door.
 435 And—wherein heaven has a finger—when this idol
 From coast to coast has leaped on foreign shores,
 And had more worship than th' outlandish whores,
 When several nations have gone over her,
 440 When for each several city she has seen
 Her maidenhead has been new and been sold dear,

366 mingled promiscuous
 375 heaven's...it Christ redeemed your soul
 376 For as for 377 shore sewer still constantly
 380 your committers in a sexual sense: those who have had sexual relations with you
 382 spaces accumulated distances from body to body 390 get you...Christian make you pregnant with a child who, because born to an at least nominal Christian or in a Christian land, will be brought up as one (the father having absconded) 395 Whores punning on 'horse' rid ridden

bits (a) mouthpieces of horses' bridles;
 (b) coins
 399 Lickerish lecherous
 402 hit agree together
 405 Dunkirk Notorious as a haven of freebooters who preyed indiscriminately on sailing vessels of all nations.
 407 Back-doored Italian alluding to the alleged sexual proclivities of Italians for sodomy
French as bearers of venereal disease

413 poison Toads were thought to be venomous.
 417 others'...them The sense seems to be that Bellafront's wearing of expensive clothes is appreciated chiefly by others.
 423 journeywomen women working at a trade for daily wages 424 list please, choose 432 hecatombs vast numbers
 436 idol i.e. the courtesan of l. 427
 437 leaped (a) danced, skipped; (b) fornicated 438 outlandish foreign 440 several separate, different

Did live well there, and might have died unknown
 And undefamed, back comes she to her own;
 And there both miserably lives and dies,
 445 Scorned even of those that once adored her eyes;
 As if her fatal-circled life thus ran:
 Her pride should end there where it first began.
 What, do you weep to hear your story read?
 Nay, if you spoil your cheeks, I'll read no more.
 450 BELLAFRONT O yes, I pray proceed:
 Indeed, 'twill do me good to weep indeed.
 HIPPOLITO
 To give those tears a relish, this I add:
 You're like the Jews, scattered, in no place certain;
 Your days are tedious, your hours burdensome,
 455 And were't not for full suppers, midnight revels,
 Dancing, wine, riotous meetings, which do drown
 And bury quite in you all virtuous thoughts,
 And on your eyelids hang so heavily
 They have no power to look so high as heaven,
 460 You'd sit and muse on nothing but despair,
 Curse that devil Lust, that so burns up your blood,
 And in ten thousand shivers break your glass
 For his temptation. Say you taste delight
 To have a golden gull from rise to set, 465 To mete you in his hot luxurious arms;
 Yet your nights pay for all: I know you dream
 Of warrants, whips, and beadles, and then start
 At a door's windy creak, think every weasel
 To be a constable, and every rat 470 A long-tailed officer. Are you now not slaves?
 O, you have damnation without pleasure for it!
 Such is the state of harlots. To conclude,
 When you are old, and can well paint no more,
 You turn bawd and are then worse than before.
 Make use of this; farewell.
 475 BELLAFRONT O, I pray stay.
 HIPPOLITO
 I see Matteo comes not; time hath barred me.
 Would all the harlots in the town had heard me.
 Exit [leaving his sword]
 BELLAFRONT
 Stay yet a little longer. No—quite gone!
 480 Cursed be that minute—for it was no more,
 So soon a maid is changed into a whore—
 Wherein I first fell; be it for ever black.

Yet why should sweet Hippolito shun mine eyes,
 For whose true love I would become pure-honest,
 Hate the world's mixtures, and the smiles of gold?
 485 Am I not fair? Why should he fly me then?
 Fair creatures are desired, not scorned of men.
 How many gallants have drunk healths to me
 Out of their daggered arms, and thought them blest Enjoying but mine eyes at prodigal feasts!
 490 And does Hippolito detest my love?
 O, sure their heedless lusts but flattered me;
 I am not pleasing, beautiful, nor young.
 Hippolito hath spied some ugly blemish
 Eclipsing all my beauties; I am foul.
 495 'Harlot!' Ay, that's the spot that taints my soul.—
 His weapon left here? O fit instrument
 To let forth all the poison of my flesh!
 Thy master hates me, 'cause my blood hath ranged;
 But when 'tis forth, then he'll believe I'm changed.
 [She prepares to stab herself]
 Enter Hippolito
 HIPPOLITO
 Madwoman, what art doing?
 500 BELLAFRONT Either love me,
 Or cleave my bosom on thy rapier's point;
 Yet do not, neither, for thou then destroy'st
 That which I love thee for—thy virtues. Here, here,
 [She gives the sword to Hippolito]
 Thou'rt crueller, and kill'st me with disdain;
 505 To die so sheds no blood, yet 'tis worse pain.
 Exit Hippolito
 Not speak to me! Not look! Not bid farewell!
 Hated! This must not be; some means I'll try.
 Would all whores were as honest now as I. Exit

Enter Candido, [Viola,] his Wife, George, and two Prentices in the shop; Fustigo enters, walking by 510 GEORGE See, gentleman, what you lack. A fine holland, a fine cambric, see what you buy.
 FIRST PRENTICE Holland for shirts, cambric for bands, what is't you lack?
 515 FUSTIGO [aside] 'Sfoot, I lack 'em all, nay more, I lack money to buy 'em: let me see, let me look again; mass, this is the shop.—[To Wife] What, coz! Sweet coz! How dost, i'faith, since last night after candlelight? We had

443 own i.e. country
 449 read lecture, sermonize
 462 shivers splinters glass mirror

464 To have...set to have a rich fool from sunrise to sunset

465 mete measure (i.e. embrace)
 luxurious lustful

467 whips Whores were whipped for their offences by beadles.

start recoil suddenly in alarm

470 long-tailed possibly in reference to a whip or rope (officer could mean 'jailer'

or 'executioner' as well as 'petty officer of justice' or 'constable')

476 time...me the passage of time has prevented me (from staying)

484 mixtures promiscuous sexual relations 487-8 drunk healths...arms One of the extravagant gestures of a gallant to his mistress consisted of piercing with his dagger a vein in his arm to procure a cupful of blood (sometimes mixed with wine), which was then drunk to her health.

498 blood sexual passion

ranged been inconstant

7.0.1-2 Enter...walking by As at the start of Sc. 5, those associated with the shop presumably reveal it and set it out in the discovery space—probably the central door providing access to the stage (if, as seems likely, the Fortune Theatre was equipped with three doors).

1 holland linen fabric, originally from the province of Holland in the Netherlands 2 cambric fine white linen, originally made at Cambray in Flanders

10 good sport, i'faith, had we not? And when shall's laugh again?
WIFE When you will, cousin.
FUSTIGO Spoke like a kind Lacedemonian. I see yonder's thy husband.
WIFE Ay, there's the sweet youth, God bless him.
15 FUSTIGO And how is't cousin? And how? How is't, thou squall?
WIFE Well, cousin; how fare you?
FUSTIGO How fare I? Troth, for sixpence a meal, wench, as well as heart can wish, with calves' chawdrons and 20 chitterlings; besides I have a punk after supper, as good as a roasted apple.
CANDIDO Are you my wife's cousin?
FUSTIGO I am, sir; what hast thou to do with that?
CANDIDO O, nothing, but you're welcome.
25 FUSTIGO The devil's dung in thy teeth! I'll be welcome whether thou wilt or no, I.—What ring's this, coz?
Very pretty and fantastical, i'faith; let's see it.
WIFE Puh! Nay, you wrench my finger.
FUSTIGO [taking the ring] I ha' sworn I'll ha't, and I hope 30 you will not let my oaths be cracked in the ring, will you?—I hope, sir, you are not melancholy at this, for all your great looks. Are you angry?
CANDIDO
Angry? Not I, sir; nay, if she can part
So easily with her ring, 'tis with my heart.
35 GEORGE Suffer this, sir, and suffer all. A whoreson gull, to—
CANDIDO
Peace, George; when she has reaped what I have sown,
She'll say one grain tastes better of her own
Than whole sheaves gathered from another's land:
40 Wit's never good till bought at a dear hand.
[Fustigo and Wife kiss]
GEORGE But in the mean time she makes an ass of somebody.
SECOND PRENTICE See, see, see, sir, as you turn your back they do nothing but kiss.
CANDIDO
45 No matter, let 'em; when I touch her lip
I shall not feel his kisses, no, nor miss Any of her lip; no harm in kissing is.
Look to your business, pray make up your wares.

FUSTIGO Troth, coz, and well remembered, I would thou wouldst give me five yards of lawn to make my punk 50 some falling bands o' the fashion—three falling one upon another, for that's the new edition now. She's out of linen horribly, too; troth, sh'has never a good smock to her back neither, but one that has a great many patches in't, and that I'm fain to wear myself 55 for want of shift, too. Prithee, put me into wholesome napery, and bestow some clean commodities upon us.
WIFE Reach me those cambrics and the lawns hither.
CANDIDO What to do, wife? To lavish out my goods upon a fool?
FUSTIGO Fool! 'Snails, eat the 'fool', or I'll so batter your crown that it shall scarce go for five shillings.
SECOND PRENTICE Do you hear, sir? You're best be quiet, and say a fool tells you so.
FUSTIGO [to Candido] Nails, I think so, for thou tell'st me.
60 CANDIDO
Are you angry, sir, because I named thee fool?
Trust me, you are not wise in mine own house
And to my face to play the antic thus.
If you'll needs play the madman, choose a stage
Of lesser compass, where few eyes may note 70 Your actions' error; but if still you miss,
As here you do, for one clap, ten will hiss.
FUSTIGO Zounds, cousin, he talks to me as if I were a scurvy tragedian.
SECOND PRENTICE [aside to George] Sirrah George, I ha' 75 thought upon a device how to break his pate, beat him soundly, and ship him away.
GEORGE [aside to Second Prentice] Do't.
SECOND PRENTICE [aside to George] I'll go in, pass thorough 80 the house, give some of our fellow prentices the watchword when they shall enter, then come and fetch my master in by a wile, and place one in the hall to hold him in conference, whilst we cudgel the gull out of his coxcomb.
GEORGE [aside to Second Prentice] Do't; away, do't.
85 WIFE Must I call twice for these cambrics and lawns?
CANDIDO Nay, see, you anger her, George, prithee dispatch.
SECOND PRENTICE Two of the choicest pieces are in the warehouse, sir.
CANDIDO Go fetch them presently.
90 FUSTIGO Ay, do, make haste, sirrah. Exit Second Prentice

12 Lacedemonian wanton (i.e. like Helen of Troy, who abandoned her husband in Lacedemon)
16 squall wench (a term of both endearment and opprobrium)
19 chawdrons entrails used for food
20 chitterlings smaller intestines stuffed with forcemeat and fried or boiled 30 cracked in the ring If a coin had a crack which extended from its edge beyond the ring which encircled the sovereign's head, it was no longer acceptable as currency.

32 great looks serious countenance
40 Wit's...hand proverbial (Tilley W567)
51 falling bands collars worn falling flat around the neck
52 new edition latest style
57 napery personal linen
61 'Snails eat (a) retract; (b) literally 'eat' (punning on fool as sweet dessert)

62 crown punning on 'head' and 'an English coin worth five shillings' go (a) be accepted, pass; (b) sell 65 for because
68 antic fool
69–72 choose a stage...hiss a metatheatrical allusion to the indoor theatres used by the children's companies, which held fewer spectators than the public amphitheatres
79 thorough through

- CANDIDO
Why were you such a stranger all this while,
Being my wife's cousin?
FUSTIGO Stranger? No sir, I'm a natural Milaner born.
- 95 CANDIDO I perceive still it is your natural guise to mistake me, but you are welcome, sir; I much wish your acquaintance.
FUSTIGO My acquaintance? I scorn that, i'faith; I hope my acquaintance goes in chains of gold three-and-fifty times 100 double—you know who I mean, coz: the posts of his gate are a-painting, too.
Enter the Second Prentice SECOND PRENTICE [to Candido] Signor Pandulfo the merchant desires conference with you.
CANDIDO
Signor Pandulfo? I'll be with him straight.
105 Attend your mistress and the gentleman. Exit
WIFE [to Prentices] When do you show those pieces?
FUSTIGO [to Prentices] Ay, when do you show those pieces?
ALL THE PRENTICES Presently, sir, presently; we are but charging them.
110 FUSTIGO Come, sirrah, you flat-cap, where be these whites?
GEORGE Flat-cap! Hark in your ear, sir—[aside to Fustigo] you're a flat fool, an ass, a gull, and I'll thrum you.— [Aloud] Do you see this cambric, sir?
FUSTIGO [to Wife] 'Sfoot, coz, a good jest! Did you hear 115 him? He told me in my ear I was 'a flat fool, an ass, a gull, and I'll thrum you.—Do you see this cambric,
sir?
WIFE What, not my men, I hope?
FUSTIGO No, not your men, but one of your men, i'faith.
120 FIRST PRENTICE [showing a piece of cloth] I pray, sir, come hither; what say you to this? Here's an excellent good one.
FUSTIGO Ay, marry, this likes me well; cut me off some half-score yards.
125 SECOND PRENTICE [aside to Fustigo] Let your whores cut.
You're an impudent coxcomb, you get none, and yet
I'll thrum you.—[Aloud] A very good cambric, sir.
- FUSTIGO Again, again, as God judge me! [To Wife] 'Sfoot, coz, they stand thrumming here with me all day, and yet I get nothing. 130
FIRST PRENTICE A word, I pray, sir; you must not be angry:
prentices have hot bloods—young fellows. What say you to this piece? Look you, 'tis so delicate, so soft, so even, so fine a thread, that a lady may wear it.
FUSTIGO 'Sfoot, I think so: if a knight marry my punk, a 135 lady shall wear it. Cut me off twenty yards; thou'rt an honest lad.
FIRST PRENTICE Not without money, gull, and I'll thrum you too.
ALL THE PRENTICES Gull, we'll thrum you. 140
FUSTIGO
O Lord, sister, did you not hear something cry thump?
Zounds, your men here make a plain ass of me.
WIFE What, to my face so impudent?
GEORGE
Ay, in a cause so honest we'll not suffer
Our master's goods to vanish moneyless. 145
WIFE
You will not suffer them?
SECOND PRENTICE No, and you may blush
In going about to vex so mild a breast
As is our master's.
WIFE [to Fustigo] Take away those pieces.
Cousin, I give them freely.
FUSTIGO Mass, and I'll take 'em as freely. 150
ALL THE PRENTICES We'll make you lay 'em down again more freely.
[Prentices beat Fustigo with clubs]
WIFE
Help, help, my brother will be murdered!
Enter Candido
CANDIDO
How now, what coil is here? Forbear, I say.
GEORGE
He calls us flat-caps, and abuses us. 155
CANDIDO
Why, sirs? Do such examples flow from me?

92 stranger Candido asks why Fustigo did not reveal his identity; but in his reply Fustigo interprets stranger to mean 'foreigner'.
94 natural native (but in Candido's response 'inborn')
95 mistake misunderstand
97 acquaintance knowledge beyond recognition but less than intimacy (but Fustigo in his response professes his acquaintance to be with a specific wealthy and influential city official)
99 chains of gold either as worn by a well-dressed gentleman or associated with a city office 100-1 the posts... a-painting Posts were erected outside mayors', sheriffs', or aldermen's houses for exhibiting proclamations and were newly painted at the start of the official's term of office.

109 charging loading (the goods), with a pun on 'charging with gunpowder' playing on pieces = fire-arms
110 flat-cap A slighting term for a citizen and tradesmen, from the woollen caps apprentices were required to wear.
whites white cloths or fabrics 112 flat punning also on the senses (a) dull, stupid; (b) downright thrum beat 123 likes pleases
124 yards Second Prentice interprets as 'penises'

125 cut castrate
129 thrumming (a) i.e. threatening to 'thrum' or 'beat'; (b) provoking (literally, 'striking something with the fingers as if playing on a musical instrument')
141 cry thump make a thumping sound; thump
152.1 Prentices... clubs Although Second Prentice at ll. 79-84 had set out the strategy for prentices other than George and First and Second Prentices to enter, additional assistance seems uncalled for to overpower Fustigo, especially since the same three apparently get the better of Crambo and Poh at 12.99.1.
154 coil fuss, commotion

Scene 7

the pasyent man & the onest hore

WIFE
 They are of your keeping, sir.—Alas, poor brother.
 FUSTIGO I'faith, they ha' peppered me, sister: look, does 't not spin? Call you these prentices? I'll ne'er play at 160 cards more when clubs is trump: I have a goodly coxcomb, sister, have I not?
 CANDIDO
 Sister and brother? Brother to my wife?
 FUSTIGO If you have any skill in heraldry, you may soon know that; break but her pate, and you shall see her 165 blood and mine is all one.
 CANDIDO A surgeon, run, a surgeon! [Exit First Prentice]
 Why then wore you that forgåd name of cousin?
 FUSTIGO Because it's a common thing to call 'coz' and 'ningle' nowadays all the world over.
 CANDIDO
 170 Cousin! A name of much deceit, folly, and sin,
 For under that common-abused word,
 Many an honest-tempered citizen
 Is made a monster, and his wife trained out
 To foul adulterous action, full of fraud.
 175 I may well call that word a city's bawd.
 FUSTIGO Troth, brother, my sister would needs ha' me take upon me to gull your patience a little; but it has made double gules on my coxcomb.
 WIFE
 What, playing the woman? Blabbing now, you fool?
 CANDIDO
 180 O, my wife did but exercise a jest upon your wit.
 FUSTIGO
 'Sfoot, my wit bleeds for't, methinks.
 CANDIDO
 Then let this warning more of sense afford.
 The name of cousin is a bloody word.
 FUSTIGO I'll ne'er call coz again whilst I live, to have such 185 a coil about it. This should be a coronation day, for my head runs claret lustily. Exit
Enter an Officer
 CANDIDO
 Go wish the surgeon to have great respect.—
 [Exit Second Prentice]
 How now, my friend? What, do they sit today?
 OFFICER
 Yes, sir, they expect you at the senate-house.
 CANDIDO
 190 I thank your pains, I'll not be last man there.—
Exit Officer
 My gown, George; go, my gown.—A happy land,
 Where grave men meet, each cause to understand;

Whose consciences are not cut out in bribes
 To gull the poor man's right, but in even scales
 Peise rich and poor, without corruption's vails.— 195
 Come, where's the gown?
 GEORGE I cannot find the key, sir.
 CANDIDO Request it of your mistress.
 WIFE Come not to me for any key.
 I'll not be troubled to deliver it.
 CANDIDO
 Good wife, kind wife, it is a needful trouble, 200
 But for my gown.
 WIFE Moths swallow down your gown!
 You set my teeth on edge with talking on't.
 CANDIDO
 Nay, prithee, sweet, I cannot meet without it;
 I should have a great fine set on my head.
 WIFE
 Set on your coxcomb! Tush, fine me no fines. 205
 CANDIDO
 Believe me, sweet, none greets the senate-house
 Without his robe of reverence, that's his gown.
 WIFE
 Well, then, you're like to cross that custom once.
 You get nor key nor gown; and so depart.
 [Aside] This trick will vex him sure, and fret his heart. 210
Exit
 CANDIDO
 Stay, let me see, I must have some device.—
 My cloak's too short: fie, fie, no cloak will do't;
 It must be something fashioned like a gown,
 With my arms out.—O, George, come hither, George,
 I prithee lend me thine advice. 215
 GEORGE Troth, sir, were it any but you, they would break open chest.
 CANDIDO
 O, no. Break open chest? That's a thief's office.
 Therein you counsel me against my blood:
 'Twould show impatience, that. Any meek means 220
 I would be glad to embrace. Mass, I have got it:
 Go, step up, fetch me down one of the carpets—
 The saddest coloured carpet, honest George—
 Cut thou a hole i'th'middle for my neck,
 Two for mine arms. Nay, prithee, look not strange. 225
 GEORGE
 I hope you do not think, sir, as you mean.
 CANDIDO
 Prithee, about it quickly, the hour chides me;
 Warily, George, softly, take heed of eyes. Exit George
 Out of two evils he's accounted wise

158 peppered	severely beaten	punning on 'gull'	accusation
't	i.e. his head	185-6 coronation day...claret	Fustigo
160 clubs is trump	proverbial (Tilley C453)	likens his blood to wine flowing in the	195 Peise
169 ningle	boy-favourite, catamite; intimate	city's conduits to celebrate a coronation	vails
170 Cousin	with a pun on 'cozen'	day; and he has a bloody 'crown'.	casual profits, gratuities; perquisites
173 monster	cuckold (horned)	187 wish	204 set on my head trained	lured	wish	imposed on me (but 178 gules	red (heraldic term)—possibly	respect	Candido's Wife takes head literally)
		deferential regard, care	208 cross
		192 cause	contravene
		(a) matter in dispute; (b) charge,	222 carpets
			table-covers 223 saddest
			soberest

230 That can pick out the least; the fine imposed
 For an ungowndè senator is about Forty crusadoes, the carpet not 'bove four.
 Thus have I chosen the lesser evil yet,
 Preserved my patience, foiled her desperate wit.
Enter George [with the carpet]
 235 GEORGE Here, sir, here's the carpet.
 CANDIDO
 O, well done, George, we'll cut it just i'th'midst.
[They cut a hole in the carpet]
 'Tis very well, I thank thee; help it on.
 GEORGE It must come over your head, sir, like a wench's petticoat.
[Candido puts the carpet on]
 CANDIDO
 240 Thou'rt in the right, good George, it must indeed.
 Fetch me a night-cap, for I'll gird it close,
 As if my health were queasy. 'Twill show well
 For a rude careless night-gown, will't not, think'st?
 GEORGE Indifferent well, sir, for a night-gown, being girt 245 and pleated.
 CANDIDO Ay, and a night-cap on my head.
 GEORGE
 That's true, sir.—I'll run and fetch one, and a staff.
Exit
 CANDIDO
 For thus they cannot choose but conster it:
 One that is out of health takes no delight,
 250 Wears his apparel without appetite,
 And puts on heedless raiment without form.—
Enter George [with a night-cap and staff]
 So, so, kind George, [putting on the night-cap and taking the staff] be secret now, and prithee
 Do not laugh at me till I'm out of sight.
 GEORGE I laugh? Not I, sir.
 CANDIDO Now to the senate-house:
 Methinks I'd rather wear, without a frown,
 A patient carpet than an angry gown. Exit
 GEORGE Now looks my master just like one of our carpet-knights, only he's somewhat the honester of the two.
Enter [Viola,] Candido's Wife [with a key] 260 WIFE What, is your master gone?
 GEORGE Yes, forsooth, his back is but new turned.
 WIFE
 And in his cloak? Did he not vex and swear?
 GEORGE [aside] No, but he'll make you swear anon.—[To her] No, indeed, he went away like a lamb.

WIFE
 Key, sink to hell! Still patient, patient still!
 I am with child to vex him. Prithee, George,
 If e'er thou look'st for favour at my hands,
 Uphold one jest for me.
 GEORGE Against my master?
 WIFE 'Tis a mere jest, in faith. Say, wilt thou do't?
 GEORGE Well, what is't?
 WIFE
 Here, take this key. Thou know'st where all things lie.
 Put on thy master's best apparel, gown,
 Chain, cap, ruff, everything, be like himself,
 And 'gainst his coming home, walk in the shop;
 275 Fain the same carriage, and his patient look.
 'Twill breed but a jest thou know'st; speak, wilt thou?
 GEORGE
 'Twill wrong my master's patience.
 WIFE Prithee, George.
 GEORGE Well, if you'll save me harmless, and put me under covert-baron, I am content to please you, provided it 280 may breed no wrong against him.
 WIFE
 No wrong at all. Here, take the key; begone.
 If any vex him, this; if not this, none.
Exeunt [Candido's Wife at one door, George at another]
Enter a Bawd and Roger
 Sc. 8
 BAWD O Roger, Roger, where's your mistress, where's your mistress? There's the finest, neatest gentleman at my house but newly come over. O, where is she, where is she, where is she?
 ROGER My mistress is abroad, but not amongst 'em. My 5 mistress is not the whore now that you take her for.
 BAWD How? Is she not a whore? Do you go about to take away her good name, Roger? You are a fine pander, indeed.
 ROGER I tell you, Madonna Fingerlock, I am not sad for 10 nothing; I ha' not eaten one good meal this three-and-thirty days: I had wont to get sixteen pence by fetching a pottle of Hippocras, but now those days are past. We had as good doings, Madonna Fingerlock—she within doors and I without—as any poor young couple 15 in Milan.
 BAWD God's my life, and is she changed now?
 ROGER I ha' lost by her squeamishness more than would have builded twelve bawdy houses.

232 crusadoes Portuguese coins stamped with a cross, worth about 2s. 4d.
 233 lesser evil proverbial (Tilley E207)
 241 gird... close fasten tightly, or tie firmly 243 night-gown an overgarment worn indoors and out both during the day and at night
 244 Indifferent moderately 248 conster explain, interpret 256–7 Methinks...gown Candido prefers to express his patience in wearing the improvised table-cloth than to submit to anger in demanding his gown.

 258–9 carpet-knights one knighted on a carpet before the throne in peacetime rather than on the battle-field; often implying a voluptuary; the term had particular topicality in 1604 since James I created more than 1000 knights in his first year as king.
 266 am with child long inordinately
 275 'gainst in readiness for

280 covert-baron protection (originally a legal term relating to the condition of a wife under the cover, authority, or protection of her husband)
 8.3 come over arrived from abroad
 10 Fingerlock Possibly in reference to tight curls (a lock twisted on the finger), but the name also carries clear bawdy innuendoes.
 14 doings business (sexual pun)

Scene 8

The Humours of the Patient Man, and the Longing Wife.

20 BAWD And had she no time to turn honest but now? What a vile woman is this! Twenty pound a night, I'll be sworn, Roger, in good gold and no silver. Why, here was a time; if she should ha' picked out a time, it could not be better! Gold enough stirring; choice of men, choice of hair, choice of beards, choice of legs, and choice of every, every, everything. It cannot sink into my head that she should be such an ass. Roger, I never believe it.

ROGER Here she comes now.
Enter Bellafront

30 BAWD O sweet madonna, on with your loose gown, your felt and your feather! There's the sweetest, prop'rest, gallantest gentleman at my house; he smells all of musk and ambergris, his pocket full of crowns, flame-coloured doublet, red satin hose, carnation silk stockings, and a leg and a body, O!

BELLAFRONT
Hence, thou, our sex's monster, poisonous bawd, Lust's factor, and damnation's orator, Gossip of hell! Were all the harlots' sins Which the whole world contains numbered together, Thine far exceeds them all; of all the creatures That ever were created, thou art basest. What serpent would beguile thee of thy office? It is detestable; for thou liv'st Upon the dregs of harlots, guard'st the door, Whilst couples go to dancing: O coarse devil! Thou art the bastard's curse—thou brand'st his birth; The lecher's French disease, for thou dry-suck'st him; The harlot's poison, and thine own confusion.

BAWD Marry, come up, with a pox! Have you nobody to rail against but your bawd now?

BELLAFRONT
And you, knave pander, kinsman to a bawd—
ROGER [to Bawd] You and I, madonna, are cousins.
BELLAFRONT
Of the same blood and making, near allied, Thou, that slave to sixpence, base-mettled villain.

ROGER Sixpence? Nay, that's not so; I never took under two shillings fourpence—I hope I know my fee.

BELLAFRONT
I know not against which most to inveigh, For both of you are damned so equally. Thou never spar'st for oaths, swear'st anything, As if thy soul were made of shoe-leather: 'God damn me, gentleman, if she be within!' When in the next room she's found dallying.

ROGER If it be my vocation to swear, every man in his vocation; I hope my betters swear and damn themselves, and why should not I?

BELLAFRONT Roger, you cheat kind gentlemen.
ROGER The more gulls they.
BELLAFRONT Slave, I cashier thee.
BAWD An you do cashier him, he shall be entertained.
ROGER Shall I?—[To Bellafront] Then blurt o' your service.
BELLAFRONT [to Bawd]
As hell would have it, entertained by you! I dare the devil himself to match those two. Exit BAWD Marry gup, are you grown so holy, so pure, so honest, with a pox?
ROGER Scurvy honest punk! But stay, madonna, how must our agreement be now, for you know I am to have all the comings-in at the hall-door, and you at the chamber-door.
BAWD True, Roger, except my vails.
ROGER Vails, what vails?
BAWD Why, as thus: if a couple come in a coach, and light to lie down a little, then, Roger, that's my fee; and you may walk abroad, for the coachman himself is their pander.
ROGER Is 'a so? In truth, I have almost forgot, for want of exercise. But how if I fetch this citizen's wife to that gull, and that madonna to that gallant, how then?
BAWD Why then, Roger, you are to have sixpence a lane: so many lanes, so many sixpences.
ROGER Is't so? Then I see we two shall agree and live together.
BAWD Ay, Roger, so long as there be any taverns and bawdy houses in Milan. Exeunt

24 stirring available, in circulation	gallants because they showed off their shapely legs better than woollen hose.	come a worse except the devil come himself' (proverb: Tilley W910).
30 loose gown (the conventional dress of prostitutes)	37 factor agent, representative	73 Marry gup a corruption of 'Marry' (i.e. by Mary) 'go up' (get along)
31 felt hat	38 Gossip companion, crony	77 comings-in takings (the prospective client made payments at each stage of access to a prostitute)
33 prop'rest handsomest	54 base-mettled mean spirited (with a pun on the metal of the sixpence coin)	79 vails casual profits, gratuities; perquisites
33 ambergris perfume (a substance secreted in the intestines of the sperm-whale)	60 soul with a pun on 'sole'	82 light descend (from the coach)
flame-coloured traditionally associated with sexual encounters	63-4 If...vocation Cf. 'Let euery man abide in the same vocation wherein he was called', 1 Cor. 7:20 (Geneva Bible).	85 'a he
34 hose breeches	69 entertained employed, taken into service	89 lanes...sixpences i.e. sixpence for each lane passed through in conducting them hither carnation a shade of red resembling the colour of raw flesh	70 blurt o' 'snort on' or 'a fig for'
silk stockings Preferred by fashionable	72 devil...two Cf. 'There cannot lightly

Sc. 9 Enter Bellafront with a lute, pen, ink, and paper being placed before her [on a table].

Song

BELLAFRONT [singing]

The courtier's flatt'ring jewels,
Temptations only fuels;
The lawyer's ill-got moneys,
That suck up poor bees' honeys;
5 The citizen's son's riot,
The gallant's costly diet:
Silks and velvets, pearls and ambers,
Shall not draw me to their chambers.
Silks and velvets, (etc.)

She writes

10 O, 'tis in vain to write: it will not please;
Ink on this paper would ha' but presented
The foul black spots that stick upon my soul,
And rather make me loathsomer, than wrought
My love's impression in Hippolito's thought.
15 No, I must turn the chaste leaves of my breast,
And pick out some sweet means to breed my rest.
Hippolito, believe me, I will be
As true unto thy heart, as thy heart to thee,
And hate all men, their gifts, and company.

Enter Matteo, Castruccio, Fluello, and Pioratto

20 MATTEO You, goody punk, subaudi cockatrice, O you're a sweet whore of your promise, are you not, think you?
How well you came to supper to us last night! Mew, a whore and break her word! Nay, you may blush, and hold down your head at it well enough. 'Sfoot, ask 25 these gallants if we stayed not till we were as hungry as sergeants.

FLUELLO Ay, and their yeomen too.

CASTRUCCIO Nay, faith, acquaintance, let me tell you, you forgot yourself too much. We had excellent cheer, rare 30 vintage, and were drunk after supper.

PIORATTO And when we were in our woodcocks, sweet rogue, a brace of gulls, dwelling here in the city, came in and paid all the shot.

MATTEO Pox on her, let her alone.

BELLAFRONT

35 O, I pray do, if you be gentlemen;
I pray depart the house. Beshrew the door
For being so easily entreated. Faith,
I lent but little ear unto your talk—
My mind was busied otherwise, in troth—
40 And so your words did unregarded pass.

Let this suffice: I am not as I was.

FLUELLO 'I am not what I was!'—No, I'll be sworn thou art not, for thou wert honest at five, and now thou'rt a punk at fifteen. Thou wert yesterday a simple whore, and now thou'rt a cunning, cony-catching baggage 45 today.

BELLAFRONT

I'll say I'm worse; I pray forsake me then.

I do desire you leave me, gentlemen,
And leave yourselves. O, be not what you are—Spendthrifts of soul and body. 50

Let me persuade you to forsake all harlots:
Worse than the deadliest poisons, they are worse,
For o'er their souls hangs an eternal curse.

In being slaves to slaves, their labours perish.
They're seldom blessed with fruit, for ere it blossoms, 55
Many a worm confounds it.

They have no issue but foul ugly ones
That run along with them, e'en to their graves;

For 'stead of children, they breed rank diseases,

And all you gallants can bestow on them 60

Is that French infant, which ne'er acts but speaks.

What shallow son and heir, then, foolish gallants,

Would waste all his inheritance to purchase

A filthy, loathed disease, and pawn his body

To a dry evil? That usury's worst of all 65

When th'interest will eat out the principal.

MATTEO [aside] 'Sfoot, she gulls 'em the best! This is always her fashion, when she would be rid of any company that she cares not for, to enjoy mine alone.

FLUELLO What's here? Instructions, admonitions, and 70 caveats? Come out, you scabbard of vengeance.

[He draws his sword]

MATTEO Fluello, spurn your hounds when they fist; you shall not spurn my punk; I can tell you my blood is vexed.

FLUELLO Pox o' your blood; make it a quarrel. 75

MATTEO [drawing his sword] You're a slave! Will that serve turn?

ALL THE REST 'Sblood, hold, hold!

CASTRUCCIO Matteo, Fluello, for shame, put up.

MATTEO Spurn my sweet varlet! 80

BELLAFRONT O how many thus

Moved with a little folly have let out

Their souls in brothel-houses, fell down, and died

Just at their harlot's foot, as 'twere in pride!

FLUELLO Matteo, we shall meet. 85

9.0.1-2 Enter...table Presumably the items cited are placed in front of (before) Bellafront on a table rather than in advance of her entry, although the latter is possible.

11 presented represented

20 goody term of civility for a woman of humble station (here used ironically) subaudi understand, supply (Latin) cockatrice prostitute

22 Mew a mocking exclamation (imitative of a cat's cry)

31 in our woodcocks (a) 'eating our woodcocks', i.e. as a course of dinner;
(b) a 'woodcock's head' was a kind of tobacco pipe, so named from its shape,
so the sense may be 'smoking our pipes';
(c) 'being foolish' (from woodcock as a type of stupidity)

32 brace pair, couple

33 shot reckoning

36 Beshrew confound

45 baggage strumpet

61 that French infant i.e. venereal disease ne'er...speaks i.e. speaks (breaks out) whenever he acts

65 dry (a) withered; (b) sterile, unfruitful evil (a) malady, disease; (b) calamity, misfortune

71 scabbard of vengeance in reference to Bellafront

72 fist fart

79 put up sheathe your swords

Scene 9

The Honest Whore

MATTEO [sheathing his sword] Ay, ay, anywhere, saving at church; pray take heed we meet not there.

FLUELLO [to Bellafront, sheathing his sword] Adieu, damnation.

CASTRUCCIO [to Bellafront] Cockatrice, farewell.

PIORATTO
There's more deceit in women than in hell.
Exeunt [Castruccio, Fluello, Pioratto]

90 MATTEO Ha, ha, thou dost gull 'em so rarely, so naturally. If I did not think thou hadst been in earnest! Thou art a sweet rogue for't, i'faith.

BELLAFRONT
Why are not you gone too, Signor Matteo?
I pray depart my house. You may believe me,
95 In troth, I have no part of harlot in me.

MATTEO How's this?

BELLAFRONT
Indeed, I love you not, but hate you worse
Than any man, because you were the first Gave money for my soul. You brake the ice, 100 Which after turned a puddle; I was led
By your temptation to be miserable.
I pray seek out some other that will fall,
Or rather, I pray, seek out none at all.

MATTEO Is't possible, to be impossible: an honest whore? I have heard many honest wenches turn strumpets with a wet finger, but for a harlot to turn honest is one of Hercules' labours. It was more easy for him in one night to make fifty queans than to make one of them honest again in fifty years. Come, I hope thou dost but jest.

BELLAFRONT
110 'Tis time to leave off jesting; I had almost Jested away salvation. I shall love you
If you will soon forsake me.

MATTEO God buy thee.

BELLAFRONT
O, tempt no more women! Shun their weighty curse.
Women at best are bad; make them not worse.
115 You gladly seek our sex's overthrow,
But not to raise our states. For all your wrongs,
Will you vouchsafe me but due recompense,
To marry with me?

MATTEO How, marry with a punk, a cockatrice, a harlot?
120 Marry, faugh, I'll be burnt thorough the nose first.

BELLAFRONT
Why, la, these are your oaths! You love to undo us,
To put heaven from us, whilst our best hours waste;
You love to make us lewd, but never chaste.

MATTEO
I'll hear no more of this. This ground upon Thou'rt damned: for alt'ring thy religion. Exit 125

BELLAFRONT
Thy lust and sin speak so much. Go thou, my ruin,
The first fall my soul took. By my example
I hope few maidens now will put their heads
Under men's girdles. Who least trusts is most wise:
Men's oaths do cast a mist before our eyes. 130
My best of wit be ready; now I go,
By some device to greet Hippolito. [Exit]

Enter a Servant setting out a table, on which he places a skull, a picture, a book, and a taper

SERVANT So, this is Monday morning, and now must I to my housewifery. Would I had been created a shoemaker, for all the gentle craft are gentlemen every Monday by their copy, and scorn then to work one true stitch. My master means sure to turn me into a student, for here's my book, here my desk, here my light, this my close chamber, and [pointing to the picture] here my punk; so that this dull, drowsy first day of the week makes me half a priest, half a chandler, half a painter, half a sexton, ay, and half a bawd, for all this day my office is to do nothing but keep the door. To prove it, look you, this good face and yonder gentleman, so soon as ever my back's turned, will be naught together. 10

Enter Hippolito

HIPPOLITO Are all the windows shut?

SERVANT Close, sir, as the fist of a courtier that hath stood in three reigns. 15

HIPPOLITO
Thou art a faithful servant, and observ'st
The calendar both of my solemn vows
And ceremonious sorrow. Get thee gone.
I charge thee on thy life, let not the sound 20
Of any woman's voice pierce through that door.

SERVANT
If they do, my lord, I'll pierce some of them.
What will your lordship have to breakfast?

HIPPOLITO Sighs.

90 rarely splendidly, finely

105-6 with a wet finger easily, with little effort; without hesitation, readily. See note to 2.4-5.

107-8 Hercules' labours... queans Hercules ravished King Thespius's fifty daughters in a single night.

108 queans harlots

112 God buy thee good-bye. Matteo presumably intends to leave Bellafront at this point; but her response postpones his exit.

120 burnt... nose i.e. in the advanced stages of the ravages of syphilis

128-9 heads... girdles i.e. in subjection (originally in reference to the practice of wearing keys at a girdle); proverbial (Tilley H248)

10.0.1 setting out a table Since a table is required in the previous scene, setting out may mean 'furnishing' or 'putting things on' rather than 'bringing on stage'.

2 housewifery housekeeping, management of household affairs

3 the gentle craft the trade of shoemaking

3-4 gentlemen every Monday Shoemakers kept Monday a holiday; the Servant associates their idleness on this day with gentlemanly behaviour.

4 copy indentures

7 close private, secluded

12 good face person with a smooth or fair face yonder gentleman i.e. Hippolito

13 naught naughty (with bawdy innuendo)

15 stood endured; flourished

18 calendar register, record

- 25 SERVANT What to dinner?
HIPPOLITO Tears.
SERVANT The one of them, my lord, will fill you too full of wind, the other wet you too much. What to supper?
HIPPOLITO That which now thou canst not get me, the 30 constancy of a woman.
SERVANT Indeed, that's harder to come by than ever was Ostend.
HIPPOLITO Prithee away.
SERVANT I'll make away myself presently, which few 35 servants will do for their lords, but rather help to make them away. Now to my door-keeping; I hope to pick something out of it. Exit
HIPPOLITO [studying the picture]
My Infelice's face: her brow, her eye,
The dimple on her cheek; and such sweet skill
40 Hath from the cunning workman's pencil flown,
These lips look fresh and lively as her own, Seeming to move and speak. 'Las! Now I see
The reason why fond women love to buy Adulterate complexion: here 'tis read,
45 False colours last after the true be dead.
Of all the roses grafted on her cheeks,
Of all the graces dancing in her eyes,
Of all the music set upon her tongue,
Of all that was past woman's excellence
50 In her white bosom—look! A painted board Circumscribes all. Earth can no bliss afford.
Nothing of her but this? This cannot speak.
It has no lap for me to rest upon,
No lip worth tasting; here the worms will feed, 55 As in her coffin. Hence, then, idle art,
True love's best pictured in a true-love's heart.
Here art thou drawn, sweet maid, till this be dead,
So that thou liv'st twice, twice art buried.
Thou figure of my friend, lie there. [Taking skull]
What's here?
60 Perhaps this shrewd pate was mine enemy's.
'Las! Say it were, I need not fear him now.
For all his braves, his contumelious breath,
His frowns, though dagger-pointed, all his plots,
Though ne'er so mischievous, his Italian pills, 65 His quarrels, and that common fence, his law:
- See, see, they're all eaten out; here's not left one!
How clean they're picked away! To the bare bone!
How mad are mortals then to rear great names
On tops of swelling houses! Or to wear out Their fingers' ends in dirt, to scrape up gold!— 70
Not caring, so that sumpter-horse, the back,
Be hung with gaudy trappings, with what coarse,
Yea, rags most beggarly, they clothe the soul.
Yet, after all, their gayness looks thus foul.
What fools are men to build a garish tomb 75
Only to save the carcass whilst it rots,
To maintain't long in stinking, make good carrion,
But leave no good deeds to preserve them sound;
For good deeds keep men sweet, long above ground.
And must all come to this? Fools, wise, all hither? 80
Must all heads thus at last be laid together?
Draw me my picture then, thou grave, neat workman,
[To skull] After this fashion, [to picture] not like this;
these colours
In time, kissing but air, will be kissed off.
[To skull] But here's a fellow—that which he lays on 85
Till doomsday alters not complexion.
Death's the best painter then; they that draw shapes,
And live by wicked faces, are but God's apes.
They come but near the life, and there they stay.
This fellow draws life too; his art is fuller: 90
The pictures which he makes are without colour.
Enter his Servant
SERVANT Here's a person would speak with you, sir.
HIPPOLITO Ha!
SERVANT A person, sir, would speak with you.
HIPPOLITO Vicar?
95 SERVANT Vicar? No sir, h'as too good a face to be a vicar yet—a youth, a very youth.
HIPPOLITO
What youth? Of man or woman? Lock the doors.
SERVANT If it be a woman, marrowbones and potato pies 100 keep me for meddling with her, for the thing has got the breeches; 'tis a male varlet sure, my lord, for a woman's tailor ne'er measured him.
HIPPOLITO
Let him give thee his message and be gone.

29–30 That which... woman Cf. the proverbs, 'Women are as wavering (changeable, inconstant) as the wind'
(Tilley 698), and 'A woman's mind
(a woman) is always mutable' (Tilley W674).
32 Ostend besieged by Spanish forces from 5
July 1601 to 11 Sept. 1604 34, 35–6 make... away (a) put out of the way; (b) put to death
43 fond foolish
44 Adulterate (a) counterfeit; (b) adulterous 59 figure representation friend beloved 64 Italian pills poisons

65 common...law recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'law the common fence'
fence defence; protection 66–7 one...bone a rhyming couplet; as elsewhere in the speech rhymes confer an element of formality
68–9 How mad...houses Hippolito mocks the vanity of human aspirations to greatness built on foundations of pride and arrogance.
69 swelling proud, haughty
71 so so long as sumpter-horse pack-horse
72 coarse coarse cloth, garments

83 this fashion...this i.e. the skull...
Infelice's portrait
85 lays on applies (i.e. paint) 88 wicked possibly with a pun on 'wicks' = lips
91 colour punning on the sense 'false appearance'
94 person pronounced in the same way as 'parson'
99 marrowbones and potato pies believed to be aphrodisiacs
101 male varlet 'masculine whore' in Thersites' phrase (Troilus and Cressida, 5.1.15–17)

- 105 SERVANT He says he's Signor Matteo's man, but I know he lies.
 HIPPOLITO How dost thou know it?
 SERVANT 'Cause h'as ne'er a beard. 'Tis his boy, I think, sir, whosoe'er paid for his nursing.
 HIPPOLITO Send him, and keep the door. [Exit Servant]
 [He] reads
 110 *Fata si liceat mihi
 fingere arbitrio meo, temperem zephyro levi
 vela.*
 I'd sail, were I to choose, not in the ocean.
 115 Cedars are shaken, when shrubs do feel no bruise.
Enter Bellafront, like a page, [with a letter]
 How? From Matteo?
 BELLAFRONT [giving a letter]
 Yes, my lord.
 HIPPOLITO Art sick?
 BELLAFRONT Not all in health, my lord.
 HIPPOLITO Keep off.
 BELLAFRONT I do.
 [Aside] Hard fate when women are compelled to woo.
 HIPPOLITO This paper does speak nothing.
 BELLAFRONT Yes, my lord,
 120 Matter of life it speaks, and therefore writ
 In hidden character; to me instruction
 My master gives, and, 'less you please to stay Till you both meet, I can the text display.
 HIPPOLITO Do so: read out.
 BELLAFRONT I am already out.
 125 Look on my face, and read the strangest story!
 HIPPOLITO What, villain, ho!
Enter his Servant
 SERVANT Call you, my lord?
 HIPPOLITO Thou slave, thou hast let in the devil.
 SERVANT Lord bless us, where? He's not cloven, my lord, 130 that I can see; besides, the devil goes more like a gentleman than a page. Good my lord, buon coraggio.
 HIPPOLITO Thou hast let in a woman in man's shape,
 And thou art damned for't.
 SERVANT Not damned, I hope, for putting in a woman to 135 a lord.
 HIPPOLITO Fetch me my rapier.—Do not: I shall kill thee.
 Purge this infected chamber of that plague
 That runs upon me thus; slave, thrust her hence.
- SERVANT Alas, my lord, I shall never be able to thrust her hence without help.—Come, mermaid, you must to sea 140 again.
 BELLAFRONT Hear me but speak; my words shall be all music.
 Hear me but speak.
 [Knocking within]
 HIPPOLITO Another beats the door;
 T'other she-devil, look.
 SERVANT Why then, hell's broke loose. 145
 HIPPOLITO Hence, guard the chamber; let no more come on:
 One woman serves for man's damnation.—
Exit [Servant]
 Beshrew thee, thou dost make me violate
 The chastest and most sanctimonious vow
 That e'er was entered in the court of heaven. 150
 I was on meditation's spotless wings
 Upon my journey thither; like a storm
 Thou beat'st my ripened cogitations
 Flat to the ground, and like a thief dost stand
 To steal devotion from the holy land. 155
 BELLAFRONT [kneeling]
 If woman were thy mother, if thy heart
 Be not all marble—or if't marble be,
 Let my tears soften it, to pity me—
 I do beseech thee, do not thus with scorn Destroy a woman.
 HIPPOLITO Woman, I beseech thee, 160
 Get thee some other suit; this fits thee not.
 I would not grant it to a kneeling queen;
 I cannot love thee, nor I must not. See
 The copy of that obligation
 Where my soul's bound in heavy penalties. 165
 BELLAFRONT [rising]
 She's dead, you told me; she'll let fall her suit.
 HIPPOLITO My vows to her fled after her to heaven.
 Were thine eyes clear as mine, thou might'st behold
 her Watching upon yon battlements of stars
 How I observe them. Should I break my bond, 170
 This board would rive in twain, these wooden lips
 Call me most perjured villain. Let it suffice
 I ha' set thee in the path; is't not a sign
 I love thee, when with one so most, most dear,
 I'll have thee fellows? All are fellows there. 175
 BELLAFRONT Be greater than a king: save not a body,
 But from eternal shipwreck keep a soul.

110–13 Fata...vela Seneca, Oedipus, 882–5: 'If it were possible to fashion fate according to my will, I would raise my sails to gentle winds.'

115 Cedars...bruise proverbial (Tilley C208) bruise hurt, injury

124 out on display (i.e. she is the text)
 129–30 He's...see recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'he's not cloven that I can see'
 131 buon coraggio good courage (Italian); coraggio very likely picks up a common sense of 'courage': sexual vigour, lust.

140 mermaid prostitute
 149 sanctimonious sacred
 156–7 heart...marble proverbial (Tilley H311)
 169 yon battlements of stars in reference to the theatre 'heavens'
 171 This board i.e. the picture

- If not, and that again sin's path I tread,
The grief be mine, the guilt fall on thy head.
- 180 HIPPOLITO Stay, and take physic for it: read this book,
Ask counsel of this head what's to be done;
He'll strike it dead, that 'tis damnation
If you turn Turk again. O, do it not!
Though heaven cannot allure you to do well, 185 From doing ill let hell fright you, and learn this:
The soul whose bosom lust did never touch
Is God's fair bride, and maidens' souls are such;
The soul that, leaving chastity's white shore,
Swims in hot sensual streams, is the devil's whore.
Enter his Servant [with a letter]
190 How now, who comes?
SERVANT No more knaves, my lord, that wear smocks.
Here's a letter from Doctor Benedict. I would not enter his man, though he had hairs at his mouth, for fear he should be a woman, for some women have beards; 195 marry, they are half witches.—'Slid, you are a sweet youth to wear a codpiece, and have no pins to stick upon't.
HIPPOLITO I'll meet the doctor, tell him; yet tonight
I cannot; but at morrow rising sun 200 I will not fail. Go.—Woman, fare thee well.
Exeunt [Hippolito and Servant]
BELLAFRONT
The lowest fall can be but into hell.
It does not move him; I must therefore fly
From this undoing city, and with tears
Wash off all anger from my father's brow.
205 He cannot, sure, but joy seeing me new born.
A woman honest first, and then turn whore,
Is, as with me, common to thousands more;
But from a strumpet to turn chaste: that sound
Has oft been heard, that woman hardly found. Exit
- Enter Fustigo [with his head bound in a cloth],
Crambo, and Poh*
FUSTIGO Hold up your hands, gentlemen: [giving money]
here's one, two, three—nay, I warrant they are sound pistoles, and without flaws; I had them of my sister, and I know she uses to put up nothing that's cracked—2 three, four, five, six, seven, eight, and nine. By this hand, bring me but a piece of his blood and you shall have nine more. I'll lurk in a tavern not far off and provide supper to close up the end of the tragedy. The linen-draper's, remember. Stand to't, I beseech you, and play your parts perfectly. 10
CRAMBO Look you, signor, 'tis not your gold that we weigh.
FUSTIGO Nay, nay, weigh it and spare not; if it lack one grain of corn, I'll give you a bushel of wheat to make it up.
CRAMBO But by your favour, signor, which of the servants
15 is it, because we'll punish justly.
FUSTIGO Marry, 'tis the head man—you shall taste him by his tongue—a pretty, tall prating fellow, with a Tuscalonian beard.
POH Tuscalonian? Very good. 20
FUSTIGO Cod's life, I was ne'er so thrummed since I was a gentleman; my coxcomb was dry-beaten as if my hair had been hemp.
CRAMBO We'll dry-beat some of them.
FUSTIGO Nay, it grew so high that my sister cried 'murder' 25 out very manfully. I have her consent, in a manner, to have him peppered, else I'll not do't to win more than ten cheaters do at a rifling. Break but his pate or so, only his mazer, because I'll have his head in a cloth as well as mine—he's a linen-draper, and may take 30 enough. I could enter mine action of battery against him, but we mayhaps be both dead and rotten before the lawyers would end it.
CRAMBO No more to do, but ensconce yourself i'th' tavern; provide no great cheer—couple of capons, some pheas- 35
- 178 that if 180 physic for it medicine to cure you of sinning
this book i.e. the skull
182-3 He'll... again i.e. the skull will strike your sin dead by showing you that if you turn infidel again (return to whoredom), you cannot escape damnation.
191 knaves... smocks i.e. women disguised as men 192 enter show in 196-7 codpiece... upon't Alluding to a contemporary fashion; but also punning on pins/penis.
202-4 I must... brow An intention not acted upon; Bellafront next appears in Bedlam.
203 undoing ruinous 208-9 sound... found i.e. news of such transformations is frequently circulated, but is very rarely true
11.3 pistoles Spanish gold coins worth 16s.
- 6d. to 18s. each (with a possible pun on 'pizzles')
4 she... cracked in allusion to a crack in the ring of a coin (with a bawdy reference to vagina), which would render it unacceptable as currency put up stow away (with bawdy innuendo)
12-14 if it lack... make it up i.e. if the amount Fustigo has given is short in the smallest degree, he will make amends by overcompensation
19 Tuscalonian Tuscan, i.e. golden yellow or straw-coloured—an instance of Fustigo's swaggering bombast
21 Cod's God's
22-3 my coxcomb... hemp recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'His coxcomb was dry-beaten as if his hair had been hemp'.
22 dry-beaten beaten as to dry clothes (hemp would require a lot of such beating) 23 hemp coarse, strong fibre used for rope and stout fabrics
24 dry-beat possibly with a pun on the sense 'beat severely without drawing blood'
27-8 not do't... rifling recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'not to win more than ten cheaters do at a rifling'
28 cheaters (a) false dice; (b) those who win money with false dice rifling A gambling game in which the highest roll of the dice takes all money wagered.
29 mazer head, face
32 mayhaps may perhaps 34-6 No more... pie or so Crambo asks Fustigo to order a meal with which to celebrate their success in the venture for which he and Poh have been hired.

- ants, plovers, an orangeado pie or so. But how bloody soe'er the day be, sally you not forth.
- FUSTIGO No, no; nay, if I stir, somebody shall stink. I'll not budge, I'll lie like a dog in a manger.
- 40 CRAMBO Well, well, to the tavern; let not our supper be raw, for you shall have blood enough—your bellyful.
- FUSTIGO That's all, so God sa' me, I thirst after: blood for blood, bump for bump, nose for nose, head for head, plaster for plaster; and so farewell. What shall I call 45 your names, because I'll leave word if any such come to the bar.
- CRAMBO My name is Corporal Crambo.
POH And mine, Lieutenant Poh. Exit
- CRAMBO Poh is as tall a man as ever opened oyster; I 50 would not be the devil to meet Poh. Farewell.
- FUSTIGO Nor I, by this light, if Poh be such a Poh.
Exeunt [Crambo following Poh, Fustigo at another door]
- Sc. 12 Enter [Viola,] Candido's Wife in her shop, and the two Prentices
- WIFE
What's o'clock now?
- SECOND PRENTICE 'Tis almost twelve.
- WIFE That's well.
The senate will leave wording presently,
But is George ready?
- SECOND PRENTICE Yes, forsooth, he's furbished.
- WIFE
Now as you ever hope to win my favour,
5 Throw both your duties and respects on him
With the like awe as if he were your master;
Let not your looks betray it with a smile
Or jeering glance to any customer;
Keep a true-settled countenance, and beware
10 You laugh not, whatsoever you hear or see.
- SECOND PRENTICE I warrant you, mistress; let us alone for keeping our countenance; for if I list, there's never a fool in all Milan shall make me laugh, let him play the fool never so like an ass, whether it be the fat court 15 fool, or the lean city fool.
- WIFE
Enough, then, call down George.
- SECOND PRENTICE I hear him coming.
- WIFE
Be ready with your legs, then. Let me see How court'sy would become him.—
Enter George [in Candido's apparel] Gallantly!
Beshrew my blood, a proper seemly man,
Of a choice carriage, walks with a good port. 20
- GEORGE I thank you, mistress; my back's broad enough, now my master's gown's on.
- WIFE
Sure, I should think it were the least of sin
To mistake the master, and to let him in.
- GEORGE 'Twere a good comedy of errors that, i'faith. 25
- SECOND PRENTICE Whist, whist, my master.
- WIFE You all know your tasks.
Enter Candido [dressed in the carpet], and exit presently
—God's my life, what's that he has got upon's back?
Who can tell?
- GEORGE [aside] That can I, but I will not. 30
- WIFE Girt about him like a madman. What, has he lost his cloak, too? This is the maddest fashion that e'er I saw. What said he, George, when he passed by thee?
- GEORGE Troth, mistress, nothing; not so much as a bee, he did not hum; not so much as a bawd, he did not 'hem'; 35 not so much as a cuckold, he did not 'ha'; neither hum, hem, nor ha; only stared me in the face, passed along,
and made haste in, as if my looks had worked with him to give him a stool.
- WIFE
Sure he's vexed now; this trick has moved his spleen. 40
He's angered now, because he uttered nothing;
And wordless wrath breaks out more violent.
Maybe he'll strive for place when he comes down;
But if thou lov'st me, George, afford him none.
- GEORGE Nay, let me alone to play my master's prize, as 45 long as my mistress warrants me. I'm sure I have his best clothes on, and I scorn to give place to any

36 orangeado candied orange-peel38 somebody shall stink i.e. presumably as a result of a wound; but perhaps Fustigo threatens to damage Crambo's and Poh's reputations in the event of failure39 dog in a manger churlish person who will neither use something himself nor allow others to do so (proverbial from Aesop's fable: Tilley D513)47 Crambo a game in which one player gives a word to which each of the others must provide a rhyme48 Poh an ejaculation of contemptuous rejection49 tall brave, valiant12.2 wording speaking, talking5 Throw . . . him recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: "Throw your duties and respects on him".17 legs bows18 court'sy in reference either to the bows of the two Prentices or to George's 'courteous comportment' in imitation of Candido, which Viola comments on in the remainder of the speech24 mistake . . . in i.e. falsely suppose George to be the master and to admit him in that capacity25 comedy of errors Possibly in allusion to Shakespeare's play, 2.2–3.1, in which Antipholus of Syracuse, mistaken for his twin, is allowed to enter, and the local Antipholus is kept at bay.

26 Whist a command for silence35 hem clear one's throat (i.e. give a signal or warning such as bawds used)38–9 made haste . . . stool recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'made haste as though my looks had worked with him to give him a stool'39 give . . . stool cause him to evacuate his bowels/send him to the privy45 play my master's prize A quibble drawn from fencing, which had three degrees—in descending order, Master's, Provost's, Scholar's—each attained in a public prize or competition.

that is inferior in apparel to me; that's an axiom, a 50 principle, and is observed as much as the fashion. Let that persuade you, then, that I'll shoulder with him for the upper hand in the shop, as long as this chain will maintain it.
 WIFE Spoke with the spirit of a master, though with the tongue of a prentice.
Enter Candido like a prentice 55 Why, how now, madman? What, in your tricky-coats?
 CANDIDO O peace, good mistress.
Enter Crambo and Poh
 See what you lack! What is't you buy? Pure callicoos, fine hollands, choice cambrics, neat lawns! See what you buy? Pray come near, my master will use you well, 60 he can afford you a pennyworth.
 WIFE Ay, that he can, out of a whole piece of lawn, i'faith.
 CANDIDO Pray see your choice here, gentlemen.
 WIFE O fine fool! What, a madman? A patient madman!
 Who ever heard of the like? Well, sir, I'll fit you and your humour presently. What? Cross-points?—I'll untie 65 'em all in a trice, I'll vex you, faith. Boy, take your cloak, quick, come. Exit [with First Prentice] [George takes off his hat to Candido]
 CANDIDO
 Be covered, George; this chain and welted gown, Bare to this coat? Then the world's upside down.
 70 GEORGE Um, um, hum.
 CRAMBO That's the shop, and there's the fellow.
 POH Ay, but the master is walking in there.
 CRAMBO No matter, we'll in.
 POH 'Sblood, dost long to lie in limbo?
 75 CRAMBO An limbo be in hell, I care not.
 CANDIDO Look you, gentlemen, your choice: cambrics?
 CRAMBO No, sir, some shirting.
 CANDIDO You shall.
 CRAMBO Have you none of this striped canvas for doublets?
 80 CANDIDO None striped, sir, but plain.
 SECOND PRENTICE I think there be one piece striped within.
 GEORGE Step, sirrah, and fetch it, hum, hum, hum.
[Exit Candido and returns with cloth] CANDIDO Look you, gentlemen, I'll make but one spreading; here's a piece of cloth—fine, yet shall wear like iron. 'Tis without fault, take this upon my word, 'tis 85 without fault.
 CRAMBO Then 'tis better than you, sirrah.
 CANDIDO
 Ay, and a number more. O, that each soul
 Were but as spotless as this innocent white,
 And had as few breaks in it. 90
 CRAMBO 'Twould have some, then; there was a fray here last day in this shop.
 CANDIDO
 There was indeed a little flea-biting.
 POH A gentleman had his pate broke: call you that but a flea-biting? 95
 CANDIDO He had so.
 CRAMBO Zounds, do you stand in't. (He strikes him)
 GEORGE 'Sfoot, clubs, clubs! Prentices, down with 'em! Ah you rogues, strike a citizen in's shop?
[Prentices beat and disarm Crambo and Poh]
 CANDIDO
 None of you stir, I pray; forbear, good George. 100 CRAMBO I beseech you, sir, we mistook our marks; deliver us our weapons.
 GEORGE Your head bleeds, sir; cry clubs.
 CANDIDO
 I say you shall not; pray be patient.
 Give them their weapons. Sirs, you're best be gone; 105
 I tell you here are boys more tough than bears.
 Hence, lest more fists do walk about your ears.
 CRAMBO and POH
 We thank you, sir. Exeunt [Crambo and Poh]
 CANDIDO You shall not follow them;
 Let them alone, pray; this did me no harm.
 Troth, I was cold, and the blow made me warm, 110
 I thank 'em for't. Besides, I had decreed
 To have a vein pricked—I did mean to bleed—
 So that there's money saved. They are honest men, Pray use 'em well when they appear again.
 GEORGE Yes, sir, we'll use 'em like honest men. 115
 CANDIDO Ay, well said, George, like honest men, though they be arrant knaves, for that's the phrase of the city.
 Help to lay up these wares.
Enter [Viola,] Candido's Wife, with Officers
 WIFE Yonder he stands.

48–9 that's... fashion recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'It is observed as a principle and as much as the fashion, not to give place to any that is inferior in apparel'.
 55 tricky-coats (a) prankish behaviour; (b) smart coats (ironic). Coats refers specifically to the garments (and station) of an apprentice.
 65 Cross-points (a) a dance step in the galliard; (b) contrary intentions; (c) tagged laces used for fastening articles of clothing; (d) tricks 68 Be covered put your hat on weltd trimmed, fringed; or possibly, faced 70 Um, um, hum George is apparently at a loss for words and thereby registers his discomfort.

