A MAD WORLD, MY MASTERS

Text edited and introduced by Peter Saccio, annotated by Celia R. Daileader

DICK FOLLYWIT, a prodigal trickster, replenishes his purse by thrice robbing his grandfather Sir Bounteous Progress. Frank Gullman, a Courtesan, furnishes Penitent Brothel with the opportunity for sex with Mistress Harebrain; Penitent in turn helps her to fleece both Sir Bounteous and two young heirs, Inesse and Possibility. These plots are standard fare deriving from the competition for women and money in ancient Roman comedy, the prodigal stories of the Elizabethan stage, and the con-catching pamphlets that describe the swindles and scams of sixteenth-century London. Middleton himself had included in The Ant and the Nightingale a brief variant of the Penitent/Harebrain plot: a starchwoman-bawd arranges adultery between a citizen's wife and a gentleman. In A Mad World, My Masters Middleton effectively joins his two major stories in the marriage of Follywit to the Courtesan, each deceived about the character of the other. Using the popular device of an internal play that reflects and resolves the main plots, Middleton brings his play to conclusion with a richly inventive and funny play-within-a-play that highlights Mad World's concern with performance.

With its intrigues for money and sex, the play strongly resembles the other London comedies Middleton wrote for performance by the Children of Paul's. In this case, however, the action is not limited to London: nine of its nineteen scenes are set at the country house of Sir Bounteous, to which other characters travel. (The allusion to Newbury Assizes in 4.4 suggests a location in Berkshire.) The ten London scenes are less insistent on the topography and practices of the town than are other Middleton comedies: fewer landmarks are mentioned, and the plot does not dwell heavily on the occupations, social tensions, and financial chicanery of the city. The Courtesan plies her trade in both town and country, as has her Mother before her. The story of Penitent Brothel and the Harebrains follows the familiar pattern of a gentleman cuckolding a citizen, but although the cast list given in the second edition (1640) identifies Penitent as a gentleman and Harebrain as a citizen no explicit use is made in the script of their class difference. They meet as equals in Act 4 and are entertained without distinction by Sir Bounteous in Act 5. The emphasis of the cuckolding plot therefore falls upon the cleverness of the scheme rather than the social fissures it could reveal. Furthermore, no innocent person in Mad World is wholly despoiled of his property like Easy in Michaelmas Term—the chief victim of plunder, Sir Bounteous, is surprisingly cheerful about his losses—and no one suffers the complete degradation of Dampit in

A Trick to Catch the Old One. Mad World is quite an amiable play.

Its characteristic dramatic actions lie in disguise and theatrical performance. The chief trickster, Follywit, appears as Lord Owemuch, as a masked burglar, as the Courtesan, and as a player in a travelling troupe who functions successively as manager, prologue, and actor improvising a play. Even in his final appearance 'in his own shape', kneeling before Sir Bounteous, he likens himself to an actor concluding a performance with a prayer for the company's patron. The opening dialogue, when Follywit wears no disguise, forms a kind of green-room scene in which he recalls earlier transformations of character and costume and prepares a new role. His comrades join his performances in appropriate supporting parts, planned or improvised. The other major intriguer, the Courtesan, adopts roles without disguise or name-change. To Inesse, Possibility, and eventually Follywit, she is a pious virgin. To Harebrain she is a spiritual director for his wife. In the central scene of the play she is (for Harebrain) a sick woman uttering her dying words and (for Sir Bounteous) his mistress undergoing the pangs of pregnancy, both roles being supported by Penitent's performance as doctor. She too has a green-room passage in the first scene, receiving stage directions from her Mother. Mistress Harebrain carries out in detail the Courtesan's advice for acting the role of chaste wife, and a devil impersonates Mistress Harebrain to tempt Penitent into further sin.

The complexities of performance ramify. When Follywit appears the morning after the robbery as Lord Owemuch bound in his bed; when the Courtesan delivers moral advice to a Mistress Harebrain who is actually in the next room committing adultery; when a devil appears as a blatantly lascivious Mistress Harebrain (clearly played by the same actor who plays the lustful but decorously behaved 'real' Mistress Harebrain); and when Penitent and Mistress Harebrain convert their repentance for adultery into a pretence for Harebrain's benefit that no adultery could occur, the dizzying vortex of performances spins into ever more imaginative scripts. It is appropriate that Mad World should end with a play-within-the-play, that the inner play, The Slip, should exist only as a last-ditch improvisation by Follywit and his Lieutenant, and that a genuine 'Constable i'th' commonwealth' should be taken as 'the Constable i'th' comedy' (5.2.172-5). The overall effect is one of scrambling ingenuity exerting itself in resourceful role-playing.

It is indeed a mad world—the schemes of the two chief intriguers become fantastic. The Courtesan's virginity has been sold some fifteen times, she has convinced the impatient Sir Bounteous of his sexual prowess, and in the sickroom scene she bilks three men and helps cuckold a fourth. Follywit goes to great lengths to rob Sir Bounteous of a mere watch, chain, and jewel when he has already twice stolen heaps of his grandsire's money and treasure. Follywit and the Courtesan so often play roles that we gain little idea of their real personalities. Follywit justifies his thefts by citing the stingy jealousy of old men and asking pointedly how they got their money, while the Courtesan adeptly exploits men's contradictory stereotypes of women (they are shy and modest, they easily fall ill, they are cunning contrivers), but one cannot find in their speeches the serious concern about economics or gender that some of Middleton's other characters express. These plucky opportunists make the best of their circumstances, plume themselves on their successes, and take setbacks with resilience.

More deeply rooted comic eccentricity appears in Sir Bounteous, Harebrain, and Penitent. Explicitly identified as a character whose 'humour' (2.1.3-4) is extravagant hospitality, Sir Bounteous is as prodigal as his grandson. His appearance—'a little short old spiny gentleman in a great doublet' (3.2.7)—suggests his self-inflation. Eager as a host (witness his repetitive phrasing), enormously pleased with his possessions and courtly manners, harmlessly testy with servants, Sir Bounteous is a comic rendition of the great country householder idealized in such poems as Jonson's 'To Penshurst'. His knighthood derives from wealth, not military distinction. His social ambition is clear in his obsequious address to Lord Owemuch and his effort to establish intimacy with him. His proud display of his 'organs' hints at a ludicrous wish for bodily familiarity; he recommends Follywit to Owemuch as if he were offering an attractive catamite; and his grief over the tying up of Owemuch ('Ah, the binding of my lord cuts my heart in two pieces' [2.6.17-19]) sounds like a misplaced meditation on the Passion of Christ. His welcome to the non-noble Harebrains and Penitent is also warm, however, and with all visitors, even footmen, he loves the role of tour-guide. Despite his keeping Follywit short of money and his self-deceived relation with the Courtesan, there is something innocent in his jovial bounty. In the final deception of The Slip he is large enough to move from momentary vexation to enjoyment of the jest, and to ask only that his guests not laugh at him 'seven year hence' (5.2.184).

Harebrain is involved in deeper ironies. While many husbands in Jacobean drama fear cuckoldom, with or without warrant, Harebrain's suspicion is strikingly 'fantastic but deserved' (1.1.108). It is deserved because his wife desires Penitent from the start—she requires no persuasion, only opportunity. It is fantastic because her conduct gives no overt cause for jealousy, and his precautions and tests both prove her fidelity to his satisfaction (yet he must test again) and afford her the chance to cuckold him. He 'innocently . . . plot[s] his own abuse' (1.1.113-17). Vain (he would teach other husbands how to guard their wives), emotionally labile (witness his tears and kisses), insistent on his own absurd views (his verbal repetitions, unlike Sir Bounteous's, sound peevish), he is obsessed by sex. He remarks on the 'luscious' quality of Elizabethan erotic poetry (1.2.47-8), dismisses all non-sexual sins as trivial, bursts into lubricious carpe diem verse when describing the Courtesan's illness, and even remarks on the 'pretty' appearance of Follywit-as-Prologue (5.2.29). His eavesdropping in the sickroom scene makes him the aural equivalent of a voyeur upon the event he most fears, an event filtered through to his misunderstanding by the ambiguities of the Courtesan's monologue. In his concern with the tortures hell provides (for adulterers only) and his delight in the strict tests he sets his wife, pleasure is linked with pain. That both arise for him from his own inadequacies is suggested by an odd textual crux. In Act 5, his name is twenty times given as 'Shortrod' rather than 'Harebrain'. (One line, probably to be spoken by him, is assigned to a mysterious 'Nub'.) 'Shortrod' is too good a name for a sexually anxious cuckold to be a compositor's accident, and misreading 'Harebrain' as 'Shortrod' (or 'Nub'—a small bodily protruberance!) is a very unlikely printing-house mistake. In the Textual Introduction of this edition I have argued in more detail that both names are authorial, that the character's full name is Shortrod Harebrain. Evidently Middleton intended to label this character with genital deficiencies as well as folly. In Michaelmas Term there are puns to this effect on Shortyard's name, and both Shortyard and Shortrod Harebrain display unusual warmth when bonding with other males. Whatever his quirks, however, Harebrain retains sufficient self-esteem to enter into the final festivities as a genial guest.

The characterization of Penitent Brothel is more complex and problematic. Although he hesitates to take the role of physician, his masterful use of medical jargon and his ironical asides make him a trickster nearly as skilful as his ally the Courtesan. His ardour for Mistress Harebrain emerges occasionally in verse that rises out of the comic plotting as the lyrical descants of the young lovers in Verdi's Falstaff soar above the merriment of the Windsor wives. But he is the only person in Mad World with a vivid sense of sin, and the tonal dissonance between his fear of damnation and the play's amoral intrigue has puzzled modern critics. His first soliloquy runs the gamut from appreciation of Follywit's pranks through harsh self-condemnation to shrewd assessment of Harebrain. His spiritual anxiety climaxes in his spontaneous repentance, his horrified loathing of the devil who tempts him, and his persuasive sermon to Mistress Harebrain. The repentance cannot be insincere, and is particularly striking when he abandons his conventionally sexist condemnation of 'slime, corruption, woman' as the source of sin (4.1.18) to shoulder responsibility for both his sin and hers (4.5.48-52). Some readers have felt that his spiritual intensity, with its use of godly precepts ridiculed in earlier scenes, splits the play apart. Penitent himself is perplexed: the sudden intrusion of a devil is so surprising that he requires repeated assurances that Mistress Harebrain herself has not visited him. The audience must share his perplexity. We too see and hear some one whose face, dress, and voice are precisely those of Mistress Harebrain. She behaves very differently from the woman we have seen before, but sexual consummation can cause a release of inhibitions, and this is the first time the lovers have had the stage to themselves. Middleton's irony here enters the realm of the grotesque, for the spiritual anguish of the repentance scenes is studded with farcical effects. For anyone to shift abruptly from demure propriety to eager sexuality is in itself funny. This woman then rhymes (as several critics have noted) like Ogden Nash; Penitent's quotations from Hamlet clash bizarrely with her jocular familiarity; and his notion of a woman being 'part a virgin' (4.5.69) sounds as absurd as being 'slightly pregnant'. Middleton skilfully solders this grotesquerie back into the amoral irony of Mad World. Mistress Harebrain's already demonstrated ability to deal dryly with her husband's emotional outbursts and Penitent's skill at playing doctor prepare us for their smooth response to the unexpected entrance of the cuckold. Nothing is given away, Harebrain once again discards his jealousy, and the sequence comes blandly to rest in the play's characteristic effect of resourceful role-playing.

Having plunged into moral passion, Mad World glides out of it. The dominating pattern of the play is quid pro quo: the jealous husband is cuckolded, the ambitious host and the steward who would seduce his master's mistress are cheated of their own bribes, thief and whore ignorantly marry each other. Quid pro quo may inspire moral reflection in an audience, and is indeed invoked by some Jacobean characters in weighty contexts, as when Shakespeare's Edgar moralizes the blinding of Gloucester and Webster's Ferdinand concludes, 'Like diamonds we are cut with our own dust'. Here the principle rings out in the alarm of a stolen watch and is articulated in Follywit's shoulder-shrugging line, 'Tricks are repaid, I see' (5.2.305). It is an aesthetic more than a moral pattern: a comic recoil closer to Somerset Maugham's ironic Circle than to Jonson's judgemental Volpone. It invites, not censure and reform, but mildly rueful pleasure at the neatness of the thing and whimsical acceptance of the mad world. A constable earnestly doing his duty is bound and gagged by the comedy, and everyone else applauds. Providing applause for Follywit is half the function of his comrades; Penitent fills the sickroom scene with praise of the Courtesan's wit; Sir Bounteous and his guests intersperse The Slip with their half-misguided delight. Middleton cues the reaction he wants from his own audience, and the publisher's preface in the 1640 edition urges readers to applaud the action and to disregard as relics of old-fashioned convention the moralizing couplets that end some scenes.

The play suggests that we enjoy not only witty contrivance by minds but also resourceful activity of bodies.

In the best recent edition of Mad World, Standish Henning rightly declares that 'the play revels in obscenity', body jokes that he finds too obvious to explicate. In the present edition Celia R. Daileader does annotate them (and continues discussion of the sexual issues in her recent book Eroticism on the Renaissance Stage). Bodily actions and allusions, both decent and obscene, form a large and vital element of the play. Comic physical action appears in many of the entrances and exits (the servants especially tend to be hasty or delayed or clumsy or abrupt); in the Courtesan's fake wrestling with Follywit and with her Mother; in the dancing of Sir Bounteous and of the devil; in Follywit's cross-dressing and the hints of polymorphous sexuality; in the very breath of Follywit, whose taint of alcohol and tobacco nearly gives away his female disguise. The robbery scenes of Act 2 hinge on 'binding', where the literal tying up of characters also evokes legal obligation and intestinal constipation. The body's abilities concentrate particularly in the sickroom scene, where the Courtesan's moans disguise the sounds of offstage sex, and she feigns some action that drives Inesse and Possibility hastily away. Puking and purging are the obvious alternatives, and although the former is more easily acted, the latter coheres with the dialogue about stools and the physician's function of 'loosing' his patients. If, at the centre of this play, a beautiful and much-courted woman fakes a sonorous bowel movement to the applause of one man and the disgust of two others, the world is indeed ingeniously mad.

So theatrical a play merits a richer stage history than Mad World has had. The title-pages of the two early editions note performances at Paul's around 1606 and at Salisbury Court by 1640. Restoration memoirists note performances at Oxford in 1661 and in London around 1662. Thereafter Mad World was subjected to adaptation and pillage. Aphra Behn borrowed parts of the Owemuch robbery for The City Heiress (1682). Christopher Bullock made a six-scene farcical afterpiece called The Slip (1715) out of the Owemuch robbery and the play-within-the-play. In the same year Charles Johnson combined the robbery scenes with parts of Fletcher's Custom of the Country to create the full-length Country Lasses, which in turn was pillaged by William Kenrick in 1778. Going back directly to Mad World in 1786, Leonard Macnally created a two-act farce called The April Fool out of parts of Middleton's Acts 1, 2, and 5. Two American revivals have occurred: one at Harvard University in 1940 (again the Follywit scenes only) and another off-Broadway at the Bouverie Lane Theatre in 1978. In 1977 Barrie Keffe used the title and the general notion of city confidence tricks to create a contemporary satire for the Joint Stock Company at the Young Vic. In 1998 Middleton's own text returned to the London stage, for the first time since the seventeenth century, in a lively production at Shakespeare's Globe. Sue Lefton, a director of remarkable inventiveness in stage movement, zestfully animated Middleton's farcical complications. Amid a generally able cast David Rintoul in particular made Penitent Brothel coherent by stressing the fanaticism with which he responded to the least impulse, whether he was playing doctor, sexually rampant, or bitterly repentant.

military men returning to civilian life after the signing of the peace treaty with Spain in 1604—hence the reference to

'civil fortunes', below.

9 tenters a frame for stretching cloth

10 conscience inmost thought; mind

12–24 Hang . . . measure a parody of Sir John Oldcastle's speech in 1 Henry IV: 'I was as virtuously given as a gentleman need to be: virtuous enough; swore little;

diced not—above seven times a week;
went to a bawdy-house not—above once in a quarter—of an hour; paid money that I borrowed—three or four times; lived well, and in good compass.
And now I live out of all order, out of all compass' (3.3.13–19). Middleton's version adds a burlesque of piety by way of the religious references glossed below.

- 15 had hope of me. I went all in black, swore but o' Sundays, never came home drunk but upon fasting nights to cleanse my stomach. 'Slid, now I'm quite altered, blown into light colours, let out oaths by th' minute, sit up late till it be early, drink drunk till I am sober, sink down dead in a tavern, and rise in a tobacco shop. Here's a transformation: I was wont yet to pity the simple and leave 'em some money. 'Slid, now I gull 'em without conscience. I go without order, swear without number, gull without mercy, and drink without measure.
- 20 LIEUTENANT I deny the last, for if you drink ne'er so much, you drink within measure.
- FOLLYWIT How prove you that, sir?
- LIEUTENANT Because the drawers never fill their pots.
- FOLLYWIT Mass, that was well found out: all drunkards may lawfully say they drink within measure by that trick. And now I'm put i'th' mind of a trick. Can you keep your countenance, villains? Yet I am a fool to ask that, for how can they keep their countenance that have lost their credits?
- 30 ENSIGN I warrant you for blushing, captain.
- FOLLYWIT I easily believe that, Ensign, for thou lost thy colours once. Nay, faith, as for blushing, I think there's grace little enough amongst you all, 'tis Lent in your cheeks, the flag's down. Well, your blushing face I suspect not, nor indeed greatly your laughing face, unless you had more money in your purses. Then thus compendiously now, you all know the possibilities of my hereafter fortunes, and the humour of my frolic grandsire, Sir Bounteous Progress, whose death makes all possible to me. I shall have all when he has nothing; but now he has all, I shall have nothing. I think one mind runs through a million of 'em: they love to keep us
- sober all the while they're alive, that when they're dead we may drink to their healths. They cannot abide to see us merry all the while they're above ground, and that makes so many laugh at their fathers' funerals. I know my grandsire has his will in a box, and has bequeathed all to me when he can carry nothing away; but stood I in need of poor ten pounds now, by his will I should hang myself ere I should get it. There's no such word in his will, I warrant you, nor no such thought in his mind.
- LIEUTENANT You may build upon that, captain.
- FOLLYWIT Then since he has no will to do me good as long as he lives, by mine own will I'll do myself good before he dies, and now I arrive at the purpose. You are not ignorant, I'm sure, you true and necessary implements of mischief, first, that my grandsire Sir Bounteous Progress is a knight of thousands, and therefore no knight since one thousand six hundred; next, that he keeps a house like his name, bounteous, open for all comers; thirdly and lastly, that he stands much upon the glory of his complement, variety of entertainment, together with the largeness of his kitchen, longitude of his buttery, and fecundity of his larder, and thinks himself never happier than when some stiff lord or great countess alights to make light his dishes. These being well mixed together may give my project better encouragement and make my purpose spring forth more fortunate. To be short and cut off a great deal of dirty way, I'll down to my grandsire like a lord.
- LIEUTENANT How, captain?
- FOLLYWIT A French ruff, a thin beard, and a strong perfume will do't. I can hire blue coats for you all by Westminster clock, and that colour will be soonest believed.

14 all in black an allusion to the Puritan abhorrence of gaudy or colourful attire; ironically, however, black also represents evil.

14-15 swore but o' Sundays The only time Christians may speak God's name without blaspheming is in prayer; thus, even if Follywit illogically construes his public worship as swearing, this is a supremely ironic statement.

15-16 fasting... stomach another pious justification for improper behaviour; drinking to induce vomiting was neither encouraged nor proscribed as a fasting-day ritual.

16 'Slid an oath derived from 'God's eyelid'

17 blown... colours blossomed into garish colours; 'blown' may also suggest the flamboyantly padded costumes then in fashion.

19-20 sink... shop a parody of the Resurrection; also an allusion to the legend that Queen Elinor, wife of Edward I, was swallowed by the earth at Charing Cross to rise up again at Queenhive

21 leave... money Previously, Follywit would not steal all their money.

24 measure moderation

28 drawers bartenders

32 keep... countenance control your facial expression; also, maintain your reputation/financial credit

35 warrant... blushing guarantee I won't blush

36-7 lost... colours Follywit alludes to the ensign's duty as flag bearer; to lose the flag (or 'colours') to the enemy was considered shameful.

38-9 Lent... down Flags flown from playhouses during performances were taken down when acting was prohibited, as during Lent.

42 compendiously briefly, concisely

43 humour whim, temperament

frolic frolicsome

54 will (a) desire (b) legal document

63-4 Sir Bounteous Progress The name indicates Sir Bounteous's liberality as a host to noble guests. A 'progress' was a state journey made by a royal or noble personage.

64-5 no... hundred In 1603 James I required that all landholders worth forty pounds a year be knighted or else pay a fine. The implication is that Bounteous has cash but not status.

66-72 open... dishes The description is loaded with sexual innuendo. 'Open for all comers' suggests male ingress and ejaculation; 'stands' and 'stiff' allude to penile erection; 'great' can mean either pregnant or vaginally 'loose' (i.e. well-used); 'countess' was pronounced 'cunt-ess,' and 'light' was often used in the sense of promiscuous. Overall, Follywit depicts the nobility as a lascivious lot.

68 complement retinue, household personnel

75-6 cut... way to be short (proverbial)

78 French ruff a deep ruff or ornamental linen collar fastened at the chin; considered more fashionable than the English ruff

79-80 blue... clock Blue coats were the traditional dress of servants. Westminster, the site of the Court and Law Courts, would be a good place to look for poor servants willing to sell or loan their clothes.

LIEUTENANT But prithee, captain—
 FOLLYWIT Push! I reach past your fathoms; you desire crowns.

85 LIEUTENANT From the crown of our head to the sole of our foot, bully.

FOLLYWIT Why, carry yourselves but probably, and carry away enough with yourselves.

Enter Master Penitent Brothel

90 ENSIGN Why, there spoke a Roman captain. Master Penitent Brothel—

PENITENT Sweet Master Follywit— Exeunt all but Penitent
 Here's a mad-brain o'th' first, whose pranks scorn to have precedents, to be second to any, or walk beneath any madcap's inventions. He's played more tricks than 95 the cards can allow a man, and of the last stamp too, hating imitation—a fellow whose only glory is to be prime of the company, to be sure of which he maintains all the rest. He's the carrion, and they the kites that gorge upon him.

100 But why in others do I check wild passions
 And retain deadly follies in myself?

I tax his youth of common received riot,
 Time's comic flashes and the fruits of blood,
 And in myself soothe up adulterous motions
 And such an appetite that I know damns me
 105 (Yet willingly embrace it), love to Harebrain's wife,
 Over whose hours and pleasures her sick husband,
 With a fantastic but deserved suspect,
 Bestows his serious time in watch and ward.

110 And therefore I'm constrained to use the means
 Of one that knows no mean, a courtesan
 (One poison for another) whom her husband
 Without suspicion innocently admits
 Into her company, who with tried art

115 Corrupts and loosens her most constant powers,
 Making his jealousy more than half a wittol,
 Before his face plotting his own abuse,
 To which himself gives aim,
 Whilst the broad arrow with the forkèd head
 Misses his brow but narrowly.

Enter Courtesan

See, here she comes, 120

The close courtesan, whose mother is her bawd.

COURTESAN Master Penitent Brothel.

PENITENT My little pretty Lady Gullman, the news, the comfort?

COURTESAN You're the fortunate man, Sir Knight o' th' 125 Holland Shirt. There wants but opportunity and she's wax of your own fashioning. She had wrought herself into the form of your love before my art set finger to her.

PENITENT

Did our affections meet? our thoughts keep time? 130

COURTESAN So it should seem by the music. The only jar is in the grumbling bass viol, her husband.

PENITENT O his waking suspicion!

COURTESAN Sigh not, Master Penitent. Trust the managing of the business with me; 'tis for my credit now to see't 135 well finished. If I do you no good, sir, you shall give me no money, sir.

PENITENT I am arrived at the court of conscience. A courtesan! O admirable times! Honesty is removed to the common place. Farewell, lady. Exit 140

Enter Mother

MOTHER How now, daughter?

COURTESAN What news, mother?

MOTHER A token from thy keeper.

COURTESAN O, from Sir Bounteous Progress. He's my keeper indeed, but there's many a piece of venison stolen that 145 my keeper wots not on. There's no park kept so warily but loses flesh one time or other; and no woman kept so privately but may watch advantage to make the best of her pleasure. And in common reason one keeper cannot be enough for so proud a park as a woman. 150

MOTHER Hold thee there, girl.

COURTESAN Fear not me, mother.

MOTHER Every part of the world shoots up daily into more subtlety: the very spider weaves her cauls with more art and cunning to entrap the fly. 155
 The shallow ploughman can distinguish now

83 Push an exclamation of contempt with vaguely obscene connotations; i.e. 'shove
 it'

fathoms hints

84 crowns coins

86 bully a term implying friendly admiration between men; fine fellow, gallant

87 carry . . . probably put on a plausible act

89 Roman captain Follywit follows the custom of a Roman leader in allowing his troops to pillage whatever booty they can carry.

92 o'th' first in heraldry, the colour first mentioned in blazoning a coat of arms;
 here, a superlative

95 last stamp most recent mintage

102 tax . . . riot reproach him for the expected boisterousness of youth

103 Time's comic flashes i.e. the passing follies of youth

fruits of blood products of excessive passion. According to Renaissance medical theory, an excess of blood (one of the 'four humours' believed to make up human physiology) resulted in a passionate or lascivious temperament.

108 suspect suspicion

109 watch and ward traditional phrase for the duties of the sentinel or watchman

111 mean moderation

115 powers faculties of body and mind

116 wittol contented cuckold

118 To . . . aim which he directs. In archery, to give aim is to report the accuracy of the shot.

119 broad . . . head i.e. the cuckold's horns

121 close secret

123 Gullman The courtesan's surname highlights her talent for fooling men.

125–6 Sir Knight o' th' Holland Shirt a mock-romantic title referring to Penit-ent's expensive shirt. (Holland is fine quality linen.)

138 court of conscience Court of Requests, established in 1517 to deal with small claims

140 common place a pun on the Court of Common Pleas, one of the three major courts of law; the common place is land publicly owned and can be used as a metaphor for a whore

146 wots not on does not know about

150 proud (a) fine (b) arrogant (c) sexually aroused

154 cauls webs

'Twill simple truth and a dissembling brow.
Your base mechanic fellow can spy out
A weakness in a lord and learns to flout.
160 How does't behove us then that live by sleight
To have our wits wound up to their stretched height?
Fifteen times thou know'st I have sold thy maidenhead to make up a dowry for thy marriage, and yet there's maidenhead enough for old Sir Bounteous still. He'll be 165 all his lifetime about it yet, and be as far to seek when he has done.

The sums that I have told upon thy pillow!
I shall once see those golden days again.
Though fifteen, all thy maidenheads are not gone:
170 The Italian is not served yet, nor the French;
The Britishmen come for a dozen at once,
They engross all the market. Tut, my girl,
'Tis nothing but a politic conveyance,
A sincere carriage, a religious eyebrow
175 That throws their charms over the worldlings' senses;
And when thou spi'st a fool that truly pities
The false springs of thine eyes
And honourably dotes upon thy love,
If he be rich, set him by for a husband.
180 Be wisely tempered and learn this, my wench:
Who gets th'opinion for a virtuous name
May sin at pleasure, and ne'er think of shame.

COURTESAN

Mother, I am too deep a scholar grown
To learn my first rules now.

MOTHER

'Twill be thy own.

185 I say no more. Peace, hark, remove thyself. O, the two elder brothers! [Exit Courtesan]

Enter Inesse and Possibility

POSSIBILITY A fair hour, sweet lady.

MOTHER Good morrow, gentlemen, Master Inesse and Master Possibility.

190 INESSE Where's the little sweet lady, your daughter?

MOTHER Even at her book, sir.

POSSIBILITY So religious?

MOTHER 'Tis no new motion, sir, she's took it from an infant.

195 POSSIBILITY May we deserve a sight of her, lady?

MOTHER Upon that condition you will promise me, gentlemen, to avoid all profane talk, wanton compliments, indecent phrases, and lascivious courtings (which I know my daughter would sooner die than endure), I am contented your suits shall be granted. 200
POSSIBILITY Not a bawdy syllable, I protest!
INESSE [aside to Possibility] Syllable was well placed there,
for indeed your one syllables are your bawdiest words.
Prick that down! Exeunt

Enter Master Shortrod Harebrain

I.2

HAREBRAIN

She may make nightwork on't: 'twas well recovered.
He-cats and courtesans stroll most i'th' night,
Her friend may be received and conveyed forth nightly.

I'll be at charge for watch and ward,
For watch and ward i'faith. And here they come. 5

Enter two or three [Watchmen]

FIRST WATCHMAN Give your worship good even.

HAREBRAIN Welcome, my friends. I must deserve your diligence in an employment serious. The troth is, there is a cunning plot laid, but happily discovered,
To rob my house: the night uncertain when,
10 But fixed within the circle of this month,
Nor does this villainy consist in numbers
Or many partners, only some one
Shall in the form of my familiar friend
Be received privately into my house 15
By some perfidious servant of mine own,
Addressed fit for the practice.

FIRST WATCHMAN

O abominable!

HAREBRAIN

If you be faithful watchmen, show your goodness,
And with these angels shore up your eyelids.

[Giving money]

Let me not be purloined, purloined indeed! 20

[Aside] The merry Greeks conceive me. There is a gem
I would not loose, kept by the ItalianUnder lock and key: we Englishmen are careless creatures.[To Watchmen] Well, I have said enough.158 mechanic fellow labourer159 flout act or speak with disdain160 sleight cunning167 told counted up172 engross buy up, monopolize173 politic conveyance (a) tactful behaviour
(b) cunning trickery175 worldlings those devoted to worldly pursuits or pleasures; citizens of the world181 th'opinion reputation186 elder brothers elder brothers from separate families; therefore each expects an inheritance by primogeniture.186.1 Inesse and Possibility The two names derive from inheritance law:

an estate in esse (in being) gave actual possession of land, as distinct from an estate in possibility which would give actual possession later.193 motion inclination204 Prick that down note that down (with a pun on 'prick', one of the offending monosyllables)1.2.0.1 Harebrain Hares were held to suffer a spring madness arising from sexual jealousy.1 recovered called to mind11 within...month sometime this month.The expression alludes to a sorcerer's practice of raising and restricting evil spirits within the circumference of a circle. The conjuring circle was often used as a vaginal symbol.17 Addressed...practice prepared for the trick19 angels gold coins20 purloined a pun on 'pur', the knave in a card-game, plus 'loin', to copulate; thus,
'loined' by a knave21 merry Greeks tricky fellows22-3 kept...key Italian husbands were reputed to keep their women locked up.

SECOND WATCHMAN And we will do enough, sir.
Exeunt [Watchmen]

HAREBRAIN
 Why, well said, watch me a good turn now, so, so,
 25 so.
 Rise villainy with the lark, why 'tis prevented,
 Or steal't by with the leather-winged bat,
 The evening cannot save it. Peace!
 [Enter Courtesan]
 O Lady Gullman, my wife's only company! Welcome, 30 and how does the virtuous matron, that good old gentlewoman thy mother? I persuade myself, if modesty be in the world she has part on't: a woman of an excellent carriage all her lifetime, in court, city, and country.

35 COURTESAN She's always carried it well in those places, sir—[aside] witness three bastards apiece.—How does your sweet bedfellow, sir? You see I'm her boldest visitant.

HAREBRAIN And welcome, sweet virgin, the only compan-40 ion my soul wishes for her. I left her within at her lute.
 Prithce give her good counsel.

COURTESAN Alas, she needs none, sir.

HAREBRAIN Yet, yet, a little of thy instruction will not come amiss to her.

45 COURTESAN I'll bestow my labour, sir.

HAREBRAIN Do labour her, prithce. I have conveyed away all her wanton pamphlets, as Hero and Leander, Venus and Adonis, O two luscious mary-bone pies for a young 50 married wife! Here, here, prithce take the Resolution and read to her a little. [Giving book]

COURTESAN She's set up her resolution already, sir.

HAREBRAIN True, true, and this will confirm it the more.
 There's a chapter of Hell 'tis good to read this cold 55 weather. Terrify her, terrify her, go, read to her the horrible punishments for itching wantonness, the pains allotted for adultery. Tell her her thoughts, her very dreams are answerable, say so. Rip up the life of a courtesan and show how loathsome 'tis.

60 COURTESAN [aside] The gentleman would persuade me in time to disgrace myself and speak ill of mine own function. Exit

HAREBRAIN
 This is the course I take. I'll teach the married man
 A new selected strain. I admit none
 But this pure virgin to her company.
 Puh, that's enough: I'll keep her to her stint,
 65 I'll put her to her pension,
 She gets but her allowance, that's a bare one.
 Few women but have that beside their own.
 Ha, ha, ha! Nay, I'll put her hard to't.
Enter [Harebrain's] Wife and Courtesan. [They talk apart]

WIFE Fain would I meet the gentleman. 70
 COURTESAN Push! Fain would you meet him! Why, you do not take the course.

HAREBRAIN [aside] How earnestly she labours her, like a good wholesome sister of the Family. She will prevail, I 75 hope.

COURTESAN Is that the means?

WIFE What is the means? I would as gladly to enjoy his sight, embrace it as the—

COURTESAN Shall I have hearing? listen!

HAREBRAIN [aside] She's round with her, i'faith. 80
 COURTESAN
 When husbands in their rank'st suspicions dwell,
 Then 'tis our best art to dissemble well.
 Put but these notes in use, that I'll direct you,
 He'll curse himself that e'er he did suspect you.
 Perhaps he will solicit you as in trial 85
 To visit such and such: still give denial.
 Let no persuasions sway you: they are but fetches
 Set to betray you, jealousy's slights and reaches.
 Seem in his sight to endure the sight of no man;
 Put by all kisses till you kiss in common. 90
 Neglect all entertain; if he bring in Strangers, keep you your chamber, be not seen.
 If he chance steal upon you, let him find
 Some book lie open 'gainst an unchaste mind
 And coted Scriptures, though for your own pleasure 95
 You read some stirring pamphlet, and convey it
 Under your skirt, the fittest place to lay it.
 This is the course, my wench, to enjoy thy wishes.
 Here you perform best, when you most neglect:
 The way to daunt is to outvie suspect. 100

26 prevented forestalled
 33 carriage conduct, deportment, with an unintended innuendo: 'carriage' can refer to a woman's sexual bearing of a man's weight, and/or to her bearing of children. The courtesan picks up on the latter sense in l. 35 below.
 47-8 Hero... Adonis erotic Ovidian poems by Marlowe and Shakespeare
 48 mary-bone marrow bone, an alleged aphrodisiac
 49 Resolution The First Book of the Christian Exercise Pertaining to Resolution (1582), a popular book of devotion written by the Jesuit Robert Parsons.
 63 new selected strain alluding to the breeding of livestock and plants; Harebrain will produce a new quality in his wife and offspring by preventing her contact with any impure social elements and by having her propagate with himself alone.

 65 stint an allotted amount or measure; an allowance, here sexual 68 Few... own Most women have their marital sexual 'rations' supplemented by adulterous contacts.
 74 Family The Family of Love, a religious sect which held that religion consisted chiefly in the exercise of love: they were suspected (with some cause) of disregarding conventional morality, and were frequently used by dramatists as a vehicle for attacking sexual hypocrisy.

 80 round straightforward, blunt
 87 fetches decoys, traps
 88 reaches contrivances
 90 in common generally; by many men
 91 entertain entertainment
 94 Some... mind some book attacking sexual vice that should lie conspicuously open nearby
 95 coted annotated. Such Bibles were popular amongst Puritans.
 96 stirring titillating
 100 daunt overcome
suspect suspicion

- Manage these principles but with art and life:
Welcome all nations, thou'rt an honest wife.
- HAREBRAIN [aside]
She puts it home, i'faith, e'en to the quick;
From her elaborate action I reach that.
- 105 I must requite this maid—faith, I'm forgetful.
- WIFE
Here, lady, convey my heart unto him in this jewel.
[Giving jewel]
- Against you see me next, you shall perceive
I have profited. In the mean season tell him
I am a prisoner yet, o'th' master's side.
- 110 My husband's jealousy,
That masters him as he doth master me,
And as a keeper that locks prisoners up
Is himself prisoned under his own key.
Even so my husband in restraining me
- 115 With the same ward bars his own liberty.
- COURTESAN
I'll tell him how you wish it, and I'll wear
My wits to the third pile, but all shall clear.
- WIFE
I owe you more than thanks, but that I hope
My husband will requite you.
- COURTESAN Think you so, lady?
He has small reason for't.
- 120 HAREBRAIN [to Courtesan] What, done so soon?
Away, to't again, to't again, good wench, to't again.
Leave her not so, where left you. Come.
- COURTESAN Faith, I am weary, sir.
I cannot draw her from her strict opinion
- 125 With all the arguments that sense can frame.
- HAREBRAIN No, let me come. Fie, wife, you must consent.
What opinion is't, let's hear?
- COURTESAN
Fondly and wilfully she retains that thought,
That every sin is damned.
- 130 HAREBRAIN O fie, fie, wife! Pea, pea, pea, pea, how have you lost your time? For shame, be converted: there's a diabolical opinion indeed. Then you may think that
- usury were damned—you're a fine merchant, i'faith.
Or bribery?—you know the law well. Or sloth?—would some of the clergy heard you, i'faith. Or pride?—you come at court. Or gluttony?—you're not worthy to dine at an alderman's table.
- 135 Your only deadly sin's adultery,
That villainous ring-worm, woman's worse requital;
'Tis only lechery that's damned to th' pit-hole.
- 140 Ah, that's an arch-offence, believe it, squall,
All sins are venial but venereal.
- COURTESAN I've said enough to her.
- HAREBRAIN And she will be ruled by you.
- COURTESAN Fah!
- 145 HAREBRAIN
I'll pawn my credit on't. Come hither, lady,
I will not altogether rest ungrateful. [Offering ruby]
Here, wear this ruby for thy pains and counsel.
- COURTESAN It is not so much worth, sir. I am a very ill counsellor, truly.
- 150 HAREBRAIN Go to, I say.
- COURTESAN [taking ruby] You're to blame, i'faith, sir. I shall ne'er deserve it.
- HAREBRAIN Thou hast done't already. Farewell, sweet virgin. Prithce, let's see thee oftener.
- 155 COURTESAN [aside] Such gifts will soon entreat me. Exit
HAREBRAIN
- Wife, as thou lov'st the quiet of my breast,
Embrace her counsel, yield to her advices.
Thou wilt find comfort in 'em in the end;
Thou'lt feel an alteration, prithee think on't.
- 160 [Weeping] Mine eyes can scarce refrain.
- WIFE Keep in your dew, sir,
Lest when you would, you want it.
- HAREBRAIN
I've pawned my credit on't. Ah, didst thou know
The sweet fruit once, thou'dst never let it go.
- WIFE 'Tis that I strive to get.
- HAREBRAIN And still do so. Exeunt
- 165 Finit Actus Primus

102 Welcome . . . wife You can take lovers from all nations and still appear to be chaste.

104 reach conclude

107 Against when

109 o'th' master's side There were four wards in debtors' prison: the master's, the knight's, the twopenny, and the hole, in descending order of cost. Mistress Harebrain likens her marriage to a relatively comfortable prison cell.

117 to . . . pile to the bone; 'three-pile' is a costly, three-layer velvet

121 to't again Many of Harebrain's remarks carry an unconscious sexual innuendo.
Here he seems to provoke sexual activity rather than spiritual instruction.

125 sense reason, with a pun on sensuality

128 Fondly foolishly

129 every . . . damned Middleton satirizes the Familist devaluation of moral law in favour of an emphasis upon the experience of Divine love.

130 pea an exclamation of contempt, like
'pooh'

137 alderman's a town magistrate, next in dignity to a mayor

139 ring-worm The circular patches on the skin caused by this disease resembled the 'French crown' caused by syphilis, woman's 'requital' or revenge for adultery.

140 pit-hole (a) Hell (b) vagina

141 squall a term of endearment similar to 'pet'

142 All . . . venereal Harebrain contradicts Christian doctrine, which lists Seven Deadly Sins of which Lechery is only one. Unrepented deadly sins, unlike venial sins, result in damnation.

148 ruby considered the most precious of gemstones

152 to blame In the 16–17th c. 'to' was often understood as 'too'; 'blame' here may be read as 'blameworthy'.

157 as . . . breast if you value my peace of mind

161 refrain refrain from weeping

161–2 Keep . . . want it Keep in your tears or else you may have none when you need them. Mistress Harebrain may be alluding either to her husband's salvation or to his impending cuckoldom.

164 sweet fruit fruit of repentance, or of sexual pleasure (alluding to Eve's apple)

Incipit Actus Secundus

Enter Sir Bounteous Progress with two knights

FIRST KNIGHT You have been too much like your name,
Sir Bounteous.

SIR BOUNTEOUS O not so, good knights, not so, you know my humour. Most welcome, good Sir Andrew Polecat, 5 Sir Aquitaine Colewort, most welcome.

BOTH KNIGHTS Thanks, good Sir Bounteous.

Exeunt at one door

At the other [door], enter in haste [one of Follywit's comrades dressed as] a footman

FOOTMAN O cry your worship heartily mercy, sir.

SIR BOUNTEOUS How now, linen stockings and threescore mile a day, whose footman art thou?

10 FOOTMAN Pray, can your worship tell me, [panting] hoh, hoh, hoh, if my lord be come in yet.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Thy lord! What lord?

FOOTMAN My Lord Owemuch, sir.

15 SIR BOUNTEOUS My Lord Owemuch! I have heard much speech of that lord. H'as great acquaintance i'th' City.
That lord has been much followed.

FOOTMAN And is still, sir. He wants no company when he's in London. He's free of the Mercers, and there's none of 'em all dare cross him.

20 SIR BOUNTEOUS An they did, he'd turn over a new leaf with 'em, he would make 'em all weary on't i'th' end. Much fine rumour have I heard of that lord, yet had I never the fortune to set eye upon him. Art sure he will alight here, footman? I am afraid thou'rt mistook.

25 FOOTMAN Thinks your worship so, sir? By your leave, sir.
[Leaving]

SIR BOUNTEOUS Puh, passion of me, footman! Why, pumps,
I say, come back!

FOOTMAN Does your worship call?

SIR BOUNTEOUS Come hither, I say. I am but afraid on't.

Would it might happen so well. How dost know? Did he name the house with the great turret o'th' top? 30

FOOTMAN No, faith, did he not, sir. [Leaving]

SIR BOUNTEOUS Come hither, I say. Did he speak of a cloth
o' gold chamber?

FOOTMAN Not one word, by my troth, sir. [Leaving] 35

SIR BOUNTEOUS Come again, you lousy seven mile an hour!

FOOTMAN I beseech your worship detain me not.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Was there no talk of a fair pair of organs, a great gilt candlestick, and a pair of silver snuffers?

FOOTMAN 'Twere sin to belie my lord. I heard no such words, sir. [Leaving] 40

SIR BOUNTEOUS A pox confine thee! Come again, puh.

FOOTMAN Your worship will undo me, sir.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Was there no speech of a long dining room, a huge kitchen, large meat, and a broad dresser board? 45

FOOTMAN I have a greater maw to that indeed, an't please your worship.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Whom did he name?

FOOTMAN Why, one Sir Bounteous Progress.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Ah, ah, ah, I am that Sir Bounteous, you progressive roundabout rascal! 50

FOOTMAN (laughs) Puh!

SIR BOUNTEOUS I knew I should have him i'th' end; there's not a lord will miss me, I thank their good honours. 'Tis a fortune laid upon me, they can scent out their best 55 entertainment. I have a kind of complimentary gift given me above ordinary country knights, and how soon 'tis smelt out, I warrant ye! There's not one knight i'th' shire able to entertain a lord i'th' cue or a lady i'th' nick like me, like me. There's a kind of grace belongs to't, a kind of art which naturally slips from me, I know not on't, I promise you, 'tis gone before I'm aware on't.

Cuds me, I forget myself. Where! 60

[Enter two Servants]

FIRST SERVANT Does your worship call?

2.1.4 humour temperament

Polecat a term of abuse, especially for the lecherous; the animal was known for its fetid smell

5 Colewort a kind of cabbage, also with an offensive smell

8 linen stockings a sign of low social status

8-9 threescore...day A running footman ran before his master's coach, covering considerable distance.

15 H'as great acquaintance He is well known.
i'th' City in London (the old walled town, distinguished from the larger metropolis which had grown up around it)

17 wants lacks

18 free of the Mercers literally, a freeman of the clothsellers' guild, but 'being in the mercer's book' was used proverbially in the period for the debts of a gallant.

Owemuch, as his name indicates, is heavily in debt.

19 cross him (a) thwart him (b) cross out his debts

20 An If
turn...leaf (a) start fresh (b) open a new account

26 pumps alluding to the footman's running shoes

31 great turret Most of the objects of which Bounteous brags are large and phallic.
This plays into the stereotype, frequent in literature of the period, of the rich old man whose possessions compensate for his failing sexual potency.

33-4 cloth o' gold cloth containing gold thread; presumably, the chamber is lined with tapestries of this fabric.

38 pair of organs a single musical instrument, with further phallic connotations

39 pair...snuffers an instrument for snuffing candles; the concave (female) partner to the phallic candlesticks

45 large meat Eating meat was a frequent metaphor for sexual consumption, and was believed to increase sexual appetite.
dresser board a table for the preparation of food

46 maw appetite, inclination

51 progressive longwinded, punning on the progresses or journeys during which he accompanies his lord

56 complimental (a) that which supplies all needs (b) complimentary

59 shire region, county

59-60 lord...nick at short notice, punning on 'cue' (from the French 'queue') as the male member and 'nick', a variant of 'nock', as the female genitals.

63 Cuds me a mild oath

- 65 SIR BOUNTEOUS Run, sirrah, call in my chief gentleman i'th' chain of gold, expedite! [Exit First Servant] And how does my good lord? I never saw him before in my life. [To Second Servant] A cup of bastard for this footman.
- 70 FOOTMAN My lord has travelled this five year, sir.
SIR BOUNTEOUS Travailed this five year? How many children has he? [To Servant] Some bastard, I say!
FOOTMAN No bastard, an't please your worship.
SIR BOUNTEOUS A cup of sack to strengthen his wit. The footman's a fool. [Exit Second Servant]
[Enter Gunwater]
O come hither, Master Gunwater, come hither. Send presently to Master Pheasant for one of his hens. There's partridge i'th' house.
- GUNWATER And wild duck, an't please your worship.
80 SIR BOUNTEOUS And woodcock, an't please thy worship.
GUNWATER And woodcock, an't please your worship. I had thought to have spoke before you.
SIR BOUNTEOUS Remember the pheasant, down with some plover, clap down six woodcocks: my lord's coming.
85 Now, sir?
GUNWATER An't please your worship, there's a lord and his followers newly alighted.
SIR BOUNTEOUS Dispatch, I say, dispatch! [Exit Gunwater] Why, where's my music? He's come indeed.
Enter Follywit like a lord, with [Lieutenant, Ensign, and] his comrades in blue coats
- 90 FOLLYWIT Footman!
FOOTMAN My lord.
FOLLYWIT Run swiftly with my commendations to Sir Jasper Topas. We'll ride and visit him i'th' morning, say.
- 95 FOOTMAN Your lordship's charge shall be effected. Exit
FOLLYWIT That courtly comely form should present to me Sir Bounteous Progress.
SIR BOUNTEOUS You've found me out, my lord, I cannot hide myself. Your honour is mostly spaciouly welcome.
100 FOLLYWIT In this forgive me, sir,
That being a stranger to your house and you,
I make my way so bold, and presume
Rather upon your kindness than your knowledge.
Only your bounteous disposition
105 Fame hath divulged, and is to me well known.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Nay, an your lordship know my disposition, you know me better than they that know my person. Your honour is so much the welcomer for that.
FOLLYWIT Thanks, good Sir Bounteous.
SIR BOUNTEOUS Pray pardon me, it has been often my ambition, my lord, both in respect of your honourable presence and the prodigal fame that keeps even stroke with your unbounded worthiness,
To have wished your lordship where your lordship is, A noble guest in this unworthy seat. 110
115 Your lordship ne'er heard my organs?
FOLLYWIT Heard of 'em, Sir Bounteous, but never heard 'em.
SIR BOUNTEOUS They're but double-gilt, my lord. Some hundred and fifty pound will fit your lordship with such another pair. 120
FOLLYWIT Indeed, Sir Bounteous?
SIR BOUNTEOUS O my lord, I have a present suit to you.
FOLLYWIT To me, Sir Bounteous? And you could ne'er speak at fitter time, for I'm here present to grant you. 125
SIR BOUNTEOUS Your lordship has been a traveller.
FOLLYWIT Some five year, sir.
SIR BOUNTEOUS I have a grandchild, my lord. I love him, and when I die I'll do somewhat for him. I'll tell your honour the worst of him: a wild lad he has been. 130
FOLLYWIT So we have been all, sir.
SIR BOUNTEOUS So we have been all indeed, my lord, I thank your lordship's assistance. Some comic pranks he has been guilty of, but I'll pawn my credit for him, an honest trusty bosom. 135
FOLLYWIT And that's worth all, sir.
SIR BOUNTEOUS And that's worth all indeed, my lord, for he's like to have all when I die. Imberbis iuvenis, his chin has no more prickles yet than a midwife's: there's great hope of his wit, his hair's so long a-coming. Shall I be bold with your honour, to prefer this aforesaid Ganymede to hold a plate under your lordship's cup? 140
FOLLYWIT You wrong both his worth and your bounty, an you call that boldness. Sir, I have heard much good of that young gentleman. 145
SIR BOUNTEOUS Nay, h'as a good wit, i'faith, my lord.
FOLLYWIT He's carried himself always generously.
SIR BOUNTEOUS Are you advised of that, my lord? He's carried many things cleanly. I'll show your lordship my will. I keep it above in an outlandish box. The whoreson 150

- boy must have all: I love him, yet he shall ne'er find it as long as I live.
- FOLLYWIT Well sir, for your sake and his own deserving, I'll reserve a place for him nearest to my secrets.
- 155 SIR BOUNTEOUS I understand your good lordship: you'll make him your secretary. My music, give my lord a taste of his welcome!
- A strain played by the consort. Sir Bounteous makes a courtly honour to that lord and seems to foot the tune*
- So, how like you our airs, my lord? Are they choice?
- FOLLYWIT They're seldom matched, believe it.
- 160 SIR BOUNTEOUS The consort of mine own household.
- FOLLYWIT Yea, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS The musicians are in ordinary, yet no ordinary musicians. Your lordship shall hear my organs now.
- 165 FOLLYWIT O, I beseech you, Sir Bounteous!
- SIR BOUNTEOUS My organist.
- The organs play, and [servants with] covered dishes march over the stage*
- Come, my lord, how does your honour relish my organ?
- FOLLYWIT A very proud air, i'faith, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS O, how can't choose? A Walloon plays upon 'em, and a Welshman blows wind in their breech.
- 170 Exeunt
- A song to the organs*
- 2.2 Enter Sir Bounteous with Follywit [as Lord Owemuch, with Lieutenant, Ensign] and his consorts toward his lodging
- SIR BOUNTEOUS You must pardon us, my lord, hasty cates; your honour has had ev'n a hunting meal on't. And now I am like to bring your lordship to as mean a lodging, a hard down bed i'faith, my lord, poor cambric sheets, and a cloth o' tissue canopy. The curtains indeed were wrought in Venice, with the story of the prodigal child in silk and gold. Only the swine are left out, my lord, for spoiling the curtains.
- FOLLYWIT 'Twas well prevented, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Silken rest, harmonious slumbers, and venereal dreams to your lordship.
- FOLLYWIT The like to kind Sir Bounteous.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Fie, not to me, my lord. I'm old, past dreaming of such vanities.
- FOLLYWIT Old men should dream best.
- 15 SIR BOUNTEOUS Their dreams indeed, my lord, you've gi'n t'us. Tomorrow your lordship shall see my cocks, my fishponds, my park, my champaign grounds. I keep chambers in my house can show your lordship some pleasure.
- 20 FOLLYWIT Sir Bounteous, you ev'n whelm me with delights.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Once again a musical night to your honour. I'll trouble your lordship no more. Exit
- 25 FOLLYWIT Good rest, Sir Bounteous. [To his comrades] So, come, the visors, where be the masking suits?
- LIEUTENANT In your lordship's portmanteau.
- FOLLYWIT Peace, lieutenant.
- LIEUTENANT I had rather have war, captain.
- FOLLYWIT
- Puh, the plot's ripe. Come, to our business, lad.
- 30 Though guilt condemns, 'tis gilt must make us glad.
- LIEUTENANT Nay, an you be at your distinctions, captain, I'll follow behind no longer.
- FOLLYWIT Get you before then, and whelm your nose with your visor, go. [Exeunt all but Follywit]
- 35 Now grandsire, you that hold me at hard meat And keep me out at the dag's end, I'll fit you. Under his lordship's leave, all must be mine He and his will confesses: what I take then Is but a borrowing of so much beforehand.
- 40 I'll pay him again when he dies, in so many blacks; I'll have the church hung round with a noble a yard, Or requite him in scutcheons. Let him trap me In gold and I'll lap him in lead, quid pro quo.

2.3 Enter Courtesan with her man

COURTESAN Go, sirrah, run presently to Master Penitent Brothel. You know his lodging, knock him up. I know he cannot sleep for sighing. Tell him I've happily bethought a mean

5 To make his purpose prosper in each limb,
Which only rests to be approved by him.

Make haste, I know he thirsts for it. Exeunt

2.4 A VOICE WITHIN O!

*Enter, in a masking suit with a visor in his hand,
Follywit*

FOLLYWIT Hark, they're at their business.

FIRST SERVANT [within] Thieves, thieves!

5 FOLLYWIT Gag that gaping rascal! Though he be my grandsire's chief gentleman i'th' chain of gold, I'll have no pity of him.

Enter the rest [Lieutenant, Ensign, Footman, and others], visored

How now, lads?

LIEUTENANT All's sure and safe. On with your visor, sir.
The servants are all bound.

10 FOLLYWIT [donning his visor] There's one care past then.
Come follow me lads, I'll lead you now t' th' point and top of all your fortunes. Yon lodging is my grandsire's.

LIEUTENANT So, so, lead on, on.

[Exeunt all but Ensign]

15 ENSIGN Here's a captain worth the following and a wit worth a man's love and admiring!

Enter [Follywit, Lieutenant and others] with Sir Bounteous in his nightgown

SIR BOUNTEOUS O gentlemen, an you be kind gentlemen, what countrymen are you?

FOLLYWIT Lincolnshire men, sir.

SIR BOUNTEOUS I am glad of that, i'faith.

20 FOLLYWIT And why should you be glad of that?

SIR BOUNTEOUS O, the honestest thieves of all come out of Lincolnshire, the kindest-natured gentlemen. They'll rob a man with conscience. They have a feeling of what they go about, and will steal with tears in their eyes.

25 Ah, pitiful gentlemen!

FOLLYWIT Push! Money, money, we come for money.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Is that all you come for? Ah, what a beast was I to put out my money t'other day! Alas, good gentlemen, what shift shall I make for you? Pray come again another time.

FOLLYWIT Tut, tut, sir, money!

SIR BOUNTEOUS O not so loud, sir, you're too shrill a gentleman. I have a lord lies in my house. I would not for the world his honour should be disquieted.

FOLLYWIT Who, my Lord Owemuch? We have took order with him beforehand. He lies bound in his bed and all his followers.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Who, my lord? Bound my lord? Alas, what did you mean to bind my lord? He could keep his bed well enough without binding. You've undone me in't already, you need rob me no farther.

FOLLYWIT Which is the key, come?

SIR BOUNTEOUS Ah, I perceive now you're no true Lincolnshire spirits. You come rather out of Bedfordshire, we cannot lie quiet in our beds for you. So take enough, my masters, spur a free horse. My name's Sir Bounteous—a merry world, i'faith—what knight but I keep open house at midnight? Well, there should be a conscience, if one could hit upon't.

FOLLYWIT Away now, seize upon him, bind him.

50

SIR BOUNTEOUS Is this your court of equity? Why should I be bound for mine own money? But come, come, bind me, I have need on't. I have been too liberal tonight.
Keep in my hands, nay, as hard as you list. I am not too good to bear my lord company. You have watched your time, my masters. I was knighted at Westminster, but many of these nights will make me a knight of Windsor. You've deserved so well, my masters, I bid you all to dinner tomorrow. I would I might have your companies, i'faith, I desire no more.

FOLLYWIT [finding money] O ho, sir!

SIR BOUNTEOUS Pray meddle not with my organs, to put 'em out of tune.

FOLLYWIT [jingling the coins] O no, here's better music, sir.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Ah, pox feast you!

FOLLYWIT Dispatch with him, away!

[Exeunt Ensign and others carrying Sir Bounteous]

So, thank you, good grandsire. This was bounteously done of him, i'faith. It came somewhat hard from him at first, for indeed nothing comes stiff from an old man but money, and he may well stand upon that, when he has nothing else to stand upon. Where's our portmanteau?

LIEUTENANT Here, bully captain.

ence; achieving an erection was often euphemized in terms of standing.

FOLLYWIT In with the purchase, 'twill lie safe enough there under's nose, I warrant you.
 [They put the money in the portmanteau]
 Enter Ensign [and others]

75 What, is all sure?
 ENSIGN All's sure, captain.

FOLLYWIT You know what follows now: one villain binds his fellows. Go, we must be all bound for our own securities, rascals, there's no dallying upo'th' point. You conceit me: there is a lord to be found bound in the morning, and all his followers. Can you pick out that lord now?

80 LIEUTENANT O admirable spirit!
 FOLLYWIT You ne'er plot for your safeties, so your wants be satisfied.
 ENSIGN But if we bind one another, how shall the last man be bound?
 FOLLYWIT Pox on't, I'll have the footman 'scape.
 FOOTMAN That's I, I thank you, sir.

90 FOLLYWIT The footman of all other will be supposed to 'scape, for he comes in no bed all night, but lies in's clothes to be first ready i'th' morning. The horse and he lies in litter together. That's the right fashion of your bonny footman, and his freedom will make the better for our purpose, for we must have one i'th' morning to unbind the knight, that we may have our sport within ourselves. We now arrive at the most ticklish point, to rob and take our ease, to be thieves and lie by't. Look to't lads, it concerns every man's gullet. I'll not have the jest spoiled, that's certain, though it hazard a windpipe. I'll either go like a lord as I came, or be hanged like a thief as I am, and that's my resolution.

100 LIEUTENANT Troth, a match, captain, of all hands.
 [They shake hands and] exeunt

2.5 Enter Courtesan with Master Penitent Brothel
 COURTESAN O Master Penitent Brothel!
 PENITENT What is't, sweet Lady Gullman, that so seizes on thee with rapture and admiration?
 COURTESAN A thought, a trick, to make you, sir, especially happy, and yet I myself a saver by it.

 I would not leave you on the losing hand.

COURTESAN I will give trust to you, sir, the cause then why I raised you from your bed so soon, wherein I know sighs would not let you sleep. Thus understand it:
 10 You love that woman, Master Harebrain's wife,
 Which no invented means can crown with freedom
 For your desires and her own wish, but this
 Which in my slumbers did present itself.
 15 PENITENT I'm covetous, lady.
 COURTESAN
 You know her husband, lingering in suspect,
 Locks her from all society but mine.
 PENITENT Most true.
 COURTESAN I only am admitted, yet hitherto that has done you no real happiness. By my admittance I cannot perform that deed that should please you, you know. Wherefore thus I've conveyed it, I'll counterfeit a fit of violent sickness.
 PENITENT Good.
 25 COURTESAN Nay, 'tis not so good, by my faith, but to do you good.
 PENITENT And in that sense I called it. But take me with you, lady, would it be probable enough to have a sickness so suddenly violent?
 30 COURTESAN Puh, all the world knows women are soon down. We can be sick when we have a mind to't, catch an ague with the wind of our fans, surfeit upon the rump of a lark and bestow ten pound in physic upon't. We're likest ourselves when we're down. 'Tis the easiest art and cunning for our sect to counterfeit sick, that are always full of fits when we are well, for since we were made for a weak imperfect creature, we can fit that best that we are made for. I thus translated, and yourself slipped into the form of a physician—
 35 PENITENT I a physician, lady? Talk not on't, I beseech you. I shall shame the whole college.
 COURTESAN Tut, man, any quacksalving terms will serve for this purpose, for I am pitifully haunted with a brace of elder brothers, new perfumed in the first of their fortunes, and I shall see how forward their purses will be to the pleasing of my palate and restoring of my health. Lay on load enough upon 'em and spare 'em not, for they're good plump fleshy asses and may well enough bear it. Let gold, amber, and dissolved pearl be

- SIR BOUNTEOUS [within] Ho, Gunwater!
 FOLLYWIT [within] Singlestone!
 ANOTHER (within) Jenkin, wa, ha, ho!
 ANOTHER (within) Ewen!
 5 ANOTHER (within) Simcod!
 FOLLYWIT [within] Footman! whew!
Enter Sir Bounteous [in his nightgown] with a cord half unbound, Footman with him [unbinding him]
- FOOTMAN O good your worship, let me help your good old worship.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Ah poor honest footman, how didst thou 'scape this massacre?
- 10 FOOTMAN E'en by miracle, and lying in my clothes, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS I think so. I would I had lain in my clothes too, footman, so I had 'scaped 'em. I could have but risse like a beggar then, and so I do now, till more money come in. But nothing afflicts me so much, my poor geometrical footman, as that the barbarous villains should lay violence upon my lord. Ah, the binding of my lord cuts my heart in two pieces. [Footman frees him]
- 15 So, so, 'tis well, I thank thee, run to thy fellows, undo 'em, undo 'em, undo 'em.
- FOOTMAN Alas, if my lord should miscarry, they're unbound already, sir. They have no occupation but sleep, feed and fart. Exit
- 20 SIR BOUNTEOUS If I be not ashamed to look my lord i'th' face, I'm a Saracen. My lord—
- FOLLYWIT [within curtain] Who's that?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS One may see he has been scared. A pox on 'em for their labours!
- FOLLYWIT [within] Singlestone!
- 30 SIR BOUNTEOUS Singlestone? I'll ne'er answer to that, i'faith.
- FOLLYWIT [within] Suchman!
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Suchman? Nor that neither, i'faith, I am not brought so low, though I be old.
- FOLLYWIT [within] Who's that i'th' chamber?
- [Sir Bounteous pulls curtain to reveal Follywit, disguised as Lord Owemuch in his nightgown, bound in his bed]
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Good morrow, my lord, 'tis I. 35
- FOLLYWIT Sir Bounteous, good morrow. I would give you my hand, sir, but I cannot come at it. Is this the courtesy o'th' country, Sir Bounteous?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS
 Your lordship grieves me more than all my loss.
 'Tis the unnatural'st sight that can be found 40
 To see a noble gentleman hard bound.
- FOLLYWIT Trust me, I thought you had been better beloved, Sir Bounteous, but I see you have enemies, sir, and your friends fare the worse for 'em. I like your talk better than your lodging. I ne'er laid harder in a bed of down. 45
 I have had a mad night's rest on't. Can you not guess what they should be, Sir Bounteous?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Faith, Lincolnshire men, my lord.
- FOLLYWIT How? Fie, fie, believe it not, sir, these lie not far off, I warrant you. 50
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Think you so, my lord?
- FOLLYWIT I'll be burnt an they do: some that use to your house, sir, and are familiar with all the conveyances.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS This is the commodity of keeping open house, my lord, that makes so many shut their doors 55 about dinner-time.
- FOLLYWIT They were resolute villains. I made myself known to 'em, told 'em what I was, gave 'em my honourable word not to disclose 'em.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS O saucy unmannerly villains! 60
- FOLLYWIT And think you the slaves would trust me upon my word?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS They would not?
- FOLLYWIT Forsooth, no, I must pardon them. They told me lords' promises were mortal, and commonly die within half an hour after they are spoken. They were but gristles, and not one amongst a hundred come to any full growth or perfection, and therefore though I were a lord I must enter into bond. 65
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Insupportable rascals!
- FOLLYWIT Troth, I'm of that mind, Sir Bounteous, you fared the worse for my coming hither.
- [Sir Bounteous begins to unbind Follywit]
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Ah, good my lord, but I'm sure your lordship fared the worse. 70
- FOLLYWIT Pray, pity not me, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Is not your honour sore about the brawn of the arm? A murrain meet 'em, I feel it.
- FOLLYWIT About this place, Sir Bounteous. 75

SIR BOUNTEOUS You feel as it were a twinge, my lord?
 80 FOLLYWIT Ay, e'en a twinge, you say right.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS A pox discover 'em, that twinge I feel too.
 FOLLYWIT But that which disturbs me most, Sir Bounteous, lies here.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS True, about the wrist, a kind of tumid

 FOLLYWIT You say true, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS The reason of that, my lord, is the pulses

 FOLLYWIT Mass, so I get it.

 FOLLYWIT 'Slid, here's a house haunted indeed.

 LIEUTENANT A word with you, sir.
 FOLLYWIT How now, Singlestone?
 LIEUTENANT I'm sorry, my lord, your lordship has lost—
 95 SIR BOUNTEOUS Pup, pup, pup, pup, pup—
 FOLLYWIT What have I lost? Speak!
 SIR BOUNTEOUS [aside to Lieutenant] A good night's sleep, say.
 FOLLYWIT Speak, what have I lost, say?
 100 LIEUTENANT A good night's sleep, my lord, nothing else.
 FOLLYWIT That's true. [Rises, unbound] My clothes! Come!
 [Exit.] Curtains drawn
 LIEUTENANT [calling off] My lord's clothes! His honour's rising.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Hist, well said. Come hither. What has my

 LIEUTENANT His lordship must know that, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Hush, prithee tell me.
 LIEUTENANT 'Twill do you no pleasure to know't, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Yet again? I desire it, I say.
 110 LIEUTENANT Since your worship will needs know't, they have stolen away a jewel in a blue silk ribbon of a fair spur-royals.

 SIR BOUNTEOUS That's some two hundred i'th' total.
 115 LIEUTENANT Your worship's much about it, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Come, follow me, I'll make that whole again in so much money. Let not my lord know on't.
 LIEUTENANT O pardon me, Sir Bounteous, that were a dishonour to my lord. Should it come to his ear, I should 120 hazard my undoing by't.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS How should it come to his ear? If you be my lord's chief man about him, I hope you do not use to speak unless you be paid for't, and I had rather give you a counsellor's double fee to hold your peace. Come, 125 go to, follow me, I say.
 LIEUTENANT There will be scarce time to tell it, sir. My lord will away instantly.

SIR BOUNTEOUS His honour shall stay dinner, by his leave, I'll prevail with him so far. And now I remember a jest. I would 130 I bade the whoreson thieves to dinner last night. I would
 I might have their companies, a pox poison 'em. Exit LIEUTENANT Faith, and you are like to have no other guests, Sir Bounteous, if you have none but us. I'll give you that gift, i'faith. Exit

Enter Master Shortrod Harebrain with [the] two elder brothers, Master Inesse and Master Possibility

POSSIBILITY You see bold guests, Master Harebrain.
 HAREBRAIN You're kindly welcome to my house, good Master Inesse and Master Possibility.
 INESSE That's our presumption, sir.
 HAREBRAIN Rafe!
 5 [Enter Rafe]
 RAFF Here, sir.
 HAREBRAIN Call down your mistress to welcome these two gentlemen my friends.
 RAFF I shall, sir. Exit
 HAREBRAIN [aside]
 I will observe her carriage and watch
 10 The slippery revolutions of her eye.
 I'll lie in wait for every glance she gives
 And poise her words i'th' balance of suspect.
 If she but swag she's gone, either on this hand
 Overfamiliar, or on this too neglectful.
 15 It does behoove her carry herself even.
 POSSIBILITY
 But Master Harebrain—
 HAREBRAIN True, I hear you, sir.
 Was't you said?
 POSSIBILITY I have not spoke it yet, sir.
 HAREBRAIN Right, so I say.
 POSSIBILITY
 20 Is it not strange that in so short a time
 My little Lady Gullman should be so violently handled?
 HAREBRAIN
 O sickness has no mercy, sir.
 It neither pities lady's lip nor eye.
 It crops the rose out of the virgin's cheek,
 25 And so deflowers her that was ne'er deflowered.
 Fools then are maids to lock from men that treasure
 Which death will pluck and never yield them pleasure.
 Ah gentlemen, though I shadow it, that sweet virgin's

95 pup Bounteous makes inarticulate sounds in order to silence the Lieutenant.
 113 spur-royals gold coins imprinted with a blazing sun resembling a spur 116 make that whole compensate for the loss
 124 counsellor's double fee The chief counsel in legal actions took double fee;

 here, a bribe.
 126 tell count
 3.1.4 That's our presumption (a) So we presume (b) That's our arrogance
 11 slippery cunning

13 poise . . . suspect weigh her words in the scale of suspicion
 14 swag sink down
 16 even evenly, with moderation
 21 handled treated (by illness)
 28 shadow hide sickness grieves me not lightly. She was my wife's only 30 delight and company. Did you not hear her, gentlemen, i'th' midst of her extremest fit, still how she called upon my wife, remembered still my wife, 'Sweet Mistress Harebrain!' When she sent for me, o' one side of her bed stood the physician, the scrivener on the other:

 35 two horrible objects, but mere opposites in the course of their lives, for the scrivener binds folks and the physician makes them loose.
 POSSIBILITY But not loose of their bonds, sir?
 HAREBRAIN No by my faith, sir, I say not so. If the 40 physician could make 'em loose of their bonds, there's many a one would take physic that dares not now for poisoning. But as I was telling of you, her will was fashioning,
 Wherein I found her best and richest jewel
 45 Given as a legacy unto my wife.
 When I read that, I could not refrain weeping.
 Well, of all other, my wife has most reason to visit her.
 If she have any good nature in her, she'll show it there.
 [Enter Rafe]
 Now sir, where's your mistress?
 50 RAPE She desires you and the gentlemen your friends to hold her excused. Sh'as a fit of an ague now upon her, which begins to shake her.
 HAREBRAIN Where does it shake her most?
 RAPE All over her body, sir.
 HAREBRAIN
 55 Shake all her body, sir? 'Tis a saucy fit,
 I'm jealous of that ague. Pray walk in, gentlemen,
 I'll see you instantly. [Exeunt Inesse and Possibility]
 RAPE
 Now they are absent, sir, 'tis no such thing.
 HAREBRAIN What?
 60 RAPE My mistress has her health, sir,
 But 'tis her suit she may confine herself
 From sight of all men but your own dear self, sir,
 For since the sickness of that modest virgin,
 Her only company, she delights in none.
 HAREBRAIN
 65 No? Visit her again, commend me to her,
 Tell her they're gone, and only I myself
 Walk here to exchange a word or two with her.
 RAPE I'll tell her so, sir. Exit
 HAREBRAIN
 Fool that I am, and madman, beast! What worse?
 70 Suspicious o'er a creature that deserves
 The best opinion and the purest thought,
 Watchful o'er her that is her watch herself,

To doubt her ways that looks too narrowly
 Into her own defects. I, foolish-fearful,
 Have often rudely, out of giddy flames,
 75 Barred her those objects which she shuns herself.
 Thrice I've had proof of her most constant temper.
 Come I at unawares by stealth upon her,
 I find her circled in with divine writs
 Of heavenly meditations, here and there
 80 Chapters with leaves tucked up, which when I see,
 They either tax pride or adultery.
 Ah, let me curse myself, that could be jealous
 Of her whose mind no sin can make rebellious.
 And here the unmatched comes.
 [Enter Wife]
 Now wife, i'faith, they're gone. Push! See how fearful
 'tis. Will you not credit me? They're gone, i'faith. Why, think you I'll betray you? Come, come, thy delight and mine, thy only virtuous friend, thy sweet instructress is 90 violently taken, grievous sick, and which is worse, she mends not.
 WIFE Her friends are sorry for that, sir.
 HAREBRAIN She calls still upon thee, poor soul, remembers thee still, thy name whirls in her breath. 'Where's 95 Mistress Harebrain?' says she.
 WIFE Alas, good soul.
 HAREBRAIN She made me weep thrice. She's put thee in a jewel in her will.
 WIFE E'en to th' last gasp a kind soul.
 HAREBRAIN Take my man, go, visit her.
 100 WIFE Pray pardon me, sir; alas, my visitation cannot help her.
 HAREBRAIN O yet the kindness of a thing, wife. Still she holds the same rare temper. Take my man, I say.
 WIFE I would not take your man, sir, though I did purpose 105 going.
 HAREBRAIN No? Thy reason?
 WIFE
 The world's condition is itself so vile, sir,
 'Tis apt to judge the worst of those deserve not.
 'Tis an ill-thinking age, and does apply
 110 All to the form of it own luxury.
 This censure flies from one, that from another;
 'That man's her squire', says he; 'Her pimp', the t'other;
 'She's of the stamp', a third; fourth, 'I ha' known
 her.'
 I've heard this, not without a burning cheek.
 115 Then our attires are taxed, our very gait
 Is called in question, where a husband's presence

34 scrivener notary, who will record her will 35 mere absolute
 36 binds legally binds
 37 loose relieved of constipation

 117 where whereas

Scatters such thoughts, or makes 'em sink for fear
 Into the hearts that breed 'em. Nay, surely, if I went,
 sir,
 I would entreat your company.
 HAREBRAIN Mine? Prithee, wife, I have been there already.
 WIFE That's all one. Although you bring me but to th' door, sir, I would entreat no farther.
 HAREBRAIN Thou'rt such a wife! Why, I will bring thee thither then, but not go up, I swear.
 WIFE I'faith, you shall not. I do not desire it, sir.
 HAREBRAIN Why then, content.
 WIFE Give me your hand—you will do so, sir?
 HAREBRAIN Why, there's my lip, I will. [Kissing her]
 WIFE Why then, I go, sir.
 HAREBRAIN With me or no man! Incomparable such a woman!
Exeunt

*Vials, gallipots, plate, and an hourglass by her,
 the Courtesan [is discovered] on a bed for her counterfeit fit. [Enter] to her, Master Penitent Brothel [dressed] like a Doctor of Physic*
 PENITENT Lady?
 COURTESAN Ha, what news?
 PENITENT There's one Sir Bounteous Progress newly alighted from his footcloth, and his mare waits at door, as the fashion is.
 COURTESAN 'Slid, 'tis the knight that privately maintains me, a little short old spiny gentleman in a great doublet.
 PENITENT The same, I know 'im.
 COURTESAN He's my sole revenue, meat, drink and raiment.
 My good physician, work upon him, I'm weak.
 PENITENT Enough.
 [Enter Sir Bounteous Progress]
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Why, where be these ladies, these plump soft delicate creatures, ha?
 PENITENT Who would you visit, sir?
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Visit? Who? What are you with the plague in your mouth?
 PENITENT A physician, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Then you are a loose liver, sir. I have put you to your purgation.

PENITENT [aside] But you need none. You're purged in a worse fashion.
 COURTESAN Ah, Sir Bounteous.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS How now? What art thou?
 COURTESAN Sweet Sir Bounteous.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Passion of me, what an alteration's here!
 Rosamund sick, old Harry? Here's a sight able to make an old man shrink. I was lusty when I came in, but I am down now, i'faith. Mortality, yea? This puts me in mind of a hole seven foot deep, my grave, my grave, my grave. Hist, Master Doctor, a word, sir, hark, 'tis not the plague, is't?
 PENITENT The plague, sir? No.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Good.
 PENITENT [aside] He ne'er asks whether it be the pox or no,
 and of the twain that had been more likely.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS How now, my wench, how dost?
 COURTESAN [coughing] Huh, weak, knight, huh.
 PENITENT [aside] She says true, he's a weak knight indeed.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Where does it hold thee most, wench?
 COURTESAN All parts alike, sir.
 PENITENT [aside] She says true still, for it holds her in none.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Hark in thine ear. Thou'rt breeding of young bones; I am afraid I have got thee with child, i'faith.
 COURTESAN I fear that much, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS O, O, if it should! A young Progress, when all's done.
 COURTESAN You have done your good will, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS [aside] I see by her 'tis nothing but a surfeit of Venus, i'faith, and though I be old, I have gi'n't her. [To Courtesan] But since I had the power to make thee sick, I'll have the purse to make thee whole, that's certain. [To Penitent] Master Doctor.
 PENITENT Sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Let's hear, I pray, what is't you minister to
 her?
 PENITENT Marry, sir, some precious cordial, some costly refocillation, a composure comfortable and restorative.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Ay, ay, that, that, that.

3.2 This scene was clearly inspired by Pietro Aretino's Ragionamenti: for details see Daileader 2007.
 0.1 gallipots small medicine jars plate metal utensils
 0.2 discovered revealed
 4 footcloth large ornamented cloth laid over the horse's back and hanging to the ground on each side; considered a sign of rank.
 7 spiny spindly, thin doublet upper-body garment worn by men

 15–16 with . . . mouth speaking of the plague
 18 loose liver an immoral person, or one with a disordered liver, which was regarded as the seat of passion. Physicians were often suspected of irreligion.
 19 purgation proof, trial, but also punning on intestinal purgation
 20–1 in . . . fashion i.e. by his whore (sexually and financially)
 26 Rosamund . . . Harry? apparently a quotation from a lost ballad or play about Rosamond Clifford, the mistress of Henry II, supposedly poisoned by Henry's queen 27 shrink fearful, but suggesting the loss of an erection in the face of a 'hole seven foot deep'

 38 weak (a) prone to temptation (b) impotent
 49–50 surfeit of Venus too much sex
 58 refocillation restorative cordial composure mixture

- 60 PENITENT No poorer ingredients than the liquor of coral, clear amber or succinum, unicorn's horn six grains, magisterium perlarum one scruple—
SIR BOUNTEOUS Ah.
PENITENT Ossis de corde cervi half a scruple, aurum potabile
65 or his tincture—
SIR BOUNTEOUS Very precious, sir.
PENITENT All which being finely contunded and mixed in a stone or glass mortar with the spirit of diamber—
SIR BOUNTEOUS Nay, pray be patient, sir.
70 PENITENT That's impossible. I cannot be patient and a physician too, sir.
SIR BOUNTEOUS O cry you mercy, that's true, sir.
PENITENT All which aforesaid—
SIR BOUNTEOUS Ay, there you left, sir.
75 PENITENT When it is almost exsiccate or dry, I add thereto olei succini, olei masi, and cinnamoni.
SIR BOUNTEOUS So sir, olei masi, that same oil of mace is a great comfort to both the Counters.
PENITENT And has been of a long time, sir.
80 SIR BOUNTEOUS Well, be of good cheer, wench. There's gold for thee. [Giving money] Huh, let her want for nothing, Master Doctor. A poor kinswoman of mine: nature binds me to have a care of her. [Aside] There I gulled you, Master Doctor. [To Courtesan] Gather up a good spirit,
85 wench. The fit will away, 'tis but a surfeit of gristles.
[Aside] Ha, ha, I have fitted her! An old knight and a cock o' th' game still! I have not spurs for nothing, I see.
PENITENT [aside] No, by my faith, they're hatched. They 90 cost you an angel, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Look to her, good Master Doctor, let her want nothing. I've given her enough already. Ha, ha, ha! Exit
COURTESAN So, is he gone?
PENITENT He's like himself, gone. 95
COURTESAN [indicating the gold] Here's somewhat to set up with. How soon he took occasion to slip into his own flattery, soothing his own defects. He only fears he has done that deed which I ne'er feared to come from him in my life. This purchase came unlooked for. 100
PENITENT Hist, the pair of sons and heirs.
COURTESAN O, they're welcome, they bring money.
Enter Master Inesse [with blood on his collar] and Master Possibility
POSSIBILITY Master Doctor.
PENITENT I come to you, gentlemen.
POSSIBILITY How does she now? 105
PENITENT Faith, much after one fashion, sir.
INESSE There's hope of life, sir?
PENITENT I see no signs of death of her.
POSSIBILITY That's some comfort. Will she take anything
yet? 110
PENITENT Yes, yes, yes, she'll take still. Sh'as a kind of facility in taking. How comes your band bloody, sir?
INESSE You may see I met with a scab, sir.
PENITENT Diversa genera scabierum, as Pliny reports: there are divers kinds of scabs. 115
INESSE Pray, let's hear 'em, sir.
PENITENT An itching scab, that is your harlot. A sore scab, your usurer. A running, your promoter. A broad scab, your intelligencer. But a white scab, that's a scald knave and a pander. But to speak truth, the only scabs we are 120 nowadays troubled withal are new officers.

60 liquor of coral a solution of coral in water
61 clear...succinum white or yellow amber, cited by Pliny as beneficial for stomach ailments, ear and eye diseases unicorn's horn the horn of a rhinoceros, narwhal, or other animal, reputedly derived from the unicorn, and regarded as an antidote to poison 62 magisterium perlarum precipitate of pearls from an acid solution scruple one-third of a dram 64 Ossis de corde cervi small bones in the heart and womb of a deer, regarded as beneficial to pregnant women and those in labour.
aurum potabile nitromuriate of gold deoxidized in a volatile oil and drunk as a cordial
65 tincture essence
67 contunded pounded
68 spirit of diamber a stomachic and cordial containing ambergris, musk, and other aromatics
76 olei...cinnamoni oils of yellow amber,

mace, and cinnamon
77 oil of mace a pun alluding to the maces carried by the serjeants when they arrested debtors, who might replenish either of the Counters (City prisons); a parallel coinage is 'oil of whip', proverbially beneficial against idleness
85 gristles baby's bones, a reference to her supposed pregnancy
86 fitted her (a) served her appropriately
(b) caused this fit
87 cock...nothing alluding to cockfighting and the metal spurs attached to the legs of the birds, with a pun on 'cock of the game' as a sexual adept. 'Spurs' may also be a pun on the testicles.
89 hatched (a) as a chick (alluding to the child) (b) engraved, like the large, ornate spurs of a knight. There is also a numismatic pun: the spur, or spur-royal,
a coin worth fifteen shillings, produces angels, coins worth ten shillings.
92 enough i.e. the supposed child
95 gone (a) departed (b) out of his wits
100 purchase profit

106 after one fashion the same
109 take eat
112 taking Penitent puns on a woman's taking a man during sexual intercourse;
also a 'taker up' is one who in a gang of swindlers attracts and softens up the victim.
band a wide collar often worn with the ruff
113 scab punning on 'scab' as a low person 114 Diversa genera scabierum 'Ulcers as they be of many sorts, so are they cured after diverse manners' (Pliny, Natural History, XXXVI, xiv).
117 itching i.e. suffering the 'itch' of lust 118 promoter informer, a 'running' scab because he carries tales 119 intelligencer spy, one who gathers and distributes information, making secrets
'broad' or apparent white scab 'Treating skin affected by syphilis, or the 'pox', left a white scab.
scald afflicted with a scabby skin disease
(here, the pox); contemptible
121 officers constables

INESSE Why, now you come to mine, sir, for I'll be sworn one of them was very busy about my head this morning, and he should be a scab by that, for they are ambitious 125 and covet the head.
 PENITENT Why, you saw I derived him, sir.
 INESSE You physicians are mad gentlemen.
 PENITENT We physicians see the most sights of any men living. Your astronomers look upward into th' air—130 we look downward into th' body, and indeed we have power upward and downward.
 INESSE That you have, i'faith, sir.
 POSSIBILITY Lady, how cheer you now?
 COURTESAN The same woman still—[coughing] huh.
 135 POSSIBILITY That's not good.
 COURTESAN Little alteration.
 [Possibility gives her money]
 Fie, fie, you have been too lavish, gentlemen.
 INESSE Puh, talk not of that, lady, thy health's worth a million. Here, Master Doctor, spare for no cost.
 140 [Giving him money]
 POSSIBILITY Look what you find there, sir.
 COURTESAN What do you mean, gentlemen? Put up, put up, you see I'm down and cannot strive with you. I would rule you else. You have me at advantage, but if ever I live, I will requite it deeply.
 145 INESSE Tut, an't come to that once, we'll requite ourselves well enough.
 POSSIBILITY Mistress Harebrain, lady, is setting forth to visit you too.
 COURTESAN Ha!—huh!
 150 PENITENT [aside] There struck the minute that brings forth the birth of all my joys and wishes. But see the jar now:
 how shall I rid these from her?
 COURTESAN Pray, gentlemen, stay not above an hour from my sight.
 155 INESSE 'Sfoot, we are not going, lady.
 PENITENT [aside] Subtly brought about, yet 'twill not do, they'll stick by't. [To them] A word with you, gentlemen.
 INESSE and POSSIBILITY What says Master Doctor?

PENITENT She wants but settling of her sense with rest. One hour's sleep, gentlemen, would set all parts in tune. 160
 POSSIBILITY He says truth, i'faith.
 INESSE Get her to sleep, Master Doctor. We'll both sit here and watch by her.
 PENITENT [aside] Hell's angels watch you! No art can prevail with 'em. What with the thought of joys and 165 sight of crosses, my wits are at Hercules' Pillars, non plus ultra.
 COURTESAN Master Doctor, Master Doctor!
 PENITENT Here, lady.
 COURTESAN Your physic works! Lend me your hand! 170 [Penitent supplies a chamber-pot. She feigns farting and excreting]
 POSSIBILITY Farewell, sweet lady.
 INESSE Adieu, Master Doctor.
 [Exeunt Inesse and Possibility]
 COURTESAN So.
 PENITENT Let me admire thee.
 The wit of man wanes and decreases soon,
 But women's wit is ever at full moon. 175
 Enter Wife
 There shot a star from heaven.
 I dare not yet behold my happiness,
 The splendour is so glorious and so piercing.
 COURTESAN Mistress Harebrain, give my wit thanks hereafter. Your wishes are in sight, your opportunity spa- 180 cious.
 WIFE Will you but hear a word from me?
 COURTESAN Whoooh!
 WIFE My husband himself brought me to th' door, walks below for my return. Jealousy is prick-eared, and will 185 hear the wagging of a hair.
 COURTESAN Pish, you're a faint liver. Trust yourself with your pleasure and me with your security. Go.
 PENITENT
 The fullness of my wish!
 WIFE Of my desire! 190

123 busy...head busy hitting me on the head
 125 covet the head The officers aspire to the post of headborough, a minor parish official. There is also an allusion to the tendency of skin ailments to afflict the scalp.
 126 derived traced his lineage, also alluding to the medical term 'derive', which means to withdraw inflammation from a diseased body part by blistering or cupping.
 131 power...downward power to purge upward from the stomach or downward through the bowels

141 Put up put your money away, but also punning on 'put up' as (a) sheathe a sword or (b) insert the penis in the vagina
 143 have...advantage take advantage of me
 145 requite i.e. sexually
 151 jar obstacle
 152 these these two, Inesse and Possibility
 155 'Sfoot an oath, from 'God's foot'
 160 parts in tune punning on the 'parts' of a musical piece and the parts of the courtesan's body; also alluding to Penitent's impending consummation

with Mistress Harebrain
 165-6 thought...crosses expectation of pleasure and awareness of obstacles
 166 Hercules' Pillars Gibraltar and Mt Abyla, believed by the ancients to support the western boundary of the world; hence non plus ultra, 'no farther'.
 185 walks paces, waiting
 186-7 prick-eared...hair alertly listening, with obscene innuendos on 'prick' as penis, 'wagging' as copulation, and 'hair' as the female pudendum.
 188 faint liver coward, with a pun on the liver as seat of sexual desire

PENITENT

Beyond this sphere I never will aspire!

Exeunt [Penitent and Wife]Enter Master Harebrain [apart,] listening

HAREBRAIN

I'll listen. Now the flesh draws nigh her end,

At such a time women exchange their secrets

And ransack the close corners of their hearts.

195 What many years hath whelmed, this hour imparts.

COURTESAN [feigning to address Wife] Pray sit down, there's a low stool. Good Mistress Harebrain, this was kindly done—huh!—give me your hand—huh! Alas, how cold 200 you are. E'en so is your husband, that worthy wise gentleman, as comfortable a man to woman in my case as ever trod—huh!—shoe leather. Love him, honour him, stick by him. He lets you want nothing that's fit for a woman, and to be sure on't, he will see himself that you want it not.