 74 limbo i.e. jail (with a play on the literal sense, region bordering on hell)
 75 An if 80 but only
 84–5 wear like iron proverbial
 91 fray fight, brawl (with a pun on a fray in the cloth)
 93 flea-biting small hurt, damage (proverbial for wounds not worth speaking of; Tilley

F355)
 97 stand in't persist in your account
 98 clubs the rallying cry of the London apprentices
 101 marks targets
 111 decreed decided
 112 bleed i.e. deplete excess blood believed to be the source of an imbalance in the body's humours. Bleeding was often performed to reduce cholera.
 115 honest men Punning on its use as a vague term of praise, in patronizing reference to inferiors.

Scene 12 The humours of the patient man. The longing wyfe and the honest whore.

120 OFFICER What, in a prentice coat? [Officers bind Candido]
 WIFE Ay, ay, mad, mad, pray take heed. CANDIDO Why, why? 160 CANDIDO How now? What news with them? What make WIFE they with my wife? Officers? Is she attached?—Look to Look how his head goes! Should he get but loose, your wares. O, 'twere as much as all our lives were worth.
 125 WIFE He talks to himself; O, he's much gone indeed. OFFICER OFFICER Pray pluck up a good heart, be not so fearful.— Fear not, we'll make all sure for our own safety.
 Sirs, hark, we'll gather to him by degrees. CANDIDO WIFE Ay, ay, by degrees, I pray. O me! What makes he Are you at leisure now? Well, what's the matter?
 with the lawn in his hand, he'll tear all the ware in my Why do I enter into bonds thus? Ha? 165
 130 shop. OFFICER
 OFFICER Fear not, we'll catch him on a sudden. WIFE WIFE O, you had need do so; pray take heed of your Because you're mad, put fear upon your wife.
 warrant. WIFE
 OFFICER I warrant, mistress.—Now, Signor Candido? O, ay, I went in danger of my life every minute.
 135 CANDIDO Now, sir, what news with you, sir? CANDIDO WIFE What? Am I mad, say you, and I not know it?
 'What news with you?' he says; O, he's far gone. OFFICER OFFICER That proves you mad, because you know it not.
 I pray, fear nothing; let's alone with him.— WIFE
 Signor, you look not like yourself, methinks; Pray talk as little to him as you can; 170 [Aside to Second Officer] Steal you o' t'other side. [To You see he's too far spent.
 Candido] You're changed, you're altered. CANDIDO 140 CANDIDO Changed, sir? Why true, sir; is change strange? Bound with strong cord!
 'Tis not the fashion unless it alter. Monarchs turn to A sewster's thread, i'faith, had been enough beggars, beggars creep into the nests of princes, masters To lead me anywhere.—Wife, do you long?
 serve their prentices, ladies their servingmen, men turn You are mad too, or else you do me wrong.
 to women. GEORGE 145 OFFICER And women turn to men. But are you mad indeed, master?
 CANDIDO Ay, and women turn to men, you say true. Ha, My wife says so, 175 ha, a mad world, a mad world. And what she says, George, is all truth, you know.— [Officers seize Candido] And whither now? To Bethlem Monastery?
 OFFICER Have we caught you, sir? Ha, whither?
 CANDIDO Caught me? Well, well, you have caught me. OFFICER Faith, e'en to the madmen's pound.
 150 WIFE He laughs in your faces. CANDIDO
 GEORGE A rescue, prentices, my master's catchpoled! O' God's name, still I feel my patience sound.
 OFFICER I charge you, keep the peace, or have your legs Exeunt [Officers with Candido] gartered with irons. We have from the Duke a warrant GEORGE Come, we'll see whither he goes. If the master 180 strong enough for what we do. be mad, we are his servants, and must follow his steps; we'll be madcaps too. Farewell, mistress, you shall have CANDIDO us all in Bedlam. Exeunt [George and Prentices]
 155 I pray, rest quiet; I desire no rescue. WIFE WIFE La, he desires no rescue; 'las, poor heart, I think I ha' fitted now, you and your clothes.
 He talks against himself. If this move not his patience, nothing can; 185
 CANDIDO Well, what's the matter? I'll swear then I have a saint, and not a man. Exit OFFICER Look to that arm; Pray make sure work, double the cord.

122–3 make they are they doing

123 attached arrested

126 pluck up...heart proverbial (Tilley H323)

127 gather make way (nautical term)

141–2 Monarchs...princes Possibly alluding to the legendary African King Cophetua who disdained all women; finally he married a beggar who proved to be a fair and virtuous queen.

143–4 turn to (a) incline towards; (b) turn into, become

147 a mad...world cf. the proverbial, 'a mad world, my masters' (Tilley W880); recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'Tis a mad world'

151 catchpoled arrested (after 'catchpoles', the sheriffs' officers who made arrests, mainly for debt)

153 gartered with irons fettered

172 sewster's seamstress's

177 Bethlem Monastery the Hospital of the Priory of St Mary of Bethlehem, outside Bishopsgate, founded in 1246 and used as an asylum for lunatics from 1402

183 Bedlam corruption of Bethlem/Bethlehem

Sc. 13 Enter Duke, Doctor, Fluello, Castruccio, Pioratto

DUKE Give us a little leave.
 [Exeunt Fluello, Castruccio, Pioratto]
 Doctor, your news.

DOCTOR I sent for him, my lord; at last he came
 And did receive all speech that went from me
 As gilded pills made to prolong his health.
 5 My credit with him wrought it; for some men
 Swallow even empty hooks, like fools that fear
 No drowning where 'tis deepest 'cause 'tis clear.
 In th' end we sat and ate; a health I drank
 To Infelice's sweet departed soul.
 This train I knew would take.

10 DUKE 'Twas excellent.
 DOCTOR He fell with such devotion on his knees,
 To pledge the same—
 DUKE Fond superstitious fool!
 DOCTOR That had he been inflamed with zeal of prayer,
 He could not pour't out with more reverence.
 15 About my neck he hung, wept on my cheek,
 Kissed it, and swore he would adore my lips
 Because they brought forth Infelice's name.
 DUKE Ha, ha, alack, alack.
 DOCTOR The cup he lifts up high, and thus he said, 20 'Here, noble maid', drinks, and was poisoned.
 DUKE And died?
 DOCTOR And died, my lord.
 DUKE Thou in that word
 Hast pieced mine agèd hours out with more years
 Than thou hast taken from Hippolito.
 A noble youth he was, but lesser branches
 25 Hind'ring the greater's growth must be lopped off
 And feed the fire. Doctor, we're now all thine,
 And use us so; be bold.
 DOCTOR Thanks, gracious lord;
 My honoured lord—
 DUKE Hm.
 DOCTOR I do beseech your grace to bury deep 30 This bloody act of mine.
 DUKE Nay, nay, for that,
 Doctor, look you to't; me it shall not move.
 They're cursed that ill do, not that ill do love.

DOCTOR You throw an angry forehead on my face,
 But be you pleased backward thus far to look: 35
 That for your good this evil I undertook—DUKE Ay, ay, we conster so.
 DOCTOR And only for your love.
 DUKE Confessed: 'tis true.
 DOCTOR Nor let it stand against me as a bar 40
 To thrust me from your presence; nor believe,
 As princes have quick thoughts, that now my finger
 Being dipped in blood, I will not spare the hand,
 But that for gold—as what can gold not do?—
 I may be hired to work the like on you. 45
 DUKE Which to prevent—
 DOCTOR 'Tis from my heart as far—
 DUKE No matter, doctor, 'cause I'll fearless sleep;
 And that you shall stand clear of that suspicion,
 I banish thee for ever from my court.
 This principle is old, but true as fate: 50
 Kings may love treason, but the traitor hate. Exit DOCTOR Is't so? Nay then, Duke, your stale principle
 With one as stale the doctor thus shall quit:
 He falls himself that digs another's pit;
 Enter the Doctor's Man
 How now! Where is he? Will he meet me? 55 DOCTOR'S MAN Meet you, sir? He might have met with three fencers in this time and have received less hurt than by meeting one doctor of physic. Why, sir, he's walked under the old abbey wall yonder this hour till he's more cold than a citizen's country house in January. You may 60 smell him behind, sir; la, you, yonder he comes.
 Enter Hippolito
 DOCTOR Leave me.
 DOCTOR'S MAN I'th' lurch, if you will. Exit
 DOCTOR O, my most noble friend!
 HIPPOLITO Few but yourself
 Could have enticed me thus, to trust the air 65
 With my close sighs. You send for me—what news?
 DOCTOR Come, you must doff this black, dye that pale cheek
 Into his own colour; go, attire yourself
 Fresh as a bridegroom when he meets his bride.
 The Duke has done much treason to thy love; 70
 'Tis now revealed, 'tis now to be revenged.

13.10 train stratagem

22 pieced...out eked out, extended

24-6 lesser...fire recorded by Edward

Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'Little branches hindering growth of the greater must be lopped off and thrown into the fire'

31 for as for

33 They're cursed...love Cf. the proverbial 'If you do no ill do no ill like' (Tilley I29).

37 conster interpret, construe

42 As as well you may believe, since; for indeed

51 Kings...hate proverbial (Tilley K64)

54 He falls...pit proverbial (Tilley P356)

59-60 more cold...January recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'as cold as citizen's country house in January'

60 citizen's...January i.e. when it is uninhabited

61 behind in due time

68 his its

Scene 13

the pasyent man & the onest hore

Be merry, honoured friend, thy lady lives.
 HIPPOLITO
 What lady?
 DOCTOR Infelice. She's revived; Revived? Alack! Death never had the heart
 To take breath from her.
 75 HIPPOLITO Um, I thank you, sir;
 Physic prolongs life when it cannot save.
 This helps not my hopes, mine are in their grave;
 You do some wrong to mock me.
 DOCTOR By that love
 Which I have ever borne you, what I speak 80 Is truth: the maiden lives; that funeral, Duke's tears, the mourning, was all counterfeit.—
 A sleepy draught cozened the world and you;
 I was his minister, and then chambered up
 To stop discovery.
 HIPPOLITO O, treacherous Duke!
 DOCTOR
 85 He cannot hope so certainly for bliss,
 As he believes that I have poisoned you.
 He wooed me to't; I yielded, and confirmed him
 In his most bloody thoughts.
 HIPPOLITO A very devil!
 DOCTOR
 Her did he closely coach to Bergamo,
 And thither—
 90 HIPPOLITO Will I ride. Stood Bergamo
 In the low countries of black hell, I'll to her.
 DOCTOR
 You shall to her, but not to Bergamo.
 How passion makes you fly beyond yourself.
 Much of that weary journey I ha' cut off,
 95 For she by letters hath intelligence
 Of your supposed death, her own interment,
 And all those plots which that false Duke, her father,
 Has wrought against you; and she'll meet you—HIPPOLITO O when?
 DOCTOR
 Nay, see how covetous are your desires.—
 Early tomorrow morn.
 100 HIPPOLITO O where, good father?
 DOCTOR
 At Bethlem Monastery; are you pleased now?
 HIPPOLITO
 At Bethlem Monastery. The place well fits—
 It is the school where those that lose their wits Practise again to get them. I am sick 105 Of that disease; all love is lunatic.

DOCTOR
 We'll steal away this night in some disguise.
 Father Anselmo, a most reverend friar,
 Expects our coming, before whom we'll lay Reasons so strong that he shall yield in bands
 Of holy wedlock to tie both your hands. 110
 HIPPOLITO This is such happiness,
 That to believe it, 'tis impossible.
 DOCTOR
 Let all your joys then die in misbelief;
 I will reveal no more.
 HIPPOLITO O yes, good father,
 I am so well acquainted with despair 115
 I know not how to hope; I believe all.
 DOCTOR
 We'll hence this night. Much must be done, much said,
 But if the doctor fail not in his charms,
 Your lady shall ere morning fill these arms.
 HIPPOLITO
 Heavenly physician! Far thy fame shall spread, 120
 That mak'st two lovers speak when they be dead.
Exeunt

[Enter Viola,] Candido's Wife [with a paper], and George; Pioratto, [entering from another door,] meets them Sc. 14

WIFE O, watch, good George, watch which way the Duke comes.
 GEORGE Here comes one of the butterflies; ask him.
 WIFE Pray sir, comes the Duke this way?
 PIORATTO He's upon coming, mistress. 5
 WIFE I thank you, sir. Exit [Pioratto]
 George, are there many madfolks where thy master lies?
 GEORGE O yes, of all countries some, but especially mad Greeks—they swarm. Troth, mistress, the world is altered with you; you had not wont to stand thus with 10 a paper humbly complaining. But you're well enough served; provender pricked you, as it does many of our city wives besides.
 WIFE Dost think, George, we shall get him forth?
 GEORGE Truly, mistress, I cannot tell; I think you'll hardly 15 get him forth. Why, 'tis strange! 'Sfoot, I have known many women that have had mad rascals to their husbands, whom they would belabour by all means possible to keep 'em in their right wits; but of a woman to long to turn a tame man into a madman, why the 20 devil himself was never used so by his dam.
 WIFE How does he talk, George, ha? Good George, tell me.
 GEORGE Why, you're best go see.

76 Physic medicine, the healing art
 89 closely secretly
 91 low countries of black hell prompted by Hippolito's characterization of the Duke
 as A very devil (13.88) 96 interment i.e. the burial following the funeral procession of Sc. 1, knowledge of which was kept from Infelice (3.83-6) 99 covetous eager 109 yield consent

bands bonds
 14.3 butterflies courtiers
 5 upon on the point of 8-9 mad Greeks prankish and frolicsome people

 11 complaining lamenting, moaning
 12 provender pricked you 'good food incited you'; i.e. your whim sprang from high feeding (proverbial: Tilley P615) 15 hardly (a) with trouble or hardship;
 (b) barely

- WIFE Alas, I am afraid.
- 25 GEORGE Afraid! You had more need be ashamed; he may rather be afraid of you.
- WIFE But, George, he's not stark mad, is he? He does not rave, he's not horn-mad, George, is he?
- GEORGE Nay, I know not that, but he talks like a justice of peace, of a thousand matters and to no purpose.
- 30 WIFE I'll to the monastery. I shall be mad till I enjoy him, I shall be sick till I see him; yet when I do see him, I shall weep out mine eyes.
- GEORGE Ay, I'd fain see a woman weep out her eyes; that's as true as to say a man's cloak burns when it hangs in the water. I know you'll weep, mistress; but what says the painted cloth?—
- Trust not a woman when she cries,
For she'll pump water from her eyes
- 40 With a wet finger, and in faster showers
Than April when he rains down flowers.
- WIFE Ay, but George, that painted cloth is worthy to be hanged up for lying. All women have not tears at will, unless they have good cause.
- 45 GEORGE Ay, but mistress, how easily will they find a cause; and as one of our cheese-trenchers says very learnedly:
- As out of wormwood bees suck honey,
As from poor clients lawyers firr money,
As parsley from a roasted cony,
- 50 So, though the day be ne'er so sunny,
If wives will have it rain, down then it drives;
The calmest husbands make the stormiest wives.
- WIFE True, George, but I ha' done storming now.
- GEORGE Why, that's well done. Good mistress, throw aside this fashion of your humour, be not so fantastical in wearing it, storm no more, long no more. This longing has made you come short of many a good thing that you might have had from my master. Here comes the Duke.
- Enter Duke, Fluello, Pioratto, Sinezi*
- 60 WIFE [to Duke]
O, I beseech you, pardon my offence
In that I durst abuse your grace's warrant;
Deliver forth my husband, good my lord.
- DUKE
Who is her husband?
- FLUELLO Candido, my lord.
- DUKE
Where is he?
- WIFE He's among the lunatics.
He was a man made up without a gall; 65
Nothing could move him, nothing could convert His meek blood into fury, yet like a monster
I often beat at the most constant rock
Of his unshaken patience, and did long
To vex him.
- DUKE Did you so?
- WIFE And for that purpose 70
Had warrant from your grace to carry him
To Bethlem Monastery, whence they will not free him Without your grace's hand that sent him in.
- DUKE
You have longed fair; 'tis you are mad, I fear.
It's fit to fetch him thence, and keep you there. 75
If he be mad, why would you have him forth?
- GEORGE An please your grace, he's not stark mad, but only talks like a young gentleman, somewhat fantastically, that's all. There's a thousand about your court, city, and country, madder than he. 80
- DUKE
Provide a warrant; you shall have our hand.
- GEORGE Here's a warrant ready drawn, my lord.
- DUKE Get pen and ink, get pen and ink. [Exit George] Enter Castruccio
- CASTRUCCIO
Where is my lord, the Duke?
- DUKE How now? More madmen?
- CASTRUCCIO
I have strange news, my lord.
- DUKE Of what? Of whom? 85
- CASTRUCCIO Of Infelice, and a marriage.
- DUKE
Ha! Where? With whom?
- CASTRUCCIO Hippolito.
[Enter George with pen and ink]
- GEORGE [offering the pen] Here, my lord.
- DUKE Hence with that woman, void the room.
- FLUELLO [to Candido's Wife] Away, the Duke's vexed. 90

28 horn-mad mad with rage (with a play on the horns of a cuckold)

29–30 talks . . . purpose recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book

31 enjoy him have his company

37 painted cloth imitation tapestry, painted with scriptural or allegorical scenes, and often embellished with verses by way of motto or epigraph

38 Trust . . . cries proverbial (Tilley W638)

40 With a wet finger easily, with little effort; without hesitation, readily. Here the wet finger suggests contribution to the impression of tears. See note to 2.4–5.

41 rains down flowers Probably in reference to the suddenness with which an abundance of flowers appear, 'sends down flowers like rain'; but 'beats down flowers with rain' may be possible.

42–3 that . . . lying recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'Ay, but the painted cloth is worthy to be hanged for lying'

43 hanged up with a play on the capital punishment sense

46 cheese-trenchers commonly inscribed with sententious maxims

47 wormwood plant proverbial for its bitter taste

48 firk rob, cheat

49 cony rabbit

55 fantastical fanciful, capricious

56–7 longing . . . thing In addition to the primary common sense, 'earnest yearning', longing carries sexual innuendo picked up also in come, short, and thing (also wordplay on long, longing, and short).

57–8 made you . . . had recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'make you come short of many a good thing you might have had'

73 Without . . . hand i.e. your written authorization

74 fair completely, fully

GEORGE Whoop, come mistress, the Duke's mad too.
Exeunt [Candido's Wife and George]

DUKE
 Who told me that Hippolito was dead?
 CASTRUCCIO He that can make any man dead, the doctor.
 But, my lord, he's as full of life as wildfire, and as 95 quick. Hippolito, the doctor, and one more rid hence this evening; the inn at which they light is Bethlem Monastery. Infelice comes from Bergamo and meets them there. Hippolito is mad, for he means this day to be married; the afternoon is the hour, and Friar 100 Anselmo is the knitter.

DUKE
 From Bergamo? Is't possible? It cannot be,
 It cannot be.

CASTRUCCIO I will not swear, my lord,
 But this intelligence I took from one Whose brains works in the plot.

DUKE What's he?
 CASTRUCCIO Matteo.

FLUELLO
 Matteo knows all.

105 PIORATTO He's Hippolito's bosom.
 DUKE How far stands Bethlem hence?

ALL THE REST Six or seven miles.
 DUKE Is't even so?

Not married till the afternoon, you say?
 110 Stay, stay, let's work out some prevention. How?
 This is most strange; can none but madmen serve
 To dress their wedding dinner? All of you Get presently to horse; disguise yourselves
 Like country gentlemen,

115 Or riding citizens or so, and take
 Each man a several path, but let us meet
 At Bethlem Monastery, some space of time
 Being spent between the arrival each of other,
 As if we came to see the lunatics.

120 To horse, away; be secret on your lives.
 Love must be punished that unjustly thrives.

Exeunt [all but Fluello]

FLUELLO
 'Be secret on your lives!' Castruccio, You're but a scurvy spaniel. Honest lord,
 Good lady; zounds, their love is just, 'tis good,
 125 And I'll prevent you, though I swim in blood. Exit

Enter Friar Anselmo, Hippolito, Matteo, Infelice Sc. 15

HIPPOLITO
 Nay, nay, resolve, good father, or deny.

ANSELMO
 You press me to an act both full of danger
 And full of happiness; for I behold
 Your father's frowns, his threats, nay, perhaps death
 To him that dare do this. Yet, noble lord,
 5 Such comfortable beams break through these clouds
 By this blessed marriage that, your honoured word Being pawned in my defence, I will tie fast
 The holy wedding knot.

HIPPOLITO Tush, fear not the Duke.
 ANSELMO

O son,
 Wisely to fear is to be free from fear. 10

HIPPOLITO
 You have our words, and you shall have our lives
 To guard you safe from all ensuing danger.

MATTEO Ay, ay, chop 'em up, and away.
 ANSELMO

Stay, when is't fit for me, safest for you,
 To entertain this business? 15

HIPPOLITO Not till the evening.
 ANSELMO

Be't so; there is a chapel stands hard by Upon the west end of the abbey wall:
 Thither convey yourselves, and when the sun
 Hath turned his back upon this upper world
 20 I'll marry you; that done, no thund'ring voice
 Can break the sacred bond. Yet, lady, here
 You are most safe.

INFELICE Father, your love's most dear.
 MATTEO Ay, well said; lock us into some little room by ourselves, that we may be mad for an hour or two. 25

HIPPOLITO
 O good Matteo, no, let's make no noise.

MATTEO How! No noise! Do you know where you are?
 'Sfoot, amongst all the madcaps in Milan; so that to throw the house out at window will be the better, and no man will suspect that we lurk here to steal mutton. The more sober we are, the more scurvy 'tis.
 And though the friar tell us that here we are safest, I'm not of his mind, for if those lay here that had lost their money, none would ever look after them; but here are none but those that have lost their wits, so that if hue and cry be made, hither they'll come, and my reason 30 is, because none goes to be married till he be stark mad. 35

95 quick speedy (punning on 'alive')
 96 light arrive
 105 bosom confidant
 116 several separate, different 119 As if...lunatics a favourite contemporary pastime 123 spaniel alluding to the breed's fawning, ingratiating behaviour

15.0.1 Anselmo In opposing his sovereign, he shares a trait with St Anselm who repeatedly stood against Henry I.
 1 resolve make up your mind (to it)
 4 Your i.e. Infelice's 11 Wisely...fear proverbial (Tilley F135); recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book

14 chop 'em up i.e. clasp hands to seal the bargain
 29 throw...window make a great disturbance in a house (proverbial: Tilley H785)
 31 mutton wench (i.e. female flesh) scurvy i.e. suspicious

Enter Fluello

- HIPPOLITO Muffle yourselves, yonder's Fluello.
 MATTEO Zounds!
 40 FLUELLO O my lord, these cloaks are not for this rain; the tempest is too great. I come sweating to tell you of it, that you may get out of it.
 MATTEO Why, what's the matter?
 FLUELLO What's the matter! You have mattered it fair; the 45 Duke's at hand.
 ALL THE REST
 The Duke?
 FLUELLO The very Duke.
 HIPPOLITO Then all our plots
 Are turned upon our heads, and we are blown up With our own underminings. 'Sfoot, how comes he?
 What villain durst betray our being here?
 50 FLUELLO Castruccio—Castruccio told the Duke, and Matteo here told Castruccio.
 HIPPOLITO
 Would you betray me to Castruccio?
 MATTEO 'Sfoot, he damned himself to the pit of hell if he spake on't again.
 HIPPOLITO
 55 So did you swear to me, so were you damned.
 MATTEO Pox on 'em, and there be no faith in men, if a man shall not believe oaths. He took bread and salt, by this light, that he would never open his lips.
 HIPPOLITO
 O God, O God!
 ANSELMO Son, be not desperate,
 60 Have patience; you shall trip your enemy down
 By his own sleights.—How far is the Duke hence?
 FLUELLO He's but new set out; Castruccio, Pioratto, and Sinezi come along with him. You have time enough yet to prevent them, if you have but courage.
 ANSELMO
 65 You shall steal secretly into the chapel,
 And presently be married. If the Duke
 Abide here still, spite of ten thousand eyes,
 You shall 'scape hence like friars.
 HIPPOLITO O blest disguise,
 O happy man!
 ANSELMO
 70 Talk not of happiness till your closed hand
 Have her by th' forehead, like the lock of time.
 Be not too slow nor hasty now you climb
- Up to the tower of bliss, only be wary
 And patient, that's all. If you like my plot Build and dispatch; if not, farewell, then not. 75
 HIPPOLITO
 O yes, we do applaud it. We'll dispute
 No longer, but will hence and execute.
 Fluello, you'll stay here; let us be gone.
 The ground that frighted lovers tread upon
 Is stuck with thorns.
 ANSELMO Come then, away; 'tis meet 80
 To escape those thorns, to put on winged feet.
Exeunt [Anselmo, Hippolito, and Infelice]
 MATTEO
 No words, I pray, Fluello, for it stands us upon.
 FLUELLO O, sir, let that be your lesson. [Exit Matteo]
 Alas, poor lovers! On what hopes and fears Men toss themselves for women! When she's got, 85 The best has in her that which pleaseth not.
Enter to Fluello, the Duke, Castruccio, Pioratto, and Sinezi from several doors, muffled
 DUKE
 Who's there?
 CASTRUCCIO My lord.
 DUKE Peace, send that 'lord' away,
 A lordship will spoil all; let's be all fellows.
 What's he?
 CASTRUCCIO Fluello, or else Sinezi, by his little legs. 90
 ALL THE REST All friends, all friends.
 DUKE
 What, met upon the very point of time?
 Is this the place?
 PIORATTO This is the place, my lord.
 DUKE
 Dream you on lordships? Come, no more 'lords', pray.
 You have not seen these lovers yet?
 ALL THE REST Not yet. 95
 DUKE
 Castruccio, art thou sure this wedding feat
 Is not till afternoon?
 CASTRUCCIO So 'tis given out, my lord.
 DUKE
 Nay, nay, 'tis like: thieves must observe their hours;
 Lovers watch minutes like astronomers. 100
 How shall the interim hours by us be spent?
 FLUELLO
 Let's all go see the madmen.

40 these cloaks . . . rain 'To have a cloak for the rain' is proverbial for 'to have an alibi for one's actions' (Tilley C417).
 40-1 these cloaks . . . great recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book
 44 mattered it fair made a fine matter of it 57 took bread and salt swore (i.e. ate it, to confirm his oath)
 61 sleights subtle schemes
 64 prevent anticipate

66 presently immediately
 70-1 closed hand . . . time Alluding to the emblematic and proverbial representation of Time (originally 'opportunity') with a full shock of hair in the front but bald behind, signifying the necessity of taking advantage of an occasion when it arises and not delaying until it has passed (Tilley T311).
 76 dispute discuss

82 it stands us upon it (the scheme) depends on us
 83 O, sir . . . lesson Fluello, mindful of the earlier lapse, replies that silence should be Matteo's concern.
 99 like probable
 100 Lovers . . . astronomers recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'Lovers observe very minutes (for meeting) like astronomers'.

Scene 15 The humours of the patient man. The longing wyfe and the honest whore.

ALL THE REST Mass, content.
 Enter [the player,] Thomas Towne, like a Sweeper
 DUKE
 O, here comes one; question him, question him.
 FLUELLO How now, honest fellow, dost thou belong to the 105 house?
 SWEEPER Yes, forsooth, I am one of the implements; I sweep the madmen's rooms, and fetch straw for 'em, and buy chains to tie 'em, and rods to whip 'em. I was a 110 mad wag myself here once, but I thank Father Anselm, he lashed me into my right mind again.
 DUKE
 Anselmo is the friar must marry them.
 [To Castruccio] Question him where he is.
 CASTRUCCIO And where is Father Anselmo now?
 SWEEPER Marry, he's gone but e'en now.
 DUKE
 115 Ay, well done. Tell me, whither is he gone?
 SWEEPER Why, to God A'mighty.
 FLUELLO Ha, ha, this fellow is a fool, talks idly.
 PIORATTO [to the Sweeper] Sirrah, are all the mad folks in Milan brought hither?
 120 SWEEPER How, all? There's a wise question indeed; why, if all the mad folks in Milan should come hither, there would not be left ten men in the city.
 DUKE Few gentlemen or courtiers here, ha?
 SWEEPER O, yes, abundance, abundance. Lands no sooner 125 fall into their hands but straight they run out o' their wits. Citizens' sons and heirs are free of the house by their fathers' copy; farmers' sons come hither like geese in flocks, and when they ha' sold all their cornfields, here they sit and pick the straws.
 130 SINEZI Methinks you should have women here as well as men.
 SWEEPER O, ay, a plague on 'em; there's no ho with them,
 they are madder than march hares.
 FLUELLO Are there no lawyers here amongst you?
 135 SWEEPER O, no, not one; never any lawyer. We dare not let a lawyer come in, for he'll make 'em mad faster than we can recover 'em.
 DUKE And how long is't ere you recover any of these?
 SWEEPER Why, according to the quantity of the moon 140 that's got into 'em, an alderman's son will be mad a great while, a very great while, especially if his friends left him well; a whore will hardly come to her wits again; a puritan—there's no hope of him unless he may pull down the steeple and hang himself i'th'bell-ropes.

FLUELLO I perceive all sorts of fish come to your net. 145 SWEEPER Yes, in truth, we have blocks for all heads; we have good store of wild oats here, for the courtier is mad at the citizen, the citizen is mad at the countryman, the shoemaker is mad at the cobbler, the cobbler at the 150 carman, the punk is mad that the merchant's wife is no whore, the merchant's wife is mad that the punk is so common a whore.
 Enter Anselmo [and Servants]
 Gods-so, here's Father Anselm; pray say nothing that I tell tales out of the school. Exit
 ALL THE VISITORS
 God bless you, father.
 ANSELMO Thank you, gentlemen. 155
 CASTRUCCIO
 Pray, may we see some of those wretched souls
 That here are in your keeping?
 ANSELMO Yes, you shall;
 But gentlemen, I must disarm you then.
 There are of madmen, as there are of tame,
 All humoured not alike; we have here some 160
 So apish and fantastic play with a feather,
 And, though 'twould grieve a soul to see God's image
 So blemished and defaced, yet do they act
 Such antic and such pretty lunacies
 That spite of sorrow they will make you smile. 165
 Others again we have like hungry lions,
 Fierce as wild bulls, untameable as flies,
 And these have oftentimes from strangers' sides
 Snatched rapiers suddenly and done much harm, Whom, if you'll see, you must be weaponless. 170
 ALL THE VISITORS
 With all our hearts.
 [They disarm]
 ANSELMO [to a Servant]
 Here, take these weapons in.—
 [Exit Servant with the weapons]
 Stand off a little, pray—so, so, 'tis well.
 I'll show you here a man that was sometimes
 A very grave and wealthy citizen;
 He's served a prenticeship to this misfortune, 175
 Been here seven years, and dwelt in Bergamo.
 DUKE
 How fell he from himself?
 ANSELMO By loss at sea.
 I'll stand aside; question him you alone,
 For if he spy me, he'll not speak a word

102 Mass 'by the mass', a mild oath 102.1 Towne...Sweeper Thomas Towne, an actor with the Admiral's (later Prince Henry's) Men, 1594-1610
 108 rods... 'em i.e. as part of the cure
 117 idly incoherently, deliriously 126 free of the house possessed of certain rights and privileges within the house 127 copy with a pun on (a) abundance; and (b) in reference to rights granted by the fathers' possession of copyhold or a transcript of documents establishing their status as landowners or householders 132 ho end, stopping

 133 madder than march hares proverbial
 (Tilley H148)
 139 moon alluding to the moon's supposed influence over mad persons (preserved in lunatics)
 142 left him well i.e. left him well provided for by legacy or inheritance 146 blocks moulds for making hats (quibbling on 'blockhead')

 147 mad 'angry', with a play on 'insane'
 150 carman carrier, carter
 154 tell tales...school proverbial (Tilley T54)
 164 antic fantastic
 173 sometimes formerly
 176 seven years the term of apprenticeship

- 180 Unless he's thoroughly vexed.
 [He] discovers [a Madman]: an old man, wrapped in a net
- FLUELLO Alas, poor soul.
 CASTRUCCIO A very old man.
 DUKE [to First Madman] God speed, father.
 FIRST MADMAN God speed the plough, thou shalt not speed me.
- 185 PIORATTO We see you, old man, for all you dance in a net.
 FIRST MADMAN True, but thou wilt dance in a halter, and I shall not see thee.
 ANSELMO O, do not vex him, pray.
 CASTRUCCIO Are you a fisherman, father?
- 190 FIRST MADMAN No, I'm neither fish nor flesh.
 FLUELLO What do you with that net then?
 FIRST MADMAN Dost not see, fool? There's a fresh salmon in't; if you step one foot further, you'll be over shoes, for you see I'm over head and ear in the salt water; and if you fall into this whirlpool where I am, you're drowned, you're a drowned rat.—I am fishing here for five ships, but I cannot have a good draught, for my net breaks still, and breaks; but I'll break some of your necks an I catch you in my clutches. Stay, stay, stay, stay, stay; where's the wind, where's the wind, where's the wind, where's the wind? Out, you gulls, you goosecaps, you gudgeon-eaters! Do you look for the wind in the heavens? Ha, ha, ha, ha! No, no! Look there, look there, look there, the wind is always at that door; hark how it blows, pooff, pooff, pooff.
- 195 ALL THE VISITORS Ha, ha, ha!
 FIRST MADMAN Do you laugh at God's creatures? Do you mock old age, you rogues? Is this grey beard and head counterfeit, that you cry 'ha, ha, ha'?—Sirrah, art not thou my eldest son?
- 200 PIORATTO Yes indeed, father.
 FIRST MADMAN Then thou'rt a fool, for my eldest son had a polt-foot, crooked legs, a verjuice face, and a pear-coloured beard. I made him a scholar, and he made himself a fool.—[To Duke] Sirrah! Thou there! Hold out thy hand.
- 205 DUKE My hand? Well, here 'tis.
 FIRST MADMAN Look, look, look, look: has he not long nails, and short hair? 220
 FLUELLO Yes, monstrous short hair, and abominable long nails.
 FIRST MADMAN Tenpenny nails are they not?
 FLUELLO Yes, tenpenny nails.
 FIRST MADMAN Such nails had my second boy. Kneel down, thou varlet, and ask thy father blessing. 225
 [Duke kneels]
 Such nails had my middlemost son, and I made him a promoter; and he scraped, and scraped, and scraped, till he got the devil and all; but he scraped thus, and thus, and thus, and it went under his legs, till at length a company of kites, taking him for carrion, swept up all, all, all, all, all, all, all. 230
 [Duke rises]
 If you love your lives, look to yourselves. See, see, see, see, the Turk's galleys are fighting with my ships! 'Bounce!' goes the guns; 'O, O, O!' cry the men; 'Rumble, rumble!' go the waters.—Alas! There! 'Tis sunk—'tis sunk! I am undone, I am undone; you are the damned pirates have undone me—you are, by th' Lord, you are, you are!—Stop 'em!—You are!
 ANSELMO Why, how now, sirrah, must I fall to tame you? 240
 FIRST MADMAN Tame me? No, I'll be madder than a roasted cat. See, see, I am burnt with gunpowder.—These are our close fights.
 ANSELMO I'll whip you if you grow unruly thus.
 FIRST MADMAN Whip me? Out, you toad!—Whip me? 245
 What justice is this to whip me because I'm a beggar?—Alas, I am a poor man, a very poor man. I am starved and have had no meat, by this light, ever since the great flood. I am a poor man.
 ANSELMO Well, well, be quiet, and you shall have meat. 250
 FIRST MADMAN Ay, ay, pray do; for look you, [holding out the net] here be my guts: these are my ribs—you may look through my ribs—see how my guts come out—these are my red guts, my very guts, O, O!

180.1 discovers i.e. by opening the curtains of the discovery space

184 God speed the plough i.e. God prosper the plough (proverbial: Tilley G223)

186 dance in a net The proverb, 'You dance in a net and think nobody sees you', meant 'to act with practically no disguise while expecting to escape notice' (Tilley N130).

187 halter rope for hanging malefactors

190 fisherman understood by First Madman as 'fish or man'

191 neither... flesh proverbial (Tilley F319)

193 fresh salmon playing on the sense 'dupe, prey' (often with sexual suggestion)

194 over shoes deeply immersed

195 salt water playing on the sense 'tears'

198 draught catch, quantity taken with one drawing of the net

203 goosecaps boobies, fools

gudgeon-eaters gullible persons (a gudgeon is a small fish used for bait)

214 polt-foot club-foot

verjuice sour, crabbed

214-15 pear-coloured i.e. russet-red

215-16 I made... fool recorded by Edward Pudsey in his Commonplace Book: 'His friends made him a scholar, and he made himself a fool'.

223 Tenpenny nails large nails sold at tenpence a hundred

228 promoter informer

231 kites rapacious persons, sharpers

(playing also on the literal sense: birds of prey)

234 galleys low flat-built sea-going vessels with one deck

235 Bounce! bang!

240 fall to set to work, begin

243 close fights defensive structures erected as citadels on the decks of ships in anticipation of boarding engagements; First Madman presumably makes reference to the discovery space and imagines a skirmish with Anselmo as such an encounter.

248-9 the great flood i.e. the flood Noah survived (Genesis 7:17-24), an originating moment in human history; confused by the old man with his loss at sea

255 ANSELMO [to a Servant] Take him in there.
[Exit Servant with First Madman]

ALL THE VISITORS A very piteous sight.
CASTRUCCIO

Father, I see you have a busy charge.

ANSELMO

They must be used like children: pleased with toys,
And anon whipped for their unruliness.
260 I'll show you now a pair quite different From him that's gone; he was all words, and these,
Unless you urge 'em, seldom spend their speech,
But save their tongues.

[Enter Second Madman, and Third Madman with food and drink]

La, you.—This hithermost
Fell from the happy quietness of mind
265 About a maiden that he loved, and died.
He followed her to church, being full of tears,
And as her body went into the ground
He fell stark mad. That is a married man
Was jealous of a fair but, as some say, 270 A very virtuous wife; and that spoiled him.

SECOND MADMAN All these are whoremongers, and lay with my wife: whore, whore, whore, whore, whore.

FLUELLO Observe him.

SECOND MADMAN Gaffer shoemaker, you pulled on my 275 wife's pumps, and then crept into her pantofles; lie there, lie there.—This was her tailor—you cut out her loose-bodied gown, and put in a yard more than I allowed her; lie there by the shoemaker.—O, master doctor! Are you here? You gave me a purgation, and 280 then crept into my wife's chamber to feel her pulses, and you said, and she said, and her maid said that they went pit-a-pat, pit-a-pat, pit-a-pat.—Doctor, I'll put you anon into my wife's urinal.—Hey, come aloft, Jack! This was her schoolmaster, and taught her to 285 play upon the virginals, and still his jacks leapt up, up.
You pricked her out nothing but bawdy lessons, but I'll prick you all—fiddler—doctor—tailor—shoemaker—shoemaker—fiddler—doctor—tailor—so! Lie with my wife again, now.

290 CASTRUCCIO See how he notes the other, now he feeds.

SECOND MADMAN Give me some porridge.

THIRD MADMAN I'll give thee none.

SECOND MADMAN Give me some porridge.

THIRD MADMAN I'll not give thee a bit.

SECOND MADMAN Give me that flap-dragon.

THIRD MADMAN I'll not give thee a spoonful. Thou liest, it's no dragon, 'tis a parrot that I bought for my sweetheart, and I'll keep it.

SECOND MADMAN Here's an almond for parrot.

THIRD MADMAN Hang thyself.

SECOND MADMAN Here's a rope for parrot.

THIRD MADMAN Eat it, for I'll eat this.

SECOND MADMAN I'll shoot at thee an thou't give me none.

THIRD MADMAN Woo't thou?

SECOND MADMAN I'll run a-tilt at thee an thou't give me none.

THIRD MADMAN Woo't thou? Do, an thou dar'st.

SECOND MADMAN Bounce!

THIRD MADMAN O! O! I am slain!—Murder, murder, murder! I am slain, my brains are beaten out.

ANSELMO How now, you villains?—[To a Servant] Bring me whips.—[To Madmen] I'll whip you.

THIRD MADMAN I am dead, I am slain! Ring out the bell, for I am dead.

DUKE [to Second Madman] How will you do now, sirrah?
You ha' killed him.

SECOND MADMAN I'll answer't at sessions; he was eating of almond-butter, and I longed for't. The child had never been delivered out of my belly if I had not killed him. I'll answer't at sessions, so my wife may be burnt i'th'hand too.

ANSELMO [to a Servant] Take 'em in both; bury him, for he's dead.

THIRD MADMAN Ay, indeed, I am dead; put me, I pray, into a good pit hole.

SECOND MADMAN I'll answer't at sessions.

Exeunt [Servant with Second and Third Madmen]

Enter Bellafront, mad

ANSELMO How now, housewife, whither gad you?

BELLAFRONT A-nutting, forsooth. How do you, gaffer? How do you, gaffer? There's a French curtsy for you, too.

FLUELLO 'Tis Bellafront.

257 charge (a) order; (b) care, custody

274 Gaffer title of address, often with no intimation of respect

275 pumps single-soled, low-cut shoes generally unsuitable for streetwear (but here suggesting sexual conquest) pantofles high, cork-soled shoes, with open backs, slipped on over pumps (here suggesting stealthy sexual transgression)

276 tailor Tailors had a reputation for lechery.

277 yard punning on the sense 'penis'

280 chamber punning on the sense 'vagina'

283-4 come aloft, Jack the master's cry to a trained ape (with bawdy innuendo)

285 virginals keyed instrument of the harpsichord class (with sexual innuendo) jacks upright pieces of wood (in the virginals) connected to the key-lever;

when the keys were depressed the jacks rose causing quills fitted to them to pluck the strings (with bawdy innuendo)

286 pricked wrote down in musical notation
(with bawdy innuendo)

287 prick grieve, torment (with a play on pricked)

295 flap-dragon a raisin floating in a cup of flaming liquor

299-301 an almond... rope for parrot phrases commonly taught to parrots

303 thou't contraction of 'thou woo't' =
'thou wilt'

304 Woo't wilt

317 sessions quarter-sessions (i.e. in a law court)

318 almond-butter a preparation of cream and whites of eggs boiled, to which are added blanched almonds

320 burnt i'th'hand branded as a felon

327 housewife hussy, wench

328 A-nutting nut-gathering; but possibly with a glance at a romantic sense from nutting in contemporary use as a term of affection; in either sense presumably intended as a token of insanity

gaffer my good fellow, old fellow 329 French curtsy venereal disease, the French pox (coupled with an actual curtsy)

PIORATTO 'Tis the punk, by th'Lord.
 DUKE
 Father, what's she, I pray?
 ANSELMO As yet I know not;
 She came but in this day, talks little idly,
 And therefore has the freedom of the house.
 335 BELLAFRONT Do not you know me? Nor you? Nor you, nor
 you?
 ALL THE VISITORS No, indeed.
 BELLAFRONT Then you are an ass, and you are an ass, and you are an ass, for I know you.
 340 ANSELMO Why, what are they? Come, tell me, what are they?
 BELLAFRONT Three fishwives; will you buy any gudgeons?
Enter Hippolito, Matteo, and Infelice, disguised in the habits of friars
 God's santy, yonder come friars; I know them too.—
 How do you, friar?
 ANSELMO
 345 Nay, nay, away, you must not trouble friars.
 [Aside to Hippolito, Matteo, Infelice] The Duke is here; speak nothing.
 BELLAFRONT Nay, indeed, you shall not go: we'll run at barley-break first, and you shall be in hell.
 MATTEO [aside] My punk turned mad whore, as all her 350 fellows are?
 HIPPOLITO [aside to Infelice and Matteo]
 Speak nothing, but steal hence when you spy time.
 ANSELMO [to Bellafront]
 I'll lock you up if you're unruly, fie.
 BELLAFRONT Fie! Marry, faugh! They shall not go, indeed, till I ha' told 'em their fortunes.
 355 DUKE Good father, give her leave.
 BELLAFRONT Ay, pray, good father, and I'll give you my blessing.
 ANSELMO Well then, be brief, but if you are thus unruly,
 I'll have you locked up fast.
 360 PIORATTO Come, to their fortunes.
 BELLAFRONT Let me see: one, two, three, and four.—I'll begin with the little friar first. [To Infelice] Here's a fine hand indeed, I never saw friar have such a dainty hand:
 here's a hand for a lady, you ha' good fortune now.
 365 O see, see, what a thread here's spun;
 You love a friar better than a nun,
 Yet long you'll love no friar, nor no friar's son.

[Infelice] bows a little
 The line of life is out, yet I'm afraid,
 For all you're holy, you'll not die a maid.
 God give you joy.—Now to you, Friar Tuck. 370
 MATTEO God send me good luck.
 BELLAFRONT
 You love one, and one loves you.
 You are a false knave, and she's a Jew;
 Here is a dial that false ever goes.
 MATTEO
 O, your wit drops.
 BELLAFRONT Troth, so does your nose. 375
 [To Hippolito] Nay, let's shake hands with you, too:
 pray open,
 Here's a fine hand. Ho, friar, ho, God be here,
 So He had need. You'll keep good cheer;
 Here's a free table, but a frozen breast,
 For you'll starve those that love you best. 380
 Yet you have good fortune, for if I am no liar,
 [She] discovers them
 Then you are no friar, nor you, nor you, no friar.
 Ha ha, ha ha.
 DUKE
 Are holy habits cloaks for villainy?
 Draw all your weapons.
 HIPPOLITO Do, draw all your weapons. 385
 DUKE Where are your weapons? Draw.
 ALL THE GALLANTS
 The friar has gulled us of 'em.
 MATTEO O, rare trick!
 You ha' learned one mad point of arithmetic.
 HIPPOLITO
 Why swells your spleen so high? Against what bosom Would you your weapons draw? Hers? 'Tis your daughter's. 390
 Mine? 'Tis your son's.
 DUKE Son?
 MATTEO Son, by yonder sun.
 HIPPOLITO [to Duke]
 You cannot shed blood here but 'tis your own;
 To spill your own blood were damnation.
 Lay smooth that wrinkled brow, and I will throw Myself beneath your feet; 395
 Let it be rugged still and flinted o'er,
 What can come forth but sparkles that will burn

342 gudgeons small fish used for bait (one who takes a gudgeon is a fool)

343 santy perhaps a corruption of 'sanctity'

348 barley-break . . . hell A country game played originally by three couples, one at either end of a field and the third in the centre, termed 'hell'. The couples at the field's ends try to cross from one side to the other and are permitted to separate or 'break' when challenged by the central pair, and to switch partners in the process, but if caught by the occupants of 'hell' must exchange places with them. The game continues until all the couples have taken a turn in 'hell'.

349–50 My punk . . . are possibly in allusion to the effects of syphilis

362 little friar i.e. Infelice

370 Friar Tuck Robin Hood's friar (who, like Matteo in his disguise, was not all his gown indicated)

373 Jew a term of opprobrium: a wicked person

374 dial (indicating Matteo's face)

375 your wit drops Cf. the proverbial 'His wit is in the wane' (Tilley W555).

so . . . nose i.e. probably either inclining his head in shame or to conceal his face more fully in the cowl of the friar's habit

377 Ho exclamation of surprise

379 table punning on the sense 'palm'

380 For . . . best in allusion to Hippolito's rejection of her love

389 spleen anger

396 it i.e. your brow

397 sparkles sparks

- Yourself and us? She's mine; my claim's most good;
 She's mine by marriage, though she's yours by blood.
- ANSELMO [kneeling to Duke]
 400 I have a hand, dear lord, deep in this act,
 For I foresaw this storm, yet willingly
 Put forth to meet it. Oft have I seen a father Washing the wounds of his dear son in tears,
 A son to curse the sword that struck his father, 405 Both slain i'th'quarrel of your families.
 Those scars are now ta'en off; and I beseech you,
 To seal our pardon. All was to this end:
 To turn the ancient hates of your two houses
 To fresh green friendship, that your loves might look 410 Like the spring's forehead, comfortably sweet,
 And your vexed souls in peaceful union meet.
 Their blood will now be yours, yours will be theirs,
 And happiness shall crown your silver hairs.
- FLUELLO [to Duke]
 You see, my lord, there's now no remedy.
- 415 ALL THE GALLANTS [to Duke] Beseech your lordship.
- DUKE
 You beseech fair; you have me in place fit
 To bridle me.—Rise friar, you may be glad
 You can make madmen tame, and tame men mad.
 Since fate hath conquered, I must rest content;
 420 To strive now would but add new punishment.
 I yield unto your happiness. Be blest.
 Our families shall henceforth breathe in rest.
- ALL THE GALLANTS
 O happy change!
- DUKE You're now is my content;
 I throw upon your joys my full consent.
- 425 BELLAFRONT Am not I a fine fortune-teller? God's me, you are a brave man; will not you buy me some sugar plums for telling how the friar was i'th'well, will you not?
- DUKE
 Would thou hadst wit, thou pretty soul, to ask,
 As I have will to give.
- 430 BELLAFRONT Pretty soul! A pretty soul is better than a pretty body. Do not you know my pretty soul?
- MATTEO No.
- BELLAFRONT Look, fine man—nay? I know you all by your noses; he was mad for me once, and I was mad for 435 him once, and he was mad for her once, and were you never mad? Yes, I warrant. Is not your name Matteo?
- MATTEO Yes, lamb.
- BELLAFRONT Lamb! Baa! Am I lamb? There you lie: I am mutton. I had a fine jewel once, a very fine jewel, and
- that naughty man stole it away from me, fine jewel, a 440 very fine jewel.
- DUKE What jewel, pretty maid?
- BELLAFRONT Maid, nay, that's a lie.—O, 'twas a golden jewel, hark, 'twas called a maidenhead, and that naughty man had it, had you not, leerer? 445
- MATTEO
 Out, you mad ass, away!
- DUKE Had he thy maidenhead?
 He shall make thee amends and marry thee.
- BELLAFRONT Shall he? [Singing] 'O, brave Arthur of Bradley then, shall he!'
- DUKE
 And if he bear the mind of a gentleman, 450 I know he will.
- MATTEO I think I rifled her of some such paltry jewel.
- DUKE
 Did you? Then marry her; you see the wrong
 Has led her spirits into a lunacy.
- MATTEO How, marry her, my lord? 'Sfoot, marry a mad- 455 woman? Let a man get the tamest wife he can come by, she'll be mad enough afterward, do what he can.
- DUKE
 Father Anselmo here shall do his best
 To bring her to her wits, and will you then?
- MATTEO I cannot tell, I may choose. 460
- DUKE
 Nay, then, law shall compel. I tell you, sir,
 So much her hard fate moves me, you should not breathe
 Under this air unless you married her.
- MATTEO
 Well, then, when her wits stand in their right place
 I'll marry her. 465
- BELLAFRONT
 I thank your grace.—Matteo, thou art mine!
 I am not mad, but put on this disguise
 [To Hippolito] Only for you, my lord; for you can tell Much wonder of me; but you are gone: farewell.
 Matteo, thou first mad'st me black, now make me 470
 White as before; [kneeling] I vow to thee I'm now
 As chaste as infancy, pure as Cynthia's brow.
- HIPPOLITO
 I durst be sworn, Matteo, she's indeed.
- MATTEO
 Cony-catched, gulled! Must I sail in your fly-boat
 Because I helped to rear your main-mast first? 475
 Plague 'found you for't.—'Tis well.

427 the friar was i'th'well Alluding to a popular ballad of a friar's attempted seduction of a maid. Taking his money while keeping him at bay, the girl resolves to trick him. He duly falls down a well thinking to escape her father. At length she rescues him, but refuses to return the money.

434 noses i.e. inclining heads (in shame);

possibly punning on the 'noes' received in answer to her questioning if any knows her. Also the noses are the only features clearly visible on account of the friar's habits (with phallic innuendo).

439 mutton prostitute

448-9 'O, brave Arthur . . . shall he' refrain of a popular ballad about this character's wedding; see Companion, p. 139

466 I thank your grace Whether Bellafront removes any part of her disguise as a madwoman is not clear, but probable.

472 Cynthia's i.e. Diana's, alluding to the maiden goddess of chastity

474 fly-boat a light, fast sailing vessel (with the innuendo of female genitals)

475 main-mast (with innuendo of penis)

476 'found confound

The cuckold's stamp goes current in all nations;
 Some men have horns given them at their creations:
 If I be one of those, why so; it's better
 480 To take a common wench, and make her good,
 Than one that simpers and at first will scarce
 Be tempted forth over the threshold door,
 Yet in one sennight, zounds, turns arrant whore.
 Come wench, thou shalt be mine, give me thy golls, [Raising her] We'll talk of legs hereafter.—See, my 485 lord,
 God give us joy.

ALL THE REST God give you joy.

Enter [Viola,] Candido's Wife and George

GEORGE Come, mistress, we are in Bedlam now, mass, and see, we come in pudding-time, for here's the Duke.

490 WIFE My husband, good my lord.

DUKE Have I thy husband?

CASTRUCCIO It's Candido, my lord, he's here among the lunatics; Father Anselmo, pray fetch him forth.

[Exit Anselmo]

495 This madwoman is his wife, and though she were not with child, yet did she long most spitefully to have her husband, that was as patient as Job, to be more mad than ever was Orlando; and because she would be sure he should turn Jew, she placed him here in Bethlem.
 Yonder he comes.

Enter Candido with Anselmo

500 DUKE Come hither, signor.—Are you mad?

CANDIDO You are not mad.

DUKE Why, I know that.

CANDIDO

Then may you know I am not mad, that know
 You are not mad, and that you are the Duke.
 505 None is mad here but one.—How do you, wife?
 What do you long for now?—Pardon, my lord.

DUKE

Why, signor, came you hither?

CANDIDO O my good lord!

She had lost her child's nose else. I did cut out Pennyworths of lawn—the lawn was yet mine own;
 510 A carpet was my gown, yet 'twas mine own;
 I wore my man's coat, yet the cloth mine own;
 Had a cracked crown, the crown was yet mine own.
 She says for this I'm mad; were her words true,
 I should be mad indeed.—O foolish skill!
 515 Is patience madness? I'll be a madman still.

WIFE [kneeling]

Forgive me, and I'll vex your spirit no more.

DUKE

Come, come, we'll have you friends; join hearts, join hands.

CANDIDO See, my lord, we are even.

[To Wife] Nay, rise, for ill deeds kneel unto none but heaven.

DUKE

Signor, methinks patience has laid on you 520
 Such heavy weight that you should loathe it.

CANDIDO

Loathe it?

DUKE

For he whose breast is tender, blood so cool
 That no wrongs heat it, is a patient fool.
 What comfort do you find in being so calm?

CANDIDO

490 That which green wounds receive from sovereign balm. 525

Patience, my lord, why, 'tis the soul of peace.
 Of all the virtues, 'tis near'st kin to heaven.
 It makes men look like gods; the best of men
 That e'er wore earth about him was a sufferer:

495 A soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit, 530
 The first true gentleman that ever breathed.
 The stock of patience, then, cannot be poor.
 All it desires, it has; what monarch more?
 It is the greatest enemy to law

That can be, for it doth embrace all wrongs, 535
 And so chains up lawyers' and women's tongues.
 'Tis the perpetual prisoner's liberty,
 His walks, and orchards. 'Tis the bondsman's freedom,
 And makes him seem proud of each iron chain,

500 As though he wore it more for state than pain. 540
 It is the beggar's music, and thus sings,
 Although their bodies beg, their souls are kings.
 O my dread liege! It is the sap of bliss
 Rears us aloft, makes men and angels kiss;

And last of all, to end a household strife, 545
 It is the honey 'gainst a waspish wife.

DUKE

Thou giv'st it lively colours; who dare say
 He's mad whose words march in so good array?
 'Twere sin all women should such husbands have,
 For every man must then be his wife's slave. 550

Come, therefore, you shall teach our court to shine;
 So calm a spirit is worth a golden mine.

Wives with meek husbands that to vex them long,
 In Bedlam must they dwell, else dwell they wrong.

Wives with meek husbands that to vex them long,
 In Bedlam must they dwell, else dwell they wrong.

Exeunt

Finis

483 sennight week (i.e. seven [days and] nights)

484 golls hands (a cant term)

485 legs bows (Bellafant has been kneeling in gratitude)

489 in pudding-time in good time (originally, the time when puddings were to be had); proverbial (Tilley P634)

496–7 mad... Orlando i.e. in allusion to the title character of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso

498 Jew a term of opprobrium, but presumably intended here to signify irascibility

508 had lost... nose i.e. would have graduated from childish tactics to others with graver consequences

514 skill reason; cleverness

525 green fresh, raw

528 best of men i.e. Christ

540 state dignified appearance

LOST PLAYS: A BRIEF ACCOUNT

Doris Feldmann and Kurt Tetzeli von Rosador

THOMAS MIDDLETON is not the Seventeenth-Century Master of the Lost Play: five plays known to be lost with about thirty extant is not a bad ratio for a professional Jacobean playwright. Nor is he, at least with respect to his lost plays, the Master of the Tantalizing Title. (That he could invent these with satiric ease, the list of fictitious titles in Hengist, King of Kent, 5.1.106–14, sufficiently documents.) With the possible exception of one, the alternative title of Caesar's Fall, all the titles are of a kind pleasing to scholars. They instigate an orderly play of signification—not the fearful free play of the signifier, but one loosely structured and delimited by social conditions, literary traditions, and cultural prescriptions: (1) Caesar's Fall/Two Shapes, (2) Randall, Earl of Chester, (3) The Viper and Her Brood, (4) The Conqueror's Custom, or The Fair Prisoner, and (5) The Puritan Maid, the Modest Wife, and the Wanton Widow.

Still, there can be—as it were, by definition—no absolute certainty about the number of plays lost. There are, however, degrees of uncertainty, which can be lessened with the help of soft facts. Thus an entry into the Stationers' Register for 9 September 1653 by Humphrey Moseley attributes four plays to Middleton. Or is it five? The wording of one of the entries, 'A right woman, or women beware of women', would normally mean that the first and second parts are alternatives, but one cannot be quite sure with Moseley. He, well-known for such sharp practice, may have entered two titles as one in order to save paying two fees. If so, is A Right Woman by Middleton, as all the other four titles are? Or is it the identically titled play which Moseley entered on 29 June 1660 as by Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher and for which—in a fit of honesty?—he then paid the ordinary fee? There can be no certainty. Nor does the title itself, with its widely applicable, vaguely proverbial phrasing—'You are a right woman, sister: you have pity' (The Two Noble Kinsmen, 3.6.215)—help to clarify the matter. To attribute A Right Woman to Middleton remains a soft option.

Yet, if soft facts all cohere, some certainty can be arrived at. Such seems to be the case for an untitled play, for which, on 3 October 1602, Philip Henslowe advanced on behalf of Worcester's Men the sum of 20s. to Middleton. Even though no title is given, there is nothing unusual about this entry, neither the space left for the title, to be filled in later by Henslowe himself or by an associate like Thomas Downton, nor the amount of the advance, which could vary considerably as a reflection of both the status of the playwright and the state of the manuscript. Yet Henslowe's entry about this payment 'in earnest of a play' is not followed by the usual ones of part and full payment a few weeks later, at least not for a play by Middleton for Worcester's Men. There are, however, records of a payment of £4 to Middleton on 21 October 1602, in 'part of payment for his play called Chester tragedy' and of 40s. on 9 November 1602, in 'full payment of his play called Randall, Earl of Chester'. The progressive concretization of the title, the proximity of dates, the complementary nature of the statements about the payments, mirroring faithfully Henslowe's regular procedure, and the total of £7 itself, a good one, but well within Henslowe's limits for a new play, suggest quite forcefully that, within five weeks' time, the untitled play had been completed and entitled Randall, Earl of Chester, changing hands in the process from Worcester's to the Admiral's Men, Henslowe's other company (a not uncommon procedure, as the reverse movement of Thomas Dekker's A Medicine for a Curst Wife three months earlier testifies).

Randall, Earl of Chester, however, had not been Middleton's first work for Henslowe. On 22 May 1602, Henslowe paid £5 to the Admiral's Men 'to give unto Anthony Munday and Michael Drayton, Webster and the rest /Middleton/ in earnest of a book called Caesar's Fall'. That Middleton's name is interlined above 'rest' may mean very little, since 'the rest' also designated Thomas Dekker, in 1602 a dramatist of some standing. He surfaces in the complementary entry of 29 May 1602, when the sum of £3 was handed to 'Thomas Dekker, Drayton, Middleton and Webster and Munday in full payment for their play called Two Shapes'. There is nothing unusual about an Elizabethan or a Jacobean play advertising itself by alternative titles, nor, indeed, about there being instability between the two. The identity of authors, the closeness of dates, and the complementary nature of the payments, adding up to as much as Henslowe was willing to disburse for a new play, leave hardly any room for doubt that the titles are alternative. With five dramatists collaborating, a mechanical division of labour, one act each, may have suggested itself as the least troublesome. About the distribution of the money, whether each of the dramatists received an equal share or not, nothing whatsoever is known.

That the matter of Caesar possessed both cultural relevance and popular appeal during the 1590s is testified by the number of dramatizations, be they for the closet, such as Samuel Daniel's Cleopatra of 1593, the academic stage, such as Trinity College's Caesar's Revenge of c. 1595, or the public theatres. The Admiral's Men contributed their fair share to the Caesarean theme. In November 1594, they staged an anonymous play of Caesar and Pompey, followed seven months later by a second part. Three years later, in 1598, Henry Chettle and Robert Wilson collaborated on Catiline's Conspiracy for them. If this plan ever materialized, the Admiral's Men would, with Caesar's Fall, have built up a dramatic tradition of good commercial value (having laid in stock, according to Henslowe's inventory of 1598, '1 senator's gown, 1 hood, and 5 senator's capes'). And they would have completed a Caesarean project of some magnitude, showing Caesar in the round: the martial hero outmanœuvring and defeating Pompey the Great and, in the sequel, Sextus, his son; the powerful rhetorician and wily statesman of Catiline's conspiracy; and the destined fate of the mighty, inescapably subject to the de casibus pattern, to the inevitable rise and fall brought about either by a turn of blind Fortune's wheel or the retribution of the gods. In accordance with a tradition of mighty lines and mighty acting the Admiral's Men would have highlighted the central figure—in contrast and rivalry to the marginalized centrality of that other Julius Caesar, put on in 1599 by their competitors, the Lord Chamberlain's Men.

How the Caesar of the Admiral's Men would have been presented is not clear. Neither can the writings of any of the five dramatists be read as containing a single, fixed image of Caesar, nor can even the smallest common denominator be discerned between the works. The condemnation of Caesar's assassins implied in 1 Sir John Oldcastle (1599), in which Drayton had a hand, is simply not compatible with the condemnation of Caesar's 'ambitious ends' in his Poly-Olbion of 1612 (X, 299); and Dekker's praise of James I as a 'second Caesar' (The Wonderful Year, 1603) was followed by Middleton's presentation of Caesar's life as subject of a 'motion' in Father Hubbard's Tales (1604), to be totally subverted by Webster's Menippean satire of a 'Julius Caesar making hair buttons' (The White Devil, 5.6.109–10).

This multivalence of the moral and ideological perspective—which is no final indeterminacy, since the de casibus pattern articulated in the title of Caesar's Fall prescribes unambiguously the sense of an ending—can be somewhat delimited by analysing what is either a sub- or an alternative title: Two Shapes. For it, as for almost any other evaluation of Caesar, Plutarch could have provided the stimulus with his description of Caesar's political 'craft and malice, which he cunningly cloaked under the habit of outward courtesy and familiarity'. Such a duplicity is not only expressed by the title's numerical adjective, but also by the noun. In Middleton, whoever and whatever is characterized by it comes in a questionable shape, the result of deceit ('There is a cheater by profession | That takes more shapes than the chameleon', Microcynicon, 4.3–4), or of (theatrical) disguise ('I have bethought the shape— | Some credulous scholar', Your Five Gallants, 1.2.91–2).

Whatever Middleton may have learned about the technical side of his craft while collaborating on Caesar's Fall, he must have realized some of the possibilities of traditional historical subjects, especially the opportunity to represent problems of contemporary cultural relevance in a protective guise—joining, as he himself will put it in the Prologue to Hengist, King of Kent, 'new times' love to old times' story'. Ancient Roman history with its numerous exempla of the conflicts of authority vs. freedom, the monarchy vs. the republic, the individual vs. the state and its institutions, with its power struggles and the problematics of the transfer of power, had long served such purposes—in Heywood's succinct summary from An Apology for Actors (1612): 'If we present a foreign history, the subject is so intended, that in the lives of Romans, Grecians, or others, either the virtues of our countrymen are extolled, or their vices reproved.' England's own history had frequently been used for identical purposes, and Middleton turned to it in October 1602, dramatizing the tragedy of Randall, Earl of Chester. The subject might well have been suggested to him by his colleague Anthony Munday. In John a Kent and John a Cumber (c.1590), Munday had put—in one of a number of variant spellings—a Ranulphe, Earle of Chester on the stage, partly as a parental blocking figure, partly to give a local habitation and a name to one of the play's major conflicts (English Art vs. Scottish black magic). Munday had, moreover, employed an Earl of Chester in both The Downfall and The Death of Robert, Earl of Huntingdon (1598). And, in Look About You (printed in 1600), the Earl makes another stage appearance in another play of the Admiral's Men in a similar, though even less prominent, function. Middleton may also have been aware, as Langland was, of popular traditions, of 'rymes of Robyn hood and Randolf Erl of Chestre' (Piers Plowman, V.395). In addition, there are the 32 performances between 1594–7 of The Wise Man of West Chester and the play's revival in 1601, which kept Chester and its earls alive in the minds of Elizabethan theatre-goers.

Such insistent presentation of powerful English aristocrats may well have been part of the Admiral's Men's deliberate policy. In marked contrast to the monarchical plays of the Lord Chamberlain's Men, the nineties see a long procession of English noblemen, always heroically fighting, sometimes heroically dying, under the auspices of the Admiral's Men, such as Captain Thomas Stukeley (1596), The Downfall and The Death of Robert, Earl of Huntingdon (1598), the two parts of Sir John Oldcastle (1599), and The Conquest of Spain by John of Gaunt (1601). That these aristocratic patterns of patriotism and heroism had a clear political message about the true strength and roots of England's glory to convey during the last years of Elizabeth's reign and the mounting tension inherent in the question of succession, exploding in the Essex rising of 1601, can be taken for granted.

Hence, Middleton's choice of subject matter can hardly be called fortuitous. If he, once again, followed the plough through a well-cultivated literary terrain, he found his own furrow by turning for the general outline of plot and conflict and for a good number of details of characterization and rhetoric to that work out of which the English history play came into its own, Raphael Holinshed's Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland. There, in the revised version, published in 1587, he found three Ranulfs, Earls of Chester, of whom one, Ranulf de Meschines, is just mentioned in passing (vol. 2, p. 33). But both Ranulf de Gernons (died 1153) and Ranulf de Blundevill (died 1232) are colourful figures, extensively and dramatically treated. Munday had used Holinshed's account of Blundevill's early career for his Huntingdon plays, in which the Earl figures as nothing but a robe-bearing, doggedly loyalist member of the royal retinue. The latter part of Blundevill's life had greater appeal. He was packed off on a crusade by the king, opposed after his return the king's tyrannical measures and the introduction into England of a tithe for Rome—'The Earl of Chester only stood manfully against the payment of those tenths' (p. 364)—and was set free from a besieged castle by a quickly collected rabble of 'foreigners, players, musicians' (p. 373). Still, his life, lacking the one, terminating ingredient, is hardly the stuff of tragedy. Ranulf de Blundevill died peacefully as one of England's most powerful barons.

The life of his grandfather, Ranulf de Gernons, has more tragic potential. He is the quintessential English Baron, 'a man of . . . stoutness of stomach' (p. 103), ever, as in the battle of Lincoln, leading the 'fore ward' (p. 88), ever being driven by an amoral vitalism to pursue personal autonomy and political power. King's rule or barons' rule—this is a central conflict circumscribing many others. It climaxes at the battle of Lincoln with Ranulf first delivering a rousing battle speech, given in full by Holinshed, then personally charging King Stephen, finally taking him prisoner. And it is dramatically reversed when later he himself is 'craftily taken . . . and could not be delivered till he had surrendered the city and castle of Lincoln, with other fortresses' (p. 96). Foreshortening the historical Ranulf's further alliances, intrigues, and battles, Middleton might have had him summarily killed—poisoned by William Peverell, whom, it is said, he had robbed of his land. This drama of madly ambitious men, of alliances treacherously broken and treacherously renewed, of order and anarchy, foreshadows Hengist, King of Kent. And the element of sexual violence or violent sexuality, never far from the centre of any of Middleton's tragedies, could have been forcefully provided by the rival claimant for the English throne, the Amazonian figure of the Empress Matilda.

The fact that there are two tragedies among Middleton's earliest dramatic writings may help to correct the cliché of an early œuvre written for the children's companies, possessing a realistic, no-point-of-view satirical unity. Middleton wrote within the genres most popular around 1600—and drama based on (pseudo)history certainly ruled the public stage then. He contributed to the revival of another pseudohistory, when, on 14 December 1602, he received 5s. from Henslowe 'for a prologue and an epilogue for the play of Bacon for the court'. The writing of the two pieces for this revival of Robert Greene's old play of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (c.1589) was, no doubt, if one can judge by those highly conventional pieces which Middleton affixed to his own later plays, such as The Roaring Girl, Anything for a Quiet Life, and A Game at Chess, competently executed along the approved lines of apostrophe, captatio benevolentiae, promises of profit and delight, introducing the play's matter and mode, asking for an impartial judgement, begging for applause. It may, however, have profited Middleton in a more indirect, yet more important way, by making him realize magic's persistent popular appeal, cultural relevance—especially after James's accession—and dramatic possibilities. These are possibilities which Middleton richly exploited throughout his playwriting career—from the appearance of a succuba in A Mad World, My Masters (4.1) to the introduction of Hecate into Macbeth, and from the presentation of a witches' coven in The Witch to the transformation of Bacon's 'glass prospective' (Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay, v.105) into the fake 'magical glass' of A Game at Chess (3.1.330, 4.1.94).

With time on his hands and the need to earn money by writing, Middleton certainly wrote other plays between the beginning of his career as a professional playwright in 1601–2 and the death of Elizabeth, more or less coinciding with the closing of the theatres because of the plague, in March 1603. Where better to look for those other plays than among the lost ones—filling in, as in all reading, the empty spaces with plausible approximations. And, indeed, the titles of Middleton's two undated lost plays, The Puritan Maid, the Modest Wife, and the Wanton Widow and The Conqueror's Custom, or The Fair Prisoner, are open to such an ordered play of signification, which lodges them quite plausibly within the literary traditions and the cultural problematics of the early years of the seventeenth century.

That The Puritan Maid, the Modest Wife, and the Wanton Widow did exist and was written by Middleton there can be no reasonable doubt. It was ascribed to him both in the long list of plays entered in the Stationers' Register on 9 September 1653, for Humphrey Moseley, and in John Warburton's list of manuscript plays that were burnt by his legendary cook. The three other plays entered in the Stationers' Register by Moseley and bracketed with The Puritan Maid as by Middleton, exist and are correctly ascribed. The doubts about Warburton's veracity and the authenticity of his list have been persuasively dispersed by John Freehafer. Hence, what is left is a minimal text, the title. Its length and its additive listing of three adjectivally stereotyped figures make it a highly unusual, possibly a singular one for Jacobean plays enacted on a public stage—only academic entertainments in Cambridge being occasionally entitled according to the same principle. Certainly no other title in the Middleton canon is formulated on the same principle—with one exception. The title of The Patient Man and the Honest Whore as entered in the Stationers' Register on 9 November 1604, or, in slight variation, as printed on the first quarto the same year, runs to even more words: 'The Humours of the Patient Man. The Longing Wife and the Honest Whore'. This marked parallelism of two exceptionally phrased titles suggests some kind of relationship to have existed between the two texts, beyond that of common authorship. Proximity of date may have been one, thematic correspondence another: if The Honest Whore puts Puritan ideas and ideals to a somewhat acid test, The Puritan Maid might have reflected them. Be that as it may, there can hardly be any doubt that both plays foreground those problems which long had troubled Elizabethan minds: the moral value and cultural prestige of virginity and/or (married and widowed) chastity; the sexual and economic threat of widowhood; the hierarchical ordering of women's 'natural' roles and the possibilities of containing their bodily functions; the 'dichotomy' of woman/wife and whore.

That those themes pervade and organize the majority of Middleton's plays is common knowledge. Hence, a case can be made for almost any date for The Puritan Maid within his writing career. An early one might be favoured, if topicality and cultural relevance are privileged as criteria for dating. For the time-honoured discussion about the hierarchy of woman's three estates, of who was the earthlier happy or the more divinely blessed, maid, wife, or widow, was bound to become ever more topical and complex under the reign of an ageing Virgin Queen whose cult was not compatible with the advance of either Puritan morality or the new satirical realism. The cult is represented in 1602 by Sir John Davies's 'A Contention between a Wife, a Widow, and a Maid for Precedence'. Staged at Sir Robert Cecil's house in the Strand on 6 December 1602 to honour a visit by the Queen, it moves through 240 stately verses to its foregone conclusion. Nothing else is, under such circumstances, to be expected than that wife and widow will in the end 'yield the honour and the place . . . to the maid' (233-4). But the place of performance subverts the official doctrine: public representation has receded into the exclusive space of an aristocrat's private house.

Yet though receding, the power of official doctrine inscribes itself even in a text like Samuel Rowlands's 'Tis Merry When Gossips Meet (entered in the Stationers' Register on 15 September 1602; printed the same year), presenting the three female prototypes from a plebeian, satirical, carnivalesque point of view. Despite the low setting, a room in a tavern, despite the chatty tone and the everyday topics of conversation—certainly including the traditional one of the hierarchy of woman's estates, but extending to a gossipy variety of others like husbands, tobacco, food, dreams, and the goings-on about town—despite the improbability, that is, of the text reflecting however obliquely on the royal virgo absoluta, a commendatory poem sees the necessity of insisting that the book deals but with 'Maids of mean'st degree', protesting that it is 'not seated in a sumptuous chair, | Nor do thy lines import of Majesty'. The disclaimer implicates Rowlands's text quite thoroughly in the ongoing debate. It presents the three women, maid, wife, and, especially, widow, as weak and leaky vessels, but with a vitality and dignity of their own; not altogether mere objects of misogynist or patriarchal satire, not altogether autonomous subjects of their sayings and doings.

It is within such contexts that Middleton's ten-word text must be placed in order to understand its topicality and subversive relevance. Still, the debate, even if it shifted focus after the death of the royal embodiment of maidenhood, continued unabatedly. Hence, as Middleton's repeated and emphatic treatment of the problematic relationship in his other plays demonstrates, no one date can be insisted on. To understand Middleton's ideological stand in the play, however, there is no need to trace the numerous representations of the three estates, their versions and subversions, throughout his œuvre—the title itself explicates his position pretty clearly. The list sets off the middle term by framing it with two negatively loaded adjectives, puritan (or: puritanical) being invariably used by Middleton in accordance with contemporary usage, not to describe the reformist religious party, but to imply sectarianism or prudery or hypocrisy or all three. Thus privileging the wife, Middleton places himself squarely within mainstream Puritanism, alongside such leading Puritan divines as William Perkins, who in his Christian Economy, published in 1609, unequivocally sets up the ideal: 'Marriage . . . is a state in itself, far more excellent than the condition of single life' (p. 111). Indeed, as Isabella decides in her song dealing with a woman's progression through the three estates: 'of these three | The middle's best' (The Witch, 2.1.137-8).

Similar contextual arguments can be brought forward to locate Middleton's other undated lost play, The Conqueror's Custom, or The Fair Prisoner, either around the time of James's accession or any time later. The play's title heads a list of fifty-one manuscript plays, compiled between 1677 and 1703 by Abraham Hill, a seventeenth-century antiquarian of wide interests and easy familiarity with numerous leading figures from the intellectual and the aristocratic world. The list, magisterially described by Joseph Quincy Adams, is quite possibly based on the holdings of an antiquarian bookseller or a collector of manuscripts. The attribution of the play to Middleton must be accepted, even if there is only Hill's authority for it, since all other verifiable ascriptions of plays in Hill's manuscript are correct or, as in the case of The Witch of Edmonton, reflect (informed) seventeenth-century opinion. That The Conqueror's Custom heads the list may mean that Hill or whoever had arranged the manuscripts thought of it as an early play, as a rather vague chronological order can be discerned among the datable items, and at least one play from the top of the list, number 6, Henry Chettle's All Is Not Gold That Glisters (1601), is definitely an early one.

A stronger case for an early date can, however, be made if the portrait of the young Middleton as determinedly learning the profession of dramatist, as a revisionist and a snatcher-up of well-considered subjects of popular appeal, possessing also a high degree of topicality and cultural relevance, bears some resemblance to reality. For the wording of the title encapsulates a motif frequently dramatized in different generic modes during the 80s and the 90s, in plays such as Farrant's (?) The Wars of Cyrus, Lyly's Campaspe, Marlowe's 1 and 2 Tamburlaine, Kyd's Soliman and Perseda, the anonymous Edward III, and Shakespeare's Henry V, to name but a few. The Herculean motif of heroic man, warrior or monarch, captivated by beautiful woman, slave or queen, lends itself above all to two dramatic representations: as a mirror for princes, based on the conflict of love and lust, or as the battle of two value systems, those of love and honour. Even though these issues can hardly ever be separated clearly, Elizabethan plays emphatically foreground the conflict within the male, the prince. It is his (self-)conquest which is staged, his fall, as in Lyly's play, 'from the armour of Mars to the arms of Venus' (2.2.68–9) and his final triumph: 'I go to conquer kings, and shall I not then | Subdue myself' (Edward III, 893–4). The women are the seductresses or the objects of desire, their bodies to be besieged and taken like castles (with which in the Petrarchan tradition they had indeed become identified). But with the accession of James a 'change in... culture', as Linda Woodbridge has argued in Women and the English Renaissance (1984), took place, a change 'from "masculine" military values to peacetime values traditionally female' (p. 161). The doubleness of Middleton's title, placing conqueror and prisoner on an equal, alternative footing, may be an expression of this shift, of a new double perspective, formulated in that new mode of alternative perspectives, tragicomedy.

Tempting as it is to see Middleton as seismographically reacting to such cultural changes, James's accession and the transformations it signalled and furthered are but stages in an ongoing process—a process which the stage continuously reflected and into which it intervened with plays such as Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra or Fletcher's and Massinger's The False One. The play's cultural relevance, inherent in the motif's dramatic potential to represent affirmatively or subversively courtly life as one of manly courtesy or of effeminate, sensual ease, would not have been much less, say, in 1618–9, when James's peacemaking efforts—the praises of which Middleton had ghost-written in 1618—came increasingly under critical fire. Moreover, Middleton himself, never averse to reusing and revising motifs and themes, figures and scenes, once successfully employed, wrote another play for which the title The Conqueror's Custom, or The Fair Prisoner would be a perfect fit (as no other title of any of the lost plays would be for any other of the known ones). In More Dissemblers Besides Women (1614) there are two conquerors, Andrugio, the general, returning victoriously from battle, and Love, prettily personified in a Cupid: 'I am a little conqueror too' (1.3.77). There is also the widowed Duchess who first, during a seven years' spell of mourning, shuts herself off from the world in voluntary imprisonment but then, falling in love with Andrugio, takes the new 'Captivity cheerfully' (3.2.26). Middleton rings richly ironic variations on the theme of conquest/imprisonment; the play's imagery is suffused with it, the figures body it forth, the plot is structured to test it. Still, there is no necessity to think of The Conqueror's Custom as an alternative title of More Dissemblers Besides Women. After all, the motif was common and culturally important in Elizabethan and Jacobean times—a fact which makes it impossible to date the lost play with any certainty.

There is no doubt about the early date of The Viper and Her Brood. The lawsuit—as discovered, published, and analysed by H. N. Hillebrand—which Robert Keysar, manager of the Children of the Queen's Revels at the Blackfriars, brought against Middleton in 1609 for a debt of £16 proves that Middleton had written a play called The Viper and Her Brood by 1606; that this play was a tragedy (Keysar received a 'librum lusorium tragicum'); that Middleton thought it worth £8 10s., in part payment of the debt, and acceptable for a children's company. Also, of course, that by 1606, he had close dealings with the manager of the Revels Children (at approximately the same time as the Children of Paul's fade from sight). And that he was in debt.

The conjunctive/disjunctive nature of the title suggests strongly what matter Middleton selected for his tragedy, out of the richly varied traditions adhering to vipers (as somewhat distinct from those about serpents). From Herodotus and Pliny onwards the most striking fact about the female viper was her murderous lust. Natural history and emblematic tradition lovingly report, depict, and moralize the phenomenon. The relationship between the female viper and her brood, however, is—again based on Herodotus and Pliny—even more frequently dealt with in Renaissance literature (e.g. in Sidney's Apology for Poetry or in an anti-papist attack, such as The Tragicomedy of Serpents, 1607). Allusions to it are virtually ubiquitous in the drama of the time, from Munday's The Death of Robert, Earl of Huntingdon (ll. 1541–3) to Shakespeare's and Wilkins's Pericles (I.I.107–8), to Jonson's Magnetic Lady (4.4.5–8). It is based on the belief that the viper's brood is hatched inside her belly and impatiently gnaws its way out, thus killing the mother. It is moralized as an emblem of ingratitude or of revenge.

Taken in conjunction, ancient and Renaissance natural history emblemized tells a pretty story. Edward Topsell, following Herodotus, summarizes it succinctly and graphically in 1608, saying 'that when the vipers begin to rage in lust, and desire to couple one with another, the male commeth and putteth his head into the mouth of the female, who is so insatiable in the desire of that copulation, that when the male hath filled her with all his seed-genital, and so would draw forth his head again, she biteth it off, and destroyeth her husband, whereby he dieth and never liveth more: but the female departeth and conceiveth her young in her belly, who every day according to nature's inclination, grow to perfection and ripeness, and at last in revenge of their father's death, do likewise destroy their mother, for they eat out her belly, and by an unnatural issue come forth into the light of this world' (p. 293). Henry Peacham's Minerva Britannia (1612) depicts the story in one emblem:

This is the detailed scenario of a drama replete with murderous passion and passionate murder, or in Freudian terms, of the Oedipal tragedy complete with primal scene, castration, and horde of brothers, with parricidal and matricidal. It is a tragedy based upon emblematic tradition and lending itself to emblematic staging, much in the manner of The Changeling (in which Beatrice uses the material: 'Murder, I see, is followed by more sins. | Was my creation in the womb so cursed, | It must engender with a viper first?', 3.4.167-9). And it is the third tragedy within the first four years of Middleton's career as a highly versatile professional dramatist.

Whether there is any thematic unity within this early career or not, there seem to be, as it were, latent, subterranean connections between the works. Anthony Munday seems to have been a key-figure for the early Middleton—as collaborator, but also as mentor providing ideas (magic) or matter (Chester) for dramatic representation. And is it mere chance that the material of viper and brood frequently surfaces in Elizabethan and Jacobean writings about Caesar and the matter of Rome? 'Caesar at Rome' is the cautionary exemplum in the anonymous Vindiciae contra Tyrannos (1579), well-known in England, even though only translated into English in 1648, for those 'which are so horribly wicked, that they seek to enthrall their own native country like the viperous brood which gnaw through the entrails of their mother' (p. 105). Shakespeare's Brutus shares this view ('therefore think him as a serpent's egg, | Which, hatched, would as his kind grow mischievous', 2.1.32-3), and Jonson, both in The Poetaster (1601) and Sejanus (1603), uses the metaphor in a Roman, Caesarean setting (not, however, applying it to Caesar). Could The Viper and Her Brood have been another classical history? Presenting the monstrous life and regiment of an Agrippina? Of course it could, but it need not have been. For here we move definitely into a realm of speculation in which signifying practice plays fast and loose with scholarly rules of plausible approximation.

SEE ALSO

- Lost Pageant for Charles I: A Brief Account: this volume, 1898
- Lost Political Prose, 1620-7: A Brief Account: this volume, 1907
- Other Middleton-Dekker works: Gravesend, 128; Meeting, 183; Magnificent, 219; Patient Man, 280; Banquet, 637; Roaring Girl, 721; Gypsy, 1723
- Other Middleton-Munday works: Integrity, 1766; Golden Fleece, 1772
- Other Middleton-Webster works: Magnificent, 219; Quiet, 1593; The Duchess of Malfi, 1886
- List of works cited: Companion, 1122

MICHAELMAS TERM

Edited by Theodore B. Leinwand

Michaelmas Term takes its name from the court session that began in London on the ninth of October. The first term, or ‘father’ (1.1.35) of the court calendar, it was succeeded by Hilary, Easter, and Trinity terms. Yet, as the eponymous Michaelmas Term of the Induction tells us, ‘he that expects any great quarrels in law to be handled here, will be fondly deceived’ (1.1.70–2). And this caveat is largely borne out. Legal documents are signed and seconded and a judge is brought on stage at the last moment, but the plot is driven by commercial, not legal intrigue, and lawyers do not participate in it. The lawyers in the house at the first performance of Michaelmas Term, some time between late 1604 and early 1606, would instead have been sitting opposite the stage. For a significant portion of the audience probably consisted of law students drawn from the inns of court.

We know that as early as 1580, young men from the inns of court were playgoers. In that year, three of the Earl of Oxford’s players committed ‘disorders and frays upon the gentlemen of the Inns of the Court’. The inns men returned the favour in 1581: Parr Stafferton, a ‘gentleman of Grays Inn’, is noted in a City of London order ‘for that he...brought a disordered company of gentlemen of the Inns of Court & others, to assault...players of Interludes within the City’. Some ten years later, Thomas Nashe, in his Pierce Penniless (1592), included inns of court men among those prone to ‘bestow themselves upon pleasure...[by] seeing a Play’. Thus young John Donne, of Lincoln’s Inn, was a frequent playgoer in the 1590s. In 1609, in The Gull’s Hornbook, Dekker denigrates a law student sitting on a stool at the theatre next to a farmer’s son. In the Induction to Bartholomew Fair (1614), Jonson’s stage-keeper imagines ‘witty young masters of the Inns of Court’ sousing a prostitute ‘with her stern upward’ under a stage property pump. And in 1629, Francis Lenton caricatures the progress of an inns student who not only has sat upon the Blackfriars stage and visited both the Cockpit and the Globe, but has a copy of Jonson’s ‘book of Plays’ too. No wonder that a father in Jonson’s Poetaster (1601), fearing that his son lodged at one of the inns will become an actor, asks, ‘What? shall I have my son a stager now? an ingle [catamite, or kept boy] for players?’

Middleton several times refers explicitly to the inns in Michaelmas Term. Twice in 2.3, Quomodo boasts that his son Sim, ‘lately commenced at Cambridge’, is now a ‘Templar’ (the Knights Templar formerly occupied the law societies’ buildings). The woollen draper takes pleasure in his son’s gentrification and in his own sponsorship of Sim’s putative advance in status: ‘I have placed [him]

at Inns of Court.’ But Quomodo’s final mention of London’s law schools entails a vaunt of another sort. Left alone on stage once the commodity scam he has masterminded is well launched, Quomodo ends the second act by commanding the audience’s approbation: ‘Admire me, all you students at Inns of Cozenage.’ While the inns were virtually England’s third university, Quomodo’s bravado indicates an unacknowledged fourth school—London itself—where a ‘fair free-breasted gentleman’ like Richard Easy could get ‘the city powd’ring’. As an early modern English anticipation of a corporate lawyer/executive, a graduate of Cambridge, a law school, and the city would be a truly new man. Surpassing the draper, surpassing even his hopes for Sim (4.4.24), the merchant-lawyer that inns of court satirist Everard Guilpin lampooned in his Skailetheia (1598) could be found both ‘Toyling’ at the ‘Inns’ and ‘Moyling’ at ‘th’Exchange’. ‘Will not he thrive (think ye) who can devise, | Thus to unite the law and merchandise? | Doubtless he will, or cozen out of doubt; | What matter’s that? his law will bear him out.’

Particularly because it takes the form of direct audience address, Quomodo’s exuberant gloating raises questions about the relationship between the characters as well as the actors and their audiences. For Michaelmas Term was not only performed for at least a fair number of young men, it was performed by young men. The play’s 1607 title-page informs us that it was ‘sundry times acted by the Children of Pauls’. In a theatre that held but a few hundred spectators, a company of adolescent boys faced a cadre of late adolescent or young adult men. Surely there were mature citizens and city wives and gallants, maybe an ambassador and a lord in the audience, and a comprehensive analysis would consider citizen spectators’ responses to Quomodo, their wives’ possible reactions to Thomasine, the gallants’ reactions to the play’s gentry, and so on. But it is the law students in the audience whom Middleton singles out. From which characters might they have distanced themselves in cool amusement, and with whom might they have identified as they heard the choristers’ song school performance of Michaelmas Term?

Despite the fact that he is the play’s only lawyer in the rough, smug and gullible Sim Quomodo’s negligible part is hardly one with which the inns men would have wanted to affiliate themselves. His father, his father’s ‘spirit’ Shortyard, and Richard Easy are, however, all plausible candidates. Quomodo’s craftiness works in his favour even as his social status, his craft as citizen-draper, works against him. To the extent that he motivates, indeed scripts the play’s unfolding scam, and because he represents just the sort of capital that was financing the very city playhouses inns men frequented, Quomodo successfully models urban and financial cunning. To the extent that he is but one among a horde of grasping ‘tradesmen’ (5.1.69) out to ‘undo gentlemen daily’ (2.3.60–1), a status climber who can barely control his lust to be ‘divulged a landed man’ (3.4.5), Quomodo is an inns man’s nightmare metonymy for the ‘man-devouring city’ (2.2.21). While the Middle and Inner Templars in the choristers’ audience may have admired Quomodo for his cozenage or delighted in his artless fantasies of landownership as we still do, they also would have had a stake in his comeuppance, his final reinsertion into the shop world that bred him.

Templars in the audience could also have derived pleasure from Shortyard, Quomodo’s endlessly shape-shifting ‘spirit’. Shortyard opens up for young men on the make a vision of unchecked mobility and, better still, an apprentice besting—if only momentarily—his master. And there is reason to believe that inns students were engaged in a sort of apprenticeship. They served seven years before they were introduced by ‘Masters of the Bench’ into the mysteries of their craft. During their ‘indenture’, they were not only subject to discipline at the hands of barristers both older and more powerful than they were, but, as Arthur Marotti has argued, they were ‘socially, economically, and politically vulnerable’ in London at large. We might try to imagine what an inns student would have had to bring into focus as he followed Shortyard from one act to the next: first and always, a chorister and so an immature boy, then Shortyard the young man or boy/servant/apprentice, Blastfield the London gallant, and finally an alderman’s deputy. Active and passive, gulling and gulled, short yarded (impotent) and yet a seminal, ‘pregnant spirit’ (1.2.95), Shortyard might as easily delight as dismay, incite as well as assuage would-be pleaders’ anxieties.

Of course, it is primarily Richard Easy to whom we may assume the non-citizenry at a performance of Michaelmas Term would have responded. Gallants, inns men, or country gentlemen in town for business or court matters would all have recognized Easy as both literary and historical type, as a dupe ripe for duping and a recent inheritor of his father’s estate newly arrived in the city. A ‘fair, free-breasted gentleman’ (1.2.57), a ‘fresh gallant’ (1.2.116), Easy comes up to London not so much to marry as to be ‘free’ and live at ‘liberty’ (1.2.51–2). That he is almost immediately hooked like one of the ‘fish... tradesmen catch’ (1.2.135) speaks to his vulnerability. That he finally, perhaps undeservedly, recoups his losses and inadvertently outwits Quomodo speaks to the song school playwrights’ ideological investment in the fantasies of the youthful gentlemen in their audiences. And yet in Michaelmas Term, at least, Middleton strives for balance. Quomodo announces early on that ‘They’re [gentry] busy ’bout our wives, we [citizens] ’bout their lands’ (1.2.112); however, Quomodo is in the end still landless, and Easy is neither very preoccupied with nor very energetic about winning Thomasine Quomodo. Neither wived nor wealthier, the Easy whom the inns of court spectators attend to through Michaelmas Term has been powdered. He has been cured in the sweating tub that was London. Easy is initiated into the urban mysteries that challenged all of the young men in the audience, and in the end, he has that to which they aspired: a fair chance of succeeding within the mostly male social and financial circuits of the city.

He also enters on their behalf into urban erotic currents—circuits in which status and gender and finance and sexual practices are variously configured (Leinwand, 1994). Powdering tubs were, after all, designed for sweating out venereal disease. And the nasty Lethe–Courtesan–Hellgill scenes introduce into Michaelmas Term a hardly comic world of grotesque men trading in women’s flesh. Where heteroerotic relations arise in this plot, or in the related doings in regard to Susan Quomodo’s marriage, crude and degrading sodomitical intentions prevail. We may recall Jonson’s ‘masters of the Inns’ humiliating a prostitute ‘with her stern upward’ when Middleton’s Courtesan, a ‘backslider’, is advised to wear her hair ‘like a mock-face behind; ’tis such an Italian [sodomitical] world, many men know not before from behind’ (3.1.19–21). For her part, Susan—who will eventually find herself married to a man named Rearage—is not sure what to ‘do with a gentleman? I know not which way to lie with him’ (2.3.58–9). Even Thomasine has not been ‘use[d]... so well as a man mought’ by Quomodo (4.3.54–5).

But it is Easy, who rests too much upon his ‘R’s’, his arse (2.3.385), whose name conjures up a privy (a stool of ease), who describes himself as having been ‘easily possessed’ by Cockstone (1.2.51) and is in turn said by that gallant to be ‘somewhat too open’ (1.2.57), who finds in Shortyard a ‘sweet bedfellow’ for whom he is ‘sick’ with ‘a great desire’ (2.3.151 and 3.5.47–9), and about whom Shortyard says, ‘in a word, we’re man and wife; they can but lie together, and so do we’ (2.3.171–4)—it is Easy who enters into a sometimes comic, sometimes corrosive set of homosocial, often homoerotic relations. Heterosexuality may underwrite the intrigue in various other Middletonian comedies, but in Michaelmas Term Easy’s desire for male camaraderie, male affection, and the ‘entertainment’ (3.2.14) Shortyard can provide predominates. Considering the audience, and Bruce Smith’s plausible contention that the inns of court ‘fostered the homosexual potentiality in male bonding’, we should not be surprised. Varieties of male relations in early modern England were often merely ordinary. Philip Stubbes’s conviction that playgoing led men to ‘play sodomite’ had no effect on profits at the playhouses, and King James I’s evocation of ‘marriage’, ‘sweet child and wife’, as well as ‘dear dad and husband’ in a letter to George Villiers did not undermine his sovereignty.

There may, then, be nothing particularly troubling when homosociality crosses over into homoeroticism in Michaelmas Term, but there is a cause for concern when hierarchies based on social status or on subject (active) and object (passive) are unsettled. Whom do we imagine does what to whom when a gentleman from Essex, looking to live free but caught up in a sting, sleeps with a citizen's spirit/servant disguised as a gallant? And in what position might the inns students have imagined themselves? Or Middleton, who signed himself 'T. M. gent.' and whose father was a bricklayer, a citizen, and an 'allowed' gentleman? The play does, after all, make something in 2.3 of who 'enters' first (signs his name, but also penetrates); of whether Quomodo had a 'stomach to' (inclination, but also sexual appetite for) a 'somewhat hot' gentleman like Easy, when he 'might ha' had a good substantial citizen' (3.4.59–69); and of Shortyard, when disguised as a wealthy citizen, venturing his body for a 'gentleman's pleasure' (3.5.68).

Since the choristers were venturing their bodies in the playhouse for gentlemen's pleasure, it is possible that the inns students would in the end have sought to distance themselves from Easy. Not just a gull, a figure who might be taken—in both the financial and the erotic sense—but probably a handsome boy actor and so an object of attraction, neither Easy nor the actor who personated him could easily escape subjection. What remained within the chorister's purview would have had less to do with his acting skills or his sexual sophistication than with the two together, with what Middleton in Father Hubbard's Tales imagined was the Blackfriars boy actors' ability to 'ravish a man' (561). In their own defence, the inns men could imagine that they, unlike the boy actors, were not circumscribed by a stigmatized institution such as the children's companies. But the inns, which nurtured the vogue for satire, were often one of its targets. The theatrical transaction at the song school may therefore betray some tension: the sexual connotation of 'undo' (as in 'ravish') and the uncertainty as to who hosts or employs whom complicate the concern on William Prynne's part (1633) that 'inns of court men were undone but for players; that they are their chiefest guests and employment'. Were a law student to confirm Stubbes's worst fear and bring home a boy actor after a performance, social status, sexual practice, age difference, even gender roles (the boys did play the woman's part) all would have been in play, just as they were during the two hours within which Michaelmas Term aimed to 'dispatch' (send off, but also sexually satisfy) the audience.

In 1927, T. S. Eliot described Middleton as a playwright 'solicitous to please his audience with what they expect; but there is underneath the same steady impersonal passionless observation of human nature'. While there is much in this formulation with which we might quibble, it nonetheless answers well to the interplay of desire and calculation, of pleasure and discomfort, stimulated in and by Michaelmas Term. Stimulated, not observed or recorded (Eliot argues that 'Middleton's comedy was "photographic"', because Michaelmas Term formulates, analyses, enchants and disenchants. In fusing the city with comedy into what we now call city comedy, a dramatist like Middleton was not merely reworking New Comedy or dramatizing cony-catching stories. Like Swinburne's Hogarth (Swinburne called Michaelmas Term 'an excellent Hogarthian comedy'), Middleton seems to have been more interested in animating the ideologies that inform tropes and types than in human depth or flesh and blood (Leinwand, 1986). To imagine audience members responding to (a chorister's) Easy or Quomodo may well be different from what we usually have in mind when we talk about identifying with, say, (Burbage's) Hamlet. In a city comedy like Michaelmas Term, the city precedes and then engenders character. For Gail Kern Paster, who renders 'man-devouring city' (2.2.21) as 'the predatory city', as Middleton's version of a 'Renaissance overreacher', London is 'the one commodity that transcends the fact of limit'. A somewhat more benign account would suggest that London thoroughly socializes character, pre-empting any possibility of individuality, and that Michaelmas Term is a sort of profound comic urban sociology. Again, not photorealism but sociology, with the stress on its 'logy', its constitutive theorizing and its implicated theorist.

But comic too. For while it is reasonable to conceive of a darkly shaded production of Michaelmas Term, one in which 'there can be no change in the closed circle of the [city's] predatory system, merely recycling' (Paster), we may also imagine a production which is at least moderately restorative. Such a suggestion may seem naïve or even callous in the face of Thomasine's forced reallocation (5.3.60) to Quomodo, but then even she seems to expect to regain what she briefly possessed (5.3.140–2). Given that the play's Induction leaves off with Michaelmas Term hoping 'there's no fools i'th'house!' (1.1.75), a production might well align itself with comedy's educative function. As Stephen Booth has suggested, 'Comedy... demonstrates the proposition that there is a way things are and fools forget what it is'. Of course, history—in which this comedy is surely embedded—has proved to many that there is no reason to construe the 'way things are' to mean unchanging; if it does not denote tractable, it might still signify only resistant to change. Therefore although the fools in Michaelmas Term and its audiences forget its comic proposition, we may still note that the literal judgements of the final scene stand for a more flexible, sound judgement: less moral than analytical, at once sociological and aesthetic, available then and again in the reader's or playgoer's now.

SEE ALSO

Textual introduction and apparatus: Companion, 535

Authorship and date: Companion, 353

Michaelmas Term

[for the Children of Paul's]

THE PERSONS OF THE PLAY

Richard EASY, a gentleman from Essex
REARAGE }
SALEWOOD } London gallants
COCKSTONE }

Ephestian QUOMODO, a woollen draper
THOMASINE, Quomodo's wife
SIM, their son
SUSAN, their daughter
SHORTYARD, alias John Blastfield, etc. } Quomodo's spirits
FALSELIGHT, alias Idem, etc. }
BOY, Quomodo's servant
WINIFRED, Thomasine's maid

Andrew LETHE, born Andrew Gruel, a Scottish upstart MOTHER GRUEL, Lethe's mother
Dick HELLGILL (Pander)
COUNTRY WENCH, also Courtesan and Harlot, Lethe's mistress

Country Wench's FATHER
MOTHER, an old woman
MISTRESS COMINGS, a tirewoman TAILOR

JUDGE
DUSTBOX, a scrivener
DRAWER
Mourners SERVANTS
OFFICERS
LIVERY
Hospital boys

MICHAELMAS TERM }
BOY, his servant } the Induction
HILARY, EASTER, and TRINITY TERMS } POOR FELLOW, PAGE, and PANDER, } in dumb show }

I. I Incipit Actus Primus
Induction
Enter Michaelmas Term in a whitish cloak, new come up out of the country, a Boy bringing his gown after him

MICHAELMAS TERM

Boy?

BOY Here sir!

MICHAELMAS TERM

Lay by my conscience,

5 Give me my gown, that weed is for the country,
We must be civil now, and match our evil;
Who first made civil black, he pleased the devil.
So, now know I where I am, me thinks already
I grasp best part of the autumnian blessing
In my contentious fathom; my hand's free,

This commentary pays special attention to sexual innuendo.

- 1.1.0.3 Michaelmas Term court session that began on 9 October 2 weed his 'whitish' (signifying innocence) cloak; white is still the liturgical colour for Michaelmas (29 September) in Roman Catholic and Anglican churches 3 civil urbane; citified as opposed to

- countrified
4 civil black wealthy citizens often wore black, which was associated with the devil
7 fathom grasp, power (fig.)
11 wealthy variance costly discrepancy between two legal documents fat said of a dispute at law capable of yielding abundant returns

From wronger and from wrongèd I have fee.
And what by sweat from the rough earth they draw,
Is to enrich this silver harvest, Law. 10
And so through wealthy variance, and fat brawl,
The barn is made but steward to the hall.
Come they up thick enough?

BOY

O, like hops and harlots sir!

MICHAELMAS TERM

Why dost thou couple them? 15

BOY O, very aptly, for as the hop well boiled will make a man not stand upon his legs, so the harlot in time will leave a man no legs to stand upon!

MICHAELMAS TERM

Such another and be my heir. I have no child, Yet have I wealth would redeem beggary. 20

- 12 hall law courts (Westminster Hall)
13 Come they up litigants travelling to London
16 hop well boiled dried flowers of hops give a bitter flavour to malt liquor 18 no legs a consequence of venereal disease
19 Such another another witticism like that 20 buggery possible play on 'buggery' (see I.1.25-6)

- I think it be a curse both here and foreign,
Where bags are fruitful'st, there the womb's most barren;
The poor has all our children, we their wealth.
Shall I be prodigal when my life cools,
25 Make those my heirs whom I have beggared, fools?
It would be wondrous; rather beggar more;
Thou shalt have heirs enough, thou keep'st a whore.
And here comes kindred too with no mean purses,
Yet strive to be still blest with clients' curses.
Music playing. Enter the other three Terms, the first bringing in a fellow poor, which the other two advance, giving him rich apparel, a page, and a pander
- Exit [fellow]
- MICHAELMAS TERM
30 What subtlety have we here? A fellow
Shrugging for life's kind benefits, shift and heat, Crept up in three Terms, wrapped in silk and silver,
So well appointed too with page and pander;
It was a happy gale that blew him hither.
- FIRST TERM
35 Thou father of the Terms, hail to thee.
- SECOND TERM
May much contention still keep with thee.
- THIRD TERM
Many new fools come up and see thee.
- SECOND TERM
Let 'em pay dear enough that see thee.
- FIRST TERM
40 And like asses use such men,
When their load's off, turn 'em to graze again.
- SECOND TERM
And may our wish have full effect,
Many a suit, and much neglect.
- THIRD TERM
And as it hath been often found,
Let the clients' cups come round.
- SECOND TERM
45 Help your poor kinsmen when you ha' got 'em;
You may drink deep, leave us the bottom.
- 22 bags moneybags; also scrotums (see 1.1.28)
- 24 cools wanes
- 28 no mean purses considerable wealth, but also large scrotums
- 29.1 three Terms Hilary (winter), Easter (early spring), and Trinity (late spring);
because it commences the legal calendar,
Michaelmas is the 'father' (1.1.35)
- 31 Shrugging shuddering shift clothes
- 45 'em 'clients' cups' or goblets (payment, perhaps in the form of bribes)
- 46 bottom possible play on 'buttocks'
- 47 lamb client; also 'lamb's-wool', hot ale mixed with the pulp of roasted apples
- 48 skin parchment or legal document
- 52 come sixteen times about that take four years to litigate
- 55 reversions leftovers
- 56 meats also 'prostitutes' or flesh of a prostitute (see 1.1.62)
- returns There were eight 'days of return' in Michaelmas Term on which sheriffs returned writs (1.1.58) to the courts from which they were issued
- 62 drabs prostitutes
- 63 spread . . . you make myself known; also, make myself available for copulation
- 64 ours the boy actors, the Children of St Paul's
- 64-5 sixpenny fees minimum admission price at a hall playhouse
- 65 dispatch send off; also, sexually satisfy (see 1.2.134)
- two hours In Romeo and Juliet, Prologue.12, Shakespeare refers to the 'two-hours' traffic of our stage', but
- THIRD TERM
Or when there is a lamb fall'n in,
Take you the lamb, leave us the skin.
- MICHAELMAS TERM
Your duty and regard hath moved us,
Never till now we thought you loved us;
50 Take comfort from our words, and make no doubt,
You shall have suits come sixteen times about.
- ALL THREE TERMS
We humbly thank the patron of our hopes. Exeunt
- MICHAELMAS TERM
With what a vassal-appetite they gnaw
On our reversions, and are proud 55 Coldly to taste our meats, which eight returns
Serve in to us as courses.
One day our writs, like wild-fowl, fly abroad,
And then return o'er cities, towns, and hills,
With clients like dried straws between their bills;
60 And 'tis no few, birds pick to build their nests,
Nor no small money that keeps drabs and feasts!
But, gentlemen, to spread myself open unto you, in cheaper Terms I salute you, for ours have but sixpenny 65 fees all the year long, yet we dispatch you in two hours, without demur; your suits hang not long here after candles be lighted. Why do we call this play by such a dear and chargeable title, Michaelmas Term? Know it consents happily to our purpose, though perhaps faintly to the interpretation of many, for he that expects any 70 great quarrels in law to be handled here, will be fondly deceived; this only presents those familiar accidents which happened in town in the circumference of those six weeks whereof Michaelmas Term is lord. Sat sapienti;
I hope there's no fools i'th' house! Exit [with Boy] 75
- Enter at one door Master Rearage, meeting Master
Salewood* 1.2
- SALEWOOD What, Master Rearage?
- REARAGE Master Salewood? Exceedingly well met in town;
comes your father up this Term?
- SALEWOOD Why he was here three days before the Exchequer gaped. 5
- Dekker, in The Raven's Almanac, writes of players 'glad to play three hours for two pence'.
- 66 hang idle
- 67 candles be lighted indoor playhouses were candle-lit
- 68 dear and chargeable costly, weighty
- 69 happily fortunately
- 71 fondly foolishly
- 74 Sat sapienti proverbial: *dictum sapienti sat
est* ('a word to the wise is sufficient')
- 1.2.0.1 Rearage one who is in debt (‘arrears’)
- 0.2 Salewood one who has sold his family's estate
- 4-5 Exchequer gaped The court which dealt with revenue matters opened eight days before Michaelmas Term.

REARAGE Fie, such an early Termer?
 SALEWOOD He's not to be spoke withal. I dare not ask him blessing till the last of November.
 REARAGE And how looks thy little venturing cousin?
 10 SALEWOOD Faith like a lute that has all the strings broke; no body will meddle with her.
 REARAGE Fie, there are doctors enough in town will string her again, and make her sound as sweet as e'er she did. Is she not married yet?
 15 SALEWOOD Sh'as no luck, some may better steal a horse than others look on. I have known a virgin of five bastards wedded. Faith, when all's done we must be fain to marry her into the North, I'm afraid.
 REARAGE But will she pass so, think you?
 20 SALEWOOD Puh, any thing that is warm enough is good enough for them; so it come in the likeness, though the devil be in't, they'll venture the firing.
 REARAGE They're worthy spirits, i'faith. Heard you the news?
 25 SALEWOOD Not yet.
 REARAGE Mistress Difficult is newly fallen a widow.
 SALEWOOD Say true, is Master Difficult, the lawyer, dead?
 REARAGE Easily dead, sir.
 SALEWOOD Pray, when died he?
 30 REARAGE What a question's that! When should a lawyer die but in the vacation? He has no leisure to die in the Term-time; beside, the noise there would fetch him again.
 SALEWOOD Knew you the nature of his disease?
 35 REARAGE Faith, some say he died of an old grief he had, that the vacation was fourteen weeks long.
 SALEWOOD And very likely. I knew 'twould kill him at last; 't'as troubled him a long time. He was one of those that would fain have brought in the heresy of a fifth Term, often crying with a loud voice, 'O, why should we lose Bartholomew week?'
 40 REARAGE He savours, stop your nose; no more of him.
Enter Master Cockstone, a gentleman, meeting Master Easy of Essex COCKSTONE Young Master Easy, let me salute you, sir. When came you?
 45 EASY I have but inn'd my horse since, Master Cockstone.

COCKSTONE
 You seldom visit London, Master Easy,
 But now your father's dead, 'tis your only course;
 Here's gallants of all sizes, of all lasts;
 Here you may fit your foot, make choice of those Whom your affection may rejoice in. 50

EASY
 You have easily possessed me, I am free;
 Let those live hinds that know not liberty.

COCKSTONE
 Master Rearage?

EASY
 Good Master Salewood, I am proud of your society.

REARAGE
 What gentleman might that be? 55

COCKSTONE
 One Master Easy, h'as good land in Essex,
 A fair free-breasted gentleman, somewhat too open (Bad in man, worse in woman,
 The gentry-fault at first); he is yet fresh
 And wants the city powd'ring. But what news?
 60 Is't yet a match 'twixt Master Quomodo's
 The rich draper's daughter and yourself?

REARAGE
 Faith, sir, I am vilely rivaled!

COCKSTONE
 Vilely? By whom?

REARAGE
 One Andrew Lethe, crept to a little warmth,
 65 And now so proud that he forgets all storms;
 One that ne'er wore apparel but, like ditches,
 'Twas cast before he had it, now shines bright
 In rich embroideries. Him Master Quomodo affects, 70 The daughter him, the mother only me;
 I rest most doubtful, my side being weakest.

COCKSTONE
 Yet the mother's side
 Being surer than the father's, it may prove,
 'Men plead for money best, women for love.'

REARAGE
 'Slid, Master Quomodo! 75

8 last of November the end of Michaelmas Term
 9 venturing adventuring, copulating; so that she has been 'broke' (I.2.10, de-flowered), no one will 'meddle' (I.2.11, copulate) with her
 18 North Scotland
 22 venture the firing take a shot (fig.); possibly, risk being aroused or risk being infected with venereal disease (fire)
 31 die also, to have an orgasm
 32 fetch him draw forth or bring him back from the dead; cause to ejaculate or achieve an erection (to resurrect)
 35 grief also, disease or sickness (compare

'gripes' or griffes, colic pains)
 41 Bartholomew week week in August given over to Bartholomew Fair
 42.1 Cockstone a lecher (cock/penis + stone/testicle)
 51 possessed convinced; also, to have sexually (this would make it part of a cluster of bawdy having to do with sodomy: see 'gallants of all sizes', 'foot', 'affection', 'free' and 'liberty')
 52 hinds farm servants or cottagers
 56 Essex The people of Essex were said to be naive farmers.
 57 open sincere or undisguised, but also sexually available (compare I.2.48-52)

60 wants lacks powd'ring animal flesh was 'powdered'—salted and pickled—in a powdering tub; in Henry V, 2.1.73, Shakespeare refers to a 'powd'ring tub', a sweating tub used to cure venereal disease
 65 warmth comfort, security, prosperity
 67 ditches for drainage; graves; also, from L. scrobis, a ditch or vulva (associated with prostitutes)
 68 cast to dig or clear; to throw away ('apparel')
 75 'Slid an oath, contracted from 'God's (eye)lid'

COCKSTONE
How then, afraid of a woollen draper?

REARAGE He warned me his house, and I hate he should see me abroad. [They retire]
[Enter] Quomodo with his two spirits, Shortyard and Falselight

QUOMODO O my two spirits, Shortyard and Falselight, you that have so enriched me, I have industry for you both!

80 SHORTYARD Then do you please us best, sir.
QUOMODO Wealthy employment.
SHORTYARD You make me itch, sir.
QUOMODO You, Falselight, as I have directed you—85 FALSELIGHT I am nimble.
QUOMODO
Go, make my coarse commodities look sleek,
With subtle art beguile the honest eye;
Be near to my trap-window, cunning Falselight.

FALSELIGHT
I never failed it yet.
QUOMODO I know thou didst not.
Exit Falselight

90 But now to thee, my true and secret Shortyard, Whom I dare trust e'en with my wife;
Thou ne'er didst mistress harm, but master good.
There are too few of thy name gentlemen,
And that we feel, but citizens in abundance.

95 I have a task for thee, my pregnant spirit,
To exercise thy pointed wits upon.
SHORTYARD
Give it me, for I thirst.
QUOMODO Thine ear shall drink it.
Know, then, I have not spent this long vacation
Only for pleasure's sake. Give me the man 100 Who out of recreation culls advantage,
Dives into seasons, never walks, but thinks,
Ne'er rides, but plots. My journey was toward Essex—
SHORTYARD
Most true.
QUOMODO Where I have seen what I desire.
SHORTYARD
A woman?
QUOMODO Puh, a woman! Yet beneath her,

That which she often treads on, yet commands her: 105
Land, fair neat land.
SHORTYARD What is the mark you shoot at?
QUOMODO
Why, the fairest to cleave the heir in twain;
I mean his title: to murder his estate,
Stifle his right in some detested prison.
There are means and ways enough to hook in gentry, 110
Besides our deadly enmity, which thus stands:
They're busy 'bout our wives, we 'bout their lands.
SHORTYARD
Your revenge is more glorious:
To be a cuckold is but for one life,
When land remains to you, your heir, or wife. 115
QUOMODO
Ah, sirrah, do we sting 'em? This fresh gallant Rode newly up before me.
SHORTYARD I beseech his name.
QUOMODO
Young Master Easy.
SHORTYARD Easy? It may fall right.
QUOMODO
I have inquired his haunt.—Stay, ha!
Ay, that 'tis, that's he, that's he! 120
SHORTYARD Happily!
QUOMODO Observe, take surely note of him, he's fresh and free. Shift thyself speedily into the shape of gallantry.
I'll swell thy purse with angels. Keep foot by foot with him, out-dare his expenses, flatter, dice, and brothel to 125 him. Give him a sweet taste of sensuality. Train him to every wasteful sin, that he may quickly need health, but especially money. Ravish him with a dame or two, be his bawd for once; I'll be thine forever. Drink drunk with him, creep into bed to him, kiss him and undo 130 him, my sweet spirit.
SHORTYARD
Let your care dwell in me, soon shall it shine;
What subtlety is in man, that is not mine? Exit
QUOMODO
O, my most cheerful spirit, go, dispatch.
Gentry is the chief fish we tradesmen catch. Exit 135
EASY What's here?

76 woollen draper cloth merchant77 warned me forbid me from entering78.1 Quomodo L. for how; may pun on the name of William Howe, a broker, convicted in Star Chamber, in 1596, of 'cozening diverse young gentlemen' spirits chameleon-like assistants (fig.); also a suggestion of Quomodo's seminal fluid or vital forcesShortyard a 'short yard', a clipped measuring stick or a small penis82 employment service or work, but also intercourse (thus Shortyard's 'itch'—1.2.83—his sexual desire and his anticipated skin-irritation due to venereal disease)

88 trap-window hinged skylight or pent-house94 citizens those who were admitted to the freedom of the city (see 1.3.48); tradesmen and merchants as opposed to gentlemencitizens in abundance too many citizens with short yards95 pregnant clever101 Dives into seasons seizes opportunities105 treads walks, but also copulates106 neat trim, tidy107 heir puns on 'hair'108 title hereditary right to his property109 prison debtors' prison (see 2.3.382)116 sting defraud, enrage124 angels gold coins; possible play on

'ingles' or catamites (see 1.2.147-8)

Keep foot by foot keep pace; also, keep up with him, 'fuck for fuck' (from Fr. foutre)126 Train entice130 creep into bed to him While it was not uncommon for men to share beds at taverns and inns, this line and the next ('Kiss him and undo him') may suggest a sexual relation; see 1.2.48-52, 2.3.151, 2.3.172-4, and 3.4.105.

SALEWOOD O, they are bills for chambers.
 EASY [reads] 'Against Saint Andrew's, at a painter's house, there's a fair chamber ready furnished to be let, the 140 house not only endued with a new fashion forepart, but, which is more convenient for a gentleman, with a very provident back door.'
 SALEWOOD Why, here's virtue still. I like that thing that's necessary, as well as pleasant.
 [Enter Lethe, reading the bills]
 145 COCKSTONE What news in yonder paper?
 REARAGE Ha! Seek you for news, there's for you!
 SALEWOOD Who? 'Tis! In the name of the black angels, Andrew Gruel!
 REARAGE No, Andrew Lethe.
 150 SALEWOOD Lethe?
 REARAGE He's forgot his father's name, poor Walter Gruel, that begot him, fed him, and brought him up.
 SALEWOOD Not hither?
 REARAGE No. 'Twas from his thoughts; he brought him up 155 below.
 SALEWOOD
 But does he pass for Lethe?
 REARAGE 'Mongst strange eyes
 That no more know him than he knows himself;
 That's nothing now, for Master Andrew Lethe,
 A gentleman of most received parts,
 160 Forgetfulness, lust, impudence, and falsehood,
 And one especial courtly quality,
 To wit, no wit at all. I am his rival
 For Quomodo's daughter, but he knows it not.
 SALEWOOD
 He's spied us o'er his paper.
 REARAGE O, that's a warning
 To make our duties ready.
 165 COCKSTONE Salute him? Hang him!
 REARAGE
 Puh, wish his health a while, he'll be laid shortly;
 Let him gorge venison for a time, our doctors
 Will bring him to dry mutton. Seem respective,
 To make his pride swell like a toad with dew.
 170 SALEWOOD Master Lethe!
 REARAGE Sweet Master Lethe!

LETHE Gentlemen, your pardon; I remember you not.
 SALEWOOD Why, we supped with you last night, sir!
 LETHE
 O, cry you mercy, 'tis so long ago,
 I had quite forgot you; I must be forgiven. 175
 Acquaintance, dear society, suits, and things
 Do so flow to me,
 That had I not the better memory,
 'Twould be a wonder I should know myself.
 'Esteem is made of such a dizzy metal.' 180
 I have received of many, gifts o'er night
 Whom I have forgot ere morning. Meeting the men,
 I wished 'em to remember me again;
 They do so, then if I forget again,
 I know what helped before, that will help then. 185
 This is my course; for memory I have been told Twenty preserves, the best I find is gold.
 Ay truly! Are you not knights yet, gentlemen?
 SALEWOOD Not yet.
 LETHE No, that must be looked into, 'tis your own fault. I 190 have some store of venison, where shall we devour it, gentlemen?
 SALEWOOD The Horn were a fit place.
 LETHE
 For venison fit,
 The horn having chased it, 195
 At the Horn we'll—Rhyme to that?
 COCKSTONE
 Taste it.
 SALEWOOD
 Waste it.
 REARAGE
 Cast it. 200
 LETHE That's the true rhyme, indeed. We hunt our venison twice, I tell you: first out o'th' park, next out o'th' belly.
 COCKSTONE
 First dogs take pains to make it fit for men,
 Then men take pain to make it fit for dogs.
 LETHE
 Right. 205

137 bills advertisements; the scene is probably the middle aisle of St Paul's Cathedral, where men of fashion and unemployed servants gathered for business and display
 138 Against near or opposite painter's possibly a play on 'pander's' or 'prostitute's'
 139 chamber bed chamber, but also vagina (compare, 3.1.191)
 140 forepart perhaps a stone or brick front, but also a stomacher, the front part of a bodice 142 back door to escape creditors and constables or to facilitate liaisons; also associated with anal intercourse 147 black angels devils or fallen angels;

plays on 'ingles'
 148 Andrew Gruel stereotypical Scotsman (a satirical rendering of the courtiers who accompanied King James to London); St Andrew is the patron saint of Scotland, 'gruel' is a watery porridge favoured there
 149 Lethe puns on the river of forgetfulness in Hades and on Leith, near Edinburgh
 151 Walter pronounced 'water' (thus watered down 'gruel')
 155 below in Scotland; as a commoner (see 1.2.261-2 and 298-9)
 156 strange strangers', foreigners'
 159 received parts recognized talents
 165 duties homage

166 laid humbled; on his back 168 dry mutton consumed in the treatment of venereal disease respective respectful 176 suits petitions
 180 dizzy dizzying
 183 remember me refresh my memory (with another gift)
 187 preserves preservatives
 188 knights yet Upon his arrival in England, James I immediately began creating an unprecedented number of knights.
 193 The Horn Fleet Street tavern
 195 horn the hunters' horn
 200 Cast disgorge
 202 park deer park

COCKSTONE

Why, this is kindness; a kind gallant, you,
And love to give the dogs more than their due.
We shall attend you, sir.

LETHE

I pray do so.

SALEWOOD

The Horn.

LETHE

Easily remembered that, you know!

Exeunt [except Lethe]

210 But now unto my present business. The daughter yields, and Quomodo consents; only my Mistress Quomodo, her mother, without regard runs full against me, and sticks hard. Is there no law for a woman that will run upon a man at her own apperil? Why should not 215 she consent, knowing my state, my sudden fortunes? I can command a custard, and other bake-meats, death of sturgeon; I could keep house with nothing. What friends have I! How well am I beloved, e'en quite throughout the scullery. Not consent? 'Tis e'en as I 220 have writ; I'll be hanged an she love me not herself, and would rather preserve me as a private friend to her own pleasures, than any way advance her daughter upon me to beguile herself. Then how have I relieved her in that point? Let me peruse this letter. [Reads] 'Good 225 Mistress Quomodo, or rather, as I hope ere the Term end, Mother Quomodo, since only your consent keeps aloof off and hinders the copulation of your daughter, what may I think, but that it is a mere affection in you, doting upon some small inferior virtue of mine, to 230 draw me in upon yourself? If the case stand so, I have comfort for you; for this you may well assure yourself, that by the marriage of your daughter I have the better means and opportunity to yourself, and without the least suspicion.' This is moving stuff, and that works 235 best with a citizen's wife. But who shall I get to convey this now? My page I ha' lent forth; my pander I have employed about the country, to look out some third sister, or entice some discontented gentlewoman from her husband, whom the laying out of my appetite shall 240 maintain. Nay, I'll deal like an honourable gentleman.
I'll be kind to women; that which I gather i'th' day, I'll put into their purses at night. You shall have no cause to rail at me; no, faith, I'll keep you in good fashion, ladies; no meaner men than knights shall ransom home your gowns and recover your smocks. I'll not dally with you. Some poor widow woman would come as a necessary bawd now; and see where fitly comes—

[Enter Mother Gruel]

My mother! Curse of poverty! Does she come up to shame me, to betray my birth, and cast soil upon my new suit? Let her pass me; I'll take no notice of her.
Scurvy murrey kersey!

MOTHER GRUEL By your leave, an like your worship—

LETHE [aside] Then I must proudly venture it.—To me, good woman?

MOTHER GRUEL I beseech one word with your worship. 255

LETHE Prithee, be brief then.

MOTHER GRUEL Pray, can your worship tell me any tidings of one Andrew Gruel, a poor son of mine own?LETHE I know a gallant gentleman of the name, one Master Andrew Gruel, and well received amongst ladies. 260MOTHER GRUEL That's not he, then. He is no gentleman that I mean.LETHE Good woman, if he be a Gruel, he's a gentleman i'th' mornings, that's a gentleman o'th' first; you cannot tell me. 265MOTHER GRUEL No, truly, his father was an honest upright tooth-drawer.

LETHE O, my teeth!

MOTHER GRUEL An't please your worship, I have made a sore journey on't, all this vacant time, to come up and see my son Andrew. Poor Walter Gruel, his father, has laid his life, and left me a lone woman; I have not one husband in all the world. Therefore my coming up is for relief an't like your worship, hoping that my son Andrew is in some place about the kitchen— 275

LETHE Kitchen! Puh, fah!

MOTHER GRUEL Or a servingman to some knight of worship.