205 HAREBRAIN And so I do, i'faith, 'tis right my humour.

COURTESAN You live a lady's life with him, go where you will, ride when you will, and do what you will.

HAREBRAIN Not so, not so, neither, she's better looked to.

210 COURTESAN I know you do, you need not tell me that. 'Twere e'en pity of your life, i'faith, if ever you should wrong such an innocent gentleman. Fie, Mistress Harebrain, what do you mean? Come you to discomfort me? Nothing but weeping with you?

215 HAREBRAIN She's weeping, 't'as made her weep. My wife shows her good nature already.

COURTESAN Still, still weeping? Huff, huff, huff, why how now, woman? Hey, hy, hy, for shame, leave! Suh, suh, she cannot answer me for snobbing.

220 HAREBRAIN All this does her good, beshrew my heart, and I pity her. Let her shed tears till morning, I'll stay for her. She shall have enough on't by my good will, I'll not be her hindrance.

COURTESAN O no, lay your hand here, Mistress Harebrain. Ay there, o there, there lies my pain, good gentlewoman. Sore? O ay, I can scarce endure your hand upon't. 225

HAREBRAIN Poor soul, how she's tormented.

COURTESAN Yes, yes, I eat a cullis an hour since.

HAREBRAIN There's some comfort in that yet; she may 'scape it. 230

COURTESAN O, it lies about my heart much.

HAREBRAIN I'm sorry for that, i'faith; she'll hardly 'scape it.

COURTESAN Bound? No, no, I'd a very comfortable stool this morning. 235

HAREBRAIN I'm glad of that i'faith, that's a good sign. I smell she'll 'scape it now.

COURTESAN Will you be going then?

HAREBRAIN Fall back, she's coming.

COURTESAN Thanks, good Mistress Harebrain. Welcome, sweet Mistress Harebrain. Pray commend me to the good gentleman your husband. 240

HAREBRAIN I could do that myself now.

COURTESAN And to my Uncle Winchcomb, and to my Aunt Lipsalve, and to my Cousin Falsetop, and to my Cousin Lickit, and to my Cousin Horseman, and to all my good cousins in Clerkenwell and Saint John's. 245

Enter Wife with Master Penitent

WIFE

At three days' end my husband takes a journey.

PENITENT

O, thence I derive a second meeting.

WIFE

May it prosper still.

Till then I rest a captive to his will. 250

Once again, health, rest and strength to thee, sweet lady. Farewell, you witty squall. Good Master Doctor, have a care to her body if you stand her friend. I know you can do her good.

COURTESAN Take pity of your waiter, go. Farewell, sweet Mistress Harebrain. 255

HAREBRAIN [coming forward] Welcome, sweet wife, alight upon my lip. [Kissing her] Never was hour spent better.192 nigh nearend (a) death (b) purpose (c) bottom, with 'the flesh' alluding to Penitent's penis193 secrets (a) confidences (b) private parts194 close hidden195 whelmed kept covered197 stool (perhaps accompanied by a gesture toward the chamber-pot)198 cold in relation to the courtesan's supposed fever; also, ironically, cold as in chaste, devoid of passions199 E'en...husband poking fun at Harebrain's coldness in bed201 trod 'Treading' is a term for copulation, based on the mating action of the male bird.202-3 want...woman punning on the two senses of 'want', the obscene sense of 'thing' and the literal sense of 'to fit'. The statement can mean either (a) he makes sure you need nothing suitable for a woman, or (b) he will not permit you to desire any 'thing' that fits (into) a woman.

203 see (a) see to it (b) be deceived into seeing207 ride (a) ride coaches (b) ride men (hence Harebrain's comment)210 pity...life the great regret of your life216 Huff, huff, huff coughing sounds, intended to cover the sounds of the off-stage sex218 snobbing sobbing—a re-interpretation of the Wife's vocalizations of pleasure228 eat atecullis nutritive broth230 'scape it escape death234 Bound constipated237 smell (a) sense (b) smell239 coming (a) approaching (b) achieving

orgasm

244-6 Uncle...Horseman all names suggesting bawds and whores: 'Winchcomb', presumably combs for wenches; 'Lipsalve', a balm for chafed lips or genitals; 'Falsetop', a wig or padded brassiere; 'Lickit', suggesting fellatio and 'Horseman', sexual 'riding'247 Clerkenwell...John's The Priory of St Johns was the main landmark in Clerkenwell, an area notorious for thieves and prostitutes.253 stand her friend (a) remain her friend (b) remain her lover, with a pun on a 'standing' or erect penis255 waiter referring to Harebrain, waiting below. 'Waiter' could mean servant or admirer, but 'waiters' also kept watch at principal ports to search incoming vessels for Catholic recusants.

WIFE Why, were you within the hearing, sir?
 260 HAREBRAIN Ay, that I was i'faith, to my great comfort. I deceived you there, wife, ha, ha!
 I do entreat thee, nay, conjure thee, wife,
 Upon my love, or what can more be said,
 Oftener to visit this sick virtuous maid.
 WIFE
 265 Be not so fierce. Your will shall be obeyed.
 HAREBRAIN
 Why then I see thou lov'st me.
Exeunt [the Harebrains]
 PENITENT Art of ladies!
 When plots are e'en past hope and hang their head,
 Set with a woman's hand, they thrive and spread.
Exit
 3.3 Enter Follywit with Lieutenant Mawworm, Ensign
Oboe, and the rest of his consorts
 FOLLYWIT Was't not well managed, you necessary mis-chiefs? Did the plot want either life or art?
 LIEUTENANT 'Twas so well, captain, I would you could make such another muss at all adventures.
 5 FOLLYWIT Dost call't a muss? I am sure my grandsire ne'er got his money worse in his life than I got it from him. If ever he did cozen the simple, why, I was born to revenge their quarrel. If ever oppress the widow, I a fatherless child have done as much for him. And so 'tis through 10 the world either in jest or earnest. Let the usurer look for't, for craft recoils in the end like an overcharged musket, and maims the very hand that puts fire to't.
 There needs no more but a usurer's own blow to strike him from hence to hell—'twill set him forward with 15 a vengeance. But here lay the jest, whoresons: my grandsire, thinking in his conscience that we had not robbed him enough o'ernight, must needs pity me i'th' morning and give me the rest.
 LIEUTENANT Two hundred pounds in fair rose-nobles, I 20 protest.

FOLLYWIT Push! I knew he could not sleep quietly till he had paid me for robbing of him too. 'Tis his humour and the humour of most of your rich men in the course of their lives, for you know,
 They always feast those mouths that are least needy, 25
 And give them more that have too much already.
 And what call you that but robbing of themselves a courtlier way? O!
 LIEUTENANT Cuds me, how now, captain?
 FOLLYWIT A cold fit that comes over my memory and has 30
 a shrewd pull at my fortunes.
 LIEUTENANT What's that, sir?
 FOLLYWIT Is it for certain, lieutenant, that my grandsire keeps an uncertain creature, a quean?
 LIEUTENANT Ay, that's too true, sir. 35
 FOLLYWIT So much the more preposterous for me. I shall hop shorter by that trick. She carries away the thirds at least. 'Twill prove entailed land, I am afraid, when all's done, i'faith. Nay, I have known a vicious old thought-acting father, 40
 Damned only in his dreams, thirsting for game,
 When his best parts hung down their heads for shame,
 For his blanched harlot dispossess his son,
 And make the pox his heir—'twas gravely done.
 How hadst thou first knowledge on't, lieutenant? 45
 LIEUTENANT
 Faith, from discourse, yet all the policy
 That I could use, I could not get her name.
 FOLLYWIT Dull slave that ne'er couldst spy it.
 LIEUTENANT But the manner of her coming was described 50
 to me.
 FOLLYWIT How is the manner, prithee?
 LIEUTENANT Marry, sir, she comes, most commonly, coached.
 FOLLYWIT Most commonly coached indeed, for coaches are as common nowadays as some that ride in 'em. She 55 comes most commonly coached—

265 fierce eager, ardent
 266 Art skill, artfulness
 267-8 When...spread The metaphor is from horticulture, but there are puns suggesting the effect of a woman's hand on a flaccid penis.
 3.3.1-2 necessary mischiefs useful mischief-makers
 4 muss scramble (a children's game) at all adventures at any risk
 11 recoils mischarges
 12 puts fire to't triggered it 13 usurer's own blow i.e. his blow against another, which recoils against him. This also suggests the phallic 'blow' which may result in rebellious progeny like
 Follywit.
 14 set him forward advance him
 19 rose-nobles gold coins stamped with a rose
 30 cold fit chill

31 shrewd pull a sharp pull, a fierce assault.
 The original spelling is 'shrode,' which allows for a funeral pun: 'shrode' is a variant of 'shrewd' and 'shroud.' Follywit suffers a premonition of ill fortune.
 34 uncertain morally questionable, shady quean whore
 36 preposterous in its etymological sense of placing last what should be first 37 hop shorter as if on a shorter leash
 37-8 thirds...entailed She may get a widow's third of the estate while she lives, making it entailed land, limited in its transference. The pun on 'in-tailed', or vested in a woman's 'tail', is a favourite of Middleton's.
 39 vicious laden with vice 40 thought-acting capable of acting,

 41 game sexual play
 42 best parts (a) best qualities (b) private

 54-5 coaches...common punning on the pejorative sense of 'common'. By 1605 riding in a coach was no longer a mark of status; coaches were frequently used for prostitution.

- LIEUTENANT True, there I left, sir: guarded with some leash of pimps.
- FOLLYWIT Beside the coachman?
- 60 LIEUTENANT Right, sir. Then alighting, she's privately received by Master Gunwater.
- FOLLYWIT That's my grandsire's chief gentleman i'th' chain of gold. That he should live to be a pander and yet look upon his chain and his velvet jacket!
- 65 LIEUTENANT Then is your grandsire rounded i'th' ear, the key given after the Italian fashion, backward, she closely conveyed into his closet, there remaining till either opportunity smile upon his credit, or he send down some hot caudle to take order in his performance.
- FOLLYWIT
Peace, 'tis mine own, i'faith—I ha't!
- 70 LIEUTENANT How now, sir?
- FOLLYWIT Thanks, thanks to any spirit
That mingled it 'mongst my inventions.
- ENSIGN Why, Master Follywit!
- ALL Captain!
- 75 FOLLYWIT Give me scope and hear me.
I have begot that means which will both furnish me
And make that quean walk under his conceit.
- LIEUTENANT That were double happiness, to put thyself into money and her out of favour.
- 80 FOLLYWIT And all at one dealing!
- ENSIGN 'Sfoot, I long to see that hand played.
- FOLLYWIT And thou shalt see 't quickly, i'faith. Nay, 'tis in grain, I warrant it hold colour. Lieutenant, step behind yon hanging. If I mistook not at my entrance, there hangs the lower part of a gentlewoman's gown, with a mask and a chin-clout. Bring all this way. Nay, but do't cunningly now: 'tis a friend's house, and I'd use it so. There's a taste for you. [Exit Lieutenant]
- ENSIGN But prithee, what wilt thou do with a gentlewoman's lower part?
- FOLLYWIT Why, use it.
- ENSIGN You've answered me indeed in that. I can demand no farther.
[Re-enter Lieutenant with women's garments]
- FOLLYWIT Well said. Lieutenant—
- LIEUTENANT What will you do now, sir?
- 95 FOLLYWIT Come, come, thou shalt see a woman quickly made up here.
- LIEUTENANT But that's against kind, captain, for they are always long a-making ready.
- FOLLYWIT And is not most they do against kind, I prithee? To lie with their horsekeeper, is not that against kind? To wear half-moons made of another's hair, is not that against kind? To drink down a man—she that should set him up—pray, is not that monstrously against kind now? [Lieutenant holds out skirt for Follywit] Nay, over with it, lieutenant, over with it. Ever while you live, put a woman's clothes over her head. Cupid plays best at blindman buff.
- LIEUTENANT [putting skirt over Follywit's head] You shall have your will, maintenance. I love mad tricks as well as you, for your heart, sir. But what shift will you make for upper bodice, captain?
- FOLLYWIT [settling skirt at his waist] I see now thou'rt an ass. Why, I'm ready.
- LIEUTENANT Ready?
- 115 FOLLYWIT Why, the doublet serves as well as the best and is most in fashion. We're all male to th' middle, mankind from the beaver to th' bum. 'Tis an Amazonian time—you shall have women shortly tread their husbands. I should have a couple of locks behind. Prithee, lieutenant, find 'em out for me and wind 'em about

57 leash three, as of hunting dogs

64 chain...jacket marks of high status amongst the servants

65 rounded whispered

66 key...backward The key is handed behind the back. Italians were reputed to favour anal intercourse, perhaps due to the pornographic poems of Pietro Aretino, which emphasize this practice.

67 closet bedroom

68–9 either...performance If opportunity alone does not boost his sexual potency, he sends for some caudle (a restorative drink) to give him vigour.

72 inventions schemes

75 Give me scope give me your attention

76 begot conceived of furnish me satisfy my needs

77 walk...conceit decline in his estimation

82–3 'tis...colour It is dyed in a fast colour; it is a sound plan.

85 lower...gown skirt or kirtle

86 mask veil

chin-clout scarf, muffler. Masks had become fashionable for all women in public, but chin-clouts were chiefly worn by the lower classes.

87 friend's house alluding to both the clothing and the locale

88 There's...you (perhaps directed at the audience)

90 lower part (a) skirt (b) genitals

97 made up (a) created (b) screwed, and possibly made pregnant

98 kind nature

99 long a-making ready (a) take long to get dressed (b) take long to make ready for intercourse

101 lie...horsekeeper against nature because it departs from hierarchical social order

102 half-moons wigs in the shape of a half-moon, perhaps used to make the natural hair look fuller

103 drink...man consume a man sexually

104 set him up (a) honour him (b) give him an erection

107–8 put...buff (a) undress her (b) pull her skirt up over her head (playing with the idea of love as blind)

110 maintenance one who maintains servants; a 'meal-ticket'

111 shift invention

112 upper bodice From the 1580s, the bodice was made very much like the masculine doublet.

118 beaver to th' bum hat to waist. A beaver was a hat made of beaver fur; a bum was a French farthingale, a roll placed around the hips to add fullness to a woman's skirts.

118–19 Amazonian time an age of masculine women; the Amazons were a legendary race of female warriors

119 tread to mount sexually, as of birds

120 locks behind locks of false hair wound around the hatband, apparently indicating sexual availability

my hatband. Nay, you shall see, we'll be in fashion to a hair, and become all with probability. The most musty-visage critic shall not except against me.

125 LIEUTENANT [arranging Follywit's hair] Nay, I'll give thee thy due behind thy back. Thou art as mad a piece of clay—

FOLLYWIT Clay! Dost call thy captain clay? Indeed, clay was made to stop holes, he says true. Did not I tell you rascals you should see a woman quickly made up?

130 ENSIGN I'll swear for't, captain.

FOLLYWIT Come, come, my mask and my chin-clout— come into th' court.

LIEUTENANT Nay, they were both i'th' court long ago, sir.

135 FOLLYWIT Let me see, where shall I choose two or three for pimps now? But I cannot choose amiss amongst you all, that's the best. Well, as I am a quean, you were best have a care of me and guard me sure. I give you warning beforehand, 'tis a monkey-tailed age. 'Life, you shall go nigh to have half a dozen blithe fellows surprise me cowardly, carry me away with a pair of oars, and put in at Putney!

LIEUTENANT We should laugh at that, i'faith.

FOLLYWIT Or shoot in upo'th' coast of Kew!

145 LIEUTENANT Two notable fit landing places for lechers, P and Q, Putney and Kew.

FOLLYWIT Well, say you have fair warning on't. The hair about the hat is as good as a flag upo'th' pole at a common playhouse to waste company, and a chin-clout is of that powerful attraction, I can tell you, 'twill draw more linen to't.

150 LIEUTENANT Fear not us, captain, there's none here but can fight for a whore as well as some Inns o' Court man.

155 FOLLYWIT Why, then, set forward, and as you scorn two-shilling brothel, Twelve-penny panderism, and such base bribes, Guard me from bonny scribes and bony scribes.

LIEUTENANT Hang 'em, pensions and allowances, fourpence halfpenny a meal, hang 'em. Exeunt 160
Finit Actus Tertius

Incipit Actus Quartus 4.1
Enter in his chamber out of his study, Master Penitent Brothel, a book in his hand, reading

PENITENT

Ha! Read that place again: 'Adultery Draws the divorce 'twixt heaven and the soul.' Accursed man that standst divorced from heaven, Thou wretched unthrift that hast played away Thy eternal portion at a minute's game, To please the flesh hast blotted out thy name. Where were thy nobler meditations busied That they durst trust this body with itself, This natural drunkard that undoes us all And makes our shame apparent in our fall? Then let my blood pay for't, and vex and boil; My soul, I know, would never grieve to th' death The eternal spirit that feeds her with his breath. Nay, I that knew the price of life and sin, What crown is kept for continence, what for lust, The end of man and glory of that end, As endless as the giver, To dote on weakness, slime, corruption, woman? What is she, took asunder from her clothes? Being ready, she consists of hundred pieces, Much like your German clock, and near allied: Both are so nice they cannot go for pride. Beside a greater fault, but too well known, They'll strike to ten when they should stop at one. Within these three days the next meeting's fixed; If I meet then, hell and my soul be mixed. My lodging, I know constantly, she not knows. 25

123 become all (a) become whatever we choose (b) look good in any circumstance 124 musty-visage dour, prudish except against object to 126 behind thy back punning on either anal intercourse or the front-to-back position
127 clay (a) human flesh (b) weak and cowardly person (c) material for plastering (d) the penis
129 stop holes i.e. the vagina
133 court (a) courtyard (b) royal court
139 monkey-tailed lascivious
142 put in alluding to penile penetration
142-4 Putney...Kew small towns outside of London, noted as pleasure haunts; both could be reached by boat on the Thames River.
144 shoot in penetrate sexually
145-6 P and Q initials for 'prick' and the French 'queue' meaning 'tail' 149 waste company bad company, with a pun on 'waist'

chin-clout a signal of sexual availability
150-1 draw...to't The reference is unclear. Perhaps the 'fine linen' refers to gallants in fine clothing who will be attracted.
153-4 Inns...man law student, residing at one of the London Inns of Court
156 two-shilling the standard price for an ordinary whore 158 bonny scribes pretty misers bony scribes starving professional penmen
4.1.1 place passage
4 unthrift spendthrift
4-5 played...portion hazarded, as at dice, your divine inheritance
5 minute's game i.e. sexual intercourse
13 her the soul's
15 crown reward; glory
17 giver i.e. God

19 took asunder from removed from 20 ready dressed
21 German clock a reference to the first clocks, which were imported from Germany and notoriously irregular
22 nice delicate, over-refined go (a) go out (b) walk. Women's fashions both made for elaborate preparation rituals and prevented them from walking properly, once dressed.
23 fault flaw; but the sense of 'fissure, crack' made for obscene punning on the female anatomy—hence, a 'fault... too well known', suggests the well-used vagina of a (literally) loose woman
24 strike to as a clock; the word was also used in a similar sense as 'screw', copulate with—hence, the difference between ten (men) and one
27 I...constantly I am sure

- Sin's hate is the best gift that sin bestows.
I'll ne'er embrace her more—never—bear witness, never.
Enter the Devil in [Wife's] shape, claps him on the shoulder
- SUCCUBUS
30 What? At a stand? The fitter for my company!
- PENITENT
Celestial soldiers guard me!
- SUCCUBUS How now, man?
'Las, did the quickness of my presence fright thee?
- PENITENT
Shield me, you ministers of faith and grace!
- SUCCUBUS
Leave, leave, are you not ashamed to use
Such words to a woman?
- PENITENT Thou'rt a devil.
- 35 SUCCUBUS A devil?
Feel, feel, man: has a devil flesh and bone?
- PENITENT
I do conjure thee by that dreadful power—
- SUCCUBUS
The man has a delight to make me tremble.
Are these the fruits of thy adventurous love?
- 40 Was I enticed for this? to be soon rejected?
Come, what has changed thee so, delight?
- PENITENT
Away!
- SUCCUBUS
Remember!
Remember!
- PENITENT Leave my sight!
- SUCCUBUS
Have I this meeting wrought with cunning
Which when I come I find thee shunning?
45 Rouse thy amorous thoughts and twine me,
All my interest I resign thee.
Shall we let slip this mutual hour
Comes so seldom in our power?
Where's thy lip, thy clip, thy fadom?
50 Had women such loves, would't not mad 'em?
Art a man, or dost abuse one?
A love, and knowst not how to use one?
Come, I'll teach thee—
- PENITENT Do not follow!
- SUCCUBUS
Once so firm and now so hollow?
When was place and season sweeter?
55 Thy bliss in sight and dar'st not meet her?
Where's thy courage, youth and vigour?
Love's best pleased when't's seized with rigour.
Seize me then with veins most cheerful;
Women love no flesh that's fearful.
60 'Tis but a fit—come, drink't away,
And dance and sing, and kiss and play.
[Dancing and singing] Fa le la le la fa le la le la fa le la fa le la le la.
- PENITENT Torment me not.
- SUCCUBUS Fa le la fa le la fa la la lo.
- PENITENT Fury!
- SUCCUBUS Fa le la fa le la fa la la lo.
- PENITENT
Devil! I do conjure thee once again
By that soul-quaking thunder to depart,
70 And leave this chamber freed from thy damned art!
Succubus stamps and exit
It has prevailed! O my sin-shaking sinews!
What should I think? Jasper, why, Jasper!
[Enter Jasper]
- JASPER
Sir, how now? What has disturbed you, sir?
- PENITENT
A fit, a qualm—is Mistress Harebrain gone?
75
- JASPER
Who, sir? Mistress Harebrain?
- PENITENT Is she gone, I say?
- JASPER Gone? Why, she was never here yet.
- PENITENT No?
- JASPER Why, no, sir.
- PENITENT Art sure on't?
- 80 JASPER Sure on't? If I be sure I breathe and am myself.
- PENITENT I like it not. Where kept'st thou?
- JASPER I'th' next room, sir.
- PENITENT Why, she struck by thee, man.
- JASPER You'd make one mad, sir. That a gentlewoman 85 should steal by me and I not hear her? 'Sfoot, one may hear the rustling of their bums almost an hour before we see 'em.
- PENITENT
I will be satisfied, although to hazard.

4.2 Enter at one door Sir Bounteous Progress, at another Gunwater
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Why, how now, Master Gunwater? What's the news with your haste?
 GUNWATER I have a thing to tell your worship—
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Why, prithe tell me, speak, man.
 5 GUNWATER Your worship shall pardon me, I have better bringing up than so.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS How, sir?
 GUNWATER 'Tis a thing made fit for your ear, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS O, O, O, cry you mercy, now I begin to 10 taste you. Is she come?
 GUNWATER She's come, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Recovered, well and sound again?
 GUNWATER That's to be feared, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Why, sir?
 15 GUNWATER She wears a linen cloth about her jaw.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Ha, ha, haw! Why, that's the fashion, you whoreson Gunwater.
 GUNWATER The fashion, sir? Live I so long time to see that a fashion,
 20 Which rather was an emblem of dispraise.
 It was suspected much in Monsieur's days.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Ay, ay, in those days, that was a queasy time. Our age is better hardened now, and put oftener in the fire. We are tried what we are. Tut, the pox is as 25 natural now as an ague in the springtime. We seldom take physic without it. Here, take this key. You know what duties belong to 't. Go, give order for a cullis, let there be a good fire made i'th' matted chamber, do you hear, sir?
 30 GUNWATER I know my office, sir. Exit

SIR BOUNTEOUS An old man's venery is very chargeable, my masters: there's much cookery belongs to't. Exit

Enter Gunwater [wearing his gold chain] with Follywit in Courtesan's disguise and masked 4.3
 GUNWATER Come, lady, you know where you are now?
 FOLLYWIT Yes, good Master Gunwater.
 GUNWATER This is the old closet, you know.
 FOLLYWIT I remember it well, sir.
 GUNWATER There stands a casket. I would my yearly 5 revenue were but worth the wealth that's locked in't, lady, yet I have fifty pound a year, wench.
 FOLLYWIT Beside your apparel, sir?
 GUNWATER Yes, faith, have I.
 FOLLYWIT But then you reckon your chain, sir. 10 GUNWATER No, by my troth do I not, neither. Faith, an you consider me rightly, sweet lady, you might admit a choice gentleman into your service.
 FOLLYWIT O pray, away, sir!
 GUNWATER Pusha! Come, come, you do but hinder your 15 fortunes, i'faith. I have the command of all the house, I can tell you. [Groping Follywit] Nothing comes into th' kitchen but comes through my hands.
 FOLLYWIT Pray do not handle me, sir.
 GUNWATER Faith, you're too nice, lady, and as for my 20 secrecy, you know I have vowed it often to you.
 FOLLYWIT Vowed it? No, no, you men are fickle.
 GUNWATER Fickle? 'Sfoot bind me, lady—
 FOLLYWIT [grasping his gold chain] Why, I bind you by 25 virtue of this chain to meet me tomorrow at the Flower-de-luce yonder, between nine and ten.
 GUNWATER And if I do not, lady, let me lose it, thy love and my best fortunes!
 FOLLYWIT [taking chain] Why, now I'll try you, go to.
 GUNWATER Farewell, sweet lady. Kisses her. Exit 30
 FOLLYWIT Welcome, sweet coxcomb! By my faith, a good induction. I perceive by his overworn phrase and his action toward the middle region still, there has been some saucy nibbling motion, and no doubt the cunning quean waited but for her prey, and I think 'tis better 35 bestowed upon me for his soul's health—and his body's too. I'll teach the slave to be so bold yet, as once to offer

4.2.10 taste you (a) understand you
 (b) relish your tidings
 13 feared doubted
 15 cloth... jaw a means of hiding the disfigurement caused by syphilis; Follywit's chin-clout also hides his identity.
 21 Monsieur's The Duke of Anjou, brother of the French king Charles IX, who visited England several times in the 1570s, hoping to marry Elizabeth.

 frequent remedy for the pox. Also, an ironic allusion to Biblical metaphors of testing such as in Zechariah 13:9.

to vault into his master's saddle, i'faith. Now, casket, 40 by your leave, I have seen your outside oft, but that's no proof. Some have fair outsides that are nothing worth. [Breaking casket open] Ha! Now by my faith, a gentlewoman of very good parts: diamond, ruby, sapphire, onyx cum prole silexque. If I do not wonder how 45 the quean 'scaped tempting, I'm an hermaphrodite.
 Sure she could lack nothing but the devil to point to't, and I wonder that he should be missing. Well, 'tis better as it is: this is the fruit of old grunting venery.
 Grandsire, you may thank your drab for this. O fie, in your crinkling days, grandsire, keep a courtesan to 50 hinder your grandchild! 'Tis against nature, i'faith, and I hope you'll be weary on't.
 Now to my villains that lurk close below.
 Who keeps a harlot, tell him this from me:
 He needs nor thief, disease, nor enemy.

Exit [with jewels]

4.4 Enter Sir Bounteous

SIR BOUNTEOUS Ah sirrah, methink I feel myself well toasted, bumbasted, rubbed and refreshed. But i'faith,
 I cannot forget to think how soon sickness has altered her to my taste. I gave her a kiss at bottom o'th' stairs, 5 and by th' mass, methought her breath had much ado to be sweet, like a thing compounded methought of wine, beer and tobacco. I smelt much pudding in't.
 It may be but my fancy or her phisic;
 For this I know, her health gave such content,
 10 The fault rests in her sickness or my scent.
 [Looking for Courtesan] How dost thou now, sweet girl, what, well recovered?
 Sickness quite gone, ha? Speak, ha? Wench! Frank Gullman!
 [Finding open casket] Why, body of me, what's here? My casket wide open, broke open, my jewels stolen! Why, 15 Gunwater!
 GUNWATER [within] Anon, anon, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Come hither, Gunwater.
 GUNWATER [within] That were small manners, sir, i'faith.
 I'll find a time anon. Your worship's busy yet.
 20 SIR BOUNTEOUS Why, Gunwater!

GUNWATER [within] Foh, nay then, you'll make me blush, i'faith, sir.

[Enter Gunwater]

SIR BOUNTEOUS Where's this creature?

GUNWATER What creature is't you'd have, sir?

SIR BOUNTEOUS The worst that ever breathes.

GUNWATER That's a wild boar, sir.

SIR BOUNTEOUS That's a vild whore, sir. Where didst thou leave her, rascal?

GUNWATER Who? Your recreation, sir?

SIR BOUNTEOUS My execration, sir.

30

GUNWATER Where I was wont, in your worship's closet.

SIR BOUNTEOUS

A pox engross her, it appears too true.

See you this casket, sir?

GUNWATER

My chain, my chain, my chain, my one and only chain!

Exit

SIR BOUNTEOUS

Thou runst to much purpose now, Gunwater, yea?

35

Is not a quean enough to answer for

But she must join a thief to't? A thieving quean!

Nay, I have done with her, i'faith. 'Tis a sign she's been sick o' late, for she's a great deal worse than she was.

By my troth, I would have pawned my life upon't, did 40

she want anything? Was she not supplied?

Nay, and liberally, for that's an old man's sin:

We'll feast our lechery though we starve our kin.

Is not my name Sir Bounteous, am I not expressed
 there?

Ah, fie, fie, fie, fie, fie, but I perceive

45

Though she have never so complete a friend,

A strumpet's love will have a waft i'th' end

And distaste the vessel. I can hardly bear this.

But say I should complain, perhaps she has pawned
 'em—

'Sfoot, the judges will but laugh at it, and bid her

50 borrow more money of 'em, make the old fellow pay for's lechery: that's all the 'mends I get. I have seen the same case tried at Newbury the last 'sizes.

Well, things must slip and sleep. I will dissemble it 38 vault ... saddle a variation on the 'riding' metaphor

42 of ... parts (a) good qualities (b) attractive body-parts. The passage as a whole equates the broaching of the casket with the sexual penetration of a woman.

43 onyx ... silexque onyx with its compounds, and silica; both are forms of quartz, often used for cameos. The phrase is out of a Latin grammar book; this particular passage refers to nouns of ambiguous gender.

44 hermaphrodite a person with attributes of both sexes

47 this i.e. Follywit's act, the theft

48 drab slut

49 crinkling wrinkled

50 hinder i.e. from his inheritance

4.4.1 sirrah Bounteous presumably thinks Gunwater is in the room.

2 bumbasted bum-basted, roasted on the backside, but also punning on bombast or hot air

7 pudding a variety of tobacco, compacted into a sausage-shaped wad

8 phisic medicine

9 content contentment

10 scent sense of smell

12 Frank Gullman Frank is a diminutive of Francis. Her first and last names together create the oxymoron 'honest trickster'.

13 body of me an oath derived from the body of Christ

18 small manners bad manners. Gunwater does not want to interrupt Bounteous and his mistress making love.

26 wild boar a reference to the wild boar who roots up the vineyard of Israel in Psalm 80:13: an image of Satan

27 vile vile; the original spelling has been kept here for the sake of the rhyme.

32 engross take

35 to much purpose for good reason

46 friend a euphemism for lover

47 waft bad odour; fart

48 distaste render offensive

52 'mends amends

53 'sises assizes, court sessions

54 things ... sleep i.e. let sleeping dogs lie

55 Because my credit shall not lose her lustre.
But whilst I live, I'll neither love nor trust her.
I ha' done, I ha' done, I ha' done with her i'faith!

PENITENT [within] A friend.
[Enter Penitent]

RAFE What's your will, sir?
PENITENT Is Master Harebrain at home?
5 RAFE No, newly gone from it, sir.
PENITENT Where's the gentlewoman his wife?
RAFE My mistress is within, sir.
PENITENT When came she in, I pray?
RAFE Who, my mistress? She was not out these two days,
10 to my knowledge.
PENITENT No? Trust me, I'd thought I'd seen her. I would request a word with her.
RAFE I'll tell her, sir. [Exit]
PENITENT I thank you.—It likes me worse and worse.
Enter [Wife]

WIFE
15 Why, how now, sir? 'Twas desperately adventured.
I little looked for you until the morrow.
PENITENT
No? Why, what made you at my chamber then even now?
WIFE
I at your chamber?
PENITENT Puh, dissemble not,
Come, come, you were there.
WIFE By my life you wrong me, sir.
PENITENT What?
WIFE
20 First, you're not ignorant what watch keeps o'er me,
And for your chamber, as I live I know 't not.
PENITENT [strikes himself]
Burst into sorrow then and grief's extremes
Whilst I beat on this flesh!
WIFE What is't disturbs you, sir?
PENITENT
Then was the devil in your likeness there.
WIFE Ha?

PENITENT
The very devil assumed thee formally:
That face, that voice, that gesture, that attire
E'en as it sits on thee, not a pleat altered,
That beaver band, the colour of that periwig,
The farthingale above the navel, all
As if the fashion were his own invention.

WIFE
Mercy defend me.
PENITENT To beguile me more,
The cunning succubus told me that meeting
Was wrought o' purpose by much wit and art,
Wept to me, laid my vows before me, urged me,
35 Gave me the private marks of all our love,
Wooded me in wanton and effeminate rhymes,
And sung and danced about me like a fairy.
And had not worthier cogitations blest me,
Thy form and his enchantments had possessed me.

WIFE
40 What shall become of me? My own thoughts doom me.
PENITENT
Be honest: then the devil will ne'er assume thee.
He has no pleasure in that shape to abide
Where these two sisters reign not, lust or pride.
He as much trembles at a constant mind
45 As looser flesh at him. Be not dismayed:
Spring souls for joy, his policies are betrayed.
Forgive me, Mistress Harebrain, on whose soul
The guilt hangs double,
My lust and thy enticement: both I challenge
50 And therefore of due vengeance it appeared
To none but me to whom both sins inhered.
What knows the lecher when he clips his whore
Whether it be the devil his parts adore?
They're both so like that, in our natural sense,
55 I could discern no change nor difference.
No marvel then times should so stretch and turn:
None for religion, all for pleasure burn.
Hot zeal into hot lust is now transformed,
Grace into painting, charity into clothes,
60 Faith into false hair, and put off as often.
There's nothing but our virtue knows a mean.
He that kept open house now keeps a quean.
He will keep open still that he commends,
And there he keeps a table for his friends;

PENITENT
A happy inward peace crown both your joys.
HAREBRAIN
Thanks above utterance to you.

Now, the news?

Invites you and my mistress to a feast
85 On Tuesday next. His man attends without.
HAREBRAIN
Return both with our willingness and thanks.
[Exit Rafe]
I will entreat you, sir, to be my guest.
PENITENT
Who, I, sir?
HAREBRAIN Faith, you shall.
PENITENT Well, I'll break strife.
HAREBRAIN
A friend's so rare, I'll sooner part from life. [Exeunt]
- 4.6 Enter Follywit, the Courtesan striving from him
FOLLYWIT What, so coy, so strict? Come, come.
COURTESAN Pray change your opinion, sir, I am not for that use.
FOLLYWIT Will you but hear me?
5 COURTESAN I shall hear that I would not. Exit
- FOLLYWIT 'Sfoot, this is strange. I've seldom seen a wench stand upon stricter points. 'Life, she will not endure to be courted. Does she e'er think to prosper? I'll ne'er believe that tree can bring forth fruit that never bears a blossom. Courtship's a blossom and often brings forth 10 fruit in forty weeks. 'Twere a mad part in me now to turn over. If ever there were any hope on't, 'tis at this instant. Shall I be madder now than ever I have been?
I'm in the way, i'faith.
Man's never at high height of madness full 15 Until he love and prove a woman's gull.
I do protest in earnest, I ne'er knew
At which end to begin to affect a woman
Till this bewitching minute. I ne'er saw
Face worth my object till mine eye met hers.
20 I should laugh an I were caught, i'faith.
I'll see her again, that's certain, whate'er comes on't.
Enter the Mother
By your favour, lady.
MOTHER You're welcome, sir.
FOLLYWIT Know you the young gentlewoman that went 25 in lately?
MOTHER I have best cause to know her. I'm her mother,
sir.
FOLLYWIT O, in good time. I like the gentlewoman well, a pretty, contrived beauty.
30 MOTHER Ay, nature has done her part, sir.
FOLLYWIT But she has one uncomely quality.
MOTHER What's that, sir?
FOLLYWIT 'Sfoot, she's afraid of a man.
MOTHER Alas, impute that to her bashful spirit. She's 35 fearful of her honour.
FOLLYWIT Of her honour? 'Slid, I'm sure I cannot get her maidenhead with breathing upon her, nor can she lose her honour in her tongue.
MOTHER True, and I have often told her so, but what would 40 you have of a foolish virgin, sir, a wilful virgin? I tell you, sir, I need not have been in that solitary estate that I am, had she had grace and boldness to have put herself forward. Always timorsome, always backward, 45 ah, that same peevish honour of hers has undone her and me both, good gentleman. The suitors, the jewels, the jointures that has been offered her—we had been made women forever! But what was her fashion? She could not endure the sight of a man, forsooth, but run and hole herself presently, so choice of her honour. I

 FOLLYWIT Would I might be hanged if my love do not stretch to her deeper and deeper. Those bashful maiden 60 humours take me prisoner. When there comes a restraint upon flesh, we are always most greedy upon't, and that makes your merchants' wives oftentimes pay so dear for a mouthful. Give me a woman as she was made at first, simple of herself, without sophistication, 65 like this wench. I cannot abide them when they have tricks, set speeches and artful entertainments. You shall have some so impudently aspected, they will outcry the forehead of a man, make him blush first and talk him into silence, and this is counted manly in a woman. It 70 may hold so—sure womanly it is not, no.
 If e'er I love or anything move me,
 'Twill be a woman's simple modesty.
Enter Mother bringing in strivingly the Courtesan COURTESAN Pray let me go. Why, mother, what do you mean? I beseech you, mother! Is this your conquest now? Great glory 'tis to overcome a poor and silly 75 virgin.
 FOLLYWIT
 The wonder of our time sits in that brow.
 I ne'er beheld a perfect maid till now.
 MOTHER
 Thou childish thing, more bashful than thou'rt wise,
 Why dost thou turn aside and drown thine eyes?
 80 Look, fearful fool, there's no temptation near thee.
 Art not ashamed that any flesh should fear thee?
 Why, I durst pawn my life the gentleman means
 No other but honest and pure love to thee.
 How say you, sir?
 FOLLYWIT By my faith, not I, lady.
 MOTHER
 85 Hark you there, what think you now, forsooth?
 What grieves your honour now?
 Or what lascivious breath intends to rear
 Against that maiden organ, your chaste ear?
 Are you resolved now better of men's hearts,
 Their faiths and their affections? With you none, 90
 Or at most few, whose tongues and minds are one.
 Repent you now of your opinion past.
 Men love as purely as you can be chaste.
 To her yourself, sir: the way's broke before you,
 You have the easier passage.
 FOLLYWIT Fear not, come, 95
 Erect thy happy graces in thy look.
 I am no curious wooer, but in faith
 I love thee honourably.
 COURTESAN How mean you that, sir?
 FOLLYWIT
 'Sfoot, as one loves a woman for a wife.
 MOTHER
 Has the gentleman answered you, trow? 100
 FOLLYWIT
 I do confess it truly to you both,
 My estate is yet but sickly, but I've a grandsire
 Will make me lord of thousands at his death.
 MOTHER
 I know your grandsire well. [Aside] She knows him better.
 FOLLYWIT
 Why then, you know no fiction. My state then 105
 Will be a long day's journey 'bove the waste, wench.
 MOTHER Nay, daughter, he says true.
 FOLLYWIT
 And thou shalt often measure it in thy coach,
 And with the wheels' track make a girdle for't.
 MOTHER Ah, 'twill be a merry journey. 110
 FOLLYWIT
 What, is't a match? If't be, clap hands and lips.
 [He kisses Courtesan]
 MOTHER 'Tis done, there's witness on't.
 FOLLYWIT
 Why then, mother, I salute you.
 [He kisses Mother]
 MOTHER Thanks, sweet son.
 [Taking Follywit aside] Son Follywit, come hither. If I might counsel thee, we'll e'en take her while the good mood's upon her. Send for a priest, and clap't up within 115 this hour.
 FOLLYWIT By my troth, agreed, mother.

 for sex appears in numerous works by Middleton.

 promise, hence Follywit addresses the bawd as 'mother'.

Act 4 Scene 6

A mad World, my Masters.

MOTHER

120 Nor does her wealth consist all in her flesh,
Though beauty be enough wealth for a woman.
She brings a dowry of three hundred pound with her.

FOLLYWIT

'Sfoot, that will serve till my grandsire dies.
I warrant you, he'll drop away at fall o'th' leaf. If ever he reach to All Hollantide, I'll be hanged.

125 MOTHER O yes, son, he's a lusty old gentleman.

FOLLYWIT Ah pox, he's given to women; he keeps a quean at this present.

MOTHER Fie!

FOLLYWIT Do not tell my wife on't.

130 MOTHER That were needless, i'faith.

FOLLYWIT He makes a great feast upon the 'leventh of this month, Tuesday next, and you shall see players there.—

135 [Aside] I have one trick more to put upon him.—My wife and yourself shall go thither before as my guests and prove his entertainment. I'll meet you there at night.

The jest will be here: that feast which he makes will,
unknown to him, serve fitly for our wedding dinner.
We shall be royally furnished, and geld some charges
by't.

140 MOTHER An excellent course, i'faith, and a thrifty. Why, son, methinks you begin to thrive before you're married.

FOLLYWIT [to Courtesan]

We shall thrive one day, wench, and clip enough:
Between our hopes there's but a grandsire's puff.

MOTHER

So, girl, here was a bird well caught.

COURTESAN

If ever, here.

145 But what for's grandsire? 'Twill scarce please him
well.

Thou'st wedded youth and strength, and wealth will fall.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Have a care, bluecoats. Bestir yourself,
Master Gunwater, cast an eye into th' kitchen, o'erlook
the knaves a little. [Exit Gunwater]

Every Jack has his friend today—this cousin and that cousin puts in for a dish of meat—a man knows not till he make a feast how many varlets he feeds.
Acquaintances swarm in every corner, like flies at Bartholomewtide that come up with drovers. 'Sfoot, I think they smell my kitchen seven mile about.

Master Penitent Brothel*]

Master Shortrod and his sweet bedfellow, you're very copiously welcome.

HAREBRAIN [presenting Penitent] Sir, here's an especial dear friend of ours. We were bold to make his way to your table.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Thanks for that boldness ever, good Master
Shortrod. Is this your friend, sir?

HAREBRAIN Both my wife's friend and mine, sir.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Why then compendiously, sir, you're welcome.

PENITENT In octavo I thank you, sir.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Excellently retorted, i'faith, he's welcome for's wit. I have my sorts of salutes and know how to place 'em courtly. Walk in, sweet gentlemen, walk in.
There's a good fire i'th' hall. You shall have my sweet company instantly.

HAREBRAIN Ay, good Sir Bounteous.

[Exeunt the Harebrains and Penitent]

SIR BOUNTEOUS You shall indeed, gentlemen.

Enter Servus [clumsily]

How now, what news brings thee in stumbling now?
SERVUS There are certain players come to town, sir, and desire to interlude before your worship.

SIR BOUNTEOUS Players? By the mass, they are welcome, they'll grace my entertainment well. But for 'certain' players, there thou liest, boy. They were never more uncertain in their lives, now up and now down. They know not when to play, where to play, nor what to play: not when to play for fearful fools, where to play for Puritan fools, nor what to play for critical fools. Go

How fitly the whoresons come upo'th' feast. Troth, I 40 was e'en wishing for 'em.
 [Re-enter Servant with Follywit, Lieutenant, and their comrades disguised as players]
 O welcome, welcome, my friends.
 FOLLYWIT
 The month of May delights not in her flowers
 More than we joy in that sweet sight of yours.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Well acted, o' my credit. I perceive he's 45 your best actor.
 LIEUTENANT He has greatest share, sir, and may live of himself, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS [to Follywit, who is removing his hat] What, what? Put on your hat, sir, pray put on. Go to, wealth 50 must be respected; let those that have least feathers stand bare. And whose men are you, I pray? Nay, keep on your hat still.
 FOLLYWIT We serve my Lord Owemuch, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS My Lord Owemuch, by my troth, the 55 welcomest men alive! Give me all your hands at once.
 That honourable gentleman? He lay at my house in a robbery once and took all quietly, went away cheerfully.
 I made a very good feast for him. I never saw a man of honour bear things bravelier away. Serve my Lord 60 Owemuch? Welcome, i'faith. [To servant] Some bastard for my lord's players! [Exit Servant]
 Where be your boys?
 FOLLYWIT They come along with the wagon, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Good, good. And which is your politician 65 amongst you? Now, i'faith, he that works out restraints, makes best legs at court, and has a suit made of purpose for the company's business, which is he? Come, be not afraid of him.
 FOLLYWIT I am he, sir.
 70 SIR BOUNTEOUS Art thou he? Give me thy hand. Hark in thine ear, thou rollest too fast to gather so much moss as thy fellow there—champ upon that, ah! And what play shall we have, my masters?

FOLLYWIT A pleasant witty comedy, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Ay, ay, ay, a comedy in any case, that I and 75 my guests may laugh a little. What's the name on't?
 FOLLYWIT 'Tis called The Slip.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS The Slip? By my troth, a pretty name and a glib one. Go all and slip into't, as fast as you can. [To 80 Servant] Cover a table for the players. [Exit Servant]
 First take heed of a lurcher: he cuts deep, he will eat up all from you. [Calling off] Some sherry for my lord's players there! Sirrah, why this will be a true feast, a right Mitre supper, a play and all.
 [Exeunt Follywit and his comrades]
 85 More lights!
 Enter Mother and Courtesan
 I called for light—here come in two are light enough for a whole house, i'faith. Dare the thief look me i'th' face? O impudent times! Go to, dissemble it.
 MOTHER Bless you, Sir Bounteous.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS O welcome, welcome, thief, quean, and 90 bawd, welcome all three.
 MOTHER Nay, here's but two on's, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS [indicating Courtesan] O' my troth, I took her for a couple. I'd have sworn there had been two faces 95 there.
 MOTHER Not all under one hood, sir.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS
 Yes, faith, would I, to see mine eyes bear double.
 MOTHER
 I'll make it hold, sir, my daughter is a couple.
 She was married yesterday.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS Buz.
 100 MOTHER
 Nay, to no buzzard neither; a right hawk
 Whene'er you know him.
 SIR BOUNTEOUS
 Away, he cannot be but a rascal.
 Walk in, walk in, bold guests that come unsent for.
 [Exit Mother]

39 fitly promptly
 40 e'en just this moment
 46 has greatest share (a) owns the most shares in the players' stock company
 (b) has taken the greatest share of the booty
 46-7 live of himself support himself
 50-1 let...bare let those with fewer feathers in their hats (representing wealth) stand hatless.
 57 took all quietly (a) bore the misfortune alluding to the proverb 'He carries two faces under one hood.'

 97 bear double see double
 98 make it hold affirm it
 100 Buz interjection of impatience, contempt 101 buzzard a hawk useless for hunting—hence, a worthless person

Act 5 Scene 1

A mad World my mafters.

105 [Aside] Soft, I perceive how my jewels went now
To grace her marriage. [Stopping Courtesan]
COURTESAN Would you with me, sir?
SIR BOUNTEOUS
Ay, how happed it, wench, you put the slip upon me
Not three nights since? I name it gently to you:
I term it neither pilfer, cheat, nor shark.
COURTESAN
You're past my reach.
110 SIR BOUNTEOUS I'm old and past your reach,
Very good, but you will not deny this, I trust.
COURTESAN
With a safe conscience, sir.
SIR BOUNTEOUS Yea? Give me thy hand,
Fare thee well. I have done with her.
COURTESAN
Give me your hand, sir. You ne'er yet begun with me. Exit
SIR BOUNTEOUS
115 Whew, whew! O audacious age!
She denies me and all, when on her fingers
I spied the ruby sit that does betray her
And blushes for her fact. Well, there's a time for't,
For all's too little now for entertainment,
120 Feast, mirth, ay, harmony, and the play to boot,
A jovial season.
Enter Follywit [as a player]
How now, are you ready?
FOLLYWIT Even upon readiness, sir. (Taking [hat] off)
SIR BOUNTEOUS Keep you your hat on.
125 FOLLYWIT I have a suit to your worship.
SIR BOUNTEOUS O cry you mercy, then you must stand bare.
FOLLYWIT We could do all to the life of action, sir, both for the credit of your worship's house and the grace of our comedy.
130 SIR BOUNTEOUS Cuds me, what else sir?
FOLLYWIT And for some defects (as the custom is) we would be bold to require your worship's assistance.
SIR BOUNTEOUS Why, with all my heart. What is't you want? Speak.
135 FOLLYWIT One's a chain for a Justice's hat, sir.
SIR BOUNTEOUS [removing chain and giving it to Follywit]
Why, here, here, here, here, whoreson, will this serve your turn?
FOLLYWIT Excellent well, sir.
140 SIR BOUNTEOUS What else lack you?
FOLLYWIT We should use a ring with a stone in't.
SIR BOUNTEOUS Nay, whoop, I have given too many rings already. Talk no more of rings, I pray you. [Removing a brooch and giving it] Here, here, here, make this jewel serve for once. 145

FOLLYWIT O, this will serve, sir.
SIR BOUNTEOUS What, have you all now?
FOLLYWIT All now, sir—only Time is brought i'th' middle of the play, and I would desire your worship's watch for Time. 150
SIR BOUNTEOUS My watch? With all my heart, only give
Time a charge that he be not fiddling with it.
[Giving watch]
FOLLYWIT You shall ne'er see that, sir.
SIR BOUNTEOUS Well, now you are furnished, sir, make haste away. 155
FOLLYWIT E'en as fast as I can, sir.—I'll set my fellows going first. They must have time and leisure or they're dull else. I'll stay and speak a prologue, yet o'tertake them. I cannot have conscience, i'faith, to go away and speak ne'er a word to 'em. My grandsire has given me three shares here. Sure I'll do somewhat for 'em. Exit 160

Enter Sir Bounteous and all the guests [Harebrain, Wife, Penitent, Courtesan, Mother, and Servants] 5.2
SIR BOUNTEOUS
More lights, more stools, sit, sit, the play begins.
[Servants provide candles and stools. The guests sit]
HAREBRAIN Have you players here, Sir Bounteous?
SIR BOUNTEOUS We have 'em for you, sir, fine nimble comedians, proper actors most of them.
PENITENT Whose men, I pray you, sir? 5
SIR BOUNTEOUS O, there's their credit, sir. They serve an honourable popular gentleman, yclept my Lord Owemuch.
HAREBRAIN My Lord Owemuch? He was in Ireland lately.
SIR BOUNTEOUS O, you ne'er knew any of the name but 10 were great travellers.
HAREBRAIN How is the comedy called, Sir Bounteous?
SIR BOUNTEOUS Marry, sir, The Slip.
HAREBRAIN The Slip?
SIR BOUNTEOUS Ay, and here the Prologue begins to slip in 15
upon's.
HAREBRAIN 'Tis so, indeed, Sir Bounteous.
Enter for a Prologue, Follywit
Prologue
FOLLYWIT
*We sing of wandering knights, what them betide
Who nor in one place nor one shape abide.
They're here now, and anon no scouts can reach 'em,
Being every man well horsed like a bold Beacham.* 20

106 Would...me Do you want something from me?
109 shark swindle
110 past my reach i.e. I don't get it
114 You...me (a sneer at his impotence)
118 fact deed
119 all's too little nothing is too much; we can't get enough

123 Even upon readiness Just about ready 127 do...action act the whole play convincingly
131 And...defects Due to some deficiencies
137-8 serve your turn serve your needs
158 dull inept
161 somewhat something or other
5.2.4 proper handsome

7 yclept named (an affected archaism)
9 Ireland a notorious refuge for English debtors
10 of the name i.e. named Owemuch 21 bold Beacham alluding to the proverb 'as bold as Beauchamp', deriving from the exploits of Thomas Beauchamp, first Earl of Warwick

*The play which we present no fault shall meet
But one: you'll say 'tis short, we'll say 'tis sweet.
'Tis given much to dumbshows, which some praise,
And like the Term delights much in delays.
So to conclude and give the name her due,
The play being called The Slip, I vanish too.* Exit

SIR BOUNTEOUS Excellently well acted and a nimble conceit.
HAREBRAIN The Prologue's pretty, i'faith.

30 PENITENT And went off well.
SIR BOUNTEOUS Ay, that's the grace of all, when they go away well, ah.

COURTESAN [aside] O' my troth, an I were not married, I could find in my heart to fall in love with that player 35 now, and send for him to a supper. I know some i'th' town that have done as much, and there took such a good conceit of their parts into th' twopenny room, that the actors have been found i'th' morning in a less compass than their stage, though 'twere ne'er so full of 40 gentlemen.

SIR BOUNTEOUS But, passion of me, where be these knaves?
Will they not come away? Methinks they stay very long.
PENITENT O, you must bear a little, sir, they have many shifts to run into.

45 SIR BOUNTEOUS 'Shifts' call you 'em? They're horrible long things.
Follywit returns in a fury [with the chain]
FOLLYWIT [aside] A pox of such fortune, the plot's betrayed!
All will come out. Yonder they come taken upon suspicion and brought back by a constable. I was 50 accurst to hold society with such coxcombs. What's to be done? I shall be shamed forever, my wife here and all. Ah, pox—by light, happily thought upon, the chain! Invention, stick to me this once, and fail me ever hereafter. So, so—

55 SIR BOUNTEOUS 'Life, I say, where be these players? O, are you come? Troth, it's time, I was e'en sending for you.
HAREBRAIN
How moodily he walks. What plays he, trow?
SIR BOUNTEOUS
A Justice, upon my credit. I know by the chain there.
FOLLYWIT [improvising as a Justice]
Unfortunate Justice!
SIR BOUNTEOUS Ah, ah, ah—
FOLLYWIT In thy kin unfortunate.

Here comes thy nephew now upon suspicion, Brought by a constable before thee, his vile associates with
him,
But so disguised none knows him but myself.
Twice have I set him free from officers' fangs,
And for his sake his fellows. Let him look to't.
My conscience will permit but one wink more.
[He sits]

SIR BOUNTEOUS Yea, shall we take justice winking?
FOLLYWIT
*For this time,
I have bethought a means to work thy freedom,
Though hazarding myself. Should the law seize him,
Being kin to me, 'twould blemish much my name.
No, I'd rather lean to danger than to shame.
Enter Constable with [neighbours, bringing in Lieutenant, Ensign and others of Follywit's comrades]*

SIR BOUNTEOUS A very explete Justice.
CONSTABLE [to neighbours] Thank you good neighbours, let me alone with 'em now. [Exeunt neighbours]

LIEUTENANT [noticing Follywit] 'Sfoot, who's yonder?
75 ENSIGN Dare he sit there?
THIRD COMRADE Follywit!
FOURTH COMRADE Captain! Puh!
FOLLYWIT [as Justice] How now, Constable, what news with thee?
80 CONSTABLE [to Sir Bounteous] May it please your worship, sir, here are a company of auspicious fellows.
SIR BOUNTEOUS To me? Puh—turn to the Justice, you whoreson hobby-horse. [To guests] This is some new player now. They put all their fools to the constable's 85 part still.
FOLLYWIT What's the matter, Constable, what's the matter?
CONSTABLE [to Follywit] I have nothing to say to your worship. [To Sir Bounteous] They were all riding a-horseback, an't please your worship.
90 SIR BOUNTEOUS Yet again? A pox of all asses still, they could not ride afoot unless 'twere in a bawdy-house.
CONSTABLE The ostler told me they were all unstable fellows, sir.
FOLLYWIT Why, sure, the fellow's drunk.
95 LIEUTENANT [as the Justice's Nephew] We spied that weakness in him long ago, sir. Your worship must bear with him,

24 dumbshows pantomimes forming part of the action of the play (becoming unfashionable by 1605)

25 Term law term

28 nimble conceit witty invention

35 send...supper It was apparently common for prostitutes to invite favourite players to dinner.

37 good...parts thorough understanding of their roles, through a pun on 'private parts'
twopenny room a covered upper room in the theatre, used for entertainment after a performance; this was a disreputable part of the house, frequented by prostitutes

38-9 less...stage a smaller circumference than the stage, even when it is most crowded by spectators. Gallants habitually sat on the stage during a performance; the players, here, wake up in beds even more crowded.

41 passion of me an oath, alluding to Christ's passion

42 stay delay

44 shifts (a) costume changes (b) stratagems (c) linen smocks

48-9 taken upon suspicion arrested

50 hold society keep company

53 Invention Ingenuity

60 nephew the word can mean 'grandson': hence, Follywit's narration is ironically pertinent

72 explete complete; also, serving to compensate for a loss

82 auspicious malapropism for 'suspicious'

84 hobby-horse the person in morris dances who acted the part of the horse; hence, a buffoon

85-6 put...part have the fools of the company play the role of constable

92 ride afoot i.e., mount a whore

93 ostler stable attendant; groom (hence, 'unstable fellows' is a pun)

- the man's much o'erseen. Only in respect of his office we obeyed him, both to appear conformable to law and clear of all offence, for I protest, sir, he found us but a-horseback.
- 100 FOLLYWIT What, he did?
- LIEUTENANT As I have a soul, that's all, and all he can lay to us.
- CONSTABLE I'faith, you were not all riding away then?
- 105 LIEUTENANT 'Sfoot, being a-horseback, sir, that must needs follow.
- FOLLYWIT Why, true, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Well said, Justice. [To guests] He helps his kinsman well.
- 110 FOLLYWIT Why, sirrah, do you use to bring gentlemen before us for riding away? What, will you have 'em stand still when they're up, like Smug upo'th' white horse yonder? Are your wits steeped? I'll make you an example for all dizzy constables, how they abuse justice. [Rising] Here, bind him to this chair.
- 115 CONSTABLE Ha, bind him? Ho!
- FOLLYWIT If you want cords, use garters.
- CONSTABLE Help, help, gentlemen!
- LIEUTENANT [binding Constable to chair] As fast as we can, sir.
- 120 CONSTABLE Thieves, thieves!
- FOLLYWIT A gag will help all this. Keep less noise, you knave.
- CONSTABLE O help, rescue the Constable! O, O!
- [They gag him]
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Ho, ho, ho ho!
- 125 FOLLYWIT Why la, you, who lets you now?
You may ride quietly. I'll see you to Take horse myself. I have nothing else to do.
Exit [with Lieutenant, Ensign, and comrades]
- CONSTABLE [tries to talk through gag] O, O, O!
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Ha, ha, ha! By my troth, the maddest piece of justice that ever was committed.
- 130 HAREBRAIN I'll be sworn for the madness on't, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS I am deceived if this prove not a merry comedy and a witty.
- PENITENT Alas, poor Constable, his mouth's open and ne'er a wise word.
- 135 SIR BOUNTEOUS Faith, he speaks now e'en as many as he has done: he seems wisest when he gapes and says nothing. Ha, ha, he turns and tells his tale to me like an ass. What have I to do with their riding away? They may ride for me, thou whoreson coxcomb, thou. Nay, thou art well enough served, i'faith.
- 140 PENITENT But what follows all this while, sir? Methinks some should pass by before this time and pity the Constable.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS By th' mass, and you say true, sir. [To Servant] Go, sirrah, step in. I think they have forgot themselves. Call the knaves away. They're in a wood, I believe. [Exit Servant]
- 145 CONSTABLE Ay, ay, ay.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Hark, the Constable says, 'Ay, they're in a wood',—ha, ha!
- 150 HAREBRAIN He thinks long of the time, Sir Bounteous.
[Enter Servant]
- SIR BOUNTEOUS How now? When come they?
- SERVANT Alas, an't please your worship, there's not one of them to be found, sir.
- 155 SIR BOUNTEOUS How?
- HAREBRAIN What says the fellow?
- SERVANT Neither horse nor man, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Body of me, thou liest.
- SERVANT Not a hair of either, sir.
- 160 HAREBRAIN How now, Sir Bounteous?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Cheated and defeated! Ungag that rascal! I'll hang him for's fellows. I'll make him bring 'em out.
[Servant ungags Constable]
- CONSTABLE Did not I tell your worship this before, brought 'em before you for suspected persons, stayed 'em at town's end upon warning given, made signs that my very jawbone aches? Your worship would not hear me, called me ass (saving your worship's presence), laughed at me.
- 165 SIR BOUNTEOUS Ha?
- HAREBRAIN I begin to taste it.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Give me leave, give me leave. Why, art not thou the Constable i'th' comedy?
- CONSTABLE I'th' comedy? Why, I am the Constable i'th' commonwealth, sir.
- 170 SIR BOUNTEOUS I am gulled, i'faith, I am gulled. When wast thou chose?
- CONSTABLE On Thursday last, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS A pox go with't, there't goes.
- PENITENT I seldom heard jest match it.
- 175 HAREBRAIN Nor I, i'faith.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Gentlemen, shall I entreat a courtesy?
- HAREBRAIN What is't, sir?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Do not laugh at me seven year hence.
- PENITENT We should betray and laugh at our own folly then, for of my troth none here but was deceived in't.
- 180 SIR BOUNTEOUS Faith, that's some comfort yet. Ha, ha, it was featly carried! Troth, I commend their wits! Before our faces, make us asses while we sit still and only laugh at ourselves.
- PENITENT Faith, they were some counterfeit rogues, sir.
- 185 SIR BOUNTEOUS By th' mass, and you say true, sir. [To Servant] Go, sirrah, step in. I think they have forgot themselves. Call the knaves away. They're in a wood, I believe. [Exit Servant]
- 190 CONSTABLE Ay, ay, ay.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Hark, the Constable says, 'Ay, they're in a wood',—ha, ha!
- HAREBRAIN He thinks long of the time, Sir Bounteous.
[Enter Servant]
- SIR BOUNTEOUS How now? When come they?

- SIR BOUNTEOUS How?

- SIR BOUNTEOUS Ha?
- HAREBRAIN I begin to taste it.

- CONSTABLE On Thursday last, sir.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS A pox go with't, there't goes.

- SIR BOUNTEOUS Why, they confess so much themselves. They said they'd play The Slip. They should be men of their words. I hope the Justice will have more conscience, i'faith, than to carry away a chain of a hundred mark of that fashion.
- 195
- HAREBRAIN What, sir?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Ay, by my troth, sir, besides a jewel, and a jewel's fellow, a good fair watch that hung about my neck, sir.
- 200
- HAREBRAIN 'Sfoot, what did you mean, sir?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Methinks my Lord Owemuch's players should not scorn me so, i'faith. They will come and bring all again, I know. Push! They will, i'faith, but a jest, certainly.
- 205
- Enter Follywit in his own shape, and all the rest*
[Lieutenant, Ensign, and comrades]
- FOLLYWIT [kneels] Pray, grandsire, give me your blessing.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Who? Son Follywit?
- FOLLYWIT [aside] This shows like kneeling after the play, I praying for my Lord Owemuch and his good countess, our honourable lady and mistress.
- 210
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Rise richer by a blessing—thou art welcome.
- FOLLYWIT Thanks, good grandsire.
[He rises and presents comrades]
- I was bold to bring those gentlemen, my friends.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS They're all welcome. Salute you that side, and I'll welcome this side.
- 215
- [He greets Follywit's comrades while Follywit greets Sir Bounteous's guests]
- Sir, to begin with you. [Greeting Lieutenant]
- HAREBRAIN Master Follywit. [Greeting him]
- FOLLYWIT I am glad 'tis our fortune so happily to meet, sir.
- 220
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Nay, then, you know me not, sir.
[Greeting Ensign]
- FOLLYWIT Sweet Mistress Harebrain. [Greeting her]
- SIR BOUNTEOUS You cannot be too bold, sir.
[Greeting another comrade]
- FOLLYWIT [aside to Courtesan] Our marriage known?
- COURTESAN [aside to him] Not a word yet.
- 225
- FOLLYWIT [aside to her] The better.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Faith, son, would you had come sooner with these gentlemen.
- FOLLYWIT Why, grandsire?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS We had a play here.
- FOLLYWIT A play, sir? No.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Yes, faith. A pox o'th' author!
- FOLLYWIT Bless us all! Why, were they such vile ones, sir?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS I am sure, villainous ones, sir.
- FOLLYWIT Some raw simple fools.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Nay, by th' mass, these were enough for thievish knaves.
- 235
- FOLLYWIT What, sir?
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Which way came you, gentlemen? You could not choose but meet 'em.
- FOLLYWIT We met a company with hampers after 'em.
- SIR BOUNTEOUS O, those were they, those were they! A pox hamper 'em!
- FOLLYWIT Bless us all again!
- SIR BOUNTEOUS They have hampered me finely, sirrah.
- FOLLYWIT How, sir?
- 245
- SIR BOUNTEOUS How, sir? I lent the rascals properties to furnish out their play, a chain, a jewel, and a watch, and they watched out their time and rid quite away with them.
- FOLLYWIT Are they such creatures?
- 250
- [The watch rings in Follywit's pocket]
- SIR BOUNTEOUS Hark, hark, gentlemen, by this light, the watch rings alarum in his pocket! There's my watch come again, or the very cousin-german to't.
- [He confronts Follywit and the comrades]
- Whose is't, whose is't? By th' mass, 'tis he. Hast thou one, son? Prithee bestow it upon thy grandsire.
- 255

A YORKSHIRE TRAGEDY

Edited by Stanley Wells

ON 23 April 1605 Walter Calverley, a young man of good family, heir to the manor of Calverley and Pudsey in Yorkshire, murdered two of his three young sons, one aged around eighteen months, the other no more than five years, and wounded their mother, his wife. On the following day, examined before two justices of the peace, he admitted to the crimes, claiming that his wife had 'many times theretofore uttered speeches and given signs and tokens unto him whereby he might easily perceive and conjecture that the said children were not by him begotten, and that he hath found himself to be in danger of his life sundry times by his wife'. At his subsequent trial he refused to plead—probably in order to ensure that the whole of his estate would pass to his heirs; he was pressed to death at York on 5 August of the same year.

These unhappy events caused a national stir, provoking a number of publications of varying degrees of artistry and sophistication. First came an anonymous pamphlet, entered on the Stationers' Register on 12 June 1605, called Two Most Unnatural and Bloody Murders, providing an account of the Calverley murders along with one of a different, unrelated case. Although this is partly journalistic in intent, it is far from a simple report of what happened; indeed Sandra Clark describes the narrative as 'intensely contrived and metaphorical; this is no mere domestic drama to be allotted, as fitting, the low or middle style, but a high tragedy of passion'; Calverley is given 'the motivation of a dramatic villain'. Transmutation of history into drama was already under way.

On 3 June a ballad based on the case had been entered, and on 24 August, after Calverley's execution, an account of The Arraignment, Condemnation, and Execution of Master Calverley at York in August 1605; neither survives. The story was also briefly told in the 1607 edition of John Stow's Summary of English Chronicles.

In addition, two plays were based on the case. The first to appear in print was The Miseries of Enforced Marriage, by George Wilkins, entered on 31 July 1607 and published in the same year 'as it is now played by his majesty's servants'. A Yorkshire Tragedy, entered as having been written by 'William Shakespeare' on 2 May 1608, appeared later that year. The title-page describes it as 'not so new as lamentable and true', claims that it was 'acted by his majesty's players at the Globe', and ascribes it to 'W. Shakespeare'; the headtitle to the text itself reads 'All's One, or one of the four plays in one, called A Yorkshire Tragedy, as it was played by the King's majesty's players'. The expression 'All's One', meaning 'it's of no account', seems entirely inappropriate to so serious a play; it might conceivably be used in an attempt to indicate some kind of overall unity for four plays performed together, but the headtitle unequivocally presents it as an alternative title for this particular play. Some commentators have taken the heading to indicate that A Yorkshire Tragedy was the overall title for a four-part work, but this seems unlikely. The phrase 'not so new' may accurately reflect a date of composition between the publication of the pamphlet and Calverley's execution, since the Wife, in her last speech, declares her intention of suing for his pardon; Holdsworth, however, arguing that A Yorkshire Tragedy echoes King Lear and influenced Timon of Athens, dates the Tragedy to the first two months of 1606.

In part, no doubt, because of the ascription to Shakespeare, A Yorkshire Tragedy has a far more extensive publication history than any of the other accounts of the Calverley case. The publisher of the first edition, Thomas Pavier, also included it in his 1619 collection of Shakespearean and pseudo-Shakespearean quartos, and although Heminges and Condell omitted it from the Shakespeare First Folio of 1623 it was one of the seven apocryphal plays added in the third Folio of 1664, reprinted in 1685. Thereafter it has frequently appeared in collections of the Shakespeare apocrypha, in other anthologies, and independently.

In spite of the evidence of the Stationers' Register both on first publication and in subsequent transfers, and of the title-page of the quarto, ascription of the play to Shakespeare is undermined by its omission from the First Folio and by the bad reputation of Pavier, whose 1619 collection, undertaken in association with William Jaggard, included falsely dated quartos of five Shakespeare plays and fraudulently ascribed 1 Sir John Oldcastle to Shakespeare. Throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries most commentators have been unable to believe that Shakespeare wrote A Yorkshire Tragedy: as Tucker Brooke wrote in 1908, 'Neither in characterization, nor in plot, nor in metrical peculiarities have the most ardent defenders of the Yorkshire Tragedy's authenticity pretended that there is any approach to Shakespeare's manner subsequent to 1605.' Many other candidates have been put forward, especially Thomas Heywood, but detailed studies by David J. Lake, MacDonald P. Jackson, and Roger Holdsworth of the play's linguistic and other features have strengthened the case that Thomas Middleton wrote most or, more probably, all of it.

The opening scene presents a number of anomalous features which have been much discussed; they may be illuminated by a brief consideration of The Miseries of Enforced Marriage, a full-length play of genuine accomplishment, especially considering that Wilkins seems not to have written any other non-collaborative dramas. Though it lacks the emotional intensity and narrative drive of A Yorkshire Tragedy, it offers the most freely inventive treatment of the facts of the case. Wilkins takes the basic situation depicted in the pamphlet—a man, Scarborough (also a Yorkshire place-name) contracted to a girl he loves but then forced into a loveless marriage for financial reasons—as the starting point for a social drama portraying many invented characters, all with fictional names, and often adopting a comic perspective on the action. Initially the husband is sympathetically portrayed, and although his beloved kills herself, events end happily for him as his guardian, dying, acknowledges responsibility for the forced marriage and leaves his wealth to Scarborough and his family. There are no murders.

The author of A Yorkshire Tragedy, by contrast, sticks remarkably closely for all but his opening scene to the pamphlet. From Scene 2 onwards all the characters come from that source, and none of any consequence are added. The pamphlet's sequence of action is followed with only one significant change: the account of the Wife's visit to her uncle and guardian in London, narrated in the pamphlet at a point corresponding to her exit at 2.103, is advanced to form the opening episode of Scene 3, in which we see her immediately on her return, thus achieving greater concentration of action and place; her speeches here pick up words uttered by her uncle in the pamphlet. Through most of the play—the closing scene is the main exception—speeches are closely indebted to the pamphlet's wording. An example is the Wife's self-defence at 3.58–67. In the pamphlet this reads:

My friends are fully possessed your land is mortgaged.
If you think I have published anything to him with desire to keep the sale of my dowry from you, either for mine own good or my children's, though it fits I have a motherly care of them, you being my husband, pass it away how you please, spend it how you will, so I may enjoy but welcome looks and kind words from you.

Middleton draws closely on this, but transforms it into a passage of regular blank verse which nevertheless presents the issues with greater clarity, with more measured pace, and with a dignified pathos with which a performer can do much:

Only my friends
Knew of your mortgaged lands, and were possessed
Of every accident before I came.
If thou suspect it but a plot in me
To keep my dowry, or for mine own good

Or my poor children's—though it suits a mother
To show a natural care in their reliefs—
Yet I'll forget myself to calm your blood.
Consume it as your pleasure counsels you,
And all I wish e'en clemency affords.

Even stage directions take over the pamphlet's wording—'Catches up the youngest' (5.17.1)—'she caught up the youngest'—is one of many possible examples; and a revealing tiny detail is the Wife's interrupted speech 'And—' at 2.76, stimulated by the pamphlet's 'But as she would have gone forward he cut her off...'

In spite of these and other close correspondences, it would be wrong to give the impression that Middleton's dependence on the pamphlet is slavish. So, for example, the episodes in Scene 3 in which gentlemen reprove the Husband are considerably expanded and developed from a few hints in the source, and the Wife's speech at 3.80, indebted to the formal conventions of the dramatic lament, finds words for the 'long-fetched sigh or two' with which Calverley's wife 'eased her heart'. Although the dramatist was working primarily from a clearly defined source, his play may be located too within the conventions of domestic tragedy (such as the anonymous Arden of Faversham) and of 'patient wife' plays.

Thematically the dramatist's main development of his source material lies in the notion that the Husband's actions result from demonic possession. This theme was probably suggested by the talons on the hands and feet of the dark figure of an old man depicted beside the murderer on the title-page of the pamphlet (reproduced in the Companion, 130). It emerges slowly, perhaps because it grew in Middleton's mind as he wrote, but perhaps also because in the earlier scenes he does not wish to detract from the Husband's personal responsibility for his tragedy. In the opening speech of Scene 2 the Wife speaks of her husband as 'half mad | His fortunes cannot answer his expense' and later declares that his transformation from his former self is 'As if some vexèd spirit had got his form upon him'. The Husband himself begins to see his condition as that of one who has sold his soul to the devil shortly before first attacking one of his sons:

Divines and dying men may talk of hell,
But in my heart her several torments dwell,
Slavery and misery. Who in this case
Would not take up money upon his soul,
Pawn his salvation, live at interest?

(The fact that the first couplet of this passage comes from Thomas Nashe's Pierce Penniless may act as a caution against underestimating the literary features of what is too easily regarded as a largely documentary drama.) But the most explicit, and powerful, expression of the idea comes in the Husband's speech of repentance to which he is moved in the final scene by his Wife's forgiveness, when he feels the devil losing possession of his body:

... thou hast devised

A fine way now to kill me, thou hast given mine eyes
Seven wounds apiece, now glides the devil from me,
Departs at every joint, heaves up my nails.
O, catch him new torments that were ne'er invented,
Bind him one thousand more, you blessed angels,
In that pit bottomless, let him not rise
To make men act unnatural tragedies,
To spread into a father and, in fury,
Make him his children's executioners,
Murder his wife, his servants, and who not?
For that man's dark where heaven is quite forgot.

This eloquent speech, with its heightened language, its use of rhyme and half-rhyme, its vivid physical imagery, its self-conscious rhetoric comparable to Faustus's great final speech in Marlowe's play, shows the dramatist writing at the height of his power, and a similar degree of expressiveness informs the Husband's reaction to the sight of his two dead children 'laid forth upon the threshold':

Here's weight enough to make a heartstring crack.
O were it lawful that your pretty souls
Might look from heaven into your father's eyes
Then should you see the penitent glasses melt
And both your murders shoot upon my cheeks.
But you are playing in the angels' laps
And will not look on me
Who, void of grace, killed you in beggary.

And he refers again to the influence of the devil:

O, 'twas the enemy my eyes so bleared.

The Husband's final words retreat from the immediacy of what has gone before to draw a generalized moral:

Let every father look into my deeds,
And then their heirs may prosper while mine bleeds.

But while the bulk of the play, from Scene 2 onwards, reads as if it were written at white heat, the dramatist himself possessed by the challenge of transforming the pamphlet into a play, the opening scene, as has long been recognized, has an entirely different quality. Only here are the characters given names—and although Middleton more than most dramatists was often content to let even major characters be known only by type names, only the special case of A Game at Chess affords a parallel in his output for the complete namelessness of all the characters in this play from the beginning of the second scene. And here too the raw material of the scene, which is only slightly indebted to the pamphlet, is treated with a relaxed expansiveness, a freedom of invention, more akin to the manner of Wilkins's full-length play than to anything in the rest of A Yorkshire Tragedy.

Many attempts have been made to explain the anomalies of this scene, which are such that, as Sturgess reasonably comments, 'It seems doubtful whether one should include scene i in a modern revival' (p. 35); they are summarized in the Introduction to the Revels edition

(pp. 13–15), to whose editors 'it seems safe to infer that Scene i was added later by a different playwright'. But their inference that because the scene lacks the close relationship with the pamphlet of the rest of the play its author did not know the pamphlet, and therefore had not written the rest of the play, is unnecessary: the scene makes clear allusions to the grief of the servants' 'young mistress' 'for the long absence of her love' which is eloquently described in the pamphlet. The Revels editors propose that the scene was added as a result of the decision to print the play independently; it seems no less plausible that it served as an induction, linking the body of the play, in a way that we cannot recover, to the four-part sequence as a whole.

A Yorkshire Tragedy is roughly 700 lines long. If performed with three other plays of equal length it would have made an entertainment substantial but not exceptional in duration by Jacobean standards. Its brevity renders it unsuitable for conventional performance, but is not a complete handicap; indeed the play has a fuller history of production than many Jacobean dramas, including The Miseries of Enforced Marriage. In 1720 Joseph Mitchell (apparently with assistance from Aaron Hill) adapted it into a sentimental one-act tragedy, The Fatal Extravagance, and this play in turn was transformed into a sentimental comedy, The Prodigal, by F. G. Waldron in 1794. A Yorkshire Tragedy was given in Boston, Massachusetts, as part of a triple bill in 1847 as a benefit for the actress (Harriet Bland, sister of Helen Faucit) playing the Wife—rather surprisingly since, although the role gives good acting opportunities, it is so clearly overshadowed by that of the Husband. A Russian translation was performed in 1895 and (apparently) 1904, but no performances in England are recorded until the 1950s. Since then it has received a number of amateur and professional productions, some by out-of-the-way groups in obscure circumstances, but others of a more prestigious nature: in 1987 it even reached the National Theatre, though only for a single performance in its studio auditorium, the Cottesloe; the play probably achieved its largest audiences in two BBC radio productions, in 1955 and 1957.

Though the ascription to Shakespeare no doubt formed part of the motivation for many of these performances, those involved must also have had enough faith in the script's inherent stage-worthiness to put it to theatrical test; at least one group saw modern parallels to the action, adapting it into 'a play on the subject of domestic violence against women in modern Yorkshire' (Revels). The concentration of the play's action gives it great pace, and the unsentimentality of the presentation even of those episodes that afford most opportunity for pathos, such as the sufferings of the Wife and the terror of the little boy on being attacked by his father, is genuinely affecting; but it is above all the role of the Husband, with its fluctuations in style from staccato prose, anguished in its repetitions, to elevated verse, that gives the play its fascination, facing the actor with the challenge of synthesizing the character's conflicting impulses of family pride, love for brother, wife, and children, obsessive extravagance, and self-loathing issuing in horrendous violence. In a letter dated 12 March 1919 T. S. Eliot wrote: 'Damn Swinburne, J. A. Symonds, Dekker, Heywood and domestic tragedy except "Yorkshire Tr".' This is no doubt his tribute to the play's stark unsentimentality compared with other plays in the genre to which it belongs. Its brevity is part of its greatness; nothing dilutes its emotional impact.

Sc. I

Enter Oliver and Ralph, two servingmen

OLIVER Sirrah Ralph, my young mistress is in such a pitiful passionate humour for the long absence of her love!

RALPH Why, can you blame her? Why, apples hanging longer on the tree than when they are ripe makes so many fallings: viz., mad wenches because they are not gathered in time are fain to drop of themselves, and then 'tis common, you know, for every man to take 'em up.

OLIVER Mass, thou sayst true, 'tis common indeed. But sirrah, is neither our young master returned nor our fellow Sam come from London?

RALPH Neither of either, as the Puritan bawd says.—'Slid, I hear Sam, Sam's come, here's—tarry—come, i'faith now my nose itches for news.

Persons Oliver, Ralph, and Sam of Sc. 1 might double with any of the adult parts, but would most logically become the anonymous Servants/Servingmen of the rest of the play. The younger servant Sam may be the 'lusty' Servant of Sc. 5, who is the First Servant in the list of parts. In the edited text of the play, the roles of the Gentlemen and Servants are left unnumbered except when the quarto numbers them ('First Gentleman', etc.). The only other doubling possibilities for the adult males also involve the three servants (doubling as the gentlemen). None of the three parts for boy actors (Wife, Son, Maid) can be doubled.

1.1 Sirrah sir (used from a superior to an inferior)

my young mistress This seems to refer not to the Wife of the play but to the young Yorkshire woman to whom Calverley was previously contracted, and whom he wronged. She is not mentioned after Sc. 1.

2 passionate humour for suffering condition because of

4 makes causes (the singular form because 'apples...ripe' is thought of as the subject)

5 fallings windfalls (first recorded use in this sense)

viz. namely; a colloquial abbreviation of 'videlicet'

5-6 mad...drop perhaps 'wenches who go mad because they have not been made love to when they were ready for it are apt to fall (in virtue)'

9 Mass by the mass (a mild oath)

common (as in 'common woman', a prostitute)

12 Neither of either neither the one nor the other the Puritan bawd obscure; 'Puritan' could imply 'hypocritical'. There may be a lost allusion.

'Slid by God's eyelid; a common oath

13 here's here (he) is tarry (perhaps implying that Oliver was beginning to walk away)

14-15 my nose itches...elbow forerunners of news in common superstition

15 OLIVER And so does mine elbow.
 SAM (calls within) Where are you there?
Enter Sam furnished with things from London
 SAM [calling] Boy, look you walk my horse with discretion, I have rid him simply. I warrant his skin sticks to his back with very heat, if a should catch cold and get the 20 cough of the lungs I were well served, were I not?—
 What, Ralph and Oliver!
 RALPH and OLIVER Honest fellow Sam, welcome, i'faith!
 What tricks hast thou brought from London?
 SAM You see I am hanged after the truest fashion, three 25 hats and two glasses bobbing upon 'em, two rebato wires upon my breast, a cap-case by my side, a brush at my back, an almanac in my pocket, and three ballads in my codpiece—nay, I am the true picture of a common servingman.
 30 OLIVER I'll swear thou art, thou mayst set up when thou wilt. There's many a one begins with less, I can tell thee, that proves a rich man ere he dies. But what's the news from London, Sam?
 RALPH Ay, that's well said, what's the news from London, 35 sirrah? My young mistress keeps such a puling for her love.
 SAM Why, the more fool she, ay, the more ninny-hammer
 she.
 OLIVER Why, Sam, why?
 40 SAM Why, he's married to another long ago.
 RALPH and OLIVER I'faith, ye jest.
 SAM Why, did you not know that till now? Why, he's married, beats his wife, and has two or three children by her; for you must note that any woman bears the 45 more when she is beaten.
 RALPH Ay, that's true, for she bears the blows.
 OLIVER Sirrah Sam, I would not for two years' wages my young mistress knew so much, she'd run upon the left hand of her wit and ne'er be her own woman again.
 50 SAM And I think she was blest in her cradle that he never came in her bed. Why, he has consumed all, pawned his lands, and made his university brother stand in wax for him—there's a fine phrase for a scrivener! Puh, he owes more than his skin's worth.
 OLIVER Is't possible? 55
 SAM Nay, I'll tell you moreover he calls his wife whore as familiarly as one would call Mall and Doll, and his children bastards as naturally as can be. But what have we here? I thought 'twas somewhat pulled down my breeches, I quite forgot my two potting-sticks. These 60 came from London, now anything is good here that comes from London.
 OLIVER Ay, 'Far fetched . . .', you know—
 SAM But speak in your conscience i'faith, have not we as good potting-sticks i'th' country as need to be put i'th' 65 fire? The mind of a thing is all, the mind of a thing's all, and as thou saidst e'en now, 'Far fetched is the best things for ladies.'
 OLIVER Ay, and for waiting gentlewomen, too.
 SAM But Ralph, what, is our beer sour this thunder? 70
 OLIVER No, no, it holds countenance yet.
 SAM Why then, follow me, I'll teach you the finest humour to be drunk in, I learned it at London last week.
 RALPH and OLIVER I'faith, let's hear it, let's hear it.
 SAM The bravest humour, 'twould do a man good to be 75 drunk in't. They call it 'knighting' in London when they drink upon their knees.
 RALPH and OLIVER Faith, that's excellent.
 SAM Come, follow me, I'll give you all the degrees on't in order. Exeunt 80

as the 'young mistress' is waiting for her lover to return from London
 70 this thunder at this time of thunder; there was a belief that thunder turned beer sour 71 holds countenance keeps a calm, or sweet, appearance (punning on 'sour' as 'ill-countenanced')
 75 bravest finest
 76–7 knighting . . . knees referring to the practice of drinking toasts while on one's knees
 79 degrees names of different degrees of drunkenness
 2.1 will away will be lost
 3 Both to consume enough to waste both credit honour, reputation 8 Taking taking to surfeits illnesses resulting from excess

- 10 And this not all, but that which kills me most,
When he recounts his losses and false fortunes,
The weakness of his state so much dejected,
Not as a man repentant but half mad
His fortunes cannot answer his expense.
- 15 He sits and sullenly locks up his arms,
Forgetting heaven, looks downward, which makes
him
Appear so dreadful that he frights my heart,
Walks heavily, as if his soul were earth,
Not penitent for those his sins are past
- 20 But vexed his money cannot make them last—
A fearful melancholy, ungodly sorrow.
O, yonder he comes: now in despite of ill
I'll speak to him, and I will hear him speak,
And do my best to drive it from his heart.
Enter Husband
- HUSBAND
25 Pox o'th' last throw, it made
Five hundred angels vanish from my sight.
I'm damned, I'm damned. The angels have forsook
me,
Nay, 'tis certainly true, for he that has no coin
Is damned in this world, he's gone, he's gone.
- 30 WIFE Dear husband—
HUSBAND
O, most punishment of all, I have a wife.
WIFE
I do entreat you as you love your soul,
Tell me the cause of this your discontent.
- HUSBAND
35 A vengeance strip thee naked, thou art cause, Effect, quality, property, thou, thou, thou. Exit
- WIFE Bad turned to worse!
Both beggary of the soul as of the body,
And so much unlike himself at first
As if some vexèd spirit had got his form upon him.
Enter Husband again
- 40 He comes again.
He says I am the cause—I never yet
Spoke less than words of duty and of love.
- HUSBAND If marriage be honourable then cuckolds are honourable, for they cannot be made without marriage.
- 45 Fool, what meant I to marry, to get beggars? Now must my eldest son be a knave or nothing; he cannot live
- upo' th' soil for he will have no land to maintain him.
That mortgage sits like a snaffle upon mine inheritance and makes me chaw upon iron. My second son must be a promoter, and my third a thief, or an underputter, a 50 slave pander.
O beggary, beggary,
To what base uses dost thou put a man!
I think the devil scorns to be a bawd.
He bears himself more proudly, has more care 55
On's credit.
Base, slavish, abject, filthy poverty!
- WIFE
Good sir, by all our vows I do beseech you,
Show me the true cause of your discontent.
- HUSBAND Money, money, money, and thou must supply 60
me.
WIFE
Alas, I am the least cause of your discontent,
Yet what is mine, either in rings or jewels,
Use to your own desire; but I beseech you,
As you're a gentleman by many bloods,
Though I myself be out of your respect, 65
Think on the state of these three lovely boys
You have been father to.
- HUSBAND Puh, bastards, bastards, bastards, begot in tricks, begot in tricks. 70
WIFE
Heaven knows how those words wrong me! But I may Endure these griefs among a thousand more.
O, call to mind your lands already mortgaged,
Yourself went into debts, your hopeful brother
At the university in bonds for you 75
Like to be seized upon. And—
- HUSBAND Ha' done, thou harlot
Whom though for fashion sake I married
I never could abide! Think'st thou thy words
Shall kill my pleasures? Fall off to thy friends,
Thou and thy bastards beg, I will not bate 80
A whit in humour. Midnight, still I love you
And revel in your company. Curbed in?
Shall it be said in all societies
That I broke custom, that I flagged in money?
No, those thy jewels I will play as freely 85
As when my state was fullest.
- WIFE Be it so.

Scene 2

A Yorkshiere Tragedy.

HUSBAND

Nay I protest (spurns her)—and take that for an earnest—

I will for ever hold thee in contempt
And never touch the sheets that cover thee,
But be divorced in bed till thou consent
Thy dowry shall be sold to give new life
Unto those pleasures which I most affect.

WIFE

Sir, do but turn a gentle eye on me,
And what the law shall give me leave to do
You shall command.

HUSBAND Look it be done. Shall I want dust

And like a slave wear nothing in my pockets
But my hands, to fill them up with nails?
(Holding his hands in his pockets) O, much against my blood! Let it be done.

I was never made to be a looker-on.
A bawd to dice? I'll shake the drabs myself
And make 'em yield. I say, look it be done.

WIFE

I take my leave; it shall.

Exit

HUSBAND Speedily, speedily.

I hate the very hour I chose a wife,
A true trouble.
Three children like three evils hang upon me.
Fie, fie, fie, strumpet and bastards, strumpet and bastards!

Enter three Gentlemen hearing him

FIRST GENTLEMAN

Still do those loathsome thoughts jar on your tongue,
Yourself to stain the honour of your wife,
Nobly descended? Those whom men call mad
Endanger others, but he's more than mad
That wounds himself, whose own words do proclaim Scandals unjust to soil his better name.
It is not fit; I pray forsake it.

SECOND GENTLEMAN

Good sir, let modesty reprove you.

THIRD GENTLEMAN

Let honest kindness sway so much with you.

HUSBAND Good e'en, I thank you, sir—how do you?—

Adieu—I'm glad to see you. Exeunt Gentlemen
Farewell instructions, admonitions!

Enter a Servant

HUSBAND How now, sirrah, what would you?

SERVANT Only to certify you, sir, that my mistress was met by the way by them who were sent for her up to London by her honourable uncle, your worship's late guardian.

HUSBAND

So sir, then she is gone, and so may you be.
But let her look that the thing be done she wots of,
Or hell will stand more pleasant than her house at home.

[Exit Servant]

Enter a Gentleman

GENTLEMAN Well or ill met, I care not.

HUSBAND No, nor I.

GENTLEMAN

I am come with confidence to chide you.

HUSBAND Who, me? Chide me? Do't finely, then. Let it not move me, for if thou chid'st me angry I shall strike.

GENTLEMAN

Strike thine own follies, for it is thy Deserve to be well beaten. We are now in private;
There's none but thou and I. Thou'rt fond and peevish,

An unclean rioter, thy lands and credit
Lie now both sick of a consumption.

I am sorry for thee. That man spends with shame
That with his riches does consume his name:
And such art thou.

HUSBAND Peace.

GENTLEMAN No, thou shalt hear me further.

Thy father's and forefathers' worthy honours,
Which were our country monuments, our grace,
Follies in thee begin now to deface.

The springtime of thy youth did fairly promise

Such a most fruitful summer to thy friends

It scarce can enter into men's beliefs
Such dearth should hang on thee. We that see it

Are sorry to believe it. In thy change

This voice into all places will be hurled:

Thou and the devil has deceived the world.

HUSBAND

I'll not endure thee.

GENTLEMAN

But of all the worst,
Thy virtuous wife right honourably allied

- Thou hast proclaimed a strumpet.
- HUSBAND Nay, then, I know thee. 180
- 155 Thou art her champion, thou, her private friend,
The party you wot on.
- GENTLEMAN O ignoble thought!
I am past my patient blood. Shall I stand idle
And see my reputation touched to death? 185
- HUSBAND 'T'as galled you, this, has it?
- GENTLEMAN No, monster, I will prove 160 My thoughts did only tend to virtuous love.
- HUSBAND Love of her virtues? There it goes.
- GENTLEMAN Base spirit,
To lay thy hate upon the fruitful honour
Of thine own bed.
They fight, and the Husband's hurt
- HUSBAND O!
- GENTLEMAN Wilt thou yield it yet?
- HUSBAND Sir, sir, I have not done with you.
- GENTLEMAN I hope nor ne'er shall do.
Fight again
- 165 HUSBAND Have you got tricks?
Are you in cunning with me?
- GENTLEMAN No, plain and right,
He needs no cunning that for truth doth fight.
Husband falls down
- HUSBAND Hard fortune! Am I levelled with the ground?
- GENTLEMAN Now, sir, you lie at mercy.
- HUSBAND Ay, you slave.
- GENTLEMAN 170 Alas, that hate should bring us to our grave!
You see my sword's not thirsty for your life.
I am sorrier for your wound than you yourself.
You're of a virtuous house, show virtuous deeds!
'Tis not your honour, 'tis your folly bleeds.
- 175 Much good has been expected in your life;
Cancel not all men's hopes. You have a wife
Kind and obedient; heap not wrongful shame
On her and your posterity. Let only sin be sore,
And by this fall, rise never to fall more.
And so I leave you. Exit
- HUSBAND [rising] Has the dog left me then,
After his tooth hath left me? O, my heart
Would fain leap after him. Revenge, I say,
I'm mad to be revenged. My strumpet wife,
It is thy quarrel that rips thus my flesh
And makes my breast spit blood; but thou shalt bleed. 185
Vanquished? Got down? Unable e'en to speak?
Surely 'tis want of money makes men weak.
Ay, 'twas that o'erthrew me, I'd ne'er been down else. Exit
- Enter Wife in a riding-suit, with a Servingman* Sc. 3
- SERVINGMAN Faith, mistress, if it might not be presumption
In me to tell you so, for his excuse
You had small reason, knowing his abuse.
- WIFE I grant I had, but, alas,
Why should our faults at home be spread abroad? 5
'Tis grief enough within doors. At first sight
Mine uncle could run o'er his prodigal life
As perfectly as if his serious eye
Had numbered all his follies;
Knew of his mortgaged lands, his friends in bonds, 10
Himself withered with debts, and in that minute
Had I added his usage and unkindness
'Twould have confounded every thought of good;
Where now, fathering his riots on his youth,
Which time and tame experience will shake off, 15
Guessing his kindness to me—as I smoothed him
With all the skill I had—though his deserts
Are in form uglier than an unshaped bear,
He's ready to prefer him to some office
And place at court, a good and sure relief 20
To all his stooping fortunes. 'Twill be a means I hope
To make new league between us, and redeem
His virtues with his lands.
- SERVINGMAN I should think so, mistress. If he should not now be kind to you and love you, and cherish you up, I 25 should think the devil himself kept open house in him.
- WIFE I doubt not but he will. Now prithee leave me,
I think I hear him coming.
- SERVINGMAN I am gone. Exit
- WIFE By this good means I shall preserve my lands
And free my husband out of usurers' hands. 30

Scene 3

A Yorkshire Tragedy.

Now there is no need of sale, my uncle's kind;
I hope, if aught, this will content his mind.
Here comes my husband.

Enter Husband

HUSBAND Now, are you come? Where's the money, let's 35 see the money, is the rubbish sold, those wise-acres your lands? Why, when, the money, where is't? Pour't down, down with it, down with it, I say pour't o'th' ground, let's see't, let's see't.

WIFE

40 Good sir, keep but in patience and I hope
My words shall like you well. I bring you better Comfort than the sale of my dowry.

HUSBAND Ha, what's that?

WIFE Pray do not fright me, sir, but vouchsafe me hearing.
45 My uncle, glad of your kindness to me and mild usage—for so I made it to him—has in pity of your declining fortunes provided a place for you at court of worth and credit, which so much overjoyed me—

HUSBAND (spurns her) Out on thee, filth—over and over-50 joyed when I'm in torments! Thou politic whore, subtler than nine devils, was this thy journey to nunc, to set down the history of me, of my state and fortunes? Shall I, that dedicated myself to pleasure, be now confined in service to crouch and stand like an old man i'th' hams, 55 my hat off, I that never could abide to uncover my head i'th' church? Base slut, this fruit bears thy complaints.

WIFE O heaven knows

That my complaints were praises and best words
Of you and your estate. Only my friends
60 Knew of your mortgaged lands, and were possessed
Of every accident before I came.
If thou suspect it but a plot in me
To keep my dowry, or for mine own good
Or my poor children's—though it suits a mother
To show a natural care in their reliefs—
65 Yet I'll forget myself to calm your blood.
Consume it as your pleasure counsels you,
And all I wish e'en clemency affords;
Give me but comely looks and modest words.

HUSBAND [drawing his dagger] Money, whore, money, or 70 I'll—

Enters a Servant very hastily

95 dankish moist 4.5–6 dwel . . . circumstance waste time in evading the point
6 effectual to the point
10 default failure in duty
10–11 in bond . . . debt seized in execution of the bond for non-payment of the debt (OED's only instance of 'execute' in this sense); perhaps also 'seized because of a bond put into effect as a result of your debt'
11 amazed thrown into confusion

Thy hasty news!
SERVANT May it please you sir—
HUSBAND What! May I not look upon my dagger? Speak, villain, or I will execute the point on thee. Quick, short. 75 SERVANT Why, sir, a gentleman from the university stays below to speak with you.
HUSBAND From the university? So, university—that long word runs through me. Exeunt [Husband and Servants]
WIFE (alone)
Was ever wife so wretchedly beset? 80
Had not this news stepped in between, the point
Had offered violence to my breast.
That which some women call great misery
Would show but little here, would scarce be seen
Amongst my miseries. I may compare 85
For wretched fortunes with all wives that are.
Nothing will please him until all be nothing.
He calls it slavery to be preferred,
A place of credit a base servitude.
What shall become of me and my poor children,
90 Two here and one at nurse, my pretty beggars?
I see how ruin with a palsy hand
Begins to shake the ancient seat to dust.
The heavy weight of sorrow draws my lids
Over my dankish eyes. I can scarce see. 95
Thus grief will last, it wakes and sleeps with me.
[Exit]

Enter the Husband with the Master of the College Sc. 4

HUSBAND Please you draw near, sir. You're exceeding welcome.
MASTER That's my doubt, I fear I come not to be welcome.
HUSBAND Yes, howsoever.
MASTER 'Tis not my fashion, sir, to dwell in long circum- 5 stance, but to be plain and effectual. Therefore to the purpose. The cause of my setting forth was piteous and lamentable. That hopeful young gentleman your brother, whose virtues we all love dearly, through your default and unnatural negligence lies in bond executed 10 for your debt, a prisoner, all his studies amazed, his hope struck dead, and the pride of his youth muffled in these dark clouds of oppression.
HUSBAND Hmh, um, um.

15 MASTER O, you have killed the towardest hope of all our university, wherefore, without repentance and amends, expect ponderous and sudden judgements to fall grievously upon you. Your brother, a man who profited in his divine employments, might have made ten thousand souls fit for heaven, now by your careless courses cast in prison, which you must answer for, and assure your spirit it will come home at length.

HUSBAND O God! O!

25 MASTER Wise men think ill of you, others speak ill of you, no man loves you, nay, even those whom honesty condemns, condemn you; and—take this from the virtuous affection I bear your brother—never look for prosperous hour, good thought, quiet sleeps, contented walks, nor anything that makes man perfect till you redeem him. What is your answer? How will you bestow him—upon desperate misery, or better hopes? I suffer till I hear your answer.

35 HUSBAND Sir, you have much wrought with me. I feel you in my soul. You are your art's master. I never had sense till now. Your syllables have cleft me. Both for your words and pains I thank you. I cannot but acknowledge grievous wrongs done to my brother, mighty, mighty, mighty wrongs. [Calling] Within there!

Enter a Servingman

SERVINGMAN Sir?

HUSBAND

Fill me a bowl of wine. Exit Servingman for wine

40 Bruised with an execution for my sake!

MASTER

A bruise indeed makes many a mortal sore
Till the grave cure 'em.

Enter Servingman with wine

HUSBAND

Sir, I begin to you. You've chid your welcome.

MASTER

45 I could have wished it better for your sake.
I pledge you, sir: to the kind man in prison.

HUSBAND

Let it be so.

Drink both

Now, sir, if you so please
To spend but a few minutes in a walk
About my grounds below, my man here shall attend you. I doubt not but by that time to be furnished of a sufficient answer, and therein my brother fully satisfied. 50

MASTER

Good sir, in that the angels would be pleased
And the world's murmurs calmed, and I should say
I set forth then upon a lucky day.

Exit [with Servingman]

HUSBAND O thou confused man, thy pleasant sins have undone thee, thy damnation has beggared thee! That heaven should say we must not sin, and yet made women!—gives our senses way to find pleasure which, being found, confounds us. Why should we know those things so much misuse us? O, would virtue had been forbidden! We should then have proved all virtuous, for 'tis our blood to love what we're forbidden. Had not drunkenness been forbidden, what man would have been fool to a beast and zany to a swine, to show tricks in the mire? What is there in three dice to make a man draw thrice three thousand acres into the compass of a round little table, and with the gentleman's palsy in the hand shake out his posterity, thieves or beggars? 'Tis done, I ha' done't i'faith, terrible, horrible misery.—
How well was I left, very well, very well. My lands showed like a full moon about me, but now the moon's i'th'last quarter, waning, waning, and I am mad to think that moon was mine, mine and my father's and my forefathers' generations, generations. Down goes the house of us, down, down, it sinks. Now is the name a beggar; begs in me that name which hundreds of years has made this shire famous—in me, and my posterity runs out. In my seed five are made miserable besides myself. My riot is now my brother's jailor, my wife's sighing, my three boys' penury, and mine own confusion. 75

Tears his hair

Will not this poison scatter them? O, my brother's

Scene 4

A Yorkshiere Tragedy.

85 Stretch him and make him give, and I in want,
Not able for to live nor to redeem him.
Divines and dying men may talk of hell,
But in my heart her several torments dwell,
Slavery and misery. Who in this case
90 Would not take up money upon his soul,
Pawn his salvation, live at interest?
I, that did ever in abundance dwell,
For me to want exceeds the throes of hell.
Enters his little son with a top and a scourge SON What ail you, father, are you not well? I cannot scourge my top as long as you stand so. You take up 95 all the room with your wide legs. Puh, you cannot make me afeard with this. I fear no visors nor bugbears.
Husband takes up the child by the skirts of his long coat in one hand and draws his dagger with th'other
HUSBAND Up, sir, for here thou hast no inheritance left.
SON O, what will you do, father?—I am your white boy.
100 HUSBAND (strikes him) Thou shalt be my red boy. Take that!
SON O, you hurt me, father.
HUSBAND My eldest beggar. Thou shalt not live to ask an usurer bread, to cry at a great man's gate, or follow 105 'good your honour' by a crouch, no, nor your brother.
'Tis charity to brain you.
SON How shall I learn now my head's broke?
HUSBAND (stabs him)
Bleed, bleed, rather than beg, beg. Be not thy name's disgrace.
Spurn thou thy fortunes first if they be base.
Come view thy second brother. Fates, my children's 110 blood
Shall spin into your faces; you shall see
How confidently we scorn beggary. Exit with his son

Sc. 5 *Enter a Maid with a child in her arms, the Wife
by her asleep*

MAID
Sleep, sweet babe. Sorrow makes thy mother sleep.
It bodes small good when heaviness falls so deep.
Hush, pretty boy. Thy hopes might have been better;
'Tis lost at dice what ancient honour won:
5 Hard when the father plays away the son.

Nothing but misery serves in this house,
Ruin and desolation—
Enter Husband with the boy bleeding
O!
HUSBAND Whore, give me that boy.
Strives with her for the child
MAID O help, help, out, alas, murder, murder!
HUSBAND
Are you gossiping, prating sturdy quean? 10
I'll break your clamour with your neck. Downstairs, Tumble, tumble, headlong!
Throws her down
So, the surest way to charm a woman's tongue
Is break her neck; a politician did it.
SON Mother, mother, I am killed, mother! 15
Wife wakes
WIFE Ha, who's that cried? O me, my children! Both, both, both bloody, bloody!
Catches up the youngest
HUSBAND
Strumpet, let go the boy, let go the beggar.
WIFE O my sweet husband!
HUSBAND Filth, harlot! 20
WIFE
O, what will you do, dear husband?
HUSBAND Give me the bastard.
WIFE
Your own sweet boy.
HUSBAND There are too many beggars.
WIFE
Good my husband—
HUSBAND Dost thou prevent me still?
WIFE
O God!
HUSBAND (stabs at the child in her arms)
Have at his heart!
WIFE O my dear boy!
HUSBAND (gets it from her) Brat, thou shalt not live to 25 shame thy house.
WIFE
O heaven!
She's hurt and sinks down
HUSBAND And perish, now be gone.

- There's whores enough, and want would make thee one.
Enter a lusty Servant
- SERVANT
O sir, what deeds are these?
- HUSBAND Base slave, my vassal,
30 Com'st thou between my fury to question me?
SERVANT [holding him back]
Were you the devil I would hold you, sir.
- HUSBAND
Hold me? Presumption! I'll undo thee for't.
SERVANT 'Sblood, you have undone us all, sir.
- HUSBAND
Tug at thy master?
SERVANT Tug at a monster.
- HUSBAND
35 Have I no power, shall my slave fetter me?
SERVANT
Nay, then the devil wrestles, I am thrown.
- HUSBAND
O villain, now I'll tug thee, (overcomes him) now I'll tear thee,
Set quick spurs to my vassal, bruise him, trample him.
So, I think thou wilt not follow me in haste.
40 My horse stands ready saddled, away, away.
Now to my brat at nurse, my sucking beggar.
Fates, I'll not leave you one to trample on.
The Master meets him
- MASTER How is't with you, sir? Methinks you look of a distracted colour.
- 45 HUSBAND Who, I, sir? 'Tis but your fancy.
Please you walk in, sir, and I'll soon resolve you.
I want one small part to make up the sum,
And then my brother shall rest satisfied.
- MASTER
I shall be glad to see it. Sir, I'll attend you.
Exeunt [Husband and Master]
- SERVANT [rising]
50 O, I am scarce able to heave up myself.
He's so bruised me with his devilish weight
And torn my flesh with his blood-hasty spur,
A man before of easy constitution
Till now hell's power supplied, to his soul's wrong.
55 O, how damnation can make weak men strong!
Enter Master and two Servants
- MASTER'S SERVANT
O, the most piteous deed, sir, since you came!
- MASTER
A deadly greeting! Has he summed up these
To satisfy his brother? Here's another,
And by the bleeding infants the dead mother.
- WIFE O, O!
- MASTER
Surgeons, surgeons! She recovers life.
One of his men all faint and bloodied.
- SERVANT
Follow, our murderous master has took horse
To kill his child at nurse. O, follow quickly!
- MASTER
I am the readiest, it shall be my charge
To raise the town upon him.
- SERVANT Good sir, do, follow him.
Exeunt Master and his two Servants
- WIFE O, my children!
- SERVANT
How is it with my most afflicted mistress?
- WIFE
Why do I now recover, why half live
To see my children bleed before mine eyes?—
A sight able to kill a mother's breast
Without an executioner. [To the Servant] What, art thou mangled too?
- SERVANT
I, thinking to prevent what his quick mischiefs
Had so soon acted, came and rushed upon him.
75 We struggled, but a fouler strength than his O'erthrew me with his arms. Then did he bruise me,
And rent my flesh, and robbed me of my hair,
Like a man mad in execution
Made me unfit to rise and follow him.
- 80 WIFE
What is it has beguiled him of all grace
And stole away humanity from his breast,
To slay his children, purposed to kill his wife,
And spoil his servants?
Enters two Servants
- BOTH SERVANTS
Please you leave this most accursèd place.
85 A surgeon waits within.
- WIFE Willing to leave it!
'Tis guilty of sweet blood, innocent blood.
Murder has took this chamber with full hands,
And will ne'er out as long as the house stands.

- WIFE
Tut, far greater wounds did my breast feel,
Unkindness strikes a deeper wound than steel.
You have been still unkind to me.
- HUSBAND Faith, and so I think I have.
- 15 I did my murders roughly, out of hand,
Desperate and sudden, but thou hast devised
A fine way now to kill me, thou hast given mine eyes
Seven wounds apiece. Now glides the devil from me,

the direction of another.
4.1 in a chair A similar direction occurs in the quarto text of Othello, 5.2.288:
'...Cassio [wounded] in a chair.' Some kind of invalid's carrying-chair is implied.

18-19 Seven wounds...nails Samuel exorcists gave a woman 'five blows, in remembrance of the five wounds of Christ, and seven in honour of the seven evil spirits. He also describes how a priest commanded a devil to go 'into the dead'

of a woman's nail.

Revelations 20:2-3: 'And he [the Angel]

the bottomless pit.' John Jowett plausibly suggests (privately) that 'more' may be an error for 'year'.
- Departs at every joint, heaves up my nails.
O, catch him new torments that were ne'er invented,
20 Bind him one thousand more, you blessed angels,
In that pit bottomless, let him not rise
To make men act unnatural tragedies,
To spread into a father and, in fury,
Make him his children's executioners,
25 Murder his wife, his servants, and who not?
For that man's dark where heaven is quite forgot.
- WIFE O my repentant husband!
- HUSBAND
My dear soul, whom I too much have wronged,
For death I die, and for this have I longed.
- 30 WIFE
Thou shouldst not, be assured, for these faults die
If the law could forgive as soon as I.
Children laid out
- HUSBAND What sight is yonder?
- WIFE
O, our two bleeding boys laid forth upon the threshold.
- HUSBAND
Here's weight enough to make a heartstring crack.
35 O were it lawful that your pretty souls
Might look from heaven into your father's eyes
Then should you see the penitent glasses melt
And both your murders shoot upon my cheeks.
But you are playing in the angels' laps
40 And will not look on me
Who, void of grace, killed you in beggary.
O that I might my wishes now attain,
I should then wish you living were again
Though I did beg with you, which thing I feared.
45 O, 'twas the enemy my eyes so bleared.
O, would you could pray heaven me to forgive,
That will unto my end repentant live.
- WIFE
It makes me e'en forget all other sorrows
And have part with this.
- OFFICER Come, will you go? 50
- HUSBAND
I'll kiss the blood I spilt, and then I go.
My soul is bloodied, well may my lips be so.
Farewell, dear wife, now thou and I must part.

38 glasses i.e. eyes
39 both...shoot This elliptical expression seems to mean that tears for the murders of both boys would spring forth on his cheeks.
45 Though even if
46 enemy i.e. the devil
50 have part with participate wholly in

THE LIFE OF TIMON OF ATHENS

Text edited and annotated by John Jowett, introduced by Sharon O'Dair

WITH the inclusion of Timon of Athens in this edition of Thomas Middleton's Collected Works, readers may experience a familiar play differently. No longer need we assume that Timon is unfinished, as Hermann Ulrici suggested in 1815; or that it is inferior Shakespeare, perhaps even a sign of a midlife crisis, as E. K. Chambers suggested in 1930. Instead, we can now experience Timon as we experience The Two Noble Kinsmen or The Changeling—as an artistic and commercial collaboration between two professional playwrights. Of course, to think of Timon as a play partly by Middleton will not solve at once the oft-noted problems about the play's structure or interpretation. But as we become more comfortable in thinking of Timon as adjacent not only to King Lear but also to Michaelmas Term (with its almost womanless, homosocial world) and to A Trick to Catch the Old One (with its ruthless creditors), and as a play whose sources include not only North's translation of Plutarch but also an anonymous pamphlet that Middleton used in writing A Yorkshire Tragedy, it is likely we will at least reconceptualize many of those problems.

The suggestion that the play was written collaboratively is not new. In 1838, the editor Charles Knight concluded that Timon might not be entirely Shakespeare's own work. Following Knight's lead, editors and critics suggested over the course of the nineteenth century a number of candidates for the role of Shakespeare's collaborator, including Chapman, Day, Middleton, Tourneur, and Wilkins. But only Middleton has survived sustained investigation. Studies of Timon by Lake (1975), Jackson (1979), Holdsworth (1982), Taylor (1987), and Hope (1994) examine the play in the context of Jacobean drama and offer 'extensive, independent, and compelling evidence' that Middleton composed about one-third of Timon, including all of scene 2, all of scenes 5 through 10, and probably parts of scenes 4, 13, and 14 as well (Taylor 1987).

Historically, most attempts to settle on another hand in Timon have tried to explain perceived deficiencies in a play assumed to be by Shakespeare—hence the repeated references in the critical and editorial literatures to an 'inferior author' or to parts of the play that do not measure up to 'the Shakespearean yardstick'. In a postmodern critical and theatrical climate, however, in which Shakespeare is not held to be without fault or peer, the search for a collaborator is no longer a search for a scapegoat. With the identification of Middleton as Shakespeare's collaborator, the questions are these: will Middleton's considerable and growing reputation lead to a more positive or favourable assessment of Timon? And if so, can such assessments influence positively what we see on stage, make for a Timon with more stage-worthiness?

Obviously neither question, and especially the latter, can be answered here and now. What we do know is that a focus on the play as exclusively Shakespearean has left critics, directors, and audiences frustrated and unsatisfied. Critics and audiences have long complained about the second half of the play, which is undramatic, a series of static encounters in which the misanthropic Timon rails at a variety of Athenians, thus taking revenge on those he knew when he was the generous and magnificent Timon. As a number of critics have noted, these are encounters that interest audiences intellectually more than emotionally, which is not generally a recipe for success on the stage. And they are encounters, it should be noted in this context, that undoubtedly were written by Shakespeare.

Critics and audiences have complained, too, about the confusing and ambiguous characterization of Alcibiades. Some have wondered why he appears in the play at all, apparently not impressed by H. J. Oliver's now-creaky modernist explanation: like other Shakespearean men of action (including Fortinbras, Octavius, or Aufidius), Alcibiades functions as a foil to the more contemplative Timon, and survives the hero 'partly because he has a clearer view of things and is more efficient, but partly because (it is the thought that recurs most often in Shakespeare) efficiency has been bought at the price of a certain loss of sensitivity'. And in the last quarter century, a chorus of critics and viewers have complained about the play's 'exclusion' of women. For these, Alcibiades' two whores and the Amazons who appear in the Masque of scene 2 are hardly significant, and indicate that what is going on in Athens is fundamentally unsound or distasteful, the extremes of which, as Karen Newman puts it, 'might be alliteratively described as capitalism and castration'.

Even contemporary audiences who have had opportunities to judge the play in performance find the play unsatisfying. Timon has been performed more often in the last 50 years than it was performed in the previous two and a half centuries. What this frequency reveals, however, is not increased popularity or greater receptivity to the play's themes and movements, but the influence of increasingly numerous Shakespeare festivals, with their tendencies not to shirk even one bit of the canon. At least two studies suggest that despite the higher absolute numbers of productions, despite the likelihood of finding Timon in Newfoundland or Utah or Prague, Timon remains one of the three or four plays in the Shakespearean canon that is least likely to be put on the stage (Sanders; Williams). And even when a production is 'of great originality and distinction, . . . and perfectly successful in its own terms' (Berry), such as that directed in 1983 by Robin Phillips in Ontario, Timon troubles the box office. Despite its critical success, audiences stayed away from Phillips's production: the house was 'so shrunken ultimately that seats in the balcony and side aisles were, by the cunning of the computer, made out of bounds, so that the poor devils on the stage might have some sense of a crowd to play to' (Mellamphy). Timon, it seems, always makes the 'box-office "black list" of . . . losers' (Thomson).

This is not to say that over the centuries Timon has not attracted spirited defenders and admirers, both theatrical and literary, such as William Hazlitt and Friedrich Schiller, and even philosophical and political, such as Karl Marx and (if Michael Simmonds is to be believed) John Ruskin. Contemporary directors and critics find much to admire in the play and seem to want the play to succeed theatrically. Even a bit of lobbying goes on: given life in the late twentieth century, the play should succeed theatrically. We should appreciate, if not enjoy, the play because we, too, live in 'times of lessened expectations and bleak horizons' (Ruszkiewicz), and can see 'in Timon a recognizable man, one without spiritual resources in a mean-spirited world, who makes his fiercest commitment of all to despair' (Williams). We should appreciate Timon because ours, too, is 'an opulent civilization in catastrophe' in which misanthropy seems the justified response to 'greed and materialism and self-interest' (Zinman).

Convinced, like the critics, that they know why Timon is 'so much the play for our times' (Zinman), contemporary directors have focused on constructing Timon as social satire. Beginning with Willard Stoker's modern dress production in 1947, in which the second half of the play was set beside a bomb crater, and Tyrone Guthrie's production at the Old Vic in 1952, in which Timon was 'the spoiled Darling of Fortune whom Fortune suddenly spurns' (Guthrie, cited by Williams), directors have sought to make Timon relevant to audiences by emphasizing the play's relationship to putative failures of Western society—its militarism, its materialism, its self-interest and greed. In 1974, Peter Brook staged the play in French at the Théâtre des Bouffes-du-Nord in Paris, an abandoned Victorian theatre, gutted and scarred long ago by fire. In the remains of the red and gilt theatre, Brook's Timon—abstract, austere, and informal, seemingly unconcerned with period consistencies or contemporary relevancies—nevertheless precisely conveyed an image of the doom of consumer society, of the decline of the West.

Brook's vision of the play is perhaps not surprising in a society that had been rocked by the first 'oil crisis'. But the decline of the West is not a theme tied by contemporary directors or critics to a certain date, and certainly not to 1974, with its emerging inflationary spiral. The decline of the West plays well, for seemingly the West is always already in decline, and if not 1974, then a director can find a suitable setting for Timon in the Edwardian era, as Phillips did in 1983, and which Ralph Berry judged 'the ideal frame for the drama of opulence and disintegration'. If not satisfied with the age of property, a director can turn to the roaring 1920s, as Michael Langham did in 1991 at Stratford, Ontario; and, with the help of a splendid score by Duke Ellington originally commissioned for Stratford's 1963 production, he can reveal Timon to be 'the Great Gatsby de leurs jours' (Zinman).

Or, if near-relevance is not enough, a director can set Timon in the present, as Trevor Nunn did for his production at the Young Vic in London, also in 1991. Nunn put onto the stage not only what reviewer Peter Holland calls 'the violent underbelly of . . . Thatcherite consumer capitalism'—including an armed robbery, plain-clothes policemen, tramps, a vacant lot, and six wrecked cars—but also Thatcherite capitalism's more satisfying upper middle-class surface, its accessible amenities, such as computers, cell phones, squash courts, and bottles of Evian water. Nunn materialized this Timon through an impressive accumulation of social detail and a strategic rewriting of the play, rewriting intended 'to clarify what is impossibly obscure, to expand what is impenetrably telescoped and to make dramatic what is inert in the story' (Nunn, cited by Holland).

It is a cliché to say that every age invents its own Shakespeare; but clichés develop because they are to some degree accurate about what they describe. In the eighteenth century, Timon became an object lesson about the consequences of ostentation and liberality, and in the nineteenth, Timon was idealized, conceived most often as a noble victim of a corrupt society (Butler). The late twentieth century has cast the play as social satire, with Timon himself conceived variously: by Phillips and Langham, as a disillusioned millionaire; by Brook, as a disillusioned liberal; by Guthrie, as a disillusioned spoiled fool; by all, as one for whom it is impossible to feel pity or fear.

In the search for contemporary relevance, a relevance that seems so obvious—what could be more socially responsible or satisfying than to denounce contemporary society's greed or brutality?—what tends to be overlooked, as I have argued elsewhere, is the play's historical specificity, its location in a moment of social and economic development. What tends to be overlooked, ironically, are the important lessons Karl Marx drew from Shakespeare and Middleton's presentation of Timon's fall. Consider Timon's paean to gold (14.28–42), that 'immense malediction of malediction', which Marx loved and absorbed 'with a kind of delight whose signs are unmistakable' (Derrida). For Marx, the speech crystallizes the structurally transformative power of gold or money; Marx is less concerned with the ways money affects a person's personality than with the ways money allows a person to affect society. In the Economic and Philosophical Manuscripts (1844), Marx explains this point: 'that which I am unable to do as a man, and of which therefore all my individual essential powers are incapable, I am able to do by means of money'. Money provides anyone who obtains it the power to 'overturn... and confound... all human and natural qualities,' to bring about 'the fraternization of incompatibles'. This power—what Timon describes as the power to make 'Black white, foul fair, wrong right, | Base noble, old young, coward valiant'—would alter profoundly the largely static and traditional societies of medieval Europe.

Such is the social revolutionary force of capital about which Marx and Timon complain: under its influence society can be transformed structurally, everything can be turned 'into its contrary' (Marx, Manuscripts). Money accomplishes a 'transfiguring alchemy', as Jacques Derrida notes, and it does so because it is 'a radical leveller', which 'extinguishes all distinctions' (Marx, Capital). Money will 'Pluck stout men's pillows from below their heads' and give a thief 'title, knee, and approbation', the kind of honour traditionally reserved for 'senators on the bench'. Money can bring blessing to the 'accursed and | Make the hoar leprosy adored'. With enough money, even 'the wappered widow' can find a new husband: 'She whom the spittle house and ulcerous sores | Would cast the gorge at, this embalms and spices | To th' April day again'. Money allows 'social power [to become] the private power of private persons', as Marx argued in Capital, and as such, money disrupts and eventually undermines static and hierarchical social orders. Timon turns misanthropic for good reasons: his friends' failure to rescue him from ruin forces him to confront the deeply transformative, and in his eyes, the deeply evil effects of rationalized economic behaviour.

Marx identifies in Timon an expression of the structural power of capital, but Shakespeare and Middleton achieve this result by focusing attention on a contemporary social problem, what Lawrence Stone calls 'the crisis of the aristocracy'—the nobility's need to adapt behaviourally to the emergence of capitalism, which itself depended on freeing economic decision-making from determination by ethics and morality or the control of religious institutions. One of the many divisive and lengthy battles in this liberation occurred over the legitimization of interest-taking on loans; in 1571, Parliament repealed the Act of 1552, which had reinforced medieval prohibitions on moneylending by outlawing 'the taking of any interest whatever, under pain of imprisonment and fine, in addition to the forfeiture of principal and interest' (Tawney). The compromise Act of 1571 clearly 'was a turning point', according to R. H. Tawney, because it distinguished between usury and interest and legalized the latter. Another of the battles in this liberation focused on sumptuary laws, which regulated according to ascribed social status the kinds of clothes a person could purchase and wear. Like the prohibitions on interest-taking, the legal regulation of dress was repeatedly reinforced by the state during the Elizabethan period, but unsuccessfully; in 1604, the sumptuary laws were eliminated. In both cases, Pandora had already opened the box. As Lisa Jardine points out with respect to the sumptuary laws, 'the affluent burghers with ready money to dress like the gentry were also the purveyors of the commodity being legislated about: expensive fabrics'.

The noble Timon ruins his estate and himself by holding to a set of economic and ethical norms that are not just under pressure but clearly no longer in force. Commensurate with the norm that usury is sinful, for example, Timon believes that a nobleman should give, and give freely, without expectation of immediate, or even of any, return:

Why, I have often wished myself poorer, that I might come nearer to you. We are born to do benefits; and what better or properer can we call our own than the riches of our friends? O, what a precious comfort 'tis to have so many like brothers commanding one another's fortunes! (2.97–102)

As this passage and others make clear, Timon thinks about money differently from us. Money is not a personal matter for him: both giving money and getting it occur through a generalized exchange among a group of men that over time is equitable. In Timon's world, furthermore, money is a means to an end, which itself is vastly more important than money: that of displaying through conspicuous consumption one's status, one's position relative to others. In contrast, as Middleton's scenes in this play show, Timon's 'brothers' or peers have learned, perhaps from hard experience, to behave less like Antonio and Bassanio and more like Shylock, or us: they will not allow others to command their fortunes, but will judge for themselves when to lend money and when not to, 'especially upon bare friendship, | without security' (5.41–2).

Timon's honour and prestige is deeply staked to his gift-giving. Indeed, Timon's 'power depends on his bounty', as David Bevington and David L. Smith observe. His gift-giving is rivalrous, as is the potlatch for the chieftains of the tribes of the American north-west, described by Marcel Mauss in The Gift, or to a lesser degree, the seasonal balls given by the élites of late nineteenth-century America, described by Thorstein Veblen in The Theory of the Leisure Class. What I wish to emphasize here are not the particular similarities or dissimilarities between Timon and the chiefs or the corporate chiefs, but rather Mauss's point that gift exchange is economic as well as social activity. Furthermore, as Veblen implies, market exchange itself is imbued with the behavioural norms of non-market exchange, which is why Veblen addresses the history of the leisure class in order to assess its role in contemporary economic life and why he—and we—can compare the potlatch to the society ball or to Timon's banquets: 'conspicuous consumption of valuable goods is a means of reputability to the gentleman of leisure'.

It has been argued, using Langham's 1991, jazz-era Timon as evidence, that performance of 'a classical play must lead the audience to see itself in the action, or it will cease to be a work of art which impels society towards the creation of new standards, and becomes one which inhibits creation' (Hayes). Perhaps. But Shakespeare and Middleton knew that audiences are not uniform in their tastes or interests: relevance, or leading an audience to 'see itself in the action', must be an expansive and resonant effort. In the past half-century, our efforts with Timon have been narrowly focused on contemporary social satire, which has led not to 'the creation of new standards' but to frustration and disappointment. In productions of Timon, we might see ourselves—and the negative effects of capitalism—more clearly if we understand that Timon is not our contemporary. His failure in the face of capital is not an object lesson for us because, like other literary misanthropes, his experience has 'a determinate otherness, which is to say: not all misanthropes are alike. They have a history, which is a reflex of the history of social forms themselves' (Konstan). Timon's rage, therefore, is not the same as the rage of Menander's Knemon, or even of Molière's Alceste. Still, this kind of historical difference may be crucial and may offer a different way to make Timon 'relevant' to us: as Brook Thomas observes, it is through 'an exchange with texts from the past' that we gain 'a sense of the otherness of our own point of view', an insight that can then lead us to imagine 'alternative ways of world-making'.

Timon 'is a straightforward tract for the times', as E. C. Pettet suggested over fifty years ago: a tract for the early seventeenth century, when capital begins to transform society structurally, moving society's élite from gift-exchange and conspicuous consumption to market-exchange and increasing rates of saving. In Timon, Shakespeare and Middleton urge consideration of a specific historical moment, when the emergence of a capitalist economy begins to transform a society structurally—unsettling the status quo and confusing 'in equivalency the proper and the improper, credit and discredit, faith and lie, the "true and the false", oath, perjury, and abjuration . . .' (Derrida).

Marx would like us to agree that Timon's transformation symbolizes society's transformation under the influence of money and capital. But to do so requires an idealization of Timon's liberality and, more importantly, of the old order of feudalism that guarantees his privilege. In this, Marx's reading is perfectly attuned with other nineteenth-century readings of the play. In contrast, Shakespeare and Middleton do not make this association: however much they lament Timon's fall and however harshly they judge those who decline to help him, the authors do not idealize Timon or the social order that supports his privilege.

Shakespeare and Middleton were well-positioned to describe the structural transformations they dramatize, not just here in Timon but elsewhere as well, as in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice or Middleton's A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, which display the effects on the social order generally, and on the nobility in particular, of an economy newly sprung open, of social mobility by people of 'the middling sort' like the playwrights themselves. Furthermore, Shakespeare and Middleton doubtless were quite aware of the social and economic possibilities of the professional theatre in which they worked and quite interested in promoting them, as Louis Montrose has emphasized. But Shakespeare and Middleton understood, too, that their success in promoting a professional theatre or themselves as, in Taylor's words, 'textual capitalists' ('Lives'), depended on dramatizing not just their own but a variety of points of view: Timon's as well as Shylock's; Orlando's as well as Yellowhammer's; and Petruccio's as well as the Roaring Girl's. Such variety inhibits—or should inhibit—the kinds of moralizing that has surrounded Timon of Athens, especially in the twentieth century. Newman is correct, I believe, to conclude that Timon offers a sexual narrative 'in which the absence of women is simply that, the absence of women'. We would do well to conclude, too, that in Timon the failure of the gift economy is simply that, the failure of the gift economy. It is not the end of a golden age of bounty and magnificence, an economic fall from which we can never recover.

Enter Poet [at one door], Painter [carrying a picture, at another door; followed by] Jeweller, Merchant, and Mercer, at several doors

POET

Good day, sir.

PAINTER I am glad you're well.

POET

I have not seen you long. How goes the world?

PAINTER

It wears, sir, as it grows.

POET

Ay, that's well known.

But what particular rarity, what strange,

Which manifold record not matches?—See,

Magic of bounty, all these spirits thy power

Hath conjured to attend.

[Merchant and Jeweller meet. Mercer passes over the stage, and exits]

I know the merchant.

PAINTER

I know them both. Th' other's a jeweller.

1.0.2-3 followed...doors The play opens with a convergence of clients attending on Timon. They establish two separate conversations (Poet and Painter, Merchant and Jeweller). The Mercer may be an accidental duplication of the Merchant, but can be understood to add to the substance and bustle of the gathering clients ('all these spirits', 1.6, and compare the passage over the stage of the Senators at 1.38.1-1.41.1). The Painter is identifiable because carrying a picture; the Poet might wear a crown of laurel.

3 wears wears away
4 what strange what that is strange
5 record memory, recorded history
6 spirits (a) supernatural beings (b) people
7 conjured to attend Applies to both magical conjuration of spirits and the influence of patronage.

Scene 1

Timon of Athens.

MERCHANT [to Jeweller]		PAINTER [showing the picture]
O, 'tis a worthy lord!		'Tis a good piece.
JEWELLER	Nay, that's most fixed.	POET
MERCHANT		So 'tis. This comes off well and excellent.
10 A most incomparable man, breathed, as it were,		PAINTER
To an untirable and continue goodness.		Indifferent.
He passes.		POET	Admirable. How this grace
JEWELLER [showing a jewel]		Speaks his own standing! What a mental power	30
I have a jewel here.		This eye shoots forth! How big imagination
MERCHANT		Moves in this lip! To th' dumbness of the gesture
O, pray, let's see't. For the Lord Timon, sir?		One might interpret.
JEWELLER		PAINTER
If he will touch the estimate. But for that—		It is a pretty mocking of the life.	35
POET [to himself]		Here is a touch; is't good?
15 'When we for recompense have praised the vile,		POET	I will say of it,
It stains the glory in that happy verse		It tutors nature. Artificial strife
Which aptly sings the good.'		Lives in these touches livelier than life.
MERCHANT [to Jeweller]	'Tis a good form.		Enter certain Senators
JEWELLER		PAINTER	How this lord is followed!
And rich. Here is a water, look ye.		POET	The senators of Athens, happy men!
PAINTER [to Poet]		PAINTER	Look, more.
You are rapt, sir, in some work, some dedication			[The Senators pass over the stage, and exeunt]
To the great lord.		POET
20 POET	A thing slipped idly from me.	You see this confluence, this great flood of visitors.
Our poesy is as a gum which oozes		I have in this rough work shaped out a man
From whence 'tis nourished. The fire i'th' flint		Whom this beneath world doth embrace and hug
Shows not till it be struck; our gentle flame		With amplest entertainment. My free drift	45
Provokes itself, and like the current flies		Halts not particularly, but moves itself
25 Each bound it chafes. What have you there?		In a wide sea of wax. No levelled malice
PAINTER		Infects one comma in the course I hold,
A picture, sir. When comes your book forth?		But flies an eagle flight, bold and forth on,
POET		Leaving no tract behind.	50
Upon the heels of my presentment, sir.		PAINTER	How shall I understand you?
Let's see your piece.

9 fixed certain
 10 breathed accustomed through training
 11 continue continual
 12 passes excels
 14 touch the estimate reach the expected price
 15 we i.e. poets
 16 happy fortunate in its subject
 17 form (a) shape (b) kind, quality
 18 water transparency, lustre
 21-5 Our... chafes Poets, the Poet claims, are not subject to external and spasmodic stimulations such as a patron's favour; their verse flows slowly, spontaneously, at any time.
 22-3 The... struck Varies the proverb 'In the coldest flint there is hot fire'.
 24 Provokes itself i.e. stimulates itself without needing friction
 24-5 like... chafes The image is now of a river whose current bends away from a bank to avoid friction and turbulence.
 24 flies rushes away from 25 bound bank
 27 Upon the heels of immediately after presentment i.e. presentation of the book to Timon

 30 this grace the grace of this figure
 31 his i.e. that of the person represented (presumably Timon)
 32 big greatly
 33 Moves in i.e. is expressed by the apparent movement (or expression) of 35 pretty neatly contrived mocking imitation, counterfeit
 36 touch brushstroke; fine, natural, or lifelike detail
 37 Artificial strife i.e. art's attempt to outdo nature
 39 this lord i.e. Timon
 41.1 Senators The term as applied to members of the Athenian Council is unusual and does not derive from recognized sources. It might anticipate costumes of classical robes, perhaps in contrast with contemporary Jacobean costume for the tradesmen and artisans. In the English context, senators could imply Members of Parliament, but Middleton's civic works often describe the City of London Council as senators. In the play the Senate seems to be an exclusive governing council and its members typically have mercantile or financial connections. The status of Athens as a city state strengthens the analogy with the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London rather than, or as well as, MPs. The roles are distinct from lords except after 11.1.04.1, 'Enter the Senators with other Lords'.

 44 beneath world mortal, changeable world (as distinct from the heavens)
 45 entertainment welcome
 46 particularly in individual cases
 47 of wax growing, becoming more potent (probably also referring to the practice of writing on tablets of wax) levelled aimed at particular people
 48 comma (a) the punctuation mark (b) phrase
 49-50 But... behind Compare Wisdom of Solomon 5:10-11: 'as a bird that flieth through in the air... whereas afterward no token of her way can be found'.
 49 flies i.e. My free drift flies
 50 tract trace; track

POET I will unbolt to you.
 You see how all conditions, how all minds,
 As well of glib and slipp'ry creatures as 55 Of grave and austere quality, tender down
 Their service to Lord Timon. His large fortune,
 Upon his good and gracious nature hanging,
 Subdues and properties to his love and tendance
 All sorts of hearts; yea, from the glass-faced flatterer
 60 To Apemantus, that few things loves better
 Than to abhor himself—even he drops down
 The knee before him, and returns in peace,
 Most rich in Timon's nod.
 PAINTER I saw them speak together.
 POET
 65 Sir, I have upon a high and pleasant hill
 Feigned Fortune to be throned. The base o' th' mount
 Is ranked with all deserts, all kind of natures
 That labour on the bosom of this sphere
 To propagate their states. Amongst them all
 Whose eyes are on this sovereign lady fixed 70 One do I personate of Lord Timon's frame,
 Whom Fortune with her ivory hand wafts to her,
 Whose present grace to present slaves and servants
 Translates his rivals.
 PAINTER 'Tis conceived to scope.
 75 This throne, this Fortune, and this hill, methinks,
 With one man beckoned from the rest below,
 Bowing his head against the steepy mount
 To climb his happiness, would be well expressed
 In our condition.
 POET Nay, sir, but hear me on.
 80 All those which were his fellows but of late,
 Some better than his value, on the moment
 Follow his strides, his lobbies fill with tendance,
 Rain sacrificial whisperings in his ear,
 Make sacred even his stirrup, and through him
 Drink the free air.
 PAINTER Ay, marry, what of these?

POET
 When Fortune in her shift and change of mood
 85 Spurns down her late beloved, all his dependants,
 Which laboured after him to the mountain's top
 Even on their knees and hands, let him fall down,
 Not one accompanying his declining foot.
 PAINTER 'Tis common. 90
 A thousand moral paintings I can show
 That shall demonstrate these quick blows of Fortune's
 More pregnantly than words. Yet you do well
 To show Lord Timon that mean eyes have seen 95 The foot above the head.
Trumpets sound. Enter Lord Timon [wearing a rich jewel], addressing himself courteously to every suitor, [a Messenger from Ventidius with him; Lucilius and other Servants]
 TIMON [to Messenger] Imprisoned is he, say you?
 MESSENGER
 Ay, my good lord. Five talents is his debt,
 His means most short, his creditors most strait.
 Your honourable letter he desires
 To those have shut him up, which failing,
 100 Periods his comfort.
 TIMON Noble Ventidius! Well,
 I am not of that feather to shake off
 My friend when he must need me. I do know him
 A gentleman that well deserves a help,
 Which he shall have. I'll pay the debt and free him. 105
 MESSENGER Your lordship ever binds him.
 TIMON
 Commend me to him. I will send his ransom;
 And, being enfranchised, bid him come to me.
 'Tis not enough to help the feeble up,
 But to support him after. Fare you well. 110
 MESSENGER All happiness to your honour. Exit
Enter an Old Athenian
 OLD MAN
 Lord Timon, hear me speak.

53 conditions (a) social ranks (b) temperaments
 55 quality (a) rank, nobility (b) character
 56 large fortune great good fortune, illustriousness (hinting also at 'ample wealth')
 58 Subdues makes subservient properties appropriates
 59 glass-faced mirror-faced (reflecting his patron's moods and opinions)
 62 returns goes away
 63 Most... nod (a) most gratified in Timon's approval (b) most enriched by Timon's assent
 65 Feigned represented
 66 ranked lined all deserts people of every kind of merit
 67 this sphere (the earth)
 68 propagate increase states possessions, fortunes 69 this sovereign lady i.e. Fortune. The Poet's depiction of Fortune's mount was traditional.

 72 Whose i.e. Fortune's present grace graciousness of the moment to into present slaves immediate slaves 73 Translates transforms to scope to the purpose, aptly
 77 expressed exemplified
 78 our condition the circumstances we find around us
 80 his value him in value (or status)
 83 stirrup (held by followers when the rider mounts his horse)
 83-4 through... air depend on him even for the air they breathe. Air was proverbially free.
 89 declining falling, sinking foot (as the part of the body others follow)
 91 moral allegorical

92 demonstrate (accented on the second syllable) quick vigorous, sharp. Pregnantly in 1.93 gives wordplay on 'with child'.
 93 pregnantly cogently (and see previous note)
 94 mean eyes the eyes of the lowly
 95 The foot... head i.e. the foot of the fortunate of Fortune's hill advanced above the vulnerable aspirant's head
 97 Five talents A considerable sum: a talent could be over 56 lbs of silver.
 98 strait exacting
 100-1 which... comfort if which fails, his hopes end
 102 feather i.e. disposition
 106 ever binds him makes him obliged for ever
 110 But i.e. but also necessary
 111.1 Athenian Another suggestion of specifically ancient Greek costume.

Scene 1

The Life of Tymon of Athens.

TIMON Freely, good father.

OLD MAN
Thou hast a servant named Lucilius.
TIMON I have so. What of him?

115 OLD MAN
Most noble Timon, call the man before thee.

TIMON
Attends he here or no? Lucilius!

LUCILIUS [coming forward] Here at your lordship's service.

OLD MAN
This fellow here, Lord Timon, this thy creature,
By night frequents my house. I am a man
120 That from my first have been inclined to thrift,
And my estate deserves an heir more raised
Than one which holds a trencher.

TIMON Well, what further?

OLD MAN
One only daughter have I, no kin else
On whom I may confer what I have got.
125 The maid is fair, o' th' youngest for a bride,
And I have bred her at my dearest cost
In qualities of the best. This man of thine
Attempts her love. I prithee, noble lord,
Join with me to forbid him her resort.

130 MYSELF have spoke in vain.

TIMON The man is honest.

OLD MAN Therefore he will be, Timon.
His honesty rewards him in itself;
It must not bear my daughter.

135 TIMON Does she love him?

OLD MAN She is young and apt.
Our own precedent passions do instruct us
What levity's in youth.

TIMON [to Lucilius] Love you the maid?

LUCILIUS
Ay, my good lord, and she accepts of it.

OLD MAN
140 If in her marriage my consent be missing,
I call the gods to witness, I will choose
Mine heir from forth the beggars of the world,
And dispossess her all.

TIMON How shall she be endowed
If she be mated with an equal husband?

OLD MAN
145 Three talents on the present; in future, all.

TIMON
This gentleman of mine hath served me long.
To build his fortune I will strain a little,
For 'tis a bond in men. Give him thy daughter.
What you bestow in him I'll counterpoise,
And make him weigh with her.

OLD MAN Most noble lord,
150 Pawn me to this your honour, she is his.

TIMON
My hand to thee; mine honour on my promise.

LUCILIUS
Humbly I thank your lordship. Never may
That state or fortune fall into my keeping
Which is not owed to you. Exit [with Old Man] 155

POET [presenting a poem to Timon]
Vouchsafe my labour, and long live your lordship!

TIMON
I thank you. You shall hear from me anon.
Go not away. [To Painter] What have you there, my friend?

PAINTER
A piece of painting, which I do beseech
Your lordship to accept.

TIMON Painting is welcome. 160
The painting is almost the natural man;
For since dishonour traffics with man's nature,
He is but outside; these pencilled figures are Even such as they give out. I like your work,
And you shall find I like it. Wait attendance 165
Till you hear further from me.

PAINTER The gods preserve ye!

TIMON
Well fare you, gentleman. Give me your hand.
We must needs dine together. [To Jeweller] Sir, your jewel
Hath suffered under praise.

JEWELLER What, my lord, dispraise?

TIMON
A mere satiety of commendations. 170
If I should pay you for't as 'tis extolled
It would unclue me quite.

JEWELLER My lord, 'tis rated
As those which sell would give; but you well know
Things of like value differing in the owners
Are prized by their masters. Believe't, dear lord, 175

112 father respectful form of address to an older man
118 creature dependant (disparaging)
121 more raised of higher breeding
122 one...trencher i.e. a domestic servant. A trencher was a wooden dish or plate.
125 for a bride of marriageable age
127 qualities accomplishments
129 her resort recourse to her
131 honest honourable
132 will be i.e. will be honest. Based on the proverb 'Virtue is its own reward'.
133 His...itself proverbial

134 bear carry away with it
136 apt easily impressed
148 bond obligation
150 with equally with 151 Pawn...honour if you will pawn your honour to this 155 owed to you acknowledged as owing to your generosity (or 'due to you as a debt')
156 Vouchsafe deign to accept
162 traffics has dealings
163 but outside merely outer appearances

pencilled painted with brush-strokes
164 Even...out just what they appear to be 165 find I like it oblique for 'be well paid for it'
169 Hath...praise i.e. cannot hope to match the high praise it has been given. The Jeweller understands under-praise, 'depreciation'.
170 mere utter, absolute
172 unclue undo
172-3 rated | As put at a price that
175 by according to

You mend the jewel by the wearing it.
 TIMON Well mocked.
 MERCHANT
 No, my good lord, he speaks the common tongue
 Which all men speak with him.
Enter Apemantus
 TIMON Look who comes here.
 180 Will you be chid?
 JEWELLER We'll bear, with your lordship.
 MERCHANT He'll spare none.
 TIMON
 Good morrow to thee, gentle Apemantus.
 APEMANTUS
 Till I be gentle, stay thou for thy good morrow—
 185 When thou art Timon's dog, and these knaves honest.
 TIMON
 Why dost thou call them knaves? Thou know'st them not.
 APEMANTUS Are they not Athenians?
 TIMON Yes.
 APEMANTUS Then I repent not.
 190 JEWELLER You know me, Apemantus?
 APEMANTUS
 Thou know'st I do. I called thee by thy name.
 TIMON Thou art proud, Apemantus!
 APEMANTUS Of nothing so much as that I am not like
 Timon.
 195 TIMON Whither art going?
 APEMANTUS To knock out an honest Athenian's brains.
 TIMON That's a deed thou'lt die for.
 APEMANTUS Right, if doing nothing be death by th' law.
 TIMON How lik'st thou this picture, Apemantus?
 200 APEMANTUS The best for the innocence.
 TIMON
 Wrought he not well that painted it?
 APEMANTUS He wrought better that made the painter, and yet he's but a filthy piece of work.
 PAINTER You're a dog.
 205 APEMANTUS Thy mother's of my generation. What's she, if I be a dog?
 TIMON Wilt dine with me, Apemantus?
 APEMANTUS No, I eat not lords.
 TIMON An thou shouldst, thou'dst anger ladies.
 210 APEMANTUS O, they eat lords. So they come by great bellies.

TIMON
 That's a lascivious apprehension.
 APEMANTUS
 So thou apprehend'st it, take it for thy labour.
 TIMON
 How dost thou like this jewel, Apemantus?
 APEMANTUS Not so well as plain dealing, which will not cost a man a doit. 215
 TIMON
 What dost thou think 'tis worth?
 APEMANTUS Not worth my thinking.
 How now, poet?
 POET How now, philosopher?
 APEMANTUS Thou liest.
 POET Art not one? 220
 APEMANTUS Yes.
 POET Then I lie not.
 APEMANTUS Art not a poet?
 POET Yes.
 APEMANTUS Then thou liest. Look in thy last work, where thou hast feigned him a worthy fellow. 225
 POET That's not feigned, he is so.
 APEMANTUS Yes, he is worthy of thee, and to pay thee for thy labour. He that loves to be flattered is worthy o' th' flatterer. Heavens, that I were a lord! 230
 TIMON What wouldst do then, Apemantus?
 APEMANTUS E'en as Apemantus does now: hate a lord with my heart.
 TIMON What, thyself?
 APEMANTUS Ay. 235
 TIMON Wherefore?
 APEMANTUS That I had no angry wit but to be a lord.—
 Art not thou a merchant?
 MERCHANT Ay, Apemantus.
 APEMANTUS
 Traffic confound thee, if the gods will not!
 MERCHANT If traffic do it, the gods do it. 240
 APEMANTUS
 Traffic's thy god, and thy god confound thee!
Trumpet sounds. Enter a Messenger
 TIMON What trumpet's that?
 MESSENGER
 'Tis Alcibiades, and some twenty horse
 All of companionship. 245

176 mend increase the value of 177 mocked counterfeited (as a sales pitch) 181 bear, with suffer, along with wait for a greeting

 191 thy name i.e. knave
 200 for the on account of its innocence (a) artlessness, guilelessness (perhaps because Apemantus sees obvious faults in the person painted that the Painter has failed to conceal), or
 (b) harmlessness (of the painted figure, in contrast with the represented person)

202 He i.e. God
 204 dog A general insult; also an allusion to Apemantus' cynic philosophy, as cynic is derived from the Greek for 'dog'.
 205 generation breed, species (punning on 'age-group')
 208 eat not lords i.e. do not consume the wealth that makes lords
 210 eat Quibbles on sexual 'devouring', hence the great bellies of pregnancy.
 211 apprehension idea
 212 So . . . labour as you took possession of it, keep it as reward for your effort

(punning on apprehend as 'understand')
 214–15 Not . . . doit From the proverbs 'Plain dealing is a jewel, but they that use it die beggars' and 'Not worth a doit'.
 215 doit (a coin of small value)
 223–5 Art . . . liest From the proverb,
 'Painters and poets have leave to lie'.

Scene 1

Timon of Athens.

TIMON [to Servants]
 Pray entertain them. Give them guide to us.
 [Exit one or more Servants]
 [To Jeweller] You must needs dine with me. [To Poet]
 Go not you hence
 Till I have thanked you. [To Painter] When dinner's done
 Show me this piece. [To all] I am joyful of your sights.
 Enter Alcibiades with his horsemen. [They greet
 Timon]
 250 Most welcome, sir!
 APEMANTUS [aside] So, so, there.
 Achës contract and starve your supple joints!
 That there should be small love 'mongst these sweet knaves,
 255 And all this courtesy! The strain of man's bred out
 Into baboon and monkey.
 ALCIBIADES [to Timon]
 Sir, you have saved my longing, and I feed
 Most hungrily on your sight.
 TIMON Right welcome, sir!
 Ere we depart, we'll share a bounteous time
 In different pleasures. Pray you, let us in.
 Enter two Lords
 FIRST LORD
 260 What time o' day is't, Apemantus?
 APEMANTUS
 Time to be honest.
 FIRST LORD That time serves still.
 APEMANTUS
 The most accursèd thou, that still omitt'st it.
 SECOND LORD
 Thou art going to Lord Timon's feast?
 APEMANTUS
 Ay, to see meat fill knaves, and wine heat fools.
 265 SECOND LORD Fare thee well, fare thee well.
 APEMANTUS
 Thou art a fool to bid me farewell twice.
 SECOND LORD Why, Apemantus?

APEMANTUS Shouldst have kept one to thyself, for I mean to give thee none.
 FIRST LORD Hang thyself! 270
 APEMANTUS No, I will do nothing at thy bidding. Make thy requests to thy friend.
 SECOND LORD Away, unpeaceable dog, or I'll spurn thee
 hence.
 APEMANTUS I will fly, like a dog, the heels o' th' ass. [Exit] 275
 FIRST LORD
 He's opposite to humanity. Come, shall we in,
 And taste Lord Timon's bounty? He outgoes
 The very heart of kindness.
 SECOND LORD
 He pours it out. Plutus the god of gold
 Is but his steward; no meed but he repays 280
 Sevenfold above itself; no gift to him
 But breeds the giver a return exceeding
 All use of quittance.
 FIRST LORD The noblest mind he carries
 That ever governed man.
 SECOND LORD
 Long may he live in fortunes! Shall we in? 285
 FIRST LORD I'll keep you company. Exeunt

Sc. 2

Oboes playing loud music. A great banquet served in, [Steward and Servants attending]; and then enter Lord Timon, [Alcibiades], the States, the Athenian Lords, Ventidius which Timon redeemed from prison. Then comes, dropping after all,
 Apemantus, discontentedly, like himself
 VENTIDIUS
 Most honoured Timon,
 It hath pleased the gods to remember
 My father's age, and call him to long peace.
 He is gone happy, and has left me rich.
 5 Then, as in grateful virtue I am bound
 To your free heart, I do return those talents,
 Doubled with thanks and service, from whose help
 I derived liberty.
 TIMON O, by no means,
 Honest Ventidius. You mistake my love.

246 entertain receive, welcome
 248 thanked i.e. rewarded
 249.1-2 Enter... Timon The staging of Alcibiades' arrival and greeting may be informed by Plutarch, who described him as 'a bold and insolent youth whom he [Timon] would greatly feast and make much of, and kissed him very gladly'.
 252 Achës disyllabic form of aches, referring to rheumatism, arthritis, etc.

 breeding

 be with you. Proverbial.

 Lucullus.

 2.0.1 A great banquet i.e. a full banquet, as distinct from a light dessert (as was more usual on stage, and the 'idle banquet' of 2.1.53). A loaded table and chairs need to be brought on stage. The dialogue after 2.2.35 provides a possible occasion for clearing them.

 0.3 States persons of rank, senators
 0.6 like himself in his usual manner

 'bound', 2.5, and 'at liberty', 2.8)

 parable of the talents, Matthew 25:20, etc: 'Master, thou delivered'st unto me five talents; behold, I have gained with them other five talents...'.
 7 service respect, homage

10 I gave it freely ever, and there's none
Can truly say he gives if he receives.
If our betters play at that game, we must not dare
To imitate them. Faults that are rich are fair.

VENTIDIUS
A noble spirit!
[The Lords stand with ceremony]

TIMON
15 Nay, my lords, ceremony was but devised at first
To set a gloss on faint deeds, hollow welcomes,
Recanting goodness, sorry ere 'tis shown;
But where there is true friendship, there needs none.
Pray sit. More welcome are ye to my fortunes
20 Than my fortunes to me.
[They sit]

FIRST LORD
My lord, we always have confessed it.

APEMANTUS
Ho, ho, confessed it? Hanged it, have you not?

TIMON
O, Apemantus! You are welcome.

APEMANTUS No,
You shall not make me welcome.
25 I come to have thee thrust me out of doors.

TIMON
Fie, thou'rt a churl. Ye've got a humour there
Does not become a man; 'tis much to blame.
They say, my lords, Ira furor brevis est,
But yon man is ever angry.
30 Go, let him have a table by himself,
For he does neither affect company
Nor is he fit for't, indeed.

APEMANTUS
Let me stay at thine apperil, Timon.
I come to observe, I give thee warning on't.

35 TIMON I take no heed of thee; thou'rt an Athenian, therefore welcome. I myself would have no power:
prithee, let my meat make thee silent.

APEMANTUS I scorn thy meat. 'Twould choke me, for I should ne'er flatter thee. O you gods, what a number of men eats Timon, and he sees 'em not! It grieves me to see so many dip their meat in one man's blood; and all the madness is, he cheers them up, too.

I wonder men dare trust themselves with men.
Methinks they should invite them without knives:
Good for their meat, and safer for their lives.
45 There's much example for't. The fellow that sits next him, now parts bread with him, pledges the breath of him in a divided draught, is the readiest man to kill him. 'T'as been proved. If I were a huge man, I should fear to drink at meals,
50 Lest they should spy my windpipe's dangerous notes.
Great men should drink with harness on their throats.

TIMON [drinking to a Lord]
My lord, in heart; and let the health go round.

SECOND LORD
Let it flow this way, my good lord.

APEMANTUS 'Flow this way'? A brave fellow; he keeps his tides well. Those healths will make thee and thy state look ill, Timon.
Here's that which is too weak to be a sinner:
Honest water, which ne'er left man i'th' mire.
This and my food are equals; there's no odds.
60 Feasts are too proud to give thanks to the gods.
Apemantus' grace
Immortal gods, I crave no pelf.
I pray for no man but myself.
Grant I may never prove so fond
To trust man on his oath or bond,
65 Or a harlot for her weeping,
Or a dog that seems a-sleeping,
Or a keeper with my freedom,
Or my friends if I should need 'em.
Amen. So fall to't.
70 Rich men sin, and I eat root.
[He eats]
Much good dich thy good heart, Apemantus.

TIMON Captain Alcibiades, your heart's in the field now.

ALCIBIADES My heart is ever at your service, my lord.

10-11 and...receives Echoes Luke 6:34, 'if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank shall ye have?', and Acts 20:35, 'It is a blessed thing to give, rather than to receive'.
13 Faults...fair From the proverb 'Rich men have no faults'.
15 ceremony conventional forms of deference
16 faint spiritless, reluctant, indistinct
21 confessed acknowledged. But Apemantus alludes to the proverb 'Confess and be hanged', in which the sense is 'admit guilt'.
26 churl unmannered peasant humour disposition
28 Ira...est Latin for 'anger is a short madness'; from Horace, Epistles, 1.2.62;

proverbial in English.
33 apperil peril
34 observe watch and make critical comments
41 dip...blood Reminiscent of the Last Supper of Christ: 'He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, he shall betray me' (Matthew 26:23).
42 cheers them up encourages them
44 without knives Guests usually brought their own knives to eat with.
46-52 The...throats Merges Judas Iscariot's betrayal of Christ after the Last Supper (see note to 2.4.1) with the proverb 'To laugh in one's face and cut one's throat'.
47 pledges the breath drinks to the life
48 divided shared, passed from guest to guest

49 huge eminent
51 dangerous vulnerable notes (a) musical sounds (as of a pipe) (b) distinguishing marks
52 harness armour
53 in heart (a toast of fellowship)
55-6 keeps his tides doesn't miss his opportunity. Tides is both 'times, occasions' and the sea's flow.
59 left man i'th' mire proverbial
60 no odds nothing to choose between them
61 proud (a) arrogant (b) lavish
62 pelf plunder
66 Or...weeping From the proverb, 'Trust not a woman when she weeps'.
72 dich do it (?); or perhaps dight, 'dress, array'

75 TIMON You had rather be at a breakfast of enemies than a dinner of friends.
 ALCIBIADES So they were bleeding new, my lord, there's no meat like 'em. I could wish my best friend at such a feast.
 80 APEMANTUS Would all those flatterers were thine enemies then, that then thou mightst kill 'em and bid me to 'em.
 FIRST LORD [to Timon] Might we but have that happiness, my lord, that you would once use our hearts whereby we might express some part of our zeals, we should 85 think ourselves for ever perfect.
 TIMON O, no doubt, my good friends, but the gods themselves have provided that I shall have much help from you. How had you been my friends else? Why have you that charitable title from thousands, did not you chiefly 90 belong to my heart? I have told more of you to myself than you can with modesty speak in your own behalf; and thus far I confirm you. 'O you gods,' think I, 'what need we have any friends if we should ne'er have need of 'em? They were the most needless creatures living, 95 should we ne'er have use for 'em, and would most resemble sweet instruments hung up in cases, that keeps their sounds to themselves.' Why, I have often wished myself poorer, that I might come nearer to you. We are born to do benefits; and what better or properer 100 can we call our own than the riches of our friends?
 O, what a precious comfort 'tis to have so many like brothers commanding one another's fortunes! O, joy's e'en made away ere't can be born: mine eyes cannot hold out water, methinks. To forget their faults, I drink 105 to you.
 APEMANTUS Thou weep'st to make them drink, Timon.
 SECOND LORD [to Timon]
 Joy had the like conception in our eyes,
 And at that instant like a babe sprung up.

APEMANTUS
 Ho, ho, I laugh to think that babe a bastard.
 THIRD LORD [to Timon]
 I promise you, my lord, you moved me much. 110
 APEMANTUS Much!
Sound tucket [within]
 TIMON What means that trumpet?
Enter a Servant
 How now?
 SERVANT Please you, my lord, there are certain ladies most desirous of admittance. 115
 TIMON Ladies? What are their wills?
 SERVANT There comes with them a forerunner, my lord, which bears that office to signify their pleasures.
 TIMON I pray let them be admitted.
Enter one as Cupid
 CUPID
 Hail to thee, worthy Timon, and to all 120
 That of his bounties taste! The five best senses
 Acknowledge thee their patron, and come freely
 To gratulate thy plenteous bosom. Th' ear,
 Taste, touch, smell, all, pleased from thy table rise.
 They only now come but to feast thine eyes. 125
 TIMON
 They're welcome all. Let 'em have kind admittance.
 Music make their welcome! [Exit Cupid]
 FIRST LORD
 You see, my lord, how ample you're beloved.
 [Music.] Enter the masque of Ladies as Amazons [representing the five senses], with lutes in their hands, dancing and playing APEMANTUS Hoy-day!
 What a sweep of vanity comes this way! 130
 They dance? They are madwomen.
 Like madness is the glory of this life

75-6 of enemies . . . of friends i.e. upon enemies . . . with friends
 77 bleeding new freshly killed (proverbial)
 81 to set to, eat
 83 use our hearts make use of our affections
 85 perfect contented
 89 charitable loving 98 nearer (a) more closely tied (b) closer in rank
 98-9 We . . . benefits From the proverb 'We are not born for ourselves'.
 99 benefits favours, good deeds
 101-2 O . . . fortunes Probably influenced by Psalms 133:1: 'Behold how good and joyful a thing it is, brethren, to dwell together in unity'.
 103 made away killed. Joy instantly turns to tears.
 106 Thou . . . Timon Apemantus compresses Timon's words to produce an epigram on sacrifice.
 111.1 tucket flourish of trumpets. This marks the beginning of a masque presented to entertain the guests and compliment the host (but Timon appears to have arranged it himself: see note to 2.148).

 118 that office to signify the office of announcing 121-5 The . . . eyes This 'banquet of the senses' is an antitype of the 'celestial banquet' of Plato's Symposium as expounded by Ficino.
 123 gratulate (a) gratify (b) greet (c) congratulate
 plenteous bounteous
 128.1 Amazons Women in Timon are confined to the roles of Amazons and whores. Though there were no women actors on the professional stage, female courtiers appeared in court masques, so the representation of the lady masquers as Amazons seems to reflect a complex and partly misogynistic public-theatre reaction to women on stage at court. No indication is given in the dialogue that the ladies are dressed as Amazons; they would probably be indicated as such on stage by wearing swords and plumed helmets.

128.2 representing the five senses This is suggested by 2.121-5. The senses might be indicated by motifs of the ear, tongue, finger, nose and eye on the costumes (the effect might be anything from decorous to grotesque). However, in the elaborate Caroline court masque Coelum Britannicum the senses were represented emblematically as follows:
 Sight, a man holding a mirror and a shield showing an eagle staring at the sun; Hearing, a woman playing a lute with a hind near by; Taste, a woman holding a bowl of fruit; Touch, a woman holding a falcon; Smell, a youth standing in a stream of water. Mirror, lute, bowl of fruit, falcon, and bowl of liquid are possible properties on the public stage, though the stage-direction call for 'lutes
in their hands' would make it difficult for the ladies to hold other objects.
 129 Hoy-day (an exclamation of astonishment)
 132 Like madness just such a madness

As this pomp shows to a little oil and root.
 We make ourselves fools to disport ourselves,
 135 And spend our flatteries to drink those men
 Upon whose age we void it up again
 With poisonous spite and envy.
 Who lives that's not depraved or depraves?
 140 Who dies that bears not one spurn to their graves
 Of their friends' gift?
 I should fear those that dance before me now
 Would one day stamp upon me. 'T'as been done.
 Men shut their doors against a setting sun.
The Lords rise from table, with much adoring of Timon; and to show their loves, each single out an Amazon, and all dance, men with women, a lofty strain or two to the oboes; and cease

TIMON
 145 You have done our pleasures much grace, fair ladies,
 Set a fair fashion on our entertainment,
 Which was not half so beautiful and kind.
 You have added worth unto't and lustre,
 And entertained me with mine own device.
 I am to thank you for't.

FIRST LADY
 150 My lord, you take us even at the best.

APEMANTUS Faith; for the worst is filthy, and would not hold taking, I doubt me.

TIMON
 Ladies, there is an idle banquet attends you,
 Please you to dispose yourselves.

155 ALL LADIES Most thankfully, my lord. Exeunt Ladies

TIMON Flavius.
 STEWARD My lord.
 TIMON The little casket bring me hither.
 STEWARD Yes, my lord. [Aside] More jewels yet?
 160 There is no crossing him in's humour,
 Else I should tell him well, i'faith I should.
 When all's spent, he'd be crossed then, an he could.
 'Tis pity bounty had not eyes behind,
 That man might ne'er be wretched for his mind. Exit

165 FIRST LORD Where be our men?
 SERVANT Here, my lord, in readiness.
 SECOND LORD Our horses. [Exit Servant]

[Enter Steward with the casket. He gives it to Timon, and exits]
 TIMON O my friends,
 I have one word to say to you. Look you, my good lord,
 I must entreat you honour me so much 170
 As to advance this jewel. Accept it and wear it,
 Kind my lord.
 FIRST LORD
 I am so far already in your gifts.
 ALL LORDS So are we all.
 [Timon gives them jewels.]
Enter a Servant
 FIRST SERVANT My lord, there are certain nobles of the 175 senate newly alighted and come to visit you.
 TIMON They are fairly welcome. [Exit Servant]
Enter Flavius the Steward
 STEWARD I beseech your honour, vouchsafe me a word; it does concern you near.
 TIMON
 Near? Why then, another time I'll hear thee. 180
 I prithee, let's be provided to show them entertainment.
 STEWARD I scarce know how.
Enter another Servant
 SECOND SERVANT
 May it please your honour, Lord Lucius
 Out of his free love hath presented to you
 Four milk-white horses trapped in silver. 185
 TIMON
 I shall accept them fairly. Let the presents
 Be worthily entertained. [Exit Servant]
Enter a third Servant
 How now, what news?
 THIRD SERVANT Please you, my lord, that honourable gentleman Lord Lucullus entertains your company tomorrow to hunt with him, and has sent your honour two brace 190 of greyhounds.
 TIMON
 I'll hunt with him, and let them be received
 Not without fair reward. [Exit Servant]

 And all out of an empty coffer; 195

 Before I were forced out.

 Than such that do e'en enemies exceed.
 I bleed inwardly for my lord. Exit

TIMON [to the Lords] You do yourselves
 Much wrong, you bate too much of your own merits.
 [To Second Lord] Here, my lord, a trifle of our love.

SECOND LORD
 210 With more than common thanks I will receive it.

THIRD LORD
 O, he's the very soul of bounty!
 TIMON [to First Lord] And now I remember, my lord, you gave good words the other day of a bay courser I rode on. 'Tis yours, because you liked it.

FIRST LORD
 215 O I beseech you pardon me, my lord, in that.

TIMON
 You may take my word, my lord, I know no man
 Can justly praise but what he does affect.
 I weigh my friends' affection with mine own,
 I'll tell you true. I'll call to you.

ALL LORDS O, none so welcome.

TIMON
 220 I take all and your several visitations
 So kind to heart, 'tis not enough to give.
 Methinks I could deal kingdoms to my friends,
 And ne'er be weary. Alcibiades,
 Thou art a soldier, therefore seldom rich.
 [Giving a present] It comes in charity to thee, for all
 225 thy living
 Is 'mongst the dead, and all the lands thou hast
 Lie in a pitched field.

ALCIBIADES Ay, defiled land, my lord.

FIRST LORD We are so virtuously bound—

TIMON And so am I to you.

230 SECOND LORD So infinitely endeared—
 TIMON All to you. Lights, more lights!

FIRST LORD
 The best of happiness, honour, and fortunes
 Keep with you, Lord Timon.
 TIMON Ready for his friends.
Exeunt Lords [and all but Timon and Apemantus]

APEMANTUS What a coil's here, 235
 Serving of becks and jutting-out of bums!
 I doubt whether their legs be worth the sums
 That are given for 'em. Friendship's full of dregs.
 Methinks false hearts should never have sound legs.
 240 Thus honest fools lay out their wealth on curtseys.

TIMON
 Now, Apemantus, if thou wert not sullen
 I would be good to thee.

APEMANTUS No, I'll nothing; for if I should be bribed too, there would be none left to rail upon thee, and then thou wouldst sin the faster. Thou giv'st so long, Timon, 245
 I fear me thou wilt give away thyself in paper shortly.
 What needs these feasts, pomps, and vainglories?

TIMON Nay, an you begin to rail on society once, I am sworn not to give regard to you. Farewell, and come with better music. Exit 250

APEMANTUS So. Thou wilt not hear me now, thou shalt not then. I'll lock thy heaven from thee.
 O, that men's ears should be
 To counsel deaf, but not to flattery! Exit

Enter a Senator [with bonds] Sc. 3

SENATOR
 And late five thousand. To Varro and to Isidore
 He owes nine thousand, besides my former sum,
 Which makes it five-and-twenty. Still in motion
 Of raging waste! It cannot hold, it will not. 5
 If I want gold, steal but a beggar's dog
 And give it Timon, why, the dog coins gold.
 If I would sell my horse and buy twenty more
 Better than he, why, give my horse to Timon—
 Ask nothing, give it him—it foals me straight
 And able horses. No porter at his gate, 10
 But rather one that smiles and still invites
 All that pass by. It cannot hold. No reason
 Can sound his state in safety. Caphis ho!
 Caphis, I say!

 227 pitched field battlefield with armies drawn up in formation to fight. In his reply Alcibiades quibbles by taking pitched as 'covered with pitch', alluding to Ecclesiasticus 13:1, 'He that toucheth pitch shall be defiled with it'.

228 virtuously bound bound by your virtue 231 Lights, more lights Needed to illuminate the Lords' way out of Timon's house.
 235 coil's commotion's
 236 Serving delivering becks nods, bows
 237 legs bows. Similarly at 2.239, but there with a pun on the limbs.
 248 society social occasions 252 heaven salvation, happiness (as might be obtained through heeding advice)
 3.1 late recently
 3-4 Still... waste A metaphor of violent natural destruction—'in a ceaseless rush of furious devastation'—or of a stormy sea (compare 3.12-13). More literally, raging is 'riotous, extravagant'; waste is

 'wasteful expenditure'.
 9 straight (a) at once (qualifying foals me)
 (b) upright (qualifying horses)
 13 sound... safety measure his financial condition reliably and without risk.
Sound is literally 'test the depth of water with a plummet'. Timon's state is both shallow and in flux, creating danger of shipwreck.

Enter Caphis

CAPHIS Here, sir. What is your pleasure?

SENATOR

15 Get on your cloak and haste you to Lord Timon.
 Importune him for my moneys. Be not ceased
 With slight denial, nor then silenced when 'Commend me to your master', and the cap
 Plays in the right hand, thus; but tell him
 20 My uses cry to me, I must serve my turn
 Out of mine own, his days and times are past,
 And my reliances on his fracted dates
 Have smit my credit. I love and honour him,
 But must not break my back to heal his finger.
 25 Immediate are my needs, and my relief
 Must not be tossed and turned to me in words,
 But find supply immediate. Get you gone.
 Put on a most importunate aspect,
 A visage of demand, for I do fear
 30 When every feather sticks in his own wing
 Lord Timon will be left a naked gull,
 Which flashes now a phoenix. Get you gone.

CAPHIS I go, sir.

SENATOR

'I go, sir'? [giving him bonds] Take the bonds along with you,
 And have the dates in. Come.

CAPHIS

I will, sir.

35 SENATOR

Go.

Exeunt [severally]

Sc. 4 Enter Steward, with many bills in his hand

STEWARD

No care, no stop; so senseless of expense
 That he will neither know how to maintain it
 Nor cease his flow of riot, takes no account
 How things go from him, nor resumes no care
 5 Of what is to continue. Never mind
 Was to be so unwise to be so kind.
 What shall be done? He will not hear till feel.
 [A sound of horns within]
 I must be round with him, now he comes from hunting.
 Fie, fie, fie, fie!
Enter Caphis [at one door, and Servants of] Isidore and Varro [at another door]

CAPHIS

10 Good even, Varro. What, you come for money?

VARRO'S SERVANT Is't not your business too?

CAPHIS

It is; and yours too, Isidore?

ISIDORE'S SERVANT

It is so.

CAPHIS

Would we were all discharged.

VARRO'S SERVANT

I fear it.

CAPHIS

Here comes the lord.

*Enter Timon and his train [amongst them
 Alcibiades, as from hunting]*

TIMON

So soon as dinner's done we'll forth again,
 My Alcibiades.

[Caphis meets Timon]

With me? What is your will?

15

CAPHIS

My lord, here is a note of certain dues.

TIMON Dues? Whence are you?

CAPHIS Of Athens here, my lord.

TIMON Go to my steward.

CAPHIS

Please it your lordship, he hath put me off,
 To the succession of new days, this month.
 My master is awaked by great occasion
 To call upon his own, and humbly prays you
 That with your other noble parts you'll suit
 In giving him his right.

20

TIMON

Mine honest friend,

25

I prithee but repair to me next morning.

CAPHIS

Nay, good my lord.

TIMON

Contain thyself, good friend.

VARRO'S SERVANT

One Varro's servant, my good lord.

ISIDORE'S SERVANT [to Timon]

From Isidore. He humbly prays your speedy payment.

CAPHIS [to Timon]

If you did know, my lord, my master's wants—

30

VARRO'S SERVANT [to Timon]

'Twas due on forfeiture, my lord, six weeks and past.

ISIDORE'S SERVANT [to Timon]

Your steward puts me off, my lord, and I Am sent expressly to your lordship.

TIMON

Give me breath.—

I do beseech you, good my lords, keep on.

I'll wait upon you instantly.

[Exeunt Alcibiades and Timon's train]

19 thus i.e. probably with shows of courtesy, but perhaps with gestures of impatience for the visitor to leave so that the cap can be put back on

20 uses needs

21 mine own my own money

22 fracted broken

30-1 When... gull Proverbial, and quibbles on gull as 'credulous fool'.

30 his its

35 have the dates in The bonds perhaps specified a span of time without naming the dates.

4.3 riot wild revelling

4 resumes assumes

5-6 Never... unwise there was never a mind that was so unwise

13 we were all discharged the debts were all settled with us (perhaps also 'we were all relieved of this duty') fear it i.e. suspect otherwise

14 forth again (to hunting)

21 To... days day after day

24 with... suit you'll act in accordance with your other noble qualities

35 [To Steward] Come hither. Pray you,
How goes the world, that I am thus encountered
With clamorous demands of broken bonds
And the detention of long-since-due debts,
Against my honour?
STEWARD [to Servants] Please you, gentlemen,
40 The time is unagreeable to this business;
Your importunacy cease till after dinner,
That I may make his lordship understand
Wherefore you are not paid.
TIMON [to Servants] Do so, my friends.
[To Steward] See them well entertained. [Exit]
STEWARD Pray draw near. Exit

Enter Apemantus and Fool

45 CAPHIS Stay, stay, here comes the Fool with Apemantus.
Let's ha' some sport with 'em.
VARRO'S SERVANT Hang him, he'll abuse us.
ISIDORE'S SERVANT A plague upon him, dog!
VARRO'S SERVANT How dost, Fool?
50 APEMANTUS Dost dialogue with thy shadow?
VARRO'S SERVANT I speak not to thee.
APEMANTUS No, 'tis to thyself. [To Fool] Come away.
ISIDORE'S SERVANT [to Varro's Servant] There's the fool hangs on your back already.
55 APEMANTUS No, thou stand'st single: thou'rt not on him
yet.
CAPHIS [to Isidore's Servant] Where's the fool now?
APEMANTUS He last asked the question. Poor rogues' and usurers' men, bawds between gold and want.
60 ALL SERVANTS What are we, Apemantus?
APEMANTUS Asses.
ALL SERVANTS Why?
APEMANTUS That you ask me what you are, and do not know yourselves. Speak to 'em, Fool.
65 FOOL How do you, gentlemen?
ALL SERVANTS Gramercies, good Fool. How does your mistress?
FOOL She's e'en setting on water to scald such chickens as you are. Would we could see you at Corinth.
70 APEMANTUS Good; gramercy.

Enter Page [with two letters]

FOOL Look you, here comes my master's page.
PAGE Why, how now, captain? What do you in this wise company? How dost thou, Apemantus?
APEMANTUS Would I had a rod in my mouth, that I might answer thee profitably. 75
PAGE Prithee, Apemantus, read me the superscription of these letters. I know not which is which.
APEMANTUS Canst not read?
PAGE No.
APEMANTUS There will little learning die then that day thou art hanged. This is to Lord Timon, this to Alcibiades.
Go, thou wast born a bastard, and thou'lt die a bawd.
PAGE Thou wast whelped a dog, and thou shalt famish a dog's death. Answer not; I am gone. Exit APEMANTUS E'en so thou outrunn'st grace. Fool, I will go with you to Lord Timon's. 80
FOOL Will you leave me there?
APEMANTUS If Timon stay at home. [To Servants] You three serve three usurers?
ALL SERVANTS Ay. Would they served us. 90
APEMANTUS So would I: as good a trick as ever hangman served thief.
FOOL Are you three usurers' men?
ALL SERVANTS Ay, Fool.
FOOL I think no usurer but has a fool to his servant. My mistress is one, and I am her fool. When men come to borrow of your masters they approach sadly and go away merry, but they enter my master's house merrily and go away sadly. The reason of this? 95
VARRO'S SERVANT I could render one.
APEMANTUS Do it then, that we may account thee a whoremaster and a knave, which notwithstanding thou shalt be no less esteemed.
VARRO'S SERVANT What is a whoremaster, Fool?
FOOL A fool in good clothes, and something like thee. 'Tis a spirit; sometime't appears like a lord, sometime like a lawyer, sometime like a philosopher with two stones more than 's artificial one. He is very often like a knight; and generally in all shapes that man goes up and down in from fourscore to thirteen, this spirit walks in. 110
VARRO'S SERVANT Thou art not altogether a fool.

36 How goes the world proverbial
38 detention withholding
53 the fool the name 'fool'
54 hangs on your back attaches to you (with a possible quibble on a posture for anal intercourse picked up in the following exchange)
55 stand'st (quibbling on 'have an erection') 58 He he that 68 scald Refers to (a) scalding chicken to remove the feathers (b) treatment given for venereal disease of sweating in a heated tub.
69 Would... Corinth 'Lais, an harlot of Corinth... was for none but lords and gentlemen that might well pay for it.
Whereof came up a proverb that it was not for every man to go unto Corinth' (Udall, 1542).
74-5 Would... profitably From Proverbs 26:3-4, '... a rod [belongeth] to the fool's back. Answer not a fool according to his foolishness, lest thou also be like him' and Isaiah 11:4, 'the rod of his mouth'.
83-4 famish a dog's death proverbial ('Die a dog's death')
88 If... home Implies that there will be a fool at Timon's house as long as he is
there.
95-6 My mistress is one A procuress could be seen as an usurer in the sexual economy; compare 4.59.
99 go away sadly After a visit to a brothel a man would have spent his money and might have picked up a disease, but according to a well-known post-classical Latin dictum, 'Post coitum omne animal triste' (after coition every animal is sad).
107 philosopher alchemist (see following note) stones testicles. But the artificial one is the 'philosopher's stone' of the alchemists, supposedly capable of turning base metals to gold.
109-10 goes up and down in (a) walks about in (b) gets and loses erections
111 not altogether a fool proverbial

FOOL Nor thou altogether a wise man. As much foolery as I have, so much wit thou lack'st.