LETHE [aside] O, let me not endure her!—Know you not me, good woman?MOTHER GRUEL Alas, an't please your worship, I never saw such a glorious suit since the hour I was christened. 280LETHE [aside]

Good, she knows me not, my glory does disguise me;

209 Easily remembered Horns were a familiar sign of cuckoldry.213 sticks persists, resists214 apperil peril, risk216 custard form of 'crustade'; meat (or fruit) pie covered with mixture of milk, eggs, and spices216-17 death of sturgeon possibly an oath, or a keg of sturgeon219 scullery kitchen or dishwashing room (at Court) where he got his venison220 an if226-7 keeps aloof off must yet be won227 copulation union with230 case stand so with 'small...virtue ofmine', doubles entendres for vagina and penis237 look out find237-8 third sister who may have to wait some time to marry239 laying out expenditure241 kind act naturally with, have sexual intercourse with; put 'kind' (semen or a sexual organ) in women's 'purses' (1.2.241-2, vaginas)242-6 You...you women in the audience244-5 ransom home...and recover retrieve from pawn245 dally flirt251 murrey kersey purplish-red cloth dyed with mulberries; a term of contempt for a woman252 an if it263-4 if...mornings gentlemen ate gruel for breakfast264 o'th' first first rate267 tooth-drawer dentist; butt of numerous jokes and, proverbially, a meagre figure (Tilley, T 434)269 An't If it270 vacant time vacation272 laid his life died282 glory expensive clothing

285 Beside, my poorer name being drenched in Lethe, She'll hardly understand me. What a fresh air can do!
I may employ her as a private drudge
To pass my letters and secure my lust,
And ne'er be noted mine, to shame my blood,
And drop my staining birth upon my raiment.—
290 Faith, good woman, you will hardly get to the speech of Master Andrew, I tell you.
MOTHER GRUEL No? Marry, hang him, an't like your worship, I have known the day when nobody cared to speak to him.
LETHE You must take heed how you speak ill of him now, 295 I can tell you; he's so employed.
MOTHER GRUEL Employed for what?
LETHE For his behaviour, wisdom, and other virtues.
MOTHER GRUEL His virtues? No, 'tis well known his father was too poor a man to bring him up to any virtues; he 300 can scarce write and read.
LETHE He's the better regarded for that amongst courtiers, for that's but a needy quality.
MOTHER GRUEL If it be so, then he'll be great shortly, for he has no good parts about him.
305 LETHE Well, good woman, or mother, or what you will.
MOTHER GRUEL Alack the day, I know your worship scorns to call me mother; 'tis not a thing fit for your worship indeed, such a simple old woman as I am.
LETHE In pity of thy long journey, there's sixpence British.
310 Tend upon me, I have business for you.
MOTHER GRUEL I'll wait upon your worship.
LETHE Two pole off at least.
MOTHER GRUEL I am a clean old woman, an't like your worship.
315 LETHE It goes not by cleanness here, good woman; if you were fouler, so you were braver, you might come nearer. Exit
MOTHER GRUEL Nay, and that be the fashion, I hope I shall get it shortly; there's no woman so old but she may 320 learn, and as an old lady delights in a young page or monkey, so there are young courtiers will be hungry upon an old woman, I warrant you. Exit

I.3 Enter Lethe's pander [Hellgill], with a Country Wench

HELLGILL Come, leave your puling and sighing.

COUNTRY WENCH Beshrew you now, why did you entice me from my father?

HELLGILL Why? To thy better advancement. Wouldst thou, 5 a pretty, beautiful, juicy squall, live in a poor thrummed house i'th' country in such servile habiliments, and may well pass for a gentlewoman i'th' city? Does not five hundred do so, think'st thou, and with worse faces?
O, now, in these latter days, the devil reigning, 'tis 10 an age for cloven creatures. But why sad now? Yet indeed 'tis the fashion of any courtesan to be seasick i'th' first voyage, but at next she proclaims open wars, like a beaten soldier. Why, Northamptonshire lass, dost dream of virginity now? Remember a loose-bodied 15 gown, wench, and let it go; wires and tires, bents and bums, felts and falls, thou shalt deceive the world, that gentlewomen indeed shall not be known from others.
I have a master to whom I must prefer thee after the aforesaid decking, Lethe by name, a man of one most 20 admired property: he can both love thee, and for thy better advancement be thy pander himself, an excellent spark of humility.

COUNTRY WENCH Well heaven forgive you, you train me up
to't.

HELLGILL Why, I do acknowledge it, and I think I do you 25 a pleasure in't.

COUNTRY WENCH And if I should prove a harlot now, I should be bound to curse you.

HELLGILL Bound? Nay, and you prove a harlot, you'll be 30 loose enough.

COUNTRY WENCH If I had not a desire to go like a gentlewoman, you should be hanged ere you should get me to't, I warrant you.

HELLGILL Nay, that's certain; nor a thousand more of you.
I know you are all chaste enough, till one thing or other 35 tempt you! Deny a satin gown and you dare now?

COUNTRY WENCH You know I have no power to do't, and that makes you so wilful; for what woman is there such a beast that will deny any thing that is good?

HELLGILL True, they will not, most dissemble.

COUNTRY WENCH No, an she bear a brave mind, she will 40 not, I warrant you.

HELLGILL
Why, therefore take heart, faint not at all,
Women ne'er rise, but when they fall;

283 poorer name Gruel drenched in Lethe submerged in the river of forgetfulness
284 understand recognize air appearance
285 drudge lowly servant, slave 302 needy quality requirement for those who labour
304 parts attributes but also genitalia 309 sixpence British possibly a coin newly minted following the accession of James
I, who styled himself King of Britain; a Scots sixpence was worth much less 312 Two pole 11 yards

316 so so long as braver more fashionably dressed
I.3.1 puling whining
5 squall derogatory term for a young girl thrummed thatched (see 2.2.3)
10 cloven devilish
13 beaten soldier veteran
14 loose-bodied a floor-length dress, said by spectator at one of Jonson's masques to be able to hide 'any deformity'; appropriate to a 'harlot' who will prove
'loose enough' (I.3.30, wanton) 15-16 wires...falls 'wires' are frames to support hair or a ruff; 'tires' are headdresses; 'bents' are bows or frames to extend dresses; 'bums' are padding about the posterior; 'felts' are hats; 'falls' are collars

18 prefer present, advance (see I.3.4-5)
19 decking costuming
20 property quality 28 bound obliged; Hellgill pretends she means 'tied' or 'tight'
35 thing penis (also I.3.39)
36 Deny refuse
44 fall have sexual intercourse

45 Let a man break, he's gone, blown up,
A woman's breaking sets her up;
Virginity is no city trade,
You're out o'th' freedom, when you're a maid;
Down with the lattice, 'tis but thin;
50 Let coarser beauties work within,
Whom the light mocks; thou art fair and fresh,
The gilded flies will light upon thy flesh.

COUNTRY WENCH
Beshrew your sweet enchantments, you have won.

HELLGILL [aside]
How easily soft women are undone.

55 So farewell wholesome weeds where treasure pants,
And welcome silks, where lies disease and wants.—
Come, wench, now flow thy fortunes in to bless thee, I'll bring thee where thou shalt be taught to dress thee.

COUNTRY WENCH O, as soon as may be. I am in a swoon 60 till I be a gentlewoman; and you know what flesh is man's meat till it be dressed.

HELLGILL Most certain, no more: a woman. Exeunt
Finis Actus Primus

2.1 Incipit Actus Secundus
Enter Rearage, Salewood, Lethe, Easy, with Shortyard, alias Blastfield, [and his Boy,] at dice

REARAGE Gentlemen, I ha' sworn I'll change the room.
Dice? Devils!

LETHE You see I'm patient, gentlemen.

SALEWOOD Ay, the fiend's in't. You're patient, you put up
5 all.

REARAGE Come, set me, gentlemen.

SHORTYARD An Essex gentleman, sir?

EASY An unfortunate one, sir.

SHORTYARD I'm bold to salute you, sir. You know not 10 Master Alsup there?

EASY O, entirely well.

SHORTYARD Indeed, sir?

EASY He's second to my bosom.

SHORTYARD I'll give you that comfort then, sir, you must 15 not want money as long as you are in town, sir.

EASY No, sir?

SHORTYARD I am bound in my love to him to see you furnished, and in that comfort I recover my salute again, sir.

EASY Then I desire to be more dear unto you. 20

SHORTYARD [aside] I rather study to be dear unto you.— Boy, fill some wine.—I knew not what fair impressure I received at first, but I began to affect your society very speedily.

EASY I count myself the happier. 25

SHORTYARD To Master Alsup, sir, to whose remembrance
I could love to drink till I were past remembrance.
[Drinks]

EASY I shall keep Christmas with him, sir, where your health shall likewise undoubtedly be remembered, and 30 thereupon I pledge you. [Drinks] I would sue for your name, sir.

SHORTYARD Your suit shall end in one Term, sir; my name is Blastfield.

EASY Kind Master Blastfield, your dearer acquaintance. 35
[Drinks]

REARAGE Nay, come, will ye draw in, gentlemen? Set me.

EASY Faith, I'm scattered.

SHORTYARD Sir, you shall not give out so meanly of yourself in my company for a million. Make such privy to your 40 disgrace? You're a gentleman of fair fortunes; keep me your reputation. Set 'em all; there's crowns for you.

EASY Sir, you bind me infinitely in these courtesies.

SHORTYARD You must always have a care of your reputation here in town, Master Easy; although you ride 45 down with nothing, it skills not.

EASY I'm glad you tell me that yet, then I'm indifferent.
Well, come, who throws? I set all these.

SHORTYARD Why, well said.

SALEWOOD This same Master Lethe here begins to undo us 50
again.

LETHE Ah, sir, I came not hither but to win.

SHORTYARD And then you'll leave us, that's your fashion.

LETHE He's base that visits not his friends.

SHORTYARD
55 But he's more base that carries out his winnings;
None will do so but those have base beginnings.

LETHE
It is a thing in use and ever was,
I pass this time.

SHORTYARD I wonder you should pass,
And that you're suffered.

45 break default
46 breaking defloration
48 freedom city limits (see 1.2.94, note)
49 lattice screen, shutter; hymen (fig.)
50 within indoors
52 gilded flies gallants, would-be gentlemen
55 treasure pants virtue breathes 61 dressed plays on 'clothed' and 'prepared for cooking'
2.1.1 change the room find a room that will be luckier for me

4-5 put up all win our money; 'put up with' our insults (see 3.1.123-4) 6 set put down a stake
9 salute removes his hat (see 2.1.18, where he puts his hat back on) 10 Alsup host to all (fig.)
13 second next
17 him Master Alsup
21 dear costly
22 impressure impression

34 Blastfield one who destroys estates, and women or wombs ('fields')
38 scattered broke; possibly, spread too thin
40 such such gallants, dicers
42 crowns gold coins
46 down back to your country estate skills matters
57 in use customary
58 pass give up one's turn 59 suffered tolerated, allowed

LETHE Tut, the dice are ours
 60 Then wonder not at those that have most powers.
 REARAGE
 The devil and his angels!
 LETHE Are these they?
 Welcome, dear angels, where you're cursed ne'er stay.
 [Retires]

SALEWOOD Here's luck!
 EASY Let's search him, gentlemen, I think he wears a 65 smock.
 SHORTYARD I knew the time he wore not half a shirt, just like a pea.
 EASY No! How did he for the rest?
 SHORTYARD Faith, he compounded with a couple of napkins
 70 at Barnet, and so trussed up the lower parts.
 EASY 'Twas a pretty shift, i'faith.
 SHORTYARD But Master Lethe has forgot that too.
 EASY A mischief on't, to lose all. I could—
 SHORTYARD Nay, but good Master Easy, do not do yourself 75 that tyranny, I beseech you. I must not ha' you alter your body now for the purge of a little money; you undo me, an you do.
 EASY 'Twas all I brought up with me, I protest, Master
 Blastfield; all my rent till next quarter.
 80 SHORTYARD Pox of money, talk not on't, I beseech you.
 What said I to you? Mass, I am out of cash myself too.—Boy!
 BOY Anon, sir.
 SHORTYARD Run presently to Master Gum, the mercer, and 85 will him to tell out two or three hundred pound for me, or more according as he is furnished. I'll visit him i'th' morning, say.
 BOY It shall be said, sir. [Going]
 SHORTYARD Do you hear, boy?
 90 BOY Yes, sir.
 SHORTYARD If Master Gum be not sufficiently ready, call upon Master Profit, the goldsmith.
 BOY It shall be done, sir. [Going] SHORTYARD Boy!
 95 BOY [aside] I knew I was not sent yet; now is the time.

SHORTYARD Let them both rest till another occasion. You shall not need to run so far at this time. Take one nigher hand; go to Master Quomodo, the draper, and will him to furnish me instantly.
 BOY Now I go, sir. [Exit] 100 EASY It seems you're well known, Master Blastfield, and your credit very spacious here i'th' city.
 SHORTYARD Master Easy, let a man bear himself portly, the whoresons will creep to him o' their bellies, and 105 their wives o' their backs. There's a kind of bold grace expected throughout all the parts of a gentleman. Then, for your observances, a man must not so much as spit but within line and fashion. I tell you what I ha' done: sometimes I carry my water all London over, only to deliver it proudly at the Standard; and do I 110 pass altogether unnoted, think you? No, a man can no sooner peep out his head, but there's a bow bent at him out of some watchtower or other.
 EASY So readily, sir?
 SHORTYARD Push, you know a bow's quickly ready, though 115 a gun be long a-charging, and will shoot five times to his once. Come, you shall bear yourself jovially: take heed of setting your looks to your losses, but rather smile upon your ill luck, and invite 'em tomorrow to another breakfast of bones. 120
 EASY Nay, I'll forswear dicing.
 SHORTYARD What? Peace. I am ashamed to hear you; will you cease in the first loss? Show me one gentleman that e'er did it. Fie upon't, I must use you to company, I perceive; you'd be spoiled else. Forswear dice? I would 125 your friends heard you, i'faith.
 EASY Nay, I was but in jest, sir.
 SHORTYARD I hope so. What would gentlemen say of you?
 'There goes a gull that keeps his money.' I would not have such a report go on you for the world, as long as 130 you are in my company. Why, man, fortune alters in a minute. I ha' known those have recovered so much in an hour, their purses were never sick after.
 REARAGE O, worse than consumption of the liver! Consumption of the patrimony! 135
 SHORTYARD How now? Mark their humours, Master Easy.

61 angels Rearage puns on the name of the coin as he loses once again (see 1.2.147)
 64-5 wears a smock wears women's undergarments; is effeminate ('to smock' was to render effeminate). 'He was lapped in his mother's smock' (Tilley, M 1203) is proverbial for 'he is very lucky'
 67 pea nothing separates a pea from its pod and no shirt comes between Lethe and his outerwear 69 compounded with put together; came to terms with (fig.) napkins table napkins or handkerchiefs 70 Barnet resort town north-west of London lower parts genitalia
 71 shift puns on shirt and clever trick 73 I could Having lost again, Easy is about to strike himself or to remove some garment that he can set as a stake.

 76 purge loss
 77 undo foil my plans
 78 up to London
 80 Pox of a common curse; 'pox' ('pocks') indicated syphilis
 84 merc a dealer in textiles, especially silk (which was either stiffened or glossed by coating it with 'gum')
 85 tell count
 103 portly grandly, majestically
 104 whoresons i.e. merchants
 109 water urine
 110 the Standard the great water conduit in Cheapside
 111 pass walk across London; urinate
 111-17 a man...once Shortyard claims that no sooner does a man expose his 'head' (l. 112, his penis, or prepuce) than 'a bow' (l. 112, vulva or vagina) is directed toward him. The 'bow' is 'quickly ready' (l. 115) and will 'shoot' (l. 115-16, achieve an orgasm) 'five times' (l. 115-17) in the time it takes a 'gun' (l. 115-16, a penis) to 'charge' (ejaculate) 'once' (l. 116-17).

 115 Push pish (expression of disdain)
 117-18 take...losses disguise your true feelings
 120 bones dice (see 2.1.143)
 124 use accustom
 125 spoiled despoiled, but also violated; see 'first loss' (2.1.123, loss of virginity)
 136 humours temperaments

- REARAGE Forgive me, my posterity yet ungotten!
 SHORTYARD That's a penitent maudlin dicer.
 REARAGE
 Few know the sweets that the plain life allows;
 140 Vile son that surfeits of his father's brows.
 SHORTYARD Laugh at him, Master Easy.
 EASY Ha, ha, ha!
 SALEWOOD I'll be damned an these be not the bones of some 145 quean that cozened me in her life, and now consumes me after her death.
 SHORTYARD That's the true wicked, blasphemous, and soulshuddering dicer, that will curse you all service time, and attribute his ill luck always to one drab or other.
 [Enter Hellgill, talks apart with Lethe] LETHE Dick Hellgill! The happy news?
 150 HELLGILL I have her for you, sir.
 LETHE Peace, what is she?
 HELLGILL Young, beautiful, and plump; a delicate piece of sin.
 LETHE Of what parentage?
 155 HELLGILL O, a gentlewoman of a great house.
 LETHE Fie, fie!
 HELLGILL [aside] She newly came out of a barn; yet too good for a tooth-drawer's son.
 LETHE Is she wife or maid?
 160 HELLGILL That which is daintiest, maid.
 LETHE I'd rather she'd been a wife.
 HELLGILL A wife, sir? Why?
 LETHE O, adultery is a great deal sweeter in my mind.
 HELLGILL [aside] Diseases gnaw thy bones!—I think she 165 has deserved to be a wife, sir.
 LETHE
 That will move well.
 HELLGILL [aside] Her firstlings shall be mine.
 Swine look but for the husks; the meat be thine.
 [Enter Boy, talks apart with Shortyard and Easy]
 SHORTYARD How now, boy?
 BOY Master Quomodo takes your worship's greeting ex-170 ceeding kindly, and in his commendations returns this answer, that your worship shall not be so apt to receive it, as he willing to lend it.
 SHORTYARD Why, we thank him, i'faith.
 EASY Troth, and you ha' reason to thank him sir; 'twas a 175 very friendly answer.
 SHORTYARD Push, a gentleman that keeps his days even here i'th' city, as I myself watch to do, shall have many of those answers in a twelvemonth, Master Easy.
 EASY I promise you, sir, I admire your carriage, and begin to hold a more reverend respect of you. 180 SHORTYARD Not so, I beseech you. I give my friends leave to be inward with me.—Will you walk, gentlemen?
 LETHE We're for you. [To Hellgill] Present her with this jewel, my first token.
 Enter a Drawer
 DRAWER There are certain countrymen without inquiring 185 for Master Rearage and Master Salewood.
 REARAGE Tenants!
 SALEWOOD Thou reviv'st us, rascal.
 REARAGE
 When's our next meeting, gentlemen?
 SHORTYARD Tomorrow night;
 This gentleman, by me, invites you all. 190
 Do you not, Master Easy?
 EASY Freely, sir.
 SALEWOOD
 We do embrace your love.—[Aside] A pure, fresh gull.
 SHORTYARD
 Thus make you men at parting dutiful,
 And rest beholding to you, 'tis the sleight
 To be remembered when you're out of sight. 195
 EASY
 A pretty virtue. Exeunt
- Enter the Country Wench's Father, that was enticed for Lethe* 2.2
- FATHER
 Where shall I seek her now? O, if she knew
 The dangers that attend on women's lives,
 She would rather lodge under a poor thatched roof
 Than under carved ceilings. She was my joy,
 5 And all content that I received from life,
 My dear and only daughter.
 What says the note she left? Let me again
 With staidier grief peruse it.
 [Reads] 'Father, wonder not at my so sudden departure, without your leave or knowledge. Thus, under pardon 10
 I excuse it: had you had knowledge of it, I know you would have sought to restrain it, and hinder me from what I have long desired. Being now happily preferred to a gentleman's service in London, about Holborn, if you please to send, you may hear well of me.' 15
 As false as she is disobedient.

137 ungotten not yet born 140 surfeits . . . brows indulges himself at his father's expense
 144 quean prostitute
cozened cheated
 147 service time while church services are going on; while 'serving' (having sexual intercourse with) a 'drab'
 164 Diseases venereal diseases
 166 move attract, arouse sexually 166-7 Her . . . thine Hellgill will consume the Country Wench's first fruits, he will have her 'firstlings' (and so deflower the 'maid'); Lethe can have what is left over:

 the 'husks' fit for 'swine' and the 'meat'
 (the flesh of a prostitute).
 176 keeps his days even repays his debts on time 179 carriage bearing or deportment; but also bearing weight during sexual intercourse (see 2.1.182, note) 182 inward intimate (since Easy has admired Shortyard's 'carriage', this may refer to sexual intimacy, with a play on 'innards' or bowels)

 184.1 Drawer tapster
 187-8 Tenants . . . reviv'st us The tenants have come to pay their rent.
 194 sleight artifice, trick
 2.2.14 Holborn known for licentious behaviour in its gardens and as a lawyers' quarter; prisoners were taken along Holborn to execution at Tyburn

I've made larger inquiry, left no place
 Where gentry keeps, unsought, yet cannot hear,
 Which drives me most into a shameful fear.
 20 Woe worth th'infected cause that makes me visit
 This man-devouring city, where I spent
 My unshapen youth, to be my age's curse,
 And surfeited away my name and state
 In swinish riots, that now, being sober, 25 I do awake a beggar. I may hate her.
 Whose youth voids wine, his age is cursed with water.
 O heavens, I know the price of ill too well,
 What the confusions are, in whom they dwell,
 And how soon maids are to their ruins won;
 30 One minute, and eternally undone.
 So in mine may it, may it not be thus!
 Though she be poor, her honour's precious.
 May be my present form and her fond fear,
 May chase her from me, if her eye should get me;
 35 And therefore as my love and wants advise,
 I'll serve, until I find her, in disguise.
 Such is my care to fright her from base evils,
 I leave calm state to live amongst you, devils. Exit

2.3 Lethe's Mother enters with Quomodo's wife Thomasine, with the letter [from Lethe]

THOMASINE Were these fit words, think you, to be sent to any citizen's wife: to enjoy the daughter, and love the mother too for a need? I would foully scorn that man, that should love me only for a need, I tell you. And 5 here the knave writes again, that by the marriage of my daughter, a has the better means and opportunity to myself. He lies in his throat like a villain. He has no opportunity of me, for all that; 'tis for his betters to have opportunity of me, and that he shall well know.
 10 A base, proud knave! A has forgot how he came up, and brought two of his countrymen to give their words to my husband for a suit of green kersey. A has forgot all this. And how does he appear to me when his white 15 satin suit's on, but like a maggot crept out of a nutshell, a fair body and a foul neck: those parts that are covered of him looks indifferent well, because we cannot see 'em.
 Else, for all his cleansing, pruning and paring, he's not worthy a broker's daughter, and so tell him.
 MOTHER GRUEL I will indeed, forsooth.

THOMASINE And as for my child, I hope she'll be ruled 20 in time, though she be foolish yet, and not be carried away with a cast of manchets, a bottle of wine, or a custard, and so, I pray, certify him.
 MOTHER GRUEL I'll do your errand effectually.
 THOMASINE Art thou his aunt, or his—25 MOTHER GRUEL Alas, I am a poor drudge of his.
 THOMASINE Faith, an thou wert his mother, he would make thee his drudge, I warrant him.
 MOTHER GRUEL Marry, out upon him, sir-reverence of your mistress-ship.
 30 THOMASINE Here's somewhat for thy pains, fare thee well.
 [Gives money]
 MOTHER GRUEL 'Tis more than he gave me since I came to him. [Exit]
Enter Quomodo and his daughter Susan QUOMODO How now, what prating have we here? Whis-35 pers? Dumb shows? Why, Thomasine, go to; my shop is not altogether so dark as some of my neighbours', where a man may be made cuckold at one end, while he's measuring with his yard at t'other.
 THOMASINE Only commendations sent from Master Lethe, 40 your worshipful son-in-law that should be.
 QUOMODO O, and that you like not, he that can make us rich in custom, strong in friends, happy in suits, bring us into all the rooms o' Sundays, from the leads to the 45 cellar, pop us in with venison till we crack again, and send home the rest in an honourable napkin—this man you like not, forsooth!
 SUSAN But I like him, father.
 QUOMODO My blessing go with thy liking.
 SUSAN A number of our citizens hold our credit by't, to 50 come home drunk, and say we ha' been at Court; then how much more credit is't to be drunk there indeed?
 QUOMODO Tut, thy mother's a fool.—Pray, what's Master
 Rearage, whom you plead for so?
 THOMASINE Why, first, he is a gentleman.
 55 QUOMODO Ay, he's often first a gentleman that's last a beggar.
 SUSAN My father tells you true. What should I do with a gentleman? I know not which way to lie with him.
 QUOMODO 'Tis true, too. Thou know'st, beside, we undo 60 gentlemen daily.
 THOMASINE That makes so few of 'em marry with our daughters, unless it be one green fool or other. Next,

18 unsought unsearched cannot hear have had no news of her 20 Woe worth woe unto 23 name and state reputation and inheritance
 26 voids vomits
 33 fond foolish
 36 serve play the part of a servant
 2.3.2 enjoy have a sexual relation with (see 5.2.9, note)
 6 a he
 10 came up to London; his low status
 11 countrymen If Lethe is indeed from Scotland, this would be another derogatory reference to the recent influx of Scotsmen to London.

give their words act as guarantors
 12 kersey coarse, wool cloth (see I.2.251) 18 broker's daughter daughter of a lesser tradesman, perhaps a pawnbroker (see 2.3.423)
 22 cast of manchets a batch of fine white bread
 25 aunt bawd
 29 sir-reverence 'saving your reverence';
 she excuses herself for having said

'Marry'—by the Virgin Mary 36 Dumb shows mime
 39 measuring with his yard working with his measuring rod; having sexual intercourse
 43 custom business
happy in suits successful when petitioning at Court 44 all the rooms at Court leads lead roof
 45 crack fart
 59 lie with have sexual intercourse with 63 green gullible

- 65 Master Rearage has land and living, t'other but his walk i'th' street, and his snatching diet. He's able to entertain you in a fair house of his own, t'other in some nook or corner, or place us behind the cloth like a company of puppets. At his house you shall be served curiously, sit down and eat your meat with leisure; there we must be 70 glad to take it standing, and without either salt, cloth, or trencher, and say we are befriended too.
- QUOMODO O, that gives a citizen a better appetite than his garden.
- SUSAN So say I, father; methinks it does me most good 75 when I take it standing. I know not how all women's minds are.
- Enter Falselight*
- QUOMODO Faith, I think they are all of thy mind for that thing.—How now, Falselight?
- FALSELIGHT I have descried my fellow, Shortyard, alias 80 Blastfield, at hand with the gentleman.
- QUOMODO O, my sweet Shortyard!—Daughter, get you up to your virginals. [Exit Susan]
By your leave, Mistress Quomodo.
- THOMASINE Why, I hope I may sit i'th' shop, may I not?
- 85 QUOMODO That you may, and welcome sweet honey-thigh, but not at this season, there's a buck to be struck.
- THOMASINE [aside] Well, since I'm so expressly forbidden, I'll watch above i'th' gallery, but I'll see your knavery. Exit
- QUOMODO Be you prepared as I tell you.
- 90 FALSELIGHT You ne'er feared me. Exit
- QUOMODO O, that sweet, neat, comely, proper, delicate parcel of land, like a fine gentlewoman i'th' waist, not so great as pretty, pretty; the trees in summer whistling, the silver waters by the banks harmoniously gliding.
95 I should have been a scholar; an excellent place for a student, fit for my son that lately commenced at Cambridge, whom now I have placed at Inns of Court.
Thus we that seldom get lands honestly, must leave our heirs to inherit our knavery. But whist, one turn about 100 my shop and meet with 'em.
- Enter Master Easy with Shortyard, alias Blastfield [and Boy]*
- EASY Is this it, sir?
- SHORTYARD Ay, let me see, this is it—sign of Three Knives—'tis it.
- QUOMODO [into the shop] Do you hear, sir?—What lack you, gentlemen? See good kerseys or broadcloths here, I pray 105 come near.—Master Blastfield!
- SHORTYARD I thought you would know me anon.
[Enter Thomasine above]
- QUOMODO You're exceeding welcome to town, sir. Your worship must pardon me, 'tis always misty weather in our shops here; we are a nation the sun ne'er shines 110 upon. Came this gentleman with you?
- SHORTYARD O, salute him fairly. He's a kind gentleman, a very inward of mine.
- QUOMODO Then I cry you mercy, sir. You're especially welcome. 115
- EASY I return you thanks, sir.
- QUOMODO But how shall I do for you now, Master Blast-field?
- SHORTYARD Why, what's the matter?
- QUOMODO It is my greatest affliction at this instant, I am 120 not able to furnish you.
- SHORTYARD How, Master Quomodo? Pray, say not so;
'slud, you undo me then.
- QUOMODO Upon my religion, Master Blastfield, bonds lie forfeit in my hands. I expect the receipt of a thousand 125 every hour, and cannot yet set eye of a penny.
- SHORTYARD That's strange, methinks.
- QUOMODO 'Tis mine own pity that plots against me, Master Blastfield. They know I have no conscience to take the forfeiture, and that makes 'em so bold with my mercy. 130
- EASY I am sorry for this.
- QUOMODO Nevertheless, if I might entreat your delay but the age of three days, to express my sorrow now, I would double the sum, and supply you with four or 135 five hundred.
- SHORTYARD Let me see, three days?
- QUOMODO Ay, good sir, and it may be possible.
- EASY [aside to Shortyard] Do you hear, Master Blastfield?
- SHORTYARD Ha?
- EASY You know I've already invited all the gallants to sup 140 with me tonight.
- SHORTYARD That's true, i'faith.
- EASY 'Twill be my everlasting shame, if I have no money to maintain my bounty.
- SHORTYARD I ne'er thought upon that.—[Aside] I looked 145 still when that should come from him.—We have

64 living rent, income

65 snatching diet leftovers (like Lethe's venison) grabbed at Court; also, a 'diet' of snatches, or quick sexual encounters

67 cloth arras or hanging at Court

67–8 a company of puppets at a puppet show

68–70 served...standing descriptions of hospitality but also of intercourse ('served' sitting or 'take it standing') in a gentleman's house or at Court; see 2.1.146–8, 2.3.58–9 and 75

68 curiously fastidiously

69 there at Court

71 trencher wooden platter or knife

72–3 his garden his vegetable garden, but also his wife's genitals

78 thing copulation; also, penis (see 5.1.53)

82 virginals spinet in a box, without legs, or keyed musical instrument

83 By your leave please leave us

86 season time

buck to be struck deer (gull) to be caught or killed

90 feared mistrusted

96 commenced took his degree

97 Inns of Court London's legal colleges

99 whist silence

102–3 Three Knives Quomodo, Shortyard, and Falselight

104 What lack you tradesman's customary greeting

109 misty weather 'not altogether so dark' (2.3.37)

114 cry you mercy beg your pardon

121 furnish 'supply' (2.3.134); also, procure for

123 'slud common oath, 'God's blood'

undo ruin

126 of on

129–30 take the forfeiture foreclose

145–6 I looked...him I have been waiting for him to say that strictly examined our expenses; it must not be three days, Master Quomodo.

150 QUOMODO No? Then I'm afraid 'twill be my grief, sir.
EASY Master Blastfield, I'll tell you what you may do now.
SHORTYARD What, good sweet bedfellow?
EASY Send to Master Gum or Master Profit, the mercer and goldsmith.
SHORTYARD Mass, that was well remembered of thee.—
155 [Aside] I perceive the trout will be a little troublesome ere he be catched.—Boy!
BOY Here, sir.
SHORTYARD Run to Master Gum, or Master Profit, and carry my present occasion of money to 'em.
160 BOY I run, sir. [Exit]
QUOMODO Methinks, Master Blastfield, you might easily attain to the satisfaction of three days; here's a gentleman, your friend, I dare say will see you sufficiently possessed till then.
165 EASY Not I, sir, by no means. Master Blastfield knows I'm further in want than himself; my hope rests all upon him. It stands upon the loss of my credit tonight, if I walk without money.
SHORTYARD Why, Master Quomodo, what a fruitless motion have you put forth. You might well assure yourself this gentleman had it not, if I wanted it. Why, our purses are brothers; we desire but equal fortunes; in a word, we're man and wife; they can but lie together, and so do we.
170 EASY As near as can be, i'faith.
SHORTYARD And to say truth, 'tis more for the continuing of this gentleman's credit in town, than any incitement from mine own want only, that I covet to be so immediately furnished. You shall hear him confess as much himself.
180 EASY 'Tis most certain, Master Quomodo.
Enter Boy
SHORTYARD O, here comes the boy now.—How now, boy, what says Master Gum, or Master Profit?
BOY Sir, they're both walked forth this frosty morning to Brentford, to see a nurse-child.
185 SHORTYARD A bastard be it. Spite and shame!
EASY Nay, never vex yourself, sweet Master Blastfield.
SHORTYARD Bewitched, I think!

QUOMODO Do you hear, sir? [Aside to Easy] You can persuade with him? 190 EASY A little, sir.
QUOMODO Rather than he should be altogether destitute, or be too much a vexation to himself, he shall take up a commodity of cloth of me, tell him.
EASY Why, la! By my troth, 'twas kindly spoken. 195
QUOMODO Two hundred pounds worth, upon my religion, say.
SHORTYARD So disastrously!
EASY Nay, Master Blastfield, you do not hear what Master Quomodo said since, like an honest, true citizen, i'faith. 200
Rather than you should grow diseased upon't, you shall take up a commodity of two hundred pounds worth of cloth.
SHORTYARD The mealy moth consume it, would he ha' me turn pedlar now? What should I do with cloth? 205
QUOMODO He's a very willful gentleman at this time, i'faith. He knows as well what to do with it as I myself, iwis. There's no merchant in town but will be greedy upon't, and pay down money upo'th' nail. They'll dispatch it over to Middleburgh presently, and raise double commodity by exchange. If not, you know 'tis Term-time, and Michaelmas Term too, the drapers' harvest for footcloths, riding suits, walking suits, chamber gowns, and hall gowns. 210
EASY Nay, I'll say that, it comes in as fit a time as can be. 215
QUOMODO Nay, take me with you again ere you go, sir. I offer him no trash, tell him, but present money, say, where I know some gentlemen in town ha' been glad, and are glad at this time, to take up commodities in hawks' hoods and brown paper. 220 EASY O, horrible! Are there such fools in town?
QUOMODO I offer him no trash, tell him, upon my religion, you may say.—[Aside] Now, my sweet Shortyard, now the hungry fish begins to nibble; one end of the worm is in his mouth, i'faith. 225
THOMASINE [aside]
Why stand I here (as late our graceless dames That found no eyes) to see that gentleman Alive, in state and credit executed, Help to rip up himself, does all he can? Why am I wife to him that is no man? 230

159 carry...occasion tell them of my pressing need 167 stands upon entails
168 walk depart from here
169-70 fruitless motion worthless proposal; also, in the context of 'satisfaction' (l. 163), 'possessed' (l. 164), 'stands upon' (l. 167), 'purses' (l. 172), and 'we're man and wife' (l. 173), a barren sexual encounter
185 Brentford a short ride west of London; notorious for assignments (hence the illegitimate 'nurse-child' hidden with its wet-nurse)

193-4 take...cloth take a loan in the form of cloth instead of cash
201 diseased dis-eased
207 iwis certainly
209 upo'th' nail on the spot
210 Middleburgh Dutch port and wool mart for English merchants
210-11 raise...exchange double their money
212 harvest opportunity to 'reap' big profits
213 footcloths saddlecloths
213-14 chamber gowns, and hall gowns clothes for private rooms and for ceremonies (in great halls)

216 take...go make no doubt about it 218 where whereas 220 hawks' hoods Hunting hawks were hooded to keep them calm.
226-9 Why...can Thomasine compares herself to women watching an execution (see 2.3.378-80)
227 found no eyes would not weep
229 Help...can Easy helps the executioner who has hanged him, to quarter him ('rip up') 230 no man inhumane; impotent (see 4.3.56-8 and 5.1.52-3)

- I suffer in that gentleman's confusion.
 EASY Nay, be persuaded in that, Master Blastfield. 'Tis ready money at the merchants'; beside, the winter season and all falls in as pat as can be to help it.
- 235 SHORTYARD Well, Master Easy, none but you could have persuaded me to that.—Come, would you would dispatch then, Master Quomodo; where's this cloth?
 QUOMODO Full and whole within, all of this piece, of my religion, Master Blastfield. Feel't, nay, feel't and spare not, gentlemen; your fingers and your judgement.
- 240 SHORTYARD Cloth's good.
 EASY By my troth, exceeding good cloth; a good wale 't'as.
 QUOMODO Falselight!
 [Enter Falselight]
- FALSELIGHT I'm ne'er out o' the shop, sir.
- 245 QUOMODO Go, call in a porter presently to carry away the cloth with the star mark.—Whither will you please to have it carried, Master Blastfield?
 SHORTYARD Faith, to Master Beggarland, he's the only merchant now; or his brother, Master Stillyard-down, there's little difference.
- 250 QUOMODO You've happened upon the money men, sir; they and some of their brethren, I can tell you, will not stick to offer thirty thousand pound to be cursed still; great monied men, their stocks lie in the poor's throats. But you'll see me sufficiently discharged, Master Blastfield, ere you depart?
- SHORTYARD You have always found me righteous in that.
 QUOMODO Falselight!
 FALSELIGHT Sir?
- 260 QUOMODO You may bring a scrivener along with you.
 FALSELIGHT I'll remember that, sir. [Exit]
 QUOMODO Have you sent for a citizen, Master Blastfield?
 SHORTYARD No, faith, not yet.—Boy!
 EASY What must you do with a citizen, sir?
- 265 SHORTYARD A custom they're bound to o' late by the default of evil debtors; no citizen must lend money without two be bound in the bond; the second man enters but for custom sake.
 EASY No? And must he needs be a citizen?
 SHORTYARD By th' mass, stay, I'll learn that.—Master Quomodo!
 QUOMODO Sir?
 SHORTYARD Must the second party, that enters into bond only for fashion's sake, needs be a citizen? What say you to this gentleman for one?
- QUOMODO Alas, sir, you know he's a mere stranger to me; I neither am sure of his going or abiding; he may inn here tonight, and ride away tomorrow. Although I grant the chief burden lies upon you, yet we are bound to make choice of those we know, sir.
- 280 SHORTYARD Why, he's a gentleman of a pretty living, sir.
 QUOMODO It may be so, yet, under both your pardons, I'd rather have a citizen.
 EASY I hope you will not disparage me so. 'Tis well known I have three hundred pound a year in Essex.
- 285 SHORTYARD Well said! To him thyself. Take him up roundly.
 EASY And how doubtfully soe'er you account of me, I do not think but I might make my bond pass for a hundred pound i'th' city.
- 290 QUOMODO What, alone sir?
 EASY Alone, sir? Who says so? Perhaps I'd send down for a tenant or two.
 QUOMODO Ay, that's another case, sir.
 EASY Another case let it be then!
- 295 QUOMODO Nay, grow not into anger, sir.
 EASY Not take me into a bond? As good as you shall, Goodman goosecap.
 QUOMODO Well, Master Blastfield, because I will not disgrace the gentleman, I'm content for once, but we must not make a practice on't.
- 300 EASY No, sir, now you would, you shall not.
 QUOMODO [aside] Cuds me, I'm undone; he's gone again.
 SHORTYARD [aside] The net's broke.
 THOMASINE [aside] Hold there, dear gentleman.
- 305 EASY Deny me that small courtesy? 'Sfoot, a very Jew will not deny it me.
 SHORTYARD [aside] Now must I catch him warily.
 EASY A jest indeed; not take me into a bond, quo' they.
 SHORTYARD [aside to Easy] Master Easy. Mark my words: if it stood not upon the eternal loss of thy credit against supper—
- 310 EASY Mass, that's true.
 SHORTYARD The pawning of thy horse for his own victuals—
 EASY Right, i'faith.
 SHORTYARD And thy utter dissolution amongst gentlemen forever—
 EASY Pox on't!
 SHORTYARD Quomodo should hang, rot, stink—
- 320 QUOMODO [aside] Sweet boy, i'faith.

231 confusion destruction242 wale texture244 I'm...shop plays on his name246 star mark merchant or weaver's insignia249 Stillyard-down one whose scale ('steelyard') doesn't weigh accurately; another citizen who is always impotent252 stick hesitate253 still always, continually254 their...throats they have profited at the expense of the poor255 discharged released; a bond must be signed260 scrivener notary, copyist267 without unless268 enters signs; in the context of 'going' and 'inn' (l. 277), 'ride' (l. 278), 'burden lies upon you' (l. 279), 'case' (ll. 294 and 295), and 'undone' (l. 303; see 2.1.77, note), this suggests intercourse276 mere complete279 chief burden see 2.3.360–73, where Easy signs first and Shortyard second,

merely as a guarantor

281 pretty living considerable estate; his rent comes to 'three hundred pound a year' (2.3.285)287 roundly without equivocation; bluntly292 I'd send down if I were to send to Essex298 goodman goosecap master simpleton303 Cuds me oath, corrupted from 'God save me'305 Hold there proceed no further

306 'Sfoot oath, contracted from 'God's foot'

309 quo' they said they

SHORTYARD Drop, damn.
 QUOMODO [aside] Excellent Shortyard!
 EASY I forgot all this. What meant I to swagger before I 325 had money in my purse?—How does Master Quomodo?
 Is the bond ready?
 QUOMODO O, sir!
Enter Dustbox, the scrivener
 EASY Come, we must be friends. Here's my hand.
 QUOMODO Give it the scrivener. Here he comes.
 330 DUSTBOX Good day, Master Quomodo. Good morrow, gentlemen.
 QUOMODO We must require a little aid from your pen, good Master Dustbox.
 DUSTBOX What be the gentlemen's names that are bound,
 335 sir?
 QUOMODO Master John Blastfield, esquire, i'th' wild of Kent;
 and what do they call your bedfellow's name?
 SHORTYARD Master Richard Easy; you may easily hit on't.
 QUOMODO Master Richard Easy, of Essex, gentleman; both 340 bound to Ephestian Quomodo, citizen and draper of London; the sum, two hundred pound. What time do you take, Master Blastfield, for the payment?
 SHORTYARD I never pass my month, you know.
 QUOMODO I know it, sir. October sixteenth today; sixteenth 345 of November, say.
 EASY Is it your custom to return so soon, sir?
 SHORTYARD I never miss you.
Enter Falselight, like a porter, sweating FALSELIGHT I am come for the rest of the same piece, Master Quomodo.
 350 QUOMODO Star mark, this is it. Are all the rest gone?
 FALSELIGHT They're all at Master Stillyard-down's by this time.
 EASY How the poor rascal's all in a froth!
 SHORTYARD
 355 Push, they're ordained to sweat for gentlemen;
 Porters' backs and women's bellies bear up the world.
 [Exit Falselight with remaining cloth] EASY 'Tis true, i'faith; they bear men and money, and that's the world.
 SHORTYARD You've found it, sir.
 DUSTBOX I'm ready to your hands, gentlemen.
 360 SHORTYARD Come, Master Easy. [Gestures to Easy to sign]
 EASY I beseech you, sir.
 SHORTYARD It shall be yours, I say.
 EASY Nay, pray, Master Blastfield.

SHORTYARD I will not, i'faith.
 EASY What do you mean, sir?
 365 SHORTYARD I should show little bringing up, to take the way of a stranger.
 EASY By my troth, you do yourself wrong though, Master Blastfield.
 SHORTYARD Not a whit, sir.
 370 EASY But to avoid strife, you shall have your will of me for once.
 SHORTYARD Let it be so, I pray. [Easy signs]
 QUOMODO [aside] Now I begin to set one foot upon the 375 land. Methinks I am felling of trees already; we shall have some Essex logs yet to keep Christmas with, and that's a comfort.
 THOMASINE
 Now is he quart'ring out; the executioner
 Strides over him; with his own blood he writes.
 I am no dame that can endure such sights.
 380 Exit [above]

SHORTYARD [aside]
 So his right wing is cut, he will not fly far Past the two city hazards, Poultry and Wood Street.
 EASY How like you my Roman hand, i'faith?
 DUSTBOX Exceeding well, sir, but that you rest too much 385 upon your R's and make your E's too little.
 EASY I'll mend that presently.
 DUSTBOX Nay, 'tis done now, past mending. [Shortyard signs] You both deliver this to Master Quomodo as your deed?
 SHORTYARD We do, sir.
 390 QUOMODO I thank you, gentlemen. [Exit Dustbox] SHORTYARD Would the coin would come away now. We have deserved for't.
Enter Falselight [disguised as a porter] with the cloth
 FALSELIGHT By your leave a little, gentlemen.
 SHORTYARD How now? What's the matter? Speak!
 395 FALSELIGHT As fast as I can, sir. All the cloth's come back again.
 QUOMODO How?
 SHORTYARD What's the news?
 FALSELIGHT The passage to Middleburgh is stopped, and 400 therefore neither Master Stillyard-down nor Master Beg-garland, nor any other merchant, will deliver present money upon't. [Exit Falselight] QUOMODO Why, what hard luck have you, gentlemen!

322 damn be damned
 327.1 Dustbox the 'dustbox' contains sand with which to blot ink 328 hand Easy offers to shake hands, but Quomodo tells him to give his signature ('hand') to the scrivener
 336 wild of Kent forest ('weald') south-east of London
 340 Ephestian compare Hephaestion, Alexander the Great's lover (all of Asia was ordered to mourn at his death); also Hephaestus, who, as the Roman god

Vulcan, was made a cuckold by Venus and Mars
 346 return repay
 358 it my meaning
 362 It the 'courtesy' of signing first 366-7 to take the way of precede 375 falling of trees deforestation; controversial 'improvement' meant to maximize profits 378 quart'ring out see 2.3.229; those guilty of treason were hanged, drawn, and quartered; Easy has betrayed his inheritance, his 'blood' (2.3.379) 382 Poultry and Wood Street debtors' prisons

 383 Roman the fashionable 'Italian' style of handwriting, as opposed to Secretary or Court hand
 385 R's...E's puns on 'arse' and 'ease'
 392 coin payment for the cloth
 400 passage...stopped the route is closed (perhaps due to a Spanish blockade or attack, or to an English export prohibition)

- 405 EASY Why, Master Blastfield!
SHORTYARD Pish!
EASY You're so discontented too presently, a man cannot tell how to speak to you.
SHORTYARD Why, what would you say?
410 EASY We must make somewhat on't now, sir.
SHORTYARD Ay, where? How? The best is, it lies all upon my neck.—Master Quomodo, can you help me to any money for't? Speak.
QUOMODO Troth, Master Blastfield, since myself is so unfurnished, I know not the means how. There's one i'th' 415 street, a new setter up; if any lay out money upon't,
'twill be he.
SHORTYARD His name?
QUOMODO Master Idem. But you know we cannot give but 420 greatly to your loss, because we gain and live by't.
SHORTYARD 'Sfoot, will he give anything?
EASY Ay, stand upon that.
SHORTYARD Will he give anything? The brokers will give nothing, to no purpose.
425 QUOMODO Falselight!
[Enter Falselight above]
FALSELIGHT Over your head, sir.
QUOMODO Desire Master Idem to come presently and look upo'th' cloth.
FALSELIGHT I will, sir. [Exit above]
430 SHORTYARD What if he should offer but a hundred pound?
EASY If he want twenty on't, let's take it.
SHORTYARD Say you so?
EASY Master Quomodo will have four or five hundred pound for you of his own within three or four days.
[Enter Thomasine]
435 SHORTYARD 'Tis true, he said so indeed.
EASY Is that your wife, Master Quomodo?
QUOMODO That's she, little Thomasine!
EASY Under your leave, sir, I'll show myself a gentleman.
QUOMODO Do, and welcome, Master Easy.
440 EASY I have commission for what I do, lady, from your husband. [Kisses her] THOMASINE You may have a stronger commission for the next, an't please you, that's from myself.
Enter Sim
EASY You teach me the best law, lady.
- THOMASINE [aside] Beshrew my blood, a proper springall 445 and a sweet gentleman.
QUOMODO My son, Sim Quomodo! Here's more work for you, Master Easy; you must salute him too—[Aside] for he's like to be heir of thy land, I can tell thee.
SIM Vim, vitam, spemque salutem. 450
QUOMODO He shows you there he was a Cambridge man, sir, but now he's a Templar. Has he not good grace to make a lawyer?
EASY A very good grace to make a lawyer.
SHORTYARD [aside] For, indeed, he has no grace at all. 455
QUOMODO Some gave me counsel to make him a divine.
EASY Fie, fie!
QUOMODO But some of our livery think it an unfit thing, that our own sons should tell us of our vices; others,
to make him a physician, but then, being my heir, 460
I'm afraid he would make me away. Now, a lawyer, they're all willing to, because 'tis good for our trade and increaseth the number of cloth gowns, and indeed
'tis the fittest for a citizen's son, for our word is, 'What do ye lack?' and their word is, 'What do you give?' 465 EASY Exceeding proper.
Enter Falselight for Master Idem
QUOMODO Master Idem, welcome!
FALSELIGHT I have seen the cloth, sir.
QUOMODO Very well.
FALSELIGHT I am but a young setter up; the uttermost I 470 dare venture upon't is threescore pound.
SHORTYARD What?
FALSELIGHT If it be for me so, I am for it; if not, you have your cloth and I have my money.
EASY Nay, pray, Master Blastfield, refuse not his kind offer. 475
SHORTYARD A bargain then, Master Idem, clap hands.— [Aside] He's finely cheated.—Come, let's all to the next tavern and see the money paid.
EASY A match!
QUOMODO I follow you, gentlemen; take my son along with 480
you. Exeunt [all but Quomodo]
Now to my keys; I'm Master Idem, he must fetch the money. First have I caught him in a bond for two hundred pound, and [] my two hundred pounds' worth o' cloth again for threescore pound. Admire me, 485 all you students at Inns of Cozenage. Exit
Finis Actus Secundus

416 a new setter up one newly established 419 Idem 'the same' (Quomodo himself, see 2.3.482)
419–20 we...loss what we pay you must be less than what we have charged you for the same goods
422 stand insist
426 Over your head plays on his name 431 want twenty on't twenty less; i.e.

eighty pounds 445 springall young man (variant of 'springald')
450 Vim...salutem 'Let me salute strength, life, and hope'
452 Templar at one of the Inns of Court (see 2.3.96–7)
458 livery the woollen drapers' company
461 make me away kill me

463 gowns worn by lawyers (see 1.1.2)
466.1 for disguised as 476 clap hands shake hands and so make a deal
482 keys to where he keeps his money 484 and...my the text is corrupt here;
perhaps 'now have I' or 'have got' has dropped out 486 Cozenage cheating

3.1

Incipit Actus Tertius

Enter Lethe's pander, Hellgill, the Country Wench coming in [as a Courtesan] with a new fashion gown, dressed gentlewoman-like, the Tailor points it, and Mistress Comings, a tirewoman, busy about her head

HELLGILL You talk of an alteration; here's the thing itself. What base birth does not raiment make glorious? And what glorious births do not rags make infamous? Why should not a woman confess what she is now, since the finest are but deluding shadows, begot between tirewomen and tailors? For instance, behold their parents.

MISTRESS COMINGS Say what you will, this wire becomes you best.—How say you, tailor?

10 TAILOR I promise you 'tis a wire would draw me from my work seven days a week.

COURTESAN Why, do you work o' Sundays, tailor?

TAILOR Hardest of all, o' Sundays, because we are most forbidden.

15 COURTESAN Troth, and so do most of us women; the better day the better deed, we think.

MISTRESS COMINGS Excellent, exceeding, i'faith. A narrow-eared wire sets out a cheek so fat and so full, and if you be ruled by me, you shall wear your hair still like a mock-face behind; 'tis such an Italian world, many men know not before from behind.

TAILOR How like you the sitting of this gown now, Mistress Comings?

25 MISTRESS COMINGS It sits at marvellous good ease and comely discretion.

HELLGILL Who would think now this fine sophisticated squall came out of the bosom of a barn, and the loins of a hay-tosser?

30 COURTESAN Out, you saucy, pestiferous pander! I scorn that, i'faith.

HELLGILL Excellent, already the true phrase and style of a strumpet. Stay, a little more of the red, and then I take my leave of your cheek for four-and-twenty hours.—Do you not think it impossible that her own father should know her now, if he saw her?

35 COURTESAN Why, I think no less. How can he know me, when I scarce know myself?

HELLGILL 'Tis right.

COURTESAN But so well you lay wait for a man for me.

HELLGILL I protest I have bestowed much labour about it; and in fit time, good news, I hope.

Enter a Servant bringing in her Father in disguise to serve her SERVANT I've found one yet at last, in whose preferment I hope to reap credit.

COURTESAN Is that the fellow?

SERVANT Lady, it is.

COURTESAN Art thou willing to serve me, fellow?

FATHER So please you, he that has not the heart to serve such a mistress as your beautiful self, deserves to be honoured for a fool or knighted for a coward.

COURTESAN There's too many of them already.

FATHER 'Twere sin then to raise the number.

COURTESAN Well we'll try both our likings for a month, and then either proceed, or let fall the suit.

FATHER Be it as you have spoke, but 'tis my hope a longer Term.

COURTESAN No, truly, our Term ends once a month. We should get more than the lawyers, for they have but four Terms a year, and we have twelve, and that makes 'em run so fast to us in the vacation.

FATHER [aside] A mistress of a choice beauty! Amongst such imperfect creatures I ha' not seen a perfecter. I should have reckoned the fortunes of my daughter amongst the happiest, had she lighted into such a service, whereas now I rest doubtful whom or where she serves.

COURTESAN [gives money] There's for your bodily advice, tailor; and there's for your head-counsel; and I discharge you both till tomorrow morning again.

TAILOR At which time our neatest attendance.

MISTRESS COMINGS I pray, have an especial care, howsoever you stand or lie, that nothing fall upon your hair to batter your wire. Exeunt [Tailor and Mistress Comings]

COURTESAN I warrant you for that.—Which gown becomes me best now, the purple satin or this?

HELLGILL If my opinion might rule over you—

Enter Lethe with Rearage and Salewood

LETHE Come, gallants, I'll bring you to a beauty shall strike your eyes into your hearts. What you see you shall desire, yet never enjoy.

REARAGE And that's a villainous torment.

SALEWOOD And is she but your underput, Master Lethe?

LETHE No more, of my credit; and a gentlewoman of a great house, noble parentage, unmatched education, my plain punk. I may grace her with the name of a

3.1.0.4-5 points it ties the laces

0.5 Comings puns on 'combing' but coming and going also suggests that she is a bawd; Mistress Comings is a hairdresser, although a 'tirewoman' was commonly a lady's maid or a dressmaker

8 wire either the entire headdress or just its supporting wire frame (see 1.3.14-16)

20 mock-face provocative hair arrangement resembling a face; if 'face' is slang for 'arse' (see 3.1.201 note), then this phrase sets up the next

20-1 Italian...behind Italian men were said to engage in sodomy

27 squall see 1.3.4-6, note

29 pestiferous plaguoy, pernicious

32 red rouge

39 But so well How well (ironical)

lay...man look out for a servant

41.1 Servant Hellgill's man

47 serve see 2.3.68-70, note

49 knighted see 1.2.188, note

52 try...likings see if we are suited to each other

58 four Terms see 1.1.29.1, note; this concludes the legal metaphor that begins with 'proceed' (3.1.53)

61 such imperfect creatures womankind

71 stand or lie see 2.3.58-9 and 2.3.68-70, note

80 underput mistress, courtesan

83 punk prostitute

85 courtesan, a backslider, a prostitution, or such a toy; but when all comes to all, 'tis but a plain punk. Look you gentlemen, that's she; behold her.

COURTESAN O, my beloved strayer! I consume in thy absence.

90 LETHE La, you now. You shall not say I'll be proud to you, gentlemen; I give you leave to salute her.—[Aside] I'm afraid of nothing now, but that she'll utterly disgrace 'em, turn tail to 'em, and place their kisses behind her. No, by my faith, she deceives me; by my troth, she's kissed 'em both with her lips. I thank you for that music, masters. 'Slid, they both court her at once, and see, if she ha' not the wit to stand still and let 'em! I think if two men were brewed into one, there is that woman would drink 'em up both.

REARAGE [to Courtesan] A coxcomb! He a courtier?

100 COURTESAN He says he has a place there.

SALEWOOD So has the fool, a better place than he, and can come where he dare not show his head.

LETHE Nay, hear you me, gentlemen—

105 SALEWOOD I protest, you were the last man we spoke on. We're a little busy yet; pray stay there awhile. We'll come to you presently.

LETHE [aside] This is good, i'faith; endure this and be a slave forever! Since you neither savour of good breeding nor bringing up, I'll slice your hamstrings, but I'll make you show mannerly!—Pox on you, leave courting. I ha' not the heart to hurt an Englishman, i'faith, or else—

SALEWOOD What else?

LETHE Prithee, let's be merry; nothing else.—[To Servant] Here, fetch some wine.

115 COURTESAN Let my servant go for't.

LETHE Yours? Which is he?

FATHER This, sir.—

(Aside) But I scarce like my mistress now; the loins

120 Can ne'er be safe where the flies be so busy.

Wit, by experience bought, foils wit at school;

Who proves a deeper knave than a spent fool?—

I am gone for your worship's wine, sir. [Exit]

125 HELLGILL [aside to Lethe] Sir, you put up too much indignity; bring company to cut your own throat. The fire is not yet so hot, that you need two screens before it;

'tis but new kindled yet. If 'twere risse to a flame, I could not blame you then to put others before you; but, alas, all the heat yet is comfortable, a cherisher, not a defacer.

LETHE Prithee, let 'em alone. They'll be ashamed on't anon, I trow, if they have any grace in 'em. 130

HELLGILL [aside] I'd fain have him quarrel, fight, and be assuredly killed, that I might beg his place, for there's ne'er a one void yet. [Exit with Servant]

Enter Shortyard with Easy

COURTESAN You'll make him mad anon. 135

SALEWOOD 'Tis to that end.

SHORTYARD Yet at last Master Quomodo is as firm as his promise.

EASY Did I not tell you still he would?

140 SHORTYARD Let me see, I am seven hundred pound in bond now to the rascal.

EASY Nay, you're no less, Master Blastfield, look to't. By my troth, I must needs confess, sir, you ha' been uncommonly kind to me since I ha' been in town; but Master Alsup shall know on't. 145

SHORTYARD That's my ambition, sir.

EASY I beseech you, sir.—Stay, this is Lethe's haunt, see, we have caught him.

LETHE Master Blastfield and Master Easy, you're kind gentlemen both. 150

SHORTYARD Is that the beauty you famed so?

LETHE The same.

SHORTYARD Who be those so industrious about her?

155 LETHE Rearage and Salewood. I'll tell you the unmannerliest trick of 'em, that ever you heard in your life.

SHORTYARD Prithee, what's that?

LETHE I invited 'em hither to look upon her, brought 'em along with me, gave 'em leave to salute her in kindness; what do they but most saucily fall in love with her, very impudently court her for themselves, and, like two crafty attorneys, finding a hole in my lease, go about to defeat me of my right? 160

SHORTYARD Ha' they so little conscience?

LETHE The most uncivil'st part that you have seen. I know they'll be sorry for't when they have done, for there's 165

84 toy trifle, whim

87 consume waste away

90 salute kiss

92 tail her anus or vagina

95 music loud kisses

99 coxcomb conceited fool, a fop

100 place there position at Court

101 fool jester; King James brought Archy Armstrong, his fool, with him from Scotland to England

105 busy plays on 'business', or sexual intercourse

110 leave enough, stop

111 an Englishman further evidence that Lethe is a Scotsman

119 flies see 1.3.52, note

120-1 Wit... fool Although they are bankrupt fools, these sophisticated knaves will easily outwit a novice like the courtesan.

123 put up put up with (see 2.1.4, note)

124 fire the courtesan's desire

125 two screens Rearage and Salewood

131 trow believe, know

133 place at Court (see 3.1.100)

135 him Lethe; Salewood and Rearage are still 'courting'

136 'Tis to that end that's what we are trying to do

138 promise that he would shortly have money to lend

140 I... in Shortyard, and Easy (see 3.4.62-3 and 183-5), have further indebted themselves to Quomodo

151 famed boasted of 158 in kindness cordially, but also in a sexual manner

161 hole loophole, vagina

162 right title to her

163 conscience plays on 'cunt science' or 'cunt knowledge'

164 part share, but also plays on male and female genitals (private parts)

165 done finished copulating

- no man but gives a sigh after his sin of women; I know it by myself.
- SHORTYARD [to Rearage and Salewood] You parcel of a rude, saucy and unmannerly nation—
- 170 LETHE [aside] One good thing in him, he'll tell 'em on't roundly.
- SHORTYARD Cannot a gentleman purchase a little fire to thaw his appetite by, but must you, that have been daily singed in the flame, be as greedy to beguile him on't?
- 175 How can it appear in you but maliciously, an that you go about to engross hell to your selves? Heaven forbid, that you should not suffer a stranger to come in; the devil himself is not so unmannerly. I do not think but some of them rather will be wise enough to beg offices there before you, and keep you out. Marry, all the spite will be, they cannot sell 'em again.
- 180 EASY
Come, are you not to blame? Not to give place—
To us, I mean.
- LETHE A worse and a worse disgrace!
- COURTESAN Nay, gentlemen, you wrong us both then.
- 185 Stand from me, I protest I'll draw my silver bodkin upon you.
- SHORTYARD Clubs! Clubs! Gentlemen, stand upon your guard.
- COURTESAN A gentlewoman must swagger a little now and then, I perceive; there would be no civility in her chamber else. Though it be my hard fortune to have my keeper there a coward, the thing that's kept is a gentlewoman born.
- 190 SHORTYARD And to conclude, a coward, infallible of your side. Why, do you think, i'faith, I took you to be a coward? Do I think you'll turn your back to any man living? You'll be whipped first.
- 195 EASY And then indeed she turns her back to some man living.
- 200 SHORTYARD But that man shows himself a knave, for he dares not show his own face when he does it; for
- some of the Common Council in Henry the Eight's days thought it modesty at that time, that one visor should look upon another.
- EASY 'Twas honestly considered of 'em, i'faith. 205
Enter Mother Gruel
- SHORTYARD How now? What piece of stuff comes here?
- LETHE [aside] Now, some good news yet to recover my repute, and grace me in this company.—Gentlemen, are we friends among ourselves?
- SHORTYARD United. 210
[Enter Father with wine]
- LETHE Then here comes Rhenish to confirm our amity.—Wagtail, salute them all, they are friends.
- COURTESAN Then, saving my quarrel, to you all.
- SHORTYARD To's all.
- COURTESAN Now beshrew your hearts, an you do not. 215
SHORTYARD To sweet Master Lethe.
- LETHE Let it flow this way, dear Master Blastfield.—Gentlemen, to you all.
- SHORTYARD This Rhenish wine is like the scouring-stick to a gun, it makes the barrel clear. It has an excellent virtue, it keeps all the sinks in man and woman's body sweet in June and July; and, to say truth, if ditches were not cast once a year, and drabs once a month, there would be no abiding i'th' city.
- 220 LETHE Gentlemen, I'll make you privy to a letter I sent.
- SHORTYARD A letter comes well after privy; it makes amends.
- LETHE There's one Quomodo a draper's daughter in town whom for her happy portion I wealthily affect.
- REARAGE And not for love?—[To Salewood] This makes for 230 me, his rival; bear witness.
- LETHE
The father does elect me for the man,
The daughter says the same.
- SHORTYARD Are you not well?
- LETHE
Yes, all but for the mother; she's my sickness.

166 of with 168 parcel 'lot', 'set,' or 'pack' (fig.; usually contemptuous)
169 nation English
172 fire passion, mistress (see. 3.1.124), but also suggestive of venereal disease (that which has 'singed' Rearage and Salewood in the past) 176 engross monopolize hell the gates of hell (a vagina) or hell-fire (syphilitic pain)
177 stranger foreigner, a Scotsman like Lethe (see 1.2.156)
179 them the Scots; Englishmen complained that James I was packing the Court (filling 'offices') with his countrymen
181 'em the 'offices' they purchased 184 us Lethe and her
185 bodkin hair-pin, ornament
187 Clubs! call to London apprentices to assert their rights
191 chamber bed chamber, but also vagina

192 keeper door keeper or bawd
coward impotent; effeminate (the opposite of 'hard') 194-5 infallible...side meaning uncertain; perhaps because Lethe is a 'coward', the Courtesan needn't fall on her back or 'side' (buttocks) for him
196 turn your back show yourself a coward; allow yourself to be taken from behind like a coward (a male whore)
197 whipped prostitutes were sentenced to whipping
201 show his own face the official who whipped prisoners in public wore a mask; 'face' was used for buttocks and pubic area
202 Common Council representatives from London's twenty-six wards, answerable to the Court of Aldermen and the Lord Mayor
Henry the Eight's days 1509-47
203 visor mask; prostitute

206 piece of stuff person of little worth, prostitute
211 Rhenish Rhine wine
212 Wagtail prostitute, courtesan (meant as term of affection here) 213 saving except for to you all they toast ('salute') one another 215 an...not if you do not (toast us)
220 barrel of a gun, but also belly and loins (fig.)
221 sinks organs of digestion and excretion 223 cast see 1.2.68, note
drabs...month see 3.1.56-8; perhaps a monthly medical purging 225 make...to let you in on a secret about 226 A letter...privy toilet tissue is helpful in an outhouse
229 portion dowry
230 makes for favours
233 well well set

- 235 SHORTYARD By'r lady, and the mother is a pestilent, wilful, troublesome sickness, I can tell you, if she light upon you handsomely.
- LETHE
I find it so; she for a stranger pleads,
Whose name I ha' not learned.
- REARAGE [to Salewood]
240 And e'en now he called me by it.
- LETHE Now, as my letter told her, since only her consent kept aloof off, what might I think on't, but that she merely doted upon me herself!
- SHORTYARD Very assuredly.
- 245 SALEWOOD [to Rearage] This makes still for you.
- SHORTYARD Did you let it go so, i'faith?
- LETHE You may believe it, sir.—Now, what says her answer?
- SHORTYARD Ay, her answer.
- 250 MOTHER GRUEL She says you're a base, proud knave, an like your worship.
- LETHE How?
- SHORTYARD Nay, hear out her answer, or there's no goodness in you.
- 255 MOTHER GRUEL You ha' forgot, she says, in what pickle your worship came up, and brought two of your friends to give their words for a suit of green kersey.
- LETHE Drudge, peace, or—[Gestures threateningly]
- 260 SHORTYARD Show yourself a gentleman; she had the patience to read your letter, which was as bad as this can be. What will she think on't? Not hear her answer?—Speak, good his drudge.
- MOTHER GRUEL And as for her daughter, she hopes she'll be ruled by her in time, and not be carried away with a cast of manchets, a bottle of wine, and a custard, which once made her daughter sick, because you came by it with a bad conscience.
- 265 LETHE Gentlemen, I'm all in a sweat.
- SHORTYARD That's very wholesome for your body; nay, you must keep in your arms.
- MOTHER GRUEL Then she demanded of me whether I was your worship's aunt or no?
- LETHE Out, out, out!
- 270 MOTHER GRUEL Alas, said I, I am a poor drudge of his.—Faith, an thou wert his mother, quoth she, he'd make thee his drudge, I warrant him.—Marry, out upon him, quoth I, an't like your worship.
- LETHE HORROR, horror! I'm smothered. Let me go, torment me not. Exit
- SHORTYARD An you love me, let's follow him, gentlemen. 280
- REARAGE and SALEWOOD Agreed. Exeunt
- SHORTYARD I count a hundred pound well spent to pursue a good jest, Master Easy.
- EASY By my troth, I begin to bear that mind too.
- 285 SHORTYARD Well said, i'faith. Hang money! Good jests are worth silver at all times.
- EASY They're worth gold, Master Blastfield.
- Exeunt [Easy, Shortyard, and Mother Gruel]*
- COURTESAN Do you deceive me so? Are you toward marriage, i'faith, Master Lethe? It shall go hard but I'll forbid the banns. I'll send a messenger into your bones, another into your purse, but I'll do it. Exit 290
- FATHER
Thou fair and wicked creature, steeped in art, Beauteous and fresh, the soul the foulest part. A common filth is like a house possessed, Where, if not spoiled, you'll come out 'fraid at least. 295
This service likes not me; though I rest poor, I hate the basest use, to screen a whore. The human stroke ne'er made him; he that can Be bawd to woman never leapt from man; Some monster won his mother. 300
I wished my poor child hither, doubled wrong. A month and such a mistress were too long; Yet here awhile in others' lives I'll see How former follies did appear in me. Exit
- Enter Easy with Shortyard's Boy* 3.2
- EASY Boy!
- BOY Anon, sir.
- EASY Where left you Master Blastfield, your master, say you?
- BOY An hour since I left him in Paul's, sir.—[Aside] But you'll not find him the same man again, next time you meet him. 5
- EASY Methinks I have no being without his company. 'Tis so full of kindness and delight, I hold him to be the only companion in earth. 10
- BOY [aside] Ay, as companions go nowadays, that help to spend a man's money.
- EASY So full of nimble wit, various discourse, pregnant apprehension, and uncommon entertainment; he might keep company with any lord for his grace. 15

235 By'r lady By our lady
the mother hysteria
246 let it go so write that to her
255 pickle predicament
270 keep...arms not hit Mother Gruel; conduct yourself as a gentleman, a man who bears arms
284 bear that mind share your opinion
288 toward leaning toward, planning 290 banns announcement in church of intended marriage

290-I send...purse give you venereal disease and bankrupt you (see 1.1.28, note)
292 art artifice, cunning
294 common filth prostitute possessed controlled by devils 295 spoiled undone
'fraid afraid because the house is haunted; puns on 'frayed' ('spoiled' by a prostitute); see 3.3.62 and 4.1.110

296 likes pleases
297 use occupation, 'service' as a 'bawd'
(3.1.299)
298 stroke discharge, shot, or caress in intercourse
299 leapt sprang, was born
3.2.5 Paul's St Paul's Cathedral (see
1.2.137, note)

- BOY [aside] Ay, with any lord that were past it.
 EASY And such a good, freehearted, honest, affable kind of gentleman. Come, boy, a heaviness will possess me till I see him. Exit
- 20 BOY But you'll find yourself heavier then, by a seven hundred pound weight. Alas, poor birds that cannot keep the sweet country, where they fly at pleasure, but must needs come to London to have their wings clipped, and are fain to go hopping home again. Exit
- 3.3 Enter Shortyard and Falselight, like a Sergeant and a Yeoman, to arrest Easy
- SHORTYARD So, no man is so impudent to deny that. Spirits can change their shapes, and soonest of all into sergeants, because they are cousin-germans to spirits; for there's but two kind of arrests till doomsday: the devil for the soul, the sergeant for the body; but afterward the devil arrests body and soul, sergeant and all, if they be knaves still and deserve it. Now, my Yeoman Falselight—
- 5 FALSELIGHT I attend you, good Sergeant Shortyard.
- 10 SHORTYARD No more Master Blastfield now. Poor Easy, hardly beset.
- FALSELIGHT But how if he should go to prison? We're in a mad state, then, being not sergeants.
- SHORTYARD Never let it come near thy belief that he'll take prison, or stand out in law, knowing the debt to be due, but still expect the presence of Master Blastfield, kind Master Blastfield, worshipful Master Blastfield, and at the last—
- 15 BOY [within] Master Shortyard. Master Falselight!
- 20 SHORTYARD The boy; a warning-piece! See where he comes.
- Enter Easy with the Boy*
- EASY Is not in Paul's.
- BOY He is not far off, sure, sir.
- EASY When was his hour, sayst thou?
- 25 BOY Two, sir.
- EASY Why, two has struck.
- BOY No, sir, they are now a-striking.
- SHORTYARD Master Richard Easy of Essex, we arrest you. [Strikes Easy on shoulder]
- 30 EASY Ha?
- BOY Alas, a surgeon! He's hurt i'th' shoulder. [Exit]
- SHORTYARD Deliver your weapons quietly, sir.
- EASY Why, what's the matter?
- SHORTYARD You're arrested at the suit of Master Quomodo?
- EASY Master Quomodo? 35
- SHORTYARD How strange you make it. You're a landed gentleman, sir. I know 'tis but a trifle, a bond of seven hundred pound.
- EASY
- La, I knew you had mistook; you should arrest One Master Blastfield, 'tis his bond, his debt. 40
- SHORTYARD Is not your name there?
- EASY True, for fashion's sake.
- SHORTYARD Why and 'tis for fashion's sake that we arrest you.
- EASY Nay, an it be no more, I yield to that. I know Master Blastfield will see me take no injury as long as I'm in town, for Master Alsup's sake. 45
- SHORTYARD Who's that, sir?
- EASY An honest gentleman in Essex.
- SHORTYARD O, in Essex! I thought you had been in London, where now your business lies; honesty from Essex will be a great while a-coming, sir; you should look out an honest pair of citizens. 50
- EASY Alas, sir, I know not where to find 'em.
- SHORTYARD No? There's enough in town. 55
- EASY I know not one, by my troth. I am a mere stranger for these parts; Master Quomodo is all, and the honestest that I know.
- SHORTYARD To him, then, let's set forward.—Yeoman Spiderman, cast an eye about for Master Blastfield. 60
- EASY Boy!—Alas, the poor boy was frighted away at first.
- SHORTYARD Can you blame him sir? We that daily fray away knights, may fright away boys, I hope. Exeunt
- Enter Quomodo with the Boy, [Thomasine above]* 3.4
- QUOMODO
- Ha! Have they him, sayst thou?
- BOY As sure as—
- QUOMODO
- The land's mine; that's sure enough, boy. Let me advance thee, knave, and give thee a kiss; My plot's so firm, I dare it now to miss. Now shall I be divulged a landed man 5 Throughout the livery: one points, another whispers, A third frets inwardly, let him fret and hang! Especially his envy I shall have That would be fain, yet cannot be, a knave, Like an old lecher, stiff in a furred gown, Whose mind stands stiff, but his performance down. 10 Now come my golden days in.

16 past it past grace, irredeemable
 18 heaviness sadness; but the Boy, punning on 'pound' (3.2.21), takes Easy literally
 23 clipped cut short to disable flight; see 2.3.381
 24 fain obliged
 3.3.0.1 Sergeant London's two Sheriffs oversaw Sergeants, who in turn were assisted by Yeomen
 2 Spirits see 1.2.78.1, note
 3 cousin-germans first cousins

11 beset under attack
 14–15 take prison agree to imprisonment
 15 stand out in law fight it out in court
 20 warning-piece signal gun (Easy imagines the boy is looking for Blastfield)
 24 his hour Blastfield's time of arrival at St Paul's 27 a-striking plays on the 'stroke' of two and the arrest, during which Easy is 'hurt i'th' shoulder' (3.3.31)

32 weapons sword and dagger
 53 citizens for bail
 56 mere complete
 62 fray frighten
 3.4.3 advance promote
 6 livery see 2.3.458, note
 9 fain gladly
 10 girt wrapped
 11 Whose . . . down firm of mind but impotent

- Whither is the worshipful Master Quomodo and his fair bedfellow rid forth?—To his land in Essex!— 15 Whence comes those goodly load of logs?—From his land in Essex!—Where grows this pleasant fruit, says one citizen's wife in the Row.—At Master Quomodo's orchard in Essex.—O, O does it so? I thank you for that good news, i'faith.
- 20 BOY Here they come with him, sir. [Exit]
 QUOMODO Grant me patience in my joys, that being so great, I run not mad with 'em.
 [Enter Shortyard and Falselight, disguised as a Sergeant and a Yeoman, bringing in Easy]
- SHORTYARD Bless Master Quomodo!
 QUOMODO How now, sergeants? Who ha' you brought me 25 here—Master Easy!
 EASY Why, la you now, sergeants, did I not tell you you mistook?
 QUOMODO Did you not hear me say, I had rather ha' had Master Blastfield, the more sufficient man a great deal?
 30 SHORTYARD Very true, sir. But this gentleman lighting into our hands first—QUOMODO Why, did you so, sir?
 SHORTYARD We thought good to make use of that opportunity, and hold him fast.
 35 QUOMODO You did well in that, I must needs say, for your own securities. But 'twas not my mind, Master Easy, to have you first. You must needs think so.
 EASY I dare swear that, Master Quomodo.
 QUOMODO But since you are come to me, I have no reason to refuse you; I should show little manners in that, sir.
 40 EASY But I hope you spake not in that sense, sir, to impose the bond upon me?
 QUOMODO By my troth, that's my meaning, sir. You shall find me an honest man; you see I mean what I say. Is not the day past, the money untendered? You'd ha' me live uprightly, Master Easy?
 45 EASY Why, sir, you know Master Blastfield is the man.
 QUOMODO Why, sir, I know Master Blastfield is the man; but is he any more than one man? Two entered into 50 bond to me, or I'm foully cozened.
 EASY You know my entrance was but for fashion sake.
 QUOMODO Why I'll agree to you; you'll grant 'tis the fashion likewise when the bond's due, to have the money paid again.
 55 SHORTYARD So we told him, sir, and that it lay in your worship's courtesy to arrest which you please.
- QUOMODO Marry, does it, sir. These fellows know the law. Beside, you offered yourself into bond to me, you know, when I had no stomach to you. Now beshrew your heart for your labour! I might ha' had a 60 good substantial citizen that would ha' paid the sum roundly, although I think you sufficient enough for seven hundred pound, beside the forfeiture. I would be loath to disgrace you so much before sergeants.
 EASY If you would ha' the patience, sir, I do not think but 65 Master Blastfield is at carrier's to receive the money.
 QUOMODO He will prove the honester man, then, and you the better discharged. I wonder he should break with me; 'twas never his practice. You must not be angry with me now, though you were somewhat hot when you entered into bond; you may easily go in angrily, but you cannot come out so.
 70 EASY No, the devil's in't, for that!
 SHORTYARD [aside to Easy] Do you hear, sir? O'my troth, we pity you. Ha' you any store of crowns about you?
 75 EASY Faith, a poor store, yet they shall be at their service that will strive to do me good. We were both drunk last night, and ne'er thought upon the bond.
 SHORTYARD I must tell you this, you have fell into the hands of a most merciless devourer, the very gull o' the city; should you offer him money, goods or lands now, he'd rather have your body in prison, he's o' such a nature.
 80 EASY Prison? We're undone then!
 SHORTYARD He's o' such a nature, look! Let him owe any man a spite, what's his course? He will lend him money today, o' purpose to 'rest him tomorrow.
 85 EASY Defend me!
 SHORTYARD H'as at least sixteen at this instant proceeded in both the Counters: some bach'lors, some masters, some doctors of captivity of twenty years' standing; and he desires nothing more than imprisonment.
 90 EASY Would Master Blastfield would come away.
 SHORTYARD Ay, then things would not be as they are. What will you say to us if we procure you two substantial subsidy citizens to bail you, spite on's heart, and set you at liberty to find out Master Blastfield?
 95 EASY Sergeant, here, take all! I'll be dear to you, do but perform it.
 SHORTYARD [aside] Much!
 100 FALSELIGHT [aside] Enough, sweet sergeant, I hope I understand thee.

17 Row affluent Goldsmith's Row in Cheapside

29 sufficient solvent, able to meet liabilities

45 untendered unpaid

56 courtesy prerogative, purview

59 stomach inclination; in the context of 'entered' and 'entrance' (see 2.3.268, note), as well as 'hot', 'go in' and 'come out' (3.4.70-2), this may also mean 'sexual appetite'

61 good substantial wealthy, sufficient (see 3.4.29)

62 roundly directly

66 carrier's a designated inn where he could receive from provincial messengers ('carriers') money due him

80 gull throat (gullet); greedy man; possibly trickster or cheat

87 'rest arrest

89-90 proceeded...Counters advancing to a higher degree in the city's debtors' prisons (universities)

96 subsidy citizens men who paid a Parliamentary tax beyond the regular assessment; wealthy men (see 3.4.190)

98 all whatever crowns he has upon him

100 Much expressing contempt, as in 'little' or 'of course'; Shortyard either won't 'perform' anything for Easy or he dismisses Easy's 'crowns' as negligible

- SHORTYARD I love to prevent the malice of such a rascal.
Perhaps you might find Master Blastfield tonight.
- 105 EASY Why, we lie together, man, there's the jest on't.
SHORTYARD Fie! And you'll seek to secure your bail?
Because they will be two citizens of good account, you must do that for your credit sake.
- EASY I'll be bound to save them harmless.
- 110 SHORTYARD A pox on him, you cut his throat then. No words!
EASY What's it you require me, Master Quomodo?
QUOMODO You know that before this time, I hope, sir: present money, or present imprisonment.
- 115 SHORTYARD [aside to Easy] I told you so.
EASY We ne'er had money of you.
QUOMODO You had commodities, an't please you.
EASY Well, may I not crave so much liberty upon my word, to seek out Master Blastfield?
- 120 QUOMODO Yes, an you would not laugh at me. We are sometimes gulls to gentlemen, I thank 'em; but gentlemen are never gulls to us, I commend 'em.
SHORTYARD Under your leave, Master Quomodo, the gentleman craves the furtherance of an hour; and it sorts well with our occasion at this time, having a little urgent business at Guildhall; at which minute we'll return, and see what agreement is made.
- 125 QUOMODO Nay, take him along with you, sergeant.
EASY I'm undone then!
SHORTYARD He's your prisoner, and being safe in your house at your own disposing, you cannot deny him such a request. Beside, he hath a little faith in Master Blastfield's coming, sir.
- QUOMODO Let me not be too long delayed, I charge you.
- 135 EASY Not an hour, i'faith, sir.
Exeunt [Shortyard and Falselight]
QUOMODO O, Master Easy, of all men living, I never dreamt you would ha' done me this injury: make me wound my credit, fail in my commodities, bring my state into suspicion. For the breaking of your day to me has broken my day to others.
- 140 EASY You tell me of that still, which is no fault of mine, Master Quomodo.
QUOMODO O, what's a man but his honesty, Master Easy? And that's a fault amongst most of us all. Mark but this note; I'll give you good counsel now: as often as you give your name to a bond, you must think you christen a child, and take the charge on't too; for as the one, the bigger it grows, the more cost it requires, so the other, the longer it lies, the more charges it puts you to. Only here's the difference: a child must be broke, and a bond must not; the more you break children, the more you keep 'em under, but the more you break bonds, the more they'll leap in your face. And therefore, to conclude, I would never undertake to be gossip to that bond which I would not see well brought up.
- 150 EASY Say you so, sir? I'll think upon your counsel hereafter for't.
QUOMODO [aside] Ah, fool, thou shouldst ne'er ha' tasted such wit, but that I know 'tis too late.
THOMASINE [aside] The more I grieve.
QUOMODO To put all this into the compass of a little hoop ring:
Make this account, come better days or worse,
So many bonds abroad, so many boys at nurse.
- 165 EASY A good medicine for a short memory. But since you have entered so far, whose children are desperate debts, I pray?
QUOMODO Faith, they are like the offsprings of stolen lust, put to the hospital; their fathers are not to be found; they are either too far abroad, or too close within. And thus for your memory's sake:
The desperate debtor hence derives his name,
One that has neither money, land, nor fame;
All that he makes prove bastards, and not bands,
But such as yours at first are born to lands.
- 175 EASY But all that I beget hereafter I'll soon disinherit, Master Quomodo.
QUOMODO [aside] In the mean time, here's a shrewd knave will disinherit you.
EASY Well, to put you out of all doubt, Master Quomodo, I'll not trust to your courtesy; I ha' sent for bail.
QUOMODO How? You've cozened me there, i'faith.
EASY Since the worst comes to the worst, I have those friends i'th' city, I hope, that will not suffer me to lie for seven hundred pound.
- 185 QUOMODO And you told me you had no friends here at all; how should a man trust you now?

107 account repute
109 save them harmless fully indemnify them
110-11 No words silence
119 word honour; promise not to escape
124 sorts fits
126 Guildhall central meeting place for municipal business; City Hall
128-9 take...then Easy thinks Quomodo would have them imprison him and so make it impossible for him to secure bail.
138 state reputation in the business community
139 day when his debt was due

144 that's probably refers to breaking one's word
145 note noteworthy advice
146 christen become godparent ('gossip') to, take on as one's own responsibility ('charge')
149 lies remains unpaid
150 broke forced to obey
161-2 To...ring to compose a brief rhyme of the sort engraved on a ring
164 bonds abroad debts outstanding 166 entered gone into this subject (but one also 'entered' into debt) desperate defaulted

169 hospital home for foundlings
170 either...within either run off or in the Counter
171 thus...sake Quomodo turns to verse, as he did with the hoop ring posy, to make it easier for Easy to memorize his advice.
173 fame good reputation
174 All 'debts' (3.4.166) bands variant of 'bonds' (rhymes with 'lands') 175 born to lands land 'fathers' Easy's debts
176 disinherit discharge (fig.)
184 to lie to be imprisoned

- EASY That was but to try your courtesy, Master Quomodo.
 QUOMODO [aside] How unconscionably he gulls himself.— 190 They must be wealthy subsidy-men, sir, at least forty pound i'th' King's Books, I can tell you, that do such a feat for you.
Enter Shortyard and Falselight, like wealthy citizens in satin suits
 EASY Here they come, whatsoe'er they are.
 QUOMODO By'r'lady, alderman's deputies! I am very sorry 195 for you, sir; I cannot refuse such men.
 SHORTYARD Are you the gentleman in distress?
 EASY None more than myself, sir. [Takes Shortyard and Falselight aside]
 QUOMODO [aside] He speaks truer than he thinks, for if he 200 knew the hearts that owe those faces! A dark shop's good for somewhat.
 EASY That was all, sir.
 SHORTYARD And that's enough, for by that means you have made yourself liable to the bond, as well as that 205 Basefield.
 EASY Blastfield, sir.
 SHORTYARD O, cry you mercy, 'tis Blastfield indeed.
 EASY But, under both your worships' favours, I know where to find him presently.
 210 SHORTYARD That's all your refuge.
 [Enter Boy]
 BOY News, good news, Master Easy!
 EASY What, boy?
 BOY Master Blastfield, my master, has received a thousand pound, and will be at his lodging at supper.
 215 EASY Happy news! Hear you that, Master Quomodo?
 QUOMODO 'Tis enough for you to hear that, you're the fortunate man, sir.
 EASY Not now, I beseech your good worships.
 SHORTYARD Gentleman, what's your t'other name?
 220 EASY Easy.
 SHORTYARD O, Master Easy. I would we could rather pleasure you otherwise, Master Easy; you should soon perceive it. I'll speak a proud word: we have pitied more gentlemen in distress than any two citizens within the 225 freedom. But to be bail to seven hundred pound action is a matter of shrewd weight.
- EASY I'll be bound to secure you.
 SHORTYARD Tut, what's your bond, sir?
 EASY Body, goods, and lands, immediately before Master
 Quomodo. 230
 SHORTYARD Shall we venture once again, that have been so often undone by gentlemen?
 FALSELIGHT I have no great stomach to't; it will appear in us more pity than wisdom.
 EASY Why should you say so, sir? 235
 SHORTYARD I like the gentleman's face well; he does not look as if he would deceive us.
 EASY O, not I, sir!
 SHORTYARD Come, we'll make a desperate voyage once again; we'll try his honesty, and take his single bond, 240 of body, goods, and lands.
 EASY I dearly thank you, sir.
 SHORTYARD Master Quomodo!
 QUOMODO Your worships.
 SHORTYARD We have took a course to set your prisoner 245 free.
 QUOMODO Your worships are good bail; you content me.
 SHORTYARD Come then, and be a witness to a recullisance.
 QUOMODO With all my heart, sir.
 SHORTYARD Master Easy, you must have an especial care 250
 now to find out that Blastfield.
 EASY I shall have him at my lodging, sir.
 SHORTYARD The suit will be followed against you else.
 Master Quomodo will come upon us, and forsake you.
 EASY I know that, sir. 255
 SHORTYARD Well, since I see you have such a good mind to be honest, I'll leave some greater affairs, and sweat with you to find him myself.
 EASY
 Here, then, my misery ends.
 A stranger's kindness oft exceeds a friend's. Exeunt 260
 THOMASINE
 Thou art deceived, thy misery but begins;
 "To beguile goodness, is the core of sins."
 My love is such unto thee, that I die
 As often as thou drink'st up injury,
 Yet have no means to warn thee from't; for "he 265
 That sows in craft does rape in jealousy."
 [Exit above]

189 unconscionably egregiously190 subsidy-men see 3.4.96, note191 King's Books tax rolls194 alderman's deputies London was governed by twenty-six powerful aldermen and a Lord Mayor.200 owe own210 all your refuge your only hope218 Not now perhaps, 'Don't abandon me now'225 freedom see 1.3.48, note226 shrewd worrisome229–30 Body... Quomodo a 'statute merchant'; Easy would guarantee ('secure') the loan with both his 'body'
 (they could imprison him, see 3.4.81–2) and his property; this new obligation would take precedence over his bond with Quomodo231 venture In the context of 'undone',
 'stomach' (see 3.4.59, note), and 'face'
 (see 3.1.201, note), this suggests sodomy

(see 1.2.22, note).

240 single simple, sincere248 recullisance recognizance, a document acknowledging a debt and the terms of the bond254 Master... you Quomodo will have the £700 of us and we will then consider you in default (take your land).265–6 he... jealousy the crafty man is a suspicious man (see 4.1.120–1); punning on 'reap', to 'rape' is to take by force

3.5 [Enter Rearage and Salewood]
 REARAGE Now the letter's made up and all; it wants but the print of a seal, and away it goes to Master Quomodo. Andrew Lethe is well whipped in't; his name stands in a white sheet here, and does penance for him.
 5 SALEWOOD You have shame enough against him, if that be good.
 REARAGE First, as a contempt of that reverend ceremony he has in hand, to wit, marriage.
 SALEWOOD Why do you say, 'to wit, marriage', when you know there's none will marry that's wise?
 10 REARAGE Had it not more need, then, to have wit to put to't, if it be grown to a folly?
 SALEWOOD You've won, I'll give't you.
 REARAGE 'Tis no thanks now. But, as I was saying, as a foul contempt to that sacred ceremony, he most audaciously keeps a drab in town; and to be free from the interruption of blue beadles and other bawdy officers, he most politicly lodges her in a constable's house.
 20 SALEWOOD That's a pretty point i'faith.
 REARAGE And so the watch that should fetch her out are her chiefest guard to keep her in.
 SALEWOOD It must needs be, for look how the constable plays his conscience, the watchmen will follow the suit.
 25 REARAGE Why, well then.
Enter Easy with Shortyard, like a citizen
 EASY All night from me? He's hurt, he's made away!
 SHORTYARD Where shall we seek him now? You lead me fair jaunts, sir.
 EASY Pray, keep a little patience, sir. I shall find him at last, you shall see.
 30 SHORTYARD A citizen of my ease and substance to walk so long afoot!
 EASY You should ha' had my horse, but that he has eaten out his head, sir.
 35 SHORTYARD How? Would you had me hold him by the tail, sir, then?
 EASY Manners forbid! 'Tis no part of my meaning, sir. O, here's Master Rearage and Master Salewood; now we shall hear of him presently.—Gentlemen both.
 40 SALEWOOD Master Easy, how fare you, sir?

EASY Very well in health. Did you see Master Blastfield this morning?
 SALEWOOD I was about to move it to you.
 REARAGE We were all three in a mind, then.
 SALEWOOD I ha' not set eye on him these two days. 45
 REARAGE I wonder he keeps so long from us, i'faith.
 EASY I begin to be sick.
 SALEWOOD Why, what's the matter?
 EASY Nothing, in troth, but a great desire I had to have seen him. 50
 REARAGE I wonder you should miss on't lately; you're his bedfellow.
 EASY I lay alone tonight, i'faith. I do not know how—[Enter Lethe]
 O here comes Master Lethe; he can dispatch me. Master Lethe! 55
 LETHE What's your name, sir? O, cry you mercy, Master Easy.
 EASY When parted you from Master Blastfield, sir?
 LETHE Blastfield's an ass; I have sought him these two days to beat him. 60 EASY Yourself all alone, sir?
 LETHE I, and three more. Exit
 SHORTYARD [aside] I am glad I am where I am, then. I perceive 'twas time of all hands.
 REARAGE [to Salewood] Content, i'faith, let's trace him. 65
Exeunt after Lethe
 SHORTYARD What, have you found him yet? Neither? What's to be done now? I'll venture my body no further for any gentleman's pleasure; I know not how soon I may be called upon, and now to overheat myself—
 EASY I'm undone! 70
 SHORTYARD This is you that slept with him. You can make fools of us; but I'll turn you over to Quomodo for't.
 EASY Good sir—
 SHORTYARD I'll prevent mine own danger.
 EASY I beseech you, sir— 75
 SHORTYARD Though I love gentlemen well, I do not mean to be undone for 'em.
 EASY Pray, sir, let me request you, sir. Sweet sir, I beseech you, sir— Exeunt
Music. Finis Actus Tertius

3.5.1 letter's made up We never again hear of this letter; instead, Rearage plots with the Father (4.3.45-7).
 3-4 stands . . . sheet shames him in public
 5 shame scandalous information
 8 in hand in preparation
 14 'Tis . . . now Thanks for nothing.
 17 blue beadles parish officers who wore blue coats
 17-18 bawdy officers overseers of sexual offences
 18 politicly cunningly

constable's constable: a peace officer who serves writs, makes arrests, and supervises the 'watch' (3.5.21), the night patrol 21 fetch her out arrest her 23 look how however 24 follow the suit overlook the offence (the imagery is drawn from card playing)
 26 made away murdered
 28 jaunts fatiguing or troublesome journeys
 33-4 he . . . head he was forfeited in payment for his board; see 2.3.314-15

43 move . . . you ask you that 54 dispatch relieve; plays on 'make away with' or kill 63 where I am in disguise
 64 of all hands on all sides
 65 Content agreed; they pursue ('trace') Lethe
 67 venture hazard (see 3.4.231, note)
 69 called upon summoned for official duty or by death 74 prevent avoid, anticipate danger see 3.4.253-4

4.1

Incipit Actus Quartus

Enter Quomodo, his disguised spirits [Shortyard and Falselight as citizens], after whom Easy follows hard SHORTYARD Made fools of us! Not to be found!

QUOMODO What, what?

EASY Do not undo me quite, though, Master Quomodo.

QUOMODO You're very welcome, Master Easy. I ha' nothing to say to you; I'll not touch you, you may go when you please. I have good bail here, I thank their worships.

EASY What shall I say, or whom shall I beseech?

SHORTYARD Gentlemen! 'Slid, they were born to undo us, I think; but, for my part, I'll make an oath before Master Quomodo here, ne'er to do gentlemen good while I live.

FALSIGHT I'll not be long behind you.

SHORTYARD [to Easy] Away! If you had any grace in you, you would be ashamed to look us i'th' face, iwis! I wonder with what brow you can come amongst us. I should seek my fortunes far enough, if I were you, and neither return to Essex, to be a shame to my predecessors, nor remain about London, to be a mock to my successors.QUOMODO [aside] Subtle Shortyard!

SHORTYARD Here are his lands forfeited to us, Master Quomodo; and to avoid the inconscionable trouble of law, all the assurance he made to us, we willingly resign to you.

QUOMODO What shall I do with rubbish? Give me money! 'Tis for your worships to have land, that keep great houses; I should be hoisted.

SHORTYARD But, Master Quomodo, if you would but conceive it aright, the land would fall fitter to you than to us.

EASY [aside] Curts'ing about my land!

SHORTYARD You have a towardly son and heir, as we hear.

QUOMODO I must needs say, he is a Templar indeed.

SHORTYARD We have neither posterity in town, nor hope for any abroad; we have wives, but the marks have been out of their mouths these twenty years, and, as it appears, they did little good when they were in. We could not stand about it, sir; to get riches and children too, 'tis more than one man can do. And I am of those citizens' minds that say, let our wives make shift for children an they will, they get none of us; and I cannot think but he that has both much wealth and many children, has had more helps coming in than himself.

QUOMODO I am not a bow wide of your mind, sir. And for the thrifty and covetous hopes I have in my son and heir, Sim Quomodo, that he will never trust his land in wax and parchment, as many gentlemen have done before him—

EASY [aside] A by-blow for me.

QUOMODO I will honestly discharge you, and receive it in due form and order of law, to strengthen it forever to my son and heir, that he may undoubtedly enter upon't without the let or molestation of any man, at his or our pleasure whensoever.

SHORTYARD 'Tis so assured unto you.

QUOMODO Why, then, Master Easy, you're a free man, sir. You may deal in what you please and go whither you will.

[Enter Thomasine]

Why, Thomasine, Master Easy is come from Essex; bid him welcome in a cup of small beer.

THOMASINE [aside] Not only vile, but in it tyrannous.

QUOMODO If it please you, sir, you know the house; you may visit us often, and dine with us once a quarter.

EASY

Confusion light on you, your wealth and heir; Worms gnaw your conscience, as the moth your ware.

I am not the first heir that robbed or begged.

[Exit [with Thomasine following]]

QUOMODO

Excellent, excellent, sweet spirits!

SHORTYARD

Landed Master Quomodo!

QUOMODO

Delicate Shortyard, commodious Falselight,

Hug and away, shift, shift;

'Tis sleight, not strength, that gives the greatest lift.

[Exeunt Shortyard and Falselight]

4.1.3 quite completely

8 undo begins a cluster of doubles entendres that includes 'part', 'do', 'long behind' and 'come'

13 iwis certainly

14 brow effrontery, impudence

15 far far away

21 inconscionable unfair and unreasonable

22 assurance title to Easy's property (see 5.1.3)

26 hoisted overtaxed; assessed a surcharge

30 Curts'ing effusively polite

31 towardly promising

32 Templar see 2.3.452, note

34 abroad illegitimate children

34 marks depressions in the enamel of a horse's incisors which, as they gradually disappear, indicate the horse's advancing age

37 stand about it support it; have an erection

39 make shift manage

40 get beget

42 has... himself has been cuckolded

43 bow wide length of a bow, but Shortyard's bawdy may elicit this particular expression (see 2.1.111-17, note)

46 wax and parchment sealed documents

48 by-blow side-stroke; calamity; perhaps also playing on sense of 'illegitimate child'

52 let hindrance

59 small weak

61 house Easy's own estate

64 ware merchandise; but see 4.2.11, note

68 commodious profitable, handy

69 Hug... shift hug me, then shift shapes (change your disguises); also wrestling terms

70 lift means to trip up someone; elation; perhaps also playing on 'to lift', to rob

Now my desires are full—for this time.
Men may have cormorant wishes, but, alas,
A little thing, three hundred pound a year,
Suffices nature, keeps life and soul together.
75 I'll have 'em lopped immediately; I long
To warm myself by th' wood.
A fine journey in the Whitsun holidays, i'faith, to ride down with a number of citizens, and their wives, some upon pillions, some upon sidesaddles. I and little 80 Thomasine i'th' middle, our son and heir, Sim Quo-modo, in a peach-colour taffeta jacket, some horse-length or a long yard before us. There will be a fine show on's, I can tell you, where we citizens will laugh and lie down, get all our wives with child against a 85 bank, and get up again.—Stay, ha! Hast thou that wit, i'faith? 'Twill be admirable. To see how the very thought of green fields puts a man into sweet inventions. I will presently possess Sim Quomodo of all the land. I have a toy and I'll do't. And because I see before 90 mine eyes that most of our heirs prove notorious rioters after our deaths, and that cozenage in the father wheels about to folly in the son, our posterity commonly foiled at the same weapon at which we played rarely; and being the world's beaten word, what's got over the 95 devil's back (that's by knavery) must be spent under his belly (that's by lechery); being awake in these knowings, why should not I oppose 'em now, and break destiny of her custom, preventing that by policy, which without it must needs be destiny? And I have took the 100 course! I will forthwith sicken, call for my keys, make my will, and dispose of all. Give my son this blessing, that he trust no man, keep his hand from a quean and a scrivener, live in his father's faith, and do good to nobody. Then will I begin to rave like a fellow of a wide 105 conscience, and, for all the world, counterfeit to the life that which I know I shall do when I die: take on for my gold, my lands, and my writings, grow worse and worse, call upon the devil, and so make an end. By this time I have indented with a couple of searchers, who, to uphold my device, shall fray them out o'th' 110 chamber with report of sickness, and so, la, I start up, and recover again. For in this business I will trust, no, not my spirits, Falselight and Shortyard, but in disguise note the condition of all: how pitiful my wife takes my death, which will appear by November in her eye, and 115 the fall of the leaf in her body, but especially by the cost she bestows upon my funeral, there shall I try her love and regard; my daughter's marrying to my will and liking; and my son's affection after my disposing. For, to conclude, I am as jealous of this land as of my wife, to 120 know what would become of it after my decease. Exit

Enter Courtesan with her disguised Father

4.2

FATHER

Though I be poor, 'tis my glory to live honest.

COURTESAN

I prithee, do not leave me.

FATHER

To be bawd.

Hell has not such an office.

I thought at first your mind had been preserved

In virtue and in modesty of blood,

That such a face had not been made to please

The unsettled appetites of several men,

Those eyes turned up through prayer, not through lust;

But you are wicked, and my thoughts unjust.

COURTESAN Why thou art an unreasonable fellow, i'faith. 10

Do not all trades live by their ware, and yet called honest livers? Do they not thrive best when they utter most, and make it away by the great? Is not wholesale the chiefest merchandise? Do you think some merchants could keep their wives so brave but for their wholesale? 15

You're foully deceived an you think so.

FATHER

You are so glued to punishment and shame,

Your words e'en deserve whipping.

72 cormorant greedy
75 'em the trees (or their branches) on his property in Essex (see 2.3.375 and 3.4.15)
77 Whitsun Whit Sunday (Pentecost), seventh Sunday after Easter 79 pillions light saddles, or cushions attached to ordinary saddles (usually for women)
81 peach-colour taffeta expensive, fine silk fabric in a colour associated with pretentiousness
82 long yard a cloth measure 83-4 laugh...down 'laugh and lay down' was the name of a card game 85 bank river bank; also pile of money or money dealer's table (continues gaming imagery); this nearly completes a cluster of doubles entendres that begins with 'ride'
(l. 78, to mount in sexual intercourse) and includes 'pillions' (which were mounted to the rear), 'sidesaddles' (l.

79, mounted on the side), 'middle' (l.
80, genital area), 'horse-length or a long yard' (ll. 81-2, length of a long penis),
'lie' (l. 84, have sexual intercourse with),
and 'get up again' (l. 85)
88 possess put in possession
89 toy trifle, whim
93 rarely with uncommon excellence
94 beaten hackneyed; compare 1.3.12-13
94-6 what's...lechery proverbial, see Tilley,
D 316
98 policy craft, cunning
99-100 took the course found the way
100 keys see 2.3.482, note 104-5 wide conscience irrational, perhaps hypocritical nature
106 take on carry on 108 By prior to 109 indented compounded; made an agreement

searchers persons who examined dead bodies and reported on the cause of death 110 device scheme
fray frighten
111 sickness bubonic plague
115 November...eye tears, or gloom
116 fall of the leaf autumn; sadness
120 jealous compare 3.4.265-6
4.2.7 several various, sundry 9 unjust mistaken 11 ware merchandise, but also genitalia (of either sex; see 4.1.64)
12 utter sell
13 wholesale plays on 'hole sale' and 'make it away by the great'—in large quantities 15 brave dressed fashionably
18 whipping see 3.1.197, note

- To bear the habit of a gentlewoman,
And be in mind so distant.
- 20 COURTESAN Why, you fool you, are not gentlewomen sinners? And there's no courageous sinner amongst us, but was a gentlewoman by the mother's side, I warrant you. Besides, we are not always bound to think those our fathers that marry our mothers, but those that lie with our mothers, and they may be gentlemen born, and born again, for ought we know, you know.
- 25 FATHER True, corruption may well be generation's first; 'We're bad by nature, but by custom worst.' Exeunt
- 4.3 A bell tolls, a confused cry within
THOMASINE [within] O, my husband!
SIM [within] My father, O, my father!
FALSELIGHT [within] My sweet master, dead!
Enter Shortyard and the Boy
SHORTYARD Run boy, bid 'em ring out. He dead, he's gone.
5 BOY Then is as arrant a knave gone, as 'ere was called upon. [Exit]
SHORTYARD The happiest good that ever Shortyard felt, I want to be expressed, my mirth is such; To be struck now, e'en when his joys were high.
10 Men only kiss their knaveries, and so die, I've often marked it. He was a famous coz'ner while he lived, And now his son shall reap it; I'll ha' the lands, Let him study law after; 'tis no labour
15 To undo him forever. But for Easy, Only good confidence did make him foolish, And not the lack of sense, that was not it; 'Tis worldly craft beats down a scholar's wit. For this our son and heir now, he 20 From his conception was entailed an ass, And he has kept it well, twenty-five years now. Then the slightest art will do't; the lands lie fair: 'No sin to beggar a deceiver's heir.' Exit
Enter Thomasine with Winifred, her maid, in haste THOMASINE Here, Winifred, here, here, here. I have always 25 found thee secret.
WINIFRED You shall always find me so, Mistress.
THOMASINE Take this letter and this ring.
- WINIFRED Yes, forsooth.
THOMASINE O, how all the parts about me shake! Inquire for one Master Easy at his old lodging i'th' Blackfriars.
30 WINIFRED I will indeed, forsooth.
THOMASINE Tell him the party that sent him a hundred pound t'other day to comfort his heart has likewise sent him this letter and this ring, which has that virtue to recover him again forever, say. Name nobody, Winifred.
35 WINIFRED Not so much as you, forsooth.
THOMASINE Good girl. Thou shalt have a mourning gown at the burial, of mine honesty.
WINIFRED And I'll effect your will, o' my fidelity. Exit
THOMASINE I do account myself the happiest widow that ever counterfeited weeping, in that I have the leisure now, both to do that gentleman good, and do myself a pleasure; but I must seem like a hanging moon, a little waterish awhile.
Enter Rearage, Courtesan's Father following REARAGE I entertain both thee and thy device;
45 'Twill put 'em both to shame.
FATHER That is my hope, sir. Especially that strumpet. [Exit] REARAGE Save you, sweet widow! I suffer for your heaviness.
THOMASINE O, Master Rearage, I have lost the dearest husband that ever woman did enjoy.
50 REARAGE You must have patience yet.
THOMASINE O, talk not to me of patience an you love me, good Master Rearage.
REARAGE Yet, if all tongues go right, he did not use you so well as a man mought.
55 THOMASINE Nay, that's true indeed, Master Rearage. He ne'er used me so well as a woman might have been used, that's certain; in troth, 't'as been our greatest falling out, sir. And though it be the part of a widow to show herself a woman for her husband's death, yet when I remember all his unkindness, I cannot weep a stroke, i'faith, Master Rearage. And therefore wisely did a great widow in this land comfort up another: 'Go to, lady', quoth she, 'leave blubbering; thou thinkest upon thy husband's good parts when thou sheddest tears, do but remember how often he has lain from thee, and how many naughty slippery turns he has done thee,

19 habit clothing28 be...first begin with original sin ('nature') or in the act of generation29 custom habit4.3.0.1 bell the 'passing bell' tolls as Quomodo approaches death; once Falselight announces his master's death, Shortyard tells the Boy to order the death knell, to 'bid 'em ring out' (4.3.4)5 arrant thoroughgoing, unmitigated5-6 called upon summoned by death8 want...expressed haven't the words to express my joy9 struck see 2.3.86, note10 kiss approach but do not taste the fruits12 famous coz'ner see 5.3.2116 good confidence too much trust (compare 1.2.57)19 For as for20 entailed given to being as a result of his inheritance21 it his asininity22 art artifice, cunning30 Blackfriars London precinct (or liberty) between St Paul's Cathedral and the Thames38 of mine honesty oath; compare Winifred's 'o' my fidelity'43 hanging moon indicates a change of weather; shaped like a horn, the crescent moon was associated with cuckoldry45 entertain accept46 'em Lethe and the Courtesan54 use treat; have sexual relations with (compare 2.3.230 and 5.1.52-3)55 mought might60 show...woman weep61 unkindness meanness, but also unnatural behaviour65 parts see 3.1.164, note67 turns devices, tricks and thou wilt ne'er weep for him, I warrant thee.' You would not think how that counsel has wrought with me, Master Rearage; I could not dispend another tear now, an you would give me ne'er so much.

REARAGE Why, I count you the wiser widow. It shows you have wisdom, when you can check your passion. For mine own part, I have no sense to sorrow for his death, whose life was the only rub to my affection.

THOMASINE Troth, and so it was to mine. But take courage now; you're a landed gentleman, and my daughter is seven hundred pound strong to join with you.

REARAGE

But Lethe lies i'th' way.

THOMASINE

Let him lie still;

You shall tread o'er him or I'll fail in will.

REARAGE Sweet widow!

Exeunt

4.4 Enter Quomodo like a Beadle

QUOMODO What a beloved man did I live? My servants gall their fingers with wringing, my wife's cheeks smart with weeping, tears stand in every corner; you may take water in my house. But am not I a wise fool now? What if my wife should take my death so to heart, that she should sicken upon't, nay, swoon, nay, die? When did I hear of a woman do so? Let me see; now I remember me, I think 'twas before my time. Yes, I have heard of those wives that have wept, and sobbed, and swooned; marry, I never heard but they recovered again; that's a comfort, la, that's a comfort, and I hope so will mine. Peace, 'tis near upon the time. I see; here comes the worshipful livery. I have the Hospital Boys; I perceive little Thomasine will bestow cost of me.

I'll listen to the common censure now,
How the world tongues me when my ear lies low.

Enter the Livery [and Hospital Boys]

FIRST LIVERYMAN

Who, Quomodo? Merely enriched by shifts
And cozenages, believe it.

QUOMODO [aside]

I see the world is very loath to praise me,
'Tis rawly friends with me; I cannot blame it,
For what I have done has been to vex and shame it.
Here comes my son, the hope, the landed heir,
One whose rare thrift will say, "Men's tongues, you lie;
I'll keep by law what was got craftily."

[Enter Sim]

Methinks I hear him say so.

He does salute the livery with good grace

And solemn gesture.—

[To Sim] O, my young worshipful master, you have parted from a dear father, a wise and provident father.

SIM Art thou grown an ass now?

30

QUOMODO Such an honest father—

SIM Prithee, beadle, leave thy lying. I am scarce able to endure thee, i'faith. What honesty didst thou e'er know by my father? Speak. Rule your tongue, beadle, lest I make you prove it, and then I know what will become of you. 'Tis the scurviest thing i'th' earth to belie the dead so, and he's a beastly son and heir that will stand by and hear his father belied to his face; he will ne'er prosper, I warrant him. Troth, if I be not ashamed to go to church with him, I would I might be hanged; I hear such filthy tales go on him. O, if I had known he had been such a lewd fellow in his life, he should ne'er have kept me company.

QUOMODO [aside] O, O, O!

SIM But I am glad he's gone, though 'twere long first; Shortyard and I will revel it i'faith; I have made him my rent-gatherer already.

45

QUOMODO [aside] He shall be speedily disinherited; he gets not a foot, not the crown of a molehill. I'll sooner make a courtier my heir, for teaching my wife tricks, than thee. My most neglectful son! O, now the corse; I shall observe yet farther.

50

A counterfeit corse brought in, [followed by]

Thomasine, [Mother,] and all the mourners equally counterfeit

O, my most modest, virtuous, and rememb'ring wife; She shall have all when I die, she shall have all.

Enter Easy

THOMASINE [aside] Master Easy? 'Tis. O, what shift shall I make now? O! (She falls down in a feigned swoon)

55

QUOMODO [aside] Sweet wife, she swoons. I'll let her alone. I'll have no mercy at this time. I'll not see her; I'll follow the corse. Exit EASY The devil grind thy bones, thou cozening rascal! MOTHER Give her a little more air, tilt up her head.— Comfort thyself good widow; do not fall like a beast for a husband. There's more than we can well tell where to put 'em, good soul.

60

THOMASINE O, I shall be well anon.

65

MOTHER Fie, you have no patience, i'faith. I have buried four husbands, and never offered 'em such abuse.

THOMASINE Cousin, how do you?

EASY Sorry to see you ill, coz.

69 wrought with affected

70 dispend expend, shed

74 sense desire

75 rub obstacle (in bowls, an obstacle that turns aside the ball)

78 seven hundred pound her dowry (see 5.3.113)

4.4.0.1 Beadle see 3.5.17, note; beadles also oversaw funeral processions

1 gall chafe

4 take water travel by boat

12 time for the funeral procession to pass by

13 livery see 2.3.458, note

Hospital Boys the Boys of Christ's Hospital accompany the procession, singing psalms

15 censure estimate, judgement

16 tongues me speaks of me

17 shifts tricks, stratagems

20 rawly scarcely

42 lewd base, worthless

45 'twere long first it was long in coming

49 foot of land

50 teaching . . . tricks making me a cuckold

51 corse corpse

61 MOTHER an old woman, possibly a hired mourner

68 Cousin familiar form of address

- THOMASINE
The worst is past, I hope.
Pointing after the coffin
- 70 EASY I hope so too.
- THOMASINE
Lend me your hand, sweet coz, I have troubled you.
- MOTHER No trouble indeed, forsooth.—[To Easy] Good cousin, have a care of her, comfort her up as much as you can, and all little enough, I warrant ye.
Exeunt [Mother and Mourners]
- THOMASINE
My most sweet love!
- 75 EASY My life is not so dear.
- THOMASINE
I have always pitied you.
- EASY You've shown it here,
And given the desperate hope!
- THOMASINE Delay not now,
You've understood my love; I have a priest ready;
This is the fittest season, no eye offends us.
- 80 Let this kiss
Restore thee to more wealth, me to more bliss.
- EASY
The angels have provided for me. [Exeunt]
Finis Actus Quartus
- ⊗
- 5.1 Incipit Actus Quintus et Ultimus
Enter Shortyard with writings, having cozened Sim Quomodo
- SHORTYARD
I have not scope enough within my breast
To keep my joys contained; I'm Quomodo's heir,
The lands, assurances, and all are mine.
I have tripped his son's heels up above the ground
5 His father left him. Had I not encouragement?
Do not I know, what proves the father's prey,
The son ne'er looks on't, but it melts away?
Do not I know, the wealth that's got by fraud,
Slaves share it like the riches of a bawd?
10 Why, 'tis a curse unquenchable, ne'er cools;
Knives still commit their consciences to fools,
And they betray who owed 'em. Here's all the bonds,
All Easy's writings. Let me see.
- Enter Quomodo's wife [Thomasine] married to Easy*
- THOMASINE
Now my desires wear crowns.
EASY My joys exceed;
Man is ne'er healthful, till his follies bleed. 15
- THOMASINE
O, behold the villain, who in all those shapes Confounded your estate.
- EASY That slave! That villain!
- SHORTYARD [reading]
So many acres of good meadow—
- EASY Rascal!
- SHORTYARD
I hear you, sir. 20
- EASY
Rogue, Shortyard, Blastfield, sergeant, deputy, cozener!
- SHORTYARD
Hold, hold!
- EASY
I thirst the execution of his ears.
- THOMASINE
Hate you that office.
- EASY
I'll strip him bare for punishment and shame. 25
- SHORTYARD
Why do but hear me, sir; you will not think
What I have done for you.
- EASY Given his son my lands!
- SHORTYARD
Why look you, 'tis not so, you're not told true;
I have cozened him again merely for you,
Merely for you, sir; 'twas my meaning then 30
That you should wed her, and have all again.
O'my troth, it's true, sir; look you then here, sir.
Gives Easy the writings
You shall not miss a little scroll, sir. Pray, sir,
Let not the city know me for a knave;
There be richer men would envy my preferment, 35
If I should be known before 'em.
- EASY
Villain, my hate to more revenge is drawn.
When slaves are found, 'tis their base art to fawn.— [Calls] Within there!

72 No trouble Thomasine has asked Easy to help her up and then apologized to him, but the Mother assumes that Thomasine is apologizing to her; the mother thinks she is witnessing a taking of hands, a betrothal ceremony (4.4.72-4).
79 offends vexes
5.1.0.2 writings the deeds, conveyances of Easy's property, and original bonds; the 'assurances, and all' (5.1.3)
7 son puns on 'sun'

11 consciences the 'wide conscience[s]' (4.1.104-5) or hypocrisy they employ to benefit foolish heirs whom they hope will prove thrifty and lawful
12 they... 'em the fools betray the knaves who fathered, or 'owned', them
14 exceed are in excess of Thomasine's crowned desires 15 bleed drawing blood was a common medical treatment

16 shapes disguises
21 deputy see 3.4.194
23 ears criminals' ears were sometimes cut off (see 5.1.47)
24 office of the executioner
33 little scroll a single document
35 preferment promotion
36 before 'em to be more clever than they are 38 found discovered (also 5.1.41)

- [Enter Officers with Falselight bound]
- SHORTYARD
40 How now? Fresh warders!
- EASY
This is the other. Bind him fast.—Have I found you, Master Blastfield?
- SHORTYARD
This is the fruit of craft.
Like him that shoots up high, looks for the shaft,
And finds it in his forehead, so does hit 45 The arrow of our fate. Wit destroys wit;
The head the body's bane and his own bears.—
You have corn enough, you need not reap mine ears, Sweet Master Easy.
- EASY
I loathe his voice. Away!
Exit [Shortyard with Falselight and Officers]
- THOMASINE
50 What happiness was here! But are you sure you have all?
- EASY
I hope so, my sweet wife.
- THOMASINE
What difference there is in husbands, not only in one thing, but all.
- EASY
55 Here's good deeds and bad deeds, the writings that keep my lands to me, and the bonds that gave it away from me.
These, my good deeds, shall to more safety turn,
And these, my bad, have their deserts and burn.
I'll see thee again presently; read there. [Exit]
- THOMASINE
60 Did he want all, who would not love his care? [Reads]
Enter Quomodo [disguised as Beadle]
- QUOMODO [aside]
What a wife hast thou, Ephestian Quomodo.
So loving, so mindful of her duty, not only seen to weep, but known to swoon. I knew a widow about 65 Saint Antlings so forgetful of her first husband, that she married again within the twelvemonth; nay, some, by'r lady, within the month. There were sights to be seen! Had they my wife's true sorrows, seven months nor seven years would draw 'em to the stake. I would most tradesmen had such a wife as I; they hope they 70 have, we must all hope the best. Thus in her honour:
A modest wife is such a jewel,
Every goldsmith cannot show it;
He that's honest and not cruel
Is the likeliest man to owe it.
- And that's I. I made it by myself; and coming to her as a beadle for my reward this morning, I'll see how she takes my death next her heart.
THOMASINE
Now, beadle.
QUOMODO
Bless your mistress-ship's eyes from too many tears
Although you have lost a wise and worshipful gentleman.
THOMASINE
You come for your due, beadle, here i'th' 80 house?
QUOMODO
Most certain. The Hospital money and mine own poor forty pence.
THOMASINE
I must crave a discharge from you, beadle.
85 QUOMODO
Call your man. I'll heartily set my hand to a memorandum.
THOMASINE
You deal the trulier.
QUOMODO [aside]
90 Good wench still.
THOMASINE
George!
[Enter Servant]
Here is the beadle come for his money. Draw a memorandum that he has received all his due he can claim here i'th' house after this funeral.
QUOMODO [aside, while Servant writes] 95 What politic directions she gives him, all to secure herself. 'Tis time, i'faith, now to pity her. I'll discover myself to her ere I go; but came it off with some lively jest now, that were admirable. I have it! After the memorandum is written and all, I'll set my own name to't, Ephestian Quomodo.
She'll start; she'll wonder how Ephestian Quomodo 100 came thither, that was buried yesterday. You're beset, little Quomodo.
THOMASINE [counting out money]
Nineteen, twenty; five pound; one two, three; and fourpence.
QUOMODO [aside, while signing]
105 So, we shall have good sport when 'tis read. [Exit Servant]
[Enter Easy]
EASY
How now, lady, paying away money so fast?
THOMASINE
The beadle's due here, sir.
QUOMODO [aside]
Who? 'Tis Easy! What makes Easy in my house?
He is not my wife's overseer, I hope.
110 EASY
What's here?
QUOMODO [aside]
He makes me sweat.

40 Fresh warders more guards
41 other Shortyard, Falselight's accomplice 43 shaft arrow
46 bane destruction, woe
47 corn grain; wealth (fig.)
50 all the legal papers
53 one thing penis; compare 2.3.78 and 230, and 4.3.54–8
60 Did... all even if he had nothing; possible play on 'awl', for penis (see 5.1.50 and compare Master 'Alsup'— awl's up—2.1.10)
64 Saint Antlings St Antholin's Church, known for morning lectures attended by

Puritans
74 owe own
76 reward payment
83 Hospital money Quomodo, as Beadle, has been deputed to collect the boy singers' fees.
84 forty pence fee for participating in the funeral procession
85 discharge receipt
94 politic see 3.5.18, note
96 discover reveal
101 thither on the discharge beset under attack, assailed on all sides 102 little Quomodo Thomasine; because Quomodo frequently refers to 'little Thomasine' (see 2.3.437 and 4.4.14), this could be a compositor's error

103–4 Nineteen... fourpence The Hospital Boys get five pounds ('nineteen, twenty' are the last two shillings in the fifth pound; 20s. = one pound); the Beadle gets 3 shillings, 4 pence, or 40 pence (‘one, two, three’ are also shillings; 12 pence = 1s.).
110 overseer person appointed to supervise the executor of a will; for bawdy connotations, see 5.1.128, note

Act 5 Scene 1

Michaelmas Tearme.

EASY [reads] ‘Memorandum: that I have received of Richard Easy all my due I can claim here i’th’ house, or any hereafter for me. In witness whereof, I have set to mine own hand: Ephesian Quomodo.’

115 QUOMODO [aside] What have I done? Was I mad?

EASY Ephesian Quomodo?

QUOMODO

120 Ay, well, what then, sir? Get you out of my house; First, you Master Prodigal Had-land, away!

THOMASINE

What, is the beadle drunk or mad?

Where are my men to thrust him out o’ doors?

QUOMODO

Not so, good Thomasine, not so.

THOMASINE

This fellow must be whipped.

QUOMODO Thank you, good wife.

EASY

I can no longer bear him.

125 THOMASINE Nay, sweet husband.

QUOMODO [aside] Husband! I’m undone, beggared, cozened, confounded forever! Married already?—Will it please you know me now, Mistress Harlot and Master Horner? Who am I now?

130 [Discovers himself]

THOMASINE O, he’s as like my t’other husband as can be.

QUOMODO I’ll have judgement; I’ll bring you before a judge; you shall feel, wife, whether my flesh be dead or no. I’ll tickle you, i’faith, i’faith. Exit

THOMASINE

The judge that he’ll solicit knows me well.

EASY

135 Let’s on then, and our grievances first tell. Exeunt

5.2 Enter Lethe with Officers, taken with his Harlot; [Rearage and Susan looking on]

REARAGE

Here they come.

SUSAN

O, where?

LETHE

Heart of shame!

Upon my wedding morning, so disgraced!

Have you so little conscience, officers,

You will not take a bribe?

5 COURTESAN Master Lethe, we may lie together lawfully hereafter, for we are coupled together before people enough, i’faith.

[Exeunt Officers with Lethe and his Harlot]

REARAGE

There goes the strumpet.

SUSAN

Pardon my wilful blindness, and enjoy me; For now the difference appears too plain 10

Betwixt a base slave and a true gentleman.

REARAGE

I do embrace thee in the best of love.

[Aside] How soon affections fail, how soon they prove. [Exeunt]

Enter Judge, Easy and Thomasine in talk with him; [Shortyard and Falselight guarded by Officers] 5.3

JUDGE

His coz’nages are odious; he the plaintiff!

Not only framed deceitful in his life,

But so to mock his funeral!

EASY

Most just.

The livery all assembled, mourning weeds

Throughout his house e’en down to his last servant, 5

The herald richly hired to lend him arms

Feigned from his ancestors, which I dare swear knew

No other arms but those they laboured with.

All preparations furnished, nothing wanted

Save that which was the cause of all—his death. 10

If he be living!

JUDGE

’Twas an impious part.

EASY

We are not certain yet it is himself,

But some false spirit that assumes his shape

And seeks still to deceive me.

[Enter Quomodo]

QUOMODO [to Easy and Thomasine]

O, are you come?—

My lord!—[Looks to Shortyard and Falselight] They’re here. Good morrow, Thomasine. 15

JUDGE

Now, what are you?

QUOMODO

I am Quomodo, my lord, and this my wife;

Those my two men, that are bound wrongfully.

JUDGE

How are we sure you’re he?

QUOMODO

O, you cannot miss, my lord.

JUDGE

I’ll try you. 20

Are you the man that lived the famous coz’ner?

115 any anyone ‘dead’ quick demise of one’s trivial affections proves one’s worthiness’

120 First...away before I do anything else, 134 knows Has Thomasine had an affair with this judge? 5.3.4 weeds clothes

Had-land irresponsible heir 5.2.0.1 Officers They have arrested Lethe and the Courtesan at Rearage’s instigation (see 4.3.45-6). 6 richly at great cost; bribed

128 Master Horner one who gives a man horns, makes him a cuckold 9 enjoy me as your wife arms a coat of arms; puns on body part at 5.3.8

133 tickle beat, chastise; also, excite 13 How...prove ‘how fickle is love’ or ‘the 7 Feigned from as if derived from 11 part business, affair

QUOMODO
O no, my lord.

JUDGE
Did you deceive this gentleman of his right,
And laid nets o'er his land?

QUOMODO
Not I, my lord.

JUDGE
Then you're not Quomodo, but a counterfeit.
Lay hands on him, and bear him to the whip.

QUOMODO
Stay, stay a little,
I pray; now I remember me, my lord,
I cozened him indeed, 'tis wondrous true.

JUDGE
Then I dare swear this is no counterfeit;
Let all doubts cease, this man is Quomodo.

QUOMODO
Why, la, you now, you would not believe this.
I am found what I am.

JUDGE
But setting these thy odious shifts apart,
Why did that thought profane enter thy breast,
To mock the world with thy supposed death?

QUOMODO
Conceive you not that, my lord? A policy.

JUDGE
So.

QUOMODO
For, having gotten the lands, I thirsted still
To know what fate would follow 'em.

JUDGE
Being ill got.

QUOMODO
Your lordship apprehends me.

JUDGE
I think I shall anon.

QUOMODO
And thereupon,
I, out of policy, possessed my son,
Which since I have found lewd, and now intend
To disinherit him forever.
Not only this was in my death set down,
But thereby a firm trial of my wife,
Her constant sorrows, her rememb'ring virtues;
All which are dew; the shine of a next morning
Dries 'em up all, I see't.

JUDGE
Did you profess wise cozenage, and would dare
To put a woman to her two days' choice,
When oft a minute does it?

QUOMODO
Less! A moment,

The twinkling of an eye, a glimpse, scarce something does it.

Your lordship yet will grant she is my wife?

THOMASINE
O heaven!

JUDGE
After some penance, and the dues of law
I must acknowledge that.

QUOMODO
I scarce like
Those dues of law.