APEMANTUS That answer might have become Apemantus.

115 ALL SERVANTS Aside, aside, here comes Lord Timon.
Enter Timon and Steward

APEMANTUS Come with me, Fool, come.

FOOL I do not always follow lover, elder brother, and woman: sometime the philosopher.
 [Exeunt Apemantus and Fool]

STEWARD [to Servants]
 Pray you, walk near. I'll speak with you anon.
Exeunt [Servants]

TIMON
 120 You make me marvel wherefore ere this time
 Had you not fully laid my state before me,
 That I might so have rated my expense
 As I had leave of means.

STEWARD You would not hear me.
 At many leisures I proposed—

TIMON Go to.

125 Perchance some single vantages you took
 When my indisposition put you back,
 And that unaptness made your minister
 Thus to excuse yourself.

STEWARD O my good lord,
 130 At many times I brought in my accounts,
 Laid them before you; you would throw them off
 And say you summed them in mine honesty.
 When for some trifling present you have bid me
 Return so much, I have shook my head and wept,
 135 Yea, 'gainst th' authority of manners prayed you
 To hold your hand more close. I did endure
 Not seldom nor no slight checks when I have Prompted you in the ebb of your estate
 And your great flow of debts. My lovèd lord—
 140 Though you hear now too late, yet now's a time—
 The greatest of your having lacks a half
 To pay your present debts.

TIMON Let all my land be sold.

STEWARD 'Tis all engaged, some forfeited and gone,
 And what remains will hardly stop the mouth
 Of present dues. The future comes apace.
 145 What shall defend the interim, and at length

How goes our reck'ning?
 TIMON
 To Lacedaemon did my land extend.

STEWARD
 O my good lord, the world is but a word.
 Were it all yours to give it in a breath,
 How quickly were it gone.

TIMON You tell me true. 150

STEWARD
 If you suspect my husbandry of falsehood,
 Call me before th' exactest auditors
 And set me on the proof. So the gods bless me,
 When all our offices have been oppressed
 With riotous feeders, when our vaults have wept 155
 With drunken spilth of wine, when every room
 Hath blazed with lights and brayed with minstrelsy,
 I have retired me to a wasteful cock,
 And set mine eyes at flow.

TIMON Prithee, no more.

STEWARD
 'Heavens,' have I said, 'the bounty of this lord!
 160 How many prodigal bits have slaves and peasants
 This night englutted! Who is not Timon's?
 What heart, head, sword, force, means, but is Lord Timon's?
 Great Timon, noble, worthy, royal Timon!
 Ah, when the means are gone that buy this praise, 165
 The breath is gone whereof this praise is made.
 Feast won, fast lost; one cloud of winter show'rs,
 These flies are couched.'

TIMON Come, sermon me no further.
 No villainous bounty yet hath passed my heart.
 Unwisely, not ignobly, have I given. 170
 Why dost thou weep? Canst thou the conscience lack
 To think I shall lack friends? Secure thy heart.
 If I would broach the vessels of my love
 And try the argument of hearts by borrowing,
 Men and men's fortunes could I frankly use 175
 As I can bid thee speak.

STEWARD Assurance bless your thoughts!

TIMON
 And in some sort these wants of mine are crowned
 That I account them blessings, for by these Shall I try friends. You shall perceive how you

117-18 lover... woman (seen as easy sources of employment)
 125 vantages opportunities
 127-8 made... yourself provided you with an agent who would excuse you thus 136 checks rebukes
 137 Prompted you in reminded, urged you of 139 now's a time i.e. better late than never 142 engaged mortgaged
 143 stop the mouth Suggests both feeding and silencing.
 147 Lacedaemon Sparta
 153 So as

154 our offices the servants' work-areas, the kitchens, etc.
 156 oppressed crowded, overwhelmed
 156 spilth spillage
 157 minstrelsy music played by minstrels
 158 cock spout, tap
 159 And... flow The weeping is both caused by the waste of the spilt wine and analogous to it.
 161 prodigal bits excessive bits of food. Prodigal is transferred from the eaters to the food.
 162 Timon's Timon's friend, object at the disposal of Timon as patron

167 fast lost (a) lost when there is a fast instead of a feast (b) quickly lost
 168 are couched lie hidden
 169 villainous (a) vicious (b) slavish (anticipating ignobly, 4.170)
 172 Secure (a) give confidence to (b) close up (referring to the tears as a leak, and anticipating broach the vessels, 4.173)
 174 try test argument summary (as might be printed at the beginning of a book)
 175 frankly as freely
 176 Assurance... thoughts may your thought be blessed by being right

Scene 4

Timon of Athens.

180 Mistake my fortunes. I am wealthy in my friends.—
 Within there, Flaminius, Servilius!
Enter three servants: [Flaminius, Servilius, and a Third Servant]
 ALL SERVANTS
 My lord, my lord.
 TIMON I will dispatch you severally,
 [To Servilius] You to Lord Lucius, [To Flaminius] to Lord
 Lucullus you—I hunted with his honour today—[To 185 Third Servant] You to Sempronius. Commend me to their loves, and I am proud, say, that my occasions have found time to use 'em toward a supply of money. Let the request be fifty talents.
 FLAMINIUS As you have said, my lord. [Exeunt Servants]
 STEWARD
 190 Lord Lucius and Lucullus? Hmh!
 TIMON Go you, sir, to the senators,
 Of whom, even to the state's best health, I have Deserved this hearing. Bid 'em send o' th' instant
 A thousand talents to me.
 STEWARD I have been bold,
 195 For that I knew it the most general way
 To them, to use your signet and your name;
 But they do shake their heads, and I am here
 No richer in return.
 TIMON Is't true? Can 't be?
 STEWARD
 They answer in a joint and corporate voice
 200 That now they are at fall, want treasure, cannot Do what they would, are sorry, you are honourable,
 But yet they could have wished—they know not—
 Something hath been amiss—a noble nature
 May catch a wrench—would all were well—'tis pity;
 205 And so, intending other serious matters,
 After distasteful looks and these hard fractions,
 With certain half-caps and cold-moving nods
 They froze me into silence.
 TIMON You gods reward them!
 Prithee, man, look cheerly. These old fellows 210 Have their ingratitude in them hereditary.
 Their blood is caked, 'tis cold, it seldom flows.
 'Tis lack of kindly warmth they are not kind;
 And nature as it grows again toward earth
 Is fashioned for the journey dull and heavy.
 215 Go to Ventidius. Prithee, be not sad.
 Thou art true and honest—ingenuously I speak—
 No blame belongs to thee. Ventidius lately
 Buried his father, by whose death he's stepped Into a great estate. When he was poor,
 Imprisoned, and in scarcity of friends,
 220 I cleared him with five talents. Greet him from me.
 Bid him suppose some good necessity
 Touches his friend, which craves to be remembered
 With those five talents. That had, give't these fellows
 To whom 'tis instant due. Ne'er speak or think 225 That Timon's fortunes 'mong his friends can sink.
 STEWARD
 I would I could not think it. That thought is bounty's foe:
 Being free itself, it thinks all others so.
Exeunt [severally]
 [Enter Flaminius [with a box under his cloak], waiting to speak with a lord [Lucullus]. From his master, enters a Servant to him LUCULLUS' SERVANT I have told my lord of you. He is coming down to you.
 FLAMINIUS I thank you, sir.
Enter Lucullus
 LUCULLUS' SERVANT Here's my lord.
 LUCULLUS [aside] One of Lord Timon's men? A gift, I
 5 warrant. Why, this hits right; I dreamt of a silver basin and ewer tonight.—Flaminius, honest Flaminius, you are very respectively welcome, sir. [To his Servant] Fill me some wine. [Exit Servant]
 And how does that honourable, complete, free-hearted 10 gentleman of Athens, thy very bountiful good lord and
 master?
 FLAMINIUS His health is well, sir.
 LUCULLUS I am right glad that his health is well, sir. And what hast thou there under thy cloak, pretty Flaminius?
 15 FLAMINIUS Faith, nothing but an empty box, sir, which in my lord's behalf I come to entreat your honour to supply, who, having great and instant occasion to use fifty talents, hath sent to your lordship to furnish him, nothing doubting your present assistance therein.
 20 LUCULLUS La, la, la, la, 'nothing doubting' says he? Alas, good lord! A noble gentleman 'tis, if he would not keep so good a house. Many a time and often I ha' dined with him and told him on't, and come again to supper to him of purpose to have him spend less; and yet he 25 would embrace no counsel, take no warning by my coming. Every man has his fault, and honesty is his. I ha' told him on't, but I could ne'er get him from't.
Enter Servant, with wine
 SERVANT Please your lordship, here is the wine.

30 LUCULLUS Flaminius, I have noted thee always wise.
 [Drinking] Here's to thee!

FLAMINIUS Your lordship speaks your pleasure.

LUCULLUS I have observed thee always for a towardly prompt spirit, give thee thy due, and one that knows 35 what belongs to reason; and canst use the time well if the time use thee well. [Drinking] Good parts in thee!
 [To his Servant] Get you gone, sirrah. [Exit Servant]
 Draw nearer, honest Flaminius. Thy lord's a bountiful gentleman; but thou art wise, and thou know'st well 40 enough, although thou com'st to me, that this is no time to lend money, especially upon bare friendship without security. [Giving coins] Here's three solidares for thee. Good boy, wink at me, and say thou saw'st me not. Fare thee well.

FLAMINIUS

45 Is't possible the world should so much differ,
 And we alive that lived?

[He throws the coins at Lucullus]

Fly, damnèd baseness,

To him that worships thee.

LUCULLUS Ha! Now I see thou art a fool, and fit for thy master. Exit

FLAMINIUS

50 May these add to the number that may scald thee.

Let molten coin be thy damnation,

Thou disease of a friend, and not himself.

Has friendship such a faint and milky heart

It turns in less than two nights? O you gods,

55 I feel my master's passion! This slave

Unto this hour has my lord's meat in him.

Why should it thrive and turn to nutriment,

When he is turned to poison?

O, may diseases only work upon't;

And when he's sick to death, let not that part of 60 nature

Which my lord paid for be of any power

To expel sickness, but prolong his hour. Exit

Sc. 6 Enter Lucius, with three Strangers

LUCIUS Who, the Lord Timon? He is my very good friend, and an honourable gentleman.

FIRST STRANGER We know him for no less, though we are but strangers to him. But I can tell you one thing, my 5 lord, and which I hear from common rumours: now Lord Timon's happy hours are done and past, and his estate shrinks from him.

LUCIUS Fie, no, do not believe it. He cannot want for money.

SECOND STRANGER But believe you this, my lord, that not 10 long ago one of his men was with the Lord Lucullus to borrow so many talents—nay, urged extremely for't, and showed what necessity belonged to't, and yet was denied.

LUCIUS How?

SECOND STRANGER I tell you, denied, my lord.

LUCIUS What a strange case was that! Now before the gods, I am ashamed on't. Denied that honourable man?
 There was very little honour showed in't. For my own part, I must needs confess I have received some small 20 kindnesses from him, as money, plate, jewels, and suchlike trifles—nothing comparing to his; yet had he not mistook him and sent to me, I should ne'er have denied his occasion so many talents.

Enter Servilius

SERVILIUS [aside] See, by good hap yonder's my lord. I have 25 sweat to see his honour. [To Lucius] My honoured lord!

LUCIUS Servilius! You are kindly met, sir. Fare thee well.
 Commend me to thy honourable, virtuous lord, my very exquisite friend.

SERVILIUS May it please your honour, my lord hath sent—30 LUCIUS Ha! What has he sent? I am so much endeared to that lord, he's ever sending. How shall I thank him, think'st thou? And what has he sent now?

SERVILIUS He's only sent his present occasion now, my lord, requesting your lordship to supply his instant use 35 with so many talents.

LUCIUS

I know his lordship is but merry with me.

He cannot want fifty-five hundred talents.

SERVILIUS

But in the mean time he wants less, my lord.

If his occasion were not virtuous

I should not urge it half so faithfully. 40

LUCIUS

Dost thou speak seriously, Servilius?

SERVILIUS Upon my soul, 'tis true, sir.

LUCIUS What a wicked beast was I to disfigure myself against such a good time when I might ha' shown myself honourable! How unluckily it happened that I should purchase the day before a little part, and undo a great deal of honour! Servilius, now before the gods
 I am not able to do, the more beast I, I say. I was sending to use Lord Timon myself—these gentlemen 50

38 fifty-five . . . talents The sum is absurdly excessive, perhaps both because Middleton misunderstood the value of a talent and because the inflation from fifty (5.19) to fifty-five hundred is grotesquely comic.

47 part consignment can witness—but I would not for the wealth of Athens I had done't now. Commend me bountifully to his good lordship; and I hope his honour will conceive the fairest of me because I have no power to be kind.

55 And tell him this from me: I count it one of my greatest afflictions, say, that I cannot pleasure such an honourable gentleman. Good Servilius, will you befriend me so far as to use mine own words to him?

SERVILIUS Yes, sir, I shall.

LUCIUS
60 I'll look you out a good turn, Servilius. Exit Servilius
True as you said: Timon is shrunk indeed;
And he that's once denied will hardly speed. Exit

FIRST STRANGER
Do you observe this, Hostilius?

SECOND STRANGER Ay, too well.

FIRST STRANGER
Why, this is the world's soul, and just of the same piece
65 Is every flatterer's spirit. Who can call him his friend
That dips in the same dish? For, in my knowing,
Timon has been this lord's father
And kept his credit with his purse,
Supported his estate; nay, Timon's money
70 Has paid his men their wages. He ne'er drinks,
But Timon's silver treads upon his lip;
And yet—O see the monstrousness of man
When he looks out in an ungrateful shape!—
He does deny him, in respect of his,
75 What charitable men afford to beggars.

THIRD STRANGER
Religion groans at it.

FIRST STRANGER For mine own part,
I never tasted Timon in my life,
Nor came any of his bounties over me
To mark me for his friend; yet I protest, 80 For his right noble mind, illustrious virtue,
And honourable carriage,
Had his necessity made use of me
I would have put my wealth into donation
And the best half should have returned to him,

So much I love his heart. But I perceive
Men must learn now with pity to dispense,
For policy sits above conscience. Exeunt

85

Enter a Third Servant [from Timon], with Sempronius, another of Timon's friends

Sc. 7

SEMPRONIUS
Must he needs trouble me in't? Hmh! 'Bove all others?
He might have tried Lord Lucius or Lucullus;
And now Ventidius is wealthy too,
Whom he redeemed from prison. All these Owes their estates unto him.

SERVANT My lord,
5 They have all been touched and found base metal,
For they have all denied him.

SEMPRONIUS How, have they denied him?
Has Ventidius and Lucullus denied him,
And does he send to me? Three? Hmh!
It shows but little love or judgement in him.
10 Must I be his last refuge? His friends, like physicians, Thrive, give him over; must I take th' cure upon me?
He's much disgraced me in't. I'm angry at him,
That might have known my place. I see no sense for't
But his occasions might have wooed me first,
15 For, in my conscience, I was the first man
That e'er received gift from him.
And does he think so backwardly of me now
That I'll requite it last? No.
So it may prove an argument of laughter
20 To th' rest, and I 'mongst lords be thought a fool.
I'd rather than the worth of thrice the sum
He'd sent to me first, but for my mind's sake.
I'd such a courage to do him good. But now return,
And with their faint reply this answer join:
25 Who bates mine honour shall not know my coin. Exit

SERVANT Excellent. Your lordship's a goodly villain. The devil knew not what he did when he made man politic—he crossed himself by't, and I cannot think but in the end the villainies of man will set him clear. How 30 fairly this lord strives to appear foul! Takes virtuous

53-4 conceive... me think of me in the best light
60 I'll... turn Based on the proverb 'One good turn deserves another'.
62 hardly speed prosper only with difficulty
64 piece cloth
66 That... dish Recalls Matthew 26:23, 'He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me' (Christ referring to Judas).
68 kept his credit kept him in credit
72-3 O... shape Based on the proverb 'Ingratitude is monstrous'.
73 looks out shows himself
74 in respect of his relative to his own possessions

77 tasted Timon i.e. had experience of Timon's bounty. The substance of Timon is his wealth, but tasted connects with the imagery of human sacrifice.
78 over down on
81 carriage conduct
83 donation giveable form, i.e. cash
87 policy cynical calculation
7,6 touched tested for purity
11-12 like... over Proverbially, 'Physicians enriched give over their patients'.
12 Thrive (on his money) give him over abandon him, give up on him

14 That who
20 argument of subject matter for 23 but... sake if only on account of my inclination (i.e. my good will to him)
24 courage desire
26 bates abates, undervalues
29 crossed himself (a) thwarted himself (b) crossed himself off the list of debtors (hence set him clear, 7.30) (c) subscribed to Christian symbolism
31-2 Takes... wicked he copies virtuous behaviour as a pretext to be wicked. Takes... copies is literally 'copies out examples of edifying writing'.

copies to be wicked, like those that under hot ardent zeal would set whole realms on fire; of such a nature is his politic love.
 35 This was my lord's best hope. Now all are fled
 Save only the gods. Now his friends are dead.
 Doors that were ne'er acquainted with their wards
 Many a bounteous year must be employed
 Now to guard sure their master;
 40 And this is all a liberal course allows:
 Who cannot keep his wealth must keep his house.
 Exit

Sc. 8 Enter Varro's two Servants, meeting others', all [Servants of] Timon's creditors, to wait for his coming out. Then enter [Servants of] Lucius, [Titus], and Hortensius

VARRO'S [FIRST] SERVANT
 Well met; good morrow, Titus and Hortensius.
 TITUS' SERVANT The like to you, kind Varro.
 HORTENSIUS' SERVANT
 Lucius, what, do we meet together?
 LUCIUS' SERVANT
 Ay, and I think one business does command us all,
 For mine is money.
 5 TITUS' SERVANT So is theirs and ours.
 Enter [a Servant of] Philotus
 LUCIUS' SERVANT And Sir Philotus too!
 PHILOTUS' SERVANT Good day at once.
 LUCIUS' SERVANT Welcome, good brother.
 What do you think the hour?
 PHILOTUS' SERVANT Labouring for nine.
 LUCIUS' SERVANT
 So much?
 PHILOTUS' SERVANT
 Is not my lord seen yet?
 10 LUCIUS' SERVANT Not yet.
 PHILOTUS' SERVANT
 I wonder on't; he was wont to shine at seven.
 LUCIUS' SERVANT
 Ay, but the days are waxed shorter with him.
 You must consider that a prodigal course
 Is like the sun's,
 15 But not, like his, recoverable. I fear
 'Tis deepest winter in Lord Timon's purse; that is,
 One may reach deep enough, and yet find little.
 PHILOTUS' SERVANT I am of your fear for that.
 TITUS' SERVANT
 I'll show you how t'observe a strange event.

Your lord sends now for money?
 HORTENSIUS' SERVANT Most true, he does. 20
 TITUS' SERVANT
 And he wears jewels now of Timon's gift,
 For which I wait for money.
 HORTENSIUS' SERVANT It is against my heart.
 LUCIUS' SERVANT Mark how strange it shows.
 Timon in this should pay more than he owes,
 25 And e'en as if your lord should wear rich jewels
 And send for money for 'em.
 HORTENSIUS' SERVANT
 I'm weary of this charge, the gods can witness.
 I know my lord hath spent of Timon's wealth,
 And now ingratitude makes it worse than stealth. 30
 VARRO'S FIRST SERVANT
 Yes; mine's three thousand crowns. What's yours?
 LUCIUS' SERVANT Five thousand, mine.
 VARRO'S FIRST SERVANT
 'Tis much deep, and it should seem by th' sum
 Your master's confidence was above mine,
 Else surely his had equalled.
 Enter Flaminius
 TITUS' SERVANT One of Lord Timon's men.
 LUCIUS' SERVANT
 Flaminius! Sir, a word. Pray, is my lord 35
 Ready to come forth?
 FLAMINIUS No, indeed he is not.
 TITUS' SERVANT
 We attend his lordship. Pray signify so much.
 FLAMINIUS
 I need not tell him that; he knows you are Too diligent. [Exit]
 Enter Steward, in a cloak, muffled
 LUCIUS' SERVANT
 Ha, is not that his steward muffled so? 40
 He goes away in a cloud. Call him, call him.
 TITUS' SERVANT [to Steward] Do you hear, sir?
 VARRO'S SECOND SERVANT [to Steward] By your leave, sir.
 STEWARD What do ye ask of me, my friend?
 TITUS' SERVANT
 We wait for certain money here, sir.
 STEWARD Ay, 45
 If money were as certain as your waiting,
 'Twere sure enough.
 Why then preferred you not your sums and bills
 When your false masters ate of my lord's meat?
 Then they could smile and fawn upon his debts,
 50 And take down th' int'rest into their glutt'nous maws.

32 those religious fanatics. Sometimes thought to allude specifically to the Catholic Gunpowder Plot to blow up the King in Parliament.
under hiding behind
 33 set whole realms on fire An extension of the proverb "To set one's heart on fire".
 37 wards locks (literally the notched part that accepts the right key)

41 keep... keep his house retain... stay indoors (to avoid arrest for debt)
 8.7 at once to you all
 9 Labouring for going up to 11 shine rise (like the sun) 13 prodigal course (as applied to the sun, its high course in summer)
 15 his its
 19 t'observe to see and interpret

30 stealth stealing
 41 in a cloud (a) muffled from sight (b) in a state of trouble and anxiety. The phrase was proverbial in sense (a) for an act of secret intrigue.
 48 preferred brought forward
 50-1 his debts... th' int'rest i.e. the entertainment giving rise to them

Scene 8

The Life of Tymon of Athens.

You do yourselves but wrong to stir me up.
 Let me pass quietly.
 Believe't, my lord and I have made an end.
 55 I have no more to reckon, he to spend.
 LUCIUS' SERVANT
 Ay, but this answer will not serve.
 STEWARD
 If 'twill not serve 'tis not so base as you,
 For you serve knaves. [Exit]
 60 VARRO'S FIRST SERVANT How? What does his cashiered worship mutter?
 VARRO'S SECOND SERVANT No matter what; he's poor, and that's revenge enough. Who can speak broader than he that has no house to put his head in? Such may rail against great buildings.
 Enter Servilius
 65 TITUS' SERVANT O, here's Servilius. Now we shall know some answer.
 SERVILIUS If I might beseech you, gentlemen, to repair some other hour, I should derive much from't; for, take't of my soul, my lord leans wondrously to discontent. His comfortable temper has forsook him. He's 70 much out of health, and keeps his chamber.
 LUCIUS' SERVANT
 Many do keep their chambers are not sick,
 And if it be so far beyond his health
 Methinks he should the sooner pay his debts
 And make a clear way to the gods.
 75 SERVILIUS Good gods!
 TITUS' SERVANT We cannot take this for answer, sir.
 FLAMINIUS [within]
 Servilius, help! My lord, my lord!
 Enter Timon in a rage
 TIMON
 What, are my doors opposed against my passage?
 Have I been ever free, and must my house
 80 Be my retentive enemy, my jail?
 The place which I have feasted, does it now,
 Like all mankind, show me an iron heart?
 LUCIUS' SERVANT
 Put in now, Titus.
 TITUS' SERVANT My lord, here is my bill.
 LUCIUS' SERVANT
 Here's mine.
 [HORTENSIUS' SERVANT]
 And mine, my lord.
 VARRO'S FIRST and SECOND SERVANTS
 And ours, my lord.

PHILOTUS' SERVANT All our bills. 85
 TIMON Knock me down with 'em, cleave me to the girdle.
 LUCIUS' SERVANT Alas, my lord.
 TIMON Cut my heart in sums.
 TITUS' SERVANT Mine fifty talents.
 TIMON
 Tell out my blood.
 LUCIUS' SERVANT Five thousand crowns, my lord. 90
 TIMON
 Five thousand drops pays that. What yours? And yours?
 VARRO'S FIRST SERVANT My lord—
 VARRO'S SECOND SERVANT My lord—
 TIMON
 Tear me, take me, and the gods fall upon you. Exit
 HORTENSIUS' SERVANT Faith, I perceive our masters may 95 throw their caps at their money. These debts may well be called desperate ones, for a madman owes 'em.
 Exeunt

Enter Timon [and Steward] Sc. 9
 TIMON They have e'en put my breath from me, the slaves.
 Creditors? Devils!
 STEWARD My dear lord—
 TIMON What if it should be so?
 STEWARD My lord— 5
 TIMON
 I'll have it so. My steward!
 STEWARD Here, my lord.
 TIMON
 So fitly? Go bid all my friends again:
 Lucius, Lucullus, and Sempronius—all luxurs, all.
 I'll once more feast the rascals.
 STEWARD O my lord,
 You only speak from your distracted soul. 10
 There's not so much left to furnish out
 A moderate table.
 TIMON Be it not in thy care.
 Go, I charge thee, invite them all. Let in the tide
 Of knaves once more. My cook and I'll provide.
 Exeunt [severally]

Enter three Senators at one door Sc. 10
 FIRST SENATOR
 My lord, you have my voice to't. The fault's bloody.
 'Tis necessary he should die.
 Nothing emboldens sin so much as mercy.
 SECOND SENATOR Most true; the law shall bruise 'im.

54 made an end agreed to part
 60 worship Used ironically: the Steward no longer commands deference.
 70 comfortable cheerful
 72 Many...sick See note to 7.41.
 79 free generous (playing on 'at liberty')
 85 bills notes of debt (but Timon understands the weapon: and axe or blade with a long handle)

88 sums pieces of fixed value
 90 Tell count
 96 throw their caps at A proverbial gesture expressing the impossibility of catching up.
 97 desperate (a) hopeless (b) violently reckless 9.1 e'en...me taken even my breath off me

(drawing on the proverb 'air is free')
 6 I'll have it so (referring to the plan he has thought of)
 8 luxurs debauchees
 10.1 voice to't vote for it fault's crime's
 3 Nothing...mercy Proverbially, 'Pardon makes offenders'.

Enter Alcibiades at another door, with attendants

ALCIBIADES
 5 Honour, health, and compassion to the senate!
 FIRST SENATOR Now, captain.
 ALCIBIADES
 I am an humble suitor to your virtues;
 For pity is the virtue of the law,
 And none but tyrants use it cruelly.
 10 It pleases time and fortune to lie heavy
 Upon a friend of mine, who in hot blood
 Hath stepped into the law, which is past depth
 To those that without heed do plunge into't.
 He is a man, setting his feat aside,
 15 Of comely virtues;
 Nor did he soil the fact with cowardice—
 An honour in him which buys out his fault—
 But with a noble fury and fair spirit,
 Seeing his reputation touched to death,
 20 He did oppose his foe;
 And with such sober and unnoted passion
 He did behave his anger, ere 'twas spent,
 As if he had but proved an argument.
 FIRST SENATOR
 You undergo too strict a paradox,
 25 Striving to make an ugly deed look fair.
 Your words have took such pains as if they laboured
 To bring manslaughter into form, and set quarrelling
 Upon the head of valour—which indeed
 Is valour misbegot, and came into the world
 30 When sects and factions were newly born.
 He's truly valiant that can wisely suffer
 The worst that man can breathe, and make his wrongs his outsidés
 To wear them like his raiment carelessly,
 And ne'er prefer his injuries to his heart
 35 To bring it into danger.
 If wrongs be evils and enforce us kill,
 What folly 'tis to hazard life for ill!
 ALCIBIADES
 My lord—
 FIRST SENATOR
 You cannot make gross sins look clear.

To rèvege is no valour, but to bear.
 ALCIBIADES
 My lords, then, under favour, pardon me
 40 If I speak like a captain.
 Why do fond men expose themselves to battle,
 And not endure all threats, sleep upon't,
 And let the foes quietly cut their throats
 Without repugnancy? If there be 45 Such valour in the bearing, what make we Abroad? Why then, women are more valiant
 That stay at home if bearing carry it,
 And the ass more captain than the lion, the fellow
 Loaden with irons wiser than the judge,
 50 If wisdom be in suffering. O my lords,
 As you are great, be pitifully good.
 Who cannot condemn rashness in cold blood?
 To kill, I grant, is sin's extremest gust,
 But in defence, by mercy, 'tis most just.
 55 To be in anger is impiety,
 But who is man that is not angry?
 Weigh but the crime with this.
 SECOND SENATOR You breathe in vain.
 ALCIBIADES In vain?
 His service done at Lacedaemon and Byzantium
 Were a sufficient briber for his life.
 60 FIRST SENATOR
 What's that?
 ALCIBIADES
 Why, I say, my lords, he's done fair service,
 And slain in fight many of your enemies.
 How full of valour did he bear himself
 In the last conflict, and made plenteous wounds!
 SECOND SENATOR
 He has made too much plenty with 'em.
 65 He's a sworn rioter; he has a sin
 That often drowns him and takes his valour prisoner.
 If there were no foes, that were enough
 To overcome him. In that beastly fury
 He has been known to commit outrages
 70 And cherish factions. 'Tis inferred to us
 His days are foul and his drink dangerous.

- 4.1 Enter...attendants Alcibiades may alternatively appear at the beginning of the scene but not approach the Senators until here. The attendants are Senate officials.
 6 Now Either 'now then' or an expression of surprise at Alcibiades' presumptuous greeting.
 12 past out of 14 feat action, crime (perhaps also suggesting fate)
 16 fact deed, crime
 19 touched (a) hit, damaged (b) infected through contagion, besmirched
 21 unnoted inconspicuous, restrained, unremarkable

- 22 behave manage, control
 27 form (a) a formality of argument, or (b) acceptable behaviour
 28 Upon the head (a) in the category, or (b) as the crowning instance indeed in fact
 32 outsides outer garments
 33 carelessly casually 34 prefer advance, promote heart (seen as (a) seat of feelings (b) the vital organ)
 38 clear innocent
 39 but to bear i.e. rather, to endure wrongs is valour
 42 fond foolish
 45 repugnancy resistance

- 46 bearing enduring (of wrongs). Leads on to a quibble on child-bearing.
 46-7 what make we | Abroad? what's the point of venturing out?
 48 carry it wins the day (with wordplay between bearing and carry)
 52 pitifully good good in showing pity
 53 condemn...blood (a) condemn a rash deed committed in cold blood, or (b) condemn in cold blood a rash deed
 54 gust (a) taste, experience (b) outburst
 55 by mercy if seen mercifully
 57 angry Probably three syllables: 'angry'.
 66 a sin i.e. drunkenness
 71 cherish factions encourage factional violence

FIRST SENATOR
He dies. 105

ALCIBIADES
Hard fate! He might have died in war.
My lords, if not for any parts in him—
75 Though his right arm might purchase his own time
And be in debt to none—yet more to move you,
Take my deserts to his and join 'em both. 110
And for I know
Your reverend ages love security,
80 I'll pawn my victories, all my honour to you
Upon his good returns.
If by this crime he owes the law his life,
Why, let the war receive't in valiant gore,
For law is strict, and war is nothing more.

FIRST SENATOR
85 We are for law; he dies. Urge it no more,
On height of our displeasure. Friend or brother,
He forfeits his own blood that spills another.

ALCIBIADES
Must it be so? It must not be.
My lords, I do beseech you know me.

SECOND SENATOR How?

ALCIBIADES
Call me to your remembrances.

90 THIRD SENATOR What?

ALCIBIADES
I cannot think but your age has forgot me.
It could not else be I should prove so base
To sue and be denied such common grace.
My wounds ache at you.

FIRST SENATOR Do you dare our anger?
95 'Tis in few words, but spacious in effect:
We banish thee for ever.

ALCIBIADES Banish me?
Banish your dotage, banish usury
That makes the senate ugly.

FIRST SENATOR
If after two days' shine Athens contain thee,
Attend our weightier judgement; and, not to swell
100 your spirit,
He shall be executed presently.
Exeunt [Senators and attendants]

ALCIBIADES
Now the gods keep you old enough that you may live
Only in bone, that none may look on you!

I'm worse than mad. I have kept back their foes
While they have told their money and let out 105
Their coin upon large interest, I myself
Rich only in large hurts. All those for this?
Is this the balsam that the usuring senate
Pours into captains' wounds? Banishment!
It comes not ill; I hate not to be banished. 110
It is a cause worthy my spleen and fury,
That I may strike at Athens. I'll cheer up
My discontented troops, and lay for hearts.
'Tis honour with most lands to be at odds.
Soldiers should brook as little wrongs as gods. Exit 115

Enter divers [of Timon's] friends, [amongst them Lucius, Lucullus, Sempronius, and other Lords and Senators,] at several doors

FIRST LORD The good time of day to you, sir.
SECOND LORD I also wish it to you. I think this honourable lord did but try us this other day.
FIRST LORD Upon that were my thoughts tiring when we encountered. I hope it is not so low with him as he 5 made it seem in the trial of his several friends.
SECOND LORD It should not be, by the persuasion of his new feasting.
FIRST LORD I should think so. He hath sent me an earnest inviting, which many my near occasions did urge me 10 to put off, but he hath conjured me beyond them, and I must needs appear.
SECOND LORD In like manner was I in debt to my importunate business, but he would not hear my excuse. I am sorry when he sent to borrow of me that my provision 15 was out.
FIRST LORD I am sick of that grief too, as I understand how all things go.
SECOND LORD Every man hears so. What would he have borrowed of you? 20
FIRST LORD A thousand pieces.
SECOND LORD A thousand pieces?
FIRST LORD What of you?
SECOND LORD He sent to me, sir—
[Loud music]
Here he comes. 25
Enter Timon and attendants
TIMON With all my heart, gentlemen both; and how fare
you?
FIRST LORD Ever at the best, hearing well of your lordship.

74 parts (a) qualities (b) limbs (the sense taken up in right arm, 10.75)
75 time natural lifespan
79 security (alludes to both financial and military security)
81 Upon...returns as pledge that he will repay your mercy. Returns might also suggest both reformation and returns from battle.
83 receive't...gore i.e. receive the equivalent to it in the blood of enemies that he will valiantly spill

84 nothing more not at all otherwise
86 On height of our at risk of our highest 101 presently immediately
102-3 live...bone i.e. be living skeletons (too ugly to be looked at) 105 they (the senators)
108 balsam balm, ointment
113 lay set an ambush
11.0.1 divers various 0.2 Lucius, Lucullus, Sempronius They probably correspond to speaking Lords, perhaps the First, Second, and Third Lords respectively.

4 tiring feeding. Said especially of a bird of prey tearing flesh.
6 several various
10 occasions affairs (perhaps also 'pretexts')
11-12 conjured...appear Compare 1.7 and note.
17 grief (a) illness (b) offence (c) sorrow

- SECOND LORD The swallow follows not summer more willingly than we your lordship.
- 30 TIMON [aside] Nor more willingly leaves winter, such summer birds are men.—Gentlemen, our dinner will not recompense this long stay. Feast your ears with the music a while, if they will fare so harshly o' th' trumpets' sound; we shall to't presently.
- 35 FIRST LORD I hope it remains not unkindly with your lordship that I returned you an empty messenger.
- TIMON O sir, let it not trouble you.
- SECOND LORD My noble lord—
- 40 TIMON Ah, my good friend, what cheer?
The banquet brought in
- SECOND LORD My most honourable lord, I am e'en sick of shame that, when your lordship this other day sent to me, I was so unfortunate a beggar.
- TIMON Think not on't, sir.
- 45 SECOND LORD If you had sent but two hours before—
- TIMON Let it not cumber your better remembrance.—Come, bring in all together.
[Enter Servants with covered dishes]
- SECOND LORD All covered dishes.
- FIRST LORD Royal cheer, I warrant you.
- 50 THIRD LORD Doubt not that, if money and the season can yield it.
- FIRST LORD How do you? What's the news?
- THIRD LORD Alcibiades is banished. Hear you of it?
- FIRST and SECOND LORDS Alcibiades banished?
- 55 THIRD LORD 'Tis so, be sure of it.
- FIRST LORD How, how?
- SECOND LORD I pray you, upon what?
- TIMON My worthy friends, will you draw near?
- THIRD LORD I'll tell you more anon. Here's a noble feast
- 60 toward.
- SECOND LORD This is the old man still.
- THIRD LORD Will't hold, will't hold?
- SECOND LORD It does; but time will—and so—
- THIRD LORD I do conceive.
- 65 TIMON Each man to his stool with that spur as he would to the lip of his mistress. Your diet shall be in all places alike. Make not a City feast of it, to let the meat cool
- ere we can agree upon the first place. Sit, sit. The gods require our thanks.
[They sit]
- You great benefactors, sprinkle our society with thankfulness. For your own gifts make yourselves praised; but reserve still to give, lest your deities be despised. Lend to each man enough that one need not lend to another; for were your godheads to borrow of men, men would forsake the gods. Make the meat be beloved more than the man that gives it. Let no assembly of twenty be without a score of villains. If there sit twelve women at the table, let a dozen of them be as they are. The rest of your foes, O gods—the senators of Athens, together with the common tag of people—what is amiss in them, you gods, make suitable for destruction. For these my present friends, as they are to me nothing, so in nothing bless them; and to nothing are they welcome.—Uncover, dogs, and lap.
[The dishes are uncovered, and seen to be full of steaming water and stones]
- SOME LORDS What does his lordship mean? 85
- OTHER LORDS I know not.
- TIMON
- May you a better feast never behold,
You knot of mouth-friends. Smoke and lukewarm water
- Is your perfection. This is Timon's last,
Who, stuck and spangled with your flattery, 90
Washes it off, and sprinkles in your faces
Your reeking villainy.
[He throws water in their faces]
- Live loathed and long,
Most smiling, smooth, detested parasites,
Courteous destroyers, affable wolves, meek bears,
You fools of fortune, trencher-friends, time's flies, 95
Cap-and-knee slaves, vapours, and minute-jacks!
Of man and beast the infinite malady
Crust you quite o'er.
[A Lord is going]
- What, dost thou go?
Soft, take thy physic first. Thou too, and thou.

29–32 The...men Proverbially, 'Swallows, like false friends, fly away upon the approach of winter'.

40.1 The banquet i.e., a table with place-settings and stools, as for the banquet

46 cumber...remembrance trouble your memory of better things

61 old man man of old

62 hold continue, prove true

63 time will— Perhaps intimating the proverb 'time will tell truth'

65 spur urgent speed (as when a horse is spurred)

67 City feast i.e. feast as given by dignitaries of the City of London

67–8 to...place Implies both that social precedence is contested in the City and all matters are subject to debate.

70–83 You...welcome Timon's grace is printed in italics as a set piece in the 1623 Folio.

70 society social gathering

72 reserve still always hold back something

78 they women generally

80 tag rabble

88 mouth-friends (a) friends in lip-service only (b) friends when it comes to eating

Smoke steam (characteristically insubstantial and diffusing to nothing). Smoke is also 'mere talk'.

89 perfection (a) finishing touch (b) perfect representation

90 stuck and spangled Both verbs apply to fixing jewels or ornaments.

92 reeking (a) steaming (b) stinking

95 fools dupes, playthings. Fools of fortune was proverbial.

trencher-friends friends in feasting flies (only about in fair weather)

96 Cap-and-knee cap-doffing and kneebending minute-jacks over-punctilious time-servers. The jack was the mechanical human figure that struck the bell on medieval clocks—though not every minute. Jack is also 'knave'.

98 Crust (as with a scab)

99 physic medicine

[He beats them]
 100 Stay, I will lend thee this money, borrow none.
 [Exeunt Lords, leaving caps and gowns]
 What, all in motion? Henceforth be no feast
 Whereat a villain's not a welcome guest.
 Burn house! Sink Athens! Henceforth hated be
 Of Timon man and all humanity! Exit
 Enter the Senators with other Lords
 105 FIRST LORD How now, my lords?
 SECOND LORD
 Know you the quality of Lord Timon's fury?
 THIRD LORD
 Push! Did you see my cap?
 FOURTH LORD I have lost my gown.
 FIRST LORD He's but a mad lord, and naught but humours sways him. He gave me a jewel th' other day, and now 110 he has beat it out of my hat.
 Did you see my jewel?
 THIRD LORD Did you see my cap?
 SECOND LORD
 Here 'tis.
 FOURTH LORD
 Here lies my gown.
 FIRST LORD Let's make no stay.
 SECOND LORD
 Lord Timon's mad.
 THIRD LORD I feel't upon my bones.
 FOURTH LORD
 One day he gives us diamonds, next day stones.
Exeunt
 Enter Timon
 Sc. 12 TIMON
 Let me look back upon thee. O thou wall
 That girdles in those wolves, dive in the earth,
 And fence not Athens! Matrons, turn incontinent!
 Obedience fail in children! Slaves and fools,
 5 Pluck the grave wrinkled senate from the bench

And minister in their steads! To general filths
 Convert o' th' instant, green virginity!
 Do't in your parents' eyes. Bankrupts, hold fast!
 Rather than render back, out with your knives,
 And cut your trusters' throats. Bound servants, steal! 10
 Large-handed robbers your grave masters are,
 And pill by law. Maid, to thy master's bed!
 Thy mistress is o' th' brothel. Son of sixteen,
 Pluck the lined crutch from thy old limping sire;
 With it beat out his brains! Piety and fear, 15
 Religion to the gods, peace, justice, truth,
 Domestic awe, night rest, and neighbourhood,
 Instruction, manners, mysteries, and trades,
 Degrees, observances, customs, and laws,
 Decline to your confounding contraries, 20
 And yet confusion live! Plagues incident to men,
 Your potent and infectious fevers heap
 On Athens, ripe for stroke! Thou cold sciatica,
 Cripple our senators, that their limbs may halt
 As lamely as their manners! Lust and liberty, 25
 Creep in the minds and marrows of our youth,
 That 'gainst the stream of virtue they may strive
 And drown themselves in riot! Itches, blains,
 Sow all th' Athenian bosoms, and their crop
 Be general leprosy! Breath infect breath, 30
 That their society, as their friendship, may Be merely poison!
 [He tears off his clothes]
 Nothing I'll bear from thee
 But nakedness, thou detestable town;
 Take thou that too, with multiplying bans.
 Timon will to the woods, where he shall find 35
 Th' unkindest beast more kinder than mankind.
 The gods confound—hear me you good gods all—
 Th' Athenians, both within and out that wall;
 And grant, as Timon grows, his hate may grow
 To the whole race of mankind, high and low. 40
 Amen. Exit

Enter Steward, with two or three Servants

FIRST SERVANT

Hear you, master steward, where's our master?
Are we undone, cast off, nothing remaining?

STEWARD

Alack, my fellows, what should I say to you?
Let me be recorded: by the righteous gods,
I am as poor as you.

5

FIRST SERVANT

Such a house broke,
So noble a master fall'n? All gone, and not
One friend to take his fortune by the arm
And go along with him?

SECOND SERVANT

As we do turn our backs
From our companion thrown into his grave,
So his familiars to his buried fortunes
Slink all away, leave their false vows with him
Like empty purses picked; and his poor self,
A dedicated beggar to the air,
With his disease of all-shunned poverty,
Walks like contempt alone. More of our fellows.

10

15

Enter other Servants

STEWARD

All broken implements of a ruined house.

THIRD SERVANT

Yet do our hearts wear Timon's livery.
That see I by our faces. We are fellows still,
Serving alike in sorrow. Leaked is our barque,
And we, poor mates, stand on the dying deck
Hearing the surges' threat. We must all part
Into this sea of air.

20

STEWARD

Good fellows all,
The latest of my wealth I'll share amongst you.
Wherever we shall meet, for Timon's sake
Let's yet be fellows. Let's shake our heads and say,
As 'twere a knell unto our master's fortunes,
'We have seen better days.'

25

[He gives them money]

Let each take some.

Nay, put out all your hands. Not one word more.
Thus part we rich in sorrow, parting poor.

13.2 undone...remaining Echoes Timon's divestment in the previous scene.

5 house broke household broken up

10 his familiars to Shifts from 'his intimate friends' to 'those familiar with'.

buried fortunes The fortunes are personified as the actual recipients of friendship, now dead. Timon's fortunes as 'luck' are figuratively buried, but it was his material fortunes that his friends were familiar with; the idea of buried treasure is developed in the next scene.

12 picked from which the money has been stolen

20 mates (a) subordinate naval officers (the full expression was master's mate) (b) fellows

21 part (a) separate (b) die

23 latest last

32 point lead

35 what state compounds that of which conspicuous splendour is compounded

36 varnished glossily painted (implying 'specious, pretended')

42 to be in order to be

45-6 ingrateful...monstrous Compare 6.72-3 and note.

45 seat centre, stronghold

14.0.1 from his cave The cave might be represented naturalistically by a stage property or conventionally by a door.

1 breeding Refers to the sun's supposed capacity to breed flies etc.

2 Rotten putrid
below...orb i.e. throughout the corruptible part of creation. Thy sister is the moon, whose sphere (orb) was supposed to divide the mutable from the celestial.

Embrace, and [the Servants] part several ways

O, the fierce wretchedness that glory brings us!

Who would not wish to be from wealth exempt,
Since riches point to misery and contempt?

Who would be so mocked with glory, or to live
But in a dream of friendship,

To have his pomp and all what state compounds
But only painted like his varnished friends?

Poor honest lord, brought low by his own heart,
Undone by goodness! Strange, unusual blood

When man's worst sin is he does too much good!
Who then dares to be half so kind again?

For bounty, that makes gods, does still mar men.
My dearest lord, blessed to be most accursed,

Rich only to be wretched, thy great fortunes
Are made thy chief afflictions. Alas, kind lord!

He's flung in rage from this ingrateful seat
Of monstrous friends;

Nor has he with him to supply his life,
Or that which can command it.

I'll follow and enquire him out.

I'll ever serve his mind with my best will.

Whilst I have gold I'll be his steward still.

Exit

Enter Timon [from his cave] in the woods, [half naked, and with a spade]

Sc. 14

TIMON

O blessèd breeding sun, draw from the earth
Rotten humidity; below thy sister's orb

Infect the air. Twinned brothers of one womb,
Whose procreation, residence, and birth

Scarce is dividant, touch them with several fortunes,
The greater scorns the lesser. Not nature,

To whom all sores lay siege, can bear great fortune
But by contempt of nature.

It is the pasture lards the brother's sides,
The want that makes him lean.

Raise me this beggar and demit that lord,
The senator shall bear contempt hereditary,

The beggar native honour. Who dares, who dares

4 residence gestation in the womb

5 dividant divisible, distinguishable touch them if they are touched several different

6-8 Not...of nature i.e. it is not in human nature to bear great fortune except by despising one's natural self and familial origins, because the natural state of things is to be under siege by sickness and misfortune

9 It i.e. fortune (?)
pasture Suggests both pastoral feeding and possession of land.

lards that fattens

9-10 the brother's...him i.e. the one brother's...the other

11 demit humble, abase

12 hereditary as if he were born to it. Similarly native, 14.13.

15 In purity of manhood stand upright
 And say 'This man's a flatterer'? If one be,
 So are they all, for every grece of fortune
 Is smoothed by that below. The learned pate
 Ducks to the golden fool. All's obliquy;
 20 There's nothing level in our cursèd natures
 But direct villainy. Therefore be abhorred
 All feasts, societies, and throngs of men.
 His semblable, yea, himself, Timon disdains.
 Destruction fang mankind. Earth, yield me roots.
 [He digs]
 Who seeks for better of thee, sauce his palate
 With thy most operant poison.
 [He finds gold]

25 What is here?
 Gold? Yellow, glittering, precious gold?
 No, gods, I am no idle votarist:
 Roots, you clear heavens. Thus much of this will make 30 Black white, foul fair, wrong right,
 Base noble, old young, coward valiant.
 Ha, you gods! Why this, what, this, you gods? Why,
 this
 Will lug your priests and servants from your sides,
 Pluck stout men's pillows from below their heads.
 This yellow slave
 35 Will knit and break religions, bless th' accursed,
 Make the hoar leprosy adored, place thieves,
 And give them title, knee, and approbation
 With senators on the bench. This is it
 That makes the wappered widow wed again.
 40 She whom the spittle house and ulcerous sores
 Would cast the gorge at, this embalms and spices
 To th' April day again. Come, damned earth,
 Thou common whore of mankind, that puts odds
 Among the rout of nations; I will make thee

Do thy right nature.
 March afar off
 Ha, a drum! Thou'rt quick;
 45 But yet I'll bury thee.
 [He buries gold]
 Thou'lt go, strong thief,
 When gouty keepers of thee cannot stand.
 [He keeps some gold]
 Nay, stay thou out for earnest.
 Enter Alcibiades, with [soldiers playing] drum and fife, in warlike manner; and Phrynia and Timandra ALCIBIADES What art thou there? Speak.
 TIMON
 A beast, as thou art. The canker gnaw thy heart
 For showing me again the eyes of man. 50
 ALCIBIADES
 What is thy name? Is man so hateful to thee
 That art thyself a man?
 TIMON
 I am Misanthropos, and hate mankind.
 For thy part, I do wish thou wert a dog,
 That I might love thee something.
 ALCIBIADES I know thee well, 55
 But in thy fortunes am unlearned and strange.
 TIMON
 I know thee too, and more than that I know thee
 I not desire to know. Follow thy drum.
 With man's blood paint the ground gules, gules.
 60 Religious canons, civil laws, are cruel;
 Then what should war be? This fell whore of thine
 Hath in her more destruction than thy sword,
 For all her cherubin look.
 PHRYNIA Thy lips rot off!
 TIMON
 I will not kiss thee; then the rot returns
 To thine own lips again. 65

16 grece a step in a flight of stairs; specifically those standing on the step 17 smoothed flattered pate head (as both seat of intellect and part of the body that bows)
 18 obliquy deviousness
 22 His semblable that which resembles himself
 23 fang seize with fangs
 23.1 He digs The hole beneath the trapdoor in the middle of the stage would probably be used.
 24-8 Who... heavens Timon's prayer is answered, though against his intention and ironically. His humility is rewarded with riches, and it is he, not those who seek for better, who gets the earth's most operant poison. The irony depends on biblical teachings, particularly 'the desire of money is the root of all evil, which while some lusted after they erred from the faith and pierced themselves with many sorrows' (1 Timothy 6:10).
 25 operant potent

27 idle ineffective; insincere. Perhaps plays on idol.
 votarist one bound by vow to a religious way of life
 28 clear innocent, blameless
 28-9 make | Black white proverbial
 33 Pluck... heads (in order to throttle them)
 36 hoar Refers to the greyish colour of leprous skin.
 place thieves appoint thieves to office
 39 wappered sexually worn-out
 40 the... sores i.e. those in hospital and with ulcerous sores 41 cast the gorge vomit
 embalms and spices Suggests preparation to preserve a corpse, though spices were also used as cosmetic perfumes.
 43 common whore Alters the traditional figure of the earth as a common (general) mother (as at 14.178), and so debases the connotations of common. Whore is appropriate because land can be bought and sold; it is unlikely to have been so described under the feudal system.

puts odds creates conflict
 44 rout rabble
 45 quick sudden (to bring about strife). Also, punningly, 'alive', anticipating bury.
 46 go walk away
 47 keepers (a) owners (b) jailers
 48 for earnest as a token for the rest
 49 canker canker-worm (with the heart seen as a flower-bud)
 56 strange unacquainted
 59 gules Heraldic term for red. The repetition might suggest a red motif on a red background.
 61 fell dreadful, savage
 62 destruction Both physical (disease) and moral (damnation).
 63 Thy lips rot off Alludes to an effect of syphilis.
 64-5 I... again i.e. the curse could only be fulfilled by kissing Phrynia; as Timon refuses, he claims that the curse of rotten lips recoils onto the lips of the speaker.

ALCIBIADES
How came the noble Timon to this change? 95

TIMON
As the moon does, by wanting light to give.
But then renew I could not like the moon;
There were no suns to borrow of.

ALCIBIADES
Noble Timon, what friendship may I do thee? 70

TIMON
None but to maintain my opinion.

ALCIBIADES What is it, Timon?

TIMON Promise me friendship, but perform none. If thou wilt promise, the gods plague thee, for thou art a man.

75 If thou dost not perform, confound thee, for thou art a man.

ALCIBIADES
I have heard in some sort of thy miseries.

TIMON
Thou saw'st them when I had prosperity.

ALCIBIADES
I see them now; then was a blessèd time.

TIMON
As thine is now, held with a brace of harlots. 80

TIMANDRA
Is this th' Athenian minion, whom the world
Voiced so regardfully?

TIMON Art thou Timandra?

TIMANDRA Yes.

TIMON
Be a whore still. They love thee not that use thee.
Give them diseases, leaving with thee their lust.
85 Make use of thy salt hours: season the slaves
For tubs and baths, bring down rose-cheeked youth
To the tub-fast and the diet.

TIMANDRA Hang thee, monster!

ALCIBIADES
Pardon him, sweet Timandra, for his wits
90 Are drowned and lost in his calamities.
I have but little gold of late, brave Timon,
The want whereof doth daily make revolt
In my penurious band. I have heard and grieved
How cursèd Athens, mindless of thy worth,

Forgetting thy great deeds, when neighbour states
But for thy sword and fortune trod upon them—

TIMON
I prithee, beat thy drum and get thee gone.

ALCIBIADES
I am thy friend, and pity thee, dear Timon.

TIMON
How dost thou pity him whom thou dost trouble?
I had rather be alone.

ALCIBIADES Why, fare thee well. 100
Here is some gold for thee.

TIMON Keep it. I cannot eat it.

ALCIBIADES
When I have laid proud Athens on a heap—

TIMON
Warr'st thou 'gainst Athens?

ALCIBIADES Ay, Timon, and have cause.

TIMON
The gods confound them all in thy conquest,
And thee after, when thou hast conquerèd. 105

ALCIBIADES
Why me, Timon?

TIMON That by killing of villains
Thou wast born to conquer my country.
Put up thy gold.
[He gives Alcibiades gold]
Go on; here's gold; go on.
Be as a planetary plague when Jove
Will o'er some high-vised city hang his poison 110
In the sick air. Let not thy sword skip one.
Pity not honoured age for his white beard;
He is an usurer. Strike me the counterfeit matron;
It is her habit only that is honest,
Herself's a bawd. Let not the virgin's cheek 115
Make soft thy trenchant sword; for those milk paps
That through the window-bars bore at men's eyes
Are not within the leaf of pity writ;
But set them down horrible traitors. Spare not the babe
Whose dimpled smiles from fools exhaust their mercy. 120
Think it a bastard whom the oracle
Hath doubtfully pronounced the throat shall cut,

73 Promise... perform From the proverb 'to promise much and perform little'.
80 held with a brace (a) spent with a pair (b) held together with a clamp
81 minion favourite. But as also a derogatory term for a woman, it brings Timon into equivalence with the speaker. Her name Timandra, which Timon speaks in the next line, has the same effect. In Sc. 4 the Page was bearing letters from the brothel to Timon and Alcibiades; we might perhaps infer that Timandra was Timon's whore ('They love thee not that use thee', 14.84).
84 Be a whore still Proverbially, 'Once a whore, always a whore'.
85 lust Seen as expended and deposited in the whore's body, like semen.

86 salt hours hours of lechery (also anticipating season, as with salt) season prepare (and see previous note)
87 tubs and baths sweating-tubs and hot baths; i.e. treatments for venereal disease
88 tub-fast sexual abstinence during treatment with the sweating-tub diet (another part of the therapy)
90 lost (as at sea)
96 trod upon them would have trod upon them. A victor symbolically trod upon a vanquished foe. The sword and fortune are both the war-aims of the neighbour states and the Athenian means for defence.

104 in thy conquest by being conquered by you 109 a planetary plague a plague or disaster induced by malign planetary influence
114 habit dress
116 trenchant cutting, sharp
117 window-bars open-work squares of a bodice (?)
118 leaf of pity Metonymic for 'book of pity'; perhaps recalling the biblical Book of Life.
120 exhaust draw forth
122 doubtfully ambiguously (see next note)
the throat shall cut The prophecy does not specify whether the child will be victim or agent.

And mince it sans remorse. Swear against objects.
 Put armour on thine ears and on thine eyes
 125 Whose proof nor yells of mothers, maids, nor babes,
 Nor sight of priests in holy vestments bleeding,
 Shall pierce a jot. There's gold to pay thy soldiers.
 Make large confusion, and, thy fury spent,
 Confounded be thyself. Speak not. Be gone.

ALCIBIADES
 130 Hast thou gold yet? I'll take the gold thou giv'st me,
 Not all thy counsel.

TIMON
 Dost thou or dost thou not, heaven's curse upon thee!

PHRYNIA and TIMANDRA
 Give us some gold, good Timon. Hast thou more?

TIMON
 Enough to make a whore forswear her trade,
 And to make wholesomeness a bawd. Hold up, you 135 sluts,
 Your aprons mountant.
 [He throws gold into their aprons]
 You are not oathable,
 Although I know you'll swear, terribly swear,
 Into strong shudders and to heavenly agues
 Th' immortal gods that hear you. Spare your oaths;
 140 I'll trust to your conditions. Be whores still,
 And he whose pious breath seeks to convert you,
 Be strong in whore, allure him, burn him up.
 Let your close fire predominate his smoke;
 And be no turncoats. Yet may your pain-sick months
 145 Be quite contrary, and thatch your poor thin roofs
 With burdens of the dead—some that were hanged,
 No matter. Wear them, betray with them; whore still;
 Paint till a horse may mire upon your face.
 A pox of wrinkles!

PHRYNIA and TIMANDRA
 Well, more gold; what then?
 Believe't that we'll do anything for gold. 150

TIMON Consumptions sow
 In hollow bones of man, strike their sharp shins,
 And mar men's spurring. Crack the lawyer's voice,
 That he may never more false title plead
 Nor sound his quillets shrilly. Hoar the flamen 155
 That scolds against the quality of flesh
 And not believes himself. Down with the nose,
 Down with it flat; take the bridge quite away
 Of him that his particular to foresee Smells from the general weal. Make curled-pate ruffians bald, 160
 And let the unscarred braggarts of the war
 Derive some pain from you. Plague all,
 That your activity may defeat and quell
 The source of all erection. There's more gold.
 Do you damn others, and let this damn you;
 And ditches grave you all! 165

PHRYNIA and TIMANDRA
 More counsel with more money, bounteous Timon.

TIMON
 More whore, more mischief first; I have given you earnest.

ALCIBIADES
 Strike up the drum towards Athens. Farewell, Timon.
 If I thrive well, I'll visit thee again. 170

TIMON
 If I hope well, I'll never see thee more.

ALCIBIADES I never did thee harm.

TIMON Yes, thou spok'st well of me.

ALCIBIADES Call'st thou that harm?

TIMON
 Men daily find it. Get thee away, 175

123 sans without objects objections
 125 proof tested power
 136 mountant lifted up. A heraldic term, suggesting that the lifted skirts are emblems of prostitution. Perhaps puns on sexual 'mounting'.
oathable able to keep an oath
 138 strong...agues i.e. dismay and pain.
 The words suggest also, quibblingly, both orgasm and effects of venereal disease.
 140 trust...conditions (a) take your quality on trust (b) trust what your occupations indicate (that as whores they are not to be trusted)
 142 burn him up (with venereal disease)
 143 close fire (a) the enclosed and so fierce fire of your lust (b) secret venereal disease predominate prevail over the sweating-tub

 144 be no turncoats i.e. stay true to being whores

145 quite contrary entirely opposed to your well-being (and perhaps 'just the opposite in character': i.e. making them sick instead of active, cold (thin roofs) instead of hot) thin roofs i.e. hairless scalps (a supposed symptom of venereal disease) 146 burdens of the dead i.e. wigs made from the hair of the dead
 148 Paint apply cosmetics
mire upon get stuck in (as if in mud)
 149 A pox of a pox on, to hell with 151 Consumptions consuming diseases
 (especially sexual ones)
 152 hollow bones The anticipated result of Consumptions. Syphilis makes bones brittle and fragile.
sharp shins Again the anticipated result:
 perhaps painful nodes on the shins.
 153 spurring (a) horse-riding (b) copulation Crack...voice An ulcered larynx is another effect of syphilis.
 155 quilllets verbal niceties, quibbles

Hoar make greyish-white (with syphilis) flamen priest. The Latinism is perhaps a concession to the setting in classical Greece, but may have been chosen to avoid censorship.
 156 quality of flesh i.e. susceptibility of the flesh to sexual temptation 157 Down with the nose Syphilis caused collapse of the nose-bridge.
 159 his particular his own self-interest 160 from apart from general weal i.e. well-being of society at large curled-pate ruffians curly-headed swaggerers
 161 unscarred braggarts i.e. boastful cowards
 163 quell destroy 164 The...erection i.e. the male sexual impulse
 168 earnest a down-payment
 172-3 I...me Proverbially, 'Praise by evil men is dispraise'.

And take thy beagles with thee.
 ALICIBIADES We but offend him. Strike!
Exeunt [to drum and fife all but Timon]

TIMON
 That nature, being sick of man's unkindness,
 Should yet be hungry!
[He digs the earth]
 Common mother—thou
 Whose womb unmeasurable and infinite breast
 180 Teems and feeds all, whose selfsame mettle
 Whereof thy proud child, arrogant man, is puffed
 Engenders the black toad and adder blue,
 The gilded newt and eyeless venomèd worm,
 185 With all th' abhorrèd births below crisp heaven
 Whereon Hyperion's quick'ning fire doth shine—
 Yield him who all the human sons doth hate
 From forth thy plenteous bosom, one poor root.
 Ensear thy fertile and conceptious womb;
 Let it no more bring out ingrateful man.
 190 Go great with tigers, dragons, wolves, and bears;
 Teem with new monsters whom thy upward face
 Hath to the marbled mansion all above
 Never presented.
[He finds a root]
 O, a root! Dear thanks.
 195 Dry up thy marrows, vines, and plough-torn leas,
 Whereof ingrateful man with liquorish draughts
 And morsels unctuous greases his pure mind,
 That from it all consideration slips!—
Enter Apemantus
 More man? Plague, plague!
 APEMANTUS
 I was directed hither. Men report
 200 Thou dost affect my manners, and dost use them.
 TIMON
 'Tis then because thou dost not keep a dog
 Whom I would imitate. Consumption catch thee!
 APEMANTUS
 This is in thee a nature but infected,

A poor unmanly melancholy, sprung
 From change of fortune. Why this spade, this place, 205 This slave-like habit, and these looks of care?
 Thy flatterers yet wear silk, drink wine, lie soft,
 Hug their diseased perfumes, and have forgot
 That ever Timon was. Shame not these woods
 By putting on the cunning of a carper.
 210 Be thou a flatterer now, and seek to thrive
 By that which has undone thee. Hinge thy knee,
 And let his very breath whom thou'lt observe
 Blow off thy cap. Praise his most vicious strain,
 And call it excellent. Thou wast told thus.
 215 Thou gav'st thine ears like tapsters that bade welcome
 To knaves and all approachers. 'Tis most just
 That thou turn rascal. Hadst thou wealth again, Rascals should have't. Do not assume my likeness.

TIMON
 Were I like thee, I'd throw away myself.
 220 APEMANTUS
 Thou hast cast away thyself being like thyself—
 A madman so long, now a fool. What, think'st
 That the bleak air, thy boisterous chamberlain,
 Will put thy shirt on warm? Will these mossed trees
 That have outlived the eagle page thy heels
 225 And skip when thou point'st out? Will the cold brook, Candied with ice, caudle thy morning taste
 To cure thy o'ernight's surfeit? Call the creatures
 Whose naked natures live in all the spite
 Of wreakful heaven, whose bare unhousèd trunks
 230 To the conflicting elements exposed
 Answer mere nature; bid them flatter thee.
 O, thou shalt find—

TIMON A fool of thee! Depart.
 APEMANTUS
 I love thee better now than e'er I did.
 TIMON
 I hate thee worse.
 APEMANTUS Why?
 TIMON Thou flatter'st misery.

mere unmitigated

APEMANTUS
I flatter not, but say thou art a caitiff.

TIMON
Why dost thou seek me out?

APEMANTUS
To vex thee.

TIMON
Always a villain's office, or a fool's.
Dost please thyself in't?

APEMANTUS
Ay.

TIMON
What, a knave too?

APEMANTUS
If thou didst put this sour cold habit on 240 To castigate thy pride, 'twere well; but thou
Dost it enforcèdly. Thou'dst courtier be again
Wert thou not beggar. Willing misery
Outlives uncertain pomp, is crowned before.
245 The one is filling still, never complete;
The other at high wish. Best state, contentless,
Hath a distracted and most wretched being,
Worse than the worst, content.
Thou shouldst desire to die, being miserable.

TIMON
250 Not by his breath that is more miserable.
Thou art a slave whom fortune's tender arm
With favour never clasped, but bred a dog.
Hadst thou like us from our first swathe proceeded
The sweet degrees that this brief world affords
255 To such as may the passive drudges of it
Freely command, thou wouldst have plunged thyself
In general riot, melted down thy youth
In different beds of lust, and never learned
The icy precepts of respect, but followed 260 The sugared game before thee. But myself,
Who had the world as my confectionery,
The mouths, the tongues, the eyes and hearts of men
At duty, more than I could frame employment,
That numberless upon me stuck, as leaves
265 Do on the oak, have with one winter's brush
Fell from their boughs, and left me open, bare
For every storm that blows—I to bear this,
That never knew but better, is some burden.
Thy nature did commence in sufferance, time
Hath made thee hard in't. Why shouldst thou hate 270 men?
They never flattered thee. What hast thou given?

If thou wilt curse, thy father, that poor rag,
Must be thy subject, who in spite put stuff
To some she-beggar and compounded thee
275 Poor rogue hereditary. Hence, be gone.
If thou hadst not been born the worst of men
Thou hadst been a knave and flatterer.
APEMANTUS Art thou proud yet?
TIMON Ay, that I am not thee.
APEMANTUS I that I was 280 No prodigal.
TIMON I that I am one now.
Were all the wealth I have shut up in thee
I'd give thee leave to hang it. Get thee gone.
That the whole life of Athens were in this!
Thus would I eat it.
[He bites the root]
APEMANTUS [offering food]
285 Here, I will mend thy feast.
TIMON
First mend my company: take away thyself.
APEMANTUS
So I shall mend mine own by th' lack of thine.
TIMON
'Tis not well mended so, it is but botched;
If not, I would it were.
APEMANTUS What wouldst thou have to Athens?
TIMON
290 Thee thither in a whirlwind. If thou wilt, Tell them there I have gold. Look, so I have.
APEMANTUS
Here is no use for gold.
TIMON The best and truest,
For here it sleeps and does no hired harm.
APEMANTUS Where liest a-nights, Timon?
TIMON Under that's above me. Where feed'st thou a-days,
295 Apemantus?
APEMANTUS Where my stomach finds meat; or rather,
where I eat it.
TIMON Would poison were obedient, and knew my mind!
APEMANTUS Where wouldst thou send it?
300 TIMON To sauce thy dishes.
APEMANTUS The middle of humanity thou never knewest, but the extremity of both ends. When thou wast in thy gilt and thy perfume, they mocked thee for too much curiosity; in thy rags thou know'st none, but art

(b) desire for novelty despised for the contrary. There's a medlar for thee; eat it.

TIMON On what I hate I feed not.

APEMANTUS Dost hate a medlar?

310 TIMON Ay, though it look like thee.

APEMANTUS An thou'dst hated meddlers sooner, thou shouldst have loved thyself better now. What man didst thou ever know unthrift that was beloved after his means?

315 TIMON Who, without those means thou talk'st of, didst thou ever know beloved?

APEMANTUS Myself.

TIMON I understand thee: thou hadst some means to keep a dog.

320 APEMANTUS What things in the world canst thou nearest compare to thy flatterers?

TIMON Women nearest; but men, men are the things themselves. What wouldst thou do with the world, Apemantus, if it lay in thy power?

325 APEMANTUS Give it the beasts, to be rid of the men.

TIMON Wouldst thou have thyself fall in the confusion of men, and remain a beast with the beasts?

APEMANTUS Ay, Timon.

TIMON A beastly ambition, which the gods grant thee t'attain to. If thou wert the lion, the fox would beguile thee. If thou wert the lamb, the fox would eat thee. If thou wert the fox, the lion would suspect thee when peradventure thou wert accused by the ass. If thou wert the ass, thy dullness would torment thee, and still thou lived'st but as a breakfast to the wolf. If thou wert the wolf, thy greediness would afflict thee, and oft thou shouldst hazard thy life for thy dinner. Wert thou the unicorn, pride and wrath would confound thee, and make thine own self the conquest of thy fury. Wert thou a bear, thou wouldst be killed by the horse. Wert thou a horse, thou wouldst be seized by the leopard. Wert thou a leopard, thou wert german to the lion, and the spots of thy kindred were jurors on thy life; all thy safety were remotion, and thy defence absence.

345 What beast couldst thou be that were not subject to a beast? And what a beast art thou already, that seest not thy loss in transformation!

APEMANTUS If thou couldst please me with speaking to me, thou mightst have hit upon it here. The commonwealth of Athens is become a forest of beasts.

350

TIMON How, has the ass broke the wall, that thou art out of the city?

APEMANTUS Yonder comes a poet and a painter. The plague of company light upon thee! I will fear to catch it, and give way. When I know not what else to do, I'll see thee again. 355 TIMON When there is nothing living but thee, thou shalt be welcome. I had rather be a beggar's dog than Apemantus.

APEMANTUS
Thou art the cap of all the fools alive. 360

TIMON
Would thou wert clean enough to spit upon.

APEMANTUS
A plague on thee! Thou art too bad to curse.

TIMON
All villains that do stand by thee are pure.

APEMANTUS
There is no leprosy but what thou speak'st.

365 TIMON If I name thee.
I'll beat thee, but I should infect my hands.

APEMANTUS
I would my tongue could rot them off.

TIMON
Away, thou issue of a mangy dog!
Choler does kill me that thou art alive.
I swoon to see thee. 370

APEMANTUS Would thou wouldst burst!

TIMON Away, thou tedious rogue!
[He throws a stone at Apemantus]

I am sorry I shall lose a stone by thee.

APEMANTUS Beast!

375 TIMON Slave!
APEMANTUS Toad!
TIMON Rogue, rogue, rogue!
I am sick of this false world, and will love naught
But even the mere necessities upon't.
Then, Timon, presently prepare thy grave.
Lie where the light foam of the sea may beat 380 Thy gravestone daily. Make thine epitaph,
That death in me at others' lives may laugh.
[He looks on the gold]

O, thou sweet king-killer, and dear divorce
'Twi'x natural son and sire; thou bright defiler
385 Of Hymen's purest bed; thou valiant Mars;
Thou ever young, fresh, loved, and delicate wooer,

306 medlar A kind of apple eaten when rotten; with a pun in 14.311 on meddlers.

313 unthrift good-for-nothing

334 dullness stupidity

still all the time

337-9 Wert...fury The legendary way to catch a unicorn was to stand in front of a tree then step aside when it charged, so that its horn stuck in the tree-trunk.

340 bear (supposedly hated by horses)

342 german closely related

343 spots crimes (of the lion; quibbling on the leopard's physical spots)

344 were remotion would lie in keeping well away

347 in transformation i.e. if you were transformed

353 Yonder...painter This disconnected remark anticipates the episode at the beginning of Sc. 15, which is not imminent. Apemantus might be warning that other asses have broken the walls of Athens and are on their way, but the comment may have been deleted by the time the play reached the stage.

360 cap foremost example (punning on the fool's coxcomb)

386 Hymen's (god of marriage)

387 delicate graceful

- Whose blush doth thaw the consecrated snow
That lies on Dian's lap; thou visible god,
390 That sold'st rest close impossibilities
And mak'st them kiss, that speak'st with every tongue
To every purpose; O thou touch of hearts:
Think thy slave man rebels, and by thy virtue
Set them into confounding odds, that beasts
May have the world in empire.
- 395 APEMANTUS Would 'twere so,
But not till I am dead. I'll say thou'st gold.
Thou wilt be thronged to shortly.
- TIMON Thronged to?
APEMANTUS Ay.
- TIMON
Thy back, I prithee.
- APEMANTUS Live, and love thy misery.
- TIMON
Long live so, and so die. I am quit.
Enter [at a distance] the Banditti, [Thieves]
- 400 APEMANTUS
More things like men. Eat, Timon, and abhor them. Exit
- FIRST THIEF Where should he have this gold? It is some poor fragment, some slender ort of his remainder. The mere want of gold and the falling-from of his friends drove him into this melancholy.
- 405 SECOND THIEF It is noised he hath a mass of treasure.
- THIRD THIEF Let us make the assay upon him. If he care not for't, he will supply us easily. If he covetously reserve it, how shall 's get it?
- SECOND THIEF True, for he bears it not about him; 'tis hid.
- 410 FIRST THIEF Is not this he?
- OTHER THIEVES Where?
- SECOND THIEF 'Tis his description.
- THIRD THIEF He, I know him.
- ALL THIEVES [coming forward] Save thee, Timon.
- 415 TIMON Now, thieves.
- ALL THIEVES
Soldiers, not thieves.
- TIMON Both, too, and women's sons.
- ALL THIEVES
We are not thieves, but men that much do want.
- TIMON
Your greatest want is, you want much of meat.
Why should you want? Behold, the earth hath roots.
Within this mile break forth a hundred springs. 420
The oaks bear mast, the briars scarlet hips.
The bounteous housewife nature on each bush
Lays her full mess before you. Want? Why want?
- FIRST THIEF
We cannot live on grass, on berries, water,
As beasts and birds and fishes. 425
- TIMON
Nor on the beasts themselves, the birds and fishes;
You must eat men. Yet thanks I must you con
That you are thieves professed, that you work not
In holier shapes; for there is boundless theft
In limited professions. [Giving gold] Rascal thieves, 430
Here's gold. Go suck the subtle blood o' th' grape
Till the high fever seethe your blood to froth,
And so scape hanging. Trust not the physician;
His antidotes are poison, and he slays
More than you rob. Take wealth and lives together— 435
Do, villains, do, since you protest to do't,
Like workmen. I'll example you with thievery.
The sun's a thief, and with his great attraction
Robs the vast sea. The moon's an arrant thief,
And her pale fire she snatches from the sun. 440
The sea's a thief, whose liquid surge resolves
The moon into salt tears. The earth's a thief,
That feeds and breeds by a composture stol'n
From gen'ral excrement. Each thing's a thief.
The laws, your curb and whip, in their rough power 445
Has unchecked theft. Love not yourselves. Away,
Rob one another. There's more gold. Cut throats;
All that you meet are thieves. To Athens go,
Break open shops; nothing can you steal
But thieves do lose it. Steal less for this I give you, 450
And gold confound you howsoe'er. Amen.
- THIRD THIEF He's almost charmed me from my profession
by persuading me to it.

389 Dian's Roman goddess of chastity.

There is a suggestion too of Danaë, who was seduced by Jupiter in a shower of gold.

390 close closely (qualifying sold'st rest)392 touch touchstone393 virtue power394 confounding odds mutually-destructive strife399.1 Enter... Contrast 14.494-5.417 much do want are very needy421 mast acorns (fed to swine)423 mess serving of food427 you con express to you430 limited professions (a) regulated trades (b) less forthright admissions431 subtle (a) fine, delicate (b) treacherous
431 blood o' th' grape wine. But the image of sucking blood suggests a leech (a) in the pejorative sense 'extortioner', (b) asused in medical blood-letting (the blood-sucker here doesn't cure the patient but contracts a high fever).435 Take wealth and lives steal wealth and end lives438 attraction power of drawing up moisture441-2 The... tears Alludes to the belief that tides were caused by the sea drawing moisture from the moon.441 resolves melts, dissolves
446 Has unchecked theft have unlimited power to steal450 for on account of451 howsoe'er whatever you do

- FIRST THIEF 'Tis in the malice of mankind that he thus 455 advises us, not to have us thrive in our mystery.
SECOND THIEF I'll believe him as an enemy, and give over my trade.
FIRST THIEF Let us first see peace in Athens. There is no time so miserable but a man may be true.
Exeunt Thieves
- Enter the Steward to Timon*
- 460 STEWARD O you gods!
Is yon despised and ruinous man my lord,
Full of decay and failing? O monument
And wonder of good deeds evilly bestowed!
What an alteration of honour has desp'rate want made!
465 What viler thing upon the earth than friends,
Who can bring noblest minds to basest ends!
How rarely does it meet with this time's guise,
When man was wished to love his enemies!
Grant I may ever love and rather woo
470 Those that would mischief me than those that do!
He's caught me in his eye. I will present
My honest grief unto him, and as my lord
Still serve him with my life.—My dearest master.
- TIMON
Away! What art thou?
STEWARD Have you forgot me, sir?
TIMON
475 Why dost ask that? I have forgot all men;
Then if thou grant'st thou'rt a man, I have forgot thee.
- STEWARD
An honest poor servant of yours.
- TIMON Then I know thee not.
I never had honest man about me; ay, all
I kept were knaves to serve in meat to villains.
- 480 STEWARD The gods are witness,
Ne'er did poor steward wear a truer grief
For his undone lord than mine eyes for you.
- TIMON
What, dost thou weep? Come nearer then; I love thee
Because thou art a woman, and disclaim'st
485 Flinty mankind whose eyes do never give
But thorough lust and laughter. Pity's sleeping.
Strange times, that weep with laughing, not with weeping!
- STEWARD
I beg of you to know me, good my lord,
T'accept my grief,
[He offers his money]
and whilst this poor wealth lasts
To entertain me as your steward still. 490
- TIMON Had I a steward
So true, so just, and now so comfortable?
It almost turns my dangerous nature mild.
Let me behold thy face. Surely this man
Was born of woman. 495
Forgive my general and exceptless rashness,
You perpetual sober gods! I do proclaim
One honest man—mistake me not, but one,
No more, I pray—and he's a steward.
How fain would I have hated all mankind, 500
And thou redeem'st thyself! But all save thee
I fell with curses.
Methinks thou art more honest now than wise,
For by oppressing and betraying me
Thou mightst have sooner got another service; 505
For many so arrive at second masters
Upon their first lord's neck. But tell me true—
For I must ever doubt, though ne'er so sure—
Is not thy kindness subtle, covetous,
If not a usuring kindness, and, as rich men deal gifts, 510
Expecting in return twenty for one?
- STEWARD
No, my most worthy master, in whose breast
Doubt and suspect, alas, are placed too late.
You should have feared false times when you did feast.
Suspect still comes where an estate is least. 515
That which I show, heaven knows, is merely love,
Duty and zeal to your unmatched mind,
Care of your food and living; and, believe it,
My most honoured lord,
For any benefit that points to me, 520
Either in hope or present, I'd exchange
For this one wish: that you had power and wealth
To requite me by making rich yourself.
- TIMON
Look thee, 'tis so. Thou singly honest man,
[He gives Steward gold]
Here, take. The gods, out of my misery, 525

494–5 Surely... woman From Job 14:1, where 'man that is born of woman' describes the human condition. Timon is surprised that being born of woman has, in the Steward's case, left traces in his 'womanish' behaviour.

496 exceptless indiscriminate

498–9 One... steward The Steward contrasts with the biblical Unjust Steward, who is wise but worldly and dishonest
(Luke 16:1–9).

513 suspect suspicion

515 still always

Has sent thee treasure. Go, live rich and happy,
 But thus conditioned: thou shalt build from men,
 Hate all, curse all, show charity to none,
 But let the famished flesh slide from the bone
 530 Ere thou relieve the beggar. Give to dogs
 What thou deniest to men. Let prisons swallow 'em, Debts wither 'em to nothing; be men like blasted
 woods,
 And may diseases lick up their false bloods.
 And so farewell, and thrive.

STEWARD

535 O, let me stay and comfort you, my master.
 TIMON If thou hat'st curses,
 Stay not. Fly whilst thou art blest and free.
 Ne'er see thou man, and let me ne'er see thee.
Exeunt [Timon into his cave, Steward another way]

Sc. 15 Enter Poet and Painter

PAINTER As I took note of the place, it cannot be far where he abides.

POET What's to be thought of him? Does the rumour hold for true that he's so full of gold?

5 PAINTER Certain. Alcibiades reports it. Phrynia and Timandra had gold of him. He likewise enriched poor straggling soldiers with great quantity. 'Tis said he gave unto his steward a mighty sum.

10 POET Then this breaking of his has been but a try for his friends?

PAINTER Nothing else. You shall see him a palm in Athens again, and flourish with the highest. Therefore 'tis not amiss we tender our loves to him in this supposed 15 distress of his. It will show honestly in us, and is very likely to load our purposes with what they travail for, if it be a just and true report that goes of his having.

POET What have you now to present unto him?

PAINTER Nothing at this time, but my visitation; only I will promise him an excellent piece.

20 POET I must serve him so too, tell him of an intent that's coming toward him.

PAINTER Good as the best.

Enter Timon from his cave, [unobserved]

25 Promising is the very air o' th' time; it opens the eyes of expectation. Performance is ever the duller for his act, and but in the plainer and simpler kind of people the deed of saying is quite out of use. To promise is most courtly and fashionable. Performance is a kind of will or testament which argues a great sickness in his judgement that makes it.

TIMON [aside] Excellent workman, thou canst not paint a man so bad as is thyself. 30

POET [to Painter] I am thinking what I shall say I have provided for him. It must be a personating of himself, a satire against the softness of prosperity, with a discovery of the infinite flatteries that follow youth and opulency. 35

TIMON [aside] Must thou needs stand for a villain in thine own work? Wilt thou whip thine own faults in other men? Do so; I have gold for thee.

POET [to Painter] Nay, let's seek him.
 Then do we sin against our own estate 40
 When we may profit meet and come too late.

PAINTER True.

When the day serves, before black-cornered night,
 Find what thou want'st by free and offered light.
 Come. 45

TIMON [aside]

I'll meet you at the turn. What a god's gold,
 That he is worshipped in a baser temple
 Than where swine feed!

'Tis thou that rigg'st the barque and plough'st the foam,

50 Settlest admirèd reverence in a slave.

To thee be worship, and thy saints for aye
 Be crowned with plagues, that thee alone obey.

Fit I meet them.

[He comes forward to them]

POET

Hail, worthy Timon!

PAINTER

Our late noble master!

TIMON

Have I once lived to see two honest men? 55

POET

Sir, having often of your open bounty tasted,
 Hearing you were retired, your friends fall'n off,

Whose thankless natures, O abhorrèd spirits,
 Not all the whips of heaven are large enough—

60 What, to you,

Whose star-like nobleness gave life and influence

To their whole being! I am rapt, and cannot cover

527 from away from

532 be men let men be blasted blighted, withered

533 lick up consume (and hinting that the diseases are like a dog licking a sick man's sores or wounds)

538.1 Exeunt... way Whether there is a scene-break depends on whether there is an on-stage cave property. If Timon remains visible in his cave, there is continuity of action, and he need not come forward again until after 15.29, as in the 1623 text.

15.9 breaking bankruptcy

11-12 a... highest Alludes to Psalms

92:11: 'The righteous shall flourish like a palm-tree'.

15 travail both 'labour' and 'travel'

16 having possessions

23-9 Promising... it See note to 14.73.

The monstrous bulk of this ingratitude
 With any size of words.

65 TIMON
 Let it go naked; men may see't the better.
 You that are honest, by being what you are
 Make them best seen and known.

PAINTER He and myself
 Have travelled in the great show'r of your gifts,
 And sweetly felt it.

TIMON Ay, you are honest men.

70 PAINTER
 We are hither come to offer you our service.

TIMON
 Most honest men. Why, how shall I requite you?
 Can you eat roots and drink cold water? No.

POET and PAINTER
 What we can do we'll do to do you service.

TIMON
 You're honest men. You've heard that I have gold, 75 I am sure you have. Speak truth; you're honest men.

PAINTER
 So it is said, my noble lord, but therefor
 Came not my friend nor I.

TIMON
 Good honest men. [To Painter] Thou draw'st a counterfeit
 Best in all Athens; thou'rt indeed the best;
 Thou counterfeit'st most lively.

80 PAINTER So so, my lord.

TIMON
 E'en so, sir, as I say. [To Poet] And for thy fiction,
 Why, thy verse swells with stuff so fine and smooth
 That thou art even natural in thine art.
 But for all this, my honest-natured friends,
 85 I must needs say you have a little fault.
 Marry, 'tis not monstrous in you, neither wish I
 You take much pains to mend.

POET and PAINTER Beseech your honour
 To make it known to us.

TIMON You'll take it ill.

POET and PAINTER Most thankfully, my lord.

90 TIMON Will you indeed?

POET and PAINTER Doubt it not, worthy lord.

TIMON
 There's never a one of you but trusts a knave
 That mightily deceives you.

POET and PAINTER Do we, my lord?

TIMON
 Ay, and you hear him cog, see him dissemble,
 Know his gross patchery, love him, feed him,
 95 Keep in your bosom; yet remain assured
 That he's a made-up villain.

PAINTER I know none such, my lord.

POET Nor I.

TIMON
 Look you, I love you well. I'll give you gold,
 100 Rid me these villains from your companies.
 Hang them or stab them, drown them in a draught,
 Confound them by some course, and come to me,
 I'll give you gold enough.

POET and PAINTER
 Name them, my lord, let's know them.

TIMON
 You that way and you this, but two in company;
 105 Each man apart, all single and alone,
 Yet an arch-villain keeps him company.
 [To Painter] If where thou art two villains shall not be, Come not near him. [To Poet] If thou wouldst not reside
 But where one villain is, then him abandon. 110 Hence; pack! [Striking him] There's gold. You came for gold, ye slaves.
 [Striking Painter] You have work for me; there's payment. Hence!
 [Striking Poet] You are an alchemist; make gold of that.
 Out, rascal dogs!

Exeunt [Poet and Painter one way, Timon into his cave]

Enter Steward and two Senators

Sc. 16

STEWARD
 It is in vain that you would speak with Timon,
 For he is set so only to himself
 That nothing but himself which looks like man
 Is friendly with him.

FIRST SENATOR Bring us to his cave.
 It is our part and promise to th' Athenians
 5 To speak with Timon.

SECOND SENATOR At all times alike
 Men are not still the same. 'Twas time and griefs
 That framed him thus. Time with his fairer hand
 Offering the fortunes of his former days,
 The former man may make him. Bring us to him,
 10 And chance it as it may.

STEWARD Here is his cave.
 [Calling] Peace and content be here! Lord Timon,
 Timon,

64 size (a) quantity (b) glutinous wash applied to prepare paper or canvas for painting

94 cog cheat, flatter

95 patchery knavery

97 made-up complete

102 draught cesspool

5 our...promise the role we promised to play

SECOND SENATOR

And enter in our ears like great triumphers
In their applauding gates.

TIMON

Commend me to them,
And tell them that to ease them of their griefs,
Their fears of hostile strokes, their achès, losses,
85 Their pangs of love, with other incident throes
That nature's fragile vessel doth sustain
In life's uncertain voyage, I will some kindness do them.

I'll teach them to prevent wild Alcibiades' wrath.

FIRST SENATOR [aside]

I like this well; he will return again.

TIMON

90 I have a tree which grows here in my close
That mine own use invites me to cut down,
And shortly must I fell it. Tell my friends,
Tell Athens, in the sequence of degree
From high to low throughout, that whoso please
95 To stop affliction, let him take his haste,
Come hither ere my tree hath felt the axe,
And hang himself. I pray you do my greeting.

STEWARD [to Senators]

Trouble him no further. Thus you still shall find him.

TIMON

100 Come not to me again, but say to Athens,
Timon hath made his everlasting mansion
Upon the beachèd verge of the salt flood,
Who once a day with his embossèd froth
The turbulent surge shall cover. Thither come,
And let my gravestone be your oracle.
105 Lips, let four words go by, and language end.
What is amiss, plague and infection mend.
Graves only be men's works, and death their gain.
Sun, hide thy beams. Timon hath done his reign.