EASY
My lord,
Although the law too gently 'lot his wife,
The wealth he left behind he cannot challenge.

QUOMODO
How?

EASY
Behold his hand against it. [Shows memorandum]

QUOMODO
He does devise all means to make me mad,
That I may no more lie with my wife
In perfect memory. I know't, but yet
The lands will maintain me in my wits;
The land will do so much for me.

JUDGE [reading] 'In witness whereof I have set to mine own hand: Ephestian Quomodo.'

'Tis firm enough your own, sir.

QUOMODO
A jest, my lord, I did I knew not what.

JUDGE
It should seem so. Deceit is her own foe, Craftily gets, and childishly lets go.
But yet the lands are his.

QUOMODO
I warrant ye.

EASY
No, my good lord, the lands know the right heir;
I am their master once more.

QUOMODO
Have you the lands?

EASY
Yes, truly, I praise heaven.

QUOMODO
Is this good dealing?
Are there such consciences abroad? How?
Which way could he come by 'em?

SHORTYARD
My lord,
I'll quickly resolve you that, it comes to me.
This coz'ner, whom too long I called my patron,
To my thought dying, and the fool, his son,
Possessed of all, which my brain partly sweat for,
I held it my best virtue, by a plot
To get from him what for him was ill got—

33 found...am found to be myself, what I really am (a cozener) 41 apprehends understands, but also 'arrests'
44 lewd base, worthless
46 set down intended
49 shine sunshine

51 profess practice
58 acknowledge assent to the legal force of 60 'lot allot, dispose of 61 challenge lay claim to 66 In perfect memory because she has slept with Easy 75 yet...his the Essex estate is still Quo-modo's 81 resolve explain, settle that how Easy regained his estate

it...me the job of explaining is rightly mine 83 To my thought as far as I knew

	QUOMODO		SALEWOOD
	O, beastly Shortyard!		He speaks no truth, my lord; behold the virgin,	115
	SHORTYARD	When, no sooner mine,	Wife to a well-esteemed gentleman,
	But I was glad more quickly to resign.		Loathing the sin he follows.
	JUDGE		LETHE
	Craft once discovered shows her abject line.		I was betrayed, yes, faith.
	QUOMODO [aside]		REARAGE [to the Judge, completing an aside]
90	He hits me everywhere, for craft, once known,		... His own mother, my lord,	120
	Does teach fools wit, leaves the deceiver none.		Which he confessed, through ignorance and disdain,
	My deeds have cleft me, cleft me!		His name so changed to abuse the world and her.
	Enter Officers with Lethe and the Harlot, [Rearage, Salewood, the pander Hellgill, Mother Gruel, and Susan follow]		LETHE [aside]
	FIRST OFFICER		Marry a harlot, why not? 'Tis an honest
	Room there!		man's fortune. I pray, did not one of my countrymen	125
	QUOMODO [aside]		marry my sister? Why, well then, if none should be
	A little yet to raise my spirit.		married but those that are honest, where should a man
	Here's Master Lethe comes to wed my daughter.		seek a wife after Christmas? I pity that gentleman that
95	That's all the joy is left me.—Ha! Who's this?		has nine daughters to bestow, and seven of 'em seeded
	JUDGE		already; they will be good stuff by that time.—
	What crimes have those brought forth?		I do beseech your lordship to remove
	SALEWOOD	The shame of lust;	The punishment. I am content to marry her.	130
	Most viciously on this his wedding morning,		JUDGE
	This man was seized in shame with that bold strumpet.		There's no removing of your punishment.
	JUDGE		LETHE
	Why, 'tis she he means to marry.		O, good my lord!
	LETHE	No, in truth.	JUDGE
	JUDGE		Unless one here assembled,
	In truth, you do.		Whom you have most unnaturally abused,
	Who, for his wife, his harlot doth prefer,		Beget your pardon.
	Good reason 'tis that he should marry her.		LETHE
100	COURTESAN		Who should that be?
	I crave it on my knees, such was his vow at first.		Or who would do't, that has been so abused?	135
	HELLGILL [aside]		A troublesome penance.—[To Quomodo] Sir—
	I'll say so too, and work out mine own safety.—		QUOMODO
105	Such was his vow at first, indeed, my lord,		Knave in your face! Leave your mocking, Andrew;
	Howe'er his mood has changed him!		Marry your quean and be quiet!
	LETHE	O, vile slave!	LETHE
	COURTESAN		Master Easy—
	He says it true, my lord.		EASY
	JUDGE	Rest content,	I'm sorry you take such a bad course, sir.
	He shall both marry and taste punishment.		LETHE
	LETHE	O, intolerable! I beseech your good lordship; if I	Mistress Quomodo—	140
110	must have an outward punishment, let me not marry		THOMASINE
	an inward, whose lashes will ne'er out, but grow worse		Inquire my right name against next time; now and worse. I have a wife stays for me this morning with		go your ways like an ass as you came.
	seven hundred pound in her purse. Let me be speedily		LETHE [aside] whipped and be gone, I beseech your lordship.		Mass! I forget my mother all this while.
			I'll make her do't at first.—Pray, mother,
			Your blessing for once.
			MOTHER GRUEL
			Call'st me mother? Out,	145
			I defy thee, slave.
			LETHE
			Call me slave
			As much as you will, but do not shame me now;
			Let the world know you are my mother.
			MOTHER GRUEL
			Let me not have this villain put upon me,

89 abject line wretched ways

101 for instead of

103 at first when we first met

111 ne'er out never disappear

116 Wife Susan and Rearage have married between this and the previous scene.

119–21 His...her possibly a corrupt passage; Rearage is explaining Lethe's deceptions to the Judge

123 countrymen see 2.3.11, note

125 honest virgins

126 after Christmas after a period of festive license

127 bestow marry off

seeded impregnated

128 stuff see 3.1.206, note

137 Knave...face I call you knave to your face

141 Inquire...time Thomasine still aims to leave Quomodo for Easy.

146 defy repudiate, despise

149 put upon imposed on

Michaelmas Tearme

SERVANT (3.1; 3 lines): any but Tailor, Comings, Country Wench, Hellgill, Father, [Lethe, Shortyard, Rearage]

WINIFRED (4.3; 5 lines): any but Thomasine [Shortyard, Rearage, Father]

MOTHER (4.4; 9 lines): any but Quomodo, liveryman, hospital boy, Sim, Thomasine, mourner, Easy

FIRST LIVERYMAN (4.4; 2 lines): any but Quomodo, mother, hospital boy, Sim, Thomasine, mourner, Easy

MOURNER (4.4; no lines): any but Quomodo, liveryman, hospital boy, Sim, Thomasine, mother, Easy

HOSPITAL BOY (4.4; no lines): any but Quomodo, liveryman, mother, Sim, Thomasine, mourner, Easy

SERVANT (5.1; no lines): any but Quomodo, Thomasine, [Easy]

Induction roles (75 lines): any but another Induction part, [Rearage, Salewood]

A TRICK TO CATCH THE OLD ONE

Edited by Valerie Wayne

THIS play is one of Middleton's finest achievements in comedy. In 1886 Swinburne pronounced it 'by far the best play Middleton had yet written, and one of the best he ever wrote'; in 1927 T. S. Eliot included it among the five plays marking Middleton as a 'great' dramatist, only one other of which, The Roaring Girl, was a comedy. Gerard Langbaine thought it 'an Excellent Old Play' in 1691 (Sara Jayne Steen), and in 1960 R. H. Parker termed its plot 'a triumph of ironic construction'. Although Victorian critics questioned its morality—a reviewer of Bullen's Works of Thomas Middleton complained that the play's 'considerable humour . . . is of the kind that one cannot retell in polite society'—contemporary audiences, often less accustomed to politesse and more attuned to politics, have appreciated its treatments of early modern greed and the triumphs it offers to figures of youth and wit as they outmanoeuvre age and avarice. The play represents mercenary marriage as a socially sanctioned form of theft, one that the courtesan successfully reappropriates in her own best interest through her disguise as a rich widow. When Hoard inadvertently marries a 'whore', the thieving usurer is then caught in his own trap.

Trick was successfully adapted during the seventeenth century for Lording Barry's Ram Alley (1607–8) and Philip Massinger's A New Way to Pay Old Debts (1625). A Restoration production of the play between 1662 and 1665 (John Downes) may have been prompted by parallels between its plot and events surrounding the notorious Mary Carleton, who was tried for bigamy in 1663 at the Old Bailey for disguising herself as a German princess in order to entrap John Carleton in marriage, who also tried to entrap her. The case gained such wide public attention that it occasioned fourteen pamphlets and a play in 1663 and more publications ten years later, when Mary was tried again and hanged for theft (Janet Todd and Elizabeth Spearing). Aphra Behn, the first professional woman dramatist, then reworked A Trick to Catch the Old One and A Mad World, My Masters for her 1682 comedy, The City Heiress (Marston Stevens Balch). Her play opens with the same conflict between an uncle and his profligate nephew and concludes with the uncle's discovery that he has married his heir's 'cast-off mistress'. Behn extends Middleton's critique of the economy of marriage by making its connections with rape and theft even more explicit and adding two more female leads. Yet Wilding, Witgood's counterpart, also grows into the Restoration rake, and the celebration of his rampant virility mutes the play's social critique and appropriates it for royalist politics (Wayne, 'Assuming Gentility').

The intimate collusion between an elegant young woman and a fine gentleman, who pays her for her sexual services while a maid arranges a bed in a well-appointed interior. The inscription warns the viewer of the harm that comes from touch. Tactus (Touch), from a series of five prints representing the senses by Cornelis van Kittensteyn, after Dirck Hals, engraved between 1630 and 1663.

Revivals of Trick in the second half of the twentieth century occurred on average every five or six years. A 1964 staging in Dorset used modern dress and an all-male cast; another at Toronto in 1976 used an all-female cast. Commercial productions were mounted at the Mermaid Theatre in London in 1952, at the Theatr Clwyd in Wales in 1978, and the Bear Gardens Museum in 1985 (Lisa Cronin and Marilyn Roberts). The playwright Peter Barnes prepared an adaptation for a BBC Radio production of 1985 by bringing the allusions and jokes alive for a modern audience (Bernard Dukore). A company called Instant Classics mounted a modern dress production at London's White Bear Pub in 1994 that cut the Dampit scenes, changed one of the creditors to a woman, and based the set design on the children's game of Snakes and Ladders (Michael Neuman).

The early performance and publication history of Middleton's play also indicates a good reception from its very first audiences. Trick was probably written in 1605; it was performed by the Children of Paul's before that company ceased playing in July of 1606, after which it was trans-

'He that doth his youth expose | To brothel, drink, and danger, | Let him that is his nearest kin | Cheat him before a stranger' (Trick I.I.15-18). Engraving from The Parable of the Prodigal Son, a series of six prints. Number 3, 'The son wasting his heritage with riotous living'. By Crispijn de Passe the elder. Late 16th or early 17th century.

ferred to the other boys' company at the Blackfriars. Two of its title-pages refer to a New Year's night performance at court before James I, most likely in 1607 or 1608. The play was licensed for publication in October 1607 at the same time as The Revenger's Tragedy and presumably printed after that play late in 1607 or early in 1608. George Eld printed three title-pages for the edition dated 1608: the first, which was cancelled, identifies it as performed by the Children of Paul's; the revised title-pages exist in two different states, both of which add performances at Blackfriars and before the King, identify 'T.M.' as the author, and name Henry Rocket as the bookseller. The play was going through Eld's press just months after three other comedies that he printed had also been released for publication from Paul's, but only Trick had additional performances by the Blackfriars boys. A second edition appeared eight years later in 1616, suggesting that the first edition sold relatively well.

Trick is one of the citizen comedies that Middleton was especially known for developing at Paul's. Plays of that genre locate their action in London and in citizen culture, from which they offer urbane critiques of their society's manners and morals; they lack the 'satirical bite' of those designed for the Blackfriars, where 'railing' plays were being produced instead (Andrew Gurr). Yet this play's transfer to the Blackfriars shows its versatility and broad appeal. Both theatres provided small and select indoor settings, where seats were expensive and the audience consisted in large measure of students from the Inns of Court, more established aristocrats and gentry, some citizens and probably their wives. Michael Shapiro remarks that plays from the boys' companies 'ridiculed not only the usual collection of pedants, parasites, and parvenus, but figures of authority resembling more closely than ever what spectators were, might become, or thought themselves to be'. When Middleton represents a young man's drive to secure his fortune through inheritance and marriage, and an old man's relish for becoming a landed, country gentleman, he is staging the 'forces of appetite and materialist opportunism' that were released by the lure of social mobility and an inflationary economy increasingly fuelled by credit (Brian Gibbons).

Both Roman and English traditions are evident in the play. An affinity with urban life marks one connection with the comedies of Plautus and Terence (Gail Kern Paster), and although no single source for Trick has been found, many features of Roman comedy can be identified. Dryden's description of the New Comedy adulescens as a 'Debauch'd Son, kind in his Nature to his Mistress, but miserably in want of Money', suits Witgood quite well. He and Jane, his mistress, for whom there are countless counterparts among the courtesans of Roman comedy, succeed in overthrowing the plans of not one but two senex figures, Hoard and Lucre. Added to this Roman tradition is the English dramatic heritage of the morality play, used here in the form of the prodigal son parable, which was often staged in the sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries (A. B. Stonex, George Rowe). The play also draws on English social satire. Middleton knew the coney-catching pamphlets of Robert Greene, narratives of low-life characters who tricked or 'cozened' their unsuspecting prey, and he had used them in other early comedies. The usurer was also a frequent figure in verse satires of the 1590s. Even the jest books could have provided him with material.

The drive of Trick as it advances without pause from one intrigue to the next comes not only from Middleton's ability to imitate older literary conventions but from the rooting of its incidents in the material contrivances of his own day. The character of Dampit forms the centre of a graphic tableau of Jacobean London alive with lawyers claiming fees they have not earned and creditors bent on inducing debt. What has sometimes been called Middleton's 'realism' is a controlled representation of a society fractured by the sale of women in marriage and the theft of earnings and inheritance by the agents of usury. The play offers the pleasure of seeing those who engage in both kinds of theft—Hoard and Lucre in particular—duped by their own greed into acts of uncharacteristic generosity. The happy ending in which they learn they have been gulled implies a strong judgement against them and their vices, while the audience shares in the glee of those who gulled them.

So it is difficult to sympathize with Victorian laments of the absence of morality in this play. It is true that Witgood has led a dissolute life before the play begins. He and Jane are motivated more from desires for survival than selflessness, but not to like them is to resist the cleverest and even kindest characters in this dissolute community. Jane's indefinite past is another source of disapproval, because she has often been dismissed as a 'whore' without an understanding of the diverse ways that word was used in early modern culture. Laura Gowing explains that in the 'language of insult' then current, 'the word "whore" rarely meant a real prostitute'. As some of the play's critics have noted, and as Aphra Behn's adaption implies, Jane is not a professional prostitute but Witgood's mistress: she has been financially supported by him in return for sex and companionship without the prospect of marriage. In the very first scene she makes it clear that she lost her virginity to Witgood (1.1.37–40), and in the very last Witgood says she has slept only with him (5.2.159–60). Yet since virginity was a requirement for respectable first marriages and Jane has had sexual experience outside of marriage, in early modern culture she is considered a 'whore'.

Witgood says 'she's a whore' at 5.2.111, but when Hoard charges her with being a 'common strumpet' fifteen lines later, Witgood objects:

Nay, now
You wrong her, sir. If I were she, I'd have
The law on you for that. I durst depose for her

She ne'er had common use, nor common thought.
(5.2.125–8)

From her position as a wife at the play's conclusion, Jane would be capable of bringing a suit of slander against Hoard in an ecclesiastical court because she was not promiscuous nor had a reputation for being so. A common strumpet or prostitute was usually poorly compensated for her sexual services and worked with little protection or maintenance; as an insult the term 'strumpet' implied 'a (very) wanton woman' (Eric Partridge). The speech headings and stage directions in the early texts of Trick identify Jane as a 'courtesan', and courtesans were originally attached to the court, so the term had upper-class associations. In Edward Sharpham's 1606 satire The Fleer, the lead character remarks, 'Your whore is for every rascal, but your courtesan is for your courtier' (2.1.184–5). Yet the word 'courtesan' was more often used in England to name one who functioned as a mistress or had relatively few sexual partners. Even the female character named Frank Gullman, the courtesan in A Mad World, My Masters whose maidenhead has been sold fifteen times, has been 'kept' by various men rather than commonly available, which is why the sale of her virginity can continue and Follywit can be duped into marrying her. In G. R. Quaipe's classification of English prostitutes, Middleton's courtesan is closest to a 'private whore' (others being 'vagrant', 'public', and 'village' whores); yet she is also very different from the famous Venetian courtesans described in Coryat's Crudities (1611). Whether Italian or English, professional or private, 'courtesans' were not usually seen as 'common' and were very different from 'strumpets', unless one was reducing women to their sexually lowest, most common denominator. Hoard's slander in the presence of witnesses was an actionable offence in early modern England.

Jane assumes three different subject positions in the play: she is Witgood's mistress, a feigned rich widow named Jane Meddler, and a wife named Jane Hoard. We never learn her 'real' name. But the speech heading 'courtesan' fixes her in ways that make it difficult for readers to observe these shifts in identity and grounds a misconception of the character's sexual inconstancy, constructing for the contemporary reader a woman who makes her living by sexual commerce and is generally available to men. This situation has led most readers to think like Hoard about the character, which makes the correction and exposure of Hoard largely incomprehensible. An editorial fidelity to the original text thereby produces, for a modern audience, a de facto collusion with Hoard's view of Jane. Yet in performance this character is constructed not by an abstract social label, but by the recurrence of a physical body. Members of a theatre audience can alter their perceptions of the character as she changes more readily than a silent reader can, since the textual label is a constant reminder of her first identity. A familiar proper name is, however, about as individualized as a physical body without specifying a social role. For all of these reasons (discussed more fully in Wayne, 'Sexual Politics'), I have altered the speech headings in this edition to 'Jane' so that the subject positions of the character are associated with a name rather than a misleading occupational or sexual category.

Without such a change, it has been impossible for almost everyone to understand Jane's own charge against Hoard at the end of the play:

If in disgrace you share, I sought not you.
 You pursued me, nay, forced me.
 Had I friends would follow it,
 Less than your action has been proved a rape.
 (5.2.131-4)

Understanding this passage depends on recognizing the actions in scene 3.1 as a spousal or marriage contract between Hoard and Jane complete with a handfast, verbal agreements before witnesses, a kiss, and the naming of Jane by Hoard as 'wife'. The contract is later confirmed by a formal ceremony with a priest and is followed by a sexual consummation. We learn from a conversation between Hoard, Lamprey, and Spitchcock in 3.3 that Hoard's friends are proud of the way they pushed Jane into conceding to the spousal.

The forced marriage and rape of women of substance was sufficiently frequent in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries to prompt a sequence of statutes against such practices. Given the ease and speed with which spousals in England could be contracted, women of substance who were unmarried or femes soles were at particular risk of being forced into marriage by men who wanted to gain control of their wealth. The function of scene 3.3 in the play is to provide support for Jane's charge that she was so compelled. We know that she prefers to be married to Hoard because he is her best option since she has lost her virginity to Witgood, and he actively encourages her to accept Hoard's offer because he will not marry her. Hoard does not know as much, however, so her accusation represents a serious threat. Jane's charge of rape has also been ignored because she was thought to have made her living by sexual commerce, yet early modern English legal texts show that even prostitutes were entitled to claim that they had been raped. According to Michael Dalton writing in the early seventeenth century and citing a thirteenth-century legal historian, a 'whore' who said 'no' to a man was not, at that time, considered to be a 'whore', so the legal definition of 'whore' was malleable and reflected the disposition of a woman's sexuality in a given instance more than her reputation or occupation. A judgement issued in the trial of the Earl of Castlehaven in 1631 showed less flexibility in defining 'whore' but granted legal rights to a woman so considered: 'it is the enforcing against the will which makes the Rape; and the common whore may be ravished against her will' (Complete Collection of State Trials; Wayne, 'Sexual Politics').

The word 'rape' at this time was also used to describe two different events: what we now call rape—forced sexual relations, and the act of abduction (T. E., Law's Resolutions). Jane's accusation of rape concerns Hoard's plan to take her to Cole Harbour for a quick marriage, which he explicitly plans to conduct like an abduction (3.1.220-5). Her assent to his plan is ambiguous (3.1.226), as is her agreement to the spousal, 'I promise you, I ha' nothing' (3.1.205). This response prevents Hoard from claiming that she has deceived him about her wealth, but he reads her 'nothing' as a sexual lure, a modest understatement, or both. Hoard's feigned attempt at abduction is therefore at risk of being transformed into a legal reality by a very clever woman whose knowledge of the law is so precise that she can use every opportunity that comes to hand against him. His readiness to manipulate her shows he has given no thought to whether she desires the spousal or participates willingly in the abduction and the sexual consummation, and in the end he is yoked to a wife who has her own desires and has in turn manipulated him. Jane effectively conceals her agency until her position as wife is secure; then she activates her new status in her own defence.

After her charge of rape, Jane weighs her own mistakes against Hoard's and finds her sexual sins no more reprehensible than his coercion. Hoard then admits that her public dishonour and his own are so inextricably linked that their names can only be cleared by his treating her as a respectable wife. The 'whoring' of Hoard calls into question the opposition between good women and whores, as Anthony Dawson has observed, for if a whore can play the role of rich widow so well that she actually becomes a wife, then the difference between the two collapses and the very men who insisted on it, having taken the one for the other, become the means by which the difference is undone. This imitation of a legitimate woman in the marriage market by a marginal figure termed a 'whore' manages to highlight the ways in which marriageable women are treated as whores, because they also are bought and sold like property and for property (Margot Heine-mann). The malleability of women's identities in the play therefore threatens some important social institutions—marriage, property, and inheritance. Hence it is not only usury that is staged in Trick; the play also exhibits the early modern commodities market in women. Jane and Witgood promise reform in the playful rhymes of the play's last lines, but it is Hoard whose 'craft' has exposed him as the play's biggest 'fool' (5.2.204). Though some might call him a villain, Jane and Witgood both have reason to be more generous, so the play draws quickly to a comic and parodic close. And what could be more important than consuming the wedding meal before it cools?

SEE ALSO

Music: Companion, 140
 Textual introduction and apparatus: Companion, 562
 Authorship and date: Companion, 354

A Trick To Catch The Old One

[for the Children of Paul's]

THE PERSONS OF THE PLAY

Theodorus WITGOOD, a gentleman in debt
JANE, Witgood's mistress
HOST, friend to Witgood
Three CREDITORS of Witgood

Pecunius LUCRE, Witgood's uncle, a usurer
Jenny, WIFE to Lucre
SAM Freedom, son of Lucre's wife and suitor to Joyce
FIRST and SECOND GENTLEMEN, friends to Lucre
GEORGE, Lucre's servant

Walkadine HOARD, usurer and rival to Lucre
Joyce, NIECE to Walkadine and Onesiphorus Hoard
MONEYLOVE, suitor to Joyce
ONESIPHORUS Hoard, brother to Walkadine Hoard

LIMBER, friend to Onesiphorus Hoard
KIX, friend to Onesiphorus Hoard
SERVANT to Walkadine Hoard
ARTHUR, another servant to Walkadine Hoard
Lady FOXSTONE, friend to Walkadine Hoard

LAMPREY, a gentleman
SPITCHCOCK, a gentleman

Harry DAMPIT, a usurer
AUDREY, Dampit's servant
GULF, a usurer and acquaintance of Dampit
Sir LANCELOT, acquaintance of Dampit

Drawer, Vintner, Boy, Scrivener, Sergeants, Tailor, Barber, Perfumer, Falconer, Huntsman

I. I Incipit Actus Primus

Enter Witgood, a gentleman, solus

WITGOOD All's gone! Still thou'rt a gentleman, that's all; but a poor one, that's nothing. What milk brings thy meadows forth now? Where are thy goodly uplands and thy downlands? All sunk into that little pit, lechery.
5 Why should a gallant pay but two shillings for his ordinary that nourishes him, and twenty times two for his brothel that consumes him? But where's Long-acre?

In my uncle's conscience, which is three years' voyage about. He that sets out upon his conscience ne'er finds the way home again—he is either swallowed in the quicksands of law quilllets, or splits upon the piles of a praemunire. Yet these old fox-brained and ox-browed uncles have still defences for their avarice and apologies for their practices, and will thus greet our follies:

He that doth his youth expose
To brothel, drink, and danger,

10

15

This commentary foregrounds issues relating to women, marriage, social class, and sexual commerce.

Title A trick was an artifice or ruse used to deceive or cheat and could also refer to a course of lovemaking or a sexual act. Jane's appearance immediately after Witgood calls for 'any trick out of the compass of law' at I. I. 27–8 confirms her part in the scheme that she and Witgood devise for their elders, which certainly has a sexual component. However, the meaning of trick as a prostitute's client seems not to have been current until the twentieth century. The old one refers not only to Lucre and Hoard but to the devil. Usurers, including Dampit, are consistently associated with the devil in the play.

I. I. I gentleman a man of good but noble birth entitled to bear arms, whose wealth often derived from land

2–4 milk . . . pit Witgood's imagery describes a feminized landscape where milk rather than rain promotes the growth of his meadows and uplands, downlands, and little pit evoke locations on the female body. The wealth of his lands has subsided into the genital site of woman's sexuality.

4 lechery promiscuous sexual indulgence
5 two shillings A shilling was worth twelve pence; twenty shillings made up a pound. Two shillings could buy a meal at a quite expensive eating house or service at an inexpensive brothel.

6 ordinary an eating house that served a fixed-price meal, or the meal itself

6–7 nourishes . . . consumes The juxtaposition between food that nourishes for a small amount of money and sex that consumes at a much higher rate obscures Witgood's voluntary engagement in both activities. He is demonizing his expensive brothel and characterizing himself as its victim. Brothel could apply either to a place of prostitution or to the prostitute who worked there.

7 Long-acre a general term for an estate or patrimony

8–12 conscience . . . praemunire Lucre's conscience is like the ocean that swallows one in legal quibbles or shipwrecks one on legal obstacles.

I I quilllets legal quibbles or technicalities piles pilings or rocks

12 praemunire a sheriff's writ ox-browed (a) cuckolded, because of the ox's horns, (b) stupid, by association with the ox's bovine nature

13 still always

15–18 He . . . stranger The passage inverts Deuteronomy 23: 19–20, which prohibits usurers from lending money to family members but not to strangers.

Let him that is his nearest kin
 Cheat him before a stranger.
 And that's his uncle, 'tis a principle in usury. I dare not visit the city. There I should be too soon visited by 20 that horrible plague, my debts, and by that means I lose a virgin's love, her portion and her virtues. Well, how should a man live now, that has no living, hum?
 Why, are there not a million of men in the world that 25 only sojourn upon their brain and make their wits their mercers? And am I but one amongst that million and cannot thrive upon't? Any trick out of the compass of law now would come happily to me.

Enter Jane

JANE My love.
 30 WITGOOD My loathing! Hast thou been the secret consumption of my purse, and now com'st to undo my last means, my wits? Wilt leave no virtue in me and yet thou ne'er the better?
 Hence courtesan, round-webbed tarantula,
 35 That driest the roses in the cheeks of youth.
 JANE I have been true unto your pleasure, and all your lands, thrice racked, was never worth the jewel which I prodigally gave you: my virginity.
 Lands mortgaged may return and more esteemed,
 40 But honesty, once pawned, is ne'er redeemed.
 WITGOOD Forgive. I do thee wrong
 To make thee sin, and then to chide thee for't.

JANE

I know I am your loathing now. Farewell.

WITGOOD

Stay, best invention, stay.

JANE I that have been the secret consumption of your 45 purse, shall I stay now to undo your last means, your wits? Hence courtesan, away!

WITGOOD I prithee, make me not mad at my own weapon.
 Stay. (A thing few women can do, I know that, and therefore they had need wear stays.) Be not contrary.
 50 Dost love me? Fate has so cast it that all my means I must derive from thee.

JANE From me? Be happy then.

What lies within the power of my performance
 Shall be commanded of thee.

WITGOOD

Spoke like
 An honest drab, i'faith; it may prove something.
 What trick is not an embryo at first,
 Until a perfect shape come over it?

JANE

Come, I must help you. Whereabouts left you?
 I'll proceed.

Though you beget, 'tis I must help to breed.
 Speak, what is't? I'd fain conceive it.

WITGOOD So, so, so. Thou shall presently take the name and form upon thee of a rich country widow, four hundred a year valiant, in woods, in bullocks, in barns, 65

20 the city London

22 lose...virtues Witgood assumes that he would not be able to marry Joyce if his indebtedness were known or if he were imprisoned for debt.

portion dowry. Witgood's interest in Joyce seems largely monetary. Her status as a virgin was also important to make her an acceptable marital partner.

25 sojourn reside temporarily

25-6 make their wits...mercers owe debts only to their wits for providing them with clothes. Mercers were vendors of textiles, and The Mercer's Book was proverbial for the debts of a gallant. Witgood is intent throughout the play on turning his intelligence into money, and his name calls attention to his mental agility.

27-8 out...law (a) not punishable by law (b) out of the reach of law, and possibly illegal

28.1 Jane All previous printings of the text identify the character here and in subsequent stage directions and speech prefixes as Courtesan. However, Middleton uses that term in this and other plays to refer to a woman who was a kept mistress rather than a professional prostitute, and subsequent events confirm this description of her role. Because the term courtesan has been frequently misunderstood and contributed to confusion about the character's self-defence at the end of the play, and because the character is disguised as Jane Meddler in Act 2 and then becomes Jane Hoard in Act 3, this edition uses the Christian name to mark her speeches and actions. See Introduction.

30-2 Hast...wits Witgood continues to displace his own role in consorting with a mistress by describing Jane as the agent of his undoing.

32 virtue (a) moral sense (b) intellectual capacities (c) sexual energies

34 courtesan a woman involved in an extra-marital relationship between persons of some social standing, as distinct from a common whore; often in English Renaissance drama, as here, referring to a woman who was kept by a man rather than generally available round-webbed tarantula The wide-hooped farthingale is likened to a spider's web in its ability to entrap a man and destroy him.

35 driest...youth continues the consumption imagery of 1.1.7 and 1.1.30-1

37 thrice racked rented out at excessive rates

37-8 jewel...virginity Jane commodifies her virginity in the image of a jewel and then rates it as much higher in value than Witgood's lands.

40 honesty chastity, especially virginity for an unmarried woman

44 invention (a) device or contrivance for Witgood's scheme (b) Jane in particular, seen as a product of Witgood's devising and an agent for his plan

45-7 I...away The speech parodies Witgood's at 1.1.30-4, suggesting Jane's facility with mimicry.

48 weapon words

49-50 A thing...stays a misogynist allusion to women's inconstancy. Witgood jokingly asserts that women could be made more constant if their apparel were buttressed with 'stays' in a bodice stiffened with whale bone.

56 drab prostitute

57 embryo (a) something in a rudimentary stage or first beginning (b) a 'brainchild' of Witgood's devising

58 perfect fully formed

61 Though...breed Jane claims a share in this embryo by extending the procreative language.

62 conceive (a) understand (b) become pregnant with. The imagery of wits having a generative function continues at 3.1.108-10.

65 valiant worth bullocks young bulls

- and in rye-stacks. We'll to London and to my covetous uncle.
- JANE I begin to applaud thee; our states being both desperate, they're soon resolute. But how for horses?
- 70 WITGOOD Mass, that's true. The jest will be of some continuance. Let me see. Horses now, a bots on 'em! Stay, I have acquaintance with a mad host, never yet bawd to thee. I have rinsed the whoreson's gums in mull-sack many a time and often. Put but a good tale into his ear now, so it come off cleanly, and there's horse and man for us, I dare warrant thee.
- 75 JANE Arm your wits then speedily. There shall want nothing in me, either in behaviour, discourse, or fashion, that shall discredit your intended purpose.
- 80 I will so artfully disguise my wants, And set so good a courage on my state, That I will be believed.
- WITGOOD Why, then, all's furnished. I shall go nigh to catch that old fox, mine uncle. Though he make but some amends for my undoing, yet there's some comfort in't. He cannot otherwise choose (though it be but in hope to cozen me again) but supply any hasty want that I bring to town with me. The device well and cunningly carried, the name of a rich widow and four hundred a year in good earth, will so conjure up a kind of usurer's love in him to me that he will not only desire my presence, which at first shall scarce be granted him—I'll keep off o' purpose—but I shall find him so officious to deserve, so ready to supply. I know the state of an old man's affection so well. If his nephew be poor indeed, why, he lets God alone with him; but if he be once rich, then he'll be the first man that helps him.
- 95 JANE 'Tis right the world, for in these days an old man's love to his kindred is like his kindness to his wife: 'tis always done before he comes at it.
- WITGOOD I owe thee for that jest. Be gone! [Giving money] Here's all my wealth; prepare thyself. Away! I'll to mine
- host with all possible haste, and with the best art and most profitable form, pour the sweet circumstance into his ear, which shall have the gift to turn all the wax to honey. [Exit Jane]
- How now? O, the right worshipful seniors of our country!
- [Enter Onesiphorus Hoard, Limber, and Kix]
- ONESIPHORUS Who's that?
- 110 LIMBER O, the common rioter. Take no note of him.
- WITGOOD [aside] You will not see me now. The comfort is, Ere it be long, you will scarce see yourselves. [Exit]
- ONESIPHORUS I wonder how he breathes. He's consumed all Upon that courtesan.
- LIMBER We have heard so much. 115
- ONESIPHORUS You have heard all truth. His uncle and my brother Have been these three years mortal adversaries. Two old tough spirits, they seldom meet But fight or quarrel when 'tis calmest. I think their anger be the very fire 120 That keeps their age alive.
- LIMBER What was the quarrel, sir?
- ONESIPHORUS Faith, about a purchase fetching over a young heir. Master Hoard, my brother, having wasted much time in beating the bargain, what did me old Lucre but as his conscience moved him: knowing the poor gentleman, stepped in between 'em and cozened him himself. 125
- LIMBER And was this all, sir?
- ONESIPHORUS This was e'en it, sir. Yet for all this, I know no reason but the match might go forward betwixt his wife's son and my niece. What though there be a dissension between the two old men, I see no reason it should put a difference between the two younger. 'Tis as natural for old folks to fall out as for young to fall in. 130

69 resolute full of resolve

70 Mass abbreviation of 'by the Mass', a common oath

71 continuance duration
a bots on 'em expletive meaning 'a disease take them'. Bots was a common disease of worms that affected horses' gums.

72 mad merry

73 bawd Innkeepers sometimes acted as procurers. The Host does not know Jane.

74 mull-sack white wine heated, sweetened and spiced

75 cleanly cleverly, adroitly

80 wants (a) shortcomings (b) sexual desires, which Jane must disguise in order to take up a position in a new social group

81 set...state i.e. make so bold a showing of my estate

83 I shall go nigh i.e. I am going to make every effort

85 for my undoing for ruining me

87 cozen cheat

94 officious to deserve eager to be entitled to reward

96 he lets...him leaves him to God's mercy

99 right the world precisely the way of the world

100 kindness to sexual relations with 100-1 'tis...it (a) the wife has already had sexual relations with someone else

(b) the husband either ejaculates too soon or fails to have an erection. I.e.

an old man's gift of 'love' (or money) to members of his family is like the sex

he has with his wife: by the time he is ready to give it, she no longer wants it.

106 gift power

wax the host's earwax, which would figuratively make him deaf to Witgood's persuasion, if it did not melt into honey

109.1 Onesiphorus...Kix Onesiphorus

was a Puritan name that meant 'profit-making'; Kix is a dried-up stalk; Limber refers ironically to the character's age.

111 common rioter notorious profligate

114-15 He's...courtesan Onesiphorus sees Witgood as a consumer rather than one who has been consumed, as Witgood sees himself.

116 His uncle...brother Pecunious Lucre and Walkadine Hoard

122 purchase profit acquired by dubious means fetching over getting the better of 124 beating the bargain haggling

131 his...niece Sam Freedom and Joyce, the niece of Walkadine and Onesiphorus Hoard

134 fall in (a) make up a quarrel (b) have sex

- 135 A scholar comes a-wooing to my niece: well, he's wise, but he's poor. Her son comes a-wooing to my niece:
well, he's a fool, but he's rich.
- LIMBER Ay, marry, sir?
- ONESIPHORUS Pray now, is not a rich fool better than a 140 poor philosopher?
- LIMBER One would think so, i'faith.
- ONESIPHORUS She now remains at London with my brother, her second uncle, to learn fashions, practise music. The voice between her lips and the viol between her legs, 145 she'll be fit for a consort very speedily. A thousand good pound is her portion. If she marry, we'll ride up and be merry.
- KIX A match, if it be a match! Exeunt
- I.2 Enter at one door, Witgood, at the other, Host
- WITGOOD Mine Host!
- HOST Young master Witgood.
- WITGOOD I have been laying all the town for thee.
- HOST Why, what's the news, bully Hadland?
- 5 WITGOOD What geldings are in the house of thine own?
Answer me to that, first.
- HOST Why man, why?
- WITGOOD Mark me, what I say. I'll tell thee such a tale in thine ear, that thou shalt trust me spite of thy teeth, 10 furnish me with some money willy nilly, and ride up with me thyself contra voluntatem et professionem.
- HOST How? Let me see this trick, and I'll say thou hast more art than a conjuror.
- WITGOOD Dost thou joy in my advancement?
- 15 HOST Do I love sack and ginger?
- WITGOOD Comes my prosperity desiredly to thee?
- HOST Come forfeitures to a usurer, fees to an officer, punks to an host, and pigs to a parson desiredly? Why then, la.
- 20 WITGOOD Will the report of a widow of four hundred a year, boy, make thee leap and sing and dance and come to thy place again?
- HOST Wilt thou command me now? I am thy spirit. Conjure me into any shape.
- WITGOOD I ha' brought her from her friends, turned 25 back the horses by a sleight. Not so much as one amongst her six men, goodly large yeomanly fellows, will she trust with this her purpose. By this light, all unmanned, regardless of her state, neglectful of vainglorious ceremony, all for my love. O, 'tis a fine 30 little voluble tongue, mine Host, that wins a widow.
- HOST No, 'tis a tongue with a great T, my boy, that wins a widow.
- WITGOOD Now sir, the case stands thus. Good mine Host, if thou lov'st my happiness, assist me. 35
- HOST Command all my beasts i'th' house.
- WITGOOD Nay, that's not all neither. Prithee, take truce with thy joy and listen to me. Thou know'st I have a wealthy uncle i'th' city, somewhat the wealthier by my follies. The report of this fortune, well and cunningly 40 carried, might be a means to draw some goodness from the usuring rascal, for I have put her in hope already of some estate that I have either in land or money. Now if I be found true in neither, what may I expect but a sudden breach of our love, utter dissolution of the 45 match, and confusion of my fortunes forever.
- HOST Wilt thou but trust the managing of thy business with me?
- WITGOOD With thee? Why, will I desire to thrive in my purpose? Will I hug four hundred a year? I that know 50 the misery of nothing? Will that man wish a rich widow that has ne'er a hole to put his head in? With thee, mine Host? Why, believe it, sooner with thee than with a covey of counsellors!
- HOST Thank you for your good report, i'faith, sir. And if 55
I stand you not in stead, why then let an host come off hic et haec hostis, a deadly enemy to dice, drink, and venery. Come, where's this widow?
- WITGOOD Hard at Park End.
- HOST I'll be her servingman for once. 60

135 scholar Moneylove

144 viol...legs The viola da gamba, like the modern cello, was played with legs spread apart. The instrument here, as in Roaring Girl 4.1, suggests the expression of female erotic desire.

145 consort (a) concert, group of musicians
(b) sexual partner or spouse

148 A match...match agreed, if a marriage takes place

I.2.1 Host an innkeeper

3 laying searching

4 bully Hadland good fellow who once had land

5 geldings castrated horses

9 spite of thy teeth proverbial for 'despite yourself' (Tilley S764)

10 willy nilly whether you want to or not

11 contra...professionem Latin for 'against your will and profession'

13 conjuror sorcerer

15 ginger considered an aphrodisiac

17 punks prostitutes

18 pigs to a parson proverbial, referring to the payment of tithes to a parson in livestock

19 la exclamation accompanying an emphatic remark

26 sleight trick

29 unmanned without male attendants

32 tongue...great T great meant 'capital', and the phrase alludes to cunnilingus as well as being a phallic joke associating male genitals with the shape of 'T' and relating a man's ability to persuade or seduce a widow with the size of his penis

37-8 take truce with take a break from

52 ne'er...in proverbial for 'having neither house nor home' (Tilley H520). The image reinforces the suggestions of cunnilingus and intercourse at I.2.32.

54 covey flock, group

56 in stead (a) as your deputy (b) with horses, steeds

57 hic...hostis punning on English 'host' and Latin hostis, enemy. I.e. if I don't stand you in good stead, then let me turn out to be an enemy to dice, drink, and venery. Barber says that hic et haec parodies declensions in contemporary grammar books that preceded nouns with the demonstrative as if it were the definite article. If the noun could be either masculine or feminine, as with hostis, it was preceded in the nominative by hic et haec.

58 venery lechery

59 Hard at close to WITGOOD Why, there we let off together, keep full time. My thoughts were striking then just the same number.

 HOST I knew't. Shall we then see our merry days again?
 WITGOOD Our merry nights—which ne'er shall be more seen. Exeunt

1.3 Enter at several doors old Lucre and old Hoard. [Lamprey, Spitchcock, Sam Freedom and Moneylove] coming between them to pacify 'em

LAMPREY Nay, good Master Lucre, and you, Master Hoard, anger is the wind which you're both too much troubled withal.
 HOARD Shall my adversary thus daily affront me, ripping up the old wound of our malice which three summers could not close up, into which wound the very sight of him drops scalding lead instead of balsamum?
 LUCRE Why Hoard, Hoard, Hoard, Hoard, Hoard! May I not pass in the state of quietness to mine own house? Answer me to that, before witness, and why. I'll refer the cause to honest, even-minded gentlemen, or require the mere indifferency of the law to decide this matter. I got the purchase, true. Was't not any man's case? Yes. Will a wiseman stand as a bawd, whilst another wipes his nose of the bargain? No, I answer, no in that case.
 LAMPREY Nay, sweet Master Lucre.
 HOARD Was it the part of a friend? No, rather of a Jew. Mark what I say. When I had beaten the bush to the last bird, or as I may term it, the price to a pound, then, like a cunning usurer, to come in the evening of the bargain and glean all my hopes in a minute! To enter as it were at the back door of the purchase, for thou ne'er cam'st the right way by it.

LUCRE Hast thou the conscience to tell me so, without any impeachment to thyself?
 HOARD Thou that canst defeat thy own nephew, Lucre, lap his lands into bonds and take the extremity of thy kindred's forfeitures because he's a rioter, a waste-thrift, a brothel-master, and so forth—what may a stranger expect from thee but vulnera dilacerata, as the poet says, dilacerate dealing?
 LUCRE Upbraidst thou me with 'nephew'? Is all imputation laid upon me? What acquaintance have I with his follies? If he riot, 'tis he must want it; if he surfeit, 'tis he must feel it; if he drab it, 'tis he must lie by't. What's this to me?
 HOARD What's all to thee? Nothing, nothing. Such is the gulf of thy desire and the wolf of thy conscience. But be assured, old Pecunious Lucre, if ever fortune so bless me that I may be at leisure to vex thee, or any means so favour me that I may have opportunity to mad thee, I will pursue it with that flame of hate, that spirit of malice, unrepressed wrath, that I will blast thy comforts.
 LUCRE Ha, ha, ha!
 LAMPREY Nay, Master Hoard, you're a wise gentleman.
 HOARD I will so cross thee—
 LUCRE And I thee.
 HOARD So without mercy fret thee—
 LUCRE So monstrosly oppose thee.
 HOARD Dost scoff at my just anger? O, that I had as much power as usury has over thee!
 LUCRE Then thou wouldst have as much power as the devil has over thee.
 HOARD Toad!
 LUCRE Aspic!

61 let . . . time Witgood and the Host are like two clocks that strike at the same time, with a bawdy quibble.
 1.3.0.1 several separate
 0.2 Lamprey, Spitchcock The lamprey is a predatory eel-like fish, and spitchcock is a dish made of eel split open or cut in pieces and broiled or fried. Both names suggest slippery and menacing characters.
 4 affront (a) encounter, face (b) give offence to 7 balsamum (a) balsam, an aromatic medicinal preparation (b) in a more general sense, balm 12 mere indifferency absolute impartiality. Indifferency is an obsolete term for indifference.
 13 purchase profit acquired by dubious means any man's case an opportunity open to anyone 14 bawd pander, go-between 14–15 wipes his nose cheats him
 17 Jew Drawing on the early modern characterization of Jews as non-Christian aliens who take unfair advantage of others. The more specific association between Jews and usury is not a reason for Hoard to reject Lucre as a friend, since he is a usurer himself.

 18–19 beaten . . . bird done all the hard work. 'One beats the bush and another catches the bird' was proverbial (Tilley B740).
 19 price to a pound agreed upon an amount 20 in the evening at the end
 22 back door with a suggestion of anal intercourse
 25 impeachment accusation
 26 defeat dispossess, defraud
 27 lap enfold
bonds (a) legal deeds by which one person is bound to pay another (b) physical means by which one is shackled or confined 28 waste-thrift spendthrift
 30 vulnera dilacerata Latin for 'lacerated wounds'. There is probably no source for the phrase, which instead reflects Hoard's pomposity.
 31 dilacerate rent asunder, torn (Hoard's coinage)

 34 want it lack it
 35 drab it resort to prostitutes lie by't (a) sleep with them (b) suffer the consequences 38 gulf voracious appetite, as in the name for the character in this play wolf Usurers were likened to wolves by Sir Thomas Wilson in A Discourse upon Usury (1572).
 39 Pecunious from Latin pecuniarius, of money, and English 'pecunious', meaning wealthy 42 mad infuriate
 47 cross thwart
 51–2 as . . . thee Hoard implies that while Lucre is an agent of usury, he is also a victim of its power. The suggestion applies to all the usurers in the play, including Hoard himself.
 53 devil from an association between usurers and devils
 55 Toad Usurers were compared to toads by Gerard de Malynes in St George for England (1601).
 56 Aspic asp, a poisonous snake

HOARD Serpent!
 LUCRE Viper!
 SPITCHCOCK Nay, gentlemen, then we must divide you, 60 perforce.
 LAMPREY When the fire grows too unreasonable hot,
 there's no better way than to take off the wood.
Exeunt. Manent Sam and Moneylove
 SAM A word, good signior.
 MONEYLOVE How now, what's the news?
 65 SAM 'Tis given me to understand that you are a rival of mine in the love of Mistress Joyce, Master Hoard's niece.
 Say me ay, say me no.
 MONEYLOVE Yes, 'tis so.
 SAM Then look to yourself, you cannot live long. I'm 70 practising every morning. A month hence I'll challenge
 you.
 MONEYLOVE Give me your hand upon't. There's my pledge
 I'll meet you!

Moneylove strikes Sam

SAM O, O. What reason had you for that, sir, to strike 75 before the month? You knew I was not ready for you, and that made you so crank. I am not such a coward to strike again, I warrant you. My ear has the law of her side, for it burns horribly. I will teach him to strike a naked se, the longest day of his life. 'Slid, it shall 80 cost me some money, but I'll bring this box into the Chancery. Exit

I.4 Enter Witgood and the Host [disguised as a servingman]

HOST Fear you nothing, sir. I have lodged her in a house of credit, I warrant you.
 WITGOOD Hast thou the writings?
 HOST Firm, sir.

75 before the month before the time agreed upon for their duel a month hence 76 crank cocky
 77 again back
 77-8 My ear...side my ear is so badly injured that I have grounds for legal action
 79 naked defenceless, unprotected
 'Slid' contraction of 'God's (eye)lid', a mild oath
 80 box (a) blow (b) case
 81 Chancery court of the Lord Chancellor, the highest court of justice after the House of Lords, on the same level with the King's Bench and the Common Pleas.
 This was the court in which equity cases were most often heard.
 I.4.1-2 house of credit reputable house 3 writings the spurious documents presented to Lucre at 2.1.37.
 4.1 Dampit...Gulf Dampit is compounded of 'the damned' and the 'pit' mentioned in Audrey's song at 4.5.2, the places where and means by which he effects that damnation: brothels, women's mouths and genitals, taverns, debt, and ultimately hell. Gulf suggests the voracious appetite of the usurer that Hoard imputes to Lucre at 1.3.38.

 7 caterpillar extortioner 9-10 lost...ears (a) the deaf (b) the criminal, who was frequently punished by having his ears cropped 11 trampler of time A go-between, attorney, or petty solicitor who practised during 'term-time', the four periods of the year when courts were in session—Hilary, Easter, Trinity and Michaelmas.
 12-13 serge cloak woollen or worsted cloth. Dampit's unkempt beard and serge clothing may suggest that he pretends to be poor.
 14 brothel-vomiting one who (a) is thrown out of brothels (b) vomits drunkenly in brothels (c) speaks the language of the brothel
 19-20 set...th'ears proverbial for 'set everyone at variance' (Tilley E23) 23 staked...noble A noble was a gold coin valued at 11 shillings and 3 pence when it was issued for the third time in 1527, but it had probably dropped in value from inflation by the early seventeenth century. Dampit apparently arranged a dog fight and staked his own dog for his part of the wager, thereby winning a noble when his dog won. Watson observes that 'this account of Dampit's rise to fortune is like a parody of the success story of the typical Jacobean businessman'.

 31 trampler of the law suggesting that Dampit abuses the law or treads on the rights of others using legal means 31-2 the devil...footmen proverbial, as in 'the devil is ever kind to his own' (Tilley D245). The reference to footmen continues the trampling imagery associated with Dampit.
 32 nibbled caught, nabbed, pilfered
 35 low Gulf is short and was perhaps played by a younger boy actor.
 36 He...safe a recurrent maxim in Seneca.
Gulf uses low to mean 'humbly'.
 38 old Harry used sometimes of the devil

Enter Dampit and Gulf, who talk apart
 WITGOOD Prithee, stay and behold two the most prodigious 5 rascals that ever slipped into the shape of men: Dampit, sirrah, and young Gulf, his fellow caterpillar.
 HOST Dampit? Sure I have heard of that Dampit.
 WITGOOD Heard of him? Why, man, he that has lost both his ears may hear of him. A famous infamous 10 trampler of time—his own phrase. Note him well, that Dampit. Sirrah, he in the uneven beard and the serge cloak is the most notorious, usuring, blasphemous, atheistical, brothel-vomiting rascal that we have in these latter times now extant, whose first beginning 15 was the stealing of a mastiff dog from a farmer's house.
 HOST He looked as if he would obey the commandments well when he began first with stealing.
 WITGOOD True. The next town he came at, he set the dogs together by th'ears.
 20 HOST A sign he should follow the law, by my faith.
 WITGOOD So it followed, indeed. And being destitute of all fortunes, staked his mastiff against a noble, and by great fortune his dog had the day. How he made it up ten shillings, I know not. But his own boast is that he came 25 to town but with ten shillings in his purse, and now is credibly worth ten thousand pound!
 HOST How the devil came he by it?
 WITGOOD How the devil came he not by it? If you put in the devil once, riches come with a vengeance. He's been 30 a trampler of the law, sir, and the devil has a care of his footmen. The rogue has spied me now. He nibbled me finely once, too; a pox search you.—O, Master Dampit, the very loins of thee! Cry you mercy, Master Gulf. You walk so low, I promise you I saw you not, sir!
 35 GULF He that walks low, walks safe, the poets tell us.
 WITGOOD [aside] And nigher hell by a foot and a half than the rest of his fellows.—But my old Harry!

DAMPIT My sweet Theodorus!
 40 WITGOOD 'Twas a merry world when thou cam'st to town with ten shillings in thy purse.
 DAMPIT And now worth ten thousand pound, my boy.
 Report it: Harry Dampit, a trampler of time. Say he would be up in a morning and be here with his serge 45 gown, dashed up to the hams in a cause, have his feet stink about Westminster Hall and come home again, see the galleons, the galleasses, the great armadas of the law. Then there be hoys and petty vessels, oars and scullers of the time. There be picklocks of the time, too.
 50 Then would I be here. I would trample up and down like a mule: now to the judges, 'May it please your reverend honourable fatherhoods'; then to my counsellor, 'May it please your worshipful patience'; then to the examiner's office, 'May it please your mastership's gentleness'; then 55 to one of the clerks, 'May it please your worshipful lousiness', for I find him scrubbing in his codpiece. Then to the hall again, then to the chamber again—
 WITGOOD And when to the cellar again?
 DAMPIT E'en when thou wilt again. Trampers of time,
 60 motions of Fleet Street, and visions of Holborn! Here
 I have fees of one, there I have fees of another. My clients come about me, the fooliaminy and coxcomby of the country. I still trashed and trotted for other men's causes. Thus was poor Harry Dampit made rich by 65 others' laziness, who, though they would not follow their own suits, I made 'em follow me with their purses.
 WITGOOD Didst thou so, old Harry?
 DAMPIT Ay, and I soused 'em with bills of charges, i'faith.
 Twenty pound a year have I brought in for boathire, 70 and I ne'er stepped into boat in my life.
 WITGOOD Trampers of time.
 DAMPIT Ay, trampers of time, rascals of time, bull-beggars!

WITGOOD Ah, thou'rt a mad old Harry! Kind Master Gulf,
 I am bold to renew my acquaintance. 75
 GULF I embrace it, sir. Music. Exeunt
Finis Actus Primus

Incipit Actus Secundus
Enter Lucre

LUCRE My adversary evermore twits me with my nephew.
 Forsooth, my nephew! Why, may not a virtuous uncle have a dissolute nephew? What though he be a brotheller, a waste-thrift, a common surfeiter, and to conclude, a beggar, must sin in him call up shame 5 in me? Since we have no part in their follies, why should we have part in their infamies? For my strict hand toward his mortgage, that I deny not. I confess I had an uncle's penn'orth. Let me see, half in half;
 true, I saw neither hope of his reclaiming nor comfort 10 in his being, and was it not then better bestowed upon his uncle than upon one of his aunts? I need not say bawd, for everyone knows what aunt stands for in the last translation.

[Enter Servant]

Now, sir.

SERVANT There's a country servingman, sir, attends to speak with your worship.

LUCRE I'm at best leisure now. Send him in to me.

[Exit Servant]

Enter Host like a servingman

HOST Bless your venerable worship.

LUCRE Welcome, good fellow.

HOST [aside] He calls me thief at first sight, yet he little 20 thinks I am an host!

LUCRE What's thy business with me?

39 Theodorus meaning 'gift of God'. Taken together, Witgood's names mean that 'cleverness is God's gift'.
 45 dashed spattered with mud hams the back of the thighs
 45-6 have...stink compare 3.4.76
 46 Westminster Hall where the law courts were held until 1882
 47 galleons ships that were used by the Spanish to transport treasures from the New World. All of the vessels that follow serve as metaphors for people of different degrees of importance that Dampit encountered in his work.
galleasses heavy vessels, larger than galleons, used chiefly as warships armadas large warships
 48 hoys small coastal vessels
 48-9 oars and scullers small vessels propelled by rowing and sculling
 49 picklocks thieves
 52 counsellor the legal advocate
 53-4 examiner's office the officer who took depositions of witnesses 56 scrubbing scratching, because of lice

codpiece a bagged appendage at the front of breeches 60 motions puppets or puppet shows motions...Holborn Fleet Street and Holborn were favourite haunts of sharpers, mentioned in Audrey's song at 4.5.3.
 The two phrases compare the 'trampers of time' moving frenetically on their errands along the thoroughfares in London's business districts to figures seen in a puppet show or a trance.
 62 fooliaminy and coxcomby Dampit's coinages, the first from 'fool' and the second from 'coxcomb', a fool or simpleton; both apply to his clients.
 63 trashed ran or walked through mud and mire
 68 soused soaked or swindled
 69-70 Twenty...life Dampit has made as much as £20 a year by charging his clients for his travelling expenses by boat when he never incurred those costs. Transportation by water from one location in London to another was common.

72 trampers of time By now the phrase implies that Dampit abused his clients by charging them for time and services that he never rendered, although he presented a great show of activity on their behalves.
 72-3 bull-beggars hobgoblins or objects of dread; imps or sprites that incite superstitious fear
 2.1.1 twits censures, upbraids
 2 Forsooth in truth
 5 conclude (a) end the list (b) end his life
 9 an uncle's penn'orth a swindler's pennyworth. 'To uncle' was to cheat.
half in half half the total amount. He calculates how much he has swindled from Witgood.
 10 reclaiming (a) reforming (b) repaying his debts to take back his property
 14 last translation most recent slang. Lucre is spelling out his use of aunts to mean bawds, which will become an important motif later in the play.
 21 thief good fellow was a cant name for a thief

- 25 HOST Faith, sir, I am sent from my mistress to any sufficient gentleman indeed, to ask advice upon a doubtful point. 'Tis indifferent, sir, to whom I come, for I know none, nor did my mistress direct me to any particular man, for she's as mere a stranger here as myself. Only I found your worship within, and 'tis a thing I ever loved, sir, to be dispatched as soon as I can.
- 30 LUCRE [aside] A good blunt honesty. I like him well.—What is thy mistress?
- HOST Faith, a country gentlewoman and a widow, sir. Yesterday was the first flight of us, but now she intends to stay till a little term business be ended.
- 35 LUCRE Her name, I prithee?
- HOST It runs there in the writings, sir, among her lands. Widow Meddler.
- LUCRE Meddler? Mass, have I ne'er heard of that widow?
- 40 HOST Yes, I warrant you, have you, sir. Not the rich widow in Staffordshire?
- LUCRE Cods me, there 'tis indeed. Thou has put me into memory. There's a widow indeed. Ah, that I were a bachelor again.
- 45 HOST No doubt your worship might do much then. But she's fairly promised to a bachelor already.
- LUCRE Ah, what is he, I prithee?
- HOST A country gentleman too, one whom your worship knows not, I'm sure. He's spent some few follies in his youth, but marriage, by my faith, begins to call him home. My mistress loves him, sir, and love covers faults, you know. One Master Witgood, if ever you have heard of the gentleman.
- 50 LUCRE Ha? Witgood, sayst thou?
- 55 HOST That's his name indeed, sir. My mistress is like to bring him to a goodly seat yonder—four hundred a year, by my faith.
- LUCRE But I pray, take me with you.
- HOST Ay, sir?
- LUCRE What countryman might this young Witgood be? 60
HOST A Leicestershire gentleman, sir.
- LUCRE [aside] My nephew, by the mass, my nephew! I'll fetch out more of this, i'faith. A simple country fellow, I'll work't out of him.—And is that gentleman, sayst thou, presently to marry her? 65
- HOST Faith, he brought her up to town, sir. H'as the best card in all the bunch for't, her heart. And I know my mistress will be married ere she go down, nay I'll swear that. For she's none of those widows that will go down first and be married after. She hates that, I can tell you, 70
sir.
- LUCRE By my faith, sir, she is like to have a proper gentleman and a comely. I'll give her that gift!
- HOST Why, does your worship know him, sir?
- LUCRE I know him! Does not all the world know him? Can a man of such exquisite qualities be hid under a bushel? 75
HOST Then your worship may save me a labour, for I had charge given me to enquire after him.
- LUCRE Enquire of him? If I might counsel thee, thou shouldst ne'er trouble thyself further. Enquire of him of no more but of me. I'll fit thee! I grant he has been youthful, but is he not now reclaimed? Mark you that, 80
sir. Has not your mistress, think you, been wanton in her youth? If men be wags, are there not women wagtails?
- 85 HOST No doubt, sir.
- LUCRE Does not he return wisest that comes home whipped with his own follies?
- HOST Why, very true, sir.
- LUCRE The worst report you can hear of him, I can tell you, is that he has been a kind gentleman, a liberal and a worthy. Who but lusty Witgood, thrice noble Witgood! 90
HOST Since our worship has so much knowledge in him, can you resolve me, sir, what his living might be? My duty binds me, sir, to have a care of my mistress' estate. 95

24 sufficient well-to-do

28 mere (a) absolute (b) ordinary, inept

30 dispatched rid of a piece of business promptly, even hastily

34 first flight commonly used of fledglings leaving the nest, i.e. this is the first time the widow has left her estate

35 term business legal business transacted while the law courts were in session, with bawdy implications because prostitutes also congregated during term-time

38 Meddler The name implies one who (a) mingles or interferes in another person's business and (b) engages in sexual intercourse. A third meaning more directly suggests a 'whore' and stems from the word's association with the medlar tree, the fruit of which was eaten when it was partly rotten. The seventeenth-century texts spell the name as 'Medler' and 'Meddler'. See textual note.

41 Staffordshire a county in the English

Midlands

42 Cods me corruption of 'God save me'

51 home (a) back to his former, more restrained identity (b) back to domestic life covers conceals; i.e. love is blind

56 seat estate

58 take me with you tell me your meaning

67 bunch pack

68 go down (a) leave London for the country (b) have sex

70 She hates that The host defends the honour of his mistress by affirming that she will not have sex before marriage. There is obvious dramatic irony in the remark given what the audience knows about Jane.

72 proper handsome

73 comely pleasing, agreeable give her that gift grant her that

76 hid... bushel An image from Matthew 5:15: 'Neither do men light a lamp and put it under a bushel, but on a andlestick, and it giveth light unto all that are in the house'.

78 after about

81 fit answer

84–5 If... wagtails Wags suggests rogues; wagtails licentious women or prostitutes. There is a considerable gap between the small guilt attributed to men in the sentence and that attributed to women, which reflects the sexual double standard and makes suspect Lucre's attempts to use a woman's transgressions to justify a man's.

87–8 Does... follies The argument is similar to Jane's observation at 5.2.151, 'She that knows sin, knows best how to hate sin'.

91 kind affectionate, loving, with bawdy implications liberal (a) generous (b) licentious

92 lusty (a) agreeable, pleasing (b) full of sexual desire

94 living livelihood and estate

She has been ever a good mistress to me, though I say it. Many wealthy suitors has she nonsuited for his sake. Yet though her love be so fixed, a man cannot tell whether his nonperformance may help to remove it, sir. He makes us believe he has lands and living.

100 LUCRE Who, young Master Witgood? Why, believe it, he has as goodly a fine living out yonder—what do you call the place?

HOST Nay, I know not, i'faith.

105 LUCRE Hum, see like a beast if I have not forgot the name—puh! And out yonder again, goodly grown woods and fair meadows. Pox on't, I can ne'er hit of that place, neither. He? Why, he's Witgood of Witgood Hall; he an unknown thing!

110 HOST Is he so, sir? To see how rumour will alter. Trust me, sir, we heard once he had no lands, but all lay mortgaged to an uncle he has in town here.

LUCRE Push! 'Tis a tale, 'tis a tale.

HOST I can assure you, sir, 'twas credibly reported to my mistress.