Exit [into his cave]

FIRST SENATOR

110 His discontents are unremovably
Coupled to nature.

SECOND SENATOR

Our hope in him is dead. Let us return,
And strain what other means is left unto us

In our dear peril.

FIRST SENATOR

It requires swift foot.

Exeunt

Enter two other Senators, with a Messenger

Sc. 17

THIRD SENATOR

Thou hast painfully discovered. Are his files
As full as thy report?

MESSENGER

I have spoke the least.
Besides, his expedition promises
Present approach.

FOURTH SENATOR

We stand much hazard if they bring not Timon.

5

MESSENGER

I met a courier, one mine ancient friend,
Whom, though in general part we were opposed,
Yet our old love made a particular force
And made us speak like friends. This man was riding
10 From Alcibiades to Timon's cave
With letters of entreaty which imported
His fellowship i'th' cause against your city,
In part for his sake moved.

Enter the other Senators

THIRD SENATOR

Here come our brothers.

FIRST SENATOR

No talk of Timon; nothing of him expect.
The enemy's drum is heard, and fearful scouring
15 Doth choke the air with dust. In, and prepare.
Ours is the fall, I fear, our foe's the snare. Exeunt

Enter a Soldier, in the woods, seeking Timon

Sc. 18

Who's here? Speak, ho! No answer? What is this?

Some beast read this; there does not live a man.'
5 Dead, sure, and this his grave. What's on this tomb
I cannot read. The character I'll take with wax.
Our captain hath in every figure skill,
An aged interpreter, though young in days.
Before proud Athens he's set down by this,
Whose fall the mark of his ambition is. Exit 10

 ator or Soldier; a Stranger; a Thief

65.1 Exeunt... walls The descent from the upper acting area was by offstage ladders in the Jacobean theatre. So unless the Senators ignore Alcibiades they must exit, and unless there is an awkward break in the action they must be offstage when the epitaph is read. A flourish of trumpets would drown the noise of the Senators descending, and might even allow time for them to enter ceremonially before the Soldier arrives.
 67 hem edge

68 insculpture inscription
 71-4 Here... gait These are two separate epitaphs in Plutarch, one of them not written by Timon. They conflict in that 'Seek not my name' is contradicted in 'Here lie I, Timon'. Counting the one in Sc. 18, there are three epitaphs in all. The compulsion to repeat or rework may be attributed to either Timon or Shakespeare.
 72 caitiffs wretches, villains

77 brains' flow i.e. tears (likewise droplets)
 78 niggard nature parsimonious human nature (compared unfavourably with vast Neptune, 19.79)
conceit ingenuity, imagination
 83 the olive (as emblem of peace)
 84 stint put an end to 85 leech physician. Also the worm used in medical blood-letting; hence 'cure'. War purges corruption by spilling blood, peace draws out the blood of violence.

THE PURITAN WIDOW or THE PURITAN or THE WIDOW OF WATLING STREET

Edited by Donna B. Hamilton

IN The Puritan Widow nearly every character is an object of Middleton's satire. The Widow and her daughters want money, influence, and autonomy, and men too if men will facilitate these other projects; the citizen scholar George Pieboard, finding the world inhospitable to learning, turns his wit to the manipulation and deceit of others; and the nobleman 'from the court' who denounces the women for choosing unworthy husbands orders them to marry three knights whose base motives and shallow worth Middleton has also already exposed. But however unrelenting and comprehensive the play's satire, the main targets are Puritans and Catholics.

Catholics, or 'Romanists', were people who adhered to the beliefs and practices in place prior to the Protestant Reformation. They revered images, followed the rituals of seven sacraments, believed that good deeds were efficacious for salvation, and believed that the Pope in Rome (not a secular ruler) was the head of the church. Puritans were those Protestants who, discontent with the degree to which England had broken from Rome, continued to agitate to one degree or another for further reform to liturgical practices and even church government.

These issues are full of implication, not just for assessing the satire of The Puritan Widow, but also for identifying Middleton ideologically, and even for developing a secure sense of the Middleton canon. A case in point is the position that Margot Heinemann took in regard to Middleton's authorship of The Puritan Widow. The play, usually dated late 1606, was identified, in 1607, on the title-page of the first printed edition as having been written by 'W. S.'; the play was included in the Shakespeare folios of 1664 and 1685. No modern scholar thinks that Shakespeare was the author. Although a majority of scholars have, for more than a century, assigned the play to Middleton, Heinemann challenged that attribution on the grounds that it satirizes moderate Puritans, a stance she found to be inconceivable for Middleton. More recently, N. W. Bawcutt has argued that Middleton's persistent satire of Puritans might well provide our best evidence that the label 'Puritan' is not a satisfactory one for Middleton himself.

An alternative to that line of inquiry resides in locating the historical circumstances of 1606–7 that made all Puritanism, and especially its more extreme forms, subject to attack. Early in James I's reign, two sets of events conspired to become the shaping circumstances for Protestant politics and rhetoric: the Gunpowder Plot and the institution of an oath of allegiance directed at Catholics. Prior to the Gunpowder Plot, it had only been clear that the focus of James I's ecclesiastical policy would be to ensure a continuation of Elizabeth I's hard line on conformity. Following the Hampton Court Conference, 12–18 January 1604, a deadline of 30 November 1604 was established for ministers to subscribe to the new Canons. Deprivations of some eighty non-subscribing Protestant ministers followed in 1605. Then, on 5 November 1605, the Jesuit attempt to blow up King and Parliament was discovered, an event that refocused the attention of the nation on Catholics as the common enemy. In reaction, the 1605 session of Parliament passed four statutes: an act to declare 5 November an annual day of thanksgiving, an act to punish those involved in the Plot, and two acts setting forth measures for 'discovering and repressing' and 'avoiding the dangers that may grow by' popish recusants.

Included in these statutes was a provision requiring Catholics to take an oath of allegiance in which they swore loyalty to the king as their temporal ruler and swore that the pope did not possess a power to depose temporal rulers. Published on 25 June 1606, this oath prompted a reply in the form of a breve or letter from Pope Paul V, in which he ordered English Catholics not to take the oath. When George Blackwell, head of the English Catholics, countered by taking the oath and advising others to do the same, the Pope repeated, in a breve dated 23 August 1607, his first order. This sequence of events touched off an international paper war which ran for more than a decade, and which prompted James I to write at such length defending the oath that ultimately those writings would comprise nearly three-quarters of his corpus of political writing.

Whatever the long-range effect of the Plot and the oath, the immediate effect was to produce an increased sense of the need for solidarity among Protestants. Religious dissenters tended to fall silent, and even those who opposed James I on other issues defended his position on the Plot and the oath. One aspect of that defence was the publication, in 1606, of the account of the trial of Father Henry Garnet, the chief suspect in the Plot. Another aspect involved the reprinting of old books, as well as the production of new books, which defined England's anti-Catholicism. A Latin edition of John Jewel's Apology, or Answer in Defence of the Church of England (not printed since 1599), was reissued in 1606. James I's first work on the oath, Triplici nodo, triplex cuneus, or an Apologie for the oath of allegiance, was published in 1607. In 1609,

James I reissued his Apology for the oath of allegiance, along with a lengthy preface entitled, A premonition to all most mighty monarchs; other works included Lancelot Andrewes's Tortura torti (1609), William Barlow's Answer to a Catholic Englishman (1609), and John Donne's Pseudo-martyr (1610). There also appeared new editions of John Foxe's Acts and monuments (1610) and of Spenser's Faerie Queene (1609). Because literary scholars have tended to pay more attention to the Gunpowder Plot than the oath of allegiance, their lists of literary works associated with the Plot often exclude by default any acknowledgement that those texts may have a broader frame of reference. Works in that category include John Fletcher's Philaster (1609), Shakespeare's Cymbeline (1610), and Ben Jonson's Catiline (1611), all written in the wake of James I's second round of writing on the oath.

Also belonging to this group are Thomas Dekker's Whore of Babylon and Middleton's The Puritan Widow, both of which were printed in 1607. As sometime collaborators and as writers whose livelihood depended on their ability to capture the contemporary moment, Middleton and Dekker have much in common. In their responses to the Plot and the oath controversy, however, they took advantage of different rhetorical options. Dekker replicated the traditional anti-Catholic narrative encapsulated in Protestant readings of Revelation, depicting—as had Foxe in Acts and Monuments and Spenser in Book 1 of The Faerie Queene—the Roman church as the Whore of Babylon, who usurps the power and place of true religion. In her discussion of The Whore of Babylon as a Gunpowder Plot play, Julia Gasper has emphasized its representation of James I as a militant king protecting the church against Antichrist.

Middleton chose a different approach. He invented for The Puritan Widow a plot that associated Catholic practices with Puritan practices. This technique for demonizing both groups had been popular with the conformist church establishment and had been adopted by James I, who disliked the challenges that Puritan reform interests posed to hierarchy. After the Gunpowder Plot, a time when solidarity among Protestants was popular, this technique could be used to present the implications of the Catholic threat with unusual economy.

Examples from the writings of James I can illustrate how this rhetoric of association worked. Aiming to construct the conformist position as the broad and inclusive centre, James I had, beginning in Basilikon Doron (1599), represented nonconformity as a monolithic group of Puritan extremists and, at the same time, associated them with papists. Puritan and papist together thus became the extremes that should be avoided. In Basilikon Doron, reprinted at the time of his accession, he had described Puritans as the 'very pests in the church and commonweal, whom . . . neither oaths or promises bind', and warned his son to beware of 'both the extremities' that currently existed within the English church, 'as well as ye repress the vain Puritan, so not to suffer proud Papal Bishops'. In 1604, at the Hampton Court Conference, he linked Puritan and papist in his statement on the need to operate the ecclesiastical court of High Commission in those dioceses that had 'the most troublesome and refractory persons, either Papists or Puritans'. In his first speech to Parliament, March 1604, he distinguished the true and lawful religion from two other sorts, those 'called Catholics, but truly Papists' and those he would 'call a sect rather than Religion . . . the Puritans and Novelists'. These attitudes continued in his writings on the oath of allegiance, where, in the Premonition, he declared that the 'Jesuits are nothing but Puritan-papists'.

Such constructions could at times be offensive and threatening to Puritans who sought further church reform. Indeed during the 1580s and 1590s, when Archbishop John Whitgift and Richard Bancroft were putting together the machinery to repress dissent in the church, some felt that reforming Protestants were in greater danger from the state than Catholic recusants. The renewed Catholic threat represented by the Gunpowder Plot, however, created a rhetorical situation in which a broader range of Protestants placed a higher value on representing themselves as united.

In The Puritan Widow, Middleton plays to this developing consensus by taking the rhetoric one step beyond merely associating puritan and papist. Satire in The Puritan Widow consists of conflating the two, of literalizing the identification of one with the other, a system whereby Middleton manages, in the same actions, to satirize Puritans while also representing those Catholic practices which Protestants most abhorred. Especially important to this method is his defining all Puritans by the characteristics of those who were most extreme.

The details in the play that most quickly confirm this aspect of his strategy are the names Middleton gives to the servingmen, Nicholas St Antlings and Simon St Mary Overies, as Baldwin Maxwell pointed out some time ago. In these characters' surnames, Middleton names two parishes which, as Paul Seaver has shown, had acquired reputations for radicalism in religion. St Antholin's, on Watling Street within sight of St Paul's Cathedral, was described by William Dugdale as 'the grand nursery whence most of the seditious preachers were after sent abroad throughout England to poison the people with their antimonarchical principles'. Nicholas St Antlings also shares a name with Nicholas Felton, the minister at St Antholin's, 1592–1617, whose services were known as having been conducted in Genevan (that is, presbyterian) fashion. Additionally, the church had a long-established and well-endowed lectureship, by means of which the church could hire lecturers independently of whatever candidate it might receive by virtue of the system of advowson, whereby a patron controlled the parochial living.

The second parish represented in the name of one of the play's characters is St Mary Overie, also known as St Saviour's (and since 1905, as Southwark Cathedral), a parish located not far from the Globe. In 1604, one of its lecturers was Edmund Snape, a presbyterian nonconformist, who was forced out of St Saviour's when the Bishop of Winchester refused to give him a preaching licence. William Symonds, whose last name reappears in Middleton's Simon St Mary Overies, was appointed at St Saviour's in 1605, and cited for nonconformity in 1606; apparently, he then conformed. John Trundle, who also preached at St Saviour's, remained obstinate and refused to conform; in 1608, he would be found preaching to Brownists.

In Middleton's satiric portrait, Puritans are fools and hypocrites; self-righteous about their holiness, they are driven by lust, deceit, materialism, and self-interest. The Widow's former husband may have attended church dutifully, but he also made a career of cheating heirs of their inheritances. Similarly, servant Nicholas insists that he could never stoop to 'steal' Sir Godfrey's gold chain, but, he equivocates, he is quite willing to 'nim', or filch, it. Organizing these characters' overriding materialism around this nimming event, Middleton plays ironically on the equivocating style for which the Jesuit 'plotters' had become so well known. He also plays on the spiritual symbolism of a gold chain. In works belonging to the catena tradition—such as the frequently reprinted The Golden Chain (1591) by the well-known Calvinist theologian William Perkins—the chain was used metaphorically for the way to salvation. These Puritans, however, seek only for lost jewellery.

Through the intrigue surrounding the chain, Middleton develops two other aspects of his play, each of which allows him to sharpen the attack against Puritans while at the same time taking a broad swipe at Catholics. The first of these involves the presence and activities of Corporal Oath; the second involves the conjuring scene in the Widow's private house.

Admittedly, there is more than one way in which oaths are at issue in The Puritan Widow; in the exaggerated self-consciousness with which characters swear without using the name of God, the play refers to the passage in May 1606 of the Act to Restrain Abuses, which forbade players that licence. But the presence of Corporal Oath also introduces the matter of a 'corporal oath', an oath which is sworn with the hand touching a sacred object or the Bible. The 1606 oath of allegiance, the oath ex officio mero, and the oath of supremacy were all corporal oaths. In use in England until 1641, the oath ex officio was the first step in trials held in the ecclesiastical court of High Commission. This oath required defendants to swear to answer all questions truthfully prior to being told of what they were accused. In so far as this oath provided for self-incrimination, it became a chief means for entrapping religious dissenters, whether Catholic or Protestant. During the 1580s and 1590s, Protestant opposition to the oath had taken various forms, including refusal to take it, a step that made it impossible for the ecclesiastical trial to proceed. Looked at from the point of view of Protestant dissenters, the oath ex officio was a powerful symbol of the oppressive tactics of a too-powerful Protestant church hierarchy and of church courts that had overstepped their jurisdiction. From another point of view, the oath ex officio, inasmuch as the nonconformists had organized so much of their cause in opposition to it, had come virtually to represent the lengths to which dissenters would go to avoid proper obedience and uniformity. James I signalled his impatience with such opposition in his reference to Puritans as 'pests . . . whom . . . neither oaths or promises bind' and in his insistence, at the Hampton Court Conference, that the oath ex officio mero be retained for use on both Puritans and Catholics.

In The Puritan Widow, Corporal Oath is 'a vainglorious fellow'; Simon St Mary Overies and Nicholas St Antlings are dismayed at having to deal with him. As Nicholas explains, 'You are the man that we are forbidden to keep company withal' (1.3.1–2). Contemptuous of Nicholas for his obviously Puritan ways, Corporal Oath declares that it is within his skill to get the guilty Captain Idle out of prison. All he needs to succeed is a little help from Nicholas, Idle's cousin. In this combination of actions, wherein Middleton mocks the Puritan's fastidiousness about oaths, as well as his willingness to collude with Corporal Oath to get someone out of prison, Middleton represents Puritans as contemptuous both of the oath ex officio and of the court system that put dissenters in prison. But the situation of Catholics is represented as well, for by the date of the play, the oath of allegiance was being asked of Catholics, who, if they refused, were also subject to the oath ex officio. In fact, to represent a corporal oath on stage at this point in time, just after the oath of allegiance had been instituted, would seem to make this recent oath the first referent, and thus itself a means of making the very strong satiric link between Puritan and Catholic.

The conjuring scene in the Puritan Widow's house offers a similarly conflated satire against both Puritans and Catholics. The conjuring itself gives the scene—at least from the perspective of a seventeenth-century Protestant—a Catholic cast, for one of the central principles of Protestant attacks on the Roman church had been the accusation that Roman beliefs in exorcism and in eucharistic transubstantiation were nothing but hocus-pocus, practices that counterfeited magic and that the English church had rightfully eliminated. By having Captain Idle and George Piebord take up conjuring in the home of a Puritan, Middleton mocks Catholic practices, associates Puritans with Catholic practices, and constructs Puritan households as places inhabited by extremists like the well-known Puritan exorcist John Darrell, whom Richard Bancroft, Bishop of London, and his chaplain Samuel Harsnett had tried by the High Commission in 1598. Moreover, by having Sir Godfrey decide that the best place to conjure will be in the 'private house' of the Widow, Middleton also represents another distinguishing feature of English religious dissident movements. As Christopher Haigh has emphasized, Catholic priests often lived with Catholic gentry, who worshipped in the private chapels of their country houses. Dissident Protestants also used private houses for worship and meetings.

Beginning especially in the 1570s, Protestants interested in further reform had fostered various means of providing the kinds of practices for worship—including preaching and opportunities for discussion and debate—that the reform movements favoured. These practices, as described by Patrick Collinson, proceeded under the labels of ‘prophesyings’, ‘classes’, ‘fasts’, and ‘conventicles’, none of which is a self-explanatory term. ‘Prophesyings’ (which had nothing to do with ‘prophet’ or ‘prophecy’) were public meetings for the education of clergy, intended to assist clergy in their ability to expound scripture and involved discussion of a series of sermons preached on a single text. In 1576, Queen Elizabeth had expressed her dislike of preaching by ordering Archbishop Grindal to suppress prophesying; his protest of this policy led to his being suspended from his archepiscopal powers. The classis movement was another name for the presbyterian movement, which focused its reform effort on replacing the episcopacy with a system that would foster parity among ministers. The ‘classes’ were clandestine meetings of local clergy sympathetic to such reform; a highly organized and widespread practice, classes were often held in someone’s private house. (Edmund Snape, also of St Saviour’s, had been a leader of the Northampton classis.) ‘Fasts’ were opportunities for fasting, but were sometimes held so as to disguise the continuation during these fasts of both prophesyings and classes. ‘Conventicles’ were any illegal private religious meeting. The church hierarchy viewed such meetings as subversive. In 1584, twenty-four articles, developed by Whitgift to assist the High Commissioners who were empowered to seek out nonconforming ministers (and reprinted by Strype), included interrogatories concerning whether ‘you have used private conferences, and assembled or been present at conventicles’ and ‘taken upon you to preach, read or expound the Scriptures as well in public places as in private houses’. In 1593, Parliament passed a bill forbidding conventicles, and the Canons of 1604 (reprinted by Bullard) included the orders that ‘No minister shall preach, or administer the holy communion, in any private house, except it be in times of necessity.’

In The Puritan Widow, Middleton represents Puritans as people who listen to the counterfeit fortune-teller Pieboard ‘prophesy’ (3.5.221) and who gather in a private house where they are taken in by counterfeit conjuring. This representation not only characterizes Puritans as those who take part in forbidden activities, but characterizes the activities as embarrassingly foolish, as the practices of people from whom most people would want to dissociate. This dramatization of utter foolishness is perhaps the distinguishing mark of Middleton’s satire in this play, extending to many scenes not discussed here. One related detail that we might pause over, however, is Pieboard’s convincing the Widow that her Puritan husband is in purgatory, a preposterous notion for her to accept, given that Protestants regarded purgatory as the chief fiction of Roman Catholicism, invented by the pope to increase his power and extort money from the people. But in The Puritan Widow, the identification of Puritan with papist knows no limit.

Because the Children of Paul’s are not known to have played anything after their performance of The Puritan Widow, W. Reavley Gair has speculated that this satirical representation of Puritans contributed to the company’s final demise, sometime after 6 July 1606. Contrary to E. K. Chambers who puts the end of Paul’s Boys in July 1606, Gair considers that a particular objection to the play, a Puritan attack on the stage that cited The Puritan Widow, contributed to the end of Paul’s Boys. Preaching at Paul’s Cross on 14 February 1608, the moderate Puritan minister William Crashaw denounced ‘ungodly plays and interludes’ for bringing ‘religion and holy things upon the stage’ and for having represented ‘hypocrites’ by way of the names Nicholas St Antlings and Simon St Mary Overies, ‘names of two churches of God’.

Leaving the precise date of the end of the company aside, the entire situation may have been more complex and somewhat different than these hypotheses suggest. First, Crashaw’s sermon itself was written partly in response to the Gunpowder Plot (he speaks of the plotter Henry Garnet, who had been executed by hanging in Paul’s churchyard) and in support of James I’s reaction to it; listing the ‘twenty wounds found to be in the body of the present Romish religion’, Crashaw calls on ‘all the kings and princes of the Christian world’ to follow the ‘example of the King and Prince of Great Britain, to hate the whore and make her desolate’. Important for our purposes is Crashaw’s eagerness to position himself on the side of right, but also to take pains to defend the more extreme Puritans who were now especially under attack. Thus, he goes to the defence of St Antholin’s and St Mary Overie, a move we may understand as an attempt to reset the edge of the margins. His extremists are not papists and Puritans, but papists and Brownists.

Second, his complaint against the play includes the charge that it brought ‘religion and holy things upon the stage’, a complaint that surely was motivated in part by the fact that the play’s representation of religion is so farcically funny. However, there is nothing exclusively Puritan in Crashaw’s complaint. To the contrary, that complaint had often been the position of religious authority, of whatever stripe, in regard to the stage, and especially at moments of heightened religious tension or controversy. In 1589, it had been Whitgift and Bancroft, reacting to the playing of Martin Marprelate on the stage, who had decreed that players were not to stage ‘matters of divinity’. Nervous even about representations that satirized their opposition, they tried to shut down all playing of church affairs. As Chambers emphasized, that situation probably caused the demise of Paul's Boys after 1590. In 1599, when Whitgift and Bancroft silenced the satirists, they ended the career of Thomas Nashe (who had earlier written against Marprelate on their behalf); they also ordered Middleton's Microcynicon to be burned. The circumstances of 1606 and 1607 were similarly anxious moments for a church hierarchy already bent on holding the line on religious diversity, and made nervous by the Jesuit plotters. In such a context, satire on matters of divinity might have seemed particularly threatening, especially if an attack against Catholics hit also the very Protestants whom the establishment was trying to bring to heel. A threat of reprisal or actual reprisal against the author or players of such a play is not inconceivable. But whether or not the potential for reprisal was activated, The Puritan Widow stands as another example of Middleton playing with the limits of the possible, politically and theatrically.

Incipit Actus Primus

Enter the Lady Widow Plus, her two daughters Frank and Moll, her husband's brother an old knight Sir Godfrey, with her son and heir Master Edmond, all in mourning apparel, Edmond in a cypress hat. The Widow wringing her hands, and bursting out into a passion, as newly come from the burial of her husband WIDOW O that ever I was born, that ever I was born.

SIR GODFREY Nay, good sister, dear sister, sweet sister, be of good comfort. Show yourself a woman, now or never.

WIDOW O, I have lost the dearest man. I have buried the sweetest husband that ever lay by woman. 5

SIR GODFREY Nay, give him his due. He was indeed an honest, virtuous, discreet wise man. He was my brother, as right, as right.

WIDOW O, I shall never forget him, never forget him. He was a man so well given to a woman—O. 10

SIR GODFREY Nay, but kind sister, I could weep as much as any woman, but alas our tears cannot call him again. Methinks you are well read sister, and know that death is as common as Homo a common name to all men. A

I. I. O. 6 cypress fabric imported from Cyprus and used as a hat band in sign of mourning

- 15 man shall be taken when he's making water. Nay, did not the learned parson Master Pigman tell us even now that all flesh is frail, we are born to die, man has but a time—with suchlike deep and profound persuasions, as he is a rare fellow you know and an excellent reader.
- 20 And, for example (as there are examples abundance), did not Sir Humphrey Bubble die t'other day? There's a lusty widow. Why, she cried not above half an hour, for shame, for shame. Then followed him old Master Fulsome, the usurer. There's a wise widow. Why, she
- 25 cried ne'er a whit at all.
- WIDOW O rank not me with those wicked women. I had a husband out-shined 'em all.
- SIR GODFREY Ay, that he did i'faith, he out-shined 'em all.
- WIDOW [to Edmond] Dost thou stand there and see us all weep and not once shed a tear for thy father's death?
- 30 O thou ungracious son and heir, thou.
- EDMOND Troth, Mother, I should not weep, I'm sure. I am past a child, I hope, to make all my old school fellows laugh at me. I should be mocked, so I should. Pray, let one of my sisters weep for me. I'll laugh as much for her another time.
- WIDOW O thou past-grace thou, out of my sight, thou graceless imp. Thou grievest me more than the death of thy father. O thou stubborn only son, hadst thou such an honest man to thy father that would deceive all the world to get riches for thee, and canst thou not afford a little salt water? He that so wisely did quite overthrow the right heir of those lands, which now you respect not, up every morning betwixt four and five so duly at Westminster Hall every term-time, with all his cards and writings, for thee thou wicked Absalom—O dear husband.
- 45 EDMOND Weep, quoth a? I protest I am glad he's churched, for now he's gone I shall spend in quiet.
- FRANK
- 50 Dear mother, pray cease. Half your tears suffice. 'Tis time for you to take truce with your eyes. Let me weep now.
- WIDOW O such a dear knight, such a sweet husband have I lost, have I lost. If blessed be the corpse the rain rains upon, he had it pouring down.
- 55 SIR GODFREY Sister, be of good cheer. We are all mortal ourselves. I come upon you freshly, I ne'er speak without comfort, hear me what I shall say. My brother has left you wealthy. You're rich.
- 60 WIDOW O.
- SIR GODFREY I say you're rich. You are also fair.
- WIDOW O.
- SIR GODFREY Go to, you're fair, you cannot smother it, beauty will come to light. Nor are your years so far entered with you but that you will be sought after and may very well answer another husband. The world is full of fine gallants, choice enough, sister. For what should we do with all our knights, I pray, but to marry rich widows, wealthy citizens' widows, lusty fair-browed ladies? Go to, be of good comfort, I say. Leave snobbing and weeping. Yet my brother was a kind-hearted man.—[Aside] I would not have the elf see me now.—Come, pluck up a woman's heart. Here stands your daughters, who be well-estated and at maturity will also be inquired after with good husbands. So all these tears shall be soon dried up and a better world than ever. What, woman, you must not weep still. He's dead, he's buried.—[Aside] Yet I cannot choose but weep for him.
- WIDOW
- Marry again? No, let me be buried quick then. And that same part of choir whereon I tread To such intent, O may it be my grave, And that the priest may turn his wedding prayers, E'en with a breath, to funeral dust and ashes. O out of a million of millions, I should ne'er find such a husband. He was unmatched, unmatched. Nothing was too hot nor too dear for me. I could not speak of that one thing that I had not. Beside, I had keys of all, kept all, received all, had money in my purse, spent what I would, went abroad when I would, came home when I would, and did all what I would. O my sweet husband, I shall never have the like.
- 80
- SIR GODFREY Sister, ne'er say so. He was an honest brother of mine, and so, and you may light upon one as honest again, or one as honest again may light upon you, that's the properer phrase indeed.
- 95
- WIDOW
- Never. O, if you love me, urge it not, [She kneels]
- O, may I be the by-word of the world, The common talk at table in the mouth Of every groom and waiter, if e'er more I entertain the carnal suit of man.
- 100
- MOLL [she kneels]
- (Aside) I must kneel down for fashion, too.

45 term-time a term during which law courts are in session cards small sheets of paper; maps; charts
 46 Absalom rebelled against his father David in 2 Samuel 48 churched received some rite of the church, here burial, with pun also on 'churched' as the ceremony (set forth in the Book of Common Prayer and to which nonconformists objected) whereby

a woman who had given birth was ceremonially 'cleansed' upon returning to church following childbirth
 54-5 blest . . . upon proverbial
 68 all our knights the standard joke referring to King James's having created a large number of knights
 71 snobbing sobbing
 72 elf poor devil
 74 well-estated possessed of 'means' or property

 81 choir the upper or eastern part of the church, appropriated to the singers and to the use of those who officiate in the services and separated from other parts by a railing or screen
 87 too hot nor too dear too difficult of attainment (proverbial)
 94, 95 light upon chance upon; also bawdy, referring to male in superior position

FRANK [she kneels]
 (Aside) And I, whom never man as yet hath scaled,
 E'en in this depth of general sorrow, vow
 105 Never to marry to sustain such loss
 As a dear husband seems to be once dead.
 [Mother and daughters rise]

MOLL (aside)
 I loved my father well too, but to say,
 Nay, vow I would not marry for his death,
 Sure I should speak false Latin, should I not?
 110 I'd as soon vow never to come in bed.
 Tut, women must live by th' quick and not by th'
 dead.

WIDOW [drawing out her husband's picture]
 Dear copy of my husband, O let me kiss thee.
 How like him is this model. This brief picture Quickens my tears. My sorrows are renewed
 At this fresh sight.

SIR GODFREY Sister.
 115 WIDOW Away,
 All honesty with him is turned to clay,
 O my sweet husband, O.

FRANK My dear father.
Exeunt [Widow] and Frank

MOLL [aside] Here's a puling indeed. I think my mother 120 weeps for all the women that ever buried husbands, for if from time to time all the widows' tears in England had been bottled up, I do not think all would have filled a three-half-penny bottle. Alas, a small matter bucks a handkerchief, and sometimes the spittle stands to nigh
 St Thomas à Waterings. Well, I can mourn in good 125 sober sort as well as another. But where I spend one tear for a dead father, I could give twenty kisses for a quick husband. Exit

SIR GODFREY [aside] Well, go thy ways old Sir Godfrey, and thou mayst be proud on't. Thou hast a kind loving sister-in-law. How constant, how passionate, how full of 130 April the poor soul's eyes are. Well, I would my brother knew on't. He should then know what a kind wife he had left behind him. Truth an 'twere not for shame that the neighbours at the next garden should hear me, between joy and grief, I should e'en cry outright. Exit 135

EDMOND So, a fair riddance. My father's laid in dust. His coffin and he is like a whole meat pie, and the worms will cut him up shortly. Farewell, old Dad, farewell. I'll be curbed in no more, I. I perceive a son and heir may quickly be made a fool an he will be one, but I'll take 140 another order. Now she would have me weep for him forsooth, and why? Because he cozened the right heir, being a fool, and bestowed those lands upon me his eldest son, and therefore I must weep for him. Ha, ha.
 Why, all the world knows, as long as 'twas his pleasure 145 to get me, 'twas his duty to get for me. I know the law in that point, no attorney can gull me. Well, my uncle is an old ass and an admirable coxcomb. I'll rule the roost myself, I'll be kept under no more. I know what I may do well enough by my father's copy. The law's in mine 150 own hands now. Nay, now I know my strength, I'll be strong enough for my mother, I warrant you. Exit

Enter George Pieboard, a scholar and a citizen, and unto him an old soldier, Peter Skirmish 1.2

PIEBOARD What's to be done now, old lad of war, thou that wert wont to be as hot as a turn-spit, as nimble as a fencer, and as lousy as a schoolmaster, now thou art put to silence like a sectary? War sits now like a justice of peace and does nothing. Where be your muskets,
 5 calivers and hotshots? In Long Lane, at pawn, at pawn.

103 scaled mounted
 112 copy picture
 118 puling feeble wailing; weak querulousness
 122 bucks soaks
 123 spittle saliva, with pun on spittle ('spital' or 'hospital') as place for the reception of the indigent or diseased. The saliva reaches almost to St Thomas à Waterings; or, the hospital for the poor is too close to St Thomas à Waterings.
 124 Thomas à Waterings a spittle in Southwark
 130-1 full of April full of showers of tears
 140-1 take another order pursue another course
 142 cozened cheated
 148 admirable coxcomb conceited fool rule the roost have full sway or authority 150 by my father's copy with my inheritance of my father's holdings by copy or copyhold (copy being a species of estate at will, or customary estate in England, the only visible title to which consists of the copies of the court rolls, which are made out by the steward of the manor)

 1.2.0.1 Pieboard named after George Peele, the words 'peelee' and 'pieboard' being two words for the spadelike implement used for removing bread, pies, and other baking from a baker's oven. Pieboard's two schemes (played out in 3.3 and 3.4, and in 3.4 and 4.2) have analogues in Jests 2 and 11, in Peele's The Merry Conceited Jests of George Peele, entered in the Stationers' Register on 14 December 1605, and printed 1607. Because analogues to the jests can be found in other sources, and because there is also the possibility that Middleton saw Jests in manuscript, Jests itself does not add definitively to an ability to date the play more precisely than 1606. For summaries of the jests as they occur in Peele, see notes to 3.3.92-5, and 3.5.22-8.
a scholar and a citizen like George Peele, who was both a scholar of Oxford and a citizen of London by patrimony from his father
 2 turn-spit one who turns the roasting spit; also a term of contempt

 3 lousy infested by lice
 4 put to silence like a sectary 'Sectary' was a term commonly applied by the church hierarchy to protestant dissenters (nonconformists as well as separatists) that emphasized their setting themselves apart from (sectioning themselves off from) conformists. On 10 April 1593, Parliament passed a bill providing that 'seditious sectaries' who 'dispute the queen's authority in Ecclesiastical Cases... or attend unlawful Conventicles' be treated as harshly as Catholic recusants. The Canons of 1604 took a similarly harsh position.
 5-6 muskets, calivers and hotshots portable firearms listed in descending order according to weight. The 'hotshot', or 'harquebus', had the most rapid fire.
 6 Long Lane a street in London running east from the north-east corner of West Smithfield, a place of fights and executions, and occupied by pawnbrokers, old-clothes dealers, a cattle market, and Bartholomew Fair

10 Now keys are your only guns, key-guns, key-guns, and bawds the gunners, who are your sentinels in peace and stand ready charged to give warning with hems, hums, and pocky coughs. Only your chambers are licensed to play upon you, and drabs enough to give fire to 'em.

15 SKIRMISH Well, I cannot tell, but I am sure it goes wrong with me, for since the cessure of the wars, I have spent above a hundred crowns out o' purse. I have been a soldier anytime this forty years, and now I perceive an old soldier and an old courtier have both one destiny, and, in the end, turn both into hobnails.

PIEBOARD Pretty mystery for a beggar, for indeed a hobnail is the true emblem of a beggar's shoe sole.

20 SKIRMISH I will not say but that war is a blood-sucker, and so, but in my conscience (as there is no soldier but has a piece of one, though it be full of holes like a shot ensign, no matter, 'twill serve to swear by) in my conscience, I think some kind of peace has more hidden oppressions and violent heady sins (though looking of a gentle nature) than a professed war.

PIEBOARD Troth, and for mine own part, I am a poor gentleman and a scholar. I have been matriculated in the university, wore out six gowns there, seen some fools and some scholars, some of the city and some of the country, kept order, went bare-headed over the quadrangle, eat my commons with a good stomach, and battelled with discretion. At last, having done many sleights and tricks to maintain my wit in use (as my brain would never endure me to be idle), I was expelled the university only for stealing a cheese out of Jesus College.

SKIRMISH Is't possible?

PIEBOARD O there was one Welshman, God forgive him, pursued it hard and never left till I turned my staff toward London, where, when I came, all my friends were pit-holed, gone to graves, as indeed there was but a few left before. Then was I turned to my wits to shift in the world, to tower among sons and heirs, and fools and gulls, and ladies' eldest sons, to work upon nothing, to feed out of flint, and ever since has my belly been much beholding to my brain. But now, to return to you, old Skirmish, I say as you say, and for my part wish a turbulency in the world, for I have nothing to lose but my wits, and I think they are as mad as they will be. And to strengthen your argument the more, I say an honest war is better than a bawdy peace as touching my profession. The multiplicity of scholars hatched and nourished in the idle calms of peace makes 'em like fishes, one devour another. And the community of learning has so played upon affections, and thereby almost religion is come about to fantasy and discredited by being too much spoken of in so many and mean mouths. I myself, being a scholar and a graduate, have no other comfort by my learning but the affliction of my words, to know how scholar-like to name what I want,

and can call myself a beggar both in Greek and Latin.
And therefore, not to cog with peace, I'll not be afraid to say, 'tis a great breeder but a barren nourisher, a great getter of children, which must either be thieves or rich men, knaves or beggars.

SKIRMISH Well, would I had been born a knave then when I was born a beggar. For if the truth were known, I think I was begot when my father had never a penny in his purse.

PIEBOARD Puh, faint not, old Skirmish. Let this warrant thee, facilis descensus Avernii, 'tis an easy journey to a knave. Thou may'st be a knave when thou wilt, and peace is a good madam to all other professions and an arrant drab to us. Let us handle her accordingly, and by our wits thrive in despite of her. For since the law lives by quarrels, the courtier by smooth Godmorrows, and every profession makes itself greater by imperfections, why not we then by shifts, wiles, and forgeries? And seeing our brains are our only patrimonies, let's spend with judgement, not like a desperate son and heir, but like a sober and discreet Templar, one that will never march beyond the bounds of his allowance. And for our thriving means, thus, I myself will put on the deceit of a fortune-teller, a fortune-teller.

SKIRMISH Very proper.

7 key-guns small pistols disguised in the form of a key; also, 'key' and 'gun' mean 'penis', puns that appear in some of the names of Southwark brothels—Cross Keys and the Gun—listed in John Stow's Survey of London (1598).

8 sentinels those who keep guard like military sentinels

10 pocky coughs coughs of people infected with the pox, or syphilis chambers ordnance used to fire salutes; male or female servants; male or female genitalia.

11 drabs prostitutes

13 cessure end

17 hobnails nails with massive heads used for protecting the soles of heavy shoes;

fig. persons of low means

23 ensign flag; flag bearer

32 quadrangle identifies the university as Oxford, the usual term at Cambridge being 'court'. Going 'bare-headed over the quadrangle' marks Pieboard as a student of humble status. Middleton matriculated from Queen's College, Oxford, the date of his subscription being 7 April 1598.

commons rations, allowance of victuals
33 battelled was supplied with provisions from the college kitchen and buttery, being one of three grades of students at Oxford (a poor child, a servitor, and a batteler) who did not pay for commons. A batteler was partly self-supporting.

36–9 Jesus College . . . Welshman Jesus College, Oxford, was founded by Queen Elizabeth as a result of a petition by Dr Hugh Price, of Brecon, in 1571, who wished to bestow his estate for the maintenance of scholars from Wales.

42 pit-holed laid in the grave, buried

44 to tower to achieve, compete, stand out

46 feed out of flint to get something out of nothing, as in 'to wring water from a flint'

61 want lack

63 cog with flatter; dissemble

72 facilis descensus Avernii Aeneid 6.126, the descent to the lower world is easy

82 Templar an Inns of Court man

84 thriving means means of thriving

PIEBOARD And you of a figure-caster or a conjuror.
 SKIRMISH A conjuror.
 PIEBOARD Let me alone. I'll instruct you and teach you to 90 deceive all eyes but the devil's.
 SKIRMISH O ay, for I would not deceive him an I could choose of all others.
 PIEBOARD Fear not, I warrant you, and so by those means we shall help one another to patients, as the condition 95 of the age affords creatures enough for cunning to work upon.
 SKIRMISH O wondrous new fools and fresh asses.
 PIEBOARD O fit, fit, excellent.
 SKIRMISH What, in the name of conjuring?
 100 PIEBOARD My memory greets me happily with an admirable subject to graze upon, the Lady Widow, who of late
 I saw weeping in her garden for the death of her husband. Sure sh'as but a waterish soul, and half on't 105 by this time is dropped out of her eyes. Device well-managed may do good upon her. It stands firm, my first practise shall be there.
 SKIRMISH You have my voice, George.
 PIEBOARD She's a grey gull to her brother, a fool to her only son, and an ape to her youngest daughter. I 110 overheard 'em severally, and from their words I'll derive my device. And thou, old Peter Skirmish, shall be my second in all sleights.
 SKIRMISH Ne'er doubt me, George Pieboard, only you must teach me to conjure.
 115 PIEBOARD Puh, I'll perfect thee, Peter.
Enter Captain Idle, pinioned and with a guard of Officers, passeth over the stage
 How now? What's he?
 SKIRMISH O George, this sight kills me. 'Tis my sworn brother, Captain Idle.

PIEBOARD Captain Idle.
 SKIRMISH Apprehended for some felonious act or other. He 120 has started out, he's made a night on't, lacked silver.
 I cannot but commend his resolution. He would not pawn his buff jerkin. I would either some of us were employed or might pitch our tents at usurers' doors to 125 kill the slaves as they peep out at the wicket.
 PIEBOARD Indeed, those are our ancient enemies. They keep our money in their hands and make us to be hanged for robbing of 'em. But come, let's follow after to the prison and know the nature of his offence, and what we can stead him in he shall be sure of. And I'll uphold 130 it still that a charitable knave is better than a soothing puritan. Exeunt

*Enter at one door Corporal Oath, a vainglorious fellow, and at the other, three of the Widow Puritan's servingmen, Nicholas St Antlings, Simon
 St Mary Overies, and Frailty, in black scurvy mourning coats and books at their girdles, as coming from church. They meet.* 1.3

NICHOLAS What, Corporal Oath? I am sorry we have met with you next our hearts. You are the man that we are forbidden to keep company withal. We must not swear,
 I can tell you, and you have the name for swearing.
 5 SIMON Ay, Corporal Oath, I would you would do so much as forsake us, sir. We cannot abide you, we must not be seen in your company.
 FRAILTY There is none of us, I can tell you, but shall be soundly whipped for swearing.
 10 CORPORAL Why, how now, we three, puritanical scrape-shoes, flesh o' good Fridays, a hand.
 SIMON, FRAILTY, and NICHOLAS O.

87 figure-caster a pretender to astrology
 ('figure' is a horoscope) conjuror A statute passed by Parliament in 1604 forbade conjuration and witchcraft (see 3.5.134-5, and 3.4 and 4.2 passim).
 103 waterish soul enfeebled judgement
 108 grey gull old fool
 110 severally one after another 115.1 pinioned disabled by having the arms bound; shackled
 121 started out...made a night on't cant phrases for 'robbed on the highway' 123 buff jerkin leather jacket. To refuse to pawn it was to be ready to fight for a livelihood if there was no other way to gain one.
 125 wicket small door or gate in or beside a larger one
 130 stead assist
 131 soothing pacifying, flattering, hypocritical
 1.3.0.3 Nicholas St Antlings St Antholin's, a church on Watling Street not far from St Paul's Cathedral, known as a puritan stronghold and for religious radicalism.

 Nicholas Felton was the minister, 1592-1617.
 0.3-4 Simon St Mary Overies St Mary Overie (meaning over the Rie, or over the river), later St Saviour's, located in Southwark east from the Bishop of Winchester's house and not far from the Globe and some prisons, had, like St Antholin's, a reputation for permitting religious radicalism. One of its lecturers was William Symonds, cited for nonconformity in 1606.
 0.4 scurvy shabby
 0.5 books at their girdles Bibles at their belts
 1 Corporal Oath A 'corporal oath' is any oath—oath of supremacy, oath of allegiance, oath ex officio, etc.—sworn with the hand touching a sacred object or the Bible.
 1-2 I am sorry we have met with you next our hearts That we have met up with you will weigh on our consciences.

 3 We must not swear The 1606 Act of Abuses forbade players in a play, Maygame or pageant to use the name of God jestingly or profanely. Also, nonconformists, when arrested and questioned, routinely refused at the outset of the proceeding to take the oath ex officio, which would have sworn them to answer all questions, including those which would be self-incriminating.
 10 we three a catch phrase in drama of the period. Two of the 'three' are manifest fools, and the third, the victim of a jest or an onlooker, is included in that category by the 'we'
 10-11 scrape-shoes scrape is an awkward bow or salutation in which the foot is drawn backward on the ground
 11 flesh o' good Fridays some puritans regarded as popish the practice of not eating meat on Fridays

- CORPORAL Why, Nicholas St Antlings, Simon St Mary Overies, has the de'il possessed you, that you swear 15 no better? You half-christened catamites, you ungod-mothered varlets, does the first lesson teach you to be proud, and the second to be coxcombs, proud coxcombs, not once to do duty to a man of mark?
- FRAILTY A man of mark, quoth a. I do not think he can 20 show a beggar's noble.
- CORPORAL A corporal, a commander, one of spirit, that is able to blow you up all dry with your books at your girdles.
- SIMON We are not taught to believe that, sir, for we know 25 the breath of man is weak.
Corporal breathes upon Frailty
- FRAILTY Foh, you lie, Nicholas, for here's one strong enough. Blow us up, quoth a, he may well blow me above twelve score off o' him. I warrant, if the wind stood right, a man might smell him from the top of 30 Newgate to the leads of Ludgate.
- CORPORAL Sirrah, thou hollow book of wax candle.
- NICHOLAS Ay, you may say what you will, so you swear
not.
- CORPORAL I swear by the—
- 35 NICHOLAS Hold, hold, good Corporal Oath, for if you swear once, we shall all fall down in a swoon presently.
- CORPORAL I must and will swear, you quivering coxcombs.
My captain is imprisoned, and by Vulcan's leather codpiece point—
- 40 NICHOLAS O Simon, what an oath was there.
- FRAILTY If he should chance to break it, the poor man's breeches would fall down about his heels, for Venus allows him but one point to his hose.
- CORPORAL With these my bully feet, I will thump ope' the 45 prison doors and brain the keeper with the begging box, but I'll set my honest sweet Captain Idle at liberty.
- NICHOLAS How, Captain Idle, my old aunt's son, my dear kinsman, in cappadochio?
- CORPORAL Ay, thou church-peeling, thou holy-paring, religious outside thou. If thou hadst any grace in thee, 50 thou wouldst visit him, relieve him, swear to get him out.
- NICHOLAS Assure you, corporal, indeed la, 'tis the first time
I heard on't.
- CORPORAL Why, do't now then, marmoset. Bring forth thy 55 yearly wages, let not a commander perish.
- SIMON But if he be one of the wicked, he shall perish.
- NICHOLAS Well, corporal, I'll e'en along with you to visit my kinsman. If I can do him any good, I will, but I have nothing for him. Simon St Mary Overies and Frailty, 60 pray make a lie for me to the knight, my master, old
Sir Godfrey.
- CORPORAL A lie? May you lie then?
- FRAILTY O ay, we may lie, but we must not swear.
- SIMON True, we may lie with our neighbour's wife, but 65 we must not swear we did so.
- CORPORAL O an excellent tag of religion.
- NICHOLAS O Simon, I have thought upon a sound excuse.
It will go current. Say that I am gone to a fast.
- SIMON To a fast, very good.
70
- NICHOLAS Ay, to a fast, say, with Master Fullbelly, the minister.
- SIMON Master Fullbelly? An honest man. He feeds the flock well, for he's an excellent feeder.
- [Exeunt] Corporal [and] Nicholas
- FRAILTY O ay, I have seen him eat up a whole pig and af-
75 terward fall to the pettitoes. [Exeunt] Simon and Frailty
- The prison Marshalsea. Enter Captain Idle at one door, George Pieboard and old soldier Skirmish speaking within at another door* I.4
- PIEBOARD Pray, turn the key.

- 15 catamites young men kept for sexual purposes; derives from the Latin Catamitus, a corrupt form of Ganymedes, name of Jupiter's cupbearer whom Jupiter kept for sexual purposes
- 15-16 ungodmothered Nonconformist baptismal practice objected to some of the provisions for baptism specified in the Book of Common Prayer, such as the use of the sign of the cross in baptism, private baptism, and godparents being asked to represent themselves as the voice of the child in taking the baptismal vows. Thus, the 24 Articles had queried whether a minister had 'not used the interrogatories to the godfathers and godmothers, in the name of the infant'
as dictated by the Book of Common Prayer.
- 18-20 a man of mark ... a beggar's noble a pun on mark, meaning distinction, and mark, a sum of money. A noble was a coin; a 'beggar's noble', a farthing.
- 22 blow you up all dry destroy without

- bloodshed
- 30 Newgate to the leads of Ludgate two gates in the western wall of London.
Ludgate had a flat leaded roof.
- 31 book of wax candle rolls of candle wax coiled up in the form of a book
- 38-9 Vulcan's leather codpiece point a codpiece is an appendage to the front of the hose (or breeches); a point is a tagged lace or cord of yarn, silk, or leather, for attaching the hose to the doublet.
- 42-3 Venus allows... one point to his hose
The goddess of love has given him only one lace to hold up his breeches.
- 44 bully epithet expressing admiring familiarity
- 45 begging box almsbox on prison grounds for the benefit of prisoners
- 48 cappadochio cant name for prison.
Cappadocia was an ancient kingdom of Asia Minor, known for its slaves.
- 55 marmoset a small monkey; also a term of abuse or contempt

- 67 tag an automatically repeated or overused phrase
- 69 go current be acceptable fast Although fasting was commonly practised in the English church, its unauthorized use was regarded suspiciously because fasting could also be used as a cover for other practices, including propheysings and conventicles. Canon 72 in the Canons of 1604 ordered 'Ministers not to appoint public or private Fasts or Prophecies, or to Exorcise, but by authority;' see also I.2.84-7; 3.5.134-5, 139, and Introduction.
- 74 feeder eater, parasite
- 76 pettitoes pig's trotters
- I.4.0.1 Marshalsea a prison in Southwark, on Borough High Street and not far from St Mary Overie, connected with the Court of the King's Marshal, and used as a prison for debtors and persons charged with contempt of the Courts of the Marshal, the King's Palace, and the Admiralty

SKIRMISH Turn the key, I pray.
 CAPTAIN Who should those be? I almost know their voices.
 [Pieboard and Skirmish] entering
 O my friends, you're welcome to a smelling room here.
 5 You newly took leave of the air. Is't not a strange savour?
 PIEBOARD
 As all prisons have smells of sundry wretches
 Who, though departed, leave their scents behind 'em.
 By gold, captain, I am sincerely sorry for thee.
 10 CAPTAIN By my troth, George, I thank thee, but pish, what must be must be.
 SKIRMISH Captain, what do you lie in for? Is't great?
 What's your offence?
 CAPTAIN Faith, my offence is ordinary, common, a high-15 way. And I fear me my penalty will be ordinary and common too, a halter.
 PIEBOARD
 Nay, prophesy not so ill. It shall go hard,
 But I'll shift for thy life.
 CAPTAIN Whether I live or die, thou'rt an honest George.
 20 I'll tell you, silver flowed not with me as it had done, for now the tide runs to bawds and flatterers. I had a start out and by chance set upon a fat steward, thinking his purse had been as pursy as his body. And the slave had about him but the poor purchase of ten groats, 25 notwithstanding being descried, pursued, and taken. I know the law is so grim in respect of many desperate unsettled soldiers that I fear me I shall dance after their pipe for't.
 SKIRMISH I am twice sorry for you, captain, first, that your 30 purchase was so small and, now, that your danger is so great.
 CAPTAIN Push! The worst is but death. Ha' you a pipe of tobacco about you?
 SKIRMISH I think I have thereabouts about me.
Captain blows a pipe
 35 CAPTAIN Here's a clean gentleman too to receive.
 PIEBOARD [aside]
 Well, I must cast about, some happy sleight.
 Work brain, that ever didst thy master right.
Corporal and Nicholas [speak from] within
 CORPORAL Keeper, let the key be turned.
 NICHOLAS Ay, I pray, master keeper, give's a cast of your 40 office.
 [Enter Corporal and Nicholas]
 CAPTAIN How now, more visitants? What, Corporal Oath?

PIEBOARD and SKIRMISH Corporal.
 CORPORAL In prison, honest captain? This must not be.
 NICHOLAS How do you, captain kinsman?
 CAPTAIN [to Corporal] Good coxcomb, what makes that 45
 pure, starched fool here?
 NICHOLAS [to Captain] You see, kinsman, I am somewhat bold to call in and see how you do. I heard you were safe enough, and I was very glad on't that it was no worse. 50
 CAPTAIN
 This is a double torture now. This fool by th' book
 Does vex me more than my imprisonment.
 What meant you, corporal, to hook him hither?
 CORPORAL
 Who he? He shall relieve thee and supply thee.
 I'll make him do't.
 CAPTAIN Fie, what vain breath you spend. 55
 He supply? I'll sooner expect mercy from a usurer when my bond's forfeited, sooner kindness from a lawyer when my money's spent, nay, sooner charity from the devil than good from a puritan. I'll look for relief from him when Lucifer is restored to his blood and in heaven
 again. 60
 NICHOLAS [aside] I warrant my kinsman's talking of me,
 for my left ear burns most tyrannically.
 PIEBOARD Captain Idle, what's he there? He looks like a monkey upward and a crane downward. 65
 CAPTAIN Pshaw, a foolish cousin of mine. I must thank God for him.
 PIEBOARD Why, the better subject to work a 'scape upon.
 Thou shalt e'en change clothes with him and leave him
 here, and so. 70
 CAPTAIN Push, I published him e'en now to my corporal.
 He will be damned ere he do me so much good. Why,
 I know a more proper, a more handsome device than that if the slave would be sociable. [To Nicholas] Now, goodman fleer-face. 75
 NICHOLAS [aside] O my cousin begins to speak to me now.
 I shall be acquainted with him again, I hope.
 SKIRMISH [to Captain] Look, what ridiculous raptures take hold of his wrinkles.
 PIEBOARD Then, what say you to this device, a happy one, 80
 captain?
 CAPTAIN Speak low, George, prison rats have wider ears than those in malt-lofts.
 NICHOLAS [to Captain] Cousin, if it lay in my power, as they say, to do. 85

4 smelling stinking
 18 shift for contrive on behalf of 21-2 had a start out went to rob on the highway
 23 pursy fat
 24 purchase theft, plunder groats coins worth four pence
 25 descried perceived from a distance 27 dance slang for how a felon appears hanging from the gallows
 27-8 after their pipe to their tune; i.e. incur

the same punishment
 32 Push! an exclamation of disdain, as in
 'Pish!' or 'Tush!'
 34.1 blows smokes
 35 clean gentleman clean pipe 39-40 cast of your office example of your authority
 46 starched formal and precise 51 by th' book formulaic, constrained behaviour
 60 restored to his blood restored to his former place of dignity in heaven among obedient spirits

 71 published described
 75 fleer-face mocking, sneering face
 78-9 ridiculous raptures... wrinkles Compare the description of the puritan
 Malvolio in Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, 3.2.74-75: 'He does smile his face into more lines than is in the new map with the augmentation of the Indies'.
 83 malt-lofts where prepared malt is stored

- CAPTAIN [to Nicholas] 'Twould do me an exceeding pleasure indeed that. Ne'er talk farther on't. [To the Corporal] The fool will be hanged ere he do't.
- CORPORAL POX, I'll thump 'im to't.
- 90 PIEBOARD [to Captain] Why, do but try the fopster and break it to him bluntly.
- CAPTAIN [to Pieboard] And so my disgrace will dwell in his jaws, an the slave slaver out our purpose to his master, for would I were but as sure on't as I am sure he will deny to do't.
- 95 NICHOLAS [to Captain] I would be heartily glad, cousin, if any of my friendships, as they say, might stand, ah.
- PIEBOARD [to Captain] Why, you see he offers his friendship foolishly to you already.
- 100 CAPTAIN Ay, that's the hell on't. I would he would offer it wisely.
- NICHOLAS Verily, and indeed la, cousin.
- CAPTAIN [to Nicholas] I have took note of thy fleers a good while. If thou art minded to do me good—as thou gapst upon me comfortably and givst me charitable faces, which indeed is but a fashion in you all that are puritans—wilt soon at night steal me thy master's chain?
- NICHOLAS O, I shall swoon.
- 110 PIEBOARD Corporal, he starts already.
- CAPTAIN [to Nicholas] I know it to be worth three hundred crowns, and with the half of that I can buy my life at a broker's at second hand, which now lies in pawn to the law. If this thou refuse to do, being easy and nothing dangerous, in that thou art held in good opinion of thy master, why 'tis a palpable argument thou holdst my life at no price, and these thy broken and unjointed offers are but only created in thy lip, now born, and now buried, foolish breath only. What, wilt do't? Shall
- 115 I look for happiness in thy answer?
- NICHOLAS Steal my master's chain, quoth a? No, it shall ne'er be said that Nicholas St Antling's committed birdlime.
- CAPTAIN Nay, I told you as much, did I not? Though he be a puritan, yet he will be a true man.
- 125 NICHOLAS Why, cousin, you know 'tis written, thou shalt not steal.
- CAPTAIN Why, and fool, thou shalt love thy neighbour and help him in extremities.
- NICHOLAS Mass, I think it be indeed. In what chapter's that, cousin? 130
- CAPTAIN Why, in the first of Charity, the second verse.
- NICHOLAS The first of Charity, quoth a. That's a good jest, there's no such chapter in my book.
- CAPTAIN No, I knew 'twas torn out of thy book, and that makes so little in thy heart. 135
- PIEBOARD [taking Nicholas aside] Come, let me tell you, you're too unkind a kinsman, i'faith, the captain loving you so dearly, ay, like the pomewater of his eye, and you to be so uncomfortable, fie, fie. 140
- NICHOLAS Pray, do not wish me to be hanged. Anything else that I can do, had it been to rob, I would ha' done't, but I must not steal. That's the word the literal, thou shalt not steal. And would you wish me to steal then?
- PIEBOARD No, faith, that were too much, to speak truth. 145
- Why, wilt thou nim it from him?
- NICHOLAS That I will.
- PIEBOARD Why, enough, bully, he shall be content with that, or he shall ha' none. Let me alone with him now. [To Captain] Captain, I ha' dealt with your kinsman in a corner, a good, kind-natured fellow, methinks. Go to, you shall not have all your own asking, you shall bate somewhat on't. He is not contented absolutely, as you would say, to steal the chain from him, but to do you a pleasure, he will nim it from him. 155
- NICHOLAS Ay, that I will, cousin.
- CAPTAIN Well, seeing he will do no more, as far as I see, I must be contented with that.
- CORPORAL [aside] Here's no notable gullery.
- PIEBOARD [to Nicholas] Nay, I'll come nearer to you, gentleman, because we'll have only but a help and a mirth on't. The knight shall not lose his chain neither, but it shall be only laid out of the way some one or two days. 160
- NICHOLAS Ay, that would be good indeed, kinsman.
- PIEBOARD For I have a farther reach to profit us better by the missing on't only, than if we had it outright, as my discourse shall make it known to you. When thou hast the chain, do but convey it out at backdoor into the garden, and there hang it close in the rosemary bank 170

90 fopster fool93 slaver utter in a fawning, flattering manner105 comfortably comfortably108 chain ornament worn around the neck123 birdlime a glutinous substance spread upon twigs, by which birds may be caught and held fast; slang for stealing126–9 shalt not steal... shalt love thy*neighbour... extremities Nicholas and Captain cite, respectively, the seventh and ninth of the Ten Commandments, the Captain embellishing his with 'help him in extremities'.139 pomewater large juicy kind of apple143 That's the word the literal That's exactly what the Bible says and means.

- but for a small season. And by that harmless device, I know how to wind Captain Idle out of prison, the knight thy master shall get his pardon and release him, and he satisfy thy master with his own chain and wondrous thanks on both hands.
- 175 NICHOLAS That were rare indeed la. Pray, let me know how.
- PIEBOARD Nay, 'tis very necessary thou shouldst know because thou must be employed as an actor.
- 180 NICHOLAS An actor? O no, that's a player, and our parson rails against players mightily, I can tell you, because they brought him drunk upo'th' stage once, as he will be horribly drunk.
- CORPORAL Mass, I cannot blame him then, poor church spout.
- 185 PIEBOARD Why, as an intermeddler then.
- NICHOLAS Ay, that, that.
- PIEBOARD Give me audience then. When the old knight thy master has raged his fill for the loss of the chain, tell him thou hast a kinsman in prison of such exquisite art that the devil himself is French lackey to him and runs bare-headed by his horse belly (when he has one), whom he will cause with most Irish dexterity to fetch his chain, though 'twere hid under a mine of seacoal, and ne'er make spade or pickaxe his instruments. Tell him but this, with farther instructions thou shalt receive from me, and thou show'st thyself a kinsman indeed.
- CORPORAL A dainty bully.
- SKIRMISH An honest bookkeeper.
- 200 CAPTAIN And my three-times-thrice-honey cousin.
- NICHOLAS Nay, grace of God, I'll rob him on't suddenly and hang it in the rosemary bank. But I bear that mind, cousin, I would not steal anything methinks for mine own father.
- 205 SKIRMISH He bears a good mind in that, captain.
- PIEBOARD Why, well said. He begins to be an honest fellow, faith.
- CORPORAL In troth he does.
- NICHOLAS You see, cousin, I am willing to do you any kindness, always saving myself harmless.
- 210
- CAPTAIN Why, I thank thee. Fare thee well. I shall requite it. Exit Nicholas
- CORPORAL 'Twill be good for thee, captain, that thou hast such an egregious ass to thy cousin.
- CAPTAIN Ay, is he not a fine fool, corporal? 215
But, George, thou talkest of art and conjuring. How shall that be?
- PIEBOARD Puh, be't not in your care. 215
Leave that to me and my directions. Well, captain, doubt not thy delivery now, E'en with the vantage, man, to gain by prison, As my thoughts prompt me. Hold on brain and plot. 220
I aim at many cunning far events, All which I doubt not but to hit at length. I'll to the Widow with a quaint assault. Captain, be merry. 225
- CAPTAIN Who, I? Kerry, merry, buff jerkin.
- PIEBOARD O, I am happy in more sleights, and one will knit strong in another. Corporal Oath—
- CORPORAL Ho, bully.
- PIEBOARD And thou old Peter Skirmish—I have a necessary task for you both. 230
- SKIRMISH Lay't upon, George Pieboard.
- CORPORAL What e'er it be, we'll manage it.
- PIEBOARD I would have you two maintain a quarrel before the Lady Widow's door and draw your swords i'th' edge of the evening. Clash a little, clash, clash. 235
- CORPORAL Fuh. Let us alone to make our blades ring noon Though it be after supper.
- PIEBOARD Know you can. 240
And out of that false fire, I doubt not but to raise strange belief. And, captain, to countenance my device the better and grace my words to the widow, I have a good plain satin suit that I had of a young reveller t'other night, for words pass not regarded nowadays unless they come from a good suit of clothes, which the fates and my wits have bestowed upon me. Well, Captain Idle, if I did not highly love thee, I would ne'er 245

171 that harmless device This jest of Pieboard's has an analogue in Jest 11 of George Peele's The Merrie Conceited Jestes of George Peele, in which Peele, accompanying his friends to an Oxford commencement and running out of money, hides the rapier and dagger of a companion, and then, borrowing from the same companion, goes to Oxford and returns with a scholar, 'one of the rarest men in England,' who sets about divining the location of the lost possessions, which, as all search for them, George himself then locates. An analogue to this trick is also described in Reginald Scot's The Discovery of witchcraft (1584), where the trick is described as being used for finding a stolen horse. Scot's book denounced witchcraft as a popish device aimed at deceiving the public and making the clergy rich.

180–2 our parson . . . stage the stock characterization of the drunk cleric (here used against a puritan, but also used conventionally in criticisms of bishops, monks, popes, etc.) combined with a reference to clerics who declaimed against theatre practices. Puritan ministers usually objected to playing on Sundays and to the bear-baiting held in the theatres. In 1589, the conformist church establishment, in an effort to cope with the Marprelate controversy, sought to have all 'matters of divinity' excluded from stage plays.
185 spout one who speaks at length without much matter

186 intermeddler intermediary
191 French lackey a lackey is a hanger-on; 'French' is usually associated with venereal disease.
192 bare-headed a symptom of syphilis
horse belly horse's belly
193 Irish dexterity an allusion to the Irish running footmen employed by many nobles; as in 'Away they ran like Irish lackeys' (Black Book 516–7).
194 seacoal ordinary, mineral coal as opposed to charcoal
200 cousin kinsman
220 vantage advantage
224 quaint cunning, crafty; vagina
226 Kerry, merry, buff jerkin kerry-merry-buff is a kind of blow or buffet; running on, Idle adds 'jerkin'

CAPTAIN True, George.

PIEBOARD Fare thee well, captain. Come, corporal and

thee.

CORPORAL More news, ay, by yon Bear at Bridgefoot in heaven, shalt thou. Exeunt [all but Captain]

CAPTAIN

Enough, my friends, farewell.
This prison shows as if ghosts did part in hell. [Exit]
Finis Actus Primus

2.1 Incipit Actus Secundus
Enter Moll, youngest daughter to the Widow, alone

5 MOLL Not marry? Forswear marriage? Why, all women know 'tis as honourable a thing as to lie with a man, and I, to spite my sister's vow the more, have entertained a suitor already, a fine gallant knight of the last feather. He says he will coach me too, and well appoint me, allow me money to dice withal, and many such pleasing protestations he sticks upon my lips. Indeed, his short-winded father i'th' country is wondrous wealthy, a most abominable farmer. And 10 therefore he may do't in time. Troth, I'll venture upon him. Women are not without ways enough to help themselves. If he prove wise and good as his word, why I shall love him and use him kindly, and if he prove an ass, why in a quarter of an hour's warning I 15 can transform him into an ox. There comes in my relief again.

Enter Frailty

FRAILTY O Mistress Moll, Mistress Moll.

MOLL How now, what's the news?

FRAILTY The knight, your suitor, Sir John Pennydub.

20 MOLL Sir John Pennydub? Where, where?

FRAILTY He's walking in the gallery.

MOLL Has my mother seen him yet?

FRAILTY O no, she's spitting in the kitchen.

248 twelve score twelve score yards

251 Jills women

Jack coat of mail; buff jacket or jerkin;
penis

256-7 Bear at Bridgefoot in heaven Bear in heaven is a constellation; Bear at Bridgefoot was a tavern at the end of London Bridge. Corporal has his private name for the constellation, calling it after the tavern.

2.1.4-5 of the last feather of the latest fashion

5 coach me buy me a coach

6 appoint equip, fit out

7 protestations assertions

7-8 sticks upon my lips pledges himself, with kisses, to perform

9 abominable offensive, preposterously large

10 do't keep his word

10-11 venture upon him bet on him

15 ox a castrated bull used for draught purposes; cuckold

19 Sir John Pennydub the first of three knights in this scene, each suing for marriage. Their names satirize knighthood at a point in time when much was being made of James's having knighted

MOLL

Direct him hither softly, good Frailty.

I'll meet him halfway.

FRAILTY That's just like running a tilt, but I hope he'll 25 break nothing this time. [Exit Frailty]

MOLL 'Tis happiness my mother saw him not.

Enter Sir John Pennydub

O we'come, good Sir John.

PENNYDUB I thank you, faith. Nay, you must stand me till I 30 kiss you. 'Tis the fashion everywhere i'faith, and I came from court e'en now.

MOLL Nay, the fates forfend that I should anger the fashion.

PENNYDUB Then, not forgetting the sweet of new ceremonies, I first fall back, then recovering myself, make my honour to your lip thus, and then accost it. (Kissing
[Moll])

MOLL Trust me, very pretty and moving. You're worthy 40 on't sir.

[Enter] Widow and Sir Godfrey

O my mother, my mother, now she's here, we'll steal into the gallery. Exeunt [Moll and Pennydub]

SIR GODFREY Nay, sister, let reason rule you, do not play the fool, stand not in your own light. You have wealthy offers, large tenderings. Do not withstand your good 45 fortune. Who comes a wooing to you, I pray? No small fool. A rich knight o'th' city, Sir Oliver Muckhill, no small fool I can tell you. And furthermore, as I heard late by your maidservants (as your maidservants will say to me anything, I thank 'em) both your daughters 50 are not without suitors, ay, and worthy ones too. One a brisk courtier, Sir Andrew Tipstaff, suitor afar off to your eldest daughter, and the third a huge wealthy farmer's son, a fine young country knight. They call him Sir John Pennydub, a good name. Marry, he may 55 have it coined when he lacks money. What blessings are these, sister?

WIDOW Tempt me not, Satan.

SIR GODFREY Satan? Do I look like Satan? I hope the devil's
60 not so old as I, I trow.

WIDOW

You wound my senses, brother, when you name

so many. 'Pennydub' suggests the knight purchased his title. 'Tipstaff' is suggestive of a court bailiff or his staff, which was tipped with iron; also phallic. 'Muckhill' suggests a pile of dirt or excrement.

21 gallery a corridor or long room for exhibiting paintings and walking

23 spitting crying

30 stand me stand still for me; give me an erection

33 forfend forbid

35 sweet the culmination

37 accost approach; solicit a woman for sex

Enter Simon
 How now, Simon? Where's my son Edmond?
 65 SIMON Verily, madam, he is at vain exercise, dripping in the tennis court. [Exit Simon] WIDOW At tennis court? O now his father's gone, I shall have no rule with him. O wicked Edmond, I might well compare this with the prophecy in the Chronicle, 70 though far inferior. As Harry of Monmouth won all,
 and Harry of Windsor lost all, so Edmond of Bristow that was the father got all, and Edmond of London
 that's his son now will spend all.
 SIR GODFREY Peace, sister, we'll have him reformed. There's 75 hope on him yet, though it be but a little.
Enter Frailty
 FRAILTY Forsooth, madam, there are two or three archers at door would very gladly speak with your ladyship.
 WIDOW Archers?
 SIR GODFREY Your husband's fletcher, I warrant.
 80 WIDOW O
 Let them come near. They bring home things of his.
 Troth, I should ha' forgot 'em. How now?
 Villain, which be those archers?
Enter the suitors Sir Andrew Tipstaff, Sir Oliver Muckhill, and Pennydub
 FRAILTY Why, do you not see 'em before you? Are 85 not these archers? What do you call 'em? Shooters?
 Shooters and archers are all one, I hope.
 WIDOW Out, ignorant slave.
 MUCKHILL Nay, pray be patient, lady,
 We come in way of honourable love.
 TIPSTAFF and PENNYDUB
 We do.
 MUCKHILL
 To you.
 TIPSTAFF and PENNYDUB
 90 And to your daughters.
 WIDOW O why will you offer me this, gentlemen? Indeed,
 I will not look upon you. When the tears are scarce out of mine eyes, not yet washed off from my cheeks, and my dear husband's body scarce so cold as the coffin, 95 what reason have you to offer it? I am not like some of your widows that will bury one in the evening, and be sure to another ere morning. Pray, away. Pray, take your answers, good knights, an you be sweet knights. I have vowed never to marry, and so have my daughters 100 too.
 PENNYDUB (aside) Ay, two of you have, but the third's a good wench.

MUCKHILL Lady, a shrewd answer, marry. The best is, 'tis but the first, and he's a blunt wooer that will leave for one sharp answer. 105
 TIPSTAFF Where be your daughters, lady? I hope they'll give us better encouragements.
 WIDOW Indeed, they'll answer you so. Tak't a' my word, they'll give you the very same answer verbatim, truly
 la. 110
 PENNYDUB (aside) Mum, Moll's a good wench still. I know what she'll do.
 MUCKHILL Well, lady, for this time we'll take our leaves, hoping for better comfort.
 WIDOW O never, never, an I live these thousand years. An you be good knights, do not hope. 'Twill be all vain, vain. Look you, put off all your suits an you come to me again. [Exeunt Pennydub and Tipstaff] FRAILTY Put off all their suits, quoth a? Ay, that's the best wooing of a widow indeed, when a man's nonsuited, 120 that is, when he's a bed with her.
Going out, Muckhill and Sir Godfrey
 MUCKHILL Sir Godfrey, here's twenty angels more. Work hard for me. There's life in't yet.
 SIR GODFREY Fear not, Sir Oliver Muckhill, I'll stick close for you. Leave all with me. Exit Muckhill 125
Enter George Pieboard, the scholar
 PIEBOARD By your leave, Lady Widow.
 WIDOW What, another suitor now?
 PIEBOARD A suitor? No, I protest, lady, if you'd give me yourself, I'd not be troubled with you.
 WIDOW Say you so, sir, then you're the better welcome,
 130 sir.
 PIEBOARD Nay, heaven bless me from a widow unless I were sure to bury her speedily.
 WIDOW Good bluntness. Well, your business, sir.
 PIEBOARD Very needful if you were in private once. 135
 WIDOW Needful? Brother, pray leave us, and you, sir.
[Exit Sir Godfrey]
 FRAILTY [aside] I should laugh now if this blunt fellow should put 'em all beside the stirrup and vault into the saddle himself. I have seen as mad a trick. Exit Frailty 140 WIDOW Now, sir, here's none but we.
Enter daughters Frank and Moll
 Daughters forebear.
 PIEBOARD O no, pray let 'em stay, for what I have to speak importeth equally to them as to you.
 WIDOW Then you may stay.
 PIEBOARD
 I pray, bestow on me a serious ear,
 145 For what I speak is full of weight and fear.

154 purgatory in Roman Catholic belief, a condition or place in which the soul of those dying penitent are purified from venial sins, or undergo the temporal punishment which, after the guilt of mortal sin has been remitted, still remains to be endured by the sinner. From the early sixteenth century, protestants, believing that the soul went directly to heaven after death, had characterized purgatory as an invention of the pope (who prayed for souls to be released from purgatory), used to increase his power and extort money from the people. In his Premotion (1609), King James would refer to purgatory 'and all the trash depending thereupon' as 'not worth the talking of'.

 WIDOW and FRANK O.
 FRANK (aside) That's not I yet.
 PIEBOARD And with most impudent prostitution, show your naked bodies to the view of all beholders.
 240 WIDOW Our naked bodies. Fie, for shame.
 PIEBOARD Attend me—and your younger daughter be stricken dumb.
 MOLL Dumb? Out, alas, 'tis the worst pain of all for a woman. I'd rather be mad, or run naked, or anything.
 245 Dumb?
 PIEBOARD Give ear. Ere the evening fall upon hill, bog and meadow, this my speech shall have passed probation, and then shall I be believed accordingly.
 WIDOW If this be true, we are all shamed, all undone.
 250 MOLL Dumb? I'll speak as much as ever I can possible before evening.
 PIEBOARD But if it so come to pass (as for your fair sakes I wish it may) that this presage of your strange fortunes be prevented by that accident of death and bloodshedding which I before told you of, take heed 255 upon your lives that two of you which have vowed never to marry seek you out husbands with all present speed. And you, the third, that have such a desire to outstrip chastity, look you meddle not with a husband.
 260 MOLL A double torment.
 PIEBOARD The breach of this keeps your father in purgatory, and the punishments that shall follow you in this world would with horror kill the ear should hear 'em related.
 265 WIDOW Marry? Why, I vowed never to marry.
 FRANK And so did I.
 MOLL And I vowed never to be such an ass but to marry.
 What a cross fortune's this?
 270 PIEBOARD Ladies, though I be a fortune-teller, I cannot better fortunes. You have 'em from me as they are revealed to me. I would they were to your tempers and fellows with your bloods. That's all the bitterness I would you.
 275 WIDOW O 'tis a just vengeance for my husband's hard purchases.
 PIEBOARD I wish you to bethink yourselves and leave 'em.
 WIDOW I'll to Sir Godfrey, my brother, and acquaint him with these fearful presages.
 FRANK For, Mother, they portend losses to him.

WIDOW O ay, they do, they do. 280
 If any happy issue crown thy words,
 I will reward thy cunning.
 PIEBOARD
 'Tis enough, Lady, I wish no higher.
 [Exeunt Widow and Frank]

MOLL
 Dumb, and not marry, worse.
 Neither to speak nor kiss, a double curse. Exit 285 PIEBOARD So all this comes well about yet. I play the fortune-teller as well as if I had had a witch to my grandam. For by good happiness, being in my hostess's garden, which neighbours the orchard of the widow, I laid the hole of mine ear to a hole in the wall and heard 290 'em make these vows and speak those words upon which I wrought these advantages. And to encourage my forgery the more, I may now perceive in 'em a natural simplicity which will easily swallow an abuse if any covering be over it. And to confirm my former 295 presage to the widow, I have advised old Peter Skirmish, the soldier, to hurt Corporal Oath upon the leg, and in that hurry I'll rush amongst 'em, and instead of giving the corporal some cordial to comfort him, I'll pour into his mouth a potion of a sleepy nature to make him 300 seem as dead. For the which, the old soldier being apprehended and ready to be borne to execution, I'll step in and take upon me the cure of the dead man upon pain of dying the condemnèd's death. The corporal will wake at his minute, when the sleepy force has wrought 305 itself, and so shall I get myself into a most admired opinion, and under the pretext of that cunning, beguile as I see occasion. And if that foolish Nicholas St Antlings keep true time with the chain, my plot will be sound, the captain delivered, and my wits applauded among 310 scholars and soldiers forever. Exit Pieboard

Enter Nicholas St Antlings with the chain 2.2

NICHOLAS O, I have found an excellent advantage to take away the chain. My master put it off e'en now to 'say on a new doublet, and I sneaked it away by little and little most puritanically. We shall have good sport anon, when he's missed it, about my cousin the conjuror. The 5 world shall see I'm an honest man of my word. For now, I'm going to hang it between heaven and earth among the rosemary branches. Exit

Incipit Actus TertiusEnter Simon St Mary Overies and Frailty

FRAILTY Sirrah, Simon St Mary Overies, my mistress sends away all her suitors and puts fleas in their ears.

SIMON Frailty, she does like an honest, chaste, and virtuous woman, for widows ought not to wallow in the puddle of iniquity.

5

FRAILTY Yet, Simon, many widows will do't, what so comes on't.

SIMON True, Frailty, their filthy flesh desires a conjunction copulative. What strangers are within, Frailty?

10

FRAILTY There's none, Simon, but Master Pilfer, the tailor. He's above with Sir Godfrey praising of a doublet, and I must trudge anon to fetch Master Suds, the barber.

SIMON Master Suds, a good man, he washes the sins of the beard clean.

Enter old Skirmish the soldier

15

SKIRMISH How now, creatures, what's o'clock?

FRAILTY Why do you take us to be Jack o'th' clockhouse?

SKIRMISH I say again to you, what's o'clock?

SIMON Truly la, we go by the clock of our conscience. All worldly clocks we know go false and are set by drunken sextons.

20

SKIRMISH Then what's o'clock in your conscience?

Enter Corporal

O, I must break off. Here comes the corporal.—[To the Corporal] Hum, hum, what's o'clock?

CORPORAL O'clock? Why, past seventeen.

25

FRAILTY Past seventeen? [Aside] Nay, he's met with his match now. Corporal Oath will fit him.

SKIRMISH Thou dost not balk or baffle me, dost thou? I am a soldier. Past seventeen.

30

CORPORAL Ay, thou art not angry with the figures, art thou? I will prove it unto thee: twelve and 1 is thirteen, I hope, 2 fourteen, 3 fifteen, 4 sixteen, and 5 seventeen. Then past seventeen, I will take the dial's part in a just cause.

SKIRMISH I say, 'tis but past five then.

35

CORPORAL I'll swear 'tis past seventeen then. Dost thou not know numbers? Canst thou not cast?

SKIRMISH Cast? Dost thou speak of my casting i'th' street?

Corporal and Skirmish draw

CORPORAL Ay, and in the market-place.

SIMON Clubs, clubs, clubs!

Simon runs in

40

FRAILTY Ay, I knew by their shuffling clubs would be trump.

Enter Pieboard

Mass, here's the knave, an he can do any good upon 'em. Clubs, clubs, clubs! [Exit Frailty]

CORPORAL O villain, thou hast opened a vein in my leg.

PIEBOARD How now, for shame, for shame, put up, put up. 45

CORPORAL By yon blue welkin, 'twas out of my part, George, to be hurt on the leg.

Enter Officers

PIEBOARD O peace now, I have a cordial here to comfort thee.

OFFICERS Down with 'em, down with 'em, lay hands upon the villain. 50

SKIRMISH Lay hands on me?

PIEBOARD [aside] I'll not be seen among 'em now.

[Pieboard stands aloof]

CORPORAL

I'm hurt and had more need have surgeons

Lay hands upon me than rough officers. 55

OFFICER

Go carry him to be dressed then.

[Exeunt some Officers with Corporal Oath]

This mutinous soldier shall along with me to prison.

SKIRMISH

To prison? Where's George?

OFFICERS

Away with him.

*Exeunt [other Officers] with Skirmish*PIEBOARD [stepping forward]

So,

All lights as I would wish. The amazed widow

Will plant me strongly now in her belief 60

And wonder at the virtue of my words,

For the event turns those presages from 'em

Of being mad and dumb and begets joy

Mingled with admiration. These empty creatures,

Soldier and corporal, were but ordained 65

As instruments for me to work upon.

Now to my patient. Here's his potion. Exit

Enter the Widow with her two daughters Frank and Moll [and Frailty]

WIDOW

O wondrous happiness, beyond our thoughts,

O lucky fair event. I think our fortunes

Were blessed e'en in our cradles. We are quitted

Of all those shameful violent presages

By this rash bleeding chance. Go, Frailty, run, and

- FRAILTY Madam, he was carried to the superior, but if he had no money when he came there, I warrant he's dead by this time. Exit Frailty
- 10 FRANK Sure, that man is a rare fortune-teller. Never looked upon our hands, nor upon any mark about us. A wondrous fellow surely.
- 15 MOLL I am glad I have the use of my tongue yet, though of nothing else. I shall find the way to marry too, I hope, shortly.
- WIDOW O where's my brother Sir Godfrey? I would he were here that I might relate to him how prophetically the cunning gentleman spoke in all things.
Enter Sir Godfrey in a rage
- 20 SIR GODFREY O my chain, my chain, I have lost my chain. Where be these villains, varlets?
- WIDOW O he's lost his chain.
- SIR GODFREY My chain, my chain.
- 25 WIDOW Brother, be patient, hear me speak. You know I told you that a cunning man told me that you should have a loss, and he has prophesied so true.
- SIR GODFREY Out! He's a villain to prophesy of the loss of my chain. 'Twas worth above three hundred crowns. Besides, 'twas my father's, my father's father's, my
- 30 grandfather's huge grandfather's. I had as lief ha' lost my neck as the chain that hung about it. O my chain, my chain.
- WIDOW O brother, who can be against a misfortune? 'Tis happy 'twas no more.
- 35 SIR GODFREY No more? O goodly godly sister, would you had me lost more? My best gown, too, with the cloth of gold lace? My holiday gaskins and my jerkin set with pearl? No more?
- WIDOW O brother, you can read.
- 40 SIR GODFREY But I cannot read where my chain is. What strangers have been here? You let in strangers, thieves and catchpoles. How come it gone? There was none above with me but my tailor, and my tailor will not steal, I hope.
- 45 MOLL [aside] No, he's afraid of a chain.
Enter Frailty
- WIDOW How now, sirrah, the news.
- FRAILTY O mistress, he may well be called a corporal now, for his corpse are as dead as a cold capon's.
- WIDOW More happiness.
- SIR GODFREY Sirrah, what's this to my chain? Where's my chain, knave?
- FRAILTY Your chain, sir?
- SIR GODFREY My chain is lost, villain.
- FRAILTY I would he were hanged in chains that has it then for me. Alas, sir, I saw none of your chain since you were hung with it yourself.
- 55 SIR GODFREY
Out, varlet. It had full three thousand links. I have oft told it over at my prayers, Over and over, full three thousand links.
- FRAILTY Had it so, sir, sure it cannot be lost then. I'll put you in that comfort.
- 60 SIR GODFREY Why, why?
- FRAILTY Why, if your chain had so many links, it cannot choose but come to light.
Enter Nicholas
- SIR GODFREY
Delusion. Now, long Nicholas, where's my chain?
- 65 NICHOLAS Why, about your neck, is't not, sir?
- SIR GODFREY
About my neck, varlet. My chain is lost, 'Tis stole away, I'm robbed.
- WIDOW Nay, brother, show yourself a man.
- 70 NICHOLAS Ay, if it be lost or stole, if he would be patient, mistress, I could bring him to a cunning kinsman of mine that would fetch't again with a sesarara.
- SIR GODFREY Canst thou? I will be patient. Say, where dwells he?
- 75 NICHOLAS Marry, he dwells now, sir, where he would not dwell an he could choose, in the Marshalsea, sir. But he's an ex'lent fellow if he were out. He's travelled all the world o'er, he, and been in the seven-and-twenty provinces. Why, he would make it be fetched, sir, if 'twere rid a thousand mile out of town.
- 80 SIR GODFREY An admirable fellow. What lies he for?
- NICHOLAS Why, he did but rob a steward of ten groats t'other night, as any man would ha' done, and there he lies for't.
- SIR GODFREY
I'll make his peace, a trifle. I'll get his pardon, Besides a bountiful reward. I'll about it, But see the clerks, the justice will do much. I will about it straight. Good sister, pardon me,

- 3.3 Enter two sergeants Puttock and Ravenshaw [with Yeoman Dogson] to arrest the scholar George Pieboard
- PUTTOCK His hostess where he lies will trust him no longer. She has fee'd me to arrest him, and if you will accompany me, because I know not of what nature the scholar is, whether desperate or swift, you shall share with me, Sergeant Ravenshaw. I have the good angel to arrest him.
- 5 RAVENSHAW Troth, I'll take part with thee then, sergeant, not for the sake of the money so much, as for the hate I bear to a scholar. Why, sergeant, 'tis natural in us, you know, to hate scholars, natural. Besides, they will publish our imperfections, knaveries, and conveyances upon scaffolds and stages.
- 10 PUTTOCK Ay, and spitefully too. Troth, I have wondered how the slaves could see into our breasts so much when our doublets are buttoned with pewter.
- 15 RAVENSHAW Ay, and so close without yielding. O they're parlous fellows. They will search more with their wits than a constable with all his officers.
- 20 PUTTOCK Whist, whist, whist, Yeoman Dogson, Yeoman Dogson.
DOGSON Ha, what says sergeant?
PUTTOCK Is he in the 'pothecaries shop still?
DOGSON Ay, ay.
PUTTOCK Have an eye, ay.
- 25 RAVENSHAW The best is, sergeant, if he be a true scholar, he wears no weapon, I think.
PUTTOCK No, no, he wears no weapon.
RAVENSHAW Mass, I am right glad of that. 'T'as put me in better heart. Nay, if I clutch him once, let me alone to drag him if he be stiff-necked. I have been one of the six myself that has dragged as tall men of their hands, when their weapons have been gone, as ever bastinadoed a sergeant. I have done, I can tell you.
- 30 DOGSON Sergeant Puttock, Sergeant Puttock.
PUTTOCK Hoh.
DOGSON He's coming out single.
PUTTOCK Peace, peace, be not too greedy. Let him play a little, let him play a little. We'll jerk him up of a sudden. I ha' fished in my time.
- 40 RAVENSHAW Ay, and caught many a fool, sergeant.
- Enter Pieboard*
- PIEBOARD [aside]
I parted now from Nicholas. The chain's couched, And the old knight has spent his rage upon't. The Widow holds me in great admiration For cunning art. 'Mongst joys I am e'en lost, For my device can no way now be crossed, And now I must to prison to the captain, and there—
PUTTOCK I arrest you, sir.
PIEBOARD [aside] O, I spoke truer than I was aware. I must to prison indeed.
PUTTOCK They say you're a scholar, nay sir? Yeoman Dogson, have care to his arms. You'll rail again sergeants and stage 'em. You tickle their vices.
PIEBOARD Nay, use me like a gentleman. I'm little less.
PUTTOCK You, a gentleman? That's a good jest, i'faith. Can a scholar be a gentleman when a gentleman will not be a scholar? Look upon your wealthy citizens' sons, whether they be scholars or no, that are gentlemen by their fathers' trades. A scholar a gentleman?
PIEBOARD Nay, let fortune drive all her stings into me, she cannot hurt that in me. A gentleman is accidens inseparabile to my blood.
RAVENSHAW A rabblement, nay, you shall have a bloody rabblement upon you, I warrant you.
PUTTOCK Go, Yeoman Dogson, before, and enter the action i'th' Counter. Exit Dogson
PIEBOARD Pray, do not hand me cruelly. I'll go whither you please to have me.
PUTTOCK O he's tame. Let him loose, sergeant.
PIEBOARD Pray, at whose suit is this?
PUTTOCK Why, at your hostess's suit where you lie, Mistress Cunnyburrow, for bed and board, the sum four pound five shillings and five pence.
PIEBOARD [aside]
I know the sum too true, yet I presumed Upon a farther day. Well, 'tis my stars, And I must bear it now, though never harder. I swear, now my device is crossed indeed. Captain must lie by't. This is deceit's seed.
PUTTOCK Come, come away.
PIEBOARD Pray, give me so much time as to knit my garter, and I'll away with you. He makes to tie his garter PUTTOCK Well, we must be paid for this waiting upon you. This is no pains to attend thus.

PIEBOARD [aside] I am now wretched and miserable. I shall ne'er recover of this disease. Hot iron gnaw their fists!
 85 They have struck a fever into my shoulder, which I shall ne'er shake out again, I fear me, till with a true habeas corpus the sexton remove me. O, if I take prison once, I shall be pressed to death with actions, but not so happy as speedily. Perhaps I may be forty year a-pressing till I 90 be a thin old man that, looking through the grates, men may look through me. All my means is confounded.
 What shall I do? Has my wit served me so long and now give me the slip, like a trained servant, when I have most need of 'em, no device to keep my poor 95 carcass from these puttocks? Yes, happiness, have I a paper about me now. Yes, too, I'll try it, it may hit.
 'Extremity is touchstone unto wit', ay, ay.
 PUTTOCK 'Sfoot, how many yards are in thy garters, that thou art so long atying on them? Come away, sir.
 100 PIEBOARD Troth, sergeant, I protest, you could never ha' took me at a worse time, for now at this instant, I have no lawful picture about me.
 PUTTOCK 'Slid, how shall we come by our fees then?
 RAVENSHAW We must have fees, sirrah.
 105 PIEBOARD I could ha' wished, i'faith, that you had took me half an hour hence for your own sake, for I protest, if you had not crossed me, I was going in great joy to receive five pound of a gentleman for the device of a masque here, drawn in this paper. But now, 110 come, I must be contented. 'Tis but so much lost and answerable to the rest of my fortunes.
 PUTTOCK Why, how far hence dwells that gentleman?
 RAVENSHAW Ay, well said, sergeant. 'Tis good to cast about for money.
 115 PUTTOCK Speak, if it be not far.
 PIEBOARD We are but a little past it, the next street behind us.
 PUTTOCK 'Slid, we have waited upon you grievously already. If you'll say you'll be liberal when you ha't, 120 give us double fees and spend upon's, why, we'll show you that kindness and go along with you to the gentleman.
 RAVENSHAW Ay, well said still, sergeant. Urge that.

PIEBOARD Troth, if it will suffice, it shall be all among you.
 For my part, I'll not pocket a penny. My hostess shall 125 have her four pound five shillings and bate me the five pence, and the other fifteen shillings, I'll spend upon
 you.
 RAVENSHAW Why, now thou art a good scholar.
 PUTTOCK An excellent scholar, i'faith. He's proceeded very 130 well o'late. Come, we'll along with you.
Puttock and Ravenshaw exeunt with Pieboard. Passing in, they knock at the door with a knocker withinside

[Enter Servant]
 3.4 SERVANT Who knocks, who's at door? We had need of a porter.
 PIEBOARD [within] A few friends here.
 [*Servant opens the door to Pieboard, Ravenshaw,
 Puttock, and Dogson*]
 Pray, is the gentleman your master within?
 SERVANT Yes, is your business to him? 5
 PIEBOARD Ay, he knows it when he sees me. I pray you, have you forgot me?
 SERVANT Ay, by my troth, sir, pray come near. I'll in and tell him of you. Please you to walk here in the gallery 10 till he comes.
 PIEBOARD We will attend his worship.— [Exit Servant] [Aside] Worship I think, for so much the posts at his door should signify, and the fair coming in, and the wicket, else I neither knew him nor his worship. But
 'tis happiness he is within doors, what so e'er he be. 15
 If he be not too much a formal citizen, he may do me good.—Sergeant and yeoman, how do you like this house? Is't not most wholesomely plotted?
 RAVENSHAW Troth, prisoner, an exceeding fine house.
 PIEBOARD [aside] Yet I wonder how he should forget me, 20 for he ne'er knew me. No matter, what is forgot in you will be remembered in your master.—[To Ravenshaw, Puttock, and Dogson] A pretty comfortable room this, methinks. You have no such rooms in prison now.
 PUTTOCK O dog holes to't. 25

- 30 PUTTOCK O it stands very pleasantly for a scholar.
PIEBOARD Look, what maps and pictures, and devices and things, neatly, delicately.
Enter Gentleman
35 [Aside] Mass, here he comes. He should be a gentleman. I like his beard well. [To Gentleman] All happiness to your worship.
GENTLEMAN You're kindly welcome, sir.
PUTTOCK [to Ravenshaw] A simple salutation.
40 RAVENSHAW [to Puttock] Mass, it seems the gentleman makes great account of him.
PIEBOARD [to Gentleman] I have the thing here for you, sir.
GENTLEMAN []
PIEBOARD [aside to Gentleman] I beseech you, conceal me,
45 sir. I'm undone else.—I have the masque here for you, sir. Look you, sir.—[Aside to Gentleman] I beseech your worship first to pardon my rudeness, for my extremes makes me bolder than I would be. I am a poor gentleman and a scholar, and now most unfortunately fall'n into the fangs of unmerciful officers, arrested for debt, which though small, I am not able to compass by reason I'm destitute of lands, money, and friends. So that if I fall into the hungry swallow of the prison, I am like utterly to perish, and with fees and extortions be 50 pinched clean to the bone. Now, if ever pity had interest in the blood of a gentleman, I beseech you vouchsafe but to favour that means of my escape which I have already thought upon.
GENTLEMAN [aside to Pieboard] Go forward.
60 PUTTOCK [to Ravenshaw] I warrant he likes it rarely.
PIEBOARD [aside to Gentleman] In the plunge of my extremities, being giddy and doubtful what to do, at last it was put into my labouring thoughts to make happy use of this paper. And to blear their unlettered eyes, I told them there was a device for a masque drawn in't, and that, but for their interception, I was going to a gentleman to receive my reward for't. They, greedy at this word and hoping to make purchase of me, offered their attendance to go along with me. My hap was to make bold with your door, sir, which my thoughts showed me the most fairest and comfortablest entrance, and I hope I have happened right upon understanding and pity. May it please your good worship, then, but to uphold my device, which is to let one of your men 70 put me out at backdoor, and I shall be bound to your worship forever.
- GENTLEMAN By my troth, an excellent device.
PUTTOCK An excellent device, he says. He likes it wonderfully.
GENTLEMAN O' my faith, I never heard a better. 80
RAVENSHAW Hark, he swears he never heard a better, sergeant.
PUTTOCK O there's no talk on't. He is an excellent scholar, and especially for a masque.
GENTLEMAN [to Pieboard] Give me your paper, your device. 85
I was never better pleased in all my life. Good wit, brave wit, finely wrought. Come in, sir, and receive your money, sir. [Exit Gentleman]
PIEBOARD I'll follow your good worship.—You heard how he liked it now? 90
PUTTOCK Puh, we know he could not choose but like it. Go thy ways. Thou art a witty fine fellow, i'faith. Thou shalt discourse it to us at tavern anon, wilt thou?
PIEBOARD Ay, ay, that I will. Look, sergeants, here are maps, and pretty toys. Be doing in the mean time. I shall quickly have told out the money, you know. 95
PUTTOCK Go, go, little villain, fetch thy chink. I begin to love thee. I'll be drunk tonight in thy company.
PIEBOARD [aside]
This gentleman I may well call a part
Of my salvation in these earthly evils, 100
For he has saved me from three hungry devils. Exit
PUTTOCK Sirrah, sergeant, these maps are pretty painted things, but I could ne'er fancy 'em yet. Methinks they're too busy and full of circles and conjurations. They say all the world's in one of them, but I could ne'er find the 105 Counter in the Poultry.
RAVENSHAW I think so. How could you find it? For you know it stands behind the houses.
DOGSON Mass, that's true. Then we must look a'th' backside for't. 'Sfoot, here's nothing, all's bare. 110
RAVENSHAW I warrant thee that stands for the Counter, for you know there's a company of bare fellows there.
PUTTOCK Faith, like enough, sergeant, I never marked so much before. Sirrah, sergeant and yeoman, I should love these maps out o' cry now if we could see men 115 peep out of door in 'em. O we might have 'em in a morning to our breakfast so finely, and ne'er knock our heels to the ground a whole day for 'em.
RAVENSHAW Ay, marry, sir, I'd buy one then myself. But this talk is by the way. Where shall's sup tonight? Five pound received. Let's talk of that. I have a trick worth all. You two shall bear him to th' tavern, whilst I go close with his hostess and work out of her. I know she would be glad of the sum to finger money because she knows 'tis but a desperate debt and full of hazard. What 130 PUTTOCK Why, I would call thee King of Sergeants, and thou shouldst be chronicled in the Counter book forever.

RAVENSHAW Well, put it to me. We'll make a night on't, i'faith.

DOGSON 'Sfoot, I think he receives more money, he stays so long.

135 PUTTOCK He tarries long indeed. Maybe I can tell you, upon the good liking on't, the gentleman may prove more bountiful.

RAVENSHAW That would be rare. We'll search him.

PUTTOCK Nay, be sure of it, we'll search him and make him light enough.

140 Enter the Gentleman

RAVENSHAW O here comes the Gentleman. By your leave, sir.

GENTLEMAN God you good e'en, sirs. Would you speak with me?

145 PUTTOCK No, not with your worship, sir. Only we are bold to stay for a friend of ours that went in with your worship.

GENTLEMAN Who? Not the scholar?

PUTTOCK Yes, e'en he, an it please your worship.

150 GENTLEMAN Did he make you stay for him? He did you wrong then. Why, I can assure you he's gone above an hour ago.

RAVENSHAW How, sir?

GENTLEMAN I paid him his money, and my man told me he went out at backdoor.

155 PUTTOCK Backdoor?

GENTLEMAN Why, what's the matter?

PUTTOCK He was our prisoner, sir. We did arrest him.

GENTLEMAN What? He was not. You, the sheriff's officers, you were to blame then. Why did you not make known to me as much? I could have kept him for you. I protest, he received all of me in Britain gold of the last coining.

160 RAVENSHAW Vengeance dog him with't.

PUTTOCK 'Sfoot, has he gulled us so?

DOGSON Where shall we sup now, sergeants?

165 PUTTOCK Sup, Simon, now, eat porridge for a month.—
[To Gentleman] Well, we cannot impute it to any lack of goodwill in your worship. You did but as another would have done. 'Twas our hard fortunes to miss the purchase. But if e'er we clutch him again, the Counter shall charm him.

RAVENSHAW The Hole shall rot him.

DOGSON Amen. Exeunt [all but the Gentleman]

GENTLEMAN So,
Vex out your lungs without doors. I am proud 175 It was my hap to help him. It fell fit.
He went not empty neither for his wit.
Alas poor wretch, I could not blame his brain
To labour his delivery to be free
From their un pitying fangs. I'm glad it stood 180 Within my power to do a scholar good. Exit

Enter in the prison, meeting, George Pieboard and Captain, Pieboard coming in muffled.

3.5 CAPTAIN How now, who's that? What are you?

PIEBOARD The same that I should be, captain.

CAPTAIN George Pieboard, honest George, why camst thou in half-faced, muffled so?

PIEBOARD O captain, I thought we should ne'er ha' laughed
5 again, never spent frolic hour again.

CAPTAIN Why, why?

PIEBOARD
I, coming to prepare thee and with news
As happy as thy quick delivery,
Was traced out by the scent. Arrested, captain.
10 CAPTAIN Arrested, George?

PIEBOARD Arrested. Guess, guess, how many dogs do you think I'd upon me?

CAPTAIN Dogs? I say, I know not.

PIEBOARD
15 Almost as many as George Stone the bear.
Three at once, three at once.

CAPTAIN How didst thou shake 'em off then?

PIEBOARD
The time is busy and calls upon our wits.
Let it suffice,
Here I stand safe and 'scaped by miracle.
20 Some other hour shall tell thee, when we'll steep
Our eyes in laughter. Captain, my device
Leans to thy happiness, for ere the day
Be spent to th' girdle, thou shalt be set free.
The Corporal's in his first sleep, the chain is missed,
25 Thy kinsman has expressed thee, and the old knight
With palsy hams now labours thy release.
What rests is all in thee to conjure, captain.

- 30 CAPTAIN Conjure? 'Sfoot, George, you know the devil o' conjuring, I can conjure.
PIEBOARD The devil of conjuring, nay by my fay, I'd not have thee do so much, captain, as the devil o' conjuring. Look here, I ha' brought thee a circle ready characterized and all.
- 35 CAPTAIN 'Sfoot, George, art in thy right wits? Dost know what thou sayst? Why dost talk to a captain o' conjuring? Didst thou ever hear of a captain conjure in thy life? Dost call't a circle? 'Tis too wide a thing, methinks. Had it been a lesser circle, then I knew what to have done.
- 40 PIEBOARD Why, every fool knows that, captain. Nay, then I'll not cog with you, captain. If you'll stay and hang the next sessions, you may.
CAPTAIN No, by my faith, George, come, come, let's to conjuring, let's to conjuring.
- 45 PIEBOARD But if you look to be released, as my wits have took pain to work it and all means wrought to farther it, besides to put crowns in your purse to make you a man of better hopes. And whereas before you were a captain
50 or poor soldier, to make you now a commander of rich fools, which is truly the only best purchase peace can allow you, safer than highways, heath, or cony groves, and yet a far better booty. For your greatest thieves are never hanged, never hanged, for, why, they're wise
55 and cheat within doors. And we geld fools of more money in one night than your false-tailed gelding will purchase in a twelvemonth's running. Which confirms the old beldam's saying, he's wisest that keeps himself warmest, that is, he that robs by a good fire.
- 60 CAPTAIN Well opened, i'faith. George, thou hast pulled that saying out of the husk.
PIEBOARD Captain Idle, 'tis no time now to delude or delay. The old knight will be here suddenly. I'll perfect you, direct you, tell you the trick on't. 'Tis nothing.
- 65 CAPTAIN 'Sfoot, George, I know not what to say to't. Conjure? I shall be hanged ere I conjure.
PIEBOARD Nay, tell not me of that, captain. You'll ne'er conjure after you're hanged, I warrant you. Look you, sir, a parlous matter, sure, first to spread your circle 70 upon the ground, then with a little conjuring ceremony, as I'll have an hackney-man's wand silvered o'er o' purpose for you, then arriving in the circle, with a huge word and a great trample. As for instance, have you
- never seen a stalking stamping player that will raise a tempest with his tongue and thunder with his heels? 75
CAPTAIN O yes, yes, yes, often, often.
PIEBOARD Why, be like such a one, for anything will blear the old knight's eyes. For you must note that he'll ne'er dare to venture into the room, only perhaps peep fearfully through the keyhole to see how the play goes forward. 80
CAPTAIN Well, I may go about it when I will, but mark the end on't. I shall but shame myself, i'faith, George. Speak big words and stamp and stare, an he look in at keyhole. Why, the very thought of that would make me laugh outright and spoil all. Nay, I'll tell thee, George, when I apprehend a thing once, I am of such a laxative laughter that, if the devil himself stood by, I should laugh in his face. 85
PIEBOARD Puh, that's but the babe of a man and may easily be hushed, as to think upon some disaster, some sad misfortune, as the death of thy father i'the country.
CAPTAIN 'Sfoot, that would be the more to drive me into such an ecstasy that I should ne'er lin laughing. 90
PIEBOARD Why, then think upon going to hanging else. 95
CAPTAIN Mass, that's well remembered. Now I'll do well, I warrant thee. Ne'er fear me now. But how shall I do, George, for boisterous words and horrible names?
PIEBOARD Puh, any fustian invocations, captain, will serve as well as the best, so you rant them out well. Or you may go to a 'pothecary's shop and take all the words from the boxes. 100
CAPTAIN Troth and you say true, George, there's strange words enough to raise a hundred quacksalvers, though they be ne'er so poor when they begin. But here lies the fear on't, how if in this false conjuration a true devil should pop up indeed. 105
PIEBOARD A true devil, captain, why there was ne'er such a one. Nay, faith, he that has this place is as false a knave as our last church warden. 110
CAPTAIN Then he is false enough o' conscience i'faith, George.
- The Cry at Marshalsea [is heard]*
- CRY PRISONERS
Good gentlemen over the way, send your relief,
Good gentlemen over the way—good Sir Godfrey—
[Enter Sir Godfrey, Edmond, and Nicholas]

- NICHOLAS Master, that's my kinsman yonder in the buff jerkin. Kinsman, that's my master yonder i'th' taffety hat. Pray salute him entirely.
Captain and Sir Godfrey salute, and Pieboard salutes Master Edmond
- SIR GODFREY [to Captain] Now, my friend—
- 120 PIEBOARD [to Edmond] May I partake your name, sir?
 EDMOND My name is Master Edmond.
 PIEBOARD Master Edmond, are you not a Welshman, sir?
 EDMOND A Welshman? Why?
 PIEBOARD Because Master is your Christian name, and 125 Edmond your surname.
 EDMOND O no, I have more names at home. Master Edmond Plus is my full name at length.
 PIEBOARD O cry you mercy, sir.
Edmond and Pieboard whisper [aside]
- 130 CAPTAIN [to Sir Godfrey] I understand that you are my kinsman's good master, and, in regard of that, the best of my skill is at your service. But had you fortun'd a mere stranger and made no means to me by acquaintance, I should have utterly denied to have been the man, both by reason of the Act passed in Parliament against conjurors and witches, as also because I would 135 not have my art vulgar, trite, and common.
 SIR GODFREY I much commend your care therein, good Captain Conjuror, and that I will be sure to have it private enough, you shall do't in my sister's house, 140 mine own house I may call it, for both our charges therein are proportioned.
 CAPTAIN Very good, sir. What may I call your loss, sir?
 SIR GODFREY O you may call't a great loss, sir, a grievous loss, sir, as goodly a chain of gold, though I say it, that 145 wore it.—How say'st thou, Nicholas?
 NICHOLAS O 'twas as delicious a chain o'gold, kinsman, you know—
 SIR GODFREY You know? Did you know't, captain?
 CAPTAIN [aside] Trust a fool with secrets.—Sir, he may say 150 I know. His meaning is, because my art is such, that by it I may gather a knowledge of all things.
 SIR GODFREY Ay, very true.
- CAPTAIN [aside] A pox of all fools. The excuse stuck upon my tongue like ship pitch upon a mariner's gown, not to come off in haste.—By'r Lady, knight, to lose such a fair chain o' gold were a foul loss. Well, I can put you in this good comfort on't. If it be between heaven and earth, knight, I'll ha't for you. 155
- SIR GODFREY A wonderful conjuror. O ay, 'tis between heaven and earth, I warrant you. It cannot go out of the realm. I know 'tis somewhere above the earth. 160
- CAPTAIN [aside] Ay, nigher the earth than thou wotst on.
 SIR GODFREY For, first, my chain was rich, and no rich thing shall enter into heaven, you know.
 NICHOLAS And as for the devil, master, he has no need on't, for you know he has a great chain of his own. 165
 SIR GODFREY Thou sayest true, Nicholas, but he has put off that now that lies by him.
 CAPTAIN Faith, knight, in few words, I presume so much upon the power of my art that I could warrant your chain again. 170
 SIR GODFREY O dainty captain.
 CAPTAIN Marry, it will cost me much sweat. I were better go to sixteen hothouses.
 SIR GODFREY Ay, good man, I warrant thee. 175
 CAPTAIN Beside great vexation of kidney and liver.
 NICHOLAS O 'twill tickle you hereabouts, cousin, because you have not been used to't.
 SIR GODFREY No, have you not been used to't, captain?
 CAPTAIN [aside] Plague of all fools still.—Indeed, knight, 180 I have not used it a good while, and therefore 'twill strain me so much the more you know.
 SIR GODFREY O it will, it will.
 CAPTAIN [aside] What plunges he puts me to. Were not this knight a fool, I had been twice spoiled now. That captain's worse than accursed that has an ass to his kinsman. 'Sfoot, I fear he will drivell 't out before I come to't.—Now, sir, to come to the point indeed. You see I stick here in the jaw of the Marshalsea and cannot do't. 185
 SIR GODFREY Tut, tut, I know thy meaning. Thou wouldst say thou'rt a prisoner. I tell thee thou'rt none. 190
 CAPTAIN How none? Why, is not this the Marshalsea?

117 taffety glossy silk

134-5 Act . . . against conjurors and witches

The 1604 statute against conjuration and witchcraft specifically forbade using sorcery to seek for lost goods, or 'treasure of gold or silver'.

139 private . . . in my sister's house play on puritan conference or conventicle movement, the meetings for which were often held in a 'private house', and regarded suspiciously by the authorities as promoting any number of extremist activities. Canon 72 of the Canons of 1604 ('Ministers not to appoint public or private fasts or prophecies, or to exorcise, but by authority') was specifically designed to counter such episodes as had occurred in conjunction with the exorcisms performed in the late 1590s by the puritan exorcist John Darrell. The Canon included stipulations against 'private houses' and against any attempt 'by fasting and prayer, to cast out any Devil or Devils, under pain of the imputation of imposture or cozenage, and deposition from the ministry'.

156-71 fair chain . . . chain again passages play on a variety of secular and religious meanings of 'chain'; see 2.2.6-7

160 warrant assure

162 wotst on know about

163-4 no rich thing . . . into heaven Mark 10:24: 'It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God'.

165-6 the devil . . . own See Rev. 20:1, 2, 7, 8: 'And I saw an angel come down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, and a great chain in his hand. And he took the dragon . . . which is the devil and Satan, and he bound him a thousand years . . . - SIR GODFREY
Wilt hear me speak? I heard of thy rare conjuring.
My chain was lost. I sweat for thy release
195 As thou shalt do the like at home for me.
Keeper—
Enter Keeper
- KEEPER Sir?
SIR GODFREY Speak. Is not this man free?
KEEPER Yes, at his pleasure, sir, the fees discharged.
200 SIR GODFREY Go, go, I'll discharge them, ay.
KEEPER I thank your worship. Exit
- CAPTAIN Now trust me, you're a dear knight, kindness unexpected. O there's nothing to a free gentleman. I will conjure for you, sir, till froth come through my 205 buff jerkin.
SIR GODFREY Nay, then, thou shalt not pass with so little a bounty, for at the first sight of my chain again, forty fine angels shall appear unto thee.
CAPTAIN 'Twill be a glorious show, i'faith, knight, a very 210 fine show. But are all these of your own house? Are you sure of that, sir?
SIR GODFREY Ay, ay, no, no. What's he yonder talking with my wild nephew? Pray heaven, he give him good counsel.
215 CAPTAIN Who, he? He's a rare friend of mine, an admirable fellow, knight, the finest fortune-teller.
SIR GODFREY O 'tis he indeed that came to my lady sister and foretold the loss of my chain. I am not angry with him now, for I see 'twas my fortune to lose it. [To 220 Pieboard] By your leave, Master Fortune-teller, I had a glimpse on you at home at my sister's, the widow's.
There you prophesied of the loss of a chain. Simply though I stand here, I was he that lost it.
PIEBOARD Was it you, sir?
225 EDMOND [to Sir Godfrey] O' my troth, nuncle, he's the rarest fellow. He's told me my fortune so right. I find it so right to my nature.
SIR GODFREY What is't? God send it a good one.
EDMOND O 'tis a passing good one, nuncle, for he says I 230 shall prove such an excellent gamester in my time that I shall spend all faster than my father got it.
SIR GODFREY There's a fortune indeed.
EDMOND Nay, it hits my humour so pat.
SIR GODFREY Ay, that will be the end on't. Will the curse of 235 the beggar prevail so much that the son shall consume
- that foolishly which the father got craftily? Ay, ay, ay,
'twill, 'twill, 'twill.
PIEBOARD Stay, stay, stay.
Pieboard [opens] an almanac, and [takes aside] the Captain
CAPTAIN Turn over, George.
PIEBOARD June, July, here July, that's this month. Sunday 240 thirteen, yesterday fourteen, today fifteen.
CAPTAIN Look quickly for the fifteen day. If within the compass of these two days there would be some boisterous storm or other, it would be the best. I'd defer him off till then, some tempest, an it be thy will. 245
PIEBOARD Here's the fifteen day: [Reading] 'hot and fair.'
CAPTAIN Puh, would 't'ad been hot and foul.
PIEBOARD The sixteen day, that's tomorrow: 'the morning for the most part fair and pleasant.'
CAPTAIN No luck. 250
PIEBOARD 'But about high noon ligh'ning and thunder.'
CAPTAIN Ligh'ning and thunder, admirable, best of all, I'll conjure tomorrow just at high noon, George.
PIEBOARD Happen but true tomorrow, almanac, and I'll 255 give thee leave to lie all the year after.
CAPTAIN [to Sir Godfrey] Sir, I must crave your patience to bestow this day upon me that I may furnish myself strongly. I sent a spirit into Lancashire t'other day to fetch back a knave drover, and I look for his return this 260 evening. Tomorrow morning, my friend here and I will come and breakfast with you.
SIR GODFREY O you shall be both most welcome.
CAPTAIN And about noon, without fail, I purpose to conjure.
SIR GODFREY Midnight will be a fine time for you. 265
EDMOND Conjuring? Do you mean to conjure at our house tomorrow, sir?
CAPTAIN Marry, do I sir. 'Tis my intent, young gentleman.
EDMOND By my troth, I'll love you while I live for't. O rare,
Nicholas, we shall have conjuring tomorrow. 270
NICHOLAS Puh, ay, I could ha' told you of that.
CAPTAIN [aside] La, he could ha' told him of that, fool,
coxcomb, could ye?
EDMOND [to Captain] Do you hear me, sir? I desire more acquaintance on you. You shall earn some money of 275 me now I know you can conjure. But can you fetch any that is lost?
CAPTAIN O anything that's lost.

199 the fees discharged when the fees are discharged

208 angels coins, with pun

233 humour temperament

234-5 curse of the beggar proverbial notion that, even as a poor person's children may be wealthy, so the generation following them may be poor again, or 'Twice clogs, once boots.'

241 today fifteen In 1606, 15 July was on a Tuesday, a fact that has been used for dating Puritan no earlier than 1606.

242 the fifteen day No almanac from 1606 has been found to correspond to what is said here about July weather, but Captain's hope for stormy weather on this date coincides with the tradition that rain on St Swithin's Day (15 July) will persist for forty days.

258 I...Lancashire an allusion to Lancashire as a Catholic stronghold, and to the well-known case of the puritan exorcist John Darrell, whose exorcisms included those, in 1597, of Anne and John Starkey of Lancashire. Authorities accused Darrell of perpetrating a fraud, tried and imprisoned him. Richard Bancroft and Samuel Harsnett, Bancroft's chaplain, were deeply involved in the case. Darrell apparently died in prison in 1602, having published several books on secret presses, one of which had been answered by Harsnett. Canon 72 of the Canons of 1604 results in part from the Darrell case; see 3.5.139.

265 Midnoon midday, noon.

280 EDMOND Why, look you, sir, I tell't you as a friend and a conjuror, I should marry a 'pothecary's daughter, and 'twas told me she lost her maidenhead at Stony Stratford. Now if you'll do but so much as conjure for't and make all whole again—
 CAPTAIN That I will, sir.
 285 EDMOND By my troth, I thank you la.
 CAPTAIN [to Sir Godfrey] A little merry with your sister's son, sir.
 SIR GODFREY O a simple young man, very simple. Come,
 Captain, and you, sir. We'll e'en part with a gallon of 290 wine till tomorrow breakfast.
 PIEBOARD and CAPTAIN Troth, agreed sir.
 NICHOLAS Kinsman, scholar.
 PIEBOARD Why, now thou art a good knave, worth a hundred Brownists.
 295 NICHOLAS Am I indeed la? I thank you truly la. Exeunt
Finis Actus Tertius

4.1 Incipit Actus Quartus
Enter Moll and Sir John Pennydub
 PENNYDUB But I hope you will not serve a knight so, gentlewoman, will you? To cashier him and cast him off at your pleasure? What, do you think I was dubbed for nothing? No, by my faith, lady's daughter.
 5 MOLL Pray, Sir John Pennydub, let it be deferred awhile. I have as big a heart to marry as you can have, but as the fortune-teller told me.
 PENNYDUB Pox o'th' fortune-teller. Would Derrick had been his fortune seven year ago to cross my love thus. Did 10 he know what case I was in? Why, this is able to make a man drown himself in's father's fish pond.
 MOLL And then he told me moreover, Sir John, that the breach of it kept my father in purgatory.
 PENNYDUB In purgatory? Why, let him purge out his 15 heart there. What have we to do with that? There's physicians enough there to cast his water. Is that any matter to us? How can he hinder our love? Why, let him be hanged now he's dead. Well have I rid post day and night to bring you merry news of my father's death 20 and now—
 MOLL Thy father's death? Is the old farmer dead?

PENNYDUB As dead as his barn door, Moll.
 MOLL And you'll keep your word with me now, Sir John,
 that I shall have my coach and my coachman.
 PENNYDUB Ay, 'faith. 25
 MOLL And two white horses with black feathers to draw
 it.
 PENNYDUB Too.
 MOLL A guarded lackey to run befor't and pied liveries to come trashing after't. 30
 PENNYDUB Thou shalt, Moll.
 MOLL And to let me have money in my purse to go whither
 I will.
 PENNYDUB All this.
 MOLL Then come, whatsoe'er comes on't, we'll be made 35
 sure together before the maids o'the kitchen. Exeunt
Enter Widow with her eldest daughter Frank and Frailty 4.2

WIDOW How now, where's my brother Sir Godfrey? Went he forth this morning?
 FRAILTY O no, madam, he's above at breakfast with, sir-reverence, a conjuror.
 WIDOW A conjuror? What manner o' fellow is he? 5
 FRAILTY O, a wondrous rare fellow, mistress, very strongly made upward, for he goes in a buff jerkin. He says he will fetch Sir Godfrey's chain again, if it hang between heaven and earth.
 WIDOW What, he will not? Then he's an ex'lent fellow, I 10 warrant.—[Aside] How happy were that woman to be blessed with such a husband, a man o' cunning.—How does he look, Frailty? Very swartly, I warrant, with black beard, scorched cheeks, and smoky eyebrows.
 FRAILTY Foh, he's neither smoke-dried, nor scorched, nor 15 black, nor nothing. I tell you, madam, he looks as fair to see to as one of us. I do not think but if you saw him once you'd take him to be a Christian.
 FRANK So fair and yet so cunning. That's to be wondered at, 20
 Mother.
Enter Sir Oliver Muckhill and Sir Andrew Tipstaff
 MUCKHILL Bless you, sweet lady.
 TIPSTAFF And you, fair mistress. Exit Frailty WIDOW Coads! What do you mean, gentlemen? Fie, did I not give you your answers?

 (brother to Middleton's brother-in-law Allen Waterer), one of the earliest separatists in London, was examined in 1593 prior to the execution of Brownists Henry Barrow and John Greenwood. He testified that he had been a prisoner in Newgate for three years and had attended an assembly near Bedlam. In 1609, he was indicted for attending an assembly and again put in Newgate. Middleton was not on good terms with the Waterers.

Well, I will not stick with you now for a kiss.
[To Frank] Daughter, kiss the gentleman for once.
- FRANK
Yes, forsooth. [She kisses Tipstaff]
- TIPSTAFF I'm proud of such a favour.
- 30 WIDOW Truly la, Sir Oliver, you're much to blame to come again when you know my mind so well delivered as a widow could deliver a thing.
- MUCKHILL But I expect a farther comfort, lady.
- WIDOW Why, la you now. Did I not desire you to put off your suit quit and clean when you came to me again?
- 35 How say you? Did I not?
- MUCKHILL But the sincere love which my heart bears you—
- WIDOW Go to, I'll cut you off and, Sir Oliver, to put you in comfort afar off, my fortune is read me. I must marry again.
- 40 MUCKHILL O blest fortune!
- WIDOW But not as long as I can choose. Nay, I'll hold out well.
- 45 MUCKHILL Yet are my hopes now fairer.
Enter Frailty
- FRAILTY O madam, madam—
- WIDOW How now, what's the haste?
[Frailty whispers] in the Widow's ear
- TIPSTAFF [to Frank] Faith, Mistress Frances, I'll maintain you gallantly. I'll bring you to court, wean you among the fair society of ladies, poor kinswomen of mine, in cloth of silver. Beside you shall have your monkey, your parrot, your musk-cat, and your piss, piss, piss.
- 50 FRANK It will do very well.
- WIDOW [aside to Frailty] What does he mean to conjure here then? How shall I do to be rid of these knights?— [To Tipstaff and Muckhill] Please you, gentlemen, to walk a while i'th' garden. Go gather a pink or a gillyflower.
- TIPSTAFF and MUCKHILL With all our hearts, lady, and count us favoured.
- Exeunt Tipstaff and Muckhill; [Widow, Frank and Frailty go into an adjoining room]*
- 60 SIR GODFREY (within) Step in, Nicholas.
[Enter Nicholas]
Look, is the coast clear?
- NICHOLAS O as clear as a cat's eye, sir.
- SIR GODFREY (within) Then enter, Captain Conjuror.
Enter Sir Godfrey, Captain, Pieboard, and Edmond
[to Captain] Now, how like you your room, sir?
- 65 CAPTAIN O wonderful convenient.
- EDMOND I can tell you, captain, simply though it lies here, 'tis the fairest room in my mother's house, as dainty a room to conjure in, methinks. Why, you may bid I cannot tell how many devils welcome in't. My father has had twenty here at once.
- 70 PIEBOARD What devils?
- EDMOND Devils? No, deputies, and the wealthiest men he could get.
- SIR GODFREY Nay, put by your chats now, fall to your business roundly. The fescue of the dial is upon the criss-cross of noon. But, O hear me, captain, a qualm comes o'er my stomach.
- 75 CAPTAIN Why, what's the matter, sir?
- SIR GODFREY O how if the devil should prove a knave and tear the hangings?
- 80 CAPTAIN Fuh, I warrant you, Sir Godfrey.
- EDMOND Ay, nuncle, or spit fire upo'th' ceiling.
- SIR GODFREY Very true, too, for 'tis but thin plastered and 'twill quickly take hold o' the laths. And if he chance to spit downward too, he will burn all the boards.
- 85 CAPTAIN My life for yours, Sir Godfrey.
- SIR GODFREY My sister is very curious and dainty o'er this room, I can tell, and therefore if he must needs spit, I pray desire him to spit i'th' chimney.
- 90 PIEBOARD Why, assure you, Sir Godfrey, he shall not be brought up with so little manners to spit and spaule o'th' floor.
- SIR GODFREY Why, I thank you, good captain. Pray, have a care, ay, fall to your circle. We'll not trouble you, I warrant you. Come, we'll into the next room, and because we'll be sure to keep him out there, we'll bar up the door with some of the godlies' zealous works.
- 95 EDMOND That will be a fine device, nuncle. And because the ground shall be as holy as the door, I'll tear two or three rosaries in pieces and strew the leaves about the chamber. [It thunders] O the devil already—[Sir Godfrey, Edmond, and Nicholas] run in[to adjoining room]

76 criss-cross The meridional line in the old dial plate was distinguished by a cross; in ELD, 'chrisse-crosse'
91 spaule expectorate
96-7 bar...works mocking allusion to lengthy religious treatises by those eager for more reform. 'Zealous' and 'godly' were commonly used to stigmatize puritans.
100 rosaries another example of the play's conflation of puritan and papist. While the word 'rosary' was occasionally adopted by protestants (as in Philip Stubbes's book of prayers, The rosarie of Christian praiers and meditations, 1583), rosaries were primarily understood to be the prayer beads of Catholics. In 1606, one of the statutes responding to the Gunpowder Plot forbade anyone to import, buy, sell, or print any 'popish' primers, psalters, manuals, rosaries, catechisms, missals, breviaries, or lives of saints (3 Jac.I.c.5).

- PIEBOARD 'Sfoot, captain, speak somewhat, for shame. It lightens and thunders before thou wilt begin. Why, when?
- 105 CAPTAIN Pray, peace, George. Thou'lt make me laugh anon and spoil all.
- PIEBOARD O now it begins again. Now, now, now, captain.
- CAPTAIN Rumbos—ragdayon, pur, pur, colucundrion, Hois—Plois
- 110 SIR GODFREY (speaking through the keyhole within) O admirable conjuror, he's fetched thunder already.
- PIEBOARD Hark, hark, again, captain.
- CAPTAIN Benjamino,—gaspois—kay—gosgothoteron—unbrois
- 115 SIR GODFREY [within] O I would the devil would come away quickly. He has no conscience to put a man to such pain.
- PIEBOARD Again.
- CAPTAIN Flowste—Kakopumpos—dragone—Leloomenos—hodge-podge
- 120 PIEBOARD Well said, captain.
- SIR GODFREY [within] So long a coming? O would I had ne'er begun't now, for I fear me these roaring tempests will destroy all the fruits of the earth and tread upon my corn, O, i'th' country.
- 125 CAPTAIN Gog de gog, hobgoblin, huncks, Hounslow, Hockley te Combe Park
- WIDOW [within] O, brother, brother, what a tempest's i'th' garden. Sure there's some conjuration abroad.
- 130 SIR GODFREY [within] 'Tis at home, sister.
- PIEBOARD By and by, I'll step in, captain.
- CAPTAIN Nunck-Nunck—Rip—Gascoynes, Ipis, Drip—Dro-pite
- 135 SIR GODFREY [within] He drips and drops, poor man, alas, alas.
- PIEBOARD Now I come.
- CAPTAIN O Sulphure Soot-face
- PIEBOARD Arch-conjuror, what wouldst thou with me?
- 140 SIR GODFREY [within] O the devil, sister, i'th' dining chamber, sing, sister. I warrant you, that will keep him out, quickly, quickly, quickly.
- Sir Godfrey goes in*
- PIEBOARD So, so, so, I'll release thee. Enough, captain, enough. Allow us some time to laugh a little. They're shuddering and shaking by this time as if an earthquake were in their kidneys.
- 145 CAPTAIN Sirrah, George, how was't, how was't? Did I do't well enough?
- PIEBOARD Wilt believe me, captain? Better than any conjuror, for here was no harm in this and yet their horrible expectation satisfied well. You were much beholding to thunder and lightning at this time. It graced you well, I can tell you.
- 150 CAPTAIN I must needs say so, George. Sirrah, if we could ha' conveyed hither cleanly a cracker or a firewheel, 't'ad been admirable.
- 155 PIEBOARD Blurt, blurt, there's nothing remains to put thee to pain now, captain.
- CAPTAIN Pain? I protest, George, my heels are sorer than a Whitsun morris dancer.
- 160 PIEBOARD All's past now, only to reveal that the chain's i'th' garden, where thou know'st it has lain these two days.
- CAPTAIN But I fear that fox Nicholas has revealed it already.
- 165 PIEBOARD Fear not, captain. You must put it to th' venture now. Nay, 'tis time. Call upon 'em, take pity on 'em, for I believe some of 'em are in a pitiful case by this time.
- CAPTAIN Sir Godfrey, Nicholas kinsman—'Sfoot, they're fast at it still George. Sir Godfrey—
- [Enter Sir Godfrey, Widow, and Nicholas]
- 170 SIR GODFREY O is that the devil's voice? How comes he to know my name?
- CAPTAIN Fear not, Sir Godfrey, all's quieted.
- SIR GODFREY What, is he laid?
- 175 CAPTAIN Laid, and has newly dropped your chain i'th' garden.
- SIR GODFREY I'th' garden? In our garden?
- CAPTAIN Your garden.
- SIR GODFREY O sweet conjuror, whereabouts there?
- CAPTAIN Look well about a bank of rosemary.
- 180 SIR GODFREY Sister, the rosemary bank. Come, come, there's my chain, he says.

103 lightens flashes lightning

108 Rumbos—ragdayon, pur, pur The Captain's language of conjuring is a hodgepodge of comically feigned Greek-sounding words, with this first line coming the closest of any to containing real and appropriate Greek. 'Rumbos', for rhombos or rhombos, is the term for the special wheel used in magical rites. 'Ragdayon' is from the adjective rhagdaios, meaning 'violent' or 'furious', as applied to rain storms and lightning. 'Pur' is pyr, or 'fire'.

113 gosgothoteron -oteron is a suffix for a comparative adjective or adverb form, but the root of the work is not recognizable Greek.

119 Kakopumpos...Leloomenos two pseudo-Greek words

126-7 Hounslow, Hockley te Combe Park These three towns—Hounslow (on the Western coach road in Middlesex), Hockley in the Hole (on the N. W. Road, or Watling Street) and Combe Park (in Surrey)—were known as the scenes of many highway robberies.

154 cracker firework which explodes with a sharp report

firewheel rotating firework

156 blurt exclamation of contempt

159 Whitsun a parish festival held during the season of Whit Sunday or Whitsuntide, Whit Sunday being the seventh Sunday after Easter, to mark Pentecost morris dancer dancers in fancy costumes whose dance usually represents characters in the Robin Hood legend; a mumming performance involving fantastic dancing

- WIDOW O happiness, run, run.
 [Exeunt Sir Godfrey, Widow, and Nicholas]
 EDMOND (at keyhole) Captain Conjuror?
 CAPTAIN Who? Master Edmond?
 185 EDMOND [at keyhole] Ay, Master Edmond. May I come in safely without danger, think you?
 CAPTAIN
 Fuh, long ago. 'Tis all as 'twas at first.
 Fear nothing.
 [Enter Edmond]
 Pray, come near. How now, man?
 EDMOND O this room's mightily hot, i'faith. 'Slid, my shirt 190 sticks to my belly already. What a steam the rogue has left behind him. Foh, this room must be aired, gentlemen. It smells horribly of brimstone. Let's open the windows.
 PIEBOARD Faith, Master Edmond, 'tis but your conceit.
 195 EDMOND I would you could make me believe that, i'faith.
 Why, do you think I cannot smell his savour from another? Yet I take it kindly from you because you would not put me in a fear, i'faith. O' my troth, I shall love you for this the longest day of my life.
 200 CAPTAIN Puh, 'tis nothing, sir. Love me when you see more.
 EDMOND Mass, now I remember. I'll look whether he has singed the hangings or no.
 PIEBOARD [aside to the Captain] Captain, to entertain a little 205 sport till they come, make him believe you'll charm him invisible. He's apt to admire anything, you see. Let me alone to give force to't.
 CAPTAIN [aside to Pieboard] Go, retire to yonder end then.
 EDMOND [to Captain] I protest you are a rare fellow, are 210 you not?
 CAPTAIN O Master Edmond, you know but the least part of me yet. Why, now at this instant I could but flourish my wand thrice o'er your head and charm you invisible.
 EDMOND What? You could not. Make me walk invisible, 215 man? I should laugh at that, i'faith. Troth, I'll requite your kindness, an you'll do't, good Captain Conjuror.
 CAPTAIN Nay, I should hardly deny you such a small kindness, Master Edmond Plus. Why, look you, sir, 'tis 220 no more but this, and thus, and again, and now you're invisible.
 EDMOND Am I, i'faith? Who would think it?
 CAPTAIN You see the fortune-teller yonder at farther end o'th' chamber? Go toward him. Do what you will with him, he shall ne'er find you.
 225 EDMOND Say you so? I'll try that, i'faith.
He jostles Pieboard
 PIEBOARD How now, captain, who's that jostled me?
 CAPTAIN Jostled you? I saw nobody.
 EDMOND Ha, ha, ha. Say 'twas a spirit.
 CAPTAIN Shall I? Maybe some spirit that haunts the circle.
Edmond pulls Pieboard by the nose
 230 PIEBOARD O my nose, again. Pray conjure then, captain.
- EDMOND Troth, this is ex'lent. I may do any knavery now and never be seen. And now I remember me, Sir Godfrey, my uncle abused me t'other day and told tales of me to my mother. Troth, now I'm invisible, I'll hit him a sound wherret o'th' ear when he comes out o'th' 235 garden. I may be revenged on him now finely.
Enter Sir Godfrey, Widow, Frank, and Nicholas with the chain
 SIR GODFREY
 I have my chain again, my chain's found again,
 O sweet captain, O admirable conjuror.
Edmond strikes Sir Godfrey
 O what mean you by that, nephew?
 EDMOND
 Nephew? I hope you do not know me, uncle? 240
 WIDOW
 Why did you strike your uncle, sir?
 EDMOND
 Why, captain, am I not invisible?
 CAPTAIN [aside to Pieboard]
 A good jest, George.—
 [To Edmond] Not now you are not, sir.
 Why, did you not see me when I did uncharm you? 245
 EDMOND
 Not I, by my troth, captain.—
 [To Sir Godfrey] Then, pray you, pardon me, uncle.
 I thought I'd been invisible when I struck you.
 SIR GODFREY
 So, you would do't. Go, you're a foolish boy,
 And were I not o'ercome with greater joy,
 250 I'd make you taste correction.
 EDMOND [aside] Correction, push. No, neither you nor my mother shall think to whip me as you have done.
 SIR GODFREY Captain, my joy is such I know not how to thank you. Let me embrace you, hug you. O my sweet 255 chain. Gladness e'en makes me giddy, rare man. 'Twas as just i'th' rosemary bank as if one should ha' laid it there. O cunning, cunning.
 WIDOW Well, seeing my fortune tells me I must marry, let me marry a man of wit, a man of parts. Here's a worthy 260 captain, and 'tis a fine title truly la to be a captain's wife, a captain's wife. It goes very finely. Beside all the world knows that a worthy captain is a fit companion to any lord. Then why not a sweet bedfellow for any lady. I'll have it so. 265
Enter Frailty
 FRAILTY O mistress, gentlemen, there's the bravest sight coming along this way.
 WIDOW What brave sight?
 FRAILTY O one going to burying and another going to 270 hanging.
 WIDOW A rueful sight.
 PIEBOARD [aside to Captain] 'Sfoot, captain, I'll pawn my life the corporal's coffined, and old Skirmish the soldier going to execution. And 'tis now full about the time of 192 brimstone sulphur

 194 conceit imagination

196 savour aroma
 235 wherret slap, blow

- 275 his waking. Hold out a little longer, sleepy potion, and we shall have ex'lent admiration, for I'll take upon me the cure of him.
Enter the coffin of the Corporal, the soldier Skirmish bound and led by Officers, the Sheriff there
- FRAILTY O here they come, here they come.
 PIEBOARD [aside] Now must I close secretly with the soldier, prevent his impatience, or else all's discovered.
- 280 WIDOW O lamentable seeing! These were those brothers that fought and bled before our door.
 SIR GODFREY What? They were not, sister.
 SKIRMISH [aside to Pieboard] George, look to't. I'll peach at Tyburn else.
- 285 PIEBOARD [aside to Skirmish] Mum.—Gentles all, vouchsafe me audience, and you especially, Master Sheriff. Yon man is bound to execution Because he wounded this that now lies coffined.
- 290 SHERIFF True, true, he shall have the law, an I know the law.
 PIEBOARD But under favour, Master Sheriff, if this man had been cured and safe again, he should have been released then.
- 295 SHERIFF Why make you question of that, sir?
 PIEBOARD Then I release him freely and will take upon me the death that he should die, if within a little season I do not cure him to his proper health again.
 SHERIFF How, sir, recover a dead man? That were most strange of all.
Frank comes to Pieboard
- FRANK Sweet sir, I love you dearly and could wish my best part yours. O do not undertake such an impossible venture.
 PIEBOARD Love you me? Then for your sweet sake I'll do't.
 305 Let me entreat the corpse to be set down.
 SHERIFF Bearers, set down the coffin. This were wonderful and worthy Stow's Chronicle.
- PIEBOARD I pray, bestow the freedom of the air upon our wholesome art.—[Aside] Mass, his cheeks begin to receive natural warmth. Nay, good corporal, wake betime or I shall have a longer sleep than you. 'Sfoot, if he should prove dead indeed now, he were fully revenged upon me for making a property on him. Yet I had rather run upon the ropes than have the rope like
- a tetter run upon me.—O he stirs, he stirs again, look, gentlemen, he recovers, he starts, he rises.
 SHERIFF O, O defend us, out alas.
 PIEBOARD Nay, pray be still. You'll make him more giddy else. He knows nobody yet.
 CORPORAL 'Swounds, who am I, covered with snow, I marvel?
 PIEBOARD [aside] Nay, I knew he would swear the first thing he did, as soon as ever he came to his life again.
 CORPORAL 'Sfoot, hostess, some hot porridge. O, O, lay on a dozen of faggots in the moon parlour there.
 325 PIEBOARD [to Widow] Lady, you must needs take a little pity of him, i'faith, and send him in to your kitchen fire.
 WIDOW [to Pieboard] O with all my heart, sir. Nicholas and Frailty, help to bear him in.
 NICHOLAS Bear him in, quoth a? Pray call out the maids. I shall ne'er have the heart to do't, indeed la.
 FRAILTY Nor I neither. I cannot abide to handle a ghost, of all men.
 CORPORAL 'Sblood, let me see. Where was I drunk last night, heh?
 WIDOW O, shall I bid you once again take him away?
 FRAILTY Why, we're as fearful as you, I warrant you, O.
 WIDOW Away, villains. Bid the maids make him a caudle presently to settle his brain, or a posset of sack, quickly, 340 quickly.
 [Frailty and Nicholas] exeunt, pushing in the corpse
 SKIRMISH [to Pieboard] Sir, what so e'er you are, I do more than admire you.
 WIDOW O ay, if you knew all, Master Sheriff, as you shall do, you would say then that here were two of the rarest 345 men within the walls of Christendom.
 SHERIFF Two of 'em? O wonderful! Officers, I discharge you. Set him free. All's in tune.
 SIR GODFREY Ay, and a banquet ready by this time, Master Sheriff, to which I most cheerfully invite you and your late prisoner there. See you this goodly chain, sir? Mum, no more words. 'Twas lost and is found again.
 [To Pieboard and Captain] Come, my inestimable bullies, we'll talk of your noble acts in sparkling charneco, and instead of a jester, we'll ha' the ghost i'th' white sheet
 355 sit at upper end o'th' table.
 SHERIFF Ex'lent merry man, i'faith. [Exeunt all but Frank]
 FRANK Well, seeing I am enjoined to love and marry,

276 admiration wonder, astonishment
 277.1 Enter the coffin With the entrance of the coffin, the location of the action changes from inside the Widow's house to outside on the street. No scene division is called for in this instance of discontinuity in place but continuity in action.

Which first begot it. Now, love, play thy part.
The scholar reads his lecture in my heart. [Exit]
Finis Actus Quartus

5.1 Incipit Actus Quintus
Enter in haste Master Edmond and Frailty
EDMOND This is the marriage morning for my mother and my sister.

FRAILTY O me, Master Edmond, we shall ha' rare doings.
EDMOND Nay, go, Frailty, run to the sexton. You know my mother will be married at St Antling's. Hie thee. 'Tis past five. Bid them open the church door. My sister is almost ready.

FRAILTY What? Already, Master Edmond?

EDMOND Nay, go hie thee. First run to the sexton, and run to the clerk, and then run to Master Pigman, the parson, and then run to the milliner, and then run home again.

FRAILTY Here's run, run, run.

EDMOND But hark, Frailty.

15 FRAILTY What more yet?

EDMOND Has the maids rememb'rd to strew the way to the church?

FRAILTY Fough, an hour ago. I help' 'em myself.

EDMOND Away, away, away, away then.

20 FRAILTY Away, away, away then. Exit

EDMOND I shall have a simple father-in-law, a brave captain able to beat all our street, Captain Idle. Now my lady mother will be fitted for a delicate name, my Lady Idle, my Lady Idle, the finest name that can be for a woman. And then the scholar Master Pieboard, my sister Francis. That will be Mistress Francis Pieboard, Mistress Francis Pieboard. They'll keep a good table, I warrant you. Now all the knights' noses are put out of joint. They may go to a bone-setter's now.

Enter Captain and Pieboard

30 Hark, hark. O who come here with two torches before 'em? My sweet captain and my fine scholar. O how bravely they are shot up in one night. They look like fine Britons now, methinks. Here's a gallant change, i'faith. 'Slid, they have hired men and all, by the clock.

35 CAPTAIN Master Edmond, kind, honest, dainty Master Edmond.

EDMOND Fough, sweet captain father-in-law, a rare perfume, i'faith.

PIEBOARD What, are the brides stirring? May we steal upon 'em, thinkst thou, Master Edmond? 40

EDMOND Fough, they're e'en upon readiness, I can assure you, for they were at their torch e'en now. By the same token, I tumbled down the stairs.

PIEBOARD Alas, poor Master Edmond.

Enter musicians

CAPTAIN O the musicians. I prithee, Master Edmond, call 'em in and liquor 'em a little. 45

EDMOND That I will, sweet captain father-in-law, and make each of them as drunk as a common fiddler. Exeunt

Enter Sir John Pennydub, and Moll above lacing of her clothes 5.2

PENNYDUB Whew, Mistress Moll, Mistress Moll.

MOLL Who's there?

PENNYDUB 'Tis I.

MOLL Who? Sir John Pennydub? O you're an early cock, i'faith. Who would have thought you to be so rare a stirrer? 5

PENNYDUB Prithee, Moll, let me come up.

MOLL No, by my faith, Sir John. I'll keep you down, for you knights are very dangerous if once you get above.

PENNYDUB I'll not stay, i'faith. 10

MOLL I'faith, you shall stay, for, Sir John, you must note the nature of the climates. Your northern wench in her own country may well hold out till she be fifteen, but if she touch the south once and come up to London, here the chimes go presently after twelve. 15

PENNYDUB O th'art a mad wench, Moll, but I prithee make haste, for the priest is gone before.

MOLL Do you follow him, I'll not be long after. Exeunt

Enter Sir Oliver Muckhill, Sir Andrew Tipstaff, and old Skirmish talking 5.3

MUCKHILL O monstrous unheard of forgery.

TIPSTAFF Knight, I never heard of such villainy in our own country in my life.

MUCKHILL Why, 'tis impossible. Dare you maintain your words? 5

SKIRMISH Dare we? E'en to their weasand-pipes. We know all their plots. They cannot squander with us. They have knavishly abused us, made only properties on's to advance theirselves upon our shoulders, but they shall rue their abuses. This morning they are to be married. 10

MUCKHILL 'Tis too true. Yet if the Widow be not too much besotted on sleights and forgeries, the revelation of their villainies will make 'em loathsome. And to that end,

- 15 be it in private to you, I sent late last night to an honourable personage, to whom I am much indebted in kindness as he is to me, and therefore presume upon the payment of his tongue, and that he will lay out good words for me. And to speak truth, for such needful occasions, I only preserve him in bond. And sometimes he may do me more good here in the city by a free word of his mouth than if he had paid one half in hand and took doomsday for t'other.
- TIPSTAFF In troth, sir, without soothing be it spoken, you have published much judgement in these few words.
- 20 MUCKHILL For you know, what such a man utters will be thought effectual and to weighty purpose, and therefore into his mouth we'll put the approved theme of their forgeries.
- SKIRMISH And I'll maintain it, knight, if ye'll be true.
- Enter a Servant*
- 30 MUCKHILL How now, fellow.
- SERVANT May it please you, sir, my lord is newly lighted from his coach.
- MUCKHILL
Is my lord come already? His honour's early.
You see, he loves me well up before seven.
35 Trust me, I have found him night-capped at eleven.
There's good hope yet. Come, I'll relate all to him.
- Exeunt*
- 5.4 Enter the two bridegrooms, Captain and scholar Pieboard. After them, Sir Godfrey and Edmond, Widow changed in apparel, Mistress Frank led between two knights, Sir John Pennydub and Moll. There meets them a Nobleman, Sir Oliver Muckhill, Sir Andrew Tipstaff, [and Skirmish]
- NOBLEMAN By your leave, lady.
- WIDOW My lord, your honour is most chastely welcome.
- NOBLEMAN Madam, though I came now from court, I come not to flatter you. Upon whom can I justly cast this blot but upon your own forehead, that know not ink from milk. Such is the blind besotting in the state of an unheaded woman that's a widow. For it is the property of all you that are widows (a handful excepted) to hate those that honestly and carefully love you to the maintenance of credit, state and posterity, and strongly to doat on those that only love you to undo you. Who regard you least are best regarded, who hate you most are best beloved. And if there be but one man amongst ten thousand millions of men that is accursed disastrous and evilly planeted, whom fortune beats most, whom God hates most, and all societies esteem least, that man is sure to be a husband. Such is the peevish moon that rules your bloods. An impudent fellow best woos you, a flattering lip best wins you, or in a mirth,
- who talks roughliest is most sweetest. Nor can you distinguish truth from forgeries, mists from simplicity. Witness those two deceitful monsters that you have entertained for bridegrooms.
- WIDOW Deceitful?
- PIEBOARD [aside to Captain] All will out.
- 25 CAPTAIN [aside to Pieboard] 'Sfoot, who has blabbed, George? That foolish Nicholas?
- NOBLEMAN For what they have besotted your easy blood withal were naught but forgeries, the fortunetelling for husbands, the conjuring for the chain Sir Godfrey heard the falsehood of. All nothing but mere knavery, deceit and cozenage.
- WIDOW O wonderful! Indeed, I wondered that my husband with all his craft could not keep himself out of purgatory.
- 35 SIR GODFREY And I more wonder that my chain should be gone and my tailor had none of it.
- MOLL And I wondered most of all that I should be tied from marriage, having such a mind to't. Come, Sir John Pennydub, fair weather on our side. The moon has changed since yesternight.
- PIEBOARD [aside] The sting of every evil is within me.
- NOBLEMAN And that you may perceive I feign not with you, [Pointing to Skirmish] behold their fellow actor in those forgeries who, full of spleen and envy at their so sudden advancements, revealed all their plot in anger.
- 45 PIEBOARD [aside] Base soldier to reveal us.
- WIDOW Is't possible we should be blinded so and our eyes open?
- NOBLEMAN Widow, will you now believe that false which too soon you believed true?
- WIDOW O to my shame, I do.
- SIR GODFREY But under favour, my lord, my chain was truly lost and strangely found again.
- NOBLEMAN Resolve him of that, soldier.
- 55 SKIRMISH In few words, knight, then, thou wert the arch-gull of all.
- SIR GODFREY How, sir?
- SKIRMISH Nay, I'll prove it, for the chain was but hid in the rosemary bank all this while, and thou gotst him out of prison to conjure for it who did it admirably, fustianly. For indeed, what need any others when he knew where it was?
- SIR GODFREY O villainy of villainies. But how came my chain there?
- 65 SKIRMISH Where's 'Truly la, Indeed la', he that will not swear but lie, he that will not steal but rob, pure Nicholas St Antlings.
- SIR GODFREY
O villain, one of our society,
Deemed always holy, pure, religious,

Act 5 Scene 4

THE WIDDOW of Watling-freete.

A puritan a thief? When was't ever heard?
 Sooner we'll kill a man than steal, thou know'st.
 Out, slave, I'll rend my lion from thy back
 With mine own hands.

NICHOLAS

Dear master, O—

75 NOBLEMAN Nay, knight, dwell in patience.
 [To Widow] And now, widow, being so near the church,
 'twere great pity, nay, uncharity to send you home again without a husband. [To Muckhill and Tipstaff] 80 Draw nearer, you of true worship, state, and credit that should not stand so far off from a widow and suffer forged shapes to come between you. Not that in these I blemish the true title of a captain or blot the fair margent of a scholar, for I honour worthy and deserving parts in the one and cherish fruitful virtues 85 in the other. [To Widow and Frank] Come, lady, and you, virgin, bestow your eyes and your purest affections upon men of estimation both in court and city, that hath long wooed you and both with their hearts and wealth sincerely love you.

90 SIR GODFREY Good sister, do. Sweet little Frank, these are men of reputation. You shall be welcome at court, a great credit for a citizen, sweet sister.

NOBLEMAN Come, her silence does consent to't.

WIDOW I know not with what face.

NOBLEMAN Pah, pah, why, with your own face. They desire 95 no other.

WIDOW [to Muckhill and Tipstaff] Pardon me, worthy sirs.
 I and my daughter have wronged your loves.

MUCKHILL

'Tis easily pardoned, lady,

If you vouchsafe it now. 100

WIDOW

With all my soul.

FRANK

And I with all my heart.

MOLL

And I, Sir John, with soul, heart, lights and all.

PENNYDUB

They are all mine, Moll.

NOBLEMAN

Now, lady,

What honest spirit but will applaud your choice

And gladly furnish you with hand and voice, 105

A happy change which makes e'en heaven rejoice.

Come enter into your joys. You shall not want

For fathers now, I doubt it not, believe me,

But that you shall have hands enough to give ye.

THE REVENGER'S TRAGEDY

Edited by MacDonald P. Jackson

IN Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead Tom Stoppard re-imagined Hamlet from the point of view of those two interchangeable stooges. The Revenger's Tragedy is like a version by Yorick—as jester, and as skull. Middleton had obviously been fascinated by Shakespeare's great tragedy of revenge, but his own masterpiece in that genre adds ingredients from Jacobean satiric comedy of chicanery and disguise and from the medieval Morality drama, with its emphasis on death and eternal judgement. The spirit of the Gravedigger's 'whoreson mad fellow', master of quip and jape, presides over Middleton's plot, and the emblem of what Yorick has become dominates the play's thought, complicates its values, permeates its poetry, and darkens its mood.

The standard precipitant of a revenge tragedy, as introduced to the English theatre by Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy about 1588, is the horrendous and unpunished killing of somebody close to the hero. In Henry Chettle's Hoffman (1602), written when both Chettle and Middleton were working for the Admiral's Men, the eponymous villain-hero retaliates ferociously for the judicial execution of his pirate father, but normally the avenger seeks retribution for murder, the obstacle to legal redress being the power of the perpetrators. The adversaries of Kyd's Hieronimo, murderers of his son, are the Prince of Portugal and a machiavellian blackguard whose father is Duke of Castile and whose uncle is King of Spain. Hamlet's 'mighty opposite', Claudius, guilty of fratricide and regicide, is the new king. In The Revenger's Tragedy, Vindice's grievance is against the Duke, who poisoned his betrothed because she would not yield to his sexual advances. But Middleton's protagonist has a trace, too, of Hamlet's motive, his father having died, Vindice believes, of 'discontent' engendered by the Duke's ill treatment of him. Moreover Vindice's brother Hippolito, along with other disaffected courtiers, swears to avenge the rape of the Lord Antonio's wife—a crime that drove her to suicide—since the rapist, being the Duchess's son, seems likely to evade the full rigour of the law. And by the end of 1.3 Vindice 'durst make a promise of' Lussurioso to his sword, because the lustful heir to the dukedom has made him vow to serve as pander to Castiza, Vindice's own sister. The Revenger's Tragedy is deeply indebted to the conventions and devices of the genre towards which its title gestures: the memento vindictae, ritual oath upon a sword, undercover scheming, heavenly portents, use of poison, young woman threatened or victimized, wholesale slaughter, hero's reliance upon an 'occasion' afforded by the enemy, portrayal of an unbalanced mind, catastrophe in which a court entertainment encroaches upon the reality of the play—all these elements Middleton inherited from his predecessors, who had been influenced, directly or through Kyd, by the gory dramas of the first-century Roman Stoic, Seneca. Hamlet's incest reappears in The Revenger's Tragedy in the liaison between the Duchess and her husband's bastard, and, less overtly, in Vindice's wooing of Castiza. The scene in which Vindice and Hippolito berate their mother for her willingness to prostitute her daughter, and at dagger's point persuade her to repentance, is strongly reminiscent of the closet scene between Hamlet and Gertrude.

Yet the diversity of Vindice's objectives as avenger points to an essential difference between Shakespeare's play and Middleton's. 'Something is rotten in the state of Denmark', but the source of that corruption is Claudius, and when Hamlet kills him, Hamlet himself is dying and the play is almost over. But in The Revenger's Tragedy the whole royal family—the Duke's wife, son, stepsons, and illegitimate son—are vile. Vindice's chief foe, the Duke, is dispatched at the midpoint of the play, and Vindice's own death awaits the elimination of the whole wrangling brood: he dies after 'a nest of dukes'. Hamlet proceeds by a series of moves and countermoves of protagonist and antagonist—a struggle to the death, which both lose. But The Revenger's Tragedy has no such central conflict: the Duke and his (or his Duchess's) offspring are unaware of Vindice's plans, which are in one sense superfluous, since the sibling rivalry is itself murderous in intent. Nor does Vindice have Hamlet's need to check a ghost's word, or Hieronimo's to confirm a dubious message, before committing himself to lethal action: he tells us, in his opening soliloquy, that the Duke is the criminal, and we accept the information as given. The play lacks Hamlet's 'detective' interest. Vindice has none of Hamlet's questing, probing, self-scrutinizing impulse, either. He is unconcerned about the ethics of revenge. So the play explores no internal conflict in the mind of its hero in relation to his purpose.

Does Hamlet delay? Vindice does—for nine years, but before the play begins. The suggestion of a long prior build-up of furious resentment, newly aggravated by his 'worthy father's funeral' (1.1.119), perhaps helps explain the explosive force with which that hatred erupts on to the stage. Middleton's plot seems driven by Vindice's manic energy. Is Hamlet mad? Antony Sher, who played Vindice in Di Trevis's Royal Shakespeare Company production at the Swan in Stratford-upon-Avon in 1987, thought Middleton's hero 'so damaged by the tragedy of Gloriana that he is quite crazy, really', adding that for an actor the key to the role is realization of 'some kind of joy' in what for Vindice is 'a process of redemption'. An apter word might be therapy. Vindice moves from smouldering bitterness and a feeling that his 'life's unnatural' to him, as if he 'should be dead' (1.1.120-1), through the play's frenzied bursts of activity, to contented acquiescence in the sentence of death that Antonio passes upon him. But if Vindice experiences catharsis, the audience does not. We do not watch him die. He is bundled off to the headsman's block with a brisk 'Adieu'. No flights of angels sing this hero to his rest. We feel much as we do when at the conclusion of A Mad World, My Masters the arch trickster Follywit receives his comeuppance and good-humouredly shrugs off the news that he has unwittingly married his uncle's cast-off whore.

In fact for most of the play our engagement with Vindice is as with one of Middleton's comic pranksters or such bustling Vice figures as Marlowe's Barabas, Jonson's Volpone, or Shakespeare's Richard Gloucester. We are implicated in their williness or wickedness, vicariously enjoy it, admire their bravura inventiveness, but are detached enough to judge them. In fact, in The Revenger's Tragedy, 'the basic method of dramatic articulation seems to belong to comic art', as New Mermaid editor Brian Gibbons asserted. Events are shaped less by the inevitability of tragedy than by the capricious complications, ironies, and solutions of comedy or farce. Vindice dies because he cannot keep his mouth shut, a folly he had been quick to mock in others. His hubris is that of the contriver bursting with pride in his cleverness. In Middleton's play 'purposes mistook | Fall'n on th'inventors' heads' become the very principle of construction. So Ambitioso and Supervacuo, plotting to release their younger brother from prison 'by a wile' and to hasten the execution of their stepbrother Lussurioso while feigning to try to prevent it, accidentally ensure Junior's well-deserved beheading. Ambitioso's 'Whose head's that then?' (3.6.72) sounds like a line out of Joe Orton's Loot. Some critics have seen the just hand of Providence in these apt reversals, but the spirit in which they are presented suggests less the Divine Judge than some Cosmic Ironist or Omnipotent Jester. As audiences soon discover, much of The Revenger's Tragedy is quite outrageously funny.

Its most likely date of composition (for the King's Men) is 1606, after Middleton had written his series of 'city comedies' for the Children of Paul's. In those plays London scoundrels fleece country boobies and impoverished young gallants intrigue to outwit tightwad elders in a 'mad world' of prodigal dissipation, predatory greed, and saleable sex. Middleton presents a venal London society with deadpan detachment. The Revenger's Tragedy is in many ways closer in tone to Ben Jonson's Volpone, which Middleton may already have seen on stage, and to one of that play's evident ancestors, Marlowe's The Jew of Malta, in which the ironic handling of a melodramatic plot creates what T. S. Eliot recognized as a kind of 'savage farce'. Marlowe's Barabas and his untrusty Turkish servant Ithamore are cartoon figures of gleeful villainy, the central vengeful intriguers in a self-contained dramatic milieu of unscrupulous political scheming defined in a prologue spoken by the soul of Machiavelli himself. And in Volpone, with its beast-fable Italian character-names and Venetian setting of voluptuous trade, Jonson offers a topsy-turvy community of grotesque humours animated solely by avarice and lust, a community destroyed by its own appetites.

The creation of an abnormal looking-glass world with its own principles of operation is a familiar ploy of the satirist, and The Revenger's Tragedy adopts something of this method, to become the sanguinary counterpart of Volpone, matching its breadth, intensity, and richness, sharing its mix of revulsion and an almost celebratory gusto, while perhaps attaining a less steady ethical stance. It too draws on a conventional Elizabethan-Jacobean image of Italy, as, in the words of Thomas Nashe, 'the academy of manslaughter... the apothecary shop of poison', and employs type figures called by the Italian equivalents of Lechery, Ambition, Vanity, and so on. They are walking abstractions, vitalized by Vindice's, and beyond him the author's, fascinated detestation of what they stand for. The play encloses them in their own unnatural world of 'noon at midnight'. In many of his speeches Vindice—like Marston's ousted Duke Altofronto, awaiting the opportunity to unsettle his factious enemies and regain his kingdom, while disguised as malcontent railer Malevole—serves as court scourge, inveighing against its sensuality, extravagance, and inner rottenness, and excoriating all the foibles and abuses of the contemporary social order. Middleton's is a more effective, less bizarre and eccentric dramatic language than Marston's, but in this play he cultivates similar collisions of laughter and horror, using startling dislocations of mode and mood to convey a Mannerist sense of an unstable, chaotic age.

The blend of wit and violence, mutilation and fun often seems to foreshadow twentieth-century 'black comedy'. Audiences cannot believe that Spurio's 'Old Dad dead?' (5.1.116) belongs to the original text. It is not only the jocular treatment of grisly material and the amusing one-liners that recall Orton, who quoted Vindice's 'Surely we're all mad people, and they | Whom we think are, are not' (3.5.80-1) as epigraph to What the Butler Saw, another play in which an amoral lunacy reigns. Both playwrights exploit the disparity between the propriety of their characters' sentiments and the delinquency of their behaviour; both wring humour from the incongruous utterance of conventional pieties. The royal family in The Revenger's Tragedy pay lip-service to morality in trite couplets that bear no relation to their actual deeds. The Duke's 'Age hot is like a monster to be seen; | My hairs are white and yet my sins are green' (2.3.129-30) is simply the prelude to his asking Vindice to procure him a sexual partner. Functionally, the short soliloquy that ends with this rhyme is analogous to Claudius's prayer in

Hamlet, 3.3: it confirms his guilt beyond doubt, since he admits to having poisoned 'many a beauty' who rejected his advances. But whereas Claudius's desperate monologue serves to show the conscience-stricken human being inside the suave usurper, and so prepares the audience emotionally for the postponement of revenge, the glibness of the Duke's confession reveals an automaton, whose imminent gruesome destruction by Vindice and Hippolito we can approve, and even relish. Like Orton, Middleton has an ear for the hypocritical unctious and laughable indignation of the wicked. When, after Lussurioso has found his father's corpse and blamed 'Piato' for the slaying, Vindice himself mimics this tone of mock-outrage—'O rascal! Was he not ashamed | To put the Duke into a greasy doublet?' (5.1.71–2)—we seem to hear in the ludicrously misplaced concern for externals the authentic voice of some subversive, decorum-guying modern. Best of all, because so integral to the action, are Vindice's sardonic last words of advice to the expiring Lussurioso, after he has informed him of his deeds: 'Tell nobody' (5.3.80). Vindice's gloating epitaph over his enemy may seem the culmination of the theme of secrecy, but there is the further irony of his own self-destructive blabbing to follow.

But 'Middleton our contemporary', the disconcerting humorist, was also inheritor of a stern medieval tradition of Morality drama, homily and complaint, allegorical and emblematic art—of de contemptu mundi, exemplum horrendum, Danse Macabre, and memento mori. The Revenger's Tragedy has been seen as affording the traditional 'horrible example' of a society hurtling towards damnation. (Luchino Visconti's film The Damned would be a modern secular equivalent.) The type figures of The Revenger's Tragedy, as of Volpone, recall the Moralities, in which personified virtues and vices contend for the soul of Everyman in a 'theatre of God's judgement'. The play opens with Vindice as presenter of a torchlit procession of Duke, Duchess, and progeny—a royal progress, transformed into a parade of the Seven Deadly Sins. Vindice's initial comment, 'Duke, royal lecher, go, grey-haired adultery' (1.1.1), enforces this impression. By branding the Duke not 'adulterer' but 'adultery' Vindice equates him with his sin. Lust in this play is closely associated with gluttony (or drunkenness), and pride, envy, covetousness, and wrath are prominent. A Christian symbolism popularized through sixteenth-century emblem books lies behind some of the play's most striking images—notably the 'eternal eye | That sees through flesh and all' at 1.3.67–8—and there is frequent exploitation (noted in the commentary) of classical and biblical iconography or thought. Vindice's 'conceit in picture' of 'A usuring father...boiling in hell, and his son and heir with a whore dancing over him' (4.2.86–7) is in the medieval cautionary vein, though Middleton gives the theme his own characteristic twist; his preceding ruminations—on 'how a great rich man lies a-dying and a poor cobbler tolls the bell for him' (4.2.68–77)—are in a moralistic tradition harking back to the gospel parable of Lazarus and Dives. The masques of dancing avengers and murderers with which the play ends evoke the theme, ubiquitous in the art of medieval Europe, of the Dance of Death, in which capering skeletons guide their live doubles to the grave, often during pageants or revels.

Focusing Vindice's obsession with mortality, like a memento mori in a monk's cell, is the skull of Gloriana. The opening, in which flame-lit court pomp and finery are displayed in contrast to the lone figure holding the sallow 'shell of death', initiates a dominant theme. And the great meditation on the vanity of human wishes at 3.5.44–107 is unmatched in subsequent drama in English until Waiting for Godot gives us Lucky's monologue, which comes to rest, after its crazed digressions, on 'the skull the skull the skull the skull'. The charnel-house remnant of Vindice's 'poisoned love' stands as both the ultimate resting point in the frenetic social process whereby inherited estates dissolve in hedonistic riot as an agrarian economy yields to urban capitalism, and the stark reality that all pleasure-loving flesh is heir to. The skull is a symbol at once social, political, and religious.

Godot never comes, but the thunderous Divine Avenger invoked by Vindice's rhetoric finally makes himself heard. But Vindice greets the portent with a certain flippancy, first as 'big-voiced crier' appearing on cue and then, with a pun on 'claps', as satisfied spectator at a 'tragedy' (5.3.43–8). While the comparison of the world to a play on which God passes judgement is commonplace, Providence here elicits less than due awe. Although even the 'gargoylish grin' worn by his play has roots in the Middle Ages (as Ekeblad noted), Middleton deploys the orthodox omens and emblems with a Jacobean ambivalence. Even in the 'silkworm' speech (3.5.44–107) Vindice wields his 'bony lady' with the tormented histrionics of Gethin Price with his dummies in Trevor Griffiths's Comedians. And in fact Vindice's frequent use of theatrical terminology, his implicit or direct appeals to the audience, his stage-managing of his own invented dramas and of his changing roles within them (as in the stabbing of his alias self), and his general self-consciousness about levels of illusion add to The Revenger's Tragedy's air of twentieth-century sophistication. Even our uneasiness at the sadism of Vindice's physical and mental torturing of the Duke is largely allayed by sheer pleasure in his artistry—in the neat ironies whereby, betrayed by his own lasciviousness, the poisoner is poisoned, the victim of his victim, the forcer forced to witness his cuckolding by the child of his own adultery.

The ways in which various dramatic and literary traditions are unified in The Revenger's Tragedy have been illuminated by Inga-Stina Ekeblad (Ewbank). Certain key components act as nodes. Vindice combines the functions of a Hamlet, a Volpone, and a Malevole, besides acting as both Good and Evil Angel in a Morality temptation of Chastity and Grace. Gloriana's skull is an incitement to revenge, like the skeleton of Hoffman's father, a prompt to satirical attacks on face-painting and court ostentation, a focus for meditative sermonizing on the transience of worldly pleasures and on corporeal decay, and a stage-prop for what in a different context might have been a merry prank in which the biter is bit. The masque, a costly palace entertainment, is at once a traditional device for ending a revenge tragedy and a Danse des Morts. And this interweaving by means of character, plot, and theatrical image is tightened by the play's complex poetry. Vindice's opening monologue, brilliantly mixing exposition, denunciation, and contemplation, brings Jacobean targets within its satirical range through the associations of its imagery: the adjective 'spendthrift' is applied to the 'veins of a . . . parched and juiceless luxur' (linking sexual and financial profligacy); the old Duke riots it 'like a son and heir', recalling the wastrels of Middleton's comedies; Gloriana was once so beautiful that a 'usurer's son', in an age when landholders were increasingly in pawn to moneylenders, would have consumed 'all his patrimony' for the sake of a kiss (1.1.8–27). At the same time, a phrase such as 'apparelled in thy flesh' evokes an ancient orthodoxy (1.1.31). Ekeblad quotes some lines from Vindice's later speech over the skull (3.5.84–7):

Does every proud and self-affecting dame
Camphor her face for this? And grieve her maker
In sinful baths of milk, when many an infant starves
For her superfluous outside—all for this?

As she notes, this goes far beyond the Jacobean misogynist's reflex snarling at cosmetics, as the words 'proud', 'grieve her maker', and 'sinful' make plain: 'as in the medieval Morality the imagery of finery is pursued down to its moral significance, to its connection with pride, the deadliest of the sins, and with the homiletic theme of waste and extravagance versus the suffering inflicted upon innocents'. Yet those 'baths of milk' evoke a Cleopatra's charisma.

Dramatic, literary, and artistic traditions constitute the play's most vital source material, and as Holdsworth (1990) has shown, it is also in large measure an inspired reworking of elements already present in Middleton's early prose pamphlets, poems, and plays. But there are analogues to some of its situations and incidents in accounts of the Medici and Este families and other pseudo-historical works: notably (to name only the English versions) William Painter's The Palace of Pleasure (1567), Barnaby Rich's Farewell to Military Profession (1581), and Thomas Underdowne's An Aethiopian History (1587). Middleton also shows awareness of facts concerning the assassination of Duke Alessandro of Florence in 1537 that could not have been gleaned from Painter.

The Revenger's Tragedy was published anonymously in 1607/8, and criticism has been bedevilled by the wholly unreliable Edward Archer's mistaken ascription, fifty years later, of Middleton's play to Cyril Tourneur. Nineteenth- and early twentieth-century commentary culminated in T. S. Eliot's account of it as a projection of its author's 'inner world of nightmare', his immature 'cynicism . . . loathing and disgust of humanity . . . horror of life itself'

(1934). Later critics such as L. G. Salinger, disentangling the playwright from his characters, saw not 'psychopathic perversion' but an alert and coherent response to the 'commercialisation of the nobility' under James I and 'the disintegration of a whole social order' (1937–8). The emotional adolescent plagued by his fantasies became the controlled artist selecting from his literary inheritance to fashion an image of the times. But those who still thought of that artist as Tourneur now began to assimilate the play to the orthodox piety of The Atheist's Tragedy, exaggerating its conservatism and didacticism and minimizing its aggression, prurience, humour, and élan. Jonathan Dollimore's more recent account of The Revenger's Tragedy as parodying the providential viewpoint, 'sceptical of ideological policing', celebrating 'the artificial and the delinquent', and dominated by an air of 'subversive black camp' is an understandable reaction (1984). Yet this view also seems partial. It ignores, for example, the play's admiration for the steadfastness of Castiza, the seriousness of the biblical language applied to Gratiana's fall and conversion, and the cumulative force of such oft-repeated words as 'sin', 'damnation', 'heaven', 'doom', 'shame', 'devil', 'hell', and the like, whose reverberations create a moral framework, however complacent the court characters' utterance of them.

Placed within the Middleton canon, the play will assume further guises. However, fraught with Middleton's Calvinist conviction of human depravity but willing to laugh about it, at once repudiating and attracted to the flesh and Mammon, weighing the evanescent pleasure of the 'bewitching minute' of sex or vengeance against temporal and eternal consequences, acutely aware of social flux in 'this luxurious day wherein we breathe' (1.3.112) and nostalgic for the stability of a lost order, the play retains its ambivalence. Fredson Bowers showed that Chettle first incorporated elements of the villainous adversary into the revenge hero himself, and that The Revenger's Tragedy follows suit (1940). Vindice's ultimate recognition that 'we are ourselves our foes' (5.3.109) resonates beyond its immediate context. The two masques, of revengers and murderers, are visually indistinguishable. Yet, however warped Vindice's psyche and compromised his deeds, we experience the play largely through him and his roles (with their many asides) and are beguiled by his authorial flair. This adds to the complexity of our response. It is difficult too to know how to take Antonio. Is he a self-serving hypocrite, or does in his case a reluctant assumption of power represent 'silver age' integrity? Holdsworth's balanced discussion gives him the benefit of the doubt; but the doubt remains. And does not the affecting tableau of ravished virtue, complete with prayer-book as 'pillow to her cheek' (1.4.13)—with which Antonio, whether deliberately or not, incites Hippolito and his fellows to vengeance—seem just a little too stage-managed? By whom? Where dissimulation is so rife, the sincerest show becomes suspect. Yet the image of medical blood-letting, with which the play concludes, suggests a genuine cleansing.

Apparently unknown to the theatre for three and a half centuries after its Jacobean performances, the play has frequently been produced by amateur groups in recent decades. The Royal Shakespeare Company performed it in 1966 (directed by Trevor Nunn), as well as 1987. The first fully professional revival was that of Brian Shelton for the Pitlochry Festival in Scotland in 1965. Shelton found it 'a flamboyant and sensational piece which changes constantly: pungent, moralistic, melodramatic, comic, allegorical, violent, poetic, bawdy, tragic, absurd, ironic—the moods tumble over each other, blend and alternate in exuberant profusion'. He guessed that it had been written 'in a ferment of excitement'. Through its poetry, characters, and action it vividly transmits its author's complex vision of life at a particular point in his own, the theatre's, and Europe's history. Conceived in 'excitement', it retains its power to excite, on the page and in the theatre.

Enter Vindice [holding a skull]. The Duke, Duchess, Lussurioso his son, Spurio the Bastard, with a train, pass over the stage with torch-light

VINDICE

Duke, royal lecher, go, grey-haired adultery,
And thou his son, as impious steeped as he,
And thou his bastard, true-begot in evil,
And thou his duchess that will do with devil,

This commentary focuses particularly upon verbal imagery and linguistic play.

1.1.0.2-4 Enter... torch-light The stage direction specifies, and Vindice comments on, only the four members of the royal family. Directors usually include the Duchess's three sons in the procession, bringing the number up to seven (like the Deadly Sins).

0.2-3 Vindice... Lussurioso... Spurio

The descriptive names are derived from Italian words defined in John Florio's dictionary, A World of Words (1598). Vindice: a revenger; Lussurioso: lecherous; Spurio: bastard.

1 adultery The Duke is adultery personified, with a hint of a Morality figure.

2 impious steeped saturated in impiety

3 true-begot Vindice is sardonically playing on notions of what is true or false (or illegitimate): Spurio, though falsely begotten (out of wedlock), is the true offspring of a sinful act; his nature truly reflects his origins.

4 do have sex; the alliteration in this line, and the reductiveness of that two-letter word, point up the contempt.

- 5 Four excellent characters! O that marrowless age
Should stuff the hollow bones with damned desires
And, 'stead of heat, kindle infernal fires
Within the spendthrift veins of a dry duke,
A parched and juiceless luxur! O God, one 10 That has scarce blood enough to live upon,
And he to riot it like a son and heir?
O, the thought of that
Turns my abusèd heartstrings into fret.
[To the skull] Thou sallow picture of my poisoned love,
15 My study's ornament, thou shell of death,
Once the bright face of my betrothèd lady,
When life and beauty naturally filled out
These ragged imperfections,
When two heaven-pointed diamonds were set
20 In those unsightly rings—then 'twas a face
So far beyond the artificial shine
Of any woman's bought complexion
That the uprightest man—if such there be
That sin but seven times a day—broke custom 25 And made up eight with looking after her.
- O, she was able to ha' made a usurer's son
Melt all his patrimony in a kiss
And what his father fifty years told
To have consumed, and yet his suit been cold.
30 But O accursèd palace!
Thee, when thou wert apparelled in thy flesh,
The old Duke poisoned,
Because thy purer part would not consent
Unto his palsy lust; for old men lustful
35 Do show like young men—angry, eager, violent,
Outbid their limited performances.
O, 'ware an old man hot and vicious:
"Age, as in gold, in lust is covetous."
Vengeance, thou murder's quit-rent, and whereby 40 Thou show'st thyself tenant to tragedy,
O, keep thy day, hour, minute, I beseech,
For those thou hast determined. Hum, who'er knew Murder unpaid? Faith, give Revenge her due,
Sh'as kept touch hitherto. Be merry, merry;
45 Advance thee, O thou terror to fat folks,
To have their costly three-piled flesh worn off

5 characters examples of types of humanity (as in Jacobean writers' satirical portraits)

5-9 O that... luxur The concentrated imagery here draws on Renaissance physiology, which associated the marrow and the blood (dispersed through the veins) with the natural, vital, and animal spirits causing vigour and sexual desire; since semen was held to be generated by the blood (much blood being needed for a little semen), lechery drained the system. The passage contrasts the 'sanguine' warmth of healthy youthful passion with the hellish, unquenchable lust of a desiccated profligate. His ultimate punishment is brought into account with the charnel-house image of 'hollow bones' and the judgements implied in 'damned' and 'infernal fires'. But the most brilliantly chosen term is 'spendthrift veins', which links the Duke's sexual dissipation (his 'expense of spirit in a waste of shame', as Shakespeare's Sonnet 129 puts it) to a Jacobean world of reckless financial prodigality glanced at in lines 11 and 26-9.

9 luxur lecher (a coinage used in Black Book and confined to Middleton)

11 riot... heir The wastrel son and heir is a favourite target in Middletonian comedy. Through such comparisons Revenger fuses diverse dramatic genres and relates its Italianate action to English society of the time.

13 heartstrings literally the tendons or nerves supposed to brace the heart, but with a musical allusion (common at the time) taken up in 'fret'

fret vexation or distress, with wordplay on the ring of gut or ridge of wood set on the fingerboard of a stringed instrument such as a lute or guitar at the proper places for the fingers

14 poisoned love Besides the obvious meaning that the Duke poisoned Vindice's betrothed, there is an ironic intimation that the hero's love for Gloriana has been poisoned by bitterness and hatred.

15 study's ornament object of meditation, in the figurative sense, but also a literal memento mori in his room (as in paintings of monks' or scholars' cells)

19 heaven-pointed turned towards heaven, but with a suggestion of the sparkling facets of a diamond; also 'appointed by heaven', 'God-given'

20 unsightly (a) ugly, (b) non-seeing rings punning on (a) the sockets of bone, and (b) a ring for the finger

22 bought complexion face made up with cosmetics, with a hint that the woman herself may be bought

23-4 uprightest... day an echo of the biblical Proverbs, 24:16, probably by way of the William Perkins's Puritan A Treatise (1595). 'For a just man falleth seven times, and riseth up again: but the wicked shall fall into mischief'.

26 usurer's son developing the image of the riotous son and heir, while sketching in an English social background of capitalist profiteering, where the usurer could amass a sizable fortune

27 Melt The verb gives concreteness to our sense of the process by which the young man's estate dissolves, as though molten gold were flowing away; there is wordplay on the idea of a tender or 'melting' kiss (the collocation was not yet a cliché, but compare 4.4.147 and Pericles, 2.2.64-5).