115 LUCRE Why, do you think, i'faith, he was ever so simple to mortgage his lands to his uncle? Or his uncle so unnatural to take the extremity of such a mortgage?

HOST That was my saying still, sir.

LUCRE Puh, ne'er think it.

HOST Yet that report goes current.

120 LUCRE Nay, then you urge me, Cannot I tell that best that am his uncle?

HOST How, sir! What have I done?

LUCRE Why, how now, in a swoon, man?

HOST Is your worship his uncle, sir?

125 LUCRE Can that be any harm to you, sir?

HOST I do beseech you, sir, do me the favour to conceal it. What a beast was I to utter so much! Pray, sir, do me the kindness to keep it in. I shall have my coat pulled o'er my ears, an't should be known, for the truth is, an't please your worship, to prevent much rumour and many suitors, they intend to be married very suddenly and privately.

130

LUCRE And dost thou think it stands with my judgement to do them injury? Must I needs say the knowledge of this marriage comes from thee? Am I a fool at fifty-four? Do I lack subtlety now, that have got all my wealth by it? There's a leash of angels for thee. Come, let me woo thee. Speak, where lie they?

135

HOST So I might have no anger, sir—

LUCRE Passion of me, not a jot. Prithee, come.

140

HOST I would not have it known it came by my means.

LUCRE Why, am I a man of wisdom?

HOST I dare trust your worship, sir. But I'm a stranger to your house, and to avoid all intelligencers, I desire your worship's ear.

145

LUCRE [aside] This fellow's worth a matter of trust.—Come, sir. [Host whispers to Lucre] Why, now, thou'rt an honest lad. Ah, sirrah nephew!

HOST Please you, sir, now I have begun with your worship, when shall I attend for your advice upon that doubtful point? I must come warily now.

150

LUCRE Tut, fear thou nothing. Tomorrow's evening shall resolve the doubt.

HOST The time shall cause my attendance. Exit

LUCRE Fare thee well. There's more true honesty in such a country servingman than in a hundred of our cloak companions. I may well call 'em companions, for since blue coats have been turned into cloaks, we can scarce know the man from the master. George!

155

[Enter George]

GEORGE Anon, sir.

160

LUCRE List hither. Keep the place secret. Commend me to my nephew. I know no cause, tell him, but he might see his uncle.

GEORGE I will, sir.

LUCRE And do you hear, sir, take heed you use him with respect and duty.

165

GEORGE [aside] Here's a strange alteration. One day he must be turned out like a beggar, and now he must be called in like a knight! Exit

LUCRE Ah, sirrah, that rich widow! Four hundred a year! Beside, I hear she lays claim to a title of a hundred more. This falls unhappily, that he should bear a grudge to me

170

97 nonsuited rejected. There is a pun on the legal meaning of the word, which described the cessation of a suit resulting from the voluntary withdrawal of the plaintiff, and on 'suitors' as wooers.

99 nonperformance failure to fulfil one's promises or live up to the terms of a contract

106 puh an expression of impatience or disgust

107 hit of remember

113 Push pish, an expression of contempt analogous to the current use of fuck

118 take the extremity of exact the full amount of

119 That...still that was the story I was told

120 goes current is in general circulation urge provoke

128 in secret

128-9 coat...ears be stripped of my livery, the clothing of servants; i.e. lose my job

129 an't if it

137 leash of angels three gold coins, each worth from 10 to 11 shillings, having the figure of the archangel St Michael on one side

138 lie lodge

144 intelligencers spies

148 sirrah an expression of contempt for Witgood and a sign of Lucre's authority over him

150-1 that doubtful point i.e. Witgood's living

153 resolve dissolve, remove

156-7 cloak companions i.e. gentlemen or freed citizens whose cloaks distinguished them from servingmen until the fashion changed (see 2.1.158-9)

157 'em i.e. servingmen

158 blue coats the traditional livery or clothing of the servingman, which was discarded in the early seventeenth century for cloaks of various colours

158-9 we...master Clothing served to identify people by their class standing, so the disappearance of blue coats blurred the distinctions between masters and servants. Lucre deplores this development and then orders his own servant about immediately afterwards.

159 the man the servingman or servant

161 List hither i.e. listen over here

171 title deed of property

- now, being likely to prove so rich. What is't, trow, that he makes me a stranger for? Hum. I hope he has not so much wit to apprehend that I cozened him. He deceives me, then? Good heaven, who would have thought it would ever have come to this pass! Yet he's a proper gentleman, i'faith, give him his due. Marry, that's his mortgage, but that I ne'er mean to give him. I'll make him rich enough in words, if that be good; and if it come to a piece of money, I will not greatly stick for't. There may be hope some of the widow's lands, too, may one day fall upon me, if things be carried wisely.
- [Enter George]
- Now, sir, where is he?
- 185 GEORGE He desires your worship to hold him excused. He has such weighty business, it commands him wholly from all men.
- LUCRE Were those my nephew's words?
- GEORGE Yes indeed, sir.
- 190 LUCRE When men grow rich, they grow proud, too: I perceive that. He would not have sent me such an answer once within this twelvemonth. See what 'tis when a man's come to his lands. Return to him again, sir. Tell him his uncle desires his company for an hour. I'll trouble him but an hour, say. 'Tis for his own good, tell him. And do you hear, sir, put 'worship' upon him. Go to, do as I bid you. He's like to be a gentleman of worship very shortly.
- GEORGE [aside] This is good sport, i'faith. Exit
- 200 LUCRE Troth, he uses his uncle discourteously now. Can he tell what I may do for him? Goodness may come from me in a minute that comes not in seven year again. He knows my humour; I am not so usually good. 'Tis no small thing that draws kindness from me, he may know that, an he will. The chief cause that invites me to do him most good is the sudden astonishing of old Hoard, my adversary. How pale his malice will look at my nephew's advancement! With what a dejected spirit he will behold his fortunes, whom but last day he proclaimed rioter, penurious makeshift, despised brothel-master! Ha, ha! 'Twill do me more secret joy than my last purchase, more precious comfort than all these widow's revenues!
- [Enter George]
- Now, sir—
Enter Witgood
- GEORGE With much entreaty he's at length come, sir. 215 [Exit]
- LUCRE O nephew, let me salute you, sir! You're welcome, nephew.
- WITGOOD Uncle, I thank you.
- LUCRE You've a fault, nephew: you're a stranger here. Well, heaven give you joy. 220
- WITGOOD Of what, sir?
- LUCRE Ha, we can hear. You might have known your uncle's house, i'faith. You and your widow, go to, you were to blame, If I may tell you so without offence.
- WITGOOD How could you hear of that, sir?
- LUCRE O, pardon me. 225 It was your will to have it kept from me, I perceive now.
- WITGOOD Not for any defect of love, I protest, Uncle.
- LUCRE O, 'twas unkindness, nephew—fie, fie, fie!
- WITGOOD I am sorry you take it in that sense, sir. 230
- LUCRE Puh, you cannot colour it, i'faith, nephew.
- WITGOOD Will you but hear what I can say in my just excuse, sir?
- LUCRE Yes, faith, will I, and welcome.
- WITGOOD You that know my danger i'th' city, sir, so well, how great my debts are, and how extreme my creditors, could not out of your pure judgement, sir, have wished us hither. 235
- LUCRE Mass, a firm reason indeed.
- WITGOOD Else my uncle's house, why, 't'ad been the only make-match. 240
- LUCRE Nay, and thy credit.
- WITGOOD My credit? Nay, my countenance. Push! Nay, I know, uncle, you would have wrought it so by your 173 trow do you suppose

175 cozened cheated

175-6 He... then I am deceived in him, then?

181 stick for't be reluctant to do it

190-1 When... that Lucre is the first in the play to observe a connection between a man's proud sense of himself and his acquisition of riches or land. The play offers other instances with Hoard's reaction to his newfound wealth at 4.4.1-91 and 5.2.1-13.

196 put 'worship' upon him call him 'your worship' as a sign of respect

203 humour disposition

205 an if

210 penurious destitute, poor

212 my last purchase Lucre's victory over Hoard that was the subject of their dispute at 1.3.4-23

222 known been acquainted with, i.e. used, visited

229 unkindness ingratitude; forgetful of the relationship due to a relative

231 colour disguise, misrepresent

240 uncle's house perhaps a slang term for the residence of an 'aunt' or bawd, and hence an appropriate place for sexual assignments

241 make-match place to make a match

243 countenance dignity, appearance of wealth. Witgood counters Lucre's assertion that his uncle's home is the only place for him to gain credit with the claim that it is the only place that will support his general pretensions to wealth and reputation.

- 245 wit. You would have made her believe in time the whole house had been mine.
LUCRE Ay, and most of the goods, too.
WITGOOD La, you there! Well, let 'em all prate what they will, there's nothing like the bringing of a widow to one's uncle's house.
250 LUCRE Nay, let nephews be ruled as they list, they shall find their uncle's house the most natural place when all's done.
WITGOOD There they may be bold.
255 LUCRE Life, they may do anything there, man, and fear neither beadle nor summoner. An uncle's house! A very Cole Harbour! Sirrah, I'll touch thee near now. Hast thou so much interest in thy widow, that by a token thou couldst presently send for her?
260 WITGOOD Troth, I think I can, uncle.
LUCRE Go to, let me see that.
WITGOOD Pray, command one of your men hither, uncle.
LUCRE George!
[Enter George]
GEORGE Here, sir.
265 LUCRE Attend my nephew! [Aside, as Witgood talks to George] I love a' life to prattle with a rich widow. 'Tis pretty, methinks, when our tongues go together, and then to promise much and perform little. I love that sport o' life, i'faith. Yet I am in the mood now to do my nephew some good, if he take me handsomely.
270 [Exit George]
What, have you dispatched?
WITGOOD I ha' sent, sir.
LUCRE Yet I must condemn you of unkindness, nephew.
WITGOOD Heaven forbid, uncle!
275 LUCRE Yes, faith, must I. Say your debts be many, your creditors importunate, yet the kindness of a thing is all, nephew. You might have sent me close word on't, without the least danger or prejudice to your fortunes.
WITGOOD Troth, I confess it, uncle. I was to blame there.
280 But indeed, my intent was to have clapped it up suddenly, and so have broke forth like a joy to my friends and a wonder to the world. Beside there's a trifle of a forty pound matter toward the setting of me forth, my friends should ne'er have known on't. I meant to make shift for that myself.
285 LUCRE How, nephew? Let me not hear such a word again, I beseech you. Shall I be beholden to you?
WITGOOD To me? Alas, what do you mean, uncle?
LUCRE I charge you upon my love, you trouble nobody but myself.
290 WITGOOD You've no reason for that, uncle.
LUCRE Troth, I'll ne'er be friends with you while you live, an you do.
WITGOOD Nay, an you say so, uncle, here's my hand. I will not do't.
295 LUCRE Why, well said. There's some hope in thee when thou wilt be ruled. I'll make it up fifty, faith, because I see thee so reclaimed. Peace, here comes my wife with Sam, her t'other husband's son.
[Enter Wife and Sam]
WITGOOD Good Aunt—
300 SAM Cousin Witgood! I rejoice in my salute. You're most welcome to this noble city, governed with the sword in the scabbard.
WITGOOD [aside] And the wit in the pommel.—Good Master Sam Freedom, I return the salute.
305 LUCRE By the mass, she's coming, wife. Let me see now how thou wilt entertain her.
WIFE I hope I am not to learn, sir, to entertain a widow. 'Tis not so long ago since I was one myself.
[Enter Jane disguised as a rich widow]
WITGOOD Uncle—
310 LUCRE She's come, indeed!
WITGOOD My uncle was desirous to see you, widow, and I presumed to invite you.
JANE The presumption was nothing, Master Witgood. Is this your uncle, sir?
315 LUCRE Marry, am I, sweet widow, and his good uncle he shall find me. Ay, by this smack that I give thee, thou'rt welcome. [Kissing her] Wife, bid the widow welcome the same way again.

248 prate talk, boast

251 list please

256 beadle a parish constable, whose duties might include whipping prostitutes

summoner a minor official who summoned people to court; also an officer who brought offenders before the ecclesiastical courts, where sexual offences were often tried. Taken together, beadle nor summoner suggests that an uncle's house is free of the agents of civil and ecclesiastical authority.

257 Cole Harbour A group of tenements on the north bank of the Thames and west of London Bridge that became known as a sanctuary for debtors and criminals and a place for hasty marriages.

touch upset, annoy

258 interest claim on

266 a' life as life, i.e. as dearly as my life

prattle chatter or talk at length

270 take me handsomely interprets me courteously

277 close secret

280 clapped it up made the match

282 friends relatives

Beside there's if it were not for 283 matter i.e. debt

setting . . . forth equipping me, fitting me out

285 make shift for manage, deal with

293, 294 an if

297 make it up raise a sum to a larger sum

299 t'other other. Lucre has already married a widow.

302-3 sword . . . scabbard Since the scabbard was a sheath for the sword, the phrase implies that punishment is restrained.

304 wit . . . pommel the amount of wit in the knob on the hilt of a sword, i.e. no wit at all

307 entertain receive

317 smack kiss

- 320 SAM [aside] I am a gentleman now too, by my father's occupation, and I see no reason but I may kiss a widow by my father's copy. Truly, I think the charter is not against it. Surely these are the words: 'The son, once a gentleman, may revel it, though his father were a dauber.' 'Tis about the fifteenth page. I'll to her.
- 325 [He tries to kiss Jane, who rebuffs him]
- LUCRE [to Sam] You're not very busy now.—A word with thee, sweet widow.
- [They talk apart]
- SAM [aside] Cod's nigs! I was never so disgraced, since the hour my mother whipped me.
- 330 LUCRE [to Jane] Beside, I have no child of mine own to care for. She's my second wife—old, past bearing. Clap sure to him, widow. He's like to be my heir, I can tell you!
- JANE Is he so, sir?
- LUCRE He knows it already, and the knave's proud on't. Jolly rich widows have been offered him here i'th' city, great merchants' wives, and do you think he would once look upon 'em? Forsooth, he'll none. You are beholden to him i'th' country, then, ere we could be. Nay, I'll hold a wager, widow, if he were once known to be in town, he would be presently sought after. Nay, and happy were they that could catch him first.
- 340 JANE I think so!
- LUCRE O, there would be such running to and fro, widow, he should not pass the streets for 'em. He'd be took up in one great house or other presently. Fah! They know he has it and must have it. You see this house here, widow; this house and all comes to him. Goodly rooms ready furnished, ceiled with plaster of Paris, and all hung above with cloth of arras. Nephew!
- 350 WITGOOD Sir.
- LUCRE Show the widow your house. Carry her into all the rooms, and bid her welcome. You shall see, widow. [Aside to Witgood] Nephew? Strike all sure above, an thou be'st a good boy. Ah!
- 355 WITGOOD Alas, sir, I know not how she would take it.
- LUCRE The right way, I warrant ye. A pox, art an ass? Would I were in thy stead! Get you up. I am ashamed of you. [Exeunt Witgood and Jane]
- [Aside] So, let 'em agree as they will now. Many a match has been struck up in my house o' this fashion. Let 'em try all manner of ways, still there's nothing like an uncle's house to strike the stroke in. I'll hold my wife in talk a little.—Now, Jenny, your son there goes a-wooing to a poor gentlewoman but of a thousand portion. See my nephew, a lad of less hope, strikes at four hundred a year in good rubbish.
- 360 WIFE Well, we must do as we may, sir.
- LUCRE I'll have his money ready told for him, against he come down. Let me see, too. By th' mass, I must present the widow with some jewel, a good piece o' plate, or such a device; 'twill hearten her on well. I have a very fair standing cup, and a good high standing cup will please a widow above all other pieces. Exit
- 370 WIFE [aside] Do you mock us with your nephew?—I have a plot in my head, son—i'faith, husband, to cross you.
- SAM Is it a tragedy plot, or a comedy plot, good mother?
- WIFE 'Tis a plot shall vex him. I charge you of my blessing, son Sam, that you presently withdraw the action of your love from Master Hoard's niece.
- 380 SAM How, mother?
- WIFE Nay, I have a plot in my head, i'faith. Here, take this chain of gold and this fair diamond. Dog me the widow home to her lodging, and at thy best opportunity fasten 'em both upon her. Nay, I have a reach. I can tell you, thou art known what thou art, son, among the right worshipful—all the twelve companies.
- 385 SAM Truly, I thank 'em for it.
- WIFE He, he's a scab to thee. And so certify her thou hast two hundred a year of thyself, beside thy good parts—a proper person and a lovely. If I were a widow, I could find in my heart to have thee myself, son. Ay, from 'em all.
- 390 SAM Thank you for your good will, mother, but indeed I had rather have a stranger. And if I woo her not in that violent fashion that I will make her be glad to take
- 395

320 father's Lucre's, Sam's stepfather
 321 occupation referring to Lucre's status as a gentleman. Since status was traditionally conferred by birth rather than employment or merit, Sam's choice of words reflects the upward mobility that wealth and occupation increasingly conferred in Jacobean society. He argues that the right to sexual intimacy is inflected by class, and the higher one's rank, the more claim one has on women of a comparable position.

322 copy (a) example (b) right, as in the rights of a son to lands that his father held by custom of the manor, which were recorded on a copy of the court rolls charter i.e. of a guild of craftsmen, referring to Sam's work 325 dauber (a) plasterer (b) impostor, from daub, meaning to conceal or cover with a plausible exterior

 328 Cod's nigs an expression of surprise, probably meaning 'God's little pieces'
 345 presently immediately
 346 it i.e. Lucre's wealth
 348 ceiled ceilinged
 349 above i.e. upstairs cloth of arras rich tapestries, in which figures and scenes were woven in colour 353 Strike all sure (a) seal the match (b) have sex with her 362 strike the stroke (a) make a bargain (b) thrust one's penis
 364 thousand portion i.e. a dowry of £1,000

366 rubbish land 368 told counted against by the time that 370 plate silver or gold object
 372 standing cup a cup on a stem or base, with a pun on its phallic shape 377 of by 378-9 action...love offer of marriage
 382 Dog me follow
 384 reach scheme, goal
 386 twelve companies the twelve most important trade guilds in the City of London 388 scab to scoundrel compared with 394 stranger Sam picks up his mother's hint of incestuous desire at 2.1.390-2 and deflects it.
 395 violent vehement

these gifts ere I leave her, let me never be called the heir of your body.
 WIFE Nay, I know there's enough in you, son, if you once come to put it forth.
 400 SAM I'll quickly make a bolt or a shaft on't. Exeunt

2.2 Enter Hoard and Moneylove
 MONEYLOVE Faith, Master Hoard, I have bestowed many months in the suit of your niece. Such was the dear love I ever bore to her virtues. But since she hath so extremely denied me, I am to lay out for my fortunes elsewhere.
 5 HOARD Heaven forbid but you should, sir. I ever told you my niece stood otherwise affected.
 MONEYLOVE I must confess you did, sir, yet in regard of my great loss of time, and the zeal with which I sought 10 your niece, shall I desire one favour of your worship?
 HOARD In regard of those two, 'tis hard but you shall, sir.
 MONEYLOVE I shall rest grateful. 'Tis not full three hours, sir, since the happy rumour of a rich country widow came to my hearing.
 15 HOARD How? A rich country widow?
 MONEYLOVE Four hundred a year landed.
 HOARD Yea?
 MONEYLOVE Most firm, sir. And I have learnt her lodging. Here my suit begins, sir. If I might but entreat your 20 worship to be a countenance for me, and speak a good word—for your words will pass—I nothing doubt but I might set fair for the widow. Nor shall your labour, sir, end altogether in thanks. Two hundred angels—HOARD So, so, what suitors has she?
 25 MONEYLOVE There lies the comfort, sir. The report of her is yet but a whisper, and only solicited by young, riotous Witgood, nephew to your mortal adversary.
 HOARD Ha! Art certain he's her suitor?
 MONEYLOVE Most certain, sir. And his uncle very industrious to beguile the widow and make up the match!
 30 HOARD So? Very good!
 MONEYLOVE Now, sir, you know this young Witgood is a spendthrift, dissolute fellow.
 HOARD A very rascal.
 35 MONEYLOVE A midnight surfeiter.
 HOARD The spume of a brothel-house.
 MONEYLOVE True, sir! Which being well told in your worship's phrase, may both heave him out of her mind and drive a fair way for me to the widow's affections.

HOARD Attend me about five.
 MONEYLOVE With my best care, sir. Exit
 HOARD
 Fool, thou hast left thy treasure with a thief,
 To trust a widower with a suit in love!
 Happy revenge, I hug thee. I have not only the means laid before me extremely to cross my adversary and confound the last hopes of his nephew, but thereby to enrich my state, augment my revenues, and build mine own fortunes greater. Ha, ha!
 I'll mar your phrase, o'erturn your flatteries,
 Undo your windings, policies and plots,
 45 Fall like a secret and dispatchful plague
 On your securèd comforts. Why, I am able To buy three of Lucre, thrice outbid him,
 Let my out-monies be reckoned and all.
Enter three Creditors
 FIRST CREDITOR I am glad of this news. 55
 SECOND CREDITOR So are we, by my faith.
 THIRD CREDITOR Young Witgood will be a gallant again now.
 HOARD [aside, overhearing their conversation] Peace!
 FIRST CREDITOR I promise you, Master Cockpit, she's a 60 mighty rich widow.
 SECOND CREDITOR Why, have you ever heard of her?
 FIRST CREDITOR Who, Widow Meddler? She lies open to much rumour.
 THIRD CREDITOR Four hundred a year, they say, in very 65 good land.
 FIRST CREDITOR Nay, take 't of my word, if you believe that, you believe the least.
 SECOND CREDITOR And to see how close he keeps it.
 FIRST CREDITOR O, sir, there's policy in that to prevent 70 better suitors.
 THIRD CREDITOR He owes me a hundred pound, and I protest I ne'er looked for a penny.
 FIRST CREDITOR He little dreams of our coming. He'll wonder to see his creditors upon him. Exeunt 75
 HOARD
 Good, his creditors; I'll follow. This makes for me. All know the widow's wealth, and 'tis well known I can estate her fairly, ay, and will. In this one chance shines a twice happy fate:
 I both deject my foe, and raise my state. Music. Exit 80
Finis Actus Secundus

398-400 there's...on't the lines have phallic connotations

400 bolt...on't do it one way or the other; literally, use a thick arrow or a slender one. The phrase is proverbial (Tilley S264).

2.2.7 affected inclined, disposed

11 but unless

20 countenance support

21 pass succeed

22 set fair for stand a good chance of winning

23 Two hundred angels over £100, a considerable sum

35 surfeiter one who indulges in excesses

36 spume foam, froth

38 phrase manner of expression

49 phrase praise

50 windings meanderings, twists and turns, referring to Moneylove's shift from Hoard's niece to the widow

51 dispatchful deadly

54 out-monies assets lent out or invested and not immediately liquid

57 gallant fine gentleman, man of fashion

63-4 lies...rumour is much talked about (punning on lies open as 'sexually available'). Another name for the medlar fruit was 'openarse'.

69 he i.e. Witgood

73 looked for expected

76 makes for me works in my favour

80 deject overthrow state estate

3.1

Incipit Actus Tertius[Enter] Witgood with his Creditors

WITGOOD Why, alas, my creditors, could you find no other time to undo me but now? Rather your malice appears in this than the justness of the debt.

FIRST CREDITOR Master Witgood, I have forborne my money long.

WITGOOD I pray, speak low, sir. What do you mean?

SECOND CREDITOR We hear you are to be married suddenly to a rich country widow.

WITGOOD What can be kept so close but you creditors hear on't? Well, 'tis a lamentable state that our chiefest afflictors should first hear of our fortunes. Why, this is no good course, i'faith, sirs. If ever you have hope to be satisfied, why do you seek to confound the means that should work it? There's neither piety, no, nor policy in that. Shine favourably now. Why, I may rise and spread again, to your great comforts.

FIRST CREDITOR He says truth, i'faith.

WITGOOD Remove me now, and I consume forever.

SECOND CREDITOR Sweet gentleman!

WITGOOD How can it thrive which from the sun you sever?

THIRD CREDITOR It cannot, indeed.

WITGOOD

O, then show patience. I shall have enough
To satisfy you all.

FIRST CREDITOR Ay, if we could Be content, a shame take us.

WITGOOD For, look you,

I am but newly sure yet to the widow,
And what a rend might this discredit make.
Within these three days will I bind you lands
For your securities.

FIRST CREDITOR No, good Master Witgood,
Would 'twere as much as we dare trust you with!

WITGOOD I am to raise a little money in the city toward the setting forth of myself, for mine own credit and your comfort. Now, if my former debts should be divulged, all hope of my proceedings were quite extinguished!

FIRST CREDITOR [aside to Witgood] Do you hear, sir? I may deserve your custom hereafter. Pray, let my money be accepted before a stranger's. Here's forty pound I received as I came to you. If that may stand you in any stead, make use on't. Nay, pray sir, 'tis at your service.

WITGOOD [aside to First Creditor]

You do so ravish me with kindness that I'm constrained to play the maid and take it!

FIRST CREDITOR [aside to Witgood] Let none of them see it,
I beseech you.

WITGOOD [aside to First Creditor] Fah!

FIRST CREDITOR [aside to Witgood]

I hope I shall be first in your remembrance
After the marriage rites.

WITGOOD [aside to First Creditor]

Believe it firmly.

FIRST CREDITOR So.—What, do you walk, sirs?

SECOND CREDITOR I go. [Aside to Witgood] Take no care, sir, for money to furnish you. Within this hour, I'll send you sufficient.—Come, Master Cockpit, we both stay for
you.

THIRD CREDITOR I ha' lost a ring, i'faith. I'll follow you presently. [Exeunt First and Second Creditors]

But you shall find it, sir. I know your youth and expenses have disurnished you of all jewels. There's a ruby of twenty pound price, sir: bestow it upon your widow.—What, man, 'twill call up her blood to you.
Beside, if I might so much work with you, I would not have you beholden to those bloodsuckers for any money.

WITGOOD Not I, believe it.

THIRD CREDITOR They're a brace of cutthroats!

WITGOOD I know 'em.

THIRD CREDITOR Send a note of all your wants to my shop, and I'll supply you instantly.

WITGOOD Say you so? Why, here's my hand, then. No man living shall do't but thyself.

THIRD CREDITOR Shall I carry it away from 'em both, then?

WITGOOD I'faith, shalt thou!

THIRD CREDITOR Troth, then I thank you, sir.

3.1.4 forborne gone without

15 Shine . . . spread The metaphor associates the creditors with the sun and Witgood with a plant. It continues at 3.1.20.

18 Remove me (a) take me out of circulation by sending me to prison (b) take my money away

consume waste away (a) physically
(b) financially

25 sure betrothed

26 rend rent, split, division discredit (a) disrepute (b) having his debts called in

29 Would . . . with even if the lands you offer us as security were worth as much as we feel we can loan you. (The creditors are so gullible that at this point they decline Witgood's offer to secure his prior loans.)

30 I am to raise Eighteen lines have been omitted prior to this line and printed as an additional passage at the end of the text, on the grounds that they are an undramatic repetition of the preceding twenty-nine lines in the scene and may have been an earlier version of it.

35 custom business patronage

39 ravish (a) transport with ecstasy or delight (b) rape

40 play . . . it proverbial misogyny for yielding after an initial display of resistance.

The complete proverb was, 'Maids say nay and take it' (Tilley M34). In this context, it suggests that Witgood appears to resist what he really wants: the money; but the proverb also attributes a coyness to women that incites and excuses rape by implying that taking it is part of being female.

49 stay wait

54 disurnished deprived

56 call . . . you The widow's blood or sexual desire will be prompted by the colour and value of the ring.

67 carry . . . from triumph over

70 WITGOOD Welcome, good Master Cockpit!
Exit [Third Creditor]
 Ha, ha, ha! Why, is not this better, now, than lying a-bed? I perceive there's nothing conjures up wit sooner than poverty, and nothing lays it down sooner than wealth and lechery! This has some savour yet. O, that I 75 had the mortgage from mine uncle as sure in possession as these trifles, I would forswear brothel at noon day, and muscadine and eggs at midnight.
Enter Jane [as a rich widow]
 JANE Master Witgood? Where are you?
 WITGOOD Holla!
 80 JANE Rich news!
 WITGOOD Would 'twere all in plate.
 JANE There's some in chains and jewels. I am so haunted with suitors, Master Witgood, I know not which to dispatch first.
 85 WITGOOD You have the better term, by my faith.
 JANE
 Among the number,
 One Master Hoard, an ancient gentleman.
 WITGOOD
 Upon my life, my uncle's adversary!
 JANE
 It may well hold so, for he rails on you,
 Speaks shamefully of him.
 90 WITGOOD As I could wish it.
 JANE
 I first denied him, but so cunningly,
 It rather promised him assurèd hopes
 Than any loss of labour.
 WITGOOD Excellent!
 JANE
 I expect him every hour, with gentlemen
 95 With whom he labours to make good his words,
 To approve you riotous, your state consumed,
 Your uncle—
 WITGOOD Wench, make up thy own fortunes now; do thyself a good turn once in thy days. He's rich in 100 money, movables, and lands—marry him. He's an old doting fool, and that's worth all—marry him. 'Twould be a great comfort to me to see thee do well, i'faith—marry him. 'Twould ease my conscience well to see thee well bestowed. I have a care of thee, i'faith.
 JANE Thanks, sweet Master Witgood. 105
 WITGOOD I reach at farther happiness. First, I am sure it can be no harm to thee, and there may happen goodness to me by it. Prosecute it well. Let's send up for our wits. Now we require their best and most pregnant 110 assistance!
 JANE Step in. I think I hear 'em. Exit [with Witgood]
Enter Hoard, Lamprey and Spitchcock with the Host as servingman
 HOARD [to Host] Art thou the widow's man, by my faith?
 Sh'as a company of proper men, then.
 HOST I am the worst of six, sir. Good enough for blue coats.
 HOARD Hark hither. I hear say thou art in most credit with 115 her.
 HOST Not so, sir.
 HOARD Come, come, thou'rt modest. There's a brace of royals. Prithee, help me to th' speech of her.
 HOST I'll do what I may, sir, always saving myself harm- 120 less.
 HOARD Go to. Do't, I say. Thou shalt hear better from me.
 HOST [aside] Is not this a better place than five mark a year standing wages? Say a man had but three such clients in a day, methinks he might make a poor living on't. 125 Beside, I was never brought up with so little honesty to refuse any man's money, never. What gulls there are o' this side the world. Now know I the widow's mind.
 None but my young master comes in her clutches. Ha, ha, ha! Exit 130
 HOARD
 Now my dear gentlemen, stand firmly to me.
 You know his follies and my worth.
 LAMPREY We do, sir.
 SPITCHCOCK
 But Master Hoard, are you sure he is not i'th' house now?
 HOARD
 Upon my honesty, I chose this time
 O' purpose fit. The spendthrift is abroad. 135 Assist me. Here she comes.
 [Enter Jane. Witgood watches while concealed]
 Now, my sweet widow.

76 forswear renounce
 77 muscadine a strong, sweet wine, considered an aphrodisiac when taken with eggs
 84 dispatch get rid of 85 You...term Jane is like a lawyer in having a profitable legal term. The pun on the legal and amorous meanings of suitor reflects the profits that both lawyers and prostitutes made during the court sessions.
 89 hold so be true
 90 him i.e. Lucre
 96 approve prove
 100 movables personal property

106-8 First...it Witgood risks his plan to secure the mortgage from Lucre in order to assure Jane a future with some wealth and respectability, but he senses that this arrangement may work to his advantage as well.
 108 Prosecute perform
 109 pregnant (a) inventive, resourceful (b) generative, continuing the image of their trick as an embryo begun at l.l.57-62
 112 man servant
 114 blue coats the livery of servingmen 118-19 brace of royals pair of coins, each worth 15 shillings

120-1 saving myself harmless i.e. provided I avoid trouble 122 Thou...me i.e. I will reward you with more money
 123 mark a sum equal to two-thirds of a pound 124 standing fixed 125 poor used ironically, since receiving three braces of royals each day would be an enormous sum for a servant
 127 gulls dupes
 132 his Witgood's
 135 abroad out of his lodgings, where this scene occurs

JANE	You're welcome, Master Hoard.	LAMPREY	What we speak Our lives and means are ready to make good.	170
HOARD	Dispatch, sweet gentlemen, dispatch. I am come, widow, to prove those my words	JANE	Alas, how soon are we poor souls beguiled!
140	Neither of envy sprung, nor of false tongues, But such as their deserts and actions Do merit and bring forth, all which these gentlemen Well known and better reputed will confess.	SPITCHCOCK	And for his uncle—
JANE [to Lamprey and Spitchcock]	I cannot tell	HOARD	Let that come to me. His uncle, a severe extortioner, A tyrant at a forfeiture, greedy of others'	175
145	How my affections may dispose of me, But surely if they find him so desertless, They'll have that reason to withdraw themselves. And therefore, gentlemen, I do entreat you, As you are fair in reputation,	LAMPREY	Nay, swallow up his father, if he can Within the fathoms of his conscience.
150	And in appearing form so shine in truth: I am a widow and, alas, you know, Soon overthrown; 'tis a very small thing That we withstand, our weakness is so great; Be partial unto neither, but deliver,	HOARD [aside]	Nay, believe it, widow. You had not only matched yourself to wants, But in an evil and unnatural stock.	180
155	Without affection, your opinion.	HOARD	[aside] Follow hard, gentlemen, follow hard!
HOARD	And that will drive it home.	JANE	Is my love so deceived, before you all? I do renounce him. [Kneeling] On my knees I vow He ne'er shall marry me.
JANE	Nay, I beseech your silence, Master Hoard. You are a party.	WITGOOD [aside]	Heaven knows he never meant it!	185
HOARD	Widow, not a word!	HOARD [aside to gentlemen]	There, take her at the bound. [Jane rises]
LAMPREY	The better first to work you to belief, Know neither of us owe him flattery, Nor t'other malice, but unbribed censure, So help us our best fortunes.	LAMPREY	Then with a new and pure affection Behold yon gentleman, grave, kind, and rich, A match worthy yourself. Esteeming him, You do regard your state.
JANE	It suffices.	HOARD [aside to gentlemen]	I'll make her a jointure, say.	190
LAMPREY	That Witgood is a riotous, undone man, Imperfect both in fame and in estate, His debts wealthier than he, and executions In wait for his due body, we'll maintain With our best credit and our dearest blood.	LAMPREY	He can join land to land, and will possess you Of what you can desire.
165		SPITCHCOCK [moving Jane toward Hoard]	Come, widow, come.
JANE	Nor land nor living, say you? Pray take heed You do not wrong the gentleman!	JANE	The world is so deceitful!
		LAMPREY	There 'tis deceitful Where flattery, want, and imperfection lies.

138 Dispatch make haste140 envy malice, enmity141 their Witgood's and Lucre's145 dispose of decide, determine150 appearing form outward appearance151-3 I... great Jane parodies the stereotype of widows as generally weak and vulnerable because of their sexual needs, thereby manipulating Hoard by appearing to confirm his assumptions about her.152 very small thing (a) very little adversity (b) penis153 withstand resist, oppose155 Without affection impartially158 a party a participant in the dispute, so possibly biased160 him Hoard161 t'other Witgood censure judgement162 So... fortunes The gentlemen stake their money as proof of their testimony rather than their integrity, as occurs in the more common formula, 'So help me God'.163 undone ruined165 executions warrants for seizure of the goods or person of a debtor in default of payment166 his due body i.e. his imprisonment for debt168-9 Pray... gentleman Jane implies that a misrepresentation of Witgood's estate could constitute slander, which was a legal offence.174 forfeiture a legal procedure in which goods are seized when a debtor cannot pay his debts176-7 swallow... conscience recalling the metaphor of Lucre's conscience as like an ocean at 1.1.8-12179 wants deficiencies, debts181 Follow hard i.e. keep pressing your arguments186 at the bound at the first opportunity190 regard take notice and care ofjointure an agreement that property be held in the name of both husband and wife, with a provision that the wife becomes sole owner in the event of her husband's death193 There i.e. with Witgood

195 But none of these in him! Push!
 JANE Pray, sir.
 LAMPREY [moving Jane closer to Hoard] Come, you widows are ever most backward when you should do yourselves most good, but were it to marry a chin not worth a hair 200 now, then you would be forward enough! Come, clap hands, a match.
 [He joins the hands of Jane and Hoard]
 HOARD
 With all my heart, widow! Thanks, gentlemen.
 I will deserve your labour, and thy love.
 JANE
 Alas, you love not widows but for wealth.
 I promise you, I ha' nothing, sir.
 205 HOARD Well said,
 Widow, well said. Thy love is all I seek,
 Before these gentlemen.
 JANE Now I must hope the best.
 HOARD
 My joys are such they want to be expressed.
 JANE But Master Hoard, one thing I must remember you 210 of before these gentlemen, your friends. How shall I suddenly avoid the loathed soliciting of that perjured Witgood and his tedious, dissembling uncle, who this very day hath appointed a meeting for the same purpose too, where, had not truth come forth, I had been 215 undone, utterly undone?
 HOARD What think you of that, gentlemen?
 LAMPREY 'Twas well devised.
 HOARD Hark thee, widow. Train out young Witgood single.
 Hasten him thither with thee somewhat before the 220 hour, where, at the place appointed, these gentlemen and myself will wait the opportunity, when, by some sleight removing him from thee, we'll suddenly enter and surprise thee, carry thee away by boat to Cole

Harbour, have a priest ready, and there clap it up instantly. How lik'st it, widow?
 225 JANE
 In that it pleaseth you, it likes me well.
 HOARD
 I'll kiss thee for those words. Come, gentlemen,
 Still must I live a suitor to your favours,
 Still to your aid beholden.
 LAMPREY We're engaged, sir.
 'Tis for our credits now to see't well ended.
 230 HOARD
 'Tis for your honours, gentlemen. Nay, look to't.
 Not only in joy, but I in wealth excel.
 No more sweet widow, but sweet wife, farewell.
 JANE Farewell, sir. Exeunt Hoard, Lamprey and Spitchcock
Enter Witgood
 WITGOOD O, for more scope! I could laugh eternally!
 235 Give you joy, Mistress Hoard. I promise your fortune was good, forsooth. You've fell upon wealth enough, and there's young gentlemen enough can help you to the rest. Now it requires our wits. Carry thyself but heedfully now, and we are both—
 240 [Enter Host as a servingman]
 HOST Master Witgood, your uncle.
Enter Lucre
 WITGOOD [aside to Jane] Cods me! Remove thyself awhile.
 I'll serve for him. [Exeunt Jane and Host] LUCRE Nephew, good morrow, nephew!
 WITGOOD The same to you, kind uncle.
 245 LUCRE How fares the widow? Does the meeting hold?
 WITGOOD O, no question of that, sir.
 LUCRE I'll strike the stroke then for thee; no more days.
 WITGOOD The sooner the better, uncle. O, she's mightily 250 followed.
 LUCRE And yet so little rumoured.

195 him Hoard
Push pish, an expression of impatience 196 Pray, sir an expression of resistance, indicated also by Lamprey's suggestion that the widow is backward at 3.1.198 199 chin...hair a young man, without a beard or wealth
 200 forward eager, willing 200-3.1.201.1 Come... [He joins...Hoard]
 Lamprey is the means by which Jane and Hoard engage in a handfast, a joining of hands as a sign of the spousal or marriage contract. He later boasts that he performs this act at 3.3.33. The handfast, the promise before witnesses
 (3.1.202-5 and 3.1.226), and the kiss
 (3.1.227) were all parts of the formal spousal.
 203 deserve (a) requite (b) be worthy of 204 not...but only 205 nothing (a) no lands or living (b) a vagina (Gordon Williams). Hoard may take the remark in the second sense and also assume that Jane is modestly understating her wealth; but her disclaimer is important to prevent the charge that she misrepresents her fortune to Hoard, which could invalidate the marriage.

 207 Before these gentlemen referring to the gentlemen as witnesses to his remark 208 want to be expressed are inexpressible, lack expression 211 suddenly shortly avoid get rid of 218 Train out entice, lure single alone
 223-4 Cole Harbour see note to 2.1.257
 224 clap it up settle the arrangement.
 The benediction of a priest and his pronouncement that Jane and Hoard were man and wife would complete all elements of the formal marriage ceremony, although the priest's involvement was not necessary for legal purposes. What Hoard proposes in the foregoing passage is a feigned abduction.
 226 In...well The response registers Jane's assent to the planned abduction and the marriage by appearing to surrender her option of dissent in deference to her husband. Jane is 'acting' the wife.

 233 wife Hoard's use of this word confirms that a marital contract has taken place in the preceding lines, as does Witgood's reference to Jane as Mistress Hoard at 3.1.236.
 236 promise assure
 237-9 You've...rest Witgood envisions Jane's needs in terms of money and sex. Marriage will provide her with the former, and he presumes she will entertain extra-marital affairs for the latter. Her remarks at 4.4.151-2 reflect different assumptions about her intent.
 242 Cods me corruption of 'God save me'
 243 serve for i.e. deal with 248 strike the stroke proverbial for 'do the deed', meaning here that he will sign over the mortgage
more days postponements, days of grace.
 This is usurers' language for the time a debt was due.

	WITGOOD Mightily! Here comes one old gentleman, and he'll make her a jointure of three hundred a year, forsooth. Another wealthy suitor will estate his son in his lifetime and make him weigh down the widow. Here a merchant's son will possess her with no less than three goodly lordships at once, which were all pawns to his father.		Enter with a Drawer, Hoard, Lamprey and Spitchcock	3.3
255	LUCRE Peace, nephew. Let me hear no more of 'em. It mads me. Thou shalt prevent 'em all. No words to the widow of my coming hither. Let me see, 'tis now upon nine. Before twelve, nephew, we will have the bargain struck. We will, i'faith, boy.		DRAWER You're very welcome, gentlemen. Dick, show those gentlemen the Pomegranate there.
260	WITGOOD O my precious uncle!	Exit [with Lucre]	HOARD Hist!
			DRAWER Up those stairs, gentlemen.
3.2	Enter Hoard and his Niece		HOARD Pist, drawer!	5
	HOARD Niece, sweet niece, prithee have a care to my house. I leave all to thy discretion. Be content to dream awhile. I'll have a husband for thee shortly. Put that care upon me, wench, for in choosing wives and husbands, I am only fortunate. I have that gift given me.	Exit	DRAWER Anon, sir.
5	NIECE		HOARD Prithee, ask at the bar if a gentlewoman came not in lately.
	But 'tis not likely you should choose for me, Since nephew to your chiefest enemy Is he whom I affect. But O, forgetful, Why dost thou flatter thy affections so, With name of him that for a widow's bed Neglects thy purer love. Can it be so? Or does report dissemble?		DRAWER William at the bar, did you see any gentlewoman come in lately? Speak you ay, speak you no.	10
10	[Enter George]		WILLIAM (within) No, none came in yet but Mistress Florence.
	How now, sir?		DRAWER He says none came in yet, sir, but one Mistress Florence.
	GEORGE		HOARD What is that Florence? A widow?	15
	A letter with which came a private charge.		DRAWER Yes, a Dutch widow.
	NIECE		HOARD How?
15	Therein I thank your care.	[Exit George]	DRAWER That's an English drab, sir. Give your worship good morrow.
	I know this hand.		[Exit]
	(Reading) Dearer than sight, what the world reports of me, yet believe not. Rumour will alter shortly. Be thou constant. I am still the same that I was in love, and I hope to be the same in fortunes.		HOARD A merry knave, i'faith. I shall remember a Dutch widow the longest day of my life.	20
20	Theodorus Witgood		LAMPREY Did not I use most art to win the widow?
	I am resolved. No more shall fear or doubt Raise their pale powers to keep affection out.	Exit	SPITCHCOCK You shall pardon me for that, sir. Master Hoard knows I took her at best vantage.
			HOARD What's that, sweet gentlemen; what's that?	25
			SPITCHCOCK He will needs bear me down that his art only wrought with the widow most.
			HOARD O, you did both well, gentlemen; you did both well. I thank you.
			LAMPREY
			I was the first that moved her.
			HOARD
			You were, i'faith.	30
			SPITCHCOCK
			But it was I that took her at the bound.
			HOARD
			Ay, that was you. Faith, gentlemen, 'tis right.
			LAMPREY
			I boasted least, but 'twas I joined their hands.
			HOARD
			By th' mass, I think he did. You did all well, Gentlemen, you did all well. Contend no more.	35
255	weigh down (a) outweigh in wealth (b) position his body on top of hers during sex	21 resolved decided
256	possess (a) endow (b) take possession of	3.3.0.1 Drawer one who draws liquor at a tavern, a tapster		(b) on the recoil, rebound. Both meanings imply some physical movement of Jane in the earlier scene and hence some pressure on her assent that verges on coercion. Spitchcock's role in the spousal seems to have been more physical than verbal, which could be made evident in the staging.
257	lordships lords' estates	2 Pomegranate Rooms of inns were given names rather than numbers.
	pawns pledges as security for debt	16 Dutch widow The term returns with added force at 5.2.107.
260	prevent anticipate, forestall	18 drab prostitute
3.2.5	only uniquely, pre-eminently	24 vantage opportunity, position
9	affect love	30 moved (a) put forward the issue, appealed to her (b) aroused her response (c) physically pushed her toward Hoard		33 joined their hands The remark and Hoard's response to it show that the handfast was initiated by Lamprey rather than Hoard or Jane.
12	purer because Joyce is a virgin	31 at the bound (a) with a leap forward
14	private charge an order to deliver the letter privately
15	hand handwriting, script

LAMPREY
Come, yon room's fittest.

HOARD
True, 'tis next the door.
Exit [with Lamprey and Spitchcock]
Enter Witgood, Jane [as a rich widow], and Host [as a servingman, with Drawer]

DRAWER You're very welcome. Please you to walk upstairs.
Cloth's laid, sir.

JANE Upstairs! Troth, I am weary, Master Witgood.

40 WITGOOD Rest yourself here awhile, widow. We'll have a cup of muscadine in this little room.

DRAWER A cup of muscadine? You shall have the best, sir.
[He starts to leave]

WITGOOD But do you hear, sirrah?

45 DRAWER Do you call? Anon, sir.

WITGOOD What is there provided for dinner?

DRAWER I cannot readily tell you, sir. If you please, you may go into the kitchen and see yourself, sir. Many gentlemen of worship do use to do it, I assure you, sir.
[Exit]

50 HOST A pretty, familiar, priggish rascal. He has his part without book!

WITGOOD Against you are ready to drink to me, widow, I'll be present to pledge you.

JANE Nay, I commend your care. 'Tis done well of you.
[Exit Witgood]

55 Alas, what have I forgot!

HOST What, mistress?

JANE I slipped my wedding ring off when I washed, and left it at my lodging. Prithree, run. I shall be sad without it.
[Exit Host]

60 So, he's gone! Boy!

[Enter Boy]

BOY Anon, forsooth.

JANE Come hither, sirrah. Learn secretly if one Master Hoard, an ancient gentleman, be about house.

BOY I heard such a one named.

65 JANE Commend me to him.

Enter Hoard with Lamprey and Spitchcock

HOARD I'll do thy commendations!

JANE
O, you come well. Away, to boat, be gone!

HOARD
Thus wise men are revenged: give two for one.
Exeunt
Enter Witgood and Vintner

WITGOOD I must request
You, sir, to show extraordinary care. 70
My uncle comes with gentlemen, his friends,
And 'tis upon a making.

VINTNER Is it so?
I'll give a special charge, good Master Witgood.
May I be bold to see her?

WITGOOD Who, the widow?
With all my heart, i'faith. I'll bring you to her! 75

VINTNER If she be a Staffordshire gentlewoman, 'tis much if I know her not.

WITGOOD How now? Boy! Drawer!
[Enter Boy]

VINTNER Hie!

BOY Do you call, sir? 80

WITGOOD Went the gentlewoman up that was here?

BOY Up, sir? She went out, sir.

WITGOOD Out, sir?

BOY Out, sir. One Master Hoard, with a guard of gentlemen, carried her out at backdoor a pretty while since, 85
sir.

WITGOOD Hoard? Death and darkness! Hoard!
Enter Host [as a servingman]

HOST The devil of ring I can find!

WITGOOD How now, what news? Where's the widow?

HOST My mistress? Is she not here, sir? 90

WITGOOD More madness yet.

HOST She sent me for a ring.

WITGOOD A plot, a plot! To boat! She's stole away!

HOST What?
Enter Lucre with Gentlemen

WITGOOD Follow! Enquire old Hoard, my uncle's adversary— 95
[Exit Host]

LCURE Nephew, what's that?

WITGOOD Thrice miserable wretch!

LCURE Why, what's the matter?

VINTNER The widow's borne away, sir. 100

LCURE Ha? Passion of me! A heavy welcome, gentlemen.

FIRST GENTLEMAN The widow gone?

LCURE Who durst attempt it?

42 muscadine a strong, sweet wine
50 pretty fine, smart familiar saucy
priggish crooked, thieving
51 without book by heart
52 Against by the time that
53 pledge toast
57 wedding ring The ambiguous source of this ring indicates Jane's transitional state at this point in the play. The ring may be from her feigned former husband, in which case she pretends to desire it for sentimental reasons and to mark her status as a widow. It may be from Hoard after the spousal, since she is already married to him, although she would have had to conceal its source from the Host. And it may be from Witgood in anticipation of the matchmaking that is supposed to take place immediately thereafter, perhaps even the ring given him by the Third Creditor at 3.1.54-6, which would give the Host another reason to fetch it. This confusion about whose ring she has worn reinforces the impression that Jane is a married woman even though the identity of her husband at this moment, among her many prospects, is obscure.

63 ancient (a) venerable, senior (b) old 68 give two for one give better than they get 68.2 Vintner a wine-merchant, or an innkeeper who sells wine
72 making matchmaking
76-7 'tis much if i.e. I'd be surprised if 85 carried (a) escorted (b) drove or forcibly impelled, in keeping with the planned, feigned abduction

	WITGOOD Who but old Hoard, my uncle's adversary?		Enter Dampit, the usurer, drunk	3.4
105	LUCRE How?		DAMPIT When did I say my prayers? In anno '88, when the great armada was coming; and in anno '99, when the great thundering and lightning was, I prayed heartily then, i'faith, to overthrow Powis' new buildings. I kneeled by my great iron chest, I remember.	5
	WITGOOD With his confederates.		[Enter Audrey]
	LUCRE		AUDREY Master Dampit, one may hear you before they see you. You keep sweet hours, Master Dampit. We were all abed three hours ago.
	Hoard, my deadly enemy! Gentlemen, stand to me. I will not bear it. 'Tis in hate of me. That villain seeks my shame, nay thirsts my blood. He owes me mortal malice. I'll spend my wealth on this despitiful plot Ere he shall cross me and my nephew thus.		DAMPIT Audrey.
110	WITGOOD So maliciously!		AUDREY O, you're a fine gentleman.	10
	Enter Host [as a servingman]		DAMPIT So I am, i'faith, and a fine scholar. Do you use to go to bed so early, Audrey?
	LUCRE How now, you treacherous rascal?		AUDREY Call you this early, Master Dampit?
115	HOST That's none of my name, sir.		DAMPIT Why, is't not one of clock i'th' morning? Is not that early enough? Fetch me a glass of fresh beer.	15
	WITGOOD Poor soul, he knew not on't.		AUDREY Here, I have warmed your nightcap for you, Master Dampit.
	LUCRE I'm sorry. I see then 'twas a mere plot.		DAMPIT Draw it on, then. I am very weak, truly. I have not eaten so much as the bulk of an egg these three days.	20
	HOST		AUDREY You have drunk the more, Master Dampit.
	I traced 'em nearly—		DAMPIT What's that?
	LUCRE Well?		AUDREY You mote an you would, Master Dampit.
	HOST And hear for certain,		DAMPIT I answer you, I cannot. Hold your prating. You prate too much and understand too little. Are you answered? Give me a glass of beer.	25
	They have took Cole Harbour.		AUDREY May I ask you how you do, Master Dampit?
	LUCRE The devil's sanctuary.		DAMPIT How do I? I'faith, naught.
120	They shall not rest. I'll pluck her from his arms. Kind and dear gentlemen, If ever I had seat within your breasts—		AUDREY I ne'er knew you do otherwise.
	FIRST GENTLEMAN		DAMPIT I eat not one penn'orth of bread these two years. Give me a glass of fresh beer. I am not sick; nor I am not well.	30
	No more, good sir. It is a wrong to us To see you injured. In a cause so just		AUDREY Take this warm napkin about your neck, sir, whilst I help to make you unready.
125	We'll spend our lives, but we will right our friends.		DAMPIT How now, Audrey-prater, with your scurvy devices. What say you now?	35
	LUCRE
	Honest and kind. Come, we have delayed too long. Nephew, take comfort: a just cause is strong.
	WITGOOD
	That's all my comfort, uncle.
	Exeunt [Lucre, Gentlemen, Vintner and Boy]
	Ha, ha, ha!
130	Now may events fall luckily, and well. He that ne'er strives, says wit, shall ne'er excel. Exit

107 stand to me i.e. stand by me110 owes bears111 despitiful contemptuous, scornful117 mere i.e. performed without the help of others118 nearly carefully, closely119 took proceeded todevil's sanctuary because criminals resided there. See note to 2.1.257.3.4.0.1 usurer Dampit is spoken of as a lawyer and a usurer throughout the play. All the money he made as a lawyer provides the capital for his second occupation.2 great armada the Spanish Armada of 1588, when England defeated Spain2-3 '99...was No great thunderstorms are recorded for this year, although they are for '89 and '98. Some editors emend the date, but the passage emphasizes the long lapse of time between Dampit's prayers, as Spencer suggests; and there is no reason to rely on Dampit's memory in any event.

4 Powis' new buildings This has been interpreted as an allusion to the house of a leatherseller named Poovey in St Paul's Churchyard, which was built of wood after a proclamation of 1 March 1605 forbade the use of timber in building construction. However, it would make no sense for Dampit to have prayed in 1599 for the overthrow of a building built in 1605. Since the point of the remark is that Dampit has not prayed in a long time and has had long gaps between his prayers, the allusion to an event in 1605 is unlikely. Sugden's proposal of a reference to Powis House at Lincoln's Inn Fields is the best suggestion to date.

Whatever is alluded to, the larger point of the phrase is that when Dampit prayed on this last occasion, his purpose was to invoke harm on someone else.

5 kneeled... chest Dampit uses his chest, which might contain his money and valuables, as an altar.16 nightcap a cap worn to bed23 mote archaic form of 'might', 'could' an if24 prating chattering, blabbing28 naught in a bad way, ruined, or in bad health. Audrey takes the word in its meaning of 'wickedly'.30 penn'orth pennyworth33 napkin a neckerchief, which was a cloth or scarf used to cover the neck or shoulders34 make you unready undress you

AUDREY What say I, Master Dampit? I say nothing but that you are very weak.
 DAMPIT Faith, thou hast more cony-catching devices than all London!
 40 AUDREY Why, Master Dampit, I never deceived you in all my life!
 DAMPIT Why was that? Because I never did trust thee.
 AUDREY I care not what you say, Master Dampit.
 45 DAMPIT Hold thy prating. I answer thee, thou art a beggar, a quean, and a bawd. Are you answered?
 AUDREY Fie, Master Dampit! A gentleman and have such words!
 DAMPIT Why, thou base drudge of infortunity! Thou kitchen-stuff drab of beggary, roguery and coxcomby, 50 thou cavernesed quean of foolery, knavery and bawdraminy! I'll tell thee what, I will not give a louse for thy fortunes!
 AUDREY No, Master Dampit? And there's a gentleman comes a-wooing to me, and he doubts nothing but that you will get me from him.
 55 DAMPIT Ay? If I would either have thee or lie with thee for two thousand pound, would I might be damned! Why, thou base impudent quean of foolery, flattery, and coxcomby, are you answered?
 60 AUDREY Come, will you rise and go to bed, sir?
 DAMPIT Rise, and go to bed too, Audrey? How does Mistress Proserpine?
 AUDREY Fooh!
 65 DAMPIT She's as fine a philosopher of a stinkard's wife as any within the liberties!—Fah, fah, Audrey!
 AUDREY How now, Master Dampit?
 DAMPIT Fie upon't! What a choice of stinks here is. What hast thou done, Audrey? Fie upon't. Here's a choice of 70 stinks indeed. Give me a glass of fresh beer, and then I will to bed.
 AUDREY It waits for you above, sir.
 DAMPIT Foh! I think they burn horns in Barnard's Inn. If ever I smelt such an abominable stink, usury forsake
 75 me! [Exit]

AUDREY They be the stinking nails of his trampling feet, and he talks of burning of horns! Exit
Finis Actus Tertius

Incipit Actus Quartus
Enter at Cole Harbour Hoard and Jane [disguised as a rich widow], married now; Lamprey and Spitchcock

4.1

LAMPREY
 Join hearts, join hands in wedlock's bands,
 Never to part till death cleave your heart.
 [To Hoard] You shall forsake all other women,
 [To Jane] You lords, knights, gentlemen, and yeomen.
 What my tongue slips, make up with your lips. 5
 HOARD [kissing her]
 Give you joy, Mistress Hoard! Let the kiss come about!
 [Knocking within] Who knocks? Convey my little pig-eater out.
 LUCRE [within] Hoard?
 HOARD
 Upon my life, my adversary, gentlemen!
 LUCRE [within]
 Hoard, open the door, or we will force it ope. 10
 Give us the widow.
 HOARD Gentlemen, keep 'em out.
 LAMPREY
 He comes upon his death that enters here.
 LUCRE [within]
 My friends assist me.
 HOARD He has assistants, gentlemen.
 LAMPREY
 Tut. Nor him, nor them, we in this action fear.
 LUCRE [within]
 Shall I in peace speak one word with the widow? 15
 JANE
 Husband and gentlemen, hear me but a word.
 HOARD
 Freely, sweet wife.

39 cony-catching cheating 46 quean prostitute
bawd procuress
 49 infortunity misfortune
 50 kitchen-stuff refuse from the kitchen
drab prostitute
coxcomby foolery
 51 cavernesed one of Dampit's coinages, probably meaning 'cavernous' or even 'cavern-arsed'
 51-2 bawdraminy a portmanteau coinage from 'bawdry' and 'dream', which conveys in one word Dampit's fantastical projection of bawdry onto Audrey 55 doubts nothing but fears nothing except 63 Mistress Proserpine an unclear reference in Dampit's drunken haze, perhaps to a bawd or prostitute, to Dampit's wife or landlady, or even to Audrey herself, any of whom might be associated with the Greek goddess who spent half the year in the underworld

 65 stinkard's stinkard: a smelly or despicable person, such as Dampit
 66 the liberties areas, especially in the suburbs of London, over which the city had jurisdiction but no effective control, and therefore places where prostitution, theatre, and other marginal activities flourished 73 burn horns Spoons, cups, lanterns, and other domestic utensils were often made of horn, and burning them may have produced an unpleasant smell; but this reference has never been adequately explained.
Barnard's Inn one of the Inns of Court, in Holborn

4.1.0.2 Cole Harbour see note to 2.1.257
 1 Join... hands The joining of hearts symbolically represented through the joining of hands refers back to the handfast at 3.1.200-3.1.201.1. A marriage ceremony in which Jane and Hoard made their vows in the presence of a priest has just concluded.
 2 cleave (a) split (b) pierce, penetrate (c) separate, sever. The entire line echoes passages in the marriage ceremony.
 5 slips neglects, omits
 6 come about come around. Hoard is inviting Lamprey and Spitchcock to kiss the bride.
 7 pig-eater a term of endearment, probably meaning breeder. Pregnant women were thought to crave pork.

JANE	Let him in peaceably.	I loved your nephew. Nay, I did affect him,
	You know we're sure from any act of his.	Against the mind and liking of my friends,
HOARD	Most true.	Believed his promises, lay here in hope
JANE		Of flattered living and the boast of lands.
20	You may stand by and smile at his old weakness.	Coming to touch his wealth and state, indeed	50
	Let me alone to answer him.	It appears dross. I find him not the man:
HOARD	Content.	Imperfect, mean, scarce furnished of his needs.
	'Twill be good mirth, i'faith. How think you, gentlemen?	In words, fair lordships; in performance, hovels.
LAMPREY		Can any woman love the thing that is not?
	Good gullery!	LUCRE
HOARD	Upon calm conditions let him in.	Broke you for this?
LUCRE	[within]	JANE	55
	All spite and malice—	Was it not cause too much?
LAMPREY	Hear me, Master Lucre.	Send to enquire his state: most part of it
25	So you will vow a peaceful entrance	Lay two years mortgaged in his uncle's hands.
	With those your friends, and only exercise	LUCRE
	Calm conference with the widow, without fury,	Why, say it did, you might have known my mind.
	The passage shall receive you.	I could have soon restored it.
LUCRE	[within]	JANE	60
	I do vow it.	Ay, had I
LAMPREY		But seen any such thing performed, why
	Then enter and talk freely. Here she stands.	'Twould have tied my affection and contained me
	Enter Lucre [with Gentleman and Host]	In my first desires. Do you think, i'faith,
LUCRE		That I could twine such a dry oak as this,
30	O Master Hoard, your spite has watched the hour!	Had promise in your nephew took effect?
	You're excellent at vengeance, Master Hoard.	LUCRE	65
HOARD		Why, and there's no time passed. And rather than
	Ha, ha, ha!	My adversary should thus thwart my hopes, I
LUCRE	I am the fool you laugh at.	would—
	You are wise, sir, and know the seasons well.	JANE
	Come hither, widow. [They talk apart] Why is it thus?	Tut, you've been ever full of golden speech.
35	O, you have done me infinite disgrace,	If words were lands, your nephew would be rich.
	And your own credit no small injury.	LUCRE
	Suffer mine enemy so spitefully	Widow, believe it. I vow by my best bliss,
	To bear you from my nephew! O, I had	Before these gentlemen I will give in	70
	Rather half my substance had been forfeit,	The mortgage to my nephew instantly
40	And begged by some starved rascal.	Before I sleep or eat.
JANE		FIRST GENTLEMAN
	Why, what would you wish me do, sir?	We'll pawn our credits,
	I must not overthrow my state for love.	Widow. What he speaks shall be performed
	We have too many precedents for that.	In fullness.
45	From thousands of our wealthy, undone widows	LUCRE	75
	One may derive some wit. I do confess	Nay more, I will estate him
		In farther blessings. He shall be my heir.
		I have no son.
		I'll bind myself to that condition.

18 You...his Jane refers to the binding nature of the spousal and the ceremony that has just ended. The marriage would not be secure if it occurred after a precontract with another party (which becomes a possibility at 4.4.99) or if the bride were taken under duress (which relates to Jane's charge at 5.2.132-4). Even at this point in the play, Jane exhibits her precise knowledge of marital law.

23 gullery trickery

25 So so long as

30 watched the hour awaited its opportunity

33 seasons i.e. favourable occasions

36 credit reputation

38-40 I...rascal This alternative remains a more likely possibility than Lucre recognizes if one considers Witgood a 'starved rascal'.