28 told added up, accumulated

29 his suit been cold his advances been rejected

34 palsy lust The aged Duke is afflicted with spasms of lust, as from the involuntary trembling that is the chief symptom of palsy.

36 Outbid... performances i.e. they overestimate their physical (especially sexual) prowess; at 1.2.75 the Duchess stigmatizes the Duke as 'slack... in performance'.

38 "Age... covetous." This 'sentence' or pithy saying is set off with double commas in Eld's quarto, in accord with common contemporary practice.

39 quit-rent money paid by a freeholder to a landlord in lieu of services; vengeance is, as it were, murder's due; as Ross notes, the idea of substitute payment is less pertinent than play on 'quit' in the sense 'repay for injury'

40 tenant continuing the metaphor from 'quit-rent'; tragedy is the lord that revenge serves

42 determined decided on, with suggestions of inexorable purpose and, ironically, predestination

44 touch faith, her promise

45 thee the skull

46 three-piled alluding to the richest kind of velvet (with a thick pile, like that of a modern luxury carpet), and harking back to the metaphor in 'apparelled in thy flesh' in line 31

As bare as this; for banquets, ease, and laughter
 Can make great men, as greatness goes by clay,
 But wise men little are more great than they.
Enter his brother Hippolito

HIPPOLITO
 Still sighing o'er death's visor?

50 VINDICE Brother, welcome.
 What comfort bring'st thou? How go things at court?

HIPPOLITO
 In silk and silver, brother, never braver.

VINDICE Puh,
 Thou play'st upon my meaning. Prithee say,
 55 Has that bald madam, Opportunity,
 Yet thought upon's? Speak, are we happy yet?
 Thy wrongs and mine are for one scabbard fit.

HIPPOLITO
 It may prove happiness.

VINDICE What is't may prove?
 Give me to taste.

HIPPOLITO Give me your hearing then.
 You know my place at court.

60 VINDICE Ay, the Duke's chamber.
 But 'tis a marvel thou'rt not turned out yet.

HIPPOLITO
 Faith, I have been shoved at, but 'twas still my hap
 To hold by th' Duchess' skirt; you guess at that;
 Whom such a coat keeps up can ne'er fall flat.
 65 But to the purpose.
 Last evening, predecessor unto this,
 The Duke's son warily enquired for me;
 Whose pleasure I attended. He began
 By policy to open and unhusk me
 70 About the time and common rumour;
 But I had so much wit to keep my thoughts

Up in their built houses, yet afforded him
 An idle satisfaction without danger.
 But the whole aim and scope of his intent
 Ended in this, conjuring me in private
 75 To seek some strange-digested fellow forth
 Of ill-contented nature, either disgraced
 In former times or by new grooms displaced
 Since his stepmother's nuptials; such a blood,
 80 A man that were for evil only good;
 To give you the true word, some base-coined pander.

VINDICE
 I reach you, for I know his heat is such,
 Were there as many concubines as ladies,
 He would not be contained, he must fly out.
 I wonder how ill-featured, vile-proportioned
 85 That one should be, if she were made for woman,
 Whom at the insurrection of his lust
 He would refuse for once. Heart, I think none,
 Next to a skull, though more unsound than one.
 Each face he meets he strongly dotes upon.
 90 HIPPOLITO Brother, you've truly spoke him.
 He knows not you, but I'll swear you know him.

VINDICE
 And therefore I'll put on that knave for once
 And be a right man then, a man o'th' time;
 For to be honest is not to be i'th' world.
 95 Brother, I'll be that strange-composèd fellow.

HIPPOLITO
 And I'll prefer you, brother.

VINDICE Go to, then,
 The small'st advantage fattens wronged men.
 It may point out Occasion. If I meet her
 I'll hold her by the foretop fast enough,
 100 Or like the French mole heave up hair and all.

- 48 great quibbling on (a) large, (b) admirable as greatness goes by clay i.e. 'in the corporeal sense of greatness'; with 'clay' (prominent as the rhyme word) as a reminder of the flesh's destiny
- 49 wise ... they compare the proverb 'Wisdom is better than riches'; 'little' means 'lowly'
- 50 visor mask, or face suggestive of a mask
- 52 In ... braver Hippolito pretends to have understood Vindice's 'How go things at court?' as 'How do court-creatures walk, parade themselves?'; braver means 'more ostentatiously'
- 53 Puh exclamation of dismissal
- 55 that ... Opportunity In Renaissance iconography and proverb lore Opportunity or Occasion was a bald, winged, figure with a single forelock, which had to be seized before she passed. By attributing Occasion's baldness to the sexual disease of a brothel 'madam' (here a prostitute rather than brothel-keeper), Vindice gives his own twist to a fusion of the emblem with that of strumpet Fortune.
- 69 unhusk (so as to expose the 'kernel' of truth)
- 70 time and common rumour probably a hendiadys = the latest gossip
- 72 in their built houses dwelling inside his own head, where the mind is 'housed' and thoughts occupy their allotted sections of the brain
- 76 strange-digested oddly constituted, and hence alienated; compare 'strange-composèd' in line 96
- 79 blood man of hot spirit; unless 'blood' simply means 'nature'
- 81 base-coined illegitimately conceived; or perhaps merely of low birth with a suggestion of the debased (like base coinage)
- 82 reach understand
- 86 for woman to be a woman
- 88-9 none ... skull his lust extends almost to necrophily; an ironical foreshadowing of the Duke's tryst with Gloriana's skull
- in 3.5. Vindice's words draw attention to the object that he holds.
- 93 put on personate
- 94 right fitting the accepted standards
a man o'th' time The idea is similar to that in History of King Lear, 24.30-1, 'men | Are as the time is', though there the context is of murderous tough-mindedness, rather than of knavish duplicity and panderism. The play repeatedly insists on the depravity of 'our age' (1.3.23), 'this present minute' (1.3.25), 'nowadays' (1.3.157), 'this luxurious day wherein we breathe' (1.3.112), and so on. The effect is to evoke a hectic 'modern' society devoted to momentary pleasures.
- 97 prefer recommend, promote
- 100 foretop forelock; compare note to 1.1.55
- 101 French mole a sore on the scalp due to syphilis, which causes hair to drop out; with wordplay on the mole that undermines lawn or pasture

- I have a habit that will fit it quaintly.
 [Enter Mother and Castiza]
 Here comes our mother.
- HIPPOLITO And sister.
 VINDICE We must coin.
 Women are apt, you know, to take false money.
 105 But I dare stake my soul for these two creatures,
 Only excuse excepted—that they'll swallow,
 Because their sex is easy in belief.
- MOTHER
 What news from court, son Carlo?
 HIPPOLITO Faith, Mother,
 'Tis whispered there the Duchess' youngest son
 110 Has played a rape on Lord Antonio's wife.
- MOTHER On that religious lady!
 CASTIZA
 Royal blood! Monster, he deserves to die,
 If Italy had no more hopes but he.
- VINDICE
 Sister, you've sentenced most direct and true.
 115 The law's a woman, and would she were you.
 Mother, I must take leave of you.
- MOTHER
 Leave for what?
 VINDICE I intend speedy travel.
- HIPPOLITO
 That he does, madam.
 MOTHER Speedy indeed!
 VINDICE
 For since my worthy father's funeral
 120 My life's unnatural to me, e'en compelled,
 As if I lived now when I should be dead.
- MOTHER
 Indeed, he was a worthy gentleman,
 Had his estate been fellow to his mind.
- VINDICE
 The Duke did much deject him.
 MOTHER Much.
 VINDICE Too much.
- And through disgrace oft smothered in his spirit
 125 When it would mount. Surely I think he died
 Of discontent, the nobleman's consumption.
- MOTHER
 Most sure he did.
 VINDICE Did he? 'Lack, you know all;
 You were his midnight secretary.
- MOTHER No.
 He was too wise to trust me with his thoughts.
 130 VINDICE [aside]
 I'faith then, father, thou wast wise indeed.
 "Wives are but made to go to bed and feed."—
 Come, mother, sister. You'll bring me onward, brother?
- HIPPOLITO
 I will.
 VINDICE [aside to Hippolito]
 I'll quickly turn into another. Exeunt
- Enter the old Duke, Lussurioso his son, the Duchess, Spurio the Bastard, the Duchess's two sons Ambitioso and Supervacuo, the third her youngest, Junior, brought out with Officers for the rape, two Judges*
- DUKE
 Duchess, it is your youngest son; we're sorry.
 His violent act has e'en drawn blood of honour
 And stained our honours,
 Thrown ink upon the forehead of our state,
 Which envious spirits will dip their pens into 5 After our death, and blot us in our tombs;
 For that which would seem treason in our lives
 Is laughter when we're dead. Who dares now whisper
 That dares not then speak out, and e'en proclaim
 With loud words and broad pens our closest shame?
 10
- FIRST JUDGE
 Your grace hath spoke like to your silver years,
 Full of confirmed gravity; for what is it to have
 A flattering false insculption on a tomb

102 habit costume
quaintly finely, ingeniously

102.1 Castiza Chastity (from Italian casta, chaste)

103 coin dissemble, counterfeit (taken up in 'false money' in the next line)

105-7 But...belief 'Vindice is sure Gratiana and Castiza will see through and reject hypocrisy or deceit, with one exception—that they will believe a good excuse, for women are credulous that way' (Foakes).

108 Carlo either a pet name or the sole relic of the author's original plan for naming the character

112 Royal blood! a sarcastic ejaculation; the blood royal is characterized by 'blood' in the sense of 'carnal appetite'

113 hopes i.e. heirs to the dukedom

115 The law's a woman alluding to the image of Justice as a female figure holding a sword or pair of scales

122 worthy honourable (but with a pun on 'worthy' = rich)

124 deject abase, depress

129 secretary confidant, sharer of secrets

130-2 He...feed The notion that women cannot keep secrets was enshrined in many a misogynistic proverb.

1.2.0.3 Ambitioso and Supervacuo Italian for Ambitious and Useless, Vain, Foolish
 2 drawn...honour i.e. wounded honour so that its blood flows. Though figuratively applied, the violent image, followed by 'stained', vividly evokes the brutality of the rape; 'honour' (as the Duke repeats the word in the plural) carries its full range of meanings: chastity, reputation, royal dignity, decent conduct. 'Blood' leads, by way of 'stain' (and the associations of 'drawn'), to 'ink', which sets off the strand of imagery threading through the rest of the speech.

4 Thrown...forehead References to the 'forehead' recur, as (a) site of the cuckold's horns, (b) countenance capable of expressing shame, anger, or brazen impudence. For sexual sinfulness inscribed on the forehead see Revelations, 17:5.

5 envious malicious

10 broad pens frank or scurrilous writings closest most secret

13 insculption carved inscription

15 And in men's hearts reproach? The bowelled corpse
 May be cered in, but with free tongue I speak:
 "The faults of great men through their cerecloths break."
 DUKE
 They do; we're sorry for't. It is our fate
 To live in fear and die to live in hate.
 I leave him to your sentence. Doom him, lords—
 20 The fact is great—whilst I sit by and sigh.
 DUCHESS [kneeling]
 My gracious lord, I pray be merciful,
 Although his trespass far exceed his years.
 Think him to be your own, as I am yours;
 Call him not son-in-law: the law, I fear,
 25 Will fall too soon upon his name and him.
 Temper his fault with pity.
 LUSSURIOSO Good my lord,
 Then 'twill not taste so bitter and unpleasant
 Upon the judges' palate, for offences
 Gilt o'er with mercy show like fairest women,
 30 Good only for their beauties, which washed off,
 No sin is uglier.
 AMBITIOSO I beseech your grace,
 Be soft and mild; let not relentless law
 Look with an iron forehead on our brother.
 SPURIO [aside]
 He yields small comfort yet. Hope he shall die, 35 And if a bastard's wish might stand in force,
 Would all the court were turned into a corse.
 DUCHESS
 No pity yet? Must I rise fruitless then?
 A wonder in a woman! Are my knees
 Of such low metal that without respect—
 [She rises]
 40 FIRST JUDGE Let the offender stand forth.
 'Tis the Duke's pleasure that impartial doom
 Shall take fast hold of his unclean attempt.
 A rape! Why, 'tis the very core of lust,
 Double adultery.
 JUNIOR So, sir.
 SECOND JUDGE And, which was worse,
 45 Committed on the Lord Antonio's wife,
 That general-honest lady. Confess, my lord,
 What moved you to't?
 JUNIOR Why, flesh and blood, my lord.
 What should move men unto a woman else?
 LUSSURIOSO
 O, do not jest thy doom. Trust not an axe
 Or sword too far. The law is a wise serpent 50
 And quickly can beguile thee of thy life.
 Though marriage only has made thee my brother,
 I love thee so far—play not with thy death.
 JUNIOR
 I thank you, troth; good admonitions, faith,
 If I'd the grace now to make use of them. 55
 FIRST JUDGE
 That lady's name has spread such a fair wing
 Over all Italy that, if our tongues
 Were sparing toward the fact, judgement itself
 Would be condemned and suffer in men's thoughts.
 JUNIOR
 Well then, 'tis done, and it would please me well 60
 Were it to do again. Sure, she's a goddess,
 For I'd no power to see her and to live.
 It falls out true in this, for I must die.
 Her beauty was ordained to be my scaffold;
 And yet methinks I might be easier 'sessed. 65
 My fault being sport, let me but die in jest.
 FIRST JUDGE This be the sentence—
 DUCHESS
 O, keep't upon your tongue; let it not slip.
 Death too soon steals out of a lawyer's lip.
 Be not so cruel-wise.
 FIRST JUDGE Your grace must pardon us, 70
 'Tis but the justice of the law.
 DUCHESS The law
 Is grown more subtle than a woman should be.
 SPURIO [aside]
 Now, now he dies. Rid 'em away.
 DUCHESS [aside]
 O, what it is to have an old cool duke
 To be as slack in tongue as in performance. 75
 FIRST JUDGE
 Confirmed, this be the doom irrevocable.
 DUCHESS O!

14 bowelled disembowelled (for embalming)
 15 cered in wrapped in cerecloths (waxed sheets)
 19 Doom sentence
 20 fact crime (as also at line 58)
 24 son-in-law stepson (here with wordplay on 'law')
 26–31 Good . . . uglier Lussurioso's simile deconstructs the argument he intends, or at least pretends. Either (a) he unconsciously reveals his true feelings, or (b) he is being publicly sarcastic, or (c) lines 30–1 are an aside. The first explanation seems most probable.
 36 corse corpse; the old spelling is retained

for the rhyme
 37 rise fruitless The pun in 'fruitless' that leads to the Duchess's exclamation in line 38 is based on 'rise' = swell in pregnancy.
 39 low metal base metal (of little value), but with a suggestion of 'mettle' = the quality of a person's disposition; punning also on the literal sense of low, since she is kneeling
 41 doom judgement
 42 attempt assault
 46 general-honest wholly chaste 56 spread . . . wing The image combines the idea of the extent of her fame with suggestions of the angelic and the protective.

 61–3 Sure . . . die The idea that mortals cannot survive contact with the divine (probably with a specific allusion to Exodus, 33:20) is complicated by a pun on 'die' = to have sexual intercourse; the figurative death leads to the actual.
 65 'sessed assessed, judged
 66 sport playing on the senses 'amorous dalliance' and 'jesting, merrymaking'
 71–2 law . . . woman compare I.1.115 and note
 75 performance i.e. in bed

	FIRST JUDGE	Tomorrow early—	Whose prickles should bow under him; but 'tis not,	105
	DUCHESS	Pray be abed, my lord.	And therefore wedlock faith shall be forgot.
	FIRST JUDGE	Your grace much wrongs yourself.	I'll kill him in his forehead; hate there feed.
	AMBITIOSO	No, 'tis that tongue.	That wound is deepest, though it never bleed.
	FIRST JUDGE	Your too much right does do us too much wrong.	[Enter Spurio at a distance]
	FIRST JUDGE	Let that offender—	And here comes he whom my heart points unto,	110
80	DUCHESS	Live and be in health.	His bastard son, but my love's true-begot.
	FIRST JUDGE	Be on a scaffold—	Many a wealthy letter have I sent him,
	DUKE	Hold, hold, my lord.	Swelled up with jewels, and the timorous man
	SPURIO [aside]	Pox on't,	Is yet but coldly kind.
	DUKE	What makes my dad speak now?	That jewel's mine that quivers in his ear,	115
	DUKE	We will defer the judgement till next sitting.	Mocking his master's chillness and vain fear.
	DUKE	In the mean time let him be kept close prisoner.	He's spied me now.
	DUKE	Guard, bear him hence.	Madam, your grace so private?
85	AMBITIOSO [to Junior]	Brother, this makes for thee.	My duty on your hand.
	FIRST JUDGE	Fear not, we'll have a trick to set thee free.	[He kisses her hand]
	JUNIOR	Brother, I will expect it from you both,	DUCHESS	120
	JUNIOR	And in that hope I rest.	Upon my hand, sir? Troth, I think you'd fear
	SUPERVACUO	Farewell, be merry.	To kiss my hand too, if my lip stood there.
	SUPERVACUO	Exit Junior with a Guard	SPURIO
	SPURIO [aside]	Delayed, deferred; nay then, if judgement have cold	Witness I would not, madam.
	SPURIO [aside]	blood,	[He kisses her]
90	FLATTERY	Flattery and bribes will kill it.	DUCHESS	125
	DUKE	About it then, my lords, with your best powers.	For ceremony has made many fools.
	DUKE	More serious business calls upon our hours.	It is as easy way unto a duchess
	DUKE	Exeunt, manet Duchess	As to a hatted dame, if her love answer,
	DUCHESS	Was't ever known step-duchess was so mild	But that by timorous honours, pale respects,	125
	DUCHESS	And calm as I? Some now would plot his death	Idle degrees of fear, men make their ways
95	DUCHESS	With easy doctors, those loose-living men,	Hard of themselves. What have you thought of me?
	DUCHESS	And make his withered grace fall to his grave	SPURIO
	DUCHESS	And keep church better.	Madam, I ever think of you in duty,
	DUCHESS	Some second wife would do this, and dispatch	Regard, and—
	DUCHESS	Her double-loathèd lord at meat or sleep.	DUCHESS	130
100	DUCHESS	Indeed, 'tis true an old man's twice a child:	Puh, upon my love, I mean.
	DUCHESS	Mine cannot speak. One of his single words	SPURIO
	DUCHESS	Would quite have freed my youngest, dearest son	I would 'twere love, but 't'as a fouler name than lust.
	DUCHESS	From death or durance, and have made him walk	You are my father's wife. Your grace may guess now	130
	DUCHESS	With a bold foot upon the thorny law,	What I could call it.
	DUCHESS		DUCHESS	135
	DUCHESS		Why, thou'rt his son but falsely.
	DUCHESS		'Tis a hard question whether he begot thee.
	DUCHESS		SPURIO
	DUCHESS		I'faith, 'tis true too; I'm an uncertain man,
	DUCHESS		Of more uncertain woman. Maybe his groom
	DUCHESS		O'th' stable begot me; you know I know not.	135
	DUCHESS		He could ride a horse well—a shrewd suspicion,
	DUCHESS		marry.
	DUCHESS		He was wondrous tall; he had his length, i'faith,
	DUCHESS		For peeping over half-shut holiday windows.

79 too much right excessive privilege (as a judge)

85 makes for thee works in your favour

95 easy compliant

97 keep church better The Duke, entombed, would be not just a more regular attendant at church but a permanent one!

100 old... child proverbial

103 durance imprisonment

107 kill... forehead i.e. by committing adultery (and so furnishing his forehead with a cuckold's horns)

114 jewel's... ear A producer should ensure that Spurio wears a jewelled ear-ring.

115 Mocking probably 'imitating', rather than 'deriding', though possibly both; 'quivers' = glitters, but leading to the imputation of quivering timidity

123 hatted dame hats were worn by women of the lower orders

129 fouler... lust i.e. incest

132 hard difficult, but with a double entendre

136-7 He could... length The further sexual innuendo in 'ride' and 'length' is picked up by the Duchess in lines 142-3.

138 peeping... windows i.e. he was so tall that, mounted on a horse, he could peep over the bottom, shuttered parts of windows into the private dwellings of people relaxing on holidays

Men would desire him 'light. When he was afoot, 140 He made a goodly show under a penthouse,
 And when he rid, his hat would check the signs
 And clatter barbers' basins.
 DUCHESS Nay, set you a-horseback once,
 You'll ne'er 'light off.
 SPURIO Indeed, I am a beggar.
 DUCHESS
 145 That's more the sign thou'rt great. But to our love:
 Let it stand firm both in thy thought and mine
 That the Duke was thy father—as no doubt then
 He bid fair for't—thy injury is the more,
 For had he cut thee a right diamond,
 150 Thou hadst been next set in the dukedom's ring,
 When his worn self, like age's easy slave,
 Had dropped out of the collet into th' grave.
 What wrong can equal this? Canst thou be tame
 And think upon't?
 SPURIO No, mad and think upon't.
 DUCHESS
 155 Who would not be revenged of such a father,
 E'en in the worst way? I would thank that sin
 That could most injury him, and be in league with it.
 O, what a grief 'tis that a man should live
 But once i'th' world and then to live a bastard,
 160 The curse o'the womb, the thief of nature,
 Begot against the seventh commandement,
 Half-damned in the conception by the justice
 Of that unbribèd everlasting law.
 SPURIO
 O, I'd a hot-backed devil to my father.
 DUCHESS
 165 Would not this mad e'en patience, make blood rough?
 Who but an eunuch would not sin, his bed
 By one false minute disinherited?
 SPURIO [aside]
 Ay, there's the vengeance that my birth was wrapped in.
 I'll be revenged for all. Now hate begin.
 I'll cut foul incest but a venial sin.
 DUCHESS
 170 Cold still? In vain then must a duchess woo?

SPURIO
 Madam, I blush to say what I will do.
 DUCHESS
 Thence flew sweet comfort. Earnest, and farewell.
 [She kisses him]
 SPURIO
 O, one incestuous kiss picks open hell.
 DUCHESS
 Faith, now, old Duke, my vengeance shall reach high.
 I'll arm thy brow with woman's heraldry. Exit 175
 SPURIO
 Duke, thou didst do me wrong, and by thy act
 Adultery is my nature.
 Faith, if the truth were known, I was begot
 After some gluttonous dinner. Some stirring dish
 Was my first father, when deep healths went round 180
 And ladies' cheeks were painted red with wine,
 Their tongues, as short and nimble as their heels,
 Uttering words sweet and thick; and when they risse
 Were merrily disposed to fall again.
 In such a whisp'ring and withdrawing hour, 185
 When base male-bawds kept sentinel at stair-head,
 Was I stol'n softly. O, damnation met
 The sin of feasts, drunken adultery.
 I feel it swell me. My revenge is just.
 I was begot in impudent wine and lust. 190
 Stepmother, I consent to thy desires.
 I love thy mischief well, but I hate thee
 And those three cubs thy sons, wishing confusion,
 Death, and disgrace may be their epitaphs.
 As for my brother, the Duke's only son, 195
 Whose birth is more behelden to report
 Than mine, and yet perhaps as falsely sown—
 Women must not be trusted with their own—
 I'll loose my days upon him, hate all I.
 Duke, on thy brow I'll draw my bastardy; 200
 For indeed, a bastard by nature should make cuckolds,
 Because he is the son of a cuckold-maker. Exit

Enter Vindice and Hippolito, Vindice in disguise as Piato to attend Lord Lussurioso, the Duke's son 1.3

 1.3.79, 1.3.122, 2.2.92, 4.1.64), tends to link the sins of gluttony, avarice, lechery, wrath, and pride; here the 'swelling' of drunkenness and feasting leads to arousal for (a) sex, (b) violence.

- 50 And not so little.
I have seen patrimonies washed a-pieces,
Fruit-fields turned into bastards,
And in a world of acres
Not so much dust due to the heir 'twas left to 55 As would well gravel a petition.
LUSSURIOSO [aside]
Fine villain! Troth, I like him wondrously.
He's e'en shaped for my purpose.—Then thou know'st
I'th' world strange lust?
VINDICE O, Dutch lust, fulsome lust!
Drunken procreation, which begets so many drunkards.
60 Some father dreads not, gone to bed in wine,
To slide from the mother and cling the daughter-in-law.
Some uncles are adulterous with their nieces,
Brothers with brothers' wives. O, hour of incest!
Any kin now next to the rim o'th' sister
65 Is man's meat in these days, and in the morning,
When they are up and dressed and their mask on,
Who can perceive this, save that eternal eye
That sees through flesh and all? Well, if anything
Be damned, it will be twelve o'clock at night.
70 That twelve will never scape.
It is the Judas of the hours, wherein Honest salvation is betrayed to sin.
LUSSURIOSO
In troth, it is too. But let this talk glide.
It is our blood to err, though hell gaped loud.
75 Ladies know Lucifer fell, yet still are proud.
Now, sir, wert thou as secret as thou'rt subtle
And deeply fathomed into all estates,
I would embrace thee for a near employment,
And thou shouldst swell in money and be able
- To make lame beggars crouch to thee.
VINDICE My lord,
80 Secret? I ne'er had that disease o'th' mother,
I praise my father. Why are men made close
But to keep thoughts in best? I grant you this,
Tell but some woman a secret over night,
Your doctor may find it in the urinal i'th' morning.
85 But my lord—
LUSSURIOSO So, thou'rt confirmed in me,
And thus I enter thee.
[He gives Vindice money]
VINDICE This Indian devil
Will quickly enter any man—but a usurer;
He prevents that, by ent'ring the devil first.
LUSSURIOSO
Attend me. I am past my depth in lust,
90 And I must swim or drown. All my desires
Are levelled at a virgin not far from court,
To whom I have conveyed by messenger
Many waxed lines, full of my neatest spirit,
And jewels that were able to ravish her
95 Without the help of man; all which and more
She foolish-chaste sent back, the messengers
Receiving frowns for answers.
VINDICE Possible?
'Tis a rare phoenix, whoe'er she be.
If your desires be such, she so repugnant,
100 In troth, my lord, I'd be revenged and marry her.
LUSSURIOSO
Push!
The dowry of her blood and of her fortunes
Are both too mean—good enough to be bad withal.
I'm one of that number can defend 105 Marriage is good, yet rather keep a friend.

- 51 washed a-pieces wrecked, as by a rough sea; but with a hint of drunken profligacy in 'washed'
- 52 Fruit-fields . . . bastards i.e. the estate squandered on adultery and whoring (and perhaps on maintaining illegitimate children); the imagery also involves 'the ideas of true inheritance declining to false (usurers) and natural fruit debased by grafting with inferior stock' (Gibbons).
- 55 gravel sprinkle sand on (to dry the ink)
- 58 Dutch The Dutch were reputed to be heavy drinkers, and in Trick 'a Dutch widow' is 'an English drab'.
- 61 To . . . daughter-in-law 'In the sound and placing of two words, "slide" and "cling", the whole stealthy action comes alive' (Salgádo).
- 64 rim (a) edge, limit, (b) (rim of the) womb, (c) vagina. Here 'next to' means 'short of' (with the implication, 'though only just'); the taboo on sexual relations between brother and sister is parenthetically affirmed, but not without prurience. The tensions in Vindice's acting as procurer of Castiza for Lussurioso are foreshadowed here.
- 67 eternal eye The all-seeing eye of God, from which the sinning Adam and Eve try vainly to hide, was commonly pictured in emblem books.
- 70 twelve i.e. the twelfth of the twelve hours, as Judas was the one among the Twelve Disciples who betrayed Christ
- 74 gaped loud Hell is imagined as a yawning abyss from which the cries of the damned are heard.
- 75 Lucifer The angel Lucifer fell through the sin of pride.
- 77 estates classes of people
- 78 near private (and intimately concerning Lussurioso)
- 81 disease o'th' mother i.e. gossiping indiscreetly; compare I.I.I.30–2; there is a quibble on 'the mother' = hysteria. Vindice praises his father for begetting him as male, and so immune from the feminine weakness for blabbing.
- 82 close playing on 'close' = secret and the difference between male and female anatomy
- 85 Your . . . morning The reference is to the inspection of urine in the diagnosis of illness. Elements combined in Vindice's image are present in modern senses of the word 'leak'.
- 86 confirmed in me established in my trust
- 87 enter admit, initiate; in the next line Vindice takes up the word to play on its normal sense; there are suggestions, particularly in association with the religious overtones of 'confirmed', of a kind of parody of the Eucharist, or black mass.
- Indian The Indies were sources of gold and silver, and of tales of heathen practices.
- 89 prevents forestalls
- 94 waxed lines sealed letters
- 99 rare phoenix paragon, after the unique mythical bird
- 100 repugnant resistant, hostile
- 105 defend contend
- 106 friend mistress

- Give me my bed by stealth, there's true delight;
What breeds a loathing in't but night by night?
- VINDICE
A very fine religion.
- LUSSURIOSO Therefore thus:
110 I'll trust thee in the business of my heart,
Because I see thee well experienced
In this luxurious day wherein we breathe.
Go thou and with a smooth enchanting tongue
Bewitch her ears and cozen her of all grace.
115 Enter upon the portion of her soul,
Her honour, which she calls her chastity,
And bring it into expense; for honesty
Is like a stock of money laid to sleep,
Which, ne'er so little broke, does never keep.
- VINDICE
120 You have gi'n't the tang, i'faith, my lord.
Make known the lady to me, and my brain
Shall swell with strange invention. I will move it Till I expire with speaking and drop down
Without a word to save me; but I'll work—
- 125 LUSSURIOSO We thank thee, and will raise thee.
Receive her name: it is the only daughter
To Madam Gratiana, the late widow.
- VINDICE [aside]
O, my sister, my sister!
- LUSSURIOSO Why dost walk aside?
VINDICE
130 My lord, I was thinking how I might begin,
As thus, 'O lady'—or twenty hundred devices.
Her very bodkin will put a man in.
- LUSSURIOSO Ay, or the wagging of her hair.
VINDICE No, that shall put you in, my lord.
- LUSSURIOSO
Shall't? Why, content. Dost know the daughter, then?
- VINDICE
O, exc'llent well—by sight.
- 135 LUSSURIOSO That was her brother
That did prefer thee to us.
- VINDICE My lord, I think so;
I knew I had seen him somewhere.
- LUSSURIOSO
And therefore, pritheee, let thy heart to him
Be as a virgin, close.
- VINDICE O, my good lord.
- LUSSURIOSO
We may laugh at that simple age within him— 140
VINDICE Ha, ha, ha.
LUSSURIOSO
Himself being made the subtle instrument
To wind up a good fellow—
VINDICE That's I, my lord.
LUSSURIOSO That's thou.—
To entice and work his sister.
VINDICE A pure novice. 145
LUSSURIOSO
'Twas finely managed.
VINDICE Gallantly carried.
A pretty perfumed villain.
LUSSURIOSO I've bethought me:
If she prove chaste still and immovable,
Venture upon the mother, and with gifts,
As I will furnish thee, begin with her. 150
VINDICE
O fie, fie, that's the wrong end, my lord.
'Tis mere impossible that a mother by any gifts should become a bawd to her own daughter.
LUSSURIOSO Nay then, I see thou'rt but a puny in the subtle mystery of a woman. 155
Why, 'tis held now no dainty dish; the name
Is so in league with th'age that nowadays
It does eclipse three quarters of a mother.
VINDICE Does't so, my lord?
Let me alone, then, to eclipse the fourth. 160
LUSSURIOSO
Why, well said. Come, I'll furnish thee. But first Swear to be true in all.
VINDICE True.
LUSSURIOSO Nay, but swear.
VINDICE
Swear? I hope your honour little doubts my faith.
LUSSURIOSO
Yet for my humour's sake, 'cause I love swearing.
VINDICE
'Cause you love swearing, 'slud, I will.
LUSSURIOSO Why, enough. 165
Ere long look to be made of better stuff.
VINDICE
That will do well indeed, my lord.
LUSSURIOSO Attend me. [Exit]

112 luxurious lecherous

115 Enter The word links the ideas of devil possession (as at lines 87–8 above) and sexual assault (as at line 133 below). Lussurioso's whole speech describes a Temptation by Satan, but, taking up the implications of 'business' in line 110, puts the seduction of body and soul in commercial terms.

portion birthright, dowry

117 expense use

119 broke The simple enough word catches various concerns and overtones: broken sleep, a stock of money broken into, the hymen broken, and (through 'broker') traffic both financial and sexual.

120 gi'n't the tang given the true taste of it

122 move it urge it, plead your case

127 Gratiana Italian equivalent of Grace (from gratia, grace)

131 bodkin ornamental hairpin put a man in provide an opening, serve as a conversation piece

133 put you in obscenely punning on pubic hair and sexual penetration

143 wind up prepare, excite good fellow (a) agreeable companion, (b) thief

154 puny greenhorn

156 the name i.e. of bawd

156–8 the . . . mother 'The name (of bawd) is so closely connected with every woman in the age in which we live that even a mother is naturally three parts of one already' (Collins).

165 'slud a corruption of the oath 'God's blood'

167 Attend me wait on me as an attendant

VINDICE O!
 Now let me burst. I've eaten noble poison.
 We are made strange fellows, brother, innocent 170 villains.
 Wilt not be angry when thou hear'st on't, think'st
 thou?
 I'faith, thou shalt. Swear me to foul my sister!
 Sword, I durst make a promise of him to thee:
 Thou shalt disheir him; it shall be thine honour.
 175 And yet, now angry froth is down in me,
 It would not prove the meanest policy
 In this disguise to try the faith of both.
 Another might have had the selfsame office,
 Some slave that would have wrought effectually,
 180 Ay, and perhaps o'erwrought 'em; therefore I,
 Being thought travelled, will apply myself
 Unto the selfsame form, forget my nature,
 As if no part about me were kin to 'em,
 So touch 'em—though I durst almost for good 185 Venture my lands in heaven upon their blood. Exit

*Enter the discontented Lord Antonio, whose wife the Duchess's youngest son ravished; he discovering the body of her dead to certain lords;
 [Piero] and Hippolito*

ANTONIO
 Draw nearer, lords, and be sad witnesses
 Of a fair comely building newly fall'n,
 Being falsely underminèd. Violent rape
 Has played a glorious act. Behold, my lords,
 5 A sight that strikes man out of me.

PIERO
 That virtuous lady!

ANTONIO Precedent for wives!

HIPPOLITO
 The blush of many women, whose chaste presence
 Would e'en call shame up to their cheeks and make 170 fellows partners, accomplices

 174 disheir him prevent him from inheriting the kingdom (by killing him)
 175 angry . . . down The image is presumably of the subsidence of a tempestuous (frothy) sea.
 184 touch test
 184-5 I durst . . . blood I should dare, almost as a final act, to stake my hopes of eternal salvation on their strength of character
 1.4.0.3 discovering revealing. A curtained 'discovery space' (whether alcove in the rear wall or temporary arrangement) would have been necessary for this revelation of the dead wife, posed as monumental figure of ravaged virtue.
 Presumably the curtains would have been closed on her at the end of the
 scene.
 2 Of . . . fall'n Another expression of the traditional idea of the body as house or temple; by such hints in the imagery

the play sketches a realm of religious thought against which its actions are implicitly judged; at the same time, such an image evokes a changing society in which actual buildings are demolished or crumble from neglect.
 4 played . . . act suggesting a stage action, and sharpening our awareness of the play as play (Foakes); compare 1.1.40 7 blush of i.e. cause of blushes in 9 good colours both 'more attractive' and 'more virtuous' (because blushing indicated they were aware of past sins)
 (Loughrey and Taylor)
 10 drunk poison figuratively, with reference to the rape
 11 pledge toast (by drinking poison literally) 14 confection medicinal preservative (here in the spiritual sense)
 17 Melius . . . vivere Better to die in virtue than to live with dishonour
 20-1 that . . . ourselves that with as much

Pale wanton sinners have good colours.
 ANTONIO Dead.
 Her honour first drunk poison, and her life,
 10 Being fellows in one house, did pledge her honour.
 PIERO
 O grief of many!
 ANTONIO I marked not this before—
 A prayer-book the pillow to her cheek;
 This was her rich confection; and another
 Placed in her right hand, with a leaf tucked up
 15 Pointing to these words:
Melius virtute mori, quam per dedecus vivere.
 True and effectual it is indeed.

HIPPOLITO
 My lord, since you invite us to your sorrows,
 Let's truly taste 'em, that with equal comfort
 As to ourselves we may relieve your wrong.
 We have grief too, that yet walks without tongue:
Curae leves loquuntur, majores stupent.
 ANTONIO You deal with truth, my lord.
 Lend me but your attentions and I'll cut
 25 Long grief into short words. Last revelling night,
 When torch-light made an artificial noon
 About the court, some courtiers in the masque,
 Putting on better faces than their own,
 Being full of fraud and flattery, amongst whom 30 The Duchess' youngest son, that moth to honour,
 Filled up a room; and with long lust to eat
 Into my wearing, amongst all the ladies
 Singled out that dear form who ever lived
 As cold in lust as she is now in death;
 35 Which that step-duchess' monster knew too well;
 And therefore in the height of all the revels,
 When music was heard loudest, courtiers busiest,
 And ladies great with laughter—O vicious minute,
 Unfit, but for relation, to be spoke of!— 40 Then with a face more impudent than his visor comfort to you as to ourselves

 23 Curae . . . stupent Light cares speak out, greater ones are dumbfounded;
 misquoted from Seneca's Phaedra, line 607; common in Jacobean drama and current as a proverb. See also 4.2.193-8.
 29 better faces the masks worn in court entertainments
 31 moth to honour i.e. one who eats honour away
 33 wearing clothing (continuing the moth image)
 34 Singled . . . form The associations of
 'dear'/'deer' reinforce the hunting sense of 'singled out' (common in Renaissance writing), meaning to separate one deer from the herd.
 39 great swollen (as though with child)
 40 but for relation were it not for its essential part in the story 41 a face an effrontery (but with wordplay on the literal face)

He harried her amidst a throng of panders
That live upon damnation of both kinds,
And fed the ravenous vulture of his lust.
45 O, death to think on't! She, her honour forced,
Deemed it a nobler dowry for her name
To die with poison than to live with shame.

HIPPOLITO

A wondrous lady, of rare fire compact!
She's made her name an empress by that act.

PIERO

50 My lord, what judgement follows the offender?

ANTONIO

Faith, none, my lord; it cools and is deferred.

PIERO Delay the doom for rape?

ANTONIO

O, you must note who 'tis should die:
The Duchess' son. She'll look to be a saver.
55 "Judgement in this age is near kin to favour."

HIPPOLITO

Nay then, step forth, thou bribeless officer.

[He draws his sword]

I bind you all in steel to bind you surely.
Here let your oaths meet, to be kept and paid,
Which else will stick like rust, and shame the blade.
60 Strengthen my vow, that if at the next sitting Judgement speak all in gold and spare the blood
Of such a serpent, e'en before their seats,
To let his soul out, which long since was found Guilty in heaven.

ALL We swear it and will act it.

[They swear upon the sword]

ANTONIO

65 Kind gentlemen, I thank you in mine ire.

HIPPOLITO 'Twere pity

The ruins of so fair a monument
Should not be dipped in the defacer's blood.

PIERO

Her funeral shall be wealthy, for her name
70 Merits a tomb of pearl. My lord Antonio,
For this time wipe your lady from your eyes.
No doubt our grief and yours may one day court it,
When we are more familiar with revenge.

ANTONIO

That is my comfort, gentlemen, and I joy

75 In this one happiness above the rest,

Which will be called a miracle at last,
That, being an old man, I'd a wife so chaste.
[He closes the curtains to conceal the body]

Exeunt

Finis Actus Primi

Incipit Actus Secundus

Enter Castiza, the sister of Vindice and Hippolito

2.1

CASTIZA

How hardly shall that maiden be beset
Whose only fortunes are her constant thoughts,
That has no other child's-part but her honour
That keeps her low and empty in estate.
Maids and their honours are like poor beginners.
Were not sin rich, there would be fewer sinners.
Why had not virtue a revèue? Well,
I know the cause: 'twould have impoverished hell.

[Enter Dondolo]

How now, Dondolo?

DONDOLO Madonna, there is one, as they say, a thing of flesh and blood, a man I take him by his beard, that would very desirously mouth to mouth with you.

CASTIZA What's that?

DONDOLO Show his teeth in your company.

CASTIZA I understand thee not.

DONDOLO Why, speak with you, madonna.

CASTIZA Why, say so, madman, and cut off a great deal of dirty way. Had it not been better spoke in ordinary words, that one would speak with me?

DONDOLO Ha, ha, that's as ordinary as two shillings. I would strive a little to show myself in my place. A gentleman-usher scorns to use the phrase and fancy of a serving-man.

CASTIZA

Yours be your own, sir. Go, direct him hither.

[Exit Dondolo]

I hope some happy tidings from my brother
That lately travelled, whom my soul affects.
Here he comes.

[Enter Vindice her brother, disguised [and bearing a treasure chest]]

VINDICE

Lady, the best of wishes to your sex,

42 harried ravished43 kinds sexes

44 And...lust This image of predatory lust derives from the myth of Tityus, one of the four great sinners tortured in Hades, in his case for having attacked Latona, mother of Apollo and Diana; his punishment, similar to Prometheus's, was to have a vulture feed eternally on his liver, seat of carnal passion.
Renaissance commentators read the myth as an allegory of the tortures caused by immoderate love.

48 compact composed62 their i.e. the judges'

70 pearl Emblematic of what is pure, invaluable, and even divine, the 'pearl' leads, through association with teardrops, to the bold trope in the next sentence.

72 court it be shown at court2.1.1 hardly severely3 child's-part inheritance

8.1 Dondolo Italian for a gull or foolish servant, as in Dissemblers and Marston's Fawn

17-18 cut...way i.e. speak directly (avoid covering a lot of muddy ground)

20 ordinary as two shillings punning on a

'two-shilling ordinary', a tavern offering meals at the fixed price of two shillings

21 place office

22 gentleman-usher gentleman (rather than a member of the servant class) acting as usher to a person of superior rank

26 affects loves

27.1-2 bearing...chest The need for this is accepted by most directors; see 1.3.149-50, 2.1.85, 155, 187. The scene either imitates or inspired Volpone, 3.5, in which Volpone brings on a chest of treasure for his attempted seduction of Celia.

- Fair skins and new gowns.
 [He gives her a letter]
- CASTIZA O, they shall thank you, sir.
 Whence this?
- 30 VINDICE O, from a dear and worthy friend, Mighty.
- CASTIZA From whom?
- VINDICE The Duke's son.
- CASTIZA Receive that.
A box o' th' ear to her brother
 I swòre I'd put anger in my hand
 And pass the virgin limits of myself
 To him that next appeared in that base office,
 35 To be his sin's attorney. Bear to him
 That figure of my hate upon thy cheek
 Whilst 'tis yet hot, and I'll reward thee for't.
 Tell him my honour shall have a rich name
 When several harlots shall share his with shame.
 40 Farewell, commend me to him in my hate. Exit
- VINDICE
 It is the sweetest box that e'er my nose came nigh,
 The finest drawn-work cuff that e'er was worn.
 I'll love this blow for ever, and this cheek
 Shall still henceforward take the wall of this.
 45 O, I'm above my tongue! Most constant sister,
 In this thou hast right honourable shown.
 Many are called by their honour that have none.
 Thou art approved for ever in my thoughts.
 It is not in the power of words to taint thee.
 50 And yet for the salvation of my oath,
 As my resolve in that point, I will lay
 Hard siege unto my mother, though I know
 A siren's tongue could not bewitch her so.
 [Enter Mother]
 Mass, fitly here she comes. Thanks, my disguise.—
 Madam, good afternoon.
- 55 MOTHER You're welcome, sir.
- VINDICE
 The next of Italy commends him to you,
 Our mighty expectation, the Duke's son.
- MOTHER
 I think myself much honoured that he pleases
- To rank me in his thoughts.
- VINDICE So may you, lady.
 One that is like to be our sudden duke—
 The crown gapes for him every tide—and then
 Commander o'er us all. Do but think on him;
 How blessed were they now that could pleasure him
 E'en with anything almost.
- MOTHER Ay, save their honour.
- VINDICE
 Tut, one would let a little of that go too
 And ne'er be seen in't, ne'er be seen in't, mark you.
 I'd wink, and let it go.
- MOTHER Marry, but I would not.
- VINDICE
 Marry, but I would, I hope. I know you would too
 If you'd that blood now which you gave your daughter.
 To her indeed 'tis, this wheel comes about.
 70 That man that must be all this, perhaps ere morning
 (For his white father does but mould away),
 Has long desired your daughter.
- MOTHER Desired?
- VINDICE Nay, but hear me:
 He desires now that will command hereafter;
 Therefore be wise.
 75 I speak as more a friend to you than him.
 Madam, I know you're poor, and, 'lack the day,
 There are too many poor ladies already.
 Why should you vex the number? 'Tis despised.
 Live wealthy. Rightly understand the world,
 80 And chide away that foolish country girl
 Keeps company with your daughter, Chastity.
- MOTHER
 O fie, fie, the riches of the world cannot hire
 A mother to such a most unnatural task.
- VINDICE
 No, but a thousand angels can;
 85 Men have no power, angels must work you to't.
 The world descends into such base-born evils
 That forty angels can make fourscore devils.
 There will be fools still, I perceive, still fools.
 90 Would I be poor, dejected, scorned of greatness,
 Swept from the palace, and see other daughters

29.1 He gives her a letter mentioned by Castiza at 2.1.138–40

35 attorney i.e. one who pleads on sin's behalf

36 figure image, representation

41 box punning on (a) blow, (b) container for spices or fragrant ointment (hence 'sweetest' and 'nose')

42 drawn-work cuff shirt-sleeve cuff decorated with thread, with a pun on the cuff = blow that is 'worn' on his cheek;
 also 'drawn' picks up 'figure' (line 36)

44 take the wall of take precedence over (from the privilege of walking next to the wall as the cleaner and safer side of a pavement)

46 right honourable playing on the style of address proper to certain peers and dignitaries

51 As . . . point Vindice is recalling his idea of testing his sister and mother (1.3.176– 7).

53 siren's tongue In classical myth the sirens were sea-songstresses (half women, half birds, though later pictured as mermaids) whose enchanting voices lured sailors to destruction.

56 next of Italy i.e. first in line of succession

60 sudden duke duke at any moment

61 gapes . . . tide is open to him at any time

now. Vindice's formulation blends sinister and comic overtones. Proverbially, what 'gapes' at the 'tide' is the oyster,
 as in Ben Jonson's Bartholomew Fair: 'I have gaped as the oyster for the tide' (5.5.23). But the grave and hell also gape (1.3.74), eager to devour.

70 wheel wheel of fortune (turning to provide Castiza with an opportunity)

79 vex the number aggravate the situation by adding to the number

85 angels punning on the name of the gold coin bearing the figure of the Archangel
 Michael and worth half one pound

90 dejected abased, lowly

- Spring with the dew o'th' court, having mine own
So much desired and loved—by the Duke's son?
No, I would raise my state upon her breast
95 And call her eyes my tenants; I would count
My yearly maintenance upon her cheeks,
Take coach upon her lip, and all her parts
Should keep men after men, and I would ride
In pleasure upon pleasure.
100 You took great pains for her, once when it was.
Let her requite it now, though it be but some.
You brought her forth; she may well bring you home.
- MOTHER
O heavens! This overcomes me.
VINDICE [aside] Not, I hope, already?
MOTHER [aside]
105 It is too strong for me; men know that know us,
We are so weak their words can overthrow us.
He touched me nearly, made my virtues bate,
When his tongue struck upon my poor estate.
VINDICE [aside]
I e'en quake to proceed; my spirit turns edge.
I fear me she's unmothered, yet I'll venture.
110 "That woman is all male whom none can enter."—
What think you now, lady? Speak, are you wiser?
What said advancement to you? Thus it said:
'The daughter's fall lifts up the mother's head.'
Did it not, madam? But I'll swear it does 115 In many places. Tut, this age fears no man.
"Tis no shame to be bad, because 'tis common."
- MOTHER
Ay, that's the comfort on't.
VINDICE [aside] The comfort on't!—
I keep the best for last. Can these persuade you
To forget heaven and—
[He gives her money]
MOTHER
Ay, these are they—
VINDICE O!
120 MOTHER —that enchant our sex;
These are the means that govern our affections.
That woman
Will not be troubled with the mother long
- That sees the comfortable shine of you.
I blush to think what for your sakes I'll do. 125
VINDICE [aside]
O suffering heaven, with thy invisible finger
E'en at this instant turn the precious side
Of both mine eyeballs inward, not to see myself!
MOTHER
Look you, sir.
VINDICE Holla.
MOTHER Let this thank your pains.
[She gives him money]
VINDICE O, you're a kind madam. 130
MOTHER
I'll see how I can move.
VINDICE [aside] Your words will sting.
MOTHER
If she be still chaste, I'll ne'er call her mine.
VINDICE [aside] Spoke truer than you meant it.
MOTHER
Daughter Castiza.
[Enter Castiza]
CASTIZA Madam.
VINDICE O, she's yonder. Meet her. 135
[Aside] Troops of celestial soldiers guard her heart!
Yon dam has devils enough to take her part.
CASTIZA
Madam, what makes yon evil-officed man
In presence of you?
MOTHER Why?
CASTIZA He lately brought
Immodest writing sent from the Duke's son
To tempt me to dishonourable act. 140
MOTHER
Dishonourable act? Good honourable fool,
That wouldst be honest 'cause thou wouldst be so,
Producing no one reason but thy will;
And 't'as a good report, prettily commended,
But pray, by whom? Mean people, ignorant people. 145
The better sort I'm sure cannot abide it;
And by what rule should we square out our lives
But by our betters' actions? O, if thou knew'st
What 'twere to lose it, thou wouldst never keep it;

94 state (a) rank, (b) estate (connecting with 'raise' = build, and 'tenants')

98 keep men after men maintain many servants (but with a suggestion of promiscuity)

100 once when it was i.e. during childbirth

102 bring you home i.e. to the (financial) state to which you belong; this may be an antedating of OED's Home, adv., 7.a, 'bring oneself home' = 'recover oneself (financially)' (first citation 1760); but the phrase also recalls an 'eternal home', ironically equating material and spiritual salvation.

106 bate abate, dwindle

108 turns edge grows blunt

109 she's unmothered she has lost her maternal feelings; compare 1.3.156-60 venture pronounced 'venter' (a common spelling)

110 all male with wordplay on 'mail' = armour

enter persuade, with the obvious sexual pun

115 fears frightens

123 the mother (a) hysteria (as a women's disease), (b) maternal concern

124 comfortable comforting

126 thy invisible finger the scriptural Hand of God, prominent in Christian iconography as symbol of the omnipotent will, and often shown as issuing, with rays of light, from a cloud, and with three fingers extended (to represent the Trinity)

130 kind with the sarcastic sub-meaning 'natural, maternal'

131 move persuade (Castiza)

136 dam contemptuous term for 'mother', common in reference to 'the devil's dam'

142 honest chaste

147 square out mark out, direct; a 'square' was a footrule, so 'by what rule' plays on the abstract and concrete kinds of rule: (a) principle, criterion, (b) instrument for measuring

- 150 But there's a cold curse laid upon all maids: Times are grown wiser and will keep less charge.
 Whilst others clip the sun, they clasp the shades. A maid that has small portion now intends Virginity is paradise locked up. To break up house and live upon her friends.
 You cannot come by yourselves without fee, How blessed are you; you have happiness alone.
 And 'twas decreed that man should keep the key. Others must fall to thousands, you to one, 185
 155 Deny advancement, treasure, the Duke's son? Sufficient in himself to make your forehead
 CASTIZA Dazzle the world with jewels, and petitionary people
 I cry you mercy, lady, I mistook you. Start at your presence.
 Pray, did you see my mother? Which way went she? MOTHER O, if I were young,
 Pray god I have not lost her. I should be ravished.
 VINDICE [aside] Prettily put by. CASTIZA Ay, to lose your honour.
 MOTHER VINDICE
 Are you as proud to me as coy to him? 'Slid, how can you lose your honour to deal with my
 Do you not know me now? lord's grace? 190
 160 CASTIZA Why, are you she? He'll add more honour to it by his title.
 The world's so changed, one shape into another, Your mother will tell you how.
 It is a wise child now that knows her mother. MOTHER That I will.
 VINDICE [aside] VINDICE
 Most right, i'faith. O, think upon the pleasure of the palace,
 MOTHER I owe your cheek my hand Secured ease and state, the stirring meats
 For that presumption now, but I'll forget it. Ready to move out of the dishes, that e'en now 195
 165 Come, you shall leave those childish haviours Quicken when they're eaten;
 And understand your time. Fortunes flow to you. Banquets abroad by torch-light, musics, sports,
 What, will you be a girl? Bare-headed vassals that had ne'er the fortune
 If all feared drowning that spy waves ashore, To keep on their own hats, but let horns wear 'em,
 Gold would grow rich and all the merchants poor. Nine coaches waiting—hurry, hurry, hurry! 200
 CASTIZA CASTIZA Ay, to the devil.
 170 It is a pretty saying of a wicked one. VINDICE [aside]
 But methinks now Ay, to the devil.—To th' Duke, by my faith.
 It does not show so well out of your mouth, MOTHER
 Better in his. Ay, to the Duke. Daughter, you'd scorn to think VINDICE [aside] O'th' devil an you were there once.
 Faith, bad enough in both, VINDICE [aside] True, for most
 Were I in earnest, as I'll seem no less. There are as proud as he for his heart, i'faith.— 205
 175 [To Castiza] I wonder, lady, your own mother's words Who'd sit at home in a neglected room, Cannot be taken, nor stand in full force. Dealing her short-lived beauty to the pictures
 'Tis honesty you urge. What's honesty? That are as useless as old men, when those
 'Tis but heaven's beggar; Poorer in face and fortune than herself
 And what woman is so foolish to keep honesty Walk with a hundred acres on their backs, 210
 180 And be not able to keep herself? No, Fair meadows cut into green foreparts? O,

151 clip embrace; Vindice's rhetoric puts the alternatives not only as warmth or cold, light or darkness, but as life (and the Prince, associated in Renaissance hierarchical thought with the sun) or death ('the shades' = the phantom world of Hades)

153 come by yourselves (a) arrive at paradise unaided, (b) fulfil yourselves; possibly also with a sexual innuendo taken up in 'key' = penis

159 coy disdainful

162 It...mother a sardonic variation on the proverb 'It is a wise child that knows his own father'

165 haviours manners

168 ashore i.e. from the shore

169 Gold...rich money would accumulate (and goldsmiths, who acted as bankers, become wealthy) because it was not ventured in trade

181 keep less charge take less care (of virtue), but punning on 'charge' = expense

187 petitionary people suppliants at court (common folk)

189 ravished filled with delight, but Castiza takes up the literal meaning

190 'Slid' oath contracted from 'God's lid' (eyelid)

honour...grace playing on the worldly and moral kinds of 'honour' and on 'grace' as theological term and as courtesy-title

194 stirring stimulating, but the word also leads into 'move' and 'Quicken' to give a paradoxical (and grotesque) vitality and motion to this verbal 'still life' painting

196 Quicken (a) arouse, (b) come to life; there is an added hint of pregnancy

197 musics musical items

198-9 Bare-headed...em Hats were taken off in the presence of a social superior, though worn at home or even at church; 'let horns wear 'em' puns on stag-horn hatstands and cuckoldry.

204 an if

205 for his heart a colloquial phrase, adding emphasis ('for the life of him'); here suggesting the devil's commitment to pride. 'As proud as Lucifer' was proverbial.

210-11 Walk...foreparts satiric allusion to the sale of farms for court-wardrobes; 'foreparts' = ornamental coverings for the breast

It was the greatest blessing ever happenèd to women
 When farmers' sons agreed and met again
 To wash their hands and come up gentlemen.
 215 The commonwealth has flourished ever since.
 Lands that were mete by the rod, that labour's spared;
 Tailors ride down and measure 'em by the yard.
 Fair trees, those comely foretops of the field,
 Are cut to maintain headtires—much untold.
 220 All thrives but Chastity—she lies a-cold.
 Nay, shall I come nearer to you? Mark but this:
 Why are there so few honest women but because 'tis the poorer profession? That's accounted best that's best followed; least in trade, least in fashion; and that's not 225 honesty, believe it. And do but note the low and dejected price of it:
 "Lose but a pearl, we search and cannot brook it;
 But that once gone, who is so mad to look it?"
 MOTHER
 Troth, he says true.
 CASTIZA False, I defy you both.
 230 I have endured you with an ear of fire;
 Your tongues have struck hot irons on my face.
 Mother, come from that poisonous woman there.
 MOTHER Where?
 CASTIZA
 Do you not see her? She's too inward, then.
 [To Vindice] Slave, perish in thy office. You heavens,
 235 please
 Henceforth to make the mother a disease,
 Which first begins with me, yet I've outgone you. Exit

VINDICE [aside]
 O angels, clap your wings upon the skies
 And give this virgin crystal plaudities!

MOTHER
 240 Peevish, coy, foolish!—But return this answer:
 My lord shall be most welcome when his pleasure Conducts him this way. I will sway mine own.
 Women with women can work best alone.

VINDICE Indeed, I'll tell him so.— Exit Mother
 245 O, more uncivil, more unnatural
 Than those base-titled creatures that look downward!
 Why does not heaven turn black, or with a frown
 Undo the world? Why does not earth start up
 And strike the sins that tread upon't? O,

Were't not for gold and women there would be no
 damnation;
 Hell would look like a lord's great kitchen without fire
 in't.
 But 'twas decreed before the world began
 That they should be the hooks to catch at man. Exit

Enter Lussurioso with Hippolito, Vindice's brother 2.2
 LUSSURIOSO
 I much applaud thy judgement; thou art well-read in a fellow,
 And 'tis the deepest art to study man.
 I know this, which I never learned in schools,
 The world's divided into knaves and fools.
 HIPPOLITO [aside]
 Knave in your face, my lord—behind your back. 5
 LUSSURIOSO
 And I much thank thee that thou hast preferred
 A fellow of discourse, well-minglèd,
 And whose brain time hath seasoned.
 HIPPOLITO True, my lord.
 [Aside] We shall find season once, I hope. O villain,
 To make such an unnatural slave of me, but— 10
 [Enter Vindice disguised]
 LUSSURIOSO Mass, here he comes.
 HIPPOLITO [aside]
 And now shall I have free leave to depart.
 LUSSURIOSO
 Your absence; leave us.
 HIPPOLITO [aside] Are not my thoughts true?
 I must remove, but brother, you may stay.
 Heart, we are both made bawds a new-found way! 15
Exit

LUSSURIOSO
 Now we're an even number. A third man's dangerous,
 Especially her brother. Say, be free,
 Have I a pleasure toward?
 VINDICE O, my lord.
 LUSSURIOSO
 Ravish me in thine answer. Art thou rare?
 Hast thou beguiled her of salvation
 And rubbed hell o'er with honey? Is she a woman? 20
 VINDICE
 In all but in desire.
 LUSSURIOSO Then she's in nothing.

214 come up gentlemen come up to the court as gentlemen; 'up' also implies the rise in rank
 216 mete measured rod a unit of length (16.5 feet) or area 217 yard tailor's cloth-yard (the standard 3 feet in length) 218 foretops forelocks (often arranged to adorn the forehead)
 219 headtires headdresses untold not reckoned; i.e. much more might be said (Foakes)

227 brook it endure the loss
 228 that virginity (the 'honesty' of line 225)
 236 make...disease see notes on 1.3.81,
 2.1.123
 237 begins with attacks outgone outdistanced; i.e. resisted (the 'disease' that her mother has become) 239 crystal plaudities i.e. heavenly applause, referring to the crystalline heavenly sphere of Ptolemaic cosmology
 246 base-titled...downward animals (walking upright being an attribute of humans, and, in classical and Christian-humanist ideology, a sign of kinship with the divine)

 2.2.7 discourse fluent conversation well-minglèd well constituted
 8 seasoned matured
 9 season i.e. a fit time for revenge
 18 toward imminent; stressed on the first syllable 19 rare of exceptional merit (having succeeded)

I bate in courage now.
 VINDICE The words I brought
 25 Might well have made indifferent honest naught.
 A right good woman in these days is changed
 Into white money with less labour far.
 Many a maid has turned to Mahomet
 With easier working. I durst undertake,
 30 Upon the pawn and forfeit of my life,
 With half those words to flat a puritan's wife.
 But she is close and good; yet 'tis a doubt
 By this time. O, the mother, the mother!
 LUSSURIOSO
 I never thought their sex had been a wonder
 Until this minute. What fruit from the mother?
 VINDICE [aside]
 35 Now must I blister my soul, be forsworn,
 Or shame the woman that received me first.
 I will be true; thou liv'st not to proclaim;
 Spoke to a dying man, shame has no shame.—
 My lord.
 LUSSURIOSO
 Who's that?
 VINDICE Here's none but I, my lord.
 LUSSURIOSO
 What would thy haste utter?
 VINDICE Comfort.
 40 LUSSURIOSO Welcome.
 VINDICE
 The maid being dull, having no mind to travel
 Into unknown lands, what did me I straight
 But set spurs to the mother. Golden spurs
 Will put her to a false gallop in a trice.
 45 LUSSURIOSO Is't possible that in this
 The mother should be damned before the daughter?
 VINDICE O, that's good manners, my lord. The mother for her age must go foremost, you know.
 LUSSURIOSO
 Thou'st spoke that true; but where comes in this comfort?
 VINDICE
 50 In a fine place, my lord. The unnatural mother
 Did with her tongue so hard beset her honour
 That the poor fool was struck to silent wonder;

Yet still the maid, like an unlighted taper,
 Was cold and chaste, save that her mother's breath
 Did blow fire on her cheeks. The girl departed, 55 But the good ancient madam, half mad, threw me
 These promising words, which I took deeply note of:
 'My lord shall be most welcome—'
 LUSSURIOSO Faith, I thank her.
 VINDICE
 'When his pleasure conducts him this way—'
 LUSSURIOSO
 That shall be soon, i'faith.
 VINDICE 'I will sway mine own—' 60
 LUSSURIOSO
 She does the wiser. I commend her for't.
 VINDICE
 'Women with women can work best alone.'
 LUSSURIOSO By this light, and so they can, give 'em their due; men are not comparable to 'em.
 VINDICE No, that's true, for you shall have one woman 65 knit more in an hour than any man can ravel again in seven-and-twenty year.
 LUSSURIOSO
 Now my desires are happy; I'll make 'em freemen
 now.
 Thou art a precious fellow; faith, I love thee.
 Be wise, and make it thy revèue: beg, leg. 70
 What office couldst thou be ambitious for?
 VINDICE Office, my lord? Marry, if I might have my wish,
 I would have one that was never begged yet.
 LUSSURIOSO Nay then, thou canst have none.
 VINDICE Yes, my lord, I could pick out another office yet; 75 nay, and keep a horse and drab upon't.
 LUSSURIOSO Prithee, good bluntness, tell me.
 VINDICE Why, I would desire but this, my lord: to have all the fees behind the arras, and all the farthingales that fall plump about twelve o'clock at night upon the 80 rushes.
 LUSSURIOSO Thou'rt a mad apprehensive knave. Dost think to make any great purchase of that?
 VINDICE O, 'tis an unknown thing, my lord. I wonder 't'as been missed so long. 85
 LUSSURIOSO
 Well, this night I'll visit her, and 'tis till then

23 bate in courage decline in ardour
 24 made...naught corrupted a woman who was moderately virtuous; the adjectival 'indifferent honest' is made to stand for the (limited) virtue and for the person possessing it, so that 'naught' is both 'wicked' and the 'nothing' to which a measure of chastity is reduced 26 white money silver; i.e. she is converted into a prostitute
 27 turned to Mahomet converted to paganism (with a nod towards the Muslim harem); pagan was a cant term for prostitute
 29 pawn...life one of the several examples of hendiadys in this play; Vindice would pawn his life, knowing that it would be forfeit should he fail

 30 flat (a) overcome, (b) put her on her back
 31 close not open to persuasion
 35 be forsworn see 1.3.172
 37 thou i.e. Lussurioso
 39 Who's that? Presumably Vindice, preoccupied with the dilemma expressed in his aside, forgot his 'Piato' voice as he addressed 'My lord'.
 42 did me I the 'ethic dative', colloquial and emphatic
 43-4 But...trice playing on the associations of 'spur': the golden spurs of a knight, the golden coin called a 'spur-royal'
 49 this comfort i.e. that promised in line 40

66 knit figuratively, probably in the sense
 'unite or combine intimately'
ravel unravel
 68 happy fortunate
 70 leg bow
 71-81 What...rushes satirically alluding to abuse in the distribution of monopolies
 76 drab whore
 79 fees behind the arras i.e. fees for arranging sexual assignations behind a tapestry screen
farthingales hooped petticoats
 81 rushes commonly strewn on floors
 82 apprehensive witty
 83 purchase profit

- A year in my desires. Farewell, attend.
Trust me with thy preferment.
- VINDICE My loved lord.—
Exit Lussurioso
- [He draws his sword]
O, shall I kill him o'th' wrong side now? No!
Sword, thou wast never a backbiter yet.
I'll pierce him to his face. He shall die looking upon
me.
Thy veins are swelled with lust. This shall unfill 'em.
Great men were gods, if beggars could not kill 'em.
Forgive me, heaven, to call my mother wicked.
O, lessen not my days upon the earth.
I cannot honour her. By this I fear me
Her tongue has turned my sister into use.
I was a villain not to be forsworn
To this our lecherous hope, the Duke's son;
For lawyers, merchants, some divines, and all
Count beneficial perjury a sin small.
It shall go hard yet, but I'll guard her honour
And keep the ports sure.
Enter Hippolito
- HIPPOLITO Brother, how goes the world?
I would know news of you. But I have news to tell you.
- VINDICE
What, in the name of knavery?
- 105 HIPPOLITO Knavery, faith.
This vicious old Duke's worthily abused;
The pen of his bastard writes him cuckold.
- VINDICE
His bastard?
- HIPPOLITO Pray, believe it. He and the Duchess
By night meet in their linen. They have been seen
By stair-foot panders.
- 110 VINDICE O, sin foul and deep!
Great faults are winked at when the Duke's asleep.
- [Enter Spurio with two Servants]
See, see, here comes the Spurio.
- HIPPOLITO Monstrous luxur!
VINDICE
Unbraced, two of his valiant bawds with him.
[A Servant whispers to Spurio]
O, there's a wicked whisper; hell is in his ear.
Stay, let's observe his passage.
[Vindice and Hippolito withdraw]
- SPURIO O, but are you sure on't? 115
SERVANT
My lord, most sure on't, for 'twas spoke by one
That is most inward with the Duke's son's lust
That he intends within this hour to steal
Unto Hippolito's sister, whose chaste life
The mother has corrupted for his use. 120
- SPURIO
Sweet word, sweeter occasion! Faith, then, brother,
I'll disinherit you in as short time
As I was when I was begot in haste.
I'll damn you at your pleasure—precious deed!
After your lust, O, 'twill be fine to bleed. 125
Come, let our passing out be soft and wary.
Exeunt Spurio and Servants
- VINDICE
Mark, there, there, that step, now to the Duchess.
This their second meeting writes the Duke cuckold
With new additions, his horns newly revived.
Night, thou that lookst like funeral heralds' fees,
Torn down betimes i'th' morning, thou hang'st fitly
To grace those sins that have no grace at all.
Now 'tis full sea abed over the world,
There's juggling of all sides. Some that were maids
E'en at sunset are now perhaps i'th' toll-book. 130
This woman in immodest thin apparel
Lets in her friend by water. Here a dame,
Cunning, nails leather hinges to a door 135

89 o'th' wrong side in the back

95–6 O, lessen... her referring to Exodus, 20:12, 'Honour thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.'

96 By this by now

97 use (a) prostitution, (b) profit; usury and whoredom are closely linked in the satirical thinking of the time

100 and all Presumably this is the colloquial filler, meaning et cetera.

101 beneficial perjury referring to the doctrine justifying equivocation or lying under oath for a good cause (Ross)

102 It...but idiomatic phrase introducing a statement of what will happen unless overwhelming difficulties prevent it

103 ports gates; thus drawing out the latent metaphor in 'guard'

107 pen punning on the slang for penis

112 the Spurio Use of the definite article brings out the meaning of the name: 'the illegitimate one'.

luxur lecher

113 Unbraced unbuttoned, with clothes loosened

127 Mark...Duchess Vindice and Hippolito, having watched but not overheard Spurio and his servants, draw a false conclusion.

128–9 writes...revived continuing the image of line 107 and alluding to the 'new additions' sometimes penned for the revival of old plays and advertised on quarto title-pages; with a pun on 'additions' = titles

130 funeral heralds' fees Perhaps the herald's exorbitant fees are equated with the displays they organized—of black-framed escutcheons, shields, pennons, crested helmets, and other trappings. The fees charged by heralds on funeral occasions were high. See also Textual Notes.

133 full sea high tide (in sexual activity)

134 juggling deception

135 toll-book literally a book recording the sale of animals at market; here an imagined register of prostitutes, or even of the damned

137 friend lover

by water A lover could arrive silently by boat at a London house backing onto the Thames. Also the probable currency of 'water' = semen adds to the sexual innuendo, especially in association with 'let in'.

140 To avoid proclamation. Now cuckolds are
A-coining, apace, apace, apace, apace,
And careful sisters spin that thread i'th' night
That does maintain them and their bawds i'th' day.
HIPPOLITO
You flow well, brother.
VINDICE Puh, I'm shallow yet,
Too sparing and too modest. Shall I tell thee?
145 If every trick were told that's dealt by night,
There are few here that would not blush outright.
HIPPOLITO
I am of that belief too.
VINDICE Who's this comes?
[Enter Lussurioso]
The Duke's son up so late? Brother, fall back,
And you shall learn some mischief.—
[Hippolito withdraws]
My good lord.
LUSSURIOSO
150 Piato! Why, the man I wished for. Come,
I do embrace this season for the fittest
To taste of that young lady.
VINDICE [aside] Heart and hell!
HIPPOLITO [aside] Damned villain!
VINDICE [aside]
I ha' no way now to cross it but to kill him.
LUSSURIOSO
Come, only thou and I.
155 VINDICE My lord, my lord!
LUSSURIOSO
Why dost thou start us?
VINDICE I'd almost forgot—
The bastard!
LUSSURIOSO What of him?
VINDICE This night, this hour,
This minute, now—
LUSSURIOSO What, what?
VINDICE Shadows the Duchess—
LUSSURIOSO
Horrible word!
VINDICE And like strong poison eats
Into the Duke your father's forehead.
LUSSURIOSO O!
VINDICE
He makes horn royal.
LUSSURIOSO Most ignoble slave!
VINDICE
This is the fruit of two beds.
LUSSURIOSO I am mad.
VINDICE
That passage he trod warily.
LUSSURIOSO He did!
VINDICE
And hushed his villains every step he took.
LUSSURIOSO His villains? I'll confound them.
VINDICE Take 'em finely, finely now.
LUSSURIOSO
The Duchess' chamber door shall not control me.
[Exeunt Lussurioso and Vindice]
HIPPOLITO
Good, happy, swift! There's gunpowder i'th' court, Wildfire at midnight. In this heedless fury
He may show violence to cross himself.
170 I'll follow the event. Exit
[Enter again [Lussurioso, with sword drawn, and Vindice, disguised]]
2.3
LUSSURIOSO Where is that villain?

139 proclamation exposure as adulteress (having been betrayed by squeaking hinges)
140 A-coining being coined or created. Vindice gives a paradoxical twist to the idea of sexual activity as a 'coining' or engendering of children.
apace... apace The play catches a sense of frantic hedonism in its rhythms, as well as in its imagery; the repetition here suggests a scarcely controlled excitement. Compare the urgent insistence of Vindice's 'sales-talk' at 2.1.200, 'hurry, hurry, hurry!', which Castiza rightly hears as an invitation to join the heedless rush to 'the devil'.
141 sisters 'sisters of the game' whose housework is in 'houses of resort'. The imagery combines suggestions of the Fates with the bawdiness of Sir Toby Belch's 'spin it off' in Twelfth Night, 1.3.98-100. 'Sisters' is also a loaded word in view of Vindice's situation in respect to Castiza.
145 trick (a) card hand (sustained in 'told' = counted, and in 'dealt'), (b) stratagem,

(c) act of intercourse
146 here in the audience
150 Piato Vindice's assumed name, which means 'hidden'
156 start startle
158 Shadows either (a) closely attends upon, or (b) covers (though OED records no specifically sexual sense)
159-60 And... forehead The simile unites two image motifs, of poison and the forehead (as expressing either shame or impudence and as site for the cuckolds horns).
161 horn royal i.e. a royal cuckold, with a pun on 'royal' as a branch of a stag's antlers (possibly used as an aphrodisiac); 'horn royal' is formed on the analogy of such expressions as 'battle royal'
162 fruit of two beds i.e. a result of the Duke's begetting Spurio in a bed other than his own and the Duchess's
164 villains servants
169 Wildfire highly inflammable substance used in war
170 cross thwart
2.3.0.1-2 Enter... disguised Di Trevis, director of the Royal Shakespeare Company's production at the Swan (1987), found 2.3 a 'dreadful scene' to stage. Presumably in the Jacobean theatre the bed was set up within the 'discovery space' (curtained alcove in the stage wall or curtained booth projecting from it), and the Duke and Duchess would soon have leapt out. The imaginary setting appears unobtrusively to change from the Duchess's bed-chamber to 'the court'. Use of the discovery space would allow the bed to be concealed as the action spilled out onto the main platform and involved most of the cast. On the other hand, Jacobean beds were themselves commonly curtained, so that the scene could have been managed through the thrusting of a bed out onto the stage. And even if, as this edition's stage directions assume, the discovery space was used, its curtains may have been opened at the beginning of the scene, and the furnishings of the bed pulled back at line 7.

- VINDICE
Softly, my lord, and you may take 'em twisted.
- LUSSURIOSO
I care not how.
- VINDICE O, 'twill be glorious
To kill 'em doubled, when they're heaped. Be soft, my lord.
- LUSSURIOSO
5 Away, my spleen is not so lazy. Thus and thus I'll shake their eyelids ope, and with my sword
Shut 'em again for ever.—Villain! Strumpet!
[He pulls back the curtains of the discovery space to reveal the Duke and Duchess in bed]
- DUKE
You upper guard defend us!
- DUCHESS Treason, treason!
- DUKE
10 O, take me not in sleep. I have great sins.
I must have days,
Nay months, dear son, with penitential heaves,
To lift 'em out and not to die unclear.
O, thou wilt kill me both in heaven and here.
- LUSSURIOSO
I am amazed to death.
- DUKE Nay, villain, traitor,
15 Worse than the foulest epithet, now I'll gripe thee
E'en with the nerves of wrath, and throw thy head
Amongst the lawyers. Guard!
[Enter [Guards, who seize Lussurioso; Hippolito, Nobles, and sons of the Duchess, Ambitioso and Supervacuo]
- FIRST NOBLE
How comes the quiet of your grace disturbed?
- DUKE
20 This boy, that should be myself after me,
Would be myself before me, and in heat
Of that ambition bloodily rushed in,
Intending to depose me in my bed.
- SECOND NOBLE
Duty and natural loyalty forbid!
- DUCHESS
25 He called his father villain, and me strumpet,
A word that I abhor to file my lips with.
- AMBITIOSO
That was not so well done, brother.
- LUSSURIOSO I am abused.
I know there's no excuse can do me good.
- VINDICE [aside to Hippolito]
'Tis now good policy to be from sight.
His vicious purpose to our sister's honour
Is crossed beyond our thought.
- HIPPOLITO [aside to Vindice] You little dreamt
30 His father slept here.
- VINDICE [aside to Hippolito]
O, 'twas far beyond me.
But since it fell so, without frightful words,
Would he had killed him; 'twould have eased our swords.
[Vindice and Hippolito] dissemble a flight [and steal away]
- DUKE
Be comforted, our Duchess; he shall die.
[Exit Duchess]
- LUSSURIOSO [aside]
Where's this slave-pander now? Out of mine eye, 35 Guilty of this abuse.
[Enter Spurio with two Servants, his villains. [They talk apart.]]
- SPURIO You're villains, fablers.
You have knaves' chins and harlots' tongues. You lie,
And I will damn you with one meal a day.
- FIRST SERVANT
O, good my lord!
- SPURIO 'Sblood, you shall never sup.
- SECOND SERVANT
O, I beseech you, sir!
- SPURIO To let my sword
40 Catch cold so long and miss him.
- FIRST SERVANT Troth, my lord,
'Twas his intent to meet there.
- SPURIO Heart, he's yonder.
Ha, what news here? Is the day out o'th' socket,
That it is noon at midnight, the court up?
How comes the guard so saucy with his elbows?
45
- LUSSURIOSO [aside] The bastard here?
Nay then, the truth of my intent shall out.—

5 spleen The spleen was viewed as seat of passions, such as violent anger.

8 upper guard the guard nearest the bedchamber

11 heaves sighs

14 I am . . . death Lussurioso may let fall his sword here. It is for actors and director to decide at what point the Duke and Duchess leap out of bed.

16 nerves sinews

23 forfend forbid

25 file defile

26 abused imposed upon

32 frightful frightening; Vindice probably means that he wishes Lussurioso had killed the Duke before alarming and warning him

33.1 dissemble a flight The phrase suggests an exaggerated miming of stealing away.

35 slave-pander i.e. Piato

Out of mine eye out of sight; nowhere to be seen

36-45 This dialogue is ignored by others on stage. It is a feature of Middleton's dramaturgy that when single characters or groups of characters enter they often fail—at first or, as in this case, at any time during the scene—to interact with those already on stage, as though they were isolated by their own concerns.

Hence the prevalence of asides. But Spurio's explosive entry leads into dialogue 'apart', rather than aside.

37 harlots' a general term of abuse, applicable to either sex

43 out o'th' socket perhaps like Hamlet's 'The time is out of joint', i.e. in an abnormal state; but the phrase carries suggestions of the traditional analogy of the sun ('the day') to God's eye, displaced and shining/open at the wrong time

45 his elbows i.e. Lussurioso's, held by guards

My lord and father, hear me.
 DUKE Bear him hence.
 LUSSURIOSO I can with loyalty excuse—
 50 DUKE Excuse? To prison with the villain.
 Death shall not long lag after him.
 SPURIO [aside]
 Good, i'faith; then 'tis not much amiss.
 LUSSURIOSO
 Brothers, my best release lies on your tongues.
 I pray, persuade for me.
 AMBITIOSO It is our duties.
 Make yourself sure of us.
 55 SUPERVACUO We'll sweat in pleading.
 LUSSURIOSO
 And I may live to thank you.
Exeunt [Lussurioso, Nobles, and Guards]
 AMBITIOSO [aside] No, thy death
 Shall thank me better.
 SPURIO [aside] He's gone. I'll after him
 And know his trespass, seem to bear a part
 In all his ills, but with a puritan heart.
Exit [Spurio with his Servants]
 AMBITIOSO [to Supervacuo]
 60 Now, brother, let our hate and love be woven
 So subtly together that in speaking
 One word for his life we may make three for his death.
 The craftiest pleader gets most gold for breath.
 SUPERVACUO [to Ambitioso]
 Set on, I'll not be far behind you, brother.
 65 DUKE Is't possible
 A son should be disobedient as far as the sword?
 It is the highest, he can go no further.
 AMBITIOSO
 My gracious lord, take pity.
 DUKE Pity, boys?
 AMBITIOSO
 70 Nay, we'd be loth to move your grace too much;
 We know the trespass is unpardonable,
 Black, wicked, and unnatural.
 SUPERVACUO In a son, O, monstrous!
 AMBITIOSO Yet, my lord,
 A duke's soft hand strokes the rough head of law
 And makes it lie smooth.
 DUKE But my hand shall ne'er do't.
 AMBITIOSO
 That as you please, my lord.
 SUPERVACUO We must needs confess
 75 Some father would have entered into hate

So deadly pointed that before his eyes
 He would ha' seen the execution sound,
 Without corrupted favour.
 AMBITIOSO But, my lord,
 Your grace may live the wonder of all times
 In pard'ning that offence which never yet
 Had face to beg a pardon.
 DUKE [aside] Honey? How's this?
 AMBITIOSO
 Forgive him, good my lord, he's your own son—
 And I must needs say 'twas the vilelier done.
 SUPERVACUO
 He's the next heir—yet this true reason gathers:
 None can possess that dispossess their fathers.
 80 Be merciful—
 DUKE [aside] Here's no stepmother's wit.
 I'll try 'em both upon their love and hate.
 AMBITIOSO
 Be merciful, although—
 DUKE You have prevailed.
 My wrath, like flaming wax, hath spent itself.
 I know 'twas but some peevish moon in him.
 90 Go, let him be released.
 SUPERVACUO [aside] 'Sfoot, how now, brother?
 AMBITIOSO
 Your grace doth please to speak beside your spleen.
 I would it were so happy.
 DUKE Why, go, release him.
 SUPERVACUO
 O, my good lord, I know the fault's too weighty
 And full of general loathing, too inhuman,
 95 Rather by all men's voices worthy death.
 DUKE 'Tis true too.
 Here then, receive this signet. Doom shall pass.
 Direct it to the judges. He shall die
 Ere many days. Make haste.
 AMBITIOSO All speed that may be.
 100 We could have wished his burden not so sore.
 We knew your grace did but delay before.
Exeunt Ambitioso and Supervacuo
 DUKE
 Here's envy with a poor thin cover o'er't,
 Like scarlet hid in lawn, easily spied through.
 This their ambition by the mother's side
 105 Is dangerous and for safety must be purged.
 I will prevent their envies. Sure it was
 But some mistaken fury in our son,
 Which these aspiring boys would climb upon.

59 puritan hypocritical
 61 subtly pronounced as trisyllabic
 77 sound fully performed
 81 Honey sweet words
 86 no stepmother's wit The Duke, who sees through the blatant hypocrisy of Ambitioso and Supervacuo, means that they lack the Duchess's shrewdness or

'mother wit'.
 90 peevish moon senseless fit of frenzy (the moon provoking 'lunes' or lunatic behaviour)
 92 beside your spleen with your anger set aside
 98 signet a small seal (usually on a ring) employed to give authority, in this case to a merely verbal command 103 envy malice

 104 scarlet rich, bright red cloth lawn linen so fine as to be partially transparent 107 prevent forestall

- 110 He shall be released suddenly.
Enter Nobles
- FIRST NOBLE
Good morning to your grace.
- DUKE
Welcome, my lords.
[The Nobles kneel before the Duke]
- SECOND NOBLE
Our knees shall take away the office of our feet for ever,
Unless your grace bestow a father's eye
Upon the clouded fortunes of your son,
115 And in compassionate virtue grant him that
Which makes e'en mean men happy, liberty.
- DUKE [aside]
How seriously their loves and honours woo
For that which I am about to pray them do.—
Why, rise, my lords, your knees sign his release.
120 We freely pardon him.
- FIRST NOBLE
We owe your grace much thanks, and he much duty.
Exeunt Nobles
- DUKE
It well becomes that judge to nod at crimes
That does commit greater himself and lives.
I may forgive a disobedient error
125 That expect pardon for adultery
And in my old days am a youth in lust.
Many a beauty have I turned to poison
In the denial, covetous of all.
Age hot is like a monster to be seen;
130 My hairs are white and yet my sins are green. [Exit]
Finis Actus Secundi
- ⊗
- 3.1 Incipit Actus Tertius
Enter Ambitioso and Supervacuo
- SUPERVACUO
Brother, let my opinion sway you once.
I speak it for the best, to have him die
Surest and soonest. If the signet come
Unto the judges' hands, why then his doom
5 Will be deferred till sittings and court-days,
- Juries and further. Faiths are bought and sold.
Oaths in these days are but the skin of gold.
- AMBITIOSO
In troth, 'tis true too.
- SUPERVACUO
Then let's set by the judges
And fall to the officers. 'Tis but mistaking
The Duke our father's meaning, and where he named 10 'Ere many days', 'tis but forgetting that
And have him die i'th' morning.
- AMBITIOSO
Excellent,
Then am I heir—duke in a minute!
- SUPERVACUO [aside]
Nay,
An he were once puffed out, here is a pin
Should quickly prick your bladder.
- AMBITIOSO
Blessed occasion!
15 He being packed, we'll have some trick and wile
To wind our younger brother out of prison
That lies in for the rape. The lady's dead,
And people's thoughts will soon be buried.
- SUPERVACUO
We may with safety do't, and live and feed.
20 The Duchess' sons are too proud to bleed.
- AMBITIOSO
We are, i'faith, to say true. Come, let's not linger.
I'll to the officers. Go you before
And set an edge upon the executioner.
- SUPERVACUO
Let me alone to grind him.
- AMBITIOSO
Meet! Farewell.—
25 Exit Supervacuo
- I am next now; I rise just in that place
Where thou'rt cut off—upon thy neck, kind brother;
The falling of one head lifts up another. Exit
- Enter with the Nobles, Lussurioso from prison*
- LUSSURIOSO
My lords, I am so much indebted to your loves
For this, O, this delivery.
- FIRST NOBLE
But our duties,
My lord, unto the hopes that grow in you.
- LUSSURIOSO
If e'er I live to be myself, I'll thank you.

110 suddenly immediately
113–14 eye...clouded The collocation evokes the analogy of ruler (and his eye) to the sun.
115 virtue power
124 disobedient error lapse into disobedience (neglect of filial duty); a transferred epithet
127–8 turned...denial poisoned when she rejected my advances
128 all i.e. all beautiful women
130 green youthful 3.1.7 skin of gold i.e. a mere cover for the true regulator of the judicial process, which is money

8 set by bypass
9 fall to proceed to 14 puffed out extinguished (like a flame), in so far as 'he' = Lussurioso; but in the sense 'blown up' the phrase also relates to the sudden inflation and deflation of Ambitioso's status
16 pin i.e. his sword
16 packed packed off 24 set an edge upon make keen (the executioner in the figurative sense, and the axe in the literal); 'grind' continues the wordplay 25 Meet! Right! ('meet' = fitting)

26–7 I rise...brother The wording recalls the fabulous snake-like monster Hydra, whose heads grew again as fast as they were cut off; compare 3.5.222–3. The 'kind brother' is Lussurioso, with play on 'kind' as natural, kindred.
28 head punning on literal head and (prospective) head of family and state
3.2.2 But merely
4 myself i.e. Duke

5 O liberty, thou sweet and heavenly dame!
But hell for prison is too mild a name. Exeunt

3.3 Enter Ambitioso and Supervacuo with Officers

AMBITIOSO
Officers, here's the Duke's signet, your firm warrant,
Brings the command of present death along with it Unto our brother, the Duke's son. We are sorry
That we are so unnaturally employed

5 In such an unkind office, fitter far
For enemies than brothers.

SUPERVACUO But you know
The Duke's command must be obeyed.

FIRST OFFICER
It must and shall, my lord. This morning then;
So suddenly?

AMBITIOSO Ay, alas, poor good soul,
10 He must break fast betimes. The executioner Stands ready to put forth his cowardly valour.

SECOND OFFICER Already?

SUPERVACUO
Already, i'faith. O sir, destruction hies,
And he that is least impudent soonest dies.

FIRST OFFICER
15 Troth, you say true, my lord. We take our leaves.
Our office shall be sound. We'll not delay
The third part of a minute.

AMBITIOSO Therein you show
Yourselves good men and upright officers.
Pray let him die as private as he may,
20 Do him that favour, for the gaping people
Will but trouble him at his prayers
And make him curse and swear, and so die black.
Will you be so far kind?

FIRST OFFICER It shall be done, my lord.

AMBITIOSO
Why, we do thank you. If we live to be,
You shall have a better office.

25 SECOND OFFICER Your good lordship.

SUPERVACUO
Commend us to the scaffold in our tears.

FIRST OFFICER
We'll weep, and do your commendations.
Exeunt [Officers]

AMBITIOSO
Fine fools in office!

SUPERVACUO Things fall out so fit.

AMBITIOSO
So happily. Come, brother, ere next clock
His head will be made serve a bigger block. Exeunt 30

Enter in prison Junior Brother [and his Keeper] 3.4

JUNIOR
Keeper.