46 affect love

49 flattered exaggerated in its worth

50 touch i.e. test

50, 56 state estate

51 dross the impurities separated from metal by melting. The sentence adapts the metaphor of the touchstone, which was used for testing the quality of gold or silver alloys by rubbing them against a dark stone such as jasper. Here Jane herself serves as the touchstone.

52 mean (a) poor, of little value (b) low in social rank, not noble or gentle

53 performance fulfilment of promises

hovels squalid dwellings

63 twine...dry oak The elm with the vine twined around it was a Renaissance emblem of the husband and wife in marriage. Jane changes the elm to a dry oak to emphasize Hoard's age.

65 no time passed i.e. there is still time

69 best bliss referring to the hope of heavenly bliss

72 pawn our credits pledge our reputations

- Call thy fresh blood into thy cheeks again.
She comes—
- WITGOOD Nothing afflicts me so much 30 But that it is your adversary, uncle,
And merely plotted in despite of you.
- LUCRE Ay, that's it mads me, spites me! I'll spend my wealth ere he shall carry her so, because I know 'tis only to spite me. Ay, this is it. Here, nephew. [Offering 35 him a paper] Before these kind gentlemen I deliver in your mortgage, my promise to the widow. See, 'tis done.
Be wise. You're once more master of your own. The widow shall perceive now you are not altogether such 40 a beggar as the world reputes you. You can make shift to bring her to three hundred a year, sir.
- FIRST GENTLEMAN
By'r Lady, and that's no toy, sir.
- LUCRE
A word, nephew.
- FIRST GENTLEMAN [to Host]
Now you may certify the widow.
- LUCRE
You must conceive it aright, nephew, now.
To do you good I am content to do this.
- 45 WITGOOD I know it, sir.
- LUCRE
But your own conscience can tell I had it Dearly enough of you.
- WITGOOD Ay, that's most certain.
- LUCRE
Much money laid out, beside many a journey
To fetch the rent. I hope you'll think on't, nephew.
- WITGOOD
50 I were worse than a beast else, i'faith.
- LUCRE
Although to blind the widow and the world
I out of policy do't, yet there's a conscience, nephew.
- WITGOOD
Heaven forbid else!
- LUCRE When you are full possessed,
'Tis nothing to return it.
- WITGOOD
Alas, a thing quickly done, uncle.
- LUCRE
Well said. You know I give it you but in trust.
- WITGOOD
Pray, let me understand you rightly, uncle.
You give it me but in trust.
- LUCRE No.
- WITGOOD
That is, you trust me with it.
- LUCRE True, true.
- WITGOOD [aside] But if ever I trust you with it again, would 60 I might be trussed up for my labour.
- LUCRE You can all witness, gentlemen—and you, sir yeoman!
- HOST My life for yours, sir. Now I know my mistress' mind too well toward your nephew. Let things be in 65 preparation, and I'll train her hither in most excellent fashion. Exit
- LUCRE A good old boy. Wife Jenny!
Enter Wife
- WIFE What's the news, sir?
- LUCRE The wedding day's at hand. Prithee, sweet wife, 70 express thy housewifery. Thou'rt a fine cook, I know't.
Thy first husband married thee out of an alderman's kitchen. Go to! He raised thee for raising of paste, what?
Here's none but friends. Most of our beginnings must be winked at. Gentlemen, I invite you all to my nephew's 75 wedding against Thursday morning.
- FIRST GENTLEMAN
With all our hearts. And we shall joy to see Your enemy so mocked.
- LUCRE He laughed at me,
Gentlemen. Ha, ha, ha! Exeunt [all but Witgood]
- WITGOOD He has no conscience, faith,
80 Would laugh at them; they laugh at one another!
Who then can be so cruel? Troth, not I.
I rather pity now than aught envy.
I do conceive such joy in mine own happiness,
I have no leisure yet to laugh at their follies.

31 merely . . . you planned solely to spite you 33 carry win
35 deliver in reconvey, i.e. return with the debt cancelled
39 make shift manage
41 By'r Lady an oath referring to the Virgin Mary toy trifle
42 certify assure 47 Dearly expensively, with reference to the high cost
56 in trust (a) as a property still in Lucre's name that Witgood would eventually inherit from him, but without present ownership having been transferred (b) as a property now placed in Witgood's name that Lucre trusts him to return once he has married Jane. Witgood's response at 4.2.58, which Lucre denies, can be taken to mean either alternative but especially the first; his rephrasing at 4.2.59, to which Lucre assents, proposes only the second.

61 trussed up hanged, punning on trust
66 train conduct, entice
71 express show
72-3 out . . . kitchen Lucre reveals that his wife worked as a cook until she married her first husband. Given what else we know about Lucre, the information suggests that he may have married her because she was another rich widow.
73 Go to! Come, come. Jenny has objected to Lucre's reference to her lower class origins.

raised . . . paste elevated her to her husband's social rank by marriage because (a) she was a good baker, referring to dough that rises through the effect of yeast, and because (b) she moved him sexually 74 beginnings (a) social origins (b) moments of conception
75 winked at turned a blind eye toward 79 He Lucre
80 Would i.e. who would them Hoard and his friends they Lucre and Hoard
82 ought envy bear malice towards anyone

- [He addresses the mortgage]
 85 Thou soul of my estate, I kiss thee.
 I miss life's comfort when I miss thee.
 O, never will we part again
 Until I leave the sight of men.
 We'll ne'er trust conscience of our kin
 90 Since cozenage brings that title in. [Exit]
- 4.3 Enter three Creditors
 FIRST CREDITOR I'll wait these seven hours, but I'll see him caught.
 SECOND CREDITOR Faith, so will I.
 THIRD CREDITOR Hang him, prodigal. He's stripped of the widow.
 5 FIRST CREDITOR O' my troth, she's the wiser. She has made the happier choice. And I wonder of what stuff those widows' hearts are made of, that will marry unfledged boys before comely thrum-chinned gentlemen.
 Enter a Boy
 10 BOY News, news, news!
 FIRST CREDITOR What, boy?
 BOY The rioter is caught!
 FIRST CREDITOR So, so, so, so! [Exit Boy]
 It warms me at the heart. I love a' life to see dogs upon 15 men. O, here he comes.
 Enter Witgood with sergeants
 WITGOOD My last joy was so great, it took away the sense of all future afflictions. What a day is here o'ercast!
 How soon a black tempest rises!
 FIRST CREDITOR O, we may speak with you now, sir. What's become of your rich widow? I think you may cast your cap at the widow, may you not, sir?
 20 SECOND CREDITOR He, a rich widow? Who? A prodigal, a daily rioter and a nightly vomiter. He, a widow of account? He a hole i'th' counter!
 WITGOOD You do well, my masters, to tyrannize over misery, to afflict the afflicted. 'Tis a custom you have here amongst you. I would wish you never leave it, and I hope you'll do as I bid you.
 25 FIRST CREDITOR Come, come, sir. What say you extempore now to your bill of a hundred pound? [Handing him a
- paper*] A sweet debt, for frotting your doublets.
 SECOND CREDITOR [handing another paper] Here's mine of forty.
 THIRD CREDITOR [handing another paper] Here's mine of fifty.
 WITGOOD Pray, sirs, you'll give me breath. 35
 FIRST CREDITOR No, sir, we'll keep you out of breath still.
 Then we shall be sure you will not run away from us.
 WITGOOD Will you but hear me speak?
 SECOND CREDITOR You shall pardon us for that, sir. We know you have too fair a tongue of your own. You overcame us too lately. A shame take you! We are like to lose all that for want of witnesses. We dealt in policy then. Always, when we strive to be most politic, we prove most coxcombs. Non plus ultra. I perceive by us we're not ordained to thrive by wisdom, and therefore 45 we must be content to be tradesmen.
 WITGOOD Give me but reasonable time, and I protest I'll make you ample satisfaction.
 FIRST CREDITOR Do you talk of reasonable time to us?
 WITGOOD 'Tis true, beasts know no reasonable time. 50
 SECOND CREDITOR We must have either money or carcass.
 WITGOOD Alas, what good will my carcass do you?
 THIRD CREDITOR O, 'tis a secret delight we have amongst us. We that are used to keep birds in cages have the heart to keep men in prison, I warrant you. 55
 WITGOOD [aside] I perceive I must crave a little more aid from my wits. Do but make shift for me this once, and I'll forswear ever to trouble you in the like fashion hereafter. I'll have better employment for you, an I live.
 [To creditors] You'll give me leave, my masters, to make 60 trial of my friends and raise all means I can?
 FIRST CREDITOR That's our desires, sir.
 Enter Host [as a servingman]
 HOST Master Witgood!
 WITGOOD O, art thou come?
 HOST May I speak one word with you in private, sir? 65
 [Sergeants hold Witgood back]
 WITGOOD No, by my faith, canst thou. I am in hell here and the devils will not let me come to thee.
 CREDITORS [all talking at once] Do you call us devils? You shall find us puritans! [To sergeants] Bear him away! Let 85 Thou... thee Compare Volpone's opening address to his gold, 'O thou son of Sol, ... let me kiss, | With adoration, thee' in Volpone at 1.1.10-12.

90 cozenage (a) trickery (b) kinship, cousinship that title (a) i.e. of kin (b) the mark of ownership or title to the mortgage 4.3.9 thrum-chinned bearded. The thrum was the row of threads left hanging on a piece of cloth and the loom on which it was woven after the cloth was cut off; it would resemble fringe.

14 a' life i.e. as much as my life

14-15 dogs upon men i.e. sergeants with men in their grasp

20-1 cast... at give up

24 account punning on 'cunt'

hole... counter one of the worst cells in the city prisons for debtors. Counter also puns on 'cunt'; and hole has similar associations.

29-30 extempore now immediately

31 frotting rubbing with perfume

42 all that i.e. the money and jewellery that the creditors gave to Witgood at 3.1.36-64

policy cunning

43-6 Always... tradesmen Compare the play's final line at 5.2.204.

44 Non plus ultra no farther

50 beasts... time i.e. animals are never rational, because humans alone are defined as animal rationale

51 carcass referring to Witgood's threatened imprisonment for debt

57 make shift work a scheme

58, 59 you i.e. his wits

68 Creditors The speech headings of the 1608 and 1616 editions read Cit, for citizens, which suggests that the creditors had the status of those associated with certain London trade guilds.

69 puritans i.e. strict in enforcing laws rather than, like devils, transgressing them

70 'em talk as they go. We'll not stand to hear 'em. [To Witgood] Ah, sir, am I a devil? I shall think the better of myself as long as I live! A devil, i'faith! Exeunt

4.4 Enter Hoard

HOARD What a sweet blessing hast thou, Master Hoard! Above a multitude! Wilt thou never be thankful? How dost thou think to be blessed another time? Or dost thou count this the full measure of thy happiness? By my troth, I think thou dost. Not only a wife large in possessions, but spacious in content. She's rich, she's young, she's fair, she's wise. When I wake, I think of her lands—that revives me. When I go to bed, I dream of her beauty, and that's enough for me. She's worth four hundred a year in her very smock, if a man knew how to use it. But the journey will be all, in troth, into the country—to ride to her lands in state and order following my brother and other worshipful gentlemen, whose companies I ha' sent down for already, to ride along with us in their goodly decorum beards, their broad velvet cassocks and chains of gold twice or thrice double. Against which time, I'll entertain some ten men of mine own into liveries, all of occupations or qualities. I will not keep an idle man about me. The sight of which will so vex my adversary, Lucre—for we'll pass by his door of purpose, make a little stand for nonce, and have our horses curvet before the window—certainly he will never endure it, but run up and hang himself presently!

[Enter Servant]

How now, sirrah, what news? Any that offer their service to me yet?

SERVANT Yes, sir. There are some i'th' hall that wait for your worship's liking and desire to be entertained.

HOARD Are they of occupation?

SERVANT They are men fit for your worship, sir.

HOARD Say'st so? Send 'em all in! [Exit Servant]
To see ten men ride after me in watchet liveries with orange-tawny caps, 'twill cut his comb, i'faith.

Enter [Tailor, Barber, Perfumer, Falconer, and Huntsman]

How now? Of what occupation are you, sir?

TAILOR A tailor, an't please your worship.

HOARD A tailor? O, very good. You shall serve to make all the liveries. What are you, sir? 35

BARBER A barber, sir.

HOARD A barber! Very needful. You shall shave all the house, and if need require, stand for a reaper i'th'summertime. You, sir? 40

PERFUMER A perfumer.

HOARD I smelt you before. Perfumers of all men had need carry themselves uprightly, for if they were once knaves, they would be smelt out quickly. To you, sir?

FALCONER A falconer, an't please your worship. 45

HOARD Sa ho, sa ho, sa ho! And you, sir?

HUNTSMAN A huntsman, sir.

HOARD There boy, there boy, there boy! I am not so old but I have pleasant days to come. I promise you, my masters, I take such a good liking to you that I entertain you all. I put you already into my countenance, and you shall be shortly in my livery. But especially you two—my jolly falconer and my bonny huntsman. We shall have most need of you at my wife's manor houses i'th' country. There's goodly parks and champaign grounds for you. We shall have all our sports within ourselves. All the gentlemen o'th' country shall be beholden to us and our pastimes. 50 55

FALCONER And we'll make your worship admire, sir.

HOARD Say'st thou so? Do but make me admire, and thou shalt want for nothing. My tailor? 60

TAILOR Anon, sir.

HOARD Go presently in hand with the liveries.

TAILOR I will, sir.

HOARD My barber?

65

BARBER Here, sir.

HOARD Make 'em all trim fellows. Louse 'em well, especially my huntsman, and cut all their beards of the Polonian fashion. My perfumer?

4.4.1–23 What . . . presently Hoard's speech voices the fantasy of owning a country estate and achieving the social status of the landed gentry.

6 spacious in content ample in her ability to content me

10 in . . . smock i.e. without her outer clothing or additional possessions. The assessment places a monetary value on Jane's body.

11 use it employ Jane's body for profit

12 country punning on 'cunt'. Hoard's journey to the widow's country lands is analogous to a journey into her body.

14 companies presence

15 decorum decorous, an adjectival use of the noun

16 cassocks long, loose coats

17–18 entertain . . . liveries employ as uniformed servants

18 occupations or qualities particular trades or abilities

21 for nonce expressly, for that purpose

22 curvet leap in such a way that the horses' fore-legs are raised together and equally advanced, and the hind-legs are raised with a spring before the fore-legs touch the ground

23 up perhaps upstairs

27 entertained i.e. taken into service

31 watchet liveries pale blue uniforms

32 orange-tawny Francis Bacon remarks in his essay 'Of Usury' that 'usurers should have orange-tawny bonnets, because they do Judaize', i.e. imitate Jews. The colour was also associated with courtiers and may symbolize pride.

cut his comb take him down, humiliate

36 liveries clothing for servants, one of Hoard's preoccupations given his new status

39 reaper one who harvests grain

46 Sa ho a cry used at the sighting of game in hunting hawks

48 There boy a hunting call

51 countenance favour

53 falconer . . . huntsman Hoard's preference for the falconer and huntsman reflects his desire for forms of recreation specific to the country and the status such sports bring, as he suggests at 4.4.56–8.

55 champaign level, open country

59 admire marvel, wonder

67 Louse 'em i.e. remove their lice

69 Polonian Polish, possibly referring to a style that was current at the time. The Poles were said by Fynes Moryson in 1617 to prefer closely-trimmed hair on the head except for a long forelock.

70 PERFUMER Under your nose, sir.
 HOARD Cast a better savour upon the knaves, to take away the scent of my tailor's feet and my barber's lotium-water.
 PERFUMER It shall be carefully performed, sir.
 75 HOARD But you, my falconer and huntsman, the welcom'st men alive, i'faith!
 HUNTSMAN And we'll show you that, sir, shall deserve your worship's favour!
 HOARD I prithee, show me that. Go, you knaves all, and 80 wash your lungs i'th' buttery. Go.
 [Exeunt Tailor, Barber, Perfumer, Falconer, and Huntsman]
 [Calling something to mind] By th' mass, and well remembered! I'll ask my wife that question. Wife, Mistress Jane Hoard!
 Enter [Jane as Hoard's wife] altered in apparel
 JANE Sir, would you with me?
 85 HOARD I would but know, sweet wife, which might stand best to thy liking, to have the wedding dinner kept here or i'th' country?
 JANE Hum. Faith, sir, 'twould like me better here. Here you were married; here let all rites be ended.
 90 HOARD Could a marquise give a better answer? Hoard, bear thy head aloft: thou'st a wife will advance it.
 [Enter Host as a servingman with a letter]
 What haste comes here now? Yea, a letter. Some dreg of my adversary's malice. Come hither. What's the news?
 95 HOARD [giving letter to Jane] A thing that concerns my mistress, sir.
 HOARD Why then it concerns me, knave!
 HOARD [aside] Ay, and you, knave, too.—Cry your worship mercy! You are both like to come into trouble, I promise you, sir. A precontract.
 100 HOARD How? A precontract, say'st thou?
 HOARD I fear they have too much proof on't, sir. Old Lucre, he runs mad up and down and will to law as fast as he can. Young Witgood, laid hold on by his creditors, he exclaims upon you o' t'other side, says you have 105 wrought his undoing by the injurious detaining of his contract.
 HOARD Body o' me!

HOST
 He will have utmost satisfaction.
 The law shall give him recompense, he says.
 JANE [aside] Alas, his creditors so merciless, my state being 110 yet uncertain, I deem it not unconscionable to further him.
 HOARD True, sir.
 HOARD
 Wife, what says that letter? Let me construe it.
 JANE [tearing letter and stamping on it]
 Cursed be my rash and unadvised words!
 115 I'll set my foot upon my tongue
 And tread my inconsiderate grant to dust.
 HOARD Wife—
 HOARD [aside] A pretty shift, i'faith. I commend a woman when she can make away a letter from her husband 120 handsomely, and this was cleanly done, by my troth.
 JANE [to Hoard] I did, sir.
 Some foolish words I must confess did pass
 Which now, litigiously, he fastens on me.
 HOARD
 Of what force? Let me examine 'em.
 125 JANE
 Too strong, I fear. Would I were well freed of him.
 HOARD Shall I compound?
 JANE
 No, sir. I'd have it done some nobler way
 Of your side. I'd have you come off with honour.
 Let baseness keep with them. Why, have you not 130 The means, sir? The occasion's offered you.
 HOARD Where? How, dear wife?
 JANE He is now caught by his creditors. The slave's needy, his debts petty. He'll rather bind himself to all inconveniences than rot in prison. By this only means 135 you may get a release from him. 'Tis not yet come to his uncle's hearing. Send speedily for the creditors. By this time he's desperate, he'll set his hand to anything.
 Take order for his debts, or discharge 'em quite. A pox on him! Let's be rid of a rascal!
 140 HOARD Excellent!
 Thou dost astonish me. Go! Run! Make haste!
 Bring both the creditors and Witgood hither.

71 savour scent
 73 lotium-water stale urine, used by barbers as a hair rinse
 80 wash...buttery i.e. have a drink in the storeroom or pantry 90 marquise a noblewoman of the second rank of the peerage, below a duchess and above a countess, and therefore considerably more elevated in class than Hoard assumes Jane to be. The term marquess or marquis was used in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to refer to persons of both sexes, and a woman could hold the rank in her own right. The wife or widow of a marquess could be referred to in these ways or as a 'marchioness'.

 99 precontract an agreement to marry, which would form an impediment to subsequent marriage to another person 105 detaining withholding 111 uncertain (a) unknown (b) undetermined, because Hoard has not yet learned she has no wealth 111-12 I...him The aside shows that Jane is no longer blindly loyal to Witgood but weighs the ethics of continuing to support their joint deception. See note to 4.4.180-2.

 117 inconsiderate grant unconsidered or rash promise 121 handsomely cleverly
 cleanly adroitly 127 compound (a) bargain (in a general sense) (b) settle by means of payment 136 release a document freeing someone from contractual obligations 139 quite entirely

HOST [aside]
This will be some revenge yet. [Exit]

HOARD
In the mean space, I'll have a release drawn. Within 145 there!
[Enter Servant]

SERVANT Sir?

HOARD
Sirrah, come take directions. Go to my scrivener.

JANE [aside as Hoard talks to Servant]
I'm yet like those whose riches lie in dreams.
If I be waked, they're false. Such is my fate, 150 Who ventures deeper than the desperate state.
Though I have sinned, yet could I become new,
For where I once vow, I am ever true.

HOARD
Away! Dispatch! On my displeasure, quickly!
[Exit Servant]

155 Happy occasion. Pray heaven he be in the right vein now to set his hand to't, that nothing alter him. Grant that all his follies may meet in him at once to besot him enough.
I pray for him, i'faith. And here he comes!
[Enter Witgood and three Creditors]

WITGOOD
What would you with me now, my uncle's spiteful adversary?

HOARD
Nay, I am friends.

160 WITGOOD Ay, when your mischief's spent.

HOARD
I heard you were arrested.

WITGOOD Well, what then?
You will pay none of my debts, I am sure.

HOARD A wiseman cannot tell.
There may be those conditions 'greed upon,
May move me to do much.

165 WITGOOD Ay, when?
[He sees Jane]
'Tis thou, perjured woman—O, no name

Is vile enough to match thy treachery—
That art the cause of my confusion!

JANE Out, you penurious slave!

HOARD
Nay, wife, you are too froward. 170
Let him alone. Give losers leave to talk.

WITGOOD
Shall I remember thee of another promise
Far stronger than the first?

JANE I'd fain know that.

WITGOOD 'Twould call shame to thy cheeks.

JANE Shame!

WITGOOD [aside] Hark, in your ear.
[They talk apart]

HOARD Will he come off, think'st thou, and pay my debts 175 roundly?

JANE Doubt nothing. There's a release a-drawing and all,
to which you must set your hand.

WITGOOD Excellent.

JANE But methinks, i'faith, you might have made some 180 shift to discharge this yourself, having in the mortgage, and never have burdened my conscience with it.

WITGOOD O' my troth, I could not, for my creditors' cruelties extend to the present.

JANE No more. 185
[Speaking aloud] Why, do your worst for that. I defy you.

WITGOOD
You're impudent. I'll call up witnesses.

JANE
Call up thy wits, for thou hast been devoted
To follies a long time.

HOARD Wife, you're too bitter.
Master Witgood, and you my masters, you shall 190 Hear a mild speech come from me now, and this it is.
'T'as been my fortune, gentlemen, to have An extraordinary blessing poured Upon me o' late, and here she stands. I have wedded her

144 This...yet Since the Host is still concerned about Witgood's loss of Jane, he sees the payment of his master's debts as a way in which Witgood can be requited for what he has lost.

147 scrivener a notary who, like the lawyer and the usurer, was sometimes despised for making a living off the misfortunes of others

150 Who...state Barber sees in this remark an indication that Jane has 'reached the state of despair and then gone beyond it'. She has just described Witgood as desperate at 4.4.138 and now says her actions take her beyond that state to a point of no return.

ventures (a) voyages (b) gambles

151-2 Though...true an indication that Jane chooses to remain faithful to Hoard. Her reference to a vow in the second line suggests the decision is not a departure from her past practice; instead, this is her first commitment of marriage, her relation with Witgood having been of a different sort. The biblical connotations of become new reinforce the sense that Jane is ready to assume a new identity as wife.

154 he i.e. Witgood

156 besot overcome

170 froward perverse, refractory. The charge was commonly made by husbands of their wives, and the word was frequently applied to shrews. So Hoard is already perceiving Jane's actions in terms of early modern assumptions about marriage and a husband's supposed right to control his wife's behaviour.

171 Give...talk proverbial (Tilley L458)

173 the first presumably the promise of Witgood's marriage to Jane referred to in the letter. The mention of a stronger promise is only a pretext to speak alone with Jane, but the reference may evoke the earlier liaison of Witgood and Jane. fain gladly

176 roundly completely

180-2 But...it Jane's remark shows her resistance to further complicity in Witgood's schemes and her conscience about her relation to him now that she is married. Her comments at 4.4.110-12 and 4.4.150-2 are consistent with this direct criticism of him.

194-5 wedded...her These words signal that the marriage contract and ceremony have concluded in a sexual consummation.

- 195 And bedded her, and yet she is little the worse.
Some foolish words she hath passed to you in the country,
And some peevish debts you owe here in the city.
Set the hare's head to the goose giblet.
Release you her of her words, and I will Release you of your debts, sir.
- 200 WITGOOD Would you so?
I thank you for that, sir. I cannot blame you, i'faith.
HOARD Why, are not debts better than words, sir?
WITGOOD Are not words promises, and are not promises debts, sir?
- 205 HOARD He plays at back-racket with me.
FIRST CREDITOR Come hither, Master Witgood, come hither.
Be ruled by fools once.
[Creditors talk apart with Witgood]
- SECOND CREDITOR We are citizens and know what belong
to't.
- 210 FIRST CREDITOR Take hold of his offer. Pox on her! Let her go! If your debts were once discharged, I would help you to a widow myself worth ten of her.
- THIRD CREDITOR Mass, partner, and now you remember me on't, there's Master Mulligrub's sister, newly fallen
a widow.
- 215 FIRST CREDITOR Cods me, as pat as can be! There's a widow left for you. Ten thousand in money, beside plate, jewels, et cetera. I warrant it a match. We can do all in all with her. Prithee, dispatch. We'll carry thee to her presently.
- 220 WITGOOD My uncle will ne'er endure me when he shall hear I set my hand to a release.
- SECOND CREDITOR Hark! I'll tell thee a trick for that. I have spent five hundred pound in suits in my time. I should be wise. Thou'rt now a prisoner. Make a release. Take't of my word: whatsoever a man makes, as long as he is in durance, 'tis nothing in law.
[He snaps his fingers]
- 225 Not thus much.
- WITGOOD Say you so, sir?
THIRD CREDITOR I have paid for't. I know't. 230
WITGOOD Proceed then, I consent.
THIRD CREDITOR Why, well said.
HOARD How now, my masters? What have you done with him?
FIRST CREDITOR With much ado, sir, we have got him to 235 consent.
HOARD Ah, ah, ah! And what came his debts to now?
FIRST CREDITOR Some eightscore odd pounds, sir.
HOARD Naw, naw, naw, naw, naw! Tell me the second time; give me a lighter sum. They are but desperate 240 debts, you know, ne'er called in but upon such an accident. A poor needy knave, he would starve and rot in prison. Come, come. You shall have ten shillings in the pound and the sum down roundly.
FIRST CREDITOR You must make it a mark, sir. 245 HOARD Go to, then. [Giving money] Tell your money. In the mean time, you shall find little less there. Come, Master Witgood, you are so unwilling to do yourself good now.
[Enter Scrivener]
Welcome, honest scrivener. Now you shall hear the release read. 250
SCRIVENER [reading] 'Be it known to all men by these presents that I, Theodorus Witgood, gentleman, sole nephew to Pecunious Lucre, having unjustly made title and claim to one Jane Meddler, late widow of Anthony Meddler, and now wife to Walkadine Hoard, 255 in consideration of a competent sum of money to discharge my debts, do forever hereafter disclaim any title, right, estate, or interest in or to the said widow, late in the occupation of the said Anthony Meddler, and now in the occupation of Walkadine Hoard, as 260 also neither to lay claim, by virtue of any former contract, grant, promise or demise, to any of her manor, manor houses, parks, groves, meadowgrounds, arable lands, barns, stacks, stables, dove-holes, and coney-burrows; together with all her cattle, money, plate, 265

197 peevish silly, trifling

198 Set... giblet proverbial for 'give tit for tat' (Tilley H161)

202 better i.e. more binding

205 back-racket return of the ball at tennis

214 Mulligrub's an allusion to Master
Mulligrub from Marston's The Dutch Courtesan, which was performed between 1603 and 1605 and printed in the latter year. The mulligrubs was a fit of melancholy or spleen.223 trick In the play's first two editions, this word is capitalized and italicized here and at 4.4.297 (Trick), also at 4.5.95 (Tricks) in the first edition, to call attention to the connection between these tricks and the play's title.226-7 whatsoever...law i.e. a contract made under duress can later be rendered invalid. Although this principle does not fully apply to Witgood, since theprecontract between him and Jane is a fiction, it does apply to Jane's marriage to Hoard. Its articulation here prepares us to understand the implications of her charge at 5.2.132-4.238 eightscore odd pounds about £160, which is less than the bills presented to Witgood at 4.3.29-34 for £190

239 Tell me count

240 desperate i.e. ir retrievable

241-2 ne'er...accident i.e. would never be paid except in special circumstances such as these, because the debtor would instead be placed in prison243-4 ten...pound i.e. half of the amount, since there were twenty shillings in a pound

244 down roundly reduced promptly

245 mark i.e. two-thirds of the amount, since a mark was worth 13s. 4d. or two-thirds of a pound. The amount comes to slightly over £106.

246 Tell count

251-2 these presents i.e. the present document

256 competent sufficient

259 occupation occupancy, possession. Since the word generally refers to property, its application to the widow in this exaggerated account of her fictional possessions suggests how thoroughly she is treated like an estate or territory that has been 'occupied' sexually and economically by her supposed first husband and then by Hoard (at 4.4.260).

262 demise conveyance

264 dove-holes dovescotes, structures housing doves or pigeons

264-5 coney-burrows rabbit warrens

265 cattle chattel, movable personal possessions

- jewels, borders, chains, bracelets, furnitures, hangings, movables, or immovables, in witness whereof I, the said Theodorus Witgood, have interchangeably set to my hand and seal before these presents, the day and date above written.'
- 270 WITGOOD What a precious fortune hast thou slipped here, like a beast as thou art!
- HOARD Come, unwilling heart, come.
- WITGOOD
Well, Master Hoard, give me the pen. I see 275 'Tis vain to quarrel with our destiny.
- HOARD O, as vain a thing as can be. You cannot commit a greater absurdity, sir.
[Witgood writes]
- So, so, give me that hand now. Before all these presents, I am friends forever with thee.
- 280 WITGOOD Troth, and it were a pity of my heart now if I should bear you any grudge, i'faith.
- HOARD Content. I'll send for thy uncle against the wedding dinner. We will be friends once again.
- WITGOOD I hope to bring it to pass myself, sir.
- 285 HOARD [to Creditors] How now? Is't right, my masters?
- FIRST CREDITOR 'Tis something wanting, sir; yet it shall be sufficient.
- HOARD Why, well said. A good conscience makes a fine show nowadays. Come, my masters. You shall all taste 290 of my wine ere you depart.
- ALL We follow you, sir.
[Exeunt Hoard, Jane, and Scrivener]
- WITGOOD [aside] I'll try these fellows now.—A word, sir. What, will you carry me to that widow now?
- FIRST CREDITOR Why, do you think we were in earnest, i'faith? Carry you to a rich widow? We should get much 295 credit by that! A noted rioter, a contemptible prodigal!
- 'Twas a trick we have amongst us to get in our money. Fare you well, sir. Exeunt Creditors
- WITGOOD Farewell and be hanged, you short pig-haired, ram-headed rascals! He that believes in you shall ne'er 300 be saved, I warrant him! By this new league, I shall have some access unto my love.
- [Niece] is above
- NIECE Master Witgood!
- WITGOOD My life!
- NIECE Meet me presently. That note directs you. I would 305 not be suspected. Our happiness attends us. Farewell!
- WITGOOD A word's enough. Exeunt
- A curtained bed is thrust forth. Enter Audrey, who spins by the curtains and sings* 4.5
- [AUDREY]
Let the usurer cram him, in interest that excel, There's pits enough to damn him, before he comes to hell.
In Holborn some, in Fleet Street some,
Where'er he come, there's some, there's some.
- DAMPIT [within the bed] Trahe, traheto, draw the curtain. 5
Enter Boy. He opens the curtains, discovering Dampit the usurer in his bed Give me a sip of sack more.
[Exit Boy, and reenters shortly with sack]
Enter Lamprey and Spitchcock
- LAMPREY Look you, did not I tell you he lay like the devil in chains, when he was bound for a thousand year?
SPITCHCOCK But I think the devil had no steel bedstuffs. He goes beyond him for that. 10
- LAMPREY Nay, do but mark the conceit of his drinking.
One must wipe his mouth for him with a muckender.
Do you see, sir?

266 borders ornamental work on the edge of garments, which might be made of costly materials

267 movables personal property capable of being moved, unlike land or houses

268 interchangeably reciprocally

269 presents i.e. witnesses

271 slipped i.e. let slip

285 Is't right i.e. is the sum of money correct?

292 try test

299 pig-haired close-cropped, a hairstyle of citizens

300 ram-headed cuckolded

301 new league friendship, truce, referring to the agreement with Hoard

4.5.1-4 Let... some The song is by Thomas Ravenscroft, a chorister at St Paul's Church, and was printed in his Melismata of 1611, where it is called 'The Scrivener's servant's song of Holborn'. The play's version lacks the first two lines: 'The master is so wise, so wise, that he's proceeded wittol, | My Mistress is a fool, a fool, and yet 'tis the most get-all.' These lines were probably dropped because Dampit is not clearly married, much less a wittol (an acquiescent cuckold). Reavley Gair says that Ravenscroft may have performed the role of Audrey. For Ravenscroft's music, see Companion, 140.

1 excel surpasses that of others

2 pits (a) brothels (b) women's mouths and genitals (Proverbs 22.14) (c) taverns (d) debt, the pit he has dug for others (Proverbs 28.10) (e) hell

3 Holborn... Fleet Street These are the streets where Dampit tramps about on his business, stopping along the way at the pits mentioned in (a) and (c) in the previous note.

5 Trahe, traheto Latin commands to 'draw', applying to both the curtains of Dampit's bed and to drink. In early productions Dampit was lying in bed on the inner stage, and its curtains served as his bed curtains.

6 sack white wine from Spain or the

Canary Islands

7-8 devil... year The allusion is to Revelations 22:1-2, where an angel binds the devil with a great chain for a thousand years. The chain seems to refer to Dampit's being held up or bound in bed, given the references to steel bedstuffs at 4.5.9 and 4.5.164-5, to his being set up a peg higher at 4.5.112, and to his being hung alive in chains at 4.5.164. Sampson proposes that Dampit may be lying on the great iron chest mentioned at 3.4.5, and it is at least likely that he is surrounded by chains and devices that suggest his avarice as well as the need for additional support in his drunken state.

9 steel bedstuffs metal slats laid horizontally across the bed frame to support the bedding

11 conceit personal vanity, here referring to the need for assistance from another person

12 muckender handkerchief

- SPITCHCOCK Is this the sick trampler? Why, he is only 15 bedrid with drinking!
LAMPREY True, sir. He spies us.
DAMPIT What, Sir Tristram? You come and see a weak man here, a very weak man—
LAMPREY If you be weak in body, you should be strong in 20 prayer, sir.
DAMPIT O, I have preyed too much, poor man.
LAMPREY There's a taste of his soul for you.
SPITCHCOCK Fah, loathsome!
LAMPREY I come to borrow a hundred pound of you, sir.
25 DAMPIT Alas, you come at an ill time. I cannot spare it, i'faith. I ha' but two thousand i'th house.
AUDREY Ha, ha, ha!
DAMPIT Out, you girnative quean! The mullipode of villainy, the spinner of concupiscency!
30 Enter Sir Lancelot and another gentleman LANCELOT [to Lamprey and Spitchcock] Yea, gentlemen, are you here before us? How is he now?
LAMPREY Faith, the same man still. The tavern bitch has bit him i'th' head.
LANCELOT We shall have the better sport with him.
35 Peace!—And how cheers Master Dampit now?
DAMPIT O, my bosom Sir Lancelot! How cheer I? Thy presence is restorative.
LANCELOT But I hear a great complaint of you, Master
Dampit, among gallants.
40 DAMPIT I am glad of that, i'faith. Prithee, what?
LANCELOT They say you are waxed proud o' late, and if a friend visit you in the afternoon, you'll scarce know him.
DAMPIT Fie, fie! Proud? I cannot remember any such thing.
45 Sure I was drunk then.
LANCELOT Think you so, sir?
DAMPIT There 'twas, i'faith. Nothing but the pride of the sack, and so certify 'em.—Fetch sack, sirrah.
- BOY [aside] A vengeance sack you once!
[Exit, and returns shortly with sack]
AUDREY Why, Master Dampit, if you hold on as you begin 50 and lie a little longer, you need not take care how to dispose your wealth. You'll make the vintner your heir.
DAMPIT Out, you babliaminy! You unfeathered, cremitor-ied quean! You cullisance of scabiosity!
AUDREY Good words, Master Dampit, to speak before a 55 maid and a virgin.
DAMPIT Hang thy virginity upon the pole of carnality!
AUDREY Sweet terms! My mistress shall know 'em.
LAMPREY [to Spitchcock] Note but the misery of this usuring slave. Here he lies like a noisome dunghill, full of the 60 poison of his drunken blasphemies, and they to whom he bequeaths all grudge him the very meat that feeds him, the very pillow that eases him. Here may a usurer behold his end. What profits it to be a slave in this world, and a devil i'th' next?
65 DAMPIT Sir Lancelot? Let me buss thee, Sir Lancelot. Thou art the only friend that I honour and respect.
LANCELOT I thank you for that, Master Dampit.
DAMPIT Farewell, my bosom Sir Lancelot.
LANCELOT [aside to Lamprey and Spitchcock] Gentlemen, an 70 you love me, let me step behind you, and one of you fall a-talking of me to him.
LAMPREY Content.—Master Dampit?
DAMPIT So, sir.
LAMPREY Here came Sir Lancelot to see you, e'en now.
75 DAMPIT Hang him, rascal!
LAMPREY Who, Sir Lancelot?
DAMPIT Pythagorical rascal!
LAMPREY Pythagorical?
DAMPIT Ay, he changes his cloak when he meets a 80 sergeant.
LANCELOT What a rogue's this!

17 Sir Tristram After fifteenth-century revivals of the Tristan story, the famous lover's name was associated with any libertine. Dampit addresses him by the name because lampreys were supposed to be strong aphrodisiacs.

21 prey made a prey of, plundered

28 girnative given to 'girling' or snarling, grinning

mullipode another coinage of Dampit's, perhaps meaning 'miserable toad' from 'mulligrubs', a fit of depression or low spirits, and 'pode', for toad

29 spinner probably referring to a spider. Audrey is spinning as the scene opens, and toads and spiders were thought to be venomous.

concupiscency lust, erotic desire

32-3 tavern... head The phrase, meaning

'he is drunk', suggests that the women who provide pleasure in taverns also exact their revenge, just as drinking does.

36 bosom dear friend

49 sack destroy

52 vintner wine merchant

53 babliaminy Dampit's word for a babbler

53-4 unfeathered, cremitoried quean i.e. balding, burnt out whore. Cremitoried might refer either to the exhaustion of a prostitute or to her syphilitic or burning condition, which would also account for the loss of hair. Dampit's curses on Audrey continue to project onto her a sexual deviance that has no support elsewhere in the play.

54 cullisance badge, meaning 'epitome', from a corruption of cognizance

scabiosity suffering from scabies, various skin diseases, here associated with syphilis

57 pole of carnality i.e. erect penis

58 My mistress a reference, perhaps, to Dampit's wife, who is not clearly mentioned elsewhere, or to his landlady; or an inconsistency in the text. Compare 3.4.63-6.

60 noisome harmful, foul-smelling

64 slave The usurer was frequently called a slave to his money.

66 buss kiss

79 Pythagorical An allusion to the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls, which in this reductive formulation likens a soul taking on a different body to a person changing his clothes in order to avoid detection by the law.

- LAMPREY [to Dampit] I wonder you can rail at him, sir. He comes in love to see you.
- 85 DAMPIT A louse for his love. His father was a comb maker. I have no need of his crawling love! He comes to have longer day, the superlative rascal!
- LANCELOT 'Sfoot, I can no longer endure the rogue.— Master Dampit, I come to take my leave once again, sir.
- 90 DAMPIT Who? My dear and kind Sir Lancelot? The only gentleman of England! Let me hug thee. Farewell and a thousand!
- LAMPREY Composed of wrongs and slavish flatteries!
- 95 LANCELOT Nay, gentlemen, he shall show you more tricks yet. I'll give you another taste of him.
- LAMPREY Is't possible?
- LANCELOT His memory is upon departing.
- DAMPIT Another cup of sack!
- 100 LANCELOT Mass, then 'twill be quite gone. Before he drink that, tell him there's a country client come up and here attends for his learned advice.
- LAMPREY Enough.
- DAMPIT One cup more, and then let the bell toll. I hope I shall be weak enough by that time.
- 105 LAMPREY Master Dampit.
- DAMPIT Is the sack spouting?
- LAMPREY 'Tis coming forward, sir. Here's a countryman, a client of yours, waits for your deep and profound advice, sir.
- 110 DAMPIT A coxcomby! Where is he? Let him approach. Set me up a peg higher.
- LAMPREY [to Lancelot] You must draw near, sir.
- DAMPIT [to Lancelot] Now, good man fooliaminy, what say you to me now?
- 115 LANCELOT [disguising his voice] Please your good worship, I am a poor man, sir.
- DAMPIT What make you in my chamber then?
- LANCELOT I would entreat your worship's device in a just and honest cause, sir.
- 120 DAMPIT I meddle with no such matters. I refer 'em to Master No-man's office.
- LANCELOT I had but one house left me in all the world, sir, which was my father's, my grandfather's, my great grandfather's, and now a villain has unjustly wrung me out and took possession on't.
- DAMPIT Has he such feats? Thy best course is to bring thy ejectione firmae, and in seven year thou mayst shove him out by the law.
- LANCELOT Alas, an't please your worship, I have small friends and less money.
- DAMPIT Heyday! This gear will fadge well. Hast no money? Why then, my advice is thou must set fire o'th' house and so get him out.
- LAMPREY That will break strife, indeed.
- 135 LANCELOT I thank your worship for your hot counsel, sir. [Aside to Lamprey and Spitchcock] Altering but my voice a little, you see he knew me not. You may observe by this that a drunkard's memory holds longer in the voice than in the person. But gentlemen, shall I show you a sight? Behold the little dive-dapper of damnation, Gulf the usurer, for his time worse than t'other.
- Enter Hoard with Gulf*
- LAMPREY What's he comes with him?
- LANCELOT Why, Hoard, that married lately the Widow Meddler.
- 145 LAMPREY O, I cry you mercy, sir.
- HOARD Now gentlemen visitants, how does Master Dampit?
- LANCELOT Faith, here he lies e'en drawing in, sir, good canary as fast as he can, sir. A very weak creature, truly. He is almost past memory.
- 150 HOARD Fie, Master Dampit. You lie lazing a-bed here, and I come to invite you to my wedding dinner. Up, up, up!
- DAMPIT Who's this, Master Hoard? Who hast thou married, in the name of foolery?
- HOARD A rich widow.
- 155 DAMPIT A Dutch widow?
- HOARD A rich widow, one Widow Meddler.
- DAMPIT Meddler? She keeps open house.
- HOARD She did, I can tell you, in her t'other husband's days—open house for all comers. Horse and man was welcome, and room enough for 'em all.
- 160 DAMPIT There's too much for thee, then. Thou mayst let out some to thy neighbours.
- GULF What, hung alive in chains? O, spectacle! Bedstaffs of steel! O monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens cui lumen
- 165

85 comb maker a member of one of the newer guilds, which had less prestige than the older guilds. Combs were used to remove lice.

86 crawling referring to head lice on combs

87 longer day more time to repay his debts

88 'Sfoot an oath, from God's foot

92-3 Farewell... thousand i.e. a thousand farewells

98 upon at the point of 100 quite utterly

104 let the bell toll i.e. for his funeral

111 coxcomby i.e. fool

114 fooliaminy i.e. foolishness

118 make do

119 device a feigned malapropism for 'advice'

127 feats crimes

128 ejectione firmae a writ permitting a person who had been ousted from lands or property to recover possession of it

132 Heyday an exclamation denoting surprise or wonder, here used ironically gear will fadge business will succeed

135 break (a) cause (b) destroy, end

141 dive-dapper dabchick, a small diving waterfowl, referring to Gulf's diminutive height as well as his moral constitution

146 O...sir Lamprey's apology for not recognizing Hoard, who may be looking especially fine

149 canary a sweet wine from the Canary Islands

150 past memory (a) a former event, i.e. dead (b) beyond being remembered or commemorated (c) lacking the capacity to remember or exercise judgement

158 She...house i.e. is a whore. Dampit puns on the medlar fruit, another name for which was 'openarse'. Hoard takes the remark to mean she is a generous hostess.

162-3 let out lend, presumably for money

165-6 O...ademptum Latin for 'O horrible monster, deformed, huge, deprived of sight', from Virgil's Aeneid III.658.

- ademptum!* O Dampit, Dampit! Here's a just judgement shown upon usury, extortion, and trampling villainy!
- LANCELOT This' exc'lent. Thief rails upon the thief.
- 170 GULF Is this the end of cutthroat usury, brothel, and blasphemy? Now mayst thou see what race a usurer runs.
- DAMPIT Why, thou rogue of universality, do not I know thee? Thy sound is like the cuckoo, the Welsh ambassador. Thou cowardly slave that offers to fight with a sick man when his weapon's down! Rail upon me in my naked bed? Why, thou great Lucifer's little vicar, I am not so weak but I know a knave at first sight. Thou inconscionable rascal! Thou that goest upon Middlesex juries and will make haste to give up thy verdict because thou wilt not lose thy dinner, are you answered?
- 175 180 GULF An't were not for shame—
Draws his dagger
- DAMPIT Thou wouldst be hanged then.
- LAMPREY Nay, you must exercise patience, Master Gulf, always, in a sick man's chamber.
- 185 LANCELOT He'll quarrel with none, I warrant you, but those that are bedrid.
- DAMPIT Let him come, gentlemen, I am armed. Reach my close-stool hither.
- LANCELOT Here will be a sweet fray anon. I'll leave you gentlemen.
- 190 LAMPREY Nay, we'll along with you.—Master Gulf.
- GULF Hang him, usuring rascal!
- LANCELOT Push! Set your strength to his, your wit to his.
- AUDREY Pray, gentlemen, depart. His hour's come upon him. [To Dampit] Sleep in my bosom; sleep.
- 195 LANCELOT Nay, we have enough of him, i'faith. Keep him for the house.
Now make your best.
For thrice his wealth, I would not have his breast.
- GULF
A little thing would make me beat him, now he's asleep.
- 200 LANCELOT
Mass, then 'twill be a pitiful day when he wakes.
I would be loath to see that day. Come.
- GULF
You overrule me, gentlemen, i'faith. Exeunt
Finis Actus Quartus
- ❁
- Incipit Actus Quintus*
Enter Lucre and Witgood 5.1
- WITGOOD
Nay, uncle, let me prevail with you so much.
I'faith, go, now he has invited you.
- LUCRE I shall have great joy there, when he has borne away the widow!
- WITGOOD Why, la! I thought where I should find you presently. Uncle, o' my troth, 'tis nothing so. 5
- LUCRE What's nothing so, sir? Is not he married to the widow?
- WITGOOD No, by my troth is he not, uncle.
- LUCRE How? 10
- WITGOOD Will you have the truth on't? He is married to a whore, i'faith!
- LUCRE I should laugh at that.
- WITGOOD Uncle, let me perish in your favour if you find it not so, and that 'tis I that have married the honest woman. 15
- LUCRE Ha! I'd walk ten mile afoot to see that, i'faith!
- WITGOOD And see't you shall, or I'll ne'er see you again.
- LUCRE A quean, i'faith? Ha, ha, ha! Exeunt
- Enter Hoard tasting wine, the Host following in a livery cloak* 5.2
- HOARD Pup, pup, pup, pup! I like not this wine. Is there never a better tierce in the house?
- HOST Yes, sir, there are as good tierce in the house as any are in England.
- HOARD Desire your mistress, you knave, to taste 'em all over. She has better skill. 5
- HOST [aside] Has she so? The better for her, and the worse for you. Exit
- HOARD Arthur!
[Enter Arthur]
- Is the cupboard of plate set out? 10
- ARTHUR All's in order, sir. [Exit]
- HOARD I am in love with my liveries every time I think on 'em. They make a gallant show, by my troth. Niece!
[Enter Niece]
- NIECE Do you call, sir?
- HOARD Prithee, show a little diligence and overlook the knaves a little. They'll filch and steal today and send whole pasties home to their wives. An thou beest a good niece, do not see me purloined. 15
- NIECE Fear it not, sir.

173-4 cuckoo...ambassador The cuckoo's harsh call signalled a cuckold. Gwyn Williams suggests that the relation between it and the Welsh ambassador may stem from the representation of the bird as a messenger of love in Welsh poetry; but the conjunction here is associated with an unpleasant sound.

176 my naked bed i.e. when I am naked in bed

178-9 Middlesex juries juries from this county near London were often mentioned as unreliable

188 close-stool a covered chamber pot set in a stool

199 breast i.e. conscience

5.1.5-6 I thought...presently i.e. I thought that is what you were thinking

5.2.2 tierce cask

3 tierce (a) a thrust in fencing (b) a band

or company of soldiers

6 skill discrimination in judging wine. Hoard is more readily duped by Jane because he lacks the knowledge of someone of her supposed class.

10 cupboard of plate a sideboard or cabinet for displaying plate or dishes, or the service of plate itself

17 pasties pies

- [Aside] I have cause. Though the feast be prepared for you,
 Yet it serves fit for my wedding dinner, too. [Exit]
Enter Lamprey and Spitchcock
 HOARD Master Lamprey and Master Spitchcock, two the most welcome gentlemen alive! Your fathers and mine were all free o'th' fishmongers.
 LAMPREY They were indeed, sir. You see bold guests, sir, soon entreated.
 HOARD And that's best, sir.
 [Enter Servant]
 How now, sirrah?
 SERVANT There's a coach come to th' door, sir. [Exit]
 HOARD My Lady Foxstone, o' my life. Mistress Jane Hoard, wife! Mass, 'tis her ladyship indeed!
 [Enter Lady Foxstone]
 Madam, you are welcome to an unfurnished house, dearth of cheer, scarcity of attendance.
 LADY FOXSTONE You are pleased to make the worst, sir.
 HOARD Wife!
 [Enter Jane]
 LADY FOXSTONE Is this your bride?
 HOARD Yes, madam.—Salute my Lady Foxstone.
 JANE Please you, madam, awhile to taste the air in the garden?
 LADY FOXSTONE 'Twill please us well.
Exeunt [Jane and Lady Foxstone]
 HOARD
 Who would not wed? The most delicious life!
 No joys are like the comforts of a wife!
 LAMPREY So we bachelors think, that are not troubled with them!
 [Enter Servant]
 SERVANT Your worship's brother with another ancient gentleman are newly alighted, sir. [Exit] HOARD Master Onesiphorus Hoard! Why, now our company begins to come in.
 [Enter Onesiphorus Hoard, Limber and Kix]
 My dear and kind brother, welcome, i'faith.
 ONESIPHORUS You see we are men at an hour, brother.
 HOARD Ay, I'll say that for you, brother. You keep as good an hour to come to a feast as any gentleman in the shire. What, old Master Limber and Master Kix! Do we meet, i'faith, jolly gentlemen?
 LIMBER We hope you lack guests, sir?
 HOARD O, welcome, welcome! We lack still such guests as your worships.
- ONESIPHORUS Ah, sirrah brother, have you catched up Widow Meddler?
 HOARD From 'em all, brother. And I may tell you, I had mighty enemies, those that stuck sore. Old Lucre is a sore fox, I can tell you, brother.
 ONESIPHORUS Where is she? I'll go seek her out. I long to have a smack at her lips!
 HOARD And most wishfully, brother. See where she comes. [Re-enter Jane and Lady Foxstone]
 Give her a smack now, we may hear it all the house over.
Both [Jane and Onesiphorus] turn back
 JANE O heaven, I am betrayed! I know that face!
 HOARD Ha, ha, ha! Why, how now? Are you both ashamed? Come, gentlemen, we'll look another way.
 ONESIPHORUS Nay, brother, hark you. Come, you're disposed to be merry?
 HOARD Why do we meet else, man?
 ONESIPHORUS That's another matter. I was ne'er so feared in my life but that you had been in earnest.
 HOARD How mean you, brother?
 ONESIPHORUS You said she was your wife?
 HOARD Did I so? By my troth, and so she is.
 ONESIPHORUS By your troth, brother?
 HOARD What reason have I to dissemble with my friends, brother? If marriage can make her mine, she is mine! Why?
 ONESIPHORUS Troth, I am not well of a sudden. I must crave pardon, brother. I came to see you, but I cannot stay dinner, i'faith.
 HOARD I hope you will not serve me so, brother.
 LIMBER By your leave, Master Hoard.
 HOARD What now? What now? Pray gentlemen, you were wont to show yourselves wise men.
 LIMBER
 But you have shown your folly too much here.
 HOARD How?
 KIX
 Fie, fie! A man of your repute and name!
 You'll feast your friends, but cloy 'em first with shame.
 HOARD
 This grows too deep. Pray let us reach the sense.
 LIMBER In your old age, dote on a courtesan—HOARD Ha?
 KIX Marry a strumpet!
 HOARD Gentlemen!
 ONESIPHORUS And Witgood's quean!

24 free o'th' fishmongers members of the Fishmongers' Guild, as the names Lamprey and Spitchcock suggest

30 Foxstone 'Stones' were testicles, so the name refers to the testicles of a fox. When powdered, these were supposed to be an aphrodisiac.

32 unfurnished unprepared

45–6 another ancient gentleman The subsequent dialogue indicates that two gentlemen accompany Onesiphorus Hoard.

50 men at an hour punctual

55 lack are without, have too few

61 stuck sore thrust forcefully. Stuck is a fencing term, from stoccardo.

62 sore stern, hard

68 I am...face It is clear as early as I.I.I.I4–15 that Onesiphorus Hoard knew of the relationship between Jane and Witgood when they were all in Leicestershire.

74 feared afraid

86 serve treat

- 100 HOARD O! Nor lands, nor living?
 ONESIPHORUS Living!
 HOARD [to Jane] Speak!
 JANE
 Alas, you know at first, sir,
 I told you I had nothing.
- HOARD
 105 Out, out! I am cheated! Infinitely cozened!
 LIMBER Nay, Master Hoard—
Enter Witgood and Lucre [with the Niece]
- HOARD
 A Dutch widow, a Dutch widow, a Dutch widow!
 LUCRE
 Why, nephew, shall I trace thee still a liar?
 Will make me mad? Is not yon thing the widow?
- WITGOOD
 110 Why, la! You are so hard o' belief, uncle.
 By my troth, she's a whore.
- LUCRE
 Then thou'rt a knave.
 WITGOOD Negatur argumentum, uncle.
 LUCRE Probo tibi, nephew. He that knows a woman to be a quean must needs be a knave. Thou sayst thou knowst 115 her to be one. Ergo, if she be a quean, thou'rt a knave.
 WITGOOD Negatur sequela majoris, uncle. He that knows a woman to be a quean must needs be a knave: I deny that.
- HOARD Lucre and Witgood, you're both villains. Get you 120 out of my house.
- LUCRE
 Why, didst not invite me to thy wedding dinner?
 WITGOOD And are not you and I sworn perpetual friends before witness, sir, and were both drunk upon't?
- HOARD
 Daintily abused! You've put a junt upon me!
- LUCRE
 Ha, ha, ha!
- HOARD
 A common strumpet!
- WITGOOD
 Nay, now
 125 You wrong her, sir. If I were she, I'd have
 The law on you for that. I durst depose for her
 She ne'er had common use, nor common thought.
- JANE [to Hoard]
 Despise me, publish me: I am your wife.
 What shame can I have now but you'll have part?
 130 If in disgrace you share, I sought not you.
 You pursued me, nay, forced me.
 Had I friends would follow it,
 Less than your action has been proved a rape.
- ONESIPHORUS Brother!
 135 JANE
 Nor did I ever boast of lands unto you,
 Money or goods. I took a plainer course,
 And told you true I'd nothing.
 If error were committed, 'twas by you.
 Thank your own folly. Nor has my sin been 140 So odious but worse has been forgiven.

100 Nor lands, nor living These words echo Jane's question at 3.1.168 about Witgood.

104 I...nothing See 3.1.205 and note.

107 Dutch widow Hoard learned that the phrase referred to a prostitute at 3.3.18.

108 trace find

112 Negatur argumentum Latin for '[your] argument is denied', a phrase appropriate to disputations at the universities.

113 Probo tibi 'I will prove it to you.' knows (a) perceives, recognizes (b) has carnal knowledge of through intercourse

115 Ergo therefore. The syllogistic and Latinate manner in which Witgood and Lucre dispute the disposition of Jane's sexuality parodies her objectification by Onesiphorus Hoard, Limber, and Kix in the previous lines. But Lucre's conclusion is that Witgood is equally to blame.

116 Negatur sequela majoris 'The implication of your major premise is denied.' Through denying the premise, Witgood avoids acknowledging his complicity in Jane's construction as a 'whore'.

124 junt trick, cheat

125 common strumpet The phrase suggested promiscuity in a way that courtesan did not, since courtesans in English Renaissance drama were often kept by a man rather than generally available. Common also implies a lower class of woman than one who would be described as a courtesan. See Introduction.

126-8 I'd...thought Witgood uses the language of legal defence to deny that Jane was ever commonly available as a sexual companion and to observe that Hoard's statement leaves him open to Jane's charge of slander in an ecclesiastical court. See Introduction.

127 depose offer testimony to a court, under oath

128 common (a) promiscuous (b) lower class use i.e. for sexual purposes thought reputation, i.e. was never considered to be generally available

129 publish publically denounce

132 You pursued...forced me Jane is referring to the coercion applied to her consent to the spousal at 3.1.192-225. She is charging that she was married under duress.

133 friends kinsmen, near relations, or advisors. As a married woman or feme covert, Jane would not be allowed to bring a suit on her own behalf in civil court. But were someone willing to bring the suit for her (and Witgood is a good candidate, since he witnessed the forced marriage at 3.1.192-225), the laws on record imply that she may have had some chance of success. Even though English law defined women who were unmarried but sexually experienced as 'whores', it also held that she who refused consent to a sexual act was not, at that time, a 'whore'. See the note on rape at 5.2.134 below and the Introduction for further discussion.

follow it prosecute the case

134 Less...rape The word 'rape' during the early modern period referred not only to forced sexual relations but to the act of abduction. Rich widows were especially vulnerable to abduction by men seeking to gain control of their wealth by forcing their consent to marriage. Proved in this passage implies that some suits by women against their abductors may have been successful. Hoard planned a feigned abduction of Jane at 3.1.218-25 and brought it off at 3.3.67-8. Although the latter scene is dramatized, there were no witnesses among characters in the play besides Hoard and his friends. Jane's resistance or compliance would therefore be difficult to establish in court. She does prefer to be married to Hoard, because he is her best option in a world that characterizes a woman in her situation as a 'whore'. Hence her charges of forced marriage and abduction are designed to pressure him into honouring his marriage as well as recognizing his own errors. See Introduction.

- Nor am I so deformed but I may challenge
The utmost power of any old man's love.
She that tastes not sin before twenty,
145 Twenty to one but she'll taste it after.
Most of you old men are content to marry
Young virgins and take that which follows,
Where marrying one of us, you both save
A sinner, and are quit from a cuckold forever.
150 "And more, in brief, let this your best thoughts win:
She that knows sin, knows best how to hate sin."
- HOARD
Cursed be all malice! Black are the fruits of spite,
And poison first their owners. O my friends,
I must embrace shame, to be rid of shame.
155 Concealed disgrace prevents a public name.
Ah Witgood! Ah Theorodus!
- WITGOOD Alas, sir, I was pricked in conscience to see her well bestowed, and where could I bestow her better than upon your pitiful worship? Excepting but myself, 160 I dare swear she's a virgin. And now by marrying your niece, I have banished myself forever from her. She's mine aunt now, by my faith, and there's no meddling with mine aunt, you know—a sin against my nuncle.
- JANE
165 Lo, gentlemen, before you all,
In true reclaimed form I fall.
[She kneels]
Henceforth forever I defy
The glances of a sinful eye,
- Waving of fans, which some suppose Tricks of fancy; treading of toes,
Wringing of fingers, biting the lip,
170 The wanton gait, th'alluring trip;
All secret friends and private meetings,
Close-borne letters and bawds' greetings;
Feigning excuse to women's labours
When we are sent for to th' next neighbours;
175 Taking false physic, and ne'er start
To be let blood, though sign be at heart;
Removing chambers, shifting beds
To welcome friends in husbands' steads;
Them to enjoy and you to marry,
180 They first served, while you must tarry,
They to spend and you to gather,
They to get and you to father.
These and thousand thousand more,
New reclaimed, I now abhor.
185 [She rises]
- LUCRE
Ah, here's a lesson, rioter, for you.
- WITGOOD
I must confess my follies. I'll down, too.
[He kneels]
And here forever I disclaim
The cause of youth's undoing: game.
190 Chiefly dice, those true outlanders
That shake out beggars, thieves and panders;
Soul-wasting surfeits, sinful riots,

- 142 challenge lay claim to. Jane is not modest about her power to win Hoard's affection.
- 148 one of us someone who is sexually experienced but unmarried, which was sufficient by the standards of the time to designate her a 'whore'
- 149 quit... forever A man who marries a woman reputed to be a 'whore' is saved from the danger of becoming a cuckold because his wife's sexuality was not contained before the marriage began.
- cuckold a husband whose wife commits adultery. Horns were often set on a man's head as a sign of public ridicule for his being unable to control his wife's sexuality. The word derives from cuculus, which was Latin for the cuckoo bird.
- 150-1 "And... sin." These lines appear in quotation marks in the play's first two editions.
- 159 pitiful compassionate
- 159-60 Excepting... virgin The play provides no reason to doubt this assertion.
- 163 aunt (a) the wife of Witgood's uncle (b) mistress, prostitute, a meaning associated with the sexual meanings of 'meddling'
- nuncle uncle
- 166-85 Henceforth... abhor This speech does not reflect on Jane's past so much as her future, for the 'tricks' she abjures

- are those of married women. One might read it as suggesting how fully Jane has accepted her role as a wife since she was married in 3.1.
- 166 defy renounce
- 169 fancy love
- 169-70 treading... lip Compare Dekker and Webster's Northward Ho! at 2.2.11-14: 'what treads of the toe, salutations by winckes, discourse by bitings of the lip, amorous glances, sweete stolne kisses when your husbands backs turn'd, would passe between them'.
- 170 Wringing claspings
- 171 trip quick, light movements of the feet
- 173 Close-borne secretly conveyed
- 174 women's labours childbirth
- 176 physic medical treatment
- 176-7 ne'er... heart Jane promises to avoid the physic of blood-letting when the astrological sign is in Leo (i.e. at heart), since that sign and some others were considered 'most dangerous for blood-letting, the Moon being in them', according to almanacs and medical books such as A prognostication everlasting of right good effect (1576) by Leonard Digges. Given the context, the phrase though sign be at heart probably also refers to a wife's sexual desires, which could prompt her to use the treatment as an excuse for infidelity or for being