KEEPER My lord.

JUNIOR No news lately from our brothers?
Are they unmindful of us?

KEEPER
My lord, a messenger came newly in
And brought this from 'em.
He gives him a letter

JUNIOR Nothing but paper comforts?
I looked for my delivery before this, 5
Had they been worth their oaths. Prithce, be from us. [Exit Keeper]

Now, what say you, forsooth? Speak out, I pray.
[He reads the letter]
'Brother, be of good cheer.'—'Slud, it begins like a whore, with good cheer. 'Thou shalt not be long a prisoner.'—Not five-and-thirty year like a bankrupt, I 10 think so! 'We have thought upon a device to get thee out by a trick.'—By a trick? Pox o' your trick, an it be so long a-playing! 'And so rest comforted. Be merry and expect it suddenly.'—Be merry? Hang merry, draw and quarter merry! I'll be mad! Is't not strange that a 15 man should lie in a whole month for a woman? Well, we shall see how sudden our brothers will be in their promise. I must expect still a trick. I shall not be long a prisoner.
[Enter Keeper]
How now, what news? 20

KEEPER
Bad news, my lord; I am discharged of you.

JUNIOR
Slave, call'st thou that bad news? [Aside] I thank you, brothers.

KEEPER
My lord, 'twill prove so. Here come the officers
Into whose hands I must commit you.
[Enter four Officers]

JUNIOR Ha,
Officers? What, why?

FIRST OFFICER You must pardon us, my lord. 25
Our office must be sound. Here is our warrant,

3.3.5 unkind with the older sense of 'unnatural', as well as 'cruel'

10 betimes early in the morning

13 hies hurries

14 impudent lacking in shame or decency; the whole line is ironic both in relation to (a) the true nature of Lussurioso and (b) the fate of Junior (who 'soonest dies').

16 sound properly performed

22 black damned

24 If we live to be i.e. if I ('we' is the royal we) live to be Duke

30 block the executioner's block; quibbling on 'block' = size of hat

3.4.9 good cheer quibbling on the meaning 'good entertainment'

10 Not . . . bankrupt The bankrupt, imprisoned for debt, could not resort to bribery!

14-15 Hang . . . quarter merry alluding to the traditional punishment for treason: 'draw' = disembowel, 'quarter' = cut into quarters, dismember

16 lie in i.e. lie in prison, be confined; with the idea that it is more in the natural order of things for a woman to 'lie in' = be confined in childbed 'for a man' (because he has made her pregnant)

26 sound either 'valid' or 'fully carried out' (as at 3.3.16)

- The signet from the Duke. You must straight suffer.
 JUNIOR
 Suffer? I'll suffer you to be gone. I'll suffer you
 To come no more. What would you have me suffer?
 SECOND OFFICER
 30 My lord, those words were better changed to prayers.
 The time's but brief with you. Prepare to die.
 JUNIOR
 Sure, 'tis not so.
 THIRD OFFICER It is too true, my lord.
 JUNIOR
 I tell you, 'tis not, for the Duke my father
 Deferred me till next sitting, and I look 35 E'en every minute, threescore times an hour,
 For a release, a trick wrought by my brothers.
 FIRST OFFICER
 A trick, my lord? If you expect such comfort,
 Your hope's as fruitless as a barren woman.
 Your brothers were the unhappy messengers
 40 That brought this powerful token for your death.
 JUNIOR
 My brothers? No, no.
 SECOND OFFICER 'Tis most true, my lord.
 JUNIOR
 My brothers to bring a warrant for my death?
 How strange this shows.
 THIRD OFFICER There's no delaying time.
 JUNIOR
 Desire 'em hither, call 'em up, my brothers.
 They shall deny it to your faces.
 45 FIRST OFFICER My lord,
 They're far enough by this, at least at court,
 And this most strict command they left behind 'em.
 When grief swum in their eyes, they showed like
 brothers,
 Brim-full of heavy sorrow; but the Duke
 Must have his pleasure.
 50 JUNIOR His pleasure?
 FIRST OFFICER
 These were their last words which my memory bears:
 'Commend us to the scaffold in our tears.'
 JUNIOR
 Pox dry their tears! What should I do with tears?
 I hate 'em worse than any citizen's son
 55 Can hate salt water. Here came a letter now,
- New-bleeding from their pens, scarce stinted yet.
 Would I'd been torn in pieces when I tore it.
 Look, you officious whoresons, words of comfort:
 'Not long a prisoner'.
 FIRST OFFICER It says true in that, sir, for you must suffer 60 presently.
 JUNIOR A villainous dunce upon the letter, knavish exposition. Look you then here, sir: 'We'll get thee out by a trick', says he.
 SECOND OFFICER That may hold too, sir, for you know a 65 trick is commonly four cards, which was meant by us four officers.
 JUNIOR
 Worse and worse dealing.
 FIRST OFFICER The hour beckons us;
 The headsman waits. Lift up your eyes to heaven.
 JUNIOR
 I thank you, faith; good, pretty, wholesome counsel. 70
 I should look up to heaven, as you said,
 Whilst he behind me cozens me of my head.
 Ay, that's the trick.
 THIRD OFFICER You delay too long, my lord.
 JUNIOR
 Stay, good authority's bastards. Since I must Through brothers' perjury die, O let me venom 75
 Their souls with curses.
 FIRST OFFICER Come, 'tis no time to curse.
 JUNIOR
 Must I bleed, then, without respect of sign? Well—
 My fault was sweet sport, which the world approves;
 I die for that which every woman loves. Exeunt
- Enter Vindice [disguised] with Hippolito his brother* 3-5
- VINDICE
 O, sweet, delectable, rare, happy, ravishing!
 HIPPOLITO
 Why, what's the matter, brother?
 VINDICE O, 'tis able
 To make a man spring up and knock his forehead
 Against yon silver ceiling.
 HIPPOLITO Prithee, tell me,
 Why may not I partake with you? You vowed once 5
 To give me share to every tragic thought.
 VINDICE By th' mass, I think I did too.
 Then I'll divide it to thee: the old Duke,

34 sitting court session

55 hate salt water because of the proverbial dangers of sea-travel (Tilley, S177), and perhaps the practice of pressing men (here townsmen) to serve in the navy; with obvious wordplay on salt tears

56 stinted stanch'd (i.e. 'dried'), taking up the image of the flowing ink as blood

57 tore it i.e. tore it open

62 dunce sophistical gloss; alluding to the medieval scholastic theologian Duns Scotus, notorious among his opponents for hair-splitting arguments upon the letter with punning reference to strictly 'literal' interpretation of a text in disregard of its spirit

66 trick (a) cards played and won, (b) hand of cards; Middleton may have in mind the popular game of primero; lines 12–13 ('trick . . . a-playing') have foreshadowed the wordplay, which is continued in 'dealing' (68)

71–3 I should . . . trick alluding to the distractions used by thieves and cheats

74 good . . . bastards Junior's phrase, which makes the officers the illegitimate sons of a personified authority, reflects the play's concerns with bastardy and the proper and improper uses of power.

75 perjury the violation of their promise to have him released

77 without . . . sign without consideration of whether the astrological signs are favourable for therapeutic bleeding

3.5.4 silver ceiling (a) the sky, (b) the 'heavens' or painted canopy over the stage

8 divide it to share it with

- Thinking my outward shape and inward heart
 10 Are cut out of one piece—for he that prates
 His secrets, his heart stands o'th' outside—
 Hires me by price to greet him with a lady
 In some fit place veiled from the eyes o'th' court,
 Some darkened, blushless angle that is guilty
 15 Of his forefathers' lusts and great folks' riots;
 To which I easily (to maintain my shape)
 Consented, and did wish his impudent grace
 To meet her here in this unsunnèd lodge
 Wherein 'tis night at noon; and here the rather 20 Because, unto the torturing of his soul,
 The bastard and the Duchess have appointed
 Their meeting too in this luxurious circle;
 Which most afflicting sight will kill his eyes
 Before we kill the rest of him.
- HIPPOLITO
 25 'Twill, i'faith. Most dreadfully digested.
 I see not how you could have missed me, brother.
- VINDICE
 True, but the violence of my joy forgot it.
- HIPPOLITO
 Ay, but where's that lady now?
- VINDICE O, at that word
 30 I'm lost again; you cannot find me yet;
 I'm in a throng of happy apprehensions.
 He's suited for a lady. I have took care
 For a delicious lip, a sparkling eye.
 You shall be witness, brother.
 Be ready; stand with your hat off. Exit
- HIPPOLITO
 35 Troth, I wonder what lady it should be.
 Yet 'tis no wonder, now I think again,
 To have a lady
 Stoop to a duke that stoops unto his men.
 'Tis common to be common through the world,
 40 And there's more private common shadowing vices
- Than those who are known both by their names and prices.
 'Tis part of my allegiance to stand bare
 To the Duke's concubine—and here she comes.
Enter Vindice with the [masked] skull of his love dressed up in tires
- VINDICE [to the skull]
 Madam, his grace will not be absent long.
 Secret? Ne'er doubt us, madam. 'Twill be worth 45
 Three velvet gowns to your ladyship. Known?
 Few ladies respect that. Disgrace? A poor thin shell.
 'Tis the best grace you have to do it well.
 I'll save your hand that labour; I'll unmask you.
 [He reveals the skull]
- HIPPOLITO Why, brother, brother! 50
- VINDICE
 Art thou beguiled now? Tut, a lady can,
 At such all-hid beguile a wiser man.
 Have I not fitted the old surfeiter
 With a quaint piece of beauty? Age and bare bone 55
 Are e'er allied in action. Here's an eye
 Able to tempt a great man—to serve God;
 A pretty hanging lip, that has forgot now to dissemble.
 Methinks this mouth should make a swearer tremble,
 A drunkard clasp his teeth, and not undo 'em
 60 To suffer wet damnation to run through 'em.
 Here's a cheek keeps her colour, let the wind go whistle.
 Spout rain, we fear thee not; be hot or cold,
 All's one with us. And is not he absurd
 Whose fortunes are upon their faces set
 That fear no other god but wind and wet? 65
- HIPPOLITO Brother, you've spoke that right.
 Is this the form that living shone so bright?
- VINDICE The very same.
 And now methinks I could e'en chide myself
 70 For doting on her beauty, though her death

10 prates blabs
 14 blushless angle nook or corner suited to shameless acts
 16 shape disguise
 22 luxurious circle lecherous spot, with a possible sly glance at the 'wooden O' of the Globe
 25 dreadfully digested concocted so as to terrify
 26 missed me left me out
 30 apprehensions conceptions, anticipations
 31 suitèd for provided with 34 hat off as a mark of respect

38 Stoop to... stoops unto submit (sexually)...degrades himself to the level of 39 common quibbling on (a) usual, and
 (b) publicly available; the wordplay continues in the paradox 'private common'
 in the next line
 40 shadowing keeping themselves secret
 41 those The 'vices' assume a degree of personification that allows 'those' to refer to whores as well as their sins.
 42 stand bare stand with hat removed (but with a bawdy quibble)
 43.2 tires headdress or wig

47 shell i.e. empty thing, of no matter
 52 all-hid hide and seek 54 quaint (a) pretty, (b) ingeniously contrived; the word also carries a suggestion of 'cunt', linking to 'eye', 'lip', and
 'mouth'
 57 hanging (a) pouting (with reference to the former lip), (b) jutting downwards (with reference to the lower jawbone that remains)
 64 set staked
 65 That... wet alluding to the use of cosmetics (a favourite target of satirists)

- Shall be revenged after no common action.
Does the silkworm expend her yellow labours
For thee? For thee does she undo herself?
Are lordships sold to maintain ladyships
75 For the poor benefit of a bewitching minute?
Why does yon fellow falsify highways
And put his life between the judge's lips
To refine such a thing, keeps horse and men
To beat their valours for her?
80 Surely we're all mad people, and they Whom we think are, are not—we mistake those:
'Tis we are mad in sense, they but in clothes.
HIPPOLITO
Faith, and in clothes too, we; give us our due.
VINDICE
Does every proud and self-affecting dame
85 Camphor her face for this? And grieve her maker
In sinful baths of milk, when many an infant starves
For her superfluous outside—all for this?
Who now bids twenty pound a night, prepares
Music, perfumes, and sweetmeats? All are hushed.
90 Thou mayst lie chaste now. It were fine, methinks,
To have thee seen at revels, forgetful feasts,
And unclean brothels. Sure, 'twould fright the sinner
- And make him a good coward, put a reveller
Out of his antic amble,
And cloy an epicure with empty dishes. 95
Here might a scornful and ambitious woman Look through and through herself. See, ladies, with false forms
You deceive men, but cannot deceive worms.—
Now to my tragic business. Look you, brother,
I have not fashioned this only for show 100
And useless property. No, it shall bear a part E'en in it own revenge. This very skull
Whose mistress the Duke poisoned with this drug,
The mortal curse of the earth, shall be revenged
In the like strain, and kiss his lips to death. 105
As much as the dumb thing can, he shall feel.
What fails in poison, we'll supply in steel.
HIPPOLITO
Brother, I do applaud thy constant vengeance,
The quaintness of thy malice above thought.
[Vindice puts poison on the skull's mouth]
VINDICE
So, 'tis laid on. Now come, and welcome, Duke; 110
I have her for thee. I protest it, brother,
Methinks she makes almost as fair a sign

71 after . . . action (a) in no ordinary way, (b) through no legal process in the common court, (c) with unusual histrionics

72–98 Does . . . worms After T. S. Eliot drew attention to this passage, it was frequently analysed, most fully by L. G. Salinger and F. R. Leavis.

72 expend . . . labours The phrase, in which the epithet is made to modify the 'labours' rather than their product, condenses several images. The silkworm spins a yellow-white cocoon, which recalls gold in colour and value. 'Expend', phonetically incorporating the expected verb 'spin', works to enhance the suggestion of riches and currency, while implying a self-annihilating expenditure of effort for the benefit of others who will themselves end up as skulls; so that the associations of 'yellow' with age and disease also become pertinent.

73 For 'Vindice's irony turns, in this speech, on the ambiguities of the word "for", referring both to equivalence in exchange and to purpose or result' (Salinger). undo herself (a) unwind the thread from herself, (b) exhaust herself, destroy herself

74 lordships . . . ladyships i.e. are inherited baronial estates sold so that their owners can keep mistresses in ladylike finery. The effect of the line derives from the speciousness of its alliterative symmetry, the substance of an actual lordship being set against the social and moral vacuity of the whore tricked out as 'your ladyship'.

75 benefit with wordplay on the sense 'property rights' (Onions), so harking back to 'lordships'

bewitching charming and seductive, but with a literal edge, implying a soul in thrall to a malignant spell

76 falsify highways The expression is obscure, but most editors have understood it as an allusion to highway robbery; hence 'act the highwayman' or 'make highways unsafe', perhaps with a reference to the offender's 'altering signposts and diverting rich travellers into his predatory hands' (Gibbons), with 'fellow' carrying suggestions of 'good fellow' = thief. Middleton discourses on highway robbery in Black Book, and in another rogue-pamphlet, Martin Markall (1610), 'S.R.' describes how young 'gentlemen . . . cavalieros' rob on the highways in order to pay for 'banqueting with whores'; 'S.R.' also mentions their donning of 'artificial beards and heads of hair' as disguises and their cloaks that can be worn either side out—which may help to explain 'falsify'; but all the brands of falsity and falsification called to mind by that verb are pertinent to the broader context. Loughrey and Taylor, reading 'high ways', interpret 'impersonate the aristocracy', but the risk of capital punishment (line 77) suggests the more spectacular crime. And the existence of the colloquial term 'highway lawyers' for highway robbers may have sparked the associative process that created 'the judge's lips'.

77 put . . . lips Some commentators have detected in this brilliant line a hint of the Last Judgement, mention of sins on the highway already having activated memories of the biblical 'broad . . . way that leads to destruction' (Matthew, 7:13).

78 refine improve by adding refinements (and finery), pamper; but 'the gold image, coming through by way of "sold" (and the more effectively for never having been explicit), seems also to be felt here, with the suggestion that nothing can refine this dross' (Leavis).

79 beat their valours wear out their strengths, with play on 'valours' = values, and a possible near-homonymic pun on 'bate' = diminish, degrade; 'valour' (as prowess and boldness) seems to link the phrase with the dangerous escapades of the highway robber

84 self-affecting self-loving, vain

85 Camphor wash with camphor, a white aromatic vegetable oil used as skin-cleanser

91 forgetful i.e. of (a) morals, (b) cares, (c) mortality

94 antic amble grotesque movement in walking or dancing; 'silly walks'

97 forms appearances

98 worms The silkworm at the beginning of Vindice's meditation and homily turns into the graveyard worm at its conclusion.

101 property in the theatrical sense, as though Vindice were mounting a revenge play

102 it its

105 strain manner (literally, 'tune')

109 quaintness ingenuity

112 sign show

- As some old gentlewoman in a periwig.
 [To the skull] Hide thy face now for shame; thou hadst need have a mask now.
 [He readjusts the mask]
- 115 'Tis vain when beauty flows, but when it fleets
 This would become graves better than the streets.
- HIPPOLITO
 You have my voice in that.
 [Voices within] Hark, the Duke's come.
- VINDICE
 Peace, let's observe what company he brings
 And how he does absent 'em, for you know
 120 He'll wish all private. Brother, fall you back a little
 With the bony lady.
- HIPPOLITO That I will.
 VINDICE So, so—
 Now nine years' vengeance crowd into a minute.
 [They withdraw. Enter the Duke and Gentlemen]
- DUKE [to Gentlemen]
 You shall have leave to leave us, with this charge,
 Upon your lives: if we be missed by th' Duchess 125 Or any of the nobles, to give out
 We're privately rid forth.
- VINDICE [aside] O happiness!
 DUKE
 With some few honourable gentlemen, you may say;
 You may name those that are away from court.
- FIRST GENTLEMAN
 Your will and pleasure shall be done, my lord.
 [Exeunt Gentlemen]
- VINDICE [aside]
 130 'Privately rid forth'
 He strives to make sure work on't. [To the Duke] Your good grace.
- DUKE Piato, well done. Hast brought her? What lady is't?
 VINDICE Faith, my lord, a country lady, a little bashful at first, as most of them are, but after the first kiss, my
- lord, the worst is past with them. Your grace knows now what you have to do. Sh'as somewhat a grave look with her, but—
- DUKE
 I love that best. Conduct her.
- VINDICE [aside] Have at all!
- DUKE
 In gravest looks the greatest faults seem less.
 Give me that sin that's robed in holiness. 140
- VINDICE [to Hippolito]
 Back with the torch, brother; raise the perfumes.
- DUKE
 How sweet can a duke breathe? Age has no fault.
 Pleasure should meet in a perfumèd mist.—
 Lady, sweetly encountered. I came from court.
 I must be bold with you.
 [He kisses the skull] O, what's this? O! 145
- VINDICE
 Royal villain, white devil!
- DUKE O!
- VINDICE Brother,
 Place the torch here, that his affrighted eyeballs
 May start into those hollows. Duke, dost know
 Yon dreadful visor? View it well; 'tis the skull
 Of Gloriana, whom thou poisonedst last. 150
- DUKE O, 't'as poisoned me.
- VINDICE
 Didst not know that till now?
- DUKE What are you two?
- VINDICE
 Villains all three. The very ragged bone
 Has been sufficiently revenged.
- DUKE O, Hippolito, call treason. 155
- HIPPOLITO
 Yes, my good lord. Treason, treason, treason!
 Stamping on him
- DUKE Then I'm betrayed.

115 'Tis...flows i.e. a mask is pointless vanity when beauty exists to be displayed; with 'flows' suggesting both graceful motion and the flow of blood in the veins fleets passes away

116 This...streets a skull befits a grave better than a public place (so a mask is appropriate)

117 voice agreement, support

119 absent dismiss

121 bony punning on 'bonny'

130 Privately rid forth Vindice is exultant not only at the opportunity afforded by the Duke's vulnerability without a guard but at the unintended aptness of the sexual connotations of his phrase (as at 1.2.136-7) and of the meaning 'rid forth' = disposed of, killed off.

136 grave The pun is obvious, but, as Foakes notes, not obvious enough for the Duke.

138 Have at all! a colloquial phrase, initiating a risky venture, such as a fight or a throw of dice

142 fault physical inadequacy

146 Royal villain an oxymoron, like the next two words; playing on the difference of status between royalty and a vellein = vassal

white devil hypocrite, the fair-seeming devil proverbially being worse than the black (the standard colour); punning on the Duke's white hair

148 start...hollows stare wildly into the skull's eye-sockets; as though springing into them to supply the lost eyeballs

149 visor face, mask

150 Gloriana also a favourite name for the idealized Queen Elizabeth whose death in 1603 ended an Age that through the haze of nostalgia already appeared 'Golden'

whom...last i.e. she was the latest of his victims (compare 2.3.127). We are probably not expected to notice that, in association with 3.5.122, this means that there have been no others in the last nine years: Middleton wants to stress both that Vindice's desire for revenge has been festering in his mind for a very long time, and that the Duke is given to such crimes as he committed in respect of Gloriana.

153 all three including the skull ('ragged bone')

156.1 Stamping on him 'as if he were the serpent or a damned soul being thrust into hell, a common subject for paintings and emblems' (Gibbons). But we should not moralize away the pure primitive satisfaction afforded by the sadistic violence, to the sardonic cry of 'Treason, treason, treason!' (probably little more than a whisper).

- VINDICE
Alas, poor lecher, in the hands of knaves.
A slavish duke is baser than his slaves.
- DUKE
My teeth are eaten out.
- 160 VINDICE Hadst any left?
HIPPOLITO I think but few.
- VINDICE
Then those that did eat are eaten.
- DUKE O, my tongue!
- VINDICE
Your tongue? 'Twill teach you to kiss closer,
Not like a slobbering Dutchman. You have eyes still:
- 165 Look, monster, what a lady hast thou made me
My once betrothed wife.
- DUKE Is it thou, villain?
Nay then—
- VINDICE 'Tis I, 'tis Vindice, 'tis I.
- HIPPOLITO
And let this comfort thee: our lord and father
Fell sick upon the infection of thy frowns
And died in sadness. Be that thy hope of life.
- 170 DUKE O!
VINDICE
He had his tongue, yet grief made him die speechless.
Puh, 'tis but early yet. Now I'll begin
To stick thy soul with ulcers. I will make 175 Thy spirit grievous sore. It shall not rest,
But like some pestilent man toss in thy breast.
Mark me, Duke:
Thou'rt a renownèd, high, and mighty cuckold.
- DUKE O!
VINDICE
180 Thy bastard, thy bastard rides a-hunting in thy brow.
- DUKE
Millions of deaths!
- VINDICE Nay, to afflict thee more,
Here in this lodge they meet for damnèd clips;
Those eyes shall see the incest of their lips.
- DUKE
Is there a hell besides this, villains?
- VINDICE Villain!
185 Nay, heaven is just, scorns are the hires of scorns.
- I ne'er knew yet adulterer without horns.
- HIPPOLITO
Once ere they die 'tis quitted.
[Music sounds within]
- VINDICE Hark, the music.
Their banquet is prepared, they're coming.
- DUKE O, kill me not with that sight.
- VINDICE
Thou shalt not lose that sight for all thy dukedom. 190
- DUKE Traitors, murderers!
- VINDICE
What, is not thy tongue eaten out yet?
Then we'll invent a silence. Brother, stifle the torch.
- DUKE Treason, murder!
- VINDICE
Nay, faith, we'll have you hushed. [To Hippolito] Now with thy dagger 195
- Nail down his tongue, and mine shall keep possession
About his heart. If he but gasp, he dies.
We dread not death to quittance injuries.
Brother, if he but wink, not brooking the foul object,
Let our two other hands tear up his lids 200
- And make his eyes like comets shine through blood.
When the bad bleeds, then is the tragedy good.
- HIPPOLITO
Whist, brother. Music's at our ear; they come.
Enter the Bastard Spurio meeting the Duchess.
[They kiss, as Musicians and Attendants with lights enter and stand apart]
- SPURIO
Had not that kiss a taste of sin, 'twere sweet.
- DUCHESS
Why, there's no pleasure sweet but it is sinful. 205
- SPURIO
True, such a bitter sweetness fate hath given;
Best side to us is the worst side to heaven.
- DUCHESS
Push! Come; 'tis the old Duke thy doubtful father,
The thought of him, rubs heaven in thy way;
But I protest by yonder waxen fire, 210
- Forget him, or I'll poison him.
- SPURIO
Madam, you urge a thought which ne'er had life.

159 slavish employing various shades of meaning: (a) vile, (b) enslaved by his passions, (c) forced into submission by his vassals

162 those...eaten a truly 'mordant' literalization of 'the biter bit'

164 slobbering Dutchman The Dutchman slobbers (dribbles) because proverbially a heavy drinker.

165 made me made for me (from my betrothed)

176 pestilent suffering from the plague

180 rides...brow makes you a cuckold; 'a-hunting' links both with 'rides' (which also puns on the sexual sense) and, through the hunting of antlered deer, with the cuckold's horns, while 'brow' plays on (a) forehead, and (b) the brow of a hill.

182 clips embraces

185 hires rewards

187 Once...quitted i.e. some time before adulterers die their sin is requited (by the adultery of their spouses)

198 quittance repay

199 brooking being able to endure object sight (of Spurio and the Duchess embracing)

201 comets The analogy of eye to sun is here transformed to an analogy between eye and traditional omen of disaster and bloodshed.

202 bad...good The wordplay opposes a negative ethical judgement to a positive aesthetic one.

203 Whist like 'Hush!', a command for silence

205 Why...sinful This might almost be the court motto: sin adds piquancy to their sexual appetites.

209 rub stirs up thoughts of; here coloured by the bowling term, as in Hamlet's 'Ay, there's the rub' (3.1.67), where 'rub' = an impediment

210 waxen fire burning taper

- So deadly do I loathe him for my birth
That if he took me hasped within his bed,
215 I would add murder to adultery
And with my sword give up his years to death.
- DUCHESS
Why, now thou'rt sociable. Let's in and feast.
Loud'st music sound. Pleasure is banquet's guest.
Exeunt [Duchess, Spurio, Musicians, and Attendants]
- DUKE
I cannot brook—
[Vindice kills him]
- VINDICE The brook is turned to blood.
- HIPPOLITO
Thanks to loud music.
- 220 VINDICE 'Twas our friend indeed.
'Tis state in music for a duke to bleed.
The dukedom wants a head, though yet unknown.
As fast as they peep up, let's cut 'em down. Exeunt
- 3.6 Enter the Duchess' two sons, Ambitioso and Supervacuo
- AMBITIOSO
Was not his execution rarely plotted?
We are the Duke's sons now.
- SUPERVACUO Ay, you may thank My policy for that.
- AMBITIOSO Your policy,
For what?
- SUPERVACUO
Why, was't not my invention, brother,
5 To slip the judges? And, in lesser compass,
Did not I draw the model of his death,
Advising you to sudden officers
And e'en extemporal execution?
- AMBITIOSO
Heart, 'twas a thing I thought on too.
- SUPERVACUO
10 You thought on't too? 'Sfoot, slander not your thoughts
With glorious untruth. I know 'twas from you.
- AMBITIOSO
Sir, I say 'twas in my head.
- SUPERVACUO Ay, like your brains then,
Ne'er to come out as long as you lived.
- AMBITIOSO
You'd have the honour on't, forsooth, that your wit
- Led him to the scaffold?
SUPERVACUO Since it is my due,
15 I'll publish't; but I'll ha't in spite of you.
- AMBITIOSO
Methinks you're much too bold. You should a little Remember us, brother, next to be honest duke.
- SUPERVACUO [aside]
Ay, it shall be as easy for you to be duke
As to be honest, and that's never, i'faith.
20
- AMBITIOSO
Well, cold he is by this time, and because We're both ambitious, be it our amity,
And let the glory be shared equally.
- SUPERVACUO I am content to that.
- AMBITIOSO
This night our younger brother shall out of prison;
25 I have a trick.
- SUPERVACUO A trick? Prithee, what is't?
- AMBITIOSO
We'll get him out by a wile.
- SUPERVACUO Prithee, what wile?
- AMBITIOSO
No, sir, you shall not know it till't be done,
For then you'd swear 'twere yours.
[Enter an Officer carrying a head in a bag]
- SUPERVACUO
How now, what's he?
- AMBITIOSO One of the officers.
30
- SUPERVACUO
Desirèd news.
- AMBITIOSO How now, my friend?
- OFFICER My lords,
Under your pardon, I am allotted
To that desertless office to present you
With the yet bleeding head—
SUPERVACUO [aside to Ambitioso]
Ha, ha, excellent.
- AMBITIOSO [aside to Supervacuo]
All's sure our own. Brother, canst weep, think'st 35 thou?
'Twould grace our flattery much. Think of some dame;
'Twill teach thee to dissemble.
- SUPERVACUO [aside to Ambitioso]
I have thought.
Now for yourself.

214 hasped in coital embrace219 cannot brook cannot stand (leading to Vindice's pun on 'brook' = stream)220 Thanks . . . music for drowning out the noise of the Duke's final struggles221 'Tis . . . bleed Vindice employs the various senses of 'state' to say, roughly, 'It is fitting to a Duke's high rank that he should die in state to the accompaniment of music'.222 wants a head lacks a head of state223 Exeunt If the discovery space was used as the 'darkened, blushless angle' (3.5.14) for the Duke's rendezvous, the body was probably stowed there and curtained off. If not, Vindice and Hippolito must have dragged the corpse with them as they left.

3.6.3 policy clever plotting5 slip bypassin lesser compass to a lesser extent (i.e. less importantly); with play on 'compass' = crafty device, and on the instrument for drawing circles (leading to 'draw the model' in the next line)

6 model plan7 sudden swift in action8 extemporal on the spot11 glorious boastfulfrom you far from your thoughts16 but I'll I alone shall18 honest honoured; Supervacuo's aside (19–20) plays on the modern sense27 wile sly ruse33 desertless thankless

AMBITIOSO Our sorrows are so fluent,
 Our eyes o'erflow our tongues. Words spoke in tears
 40 Are like the murmurs of the waters, the sound
 Is loudly heard but cannot be distinguished.
 SUPERVACUO
 How died he, pray?
 OFFICER O, full of rage and spleen.
 SUPERVACUO
 He died most valiantly, then. We're glad
 To hear it.
 OFFICER We could not woo him once to pray.
 AMBITIOSO
 45 He showed himself a gentleman in that,
 Give him his due.
 OFFICER But in the stead of prayer
 He drew forth oaths.
 SUPERVACUO Then did he pray, dear heart,
 Although you understood him not.
 OFFICER My lords,
 E'en at his last, with pardon be it spoke,
 He cursed you both.
 50 SUPERVACUO He cursed us? 'Las, good soul.
 AMBITIOSO
 It was not in our powers, but the Duke's pleasure.
 [Aside] Finely dissembled o' both sides. Sweet fate,
 O happy opportunity!
Enter Lussurioso
 LUSSURIOSO
 Now, my lords—
 AMBITIOSO and SUPERVACUO
 O!
 LUSSURIOSO Why do you shun me, brothers?
 55 You may come nearer now;
 The savour of the prison has forsook me.
 I thank such kind lords as yourselves, I'm free.
 AMBITIOSO
 Alive!
 SUPERVACUO
 In health!
 AMBITIOSO Released! We were both e'en amazed
 With joy to see it.
 LUSSURIOSO I am much to thank you.
 SUPERVACUO
 60 Faith, we spared no tongue unto my lord the Duke.
 AMBITIOSO
 I know your delivery, brother,
 Had not been half so sudden but for us.
 SUPERVACUO
 O, how we pleaded!
 LUSSURIOSO Most deserving brothers,
 In my best studies I will think of it. Exit Lussurioso

AMBITIOSO
 O death and vengeance!
 SUPERVACUO Hell and torments!
 AMBITIOSO [to Officer]
 Slave, cam'st thou to delude us?
 OFFICER Delude you, my lords?
 SUPERVACUO
 Ay, villain; where's this head now?
 OFFICER Why, here, my lord.
 Just after his delivery, you both came
 With warrant from the Duke to behead your brother.
 AMBITIOSO
 Ay, our brother, the Duke's son.
 OFFICER The Duke's son,
 70 My lord, had his release before you came.
 AMBITIOSO Whose head's that then?
 OFFICER
 His whom you left command for, your own brother's.
 [He takes the head from the bag and displays it]
 AMBITIOSO Our brother's!
 O furies!
 SUPERVACUO
 Plagues!
 AMBITIOSO Confusions!
 SUPERVACUO Darkness!
 AMBITIOSO Devils!
 75 SUPERVACUO
 Fell it out so accursedly?
 AMBITIOSO So damnedly?
 SUPERVACUO [to Officer]
 Villain, I'll brain thee with it.
 OFFICER O, my good lord.
 [Exit Officer]
 SUPERVACUO
 The devil overtake thee!
 AMBITIOSO O, fatal!
 SUPERVACUO
 O, prodigious to our bloods!
 AMBITIOSO Did we dissemble?
 SUPERVACUO
 Did we make our tears women for thee?
 80 AMBITIOSO Laugh and rejoice for thee?
 SUPERVACUO
 Bring warrant for thy death?
 AMBITIOSO Mock off thy head?
 SUPERVACUO
 You had a trick, you had a wife, forsooth.
 AMBITIOSO A murrain meet 'em! There's none of these 85 wiles that ever come to good. I see now there is nothing sure in mortality but mortality.
 Well, no more words. 'Shalt be revenged, i'faith.

56 savour smell

- Come, throw off clouds now, brother. Think of vengeance
And deeper settled hate.—Sirrah, sit fast;
90 We'll pull down all, but thou shalt down at last.

- LUSSURIOSO
Hippolito.
Enter Hippolito
- HIPPOLITO
My lord. Has your good lordship Aught to command me in?
- LUSSURIOSO I prithee leave us.
- HIPPOLITO [aside]
How's this, come, and leave us?
- LUSSURIOSO Hippolito.
- HIPPOLITO Your honour,
5 I stand ready for any duteous employment.
- LUSSURIOSO
Heart, what mak'st thou here?
- HIPPOLITO [aside] A pretty lordly humour:
He bids me to be present to depart.
Something has stung his honour.
- LUSSURIOSO Be nearer, draw nearer.
You're not so good, methinks. I'm angry with you.
- HIPPOLITO
10 With me, my lord? I'm angry with myself for't.
- LUSSURIOSO
You did prefer a goodly fellow to me.
'Twas wittily elected, 'twas. I thought
He'd been a villain and he proves a knave,
To me a knave.
- HIPPOLITO I chose him for the best, my lord.
15 'Tis much my sorrow if neglect in him
Breed discontent in you.
- LUSSURIOSO Neglect? 'Twas will.
Judge of it:
Firmly to tell of an incredible act,
Not to be thought, less to be spoken of,
20 'Twixt my stepmother and the bastard, O,
Incestuous sweets between 'em.
- HIPPOLITO Fie, my lord.
- 89–90 Sirrah . . . last aimed at the absent Lussurioso
4.1.12 wittily elected wisely chosen
13 villain . . . knave The joke lies in the equivalence of the terms (even in their neutral meaning of 'servant'); but Lussurioso had expected villainy towards others rather than knavishness towards himself.
16 will deliberate behaviour
22 kind predominantly 'natural', i.e. showing due filial concern forehead again as site of a cuckold's horns
25 rased scratched
28 Jars in makes an untimely entrance, enters on a discordant note; taken up in 'villainous music' and eliciting a musical image from 'stroke' = musical beat ('to keep stroke' = to keep time)
36 iron-age mass of iron fetters (see 4.2.129); with an allusion to the Iron Age, which in classical mythology succeeded the Golden, Silver, and Brazen as last and worst.
Mum Silence!
38 Missing . . . him Vindice's scheme to have Spurio killed by Lussurioso in the Duchess's bed has failed, and Lussurioso himself has been pardoned for his unintended attack on the Duke.
- LUSSURIOSO
I, in kind loyalty to my father's forehead,
Made this a desperate arm, and in that fury
Committed treason on the lawful bed
And with my sword e'en rased my father's bosom, 25 For which I was within a stroke of death.
- HIPPOLITO
Alack, I'm sorry.
Enter Vindice [disguised]
[Aside] 'Sfoot, just upon the stroke
Jars in my brother. 'Twill be villainous music.
- VINDICE
My honoured lord.
- LUSSURIOSO Away, prithee forsake us;
Hereafter we'll not know thee. 30
- VINDICE
Not know me, my lord? Your lordship cannot choose.
- LUSSURIOSO
Begone, I say. Thou art a false knave.
- VINDICE
Why, the easier to be known, my lord.
- LUSSURIOSO
Push! I shall prove too bitter with a word,
Make thee a perpetual prisoner
35 And lay this iron-age upon thee.
- VINDICE [aside] Mum,
For there's a doom would make a woman dumb.
Missing the bastard, next him; the wind's come about;
Now 'tis my brother's turn to stay, mine to go out. Exit
- LUSSURIOSO
He's greatly moved me.
- HIPPOLITO Much to blame, i'faith. 40
- LUSSURIOSO
But I'll recover, to his ruin. 'Twas told me lately,
I know not whether falsely, that you'd a brother.
- HIPPOLITO
Who, I? Yes, my good lord, I have a brother.
- LUSSURIOSO
How chance the court ne'er saw him? Of what nature?
How does he apply his hours?
- HIPPOLITO Faith, to curse fates, 45
Who, as he thinks, ordained him to be poor,
Keeps at home, full of want and discontent.
- LUSSURIOSO [aside]
There's hope in him, for discontent and want

- Is the best clay to mould a villain of.—
 Hippolito, wish him repair to us.
 If there be aught in him to please our blood,
 For thy sake we'll advance him and build fair
 His meanest fortunes, for it is in us
 To rear up towers from cottages.
- HIPPOLITO It is so, my lord.
 He will attend your honour. But he's a man
 In whom much melancholy dwells.
- LUSSURIOSO Why, the better.
 Bring him to court.
- HIPPOLITO With willingness and speed.
 [Aside] Whom he cast off e'en now must now succeed.
 Brother, disguise must off:
- 60 In thine own shape now I'll prefer thee to him.
 How strangely does himself work to undo him. Exit
- LUSSURIOSO
 This fellow will come fitly. He shall kill
 That other slave that did abuse my spleen
 And made it swell to treason. I have put 65 Much of my heart into him. He must die.
 He that knows great men's secrets and proves slight,
 That man ne'er lives to see his beard turn white.
 Ay, he shall speed him; I'll employ thee, brother.
 Slaves are but nails to drive out one another.
- 70 He being of black condition, suitable
 To want and ill content, hope of preferment
 Will grind him to an edge.
The Nobles enter
- FIRST NOBLE Good days unto your honour.
 LUSSURIOSO
 My kind lords, I do return the like.
- 75 SECOND NOBLE Saw you my lord the Duke?
 LUSSURIOSO
 My lord and father? Is he from court?
 FIRST NOBLE He's sure from court,
 But where, which way his pleasure took, we know
 not,
 Nor can we hear on't.
 [Enter the Duke's Gentlemen]
- LUSSURIOSO Here come those should tell.
 80 Saw you my lord and father?
- FIRST GENTLEMAN
 Not since two hours before noon, my lord,
 And then he privately rid forth.
- LUSSURIOSO
 O, he's rode forth?
- FIRST NOBLE 'Twas wondrous privately.
 SECOND NOBLE
 There's none i'th' court had any knowledge on't.
- LUSSURIOSO
 His grace is old and sudden. 'Tis no treason
 To say the Duke my father has a humour
 Or such a toy about him. What in us
 Would appear light, in him seems virtuous.
- FIRST GENTLEMAN 'Tis oracle, my lord. Exeunt
- Enter Vindice and Hippolito, Vindice out of his disguise*
- HIPPOLITO
 So, so, all's as it should be; you're yourself.
- VINDICE
 How that great villain puts me to my shifts!
- HIPPOLITO
 He that did lately in disguise reject thee
 Shall, now thou art thyself, as much respect thee.
- VINDICE
 'Twill be the quainter fallacy. But, brother,
 'Sfoot, what use will he put me to now, think'st thou?
- 5 HIPPOLITO
 Nay, you must pardon me in that, I know not.
 H'as some employment for you, but what 'tis
 He and his secretary the devil knows best.
- VINDICE
 Well, I must suit my tongue to his desires,
 10 What colour soe'er they be, hoping at last
 To pile up all my wishes on his breast.
- HIPPOLITO
 Faith, brother, he himself shows the way.
- VINDICE
 Now the Duke is dead the realm is clad in clay.
 His death being not yet known, under his name
 15 The people still are governed. Well, thou his son
 Art not long lived; thou shalt not joy his death.
 To kill thee, then, I should most honour thee,

53 in us i.e. within my power

58 succeed (a) take his place as successor,
 (b) successfully deal with Lussurioso

62 fitly opportunely

63 spleen fiery temper

65 heart innermost thoughts and feelings

66 slight unworthy of trust (but providing a kind of false antithesis to 'great')

68 speed kill

69 Slaves... another alluding to the proverb,
 'One nail drives out another'

70 of black condition melancholic, the physiology of 'humours' attributing melancholy to an excess of black bile

72 grind...edge incite him (to action); a common phrase, but here with an apt suggestion of the sharpening of a weapon for Lussurioso's use

85 sudden impetuous

86 humour whim

87 toy idle fancy

88 light frivolous

89 oracle absolute truth

4.2.2 great villain an oxymoron, playing on 'great' = of high estate, and 'villain' =
 servant

shifts (a) stratagems, (b) changes of clothing

5 quainter fallacy wittier deception

9 secretary confidant

12 To...breast Perhaps an image drawn from pressing to death with weights.

13 shows the way i.e. provides a model of how to dissemble

14 realm...clay the old regime is buried; an image condensing three commonplaces:
 the flesh as clothing (as in 1.1.31), the state as body, and the identity of ruler with realm

17 joy enjoy (by succeeding to the dukedom)

For 'twould stand firm in every man's belief
 Thou'st a kind child and only died'st with grief.
 HIPPOLITO
 You fetch about well, but let's talk in present.
 How will you appear in fashion different,
 As well as in apparel, to make all things possible?
 If you be but once tripped, we fall for ever.
 It is not the least policy to be doubtful.
 You must change tongue. Familiar was your first.
 VINDICE
 Why, I'll bear me in some strain of melancholy
 And string myself with heavy-sounding wire,
 Like such an instrument that speaks
 Merry things sadly.
 HIPPOLITO Then 'tis as I meant:
 I gave you out at first in discontent.
 VINDICE
 I'll turn myself, and then—
 [Enter Lussurioso]
 HIPPOLITO 'Sfoot, here he comes.
 Hast thought upon't?
 VINDICE Salute him. Fear not me.
 LUSSURIOSO Hippolito.
 HIPPOLITO Your lordship.
 LUSSURIOSO What's he yonder?
 HIPPOLITO 'Tis Vindice, my discontented brother,
 Whom, 'cording to your will, I've brought to court.
 LUSSURIOSO Is that thy brother? Beshrew me, a good presence.
 I wonder he's been from the court so long.
 [To Vindice] Come nearer.
 HIPPOLITO Brother, Lord Lussurioso, the Duke's son.
 LUSSURIOSO Be more near to us. Welcome. Nearer yet.

Vindice snatches off his hat and makes legs to him,
 [while Hippolito moves aside]
 VINDICE
 How don you? God you god den.
 LUSSURIOSO We thank thee.
 [Aside] How strangely such a coarse, homely salute
 Shows in the palace, where we greet in fire,
 Nimble and desperate tongues. Should we name God
 In a salutation 'twould ne'er be stood on—heaven!
 Tell me, what has made thee so melancholy?
 VINDICE Why, going to law.
 LUSSURIOSO Why, will that make a man melancholy?
 VINDICE Yes, to look long upon ink and black buckram.
 I went me to law in anno quadragesimo secundo and I waded out of it in anno sextagesimo tertio.
 LUSSURIOSO What, three and twenty years in law?
 VINDICE I have known those that have been five-and-fifty,
 and all about pullen and pigs.
 LUSSURIOSO May it be possible such men should breathe,
 To vex the terms so much?
 VINDICE 'Tis food to some, my lord.
 There are old men at the present that are so poisoned with the affectation of law words (having had many suits canvassed) that their common talk is nothing but Barbary Latin. They cannot so much as pray but in law, that their sins may be removed with a writ of error and their souls fetched up to heaven with a sasarara.
 LUSSURIOSO It seems most strange to me,
 Yet all the world meets round in the same bent.
 Where the heart's set, there goes the tongue's consent.
 How dost apply thy studies, fellow?
 VINDICE Study? Why, to think how a great rich man lies a-dying and a poor cobbler tolls the bell for him; how he cannot depart the world and see the great chest stand before him; when he lies speechless, how he will point you readily to all the boxes; and when he

20 Thou'st thou wast
 21 fetch about wander around the subject (in an inventive way)
in present i.e. of the immediate problem
 22 fashion manner
 25 not . . . policy i.e. the best policy doubtful careful
 27–30 Why . . . sadly The musical conceit begins with 'strain' = tune. Vindice ought to have in mind a bass viol (Shakespeare uses the pun in Comedy of Errors, 4.3.23).
 32 turn transform, with a hint of tuning an instrument (by turning the pegs), to round off the conceit
 37 Beshrew me an idly used imprecation, meaning roughly 'the devil take me!'
 41.1 snatches . . . him i.e. Vindice scrapes and bows in a caricature of the gawky yokel.

42 don do
God you god den God give you good even; like 'don', indicating rustic speech
 45 desperate tongues recklessly expressions
 46 stood on taken seriously heaven! Lussurioso's reflex use of this word to express surprise enforces the point of his sentence; see Textual Notes.
 50 black buckram a lawyer's bag made of coarse linen, its blackness associating it with melancholy (or black bile) 51 anno . . . secundo the forty-second year (of an imagined reign)
 52 anno . . . tertio the sixty-third year
 53 three The blunder is presumably Lus-surioso's (whether as arithmetician or Latinist), not Middleton's. Partly because he is so easily and repeatedly duped by Vindice, Lussurioso appears something of a dullard.

 55 pullen poultry
 57 terms periods when the law courts are in session
 61 Barbary Latin barbarous, or bad, Latin 62 writ of error a writ brought to procure the reverse of a judgement on the ground of error
 63 sasarara colloquial anglicization of Latin
 'certiorari': a writ from a superior court arising from a complaint that a party has not received justice in an inferior court 65 meets . . . bent shares the same tendency; with 'world' acting on 'round' and 'bent' (= curve) to enhance the sense of a global characteristic 70 and see and (still) see chest treasure chest
 72 boxes presumably money-boxes

- is past all memory, as the gossips guess, then thinks he of forfeitures and obligations; nay, when to all men's 75 hearings he whurls and rattles in the throat, he's busy threatening his poor tenants; and this would last me now some seven years' thinking or thereabouts. But I have a conceit a-coming in picture upon this—I draw it myself—which, i'faith la, I'll present to your honour.
80 You shall not choose but like it, for your lordship shall give me nothing for it.
LUSSURIOSO Nay, you mistake me then,
For I am published bountiful enough.
Let's taste of your conceit.
VINDICE In picture, my lord?
LUSSURIOSO
Ay, in picture.
85 VINDICE Marry, this it is:
A usuring father to be boiling in hell and his son and heir with a whore dancing over him.
HIPPOLITO [aside] He's pared him to the quick.
LUSSURIOSO The conceit's pretty, i'faith,
90 But tak't upon my life 'twill ne'er be liked.
VINDICE No? Why, I'm sure the whore will be liked well enough.
HIPPOLITO [aside] Ay, if she were out o'th' picture he'd like her then himself.
95 VINDICE And as for the son and heir, he shall be an eyesore to no young revellers, for he shall be drawn in cloth of gold breeches.
LUSSURIOSO
And thou hast put my meaning in the pockets
And canst not draw that out. My thought was this:
100 To see the picture of a usuring father
Boiling in hell, our rich men would ne'er like it.
VINDICE O true, I cry you heartily mercy. I know the reason, for some of 'em had rather be damned indeed than damned in colours.
LUSSURIOSO [aside]
105 A parlous melancholy! H'as wit enough
To murder any man, and I'll give him means.—
I think thou art ill-moneyed.
VINDICE Money? Ho, ho!
'T'as been my want so long 'tis now my scoff.
I've e'en forgot what colour silver's of.
LUSSURIOSO [aside]
It hits as I could wish.
110 VINDICE I get good clothes
- Of those that dread my humour, and for table-room
I feed on those that cannot be rid of me.
LUSSURIOSO Somewhat to set thee up withal.
[He gives Vindice money]
VINDICE
O, mine eyes!
LUSSURIOSO How now, man?
VINDICE Almost struck blind.
This bright unusual shine to me seems proud. 115
I dare not look till the sun be in a cloud.
LUSSURIOSO [aside]
I think I shall affect his melancholy.—
How are they now?
VINDICE The better for your asking.
LUSSURIOSO
You shall be better yet if you but fasten
Truly on my intent.
[He beckons Hippolito forward]
120 Now you're both present
I will unbrace such a close, private villain Unto your vengeful swords, the like ne'er heard of,
Who hath disgraced you much and injured us.
HIPPOLITO
Disgraced us, my lord?
LUSSURIOSO Ay, Hippolito.
I kept it here till now that both your angers 125
Might meet him at once.
VINDICE I'm covetous
To know the villain.
LUSSURIOSO [to Hippolito]
You know him, that slave-pander
Piato, whom we threatened last
With irons in perpetual prisonment.
VINDICE [aside]
All this is I.
HIPPOLITO Is't he, my lord?
LUSSURIOSO I'll tell you; 130
You first preferred him to me.
VINDICE Did you, brother?
HIPPOLITO
I did indeed.
LUSSURIOSO And the ingrateful villain,
To quit that kindness, strongly wrought with me—
Being, as you see, a likely man for pleasure—
135 With jewels to corrupt your virgin sister.

73 gossips relatives and friends at the bedside

74 forfeitures and obligations legal terms with an ironic relevance to eternal matters: confiscations of estate or goods; bonds for the payment of moneys

75 whurls gurgles

78 conceit (a) artistic conception, (b) witty figure in picture i.e. as a pictorial emblem

80-1 You...for it Perhaps the point is simply that Lussurioso is not entitled to criticize something he has not paid for.

88 pared...quick The colloquialism (meaning literally to cut the cuticle so deep as to reach the sensitive parts) registers Hippolito's recognition that the conceit is an exposure of Lussurioso's own position.

104 colours a painting; but 'colours' also means 'appearances'

105 parlous shrewd, keen, dangerous

117 affect grow fond of

118 they i.e. Vindice's eyes

121 unbrace disclose; but the literal meaning of 'undress' serves as ironic reminder that Piato was a role created by means of disguise.

125 here perhaps laying a hand on his heart or head

133 quit repay wrought with worked on

HIPPOLITO
 O, villain!
 VINDICE He shall surely die that did it.
 LUSSURIOSO
 I, far from thinking any virgin harm,
 Especially knowing her to be as chaste
 As that part which scarce suffers to be touched,
 Th' eye, would not endure him—
 140 VINDICE Would you not,
 My lord? 'Twas wondrous honourably done.
 LUSSURIOSO
 But with some fine frowns kept him out.
 VINDICE Out, slave!
 LUSSURIOSO
 What did me he but, in revenge of that,
 Went of his own free will to make infirm
 145 Your sister's honour, whom I honour with my soul
 For chaste respect, and not prevailing there
 (As 'twas but desperate folly to attempt it),
 In mere spleen, by the way, waylays your mother,
 Whose honour being a coward, as it seems,
 Yielded by little force.
 150 VINDICE Coward indeed.
 LUSSURIOSO
 He, proud of their advantage, as he thought,
 Brought me these news for happy, but I,
 Heaven forgive me for't—
 VINDICE What did your honour?
 155 LUSSURIOSO In rage pushed him from me, Trampled beneath his throat, spurned him, and bruised.
 Indeed I was too cruel, to say troth.
 HIPPOLITO
 Most nobly managed.
 VINDICE [aside] Has not heaven an ear?
 Is all the lightning wasted?
 LUSSURIOSO If I now
 160 Were so impatient in a modest cause,
 What should you be?
 VINDICE Full mad. He shall not live
 To see the moon change.
 LUSSURIOSO He's about the palace.
 Hippolito, entice him this way that thy brother
 May take full mark of him.
 165 HIPPOLITO Heart, that shall not need, my lord;
 I can direct him so far.
 LUSSURIOSO Yet for my hate's sake,
 Go wind him this way. I'll see him bleed myself.

HIPPOLITO [aside to Vindice] What now, brother?
 VINDICE [aside to Hippolito]
 Nay, e'en what you will; you're put to't, brother.
 HIPPOLITO [aside to Vindice]
 An impossible task, I'll swear,
 To bring him hither that's already here. 170
 Exit
 LUSSURIOSO
 Thy name? I have forgot it.
 VINDICE Vindice, my lord.
 LUSSURIOSO
 'Tis a good name that.
 VINDICE Ay, a revenger.
 LUSSURIOSO
 It does betoken courage. Thou shouldst be valiant
 And kill thine enemies.
 VINDICE That's my hope, my lord. 175
 LUSSURIOSO
 This slave is one.
 VINDICE I'll doom him.
 LUSSURIOSO Then I'll praise thee.
 Do thou observe me best, and I'll best raise thee.
 Enter Hippolito
 VINDICE
 Indeed, I thank you.
 LUSSURIOSO Now, Hippolito,
 Where's the slave-pander?
 HIPPOLITO Your good lordship
 Would have a loathsome sight of him, much offensive. 180
 He's not in case now to be seen, my lord.
 The worst of all the deadly sins is in him,
 That beggarly damnation, drunkenness.
 LUSSURIOSO
 Then he's a double slave.
 VINDICE [aside] 'Twas well conveyed,
 Upon a sudden wit.
 LUSSURIOSO What, are you both
 185 Firmly resolved? I'll see him dead myself.
 VINDICE
 Or else let not us live.
 LUSSURIOSO You may direct
 Your brother to take note of him.
 HIPPOLITO I shall.
 LUSSURIOSO
 Rise but in this and you shall never fall.
 VINDICE
 Your honour's vassals.
 LUSSURIOSO [aside] This was wisely carried. 190
 Deep policy in us makes fools of such.

136 He...it doubly ironic: Vindice covertly avows his intention to kill Lussurioso, while unwittingly forecasting his own fate
 138-40 chaste...Th' eye with the slight pause before 'Th' eye' allowing innuendo; compare Webster's Duchess of Malji, 'And women like that part which, like the lamphrey, | Hath ne'er a bone in't... | I mean the tongue' (1.1.336-8)

143 did me he colloquial and emphatic, as at 2.2.42
 146 For chaste respect out of regard for her chastity
 148 mere spleen pure spite
 151 their advantage the advantage to be reported in 'these news'
 156 spurned kicked 160 in a modest cause in the cause of chastity, with the additional sense that it is of only modest (moderate) relevance to himself

 164 mark note
 167 wind draw, entice
 177 observe gratify, treat with respect
 181 in case in a condition
 184 conveyed managed
 185 sudden punning on 'sodden'

- Then must a slave die, when he knows too much.
- Exit
- VINDICE
O, thou almighty patience! 'Tis my wonder
That such a fellow, impudent and wicked,
195 Should not be cloven as he stood,
Or with a secret wind burst open.
Is there no thunder left, or is't kept up
In stock for heavier vengeance? There it goes.
- HIPPOLITO
Brother, we lose ourselves.
- VINDICE
200 'Twill hold, 'tis sure. Thanks, thanks to any spirit
That mingled it 'mongst my inventions.
- HIPPOLITO
What is't?
- VINDICE
'Tis sound and good. Thou shalt partake it.
I'm hired to kill myself.
- HIPPOLITO
True.
- VINDICE
Prithee, mark it:
205 And the old Duke being dead but not conveyed,
For he's already missed too, and you know
Murder will peep out of the closest husk—
- HIPPOLITO
Most true.
- VINDICE
What say you then to this device?
If we dressed up the body of the Duke—
- HIPPOLITO
In that disguise of yours.
- VINDICE
You're quick, you've reached it.
- 210 HIPPOLITO I like it wondrously.
- VINDICE
And being in drink, as you have published him,
To lean him on his elbow as if sleep had caught him,
Which claims most interest in such sluggish men.
- HIPPOLITO
215 Good yet, but here's a doubt:
We, thought by th' Duke's son to kill that pander,
Shall, when he is known, be thought to kill the Duke.
- VINDICE
Neither, O thanks, it is substantial,
For that disguise being on him which I wore,
It will be thought I, which he calls the pander,
220 Did kill the Duke and fled away in his apparel,
Leaving him so disguised to avoid swift pursuit.
- HIPPOLITO
Firmer and firmer.
- VINDICE
Nay, doubt not, 'tis in grain;
I warrant it hold colour.
- HIPPOLITO
Let's about it.
- VINDICE
But by the way too, now I think on't, brother, 225 Let's conjure that base devil out of our mother. Exeunt
- Enter the Duchess, arm in arm with the Bastard Spurio; he seemeth lasciviously to her. After them, enter Supervacuo, running with a rapier; his brother Ambitioso stops him*
- 4.3
- SPURIO
Madam, unlock yourself. Should it be seen,
Your arm would be suspected.
- DUCHESS
Who is't that dares suspect or this or these?
May not we deal our favours where we please?
- SPURIO
I'm confident you may. Exeunt Duchess and Spurio
- AMBITIOSO
2 'Sfoot, brother, hold. 5
- SUPERVACUO
Would let the bastard shame us?
- AMBITIOSO
Hold, hold, brother.
There's fitter time than now.
- SUPERVACUO
Now, when I see it?
- AMBITIOSO
'Tis too much seen already.
- SUPERVACUO
Seen and known;
The nobler she's, the baser is she grown.
- AMBITIOSO
10 If she were bent lasciviously, the fault
Of mighty women that sleep soft—O death!
Must she needs choose such an unequal sinner
To make all worse?
- SUPERVACUO
A bastard, the Duke's bastard!
Shame heaped on shame.
- AMBITIOSO
15 O, our disgrace!
Most women have small waist the world throughout,
But their desires are thousand miles about.

193–8 O, thou... vengeance? adapted from Seneca's Phaedra, lines 671–4; see also I.4.23

198 There it goes That's it!, Eureka! Vindice has hit upon a plan, as he explains in his next speech (198–200).

199 Brother... it Hippolito's phrase means 'we are destroying ourselves' and (by dramatic irony) 'we are damning ourselves'; Vindice, giving it the literal sense 'we have lost our way', claims to have 'found it' (the way to extricate themselves from their predicament).

200 hold stand the test, work

204 conveyed disposed of

206 Murder... husk the proverbial 'Murder will out'

213 sluggish sluggish

217 substantial firmly based, soundly conceived

222 in grain fast dyed, indelible

223 hold colour continuing the image while playing on the figurative sense of 'colour' = pretence: the pretence will be believed

225 conjure exorcise

4.3.0.2 seemeth acts

1 unlock yourself i.e. release your arm from mine

3 or this or these either this arm or these kisses (or caresses)

6 Woult wilt thou

9 baser quibbling on the social and moral senses

10 bent lasciviously intent on wantonness

12 unequal i.e. in rank and blood

	SUPERVACUO	That had been monstrous. I defy that man For any such intent. None lives so pure But shall be soiled with slander. Good son, believe it not.
	Come, stay not here; let's after and prevent, Or else they'll sin faster than we'll repent.	Exeunt
4.4	Enter Vindice and Hippolito, bringing out their Mother, one by one shoulder and the other by the other, with daggers in their hands	VINDICE	O, I'm in doubt Whether I'm myself or no!— Stay, let me look again upon this face. Who shall be saved when mothers have no grace?
	VINDICE	HIPPOLITO	'Twould make one half despair.
	O thou for whom no name is bad enough!	VINDICE	I was the man. Defy me now. Let's see; do't modestly.
	MOTHER	MOTHER	O hell unto my soul!
	What means my sons? What, will you murder me?	VINDICE	In that disguise I, sent from the Duke's son, Tried you and found you base metal, As any villain might have done.
	VINDICE	MOTHER	O no, No tongue but yours could have bewitched me so.
	Wicked, unnatural parent.	VINDICE	O, nimble in damnation, quick in tune. There is no devil could strike fire so soon. I am confuted in a word.
	HIPPOLITO	MOTHER	O sons, Forgive me. To myself I'll prove more true. You that should honour me, I kneel to you. [She kneels and weeps]
	MOTHER	VINDICE	A mother to give aim to her own daughter!
	O, are sons turned monsters? Help!	HIPPOLITO	True, brother, how far beyond nature 'tis, Though many mothers do't.
	VINDICE	VINDICE	Nay, an you draw tears once, go you to bed. Wet will make iron blush and change to red. Brother, it rains. 'Twill spoil your dagger. House it.
	MOTHER	HIPPOLITO	'Tis done.
5	Are you so barbarous to set iron nipples Upon the breast that gave you suck?	VINDICE	P'faith, 'tis a sweet shower. It does much good. The fruitful grounds and meadows of her soul Has been long dry. Pour down, thou blessèd dew. Rise, mother. Troth, this shower has made you higher.
	VINDICE	MOTHER
	That breast Is turned to quarlèd poison.	VINDICE
	MOTHER	VINDICE
	Cut not your days for't. Am not I your mother?	VINDICE
	VINDICE	VINDICE
10	Thou dost usurp that title now by fraud, For in that shell of mother breeds a bawd.	VINDICE
	MOTHER	VINDICE
	A bawd? O name far loathsomer than hell!	VINDICE
	HIPPOLITO	VINDICE
	It should be so, knew'st thou thy office well.	VINDICE
	MOTHER I hate it.	VINDICE
	VINDICE	VINDICE
15	Ah, is't possible, thou only God on high, That women should dissemble when they die?	VINDICE
	MOTHER	VINDICE
	Dissemble?	VINDICE
	VINDICE	VINDICE
	Did not the Duke's son direct A fellow of the world's condition hither, That did corrupt all that was good in thee, Made thee uncivilly forget thyself And work our sister to his lust?	VINDICE
20	MOTHER	VINDICE
	Who, I?	VINDICE

4.4.5 iron nipples i.e. their daggers

7 quarlèd curdled

8 Cut cut short (by being executed for murder); again alluding to Exodus, 20:12, as at 2.2.95-6

12 office duty, role

17 of... condition i.e. worldly, materialistic; but the phrase carries something of the Calvinist sense of general depravity.

19 uncivilly barbarously

24-5 I'm...no The joke raises a deeper question about his true identity than Vindice intends. As Piato, he had played the role of pander to perfection.

26 Stay...face 'This face' is presumably his mother's, but line 25 would give some justification for taking it as Vindice's own, in which case the props would have to include a mirror or glass. A moment of reflection on his own self and salvation might be effective here.

27 grace recalling the mother's name, Italian for 'Grace'

35 quick in tune quick to attune to the situation

40 give aim a term from archery meaning to guide the aim of the shooter; depending on whether the following 'to' means 'for' or 'towards', the point could be either that she directs Castiza towards Lussurioso or that she aids his attempt on the target

43 you i.e. his dagger

to bed into its scabbard

44 blush with red rust

48-9 The...dry The traditional imagery of spiritual sterility and fruitfulness is here complicated by the play's 'virtual identification of stable moral and social values with the landed order of the old-fashioned manor' (Ross).

50 this...higher continuing the image of plant growth; through her tears of remorse Mother has attained a higher moral station, and she is here literally raised to her feet

- [He helps her up]
- MOTHER
O you heavens,
Take this infectious spot out of my soul.
I'll rinse it in seven waters of mine eyes.
Make my tears salt enough to taste of grace.
55 To weep is to our sex naturally given,
But to weep truly, that's a gift from heaven.
- VINDICE
Nay, I'll kiss you now. Kiss her, brother.
Let's marry her to our souls, wherein's no lust,
And honourably love her.
- HIPPOLITO Let it be.
- VINDICE
60 For honest women are so seld and rare
'Tis good to cherish those poor few that are.
O you of easy wax, do but imagine,
Now the disease has left you, how leprously
That office would have clinged unto your forehead.
65 All mothers that had any graceful hue
Would have worn masks to hide their face at you.
It would have grown to this: at your foul name
Green-coloured maids would have turned red with shame.
- HIPPOLITO
And then our sister, full of hire and baseness.
- VINDICE
70 There had been boiling lead again.
The Duke's son's great concubine,
A drab of state, a cloth o' silver slut!
To have her train borne up and her soul trail i'th' dirt!
- HIPPOLITO
Graced, to be miserably great; rich, to be eternally wretched.
- 75 VINDICE O common madness!
Ask but the thriving'st harlot in cold blood,
She'd give the world to make her honour good.
Perhaps you'll say, 'But only to th' Duke's son
In private'. Why, she first begins with one
- Who afterward to thousand proves a whore:
"Break ice in one place, it will crack in more."
MOTHER Most certainly applied.
- HIPPOLITO
O brother, you forget our business.
- VINDICE
And well remembered. Joy's a subtle elf.
I think man's happiest when he forgets himself.—
85 Farewell, once dried, now holy-watered mead.
Our hearts wear feathers that before wore lead.
- MOTHER
I'll give you this, that one I never knew Plead better for and 'gainst the devil than you.
- VINDICE You make me proud on't. 90
- HIPPOLITO
Commend us in all virtue to our sister.
- VINDICE
Ay, for the love of heaven, to that true maid.
- MOTHER
With my best words.
- VINDICE Why, that was motherly said.
Exeunt Vindice and Hippolito
- MOTHER
I wonder now what fury did transport me.
I feel good thoughts begin to settle in me. 95
O, with what forehead can I look on her
Whose honour I've so impiously beset?
[Enter Castiza]
And here she comes.
- CASTIZA
Now mother, you have wrought with me so strongly
That, what for my advancement as to calm 100
The trouble of your tongue, I am content.
- MOTHER
Content to what?
- CASTIZA To do as you have wished me,
To prostitute my breast to the Duke's son
And put myself to common usury.
- MOTHER
I hope you will not so.

53 I'll...eyes I'll cleanse it by much penitent weeping (like Mary Magdalen, the Early Modern archetype of the repentant weeper). The phrase 'seven waters' suggests ritual purification, as when the prophet Elisha bade the leper Naaman 'wash in the Jordan seven times' (2 Kings, 5:10); Jesus had cast seven devils out of Mary (Mark, 16:9) and Mother's number probably glances also at the seven biblical psalms designated as the Penitential Psalms.

54 salt a possible allusion to the use of salt in baptism as symbol of delivery from sin. The whole passage emphasizes true repentance as a sign of saving grace through faith.

60 seld seldom found

62 of easy wax who are pliable

65 graceful quibbling on physical and spiritual grace

hue appearance

68 Green-coloured immature, inexperienced

69 hire payment for (sexual) use

72 drab whore

74 rich...wretched The consonance enforces the point.

84 subtle elf spirit that works imperceptibly or insidiously

85 I think...himself The line hints at the involutions of Vindice's tormented psyche. Like Hamlet ('Heaven and earth, | Must I remember?', 1.2.142-3), Vindice as revenger is a 'rememberer', aware of a past and of an eternal future that the court, in its frenetic preoccupation with pleasures of the present minute, obliterates from consciousness. This is a society of 'forgetful feasts' (3.5.91), and in his role as tempter Vindice tries to make his Mother 'forget heaven' (2.1.119). Vindice veers between contemplative contempt for the world and strenuous immersion in it.

86 mead meadow; the line's imagery provides the poetic resolution of the theme set forth in lines 48-50.

96 forehead countenance, dignity

100 what for In this elliptical construction, the phrase is equivalent to 'as much for'.

104 usury here = use for hire, prostitution; the figurative use of the term 'usury' associates sexual corruption with a money economy; see note on 2.2.97

- 105 CASTIZA Hope you I will not?
That's not the hope you look to be saved in.
- MOTHER
Truth, but it is.
- CASTIZA Do not deceive yourself.
I am as you e'en out of marble wrought.
What would you now? Are ye not pleased yet with
me?
- 110 You shall not wish me to be more lascivious
Than I intend to be.
- MOTHER Strike not me cold.
- CASTIZA
How often have you charged me on your blessing
To be a cursèd woman? When you knew
Your blessing had no force to make me lewd,
You laid your curse upon me. That did more;
115 The mother's curse is heavy. Where that fights Sons set in storm and daughters lose their lights.
- MOTHER
Good child, dear maid, if there be any spark
Of heavenly intellectual fire within thee,
120 O let my breath revive it to a flame.
Put not all out with woman's wilful follies.
I am recovered of that foul disease
That haunts too many mothers. Kind, forgive me;
Make me not sick in health. If then 125 My words prevailed when they were wickedness,
How much more now when they are just and good?
- CASTIZA
I wonder what you mean. Are not you she
For whose infect persuasions I could scarce
Kneel out my prayers, and had much ado
130 In three hours' reading to untwist so much
Of the black serpent as you wound about me?
- MOTHER
'Tis unfruitful, held tedious, to repeat what's past.
I'm now your present mother.
- CASTIZA Push! Now 'tis too late.
- MOTHER
Bethink again; thou know'st not what thou say'st.
- CASTIZA
No? 'Deny advancement, treasure, the Duke's son?' 135
- MOTHER
O see, I spoke those words, and now they poison me.
What will the deed do then?
Advancement? True—as high as shame can pitch!
For treasure, whoe'er knew a harlot rich?
140 Or could build by the purchase of her sin
An hospital to keep their bastards in?
The Duke's son? O, when women are young courtiers,
They are sure to be old beggars.
To know the miseries most harlots taste,
Thou'dst wish thyself unborn when thou art unchaste. 145
- CASTIZA
O mother, let me twine about your neck
And kiss you till my soul melt on your lips.
I did but this to try you.
- MOTHER O, speak truth!
- CASTIZA
Indeed, I did not, for no tongue has force
To alter me from honest. 150
If maidens would, men's words could have no power.
A virgin honour is a crystal tower,
Which, being weak, is guarded with good spirits;
Until she basely yields, no ill inherits.
- MOTHER
O happy child! Faith and thy birth hath saved me. 155
'Mongst thousand daughters happiest of all others,
Be thou a glass for maids and I for mothers. Exeunt
Finis Actus Quarti

106 That's...in The stress is on 'you': her mother's 'hope' had appeared to be of a material salvation from poverty, at the expense of Castiza's chastity, not of Divine Salvation.

108 I am...wrought Castiza is probably saying 'I am now as hardened (to the prospect of sinning) as you'; compare the 'dauntless marble' inspired by 'impudence' at 1.3.8 and 'marble impudence' at 5.3.69.

116–17 The...lights Since curses 'light' (alight) on those cursed (as in 'Confusion light on you!' in Michaelmas, 4.1.63) and people either win or 'lose' fights, one might naturally have expected the rhyme-words to appear in the reverse order. This would have created a kind of punning false antithesis in line 116: 'heavy...lights'. But the transposition is deliberate, enforcing the pun on 'Sons'/'Suns', which in turn gives the concreteness of an image of heavenly bodies to the phrase 'lose their lights' = lose their sense of moral direction.

119 intellectual here, spiritual

123 Kind (a) kind one, (b) child (one of my kin); hence = 'kind daughter'

128 infect infected

130–1 untwist...me another image that gains power from a pictorial and emblematic tradition featuring Satan as serpent in the Garden of Eden and the struggles of figures from classical mythology, such as Laocoön, who was crushed by the coils of two sea-serpents.

133 present i.e. true

140 purchase profit

141 hospital orphanage

149 did not i.e. did not speak truth before

151 would had the will (to be chaste)

154 inherits takes possession, resides there

155 happy blessed

157 glass mirror (i.e. model)

5.1 [Incipit Actus Quintus]
 Enter Vindice and Hippolito [carrying the corpse of the Duke dressed in Vindice's disguise as Piato;
 they set it in place]

VINDICE So, so, he leans well. Take heed you wake him not, brother.

HIPPOLITO I warrant you, my life for yours.

VINDICE
 That's a good lay, for I must kill myself.
 5 Brother, that's I; that sits for me. Do you mark it?
 And I must stand ready here to make away myself yonder—I must sit to be killed and stand to kill myself.
 I could vary it not so little as thrice over again. 'Tis some eight returns like Michaelmas Term.

10 HIPPOLITO That's enough, o' conscience.

VINDICE But sirrah, does the Duke's son come single?

HIPPOLITO No, there's the hell on't; his faith's too feeble to go alone. He brings flesh-flies after him that will buzz against supper-time and hum for his coming out.

15 VINDICE Ah, the fly-flop of vengeance beat 'em to pieces!
 Here was the sweetest occasion, the fittest hour, to have made my revenge familiar with him, show him the body of the Duke his father and how quaintly he died—like a politician in hugger-mugger, made no man 20 acquainted with it—and in catastrophe slain him over his father's breast, and—O, I'm mad to lose such a sweet opportunity!

HIPPOLITO Nay, push! Prithee be content. There's no remedy present. May not hereafter times open in as 25 fair faces as this?

VINDICE They may if they can paint so well.

HIPPOLITO Come now, to avoid all suspicion let's forsake this room and be going to meet the Duke's son.

VINDICE Content, I'm for any weather. Heart, step close,
 30 here he comes.

Enter Lussurioso

HIPPOLITO My honoured lord.

LUSSURIOSO O me! You both present?

VINDICE E'en newly, my lord, just as your lordship entered now. About this place we had notice given he should be, but in some loathsome plight or other. 35

HIPPOLITO Came your honour private?

LUSSURIOSO
 Private enough for this. Only a few
 Attend my coming out.

HIPPOLITO [aside] Death rot those few!

LUSSURIOSO Stay, yonder's the slave.

VINDICE
 Mass, there's the slave indeed, my lord. 40
 [Aside] 'Tis a good child; he calls his father slave.

LUSSURIOSO
 Ay, that's the villain, the damned villain. Softly,
 Tread easy.

VINDICE Puh, I warrant you, my lord,
 We'll stifle in our breaths.

LUSSURIOSO That will do well.—
 Base rogue, thou sleepest thy last. [Aside] 'Tis policy 45
 To have him killed in's sleep, for if he waked
 He would betray all to them.

VINDICE But my lord—

LUSSURIOSO
 Ha, what say'st?

VINDICE Shall we kill him now he's drunk?

LUSSURIOSO Ay, best of all.

VINDICE Why then, he will ne'er live to be sober. 50

LUSSURIOSO No matter, let him reel to hell.

VINDICE But being so full of liquor, I fear he will put out all the fire.

LUSSURIOSO Thou art a mad-breast.

VINDICE [aside] And leave none to warm your lordship's 55
 golls withal.—For he that dies drunk falls into hell-fire like a bucket o' water, quish, quish.

LUSSURIOSO
 Come, be ready, make your swords, think of your wrongs.
 This slave has injured you.

VINDICE Troth, so he has.

[Aside] And he has paid well for't. 60

5.1.0.4 set it in place leaning on his elbow as though asleep, if they adhere to Vindice's original plan (4.2.212), as seems confirmed by Vindice's opening remarks, though his next speech twice refers to sitting (but perhaps 'sits' = is placed). Again, use of the 'discovery space' seems likely. If the Duke's body had been stowed in the alcove at the end of 3.5, the actor playing the Duke could be back in the same spot for the beginning of this scene, so that Vindice and Hippolito would need only to draw the curtains and arrange the Duke's posture. Holdsworth (1990) notes the references to 'this room' (28) and 'that sad room' (89), and also the echoes (which create an 'ironic counterpointing') of the discovery of Antonio's wife: with 5.1.88 and 100 compare 1.4.1 and 1.1.4–5.

4 lay bet

9 returns i.e. rhetorical variations for describing the situation; punning on 'returns' as the days for sheriff's reports (also 'returns') to the law court upon writs.

13 flesh-flies blow-flies, i.e. parasites, hangers-on

14 against in expectation of, until

15 fly-flop fly-swatter

18 quaintly ingeniously

19 politician schemer
 in hugger-mugger in secret

20 in catastrophe in conclusion, as the final act of the tragedy. Vindice is dramatizing the situation to himself.

24 open in exhibit

26 paint as with cosmetics

41 'Tis . . . slave perhaps again recalling the proverb 'It is a wise child that know his own father'; compare 2.1.162 and note.

54 mad-breast a coinage on the analogy of 'mad-brain'; Lussurioso is complimenting
 Vindice on his bizarre wit; compare
 2.2.82

56 golls hands

58 make naked, i.e. unsheath

LUSSURIOSO
Meet with him now.

VINDICE You'll bear us out, my lord?

LUSSURIOSO
Puh, am I a lord for nothing, think you? Quickly now.

VINDICE
Sa, sa, sa, thump!
[He stabs the corpse]
There he lies.

LUSSURIOSO
Nimble done.
[He approaches the corpse]
Ha! O, villains, murderers,
'Tis the old Duke my father!

65 VINDICE That's a jest.

LUSSURIOSO What, stiff and cold already?
O, pardon me to call you from your names;
'Tis none of your deed. That villain Piato,
Whom you thought now to kill, has murdered him
And left him thus disguised.

70 HIPPOLITO And not unlikely.

VINDICE
O rascal! Was he not ashamed
To put the Duke into a greasy doublet?

LUSSURIOSO
He has been cold and stiff who knows how long?

VINDICE [aside] Marry, that do I.

75 LUSSURIOSO
No words, I pray, of anything intended.

VINDICE O, my lord.

HIPPOLITO I would fain have your lordship think that we have small reason to prate.

LUSSURIOSO
Faith, thou say'st true. I'll forthwith send to court, 80 For all the nobles, bastard, Duchess, all,
How here by miracle we found him dead,
And in his raiment that foul villain fled.

VINDICE That will be the best way, my lord, to clear us all.
Let's cast about to be clear.

LUSSURIOSO
85 Ho, Nencio, Sordido, and the rest!
Enter all [his attendants, including Sordido and Nencio and Guards]

SORDIDO My lord.

NENCIO My lord.

LUSSURIOSO
Be witnesses of a strange spectacle:
Choosing for private conference that sad room,
We found the Duke my father gealed in blood. 90

SORDIDO
My lord the Duke?—Run, hie thee, Nencio,
Startle the court by signifying so much. [Exit Nencio]

VINDICE [aside]
Thus much by wit a deep revenger can,
When murder's known, to be the clearest man.
We're furthest off and with as bold an eye 95
Survey his body as the standers-by.

LUSSURIOSO
My royal father, too basely let blood
By a malevolent slave.

HIPPOLITO [aside] Hark,
He calls thee slave again.

VINDICE H'as lost; he may.

LUSSURIOSO
O sigh! Look hither, see, his lips are gnawn 100
With poison.

VINDICE How, his lips? By th' mass, they be!

LUSSURIOSO
O villain, O rogue, O slave, O rascal!

HIPPOLITO [aside]
O good deceit, he quits him with like terms!

FIRST NOBLE [within] Where?

SECOND NOBLE [within] Which way? 105
[Enter Ambitioso and Supervacu with Nobles and Gentlemen]

AMBITIOSO
Over what roof hangs this prodigious comet
In deadly fire?

LUSSURIOSO Behold, behold, my lords.
The Duke my father's murdered by a vassal
That owes this habit and here left disguised.
[Enter Duchess and Spurio]

DUCESS
My lord and husband!

SECOND NOBLE Reverend majesty! 110

FIRST NOBLE
I have seen these clothes often attending on him.

61 Meet with him (a) encounter him as an enemy, (b) requite him bear us out back us up (against any ensuing charge)

63 Sa, sa, sa exclamation used by fencers when delivering a thrust (French 'ça')

65 That's a jest i.e. you are surely not serious

67 to...names for using the wrong terms to describe you

72 doublet close-fitting body garment for men

78 prate gossip

79 send send a message

84 cast...clear contrive to be free from suspicion

85 Nencio, Sordido Italian for an idiot (with a possible pun on Latin nuntius, messenger) and for corrupt, absurd, unclean

90 gealed congealed

93 deep profoundly cunning

can can do

94 clearest (seemingly) most innocent

95 furthest off i.e. from suspicion

103 quits repays. Foakes suggests that Hippolito thinks of Lussurioso as addressing the Duke, who had called him 'villain, traitor' at 2.3.14.

106 prodigious ominous comet This figurative reference to the portent of disaster and the death of a ruler foreshadows the actual appearance of the comet in 5.3. Ambitioso's burst of metaphor is essentially a high-flown and hypocritical exclamation of horror at the calamity.

109 owes owns

111 these clothes i.e. the man who wore these clothes, Piato

- VINDICE [aside] That nobleman
Has been i'th' country, for he does not lie.
- SUPERVACUO [aside to Ambitioso]
Learn of our mother. Let's dissemble too.
- 115 I am glad he's vanished; so I hope are you.
- AMBITIOSO [aside to Supervacuio]
Ay, you may take my word for't.
- SPURIO [aside] Old Dad dead?
I, one of his cast sins, will send the fates
Most hearty commendations by his own son.
I'll tug in the new stream till strength be done.
- 120 LUSSURIOSO
Where be those two that did affirm to us
My lord the Duke was privately rid forth?
- FIRST GENTLEMAN
O, pardon us, my lords; he gave that charge
Upon our lives, if he were missed at court,
To answer so. He rode not anywhere.
- 125 We left him private with that fellow, here.
- VINDICE [aside] Confirmed.
- LUSSURIOSO
O heavens, that false charge was his death.
Impudent beggars! Durst you to our face
Maintain such a false answer? Bear him straight To execution.
- FIRST GENTLEMAN
My lord!
- 130 LUSSURIOSO Urge me no more.
In this, the excuse may be called half the murder.
- VINDICE
You've sentenced well.
- LUSSURIOSO Away, see it be done.
[Exit First Gentleman under guard]
- VINDICE [aside]
Could you not stick? See what confession doth.
Who would not lie, when men are hanged for truth?
- HIPPOLITO [aside to Vindice]
Brother, how happy is our vengeance.
- 135 VINDICE [aside to Hippolito] Why, it hits
Past the apprehension of indifferent wits.
- LUSSURIOSO My lord, let post horse be sent Into all places to entrap the villain.
- VINDICE [aside] Post horse, ha, ha!
- [FIRST] NOBLE
My lord, we're something bold to know our duty. 140
Your father's accidentally departed.
The titles that were due to him meet you.
- LUSSURIOSO
Meet me? I'm not at leisure, my good lord.
I've many griefs to dispatch out o'th' way.
[Aside] Welcome, sweet titles!—Talk to me, my lords 145
Of sepulchres and mighty emperors' bones;
That's thought for me.
- VINDICE [aside] So, one may see by this
How sov'reign markets go:
Courtiers have feet o'th' nines and tongues o'th' twelves.
- They flatter dukes and dukes flatter themselves. 150
- [SECOND] NOBLE
My lord, it is your shine must comfort us.
- LUSSURIOSO
Alas, I shine in tears, like the sun in April.
- [FIRST] NOBLE You're now my lord's grace.
- LUSSURIOSO
My lord's grace? I perceive you'll have it so.
- [SECOND] NOBLE 'Tis but your own. 155
- LUSSURIOSO
Then heavens give me grace to be so.
- VINDICE [aside]
He prays well for himself.
- [FIRST] NOBLE [to the Duchess]
Madam, all sorrows
Must run their circles into joys. No doubt but time
Will make the murderer bring forth himself.
- VINDICE [aside]
He were an ass then, i'faith.
- [FIRST] NOBLE In the mean season, 160
Let us bethink the latest funeral honours
Due to the Duke's cold body, and withal—
Calling to memory our new happiness
Spread in his royal son—lords, gentlemen,
Prepare for revels.

112–13 That...lie alluding to the proverbial contrast between court deceit and country simplicity and truth

117 cast (a) discarded; (b) disseminated (the sins being linked to the Duke's indiscriminate sowing of his seed)

117–18 will...son i.e. he will kill Ambitioso, as he does in 5.3

119 tug as on an oar; i.e. he will strive for his own advantage in this new current of events

126 Confirmed probably meaning both 'True enough' and 'My innocence is confirmed'

131 excuse i.e. the excuse the Gentleman provided for the Duke's absence

133 stick stop talking; the whole line has ironic application to Vindice's own final inability to remain silent about the Duke's death.

136 indifferent wits ordinary intellects

137 post horse speedy riders

140 we're...duty we are rather eager (to the point of risking impertinence) to know where our allegiance now lies

147–8 So...go This is presumably Vindice's sardonic comment on Lussurioso's feigned unwillingness to accept the dukedom, but the exact meaning is obscure. Foakes, citing the proverb 'You may know by the market men how the markets go', suggests that Vindice means 'that as the new duke behaves, so his courtiers will follow suit'. But Vindice's point seems to concern market strategy:

by pretending to be a reluctant 'buyer' Lussurioso encourages the 'sellers' to be more pressing. 'Sov'reign markets' are, punningly, the best markets and markets in monarchs and in gold coins.

149 Courtiers...twelves i.e. courtiers' flattering tongues are three sizes larger than their feet (perhaps with a submerged pun on the tongue of a boot or shoe)

153 my lord's grace a courtesy-title given to a duke

160 mean season meantime

164 Spread extended; the 'royal son' spreads happiness, as the sun its warming rays; the preposition 'in' is used (rather than 'by') because his subjects are happy in this son/sun

VINDICE [aside] Revels?
 165 [FIRST] NOBLE Time hath several falls;
 Grievs lift up joys, feasts put down funerals.
 LUSSURIOSO
 Come then, my lords; my favours to you all.
 [Aside] The Duchess is suspected foully bent.
 I'll begin dukedom with her banishment.
Exeunt Duke [Lussurioso, Sordido], Nobles, [Gentlemen, Attendants bearing the old Duke's body], and Duchess

HIPPOLITO [to Vindice]
 Revels!
 VINDICE [to Hippolito]
 170 Ay, that's the word; we are firm yet.
 Strike one strain more and then we crown our wit.
Exeunt brothers Vindice and Hippolito

SPURIO [aside] Well, have at the fairest mark!—So said the Duke when he begot me—
 And if I miss his heart or near about,
 175 Then have at any; a bastard scorns to be out. [Exit]

SUPERVACUO Not'st thou that Spurio, brother?
 AMBITIOSO Yes, I note him to our shame.
 SUPERVACUO He shall not live. His hair shall not grow much longer. In this time of revels, tricks may be set afoot.
 180 Seest thou yon new moon? It shall outlive the new Duke by much.
 This hand shall dispossess him, then we're mighty.
 A masque is treason's licence—that build upon.
 'Tis murder's best face when a visor's on. Exit

AMBITIOSO
 185 Is't so? 'Tis very good.
 And do you think to be duke then, kind brother?
 I'll see fair play: drop one and there lies t'other. Exit

5.2 Enter Vindice and Hippolito with Piero and other Lords

VINDICE
 My lords, be all of music; strike old griefs
 Into other countries
 That flow in too much milk and have faint livers,

Not daring to stab home their discontents.
 Let our hid flames break out as fire, as lightning,
 To blast this villainous dukedom vexed with sin.
 Wind up your souls to their full height again.

PIERO
 How?
 FIRST LORD
 Which way?
 SECOND LORD Any way. Our wrongs are such,
 We cannot justly be revenged too much.

VINDICE
 You shall have all enough. Revels are toward,
 10 And those few nobles that have long suppressed you
 Are busied to the furnishing of a masque
 And do affect to make a pleasant tale on't.
 The masquing suits are fashioning. Now comes in
 That which must glad us all—we to take pattern
 15 Of all those suits, the colour, trimming, fashion,
 E'en to an undistinguished hair almost;
 Then, ent'ring first, observing the true form,
 Within a strain or two we shall find leisure
 To steal our swords out handsomely
 20 And, when they think their pleasure sweet and good,
 In midst of all their joys they shall sigh blood.

PIERO Weightily, effectually.
 THIRD LORD Before the t'other masquers come—
 VINDICE We're gone, all done and past.
 25

PIERO
 But how for the Duke's guard?
 VINDICE Let that alone;
 By one and one their strengths shall be drunk down.

HIPPOLITO
 There are five hundred gentlemen in the action
 That will apply themselves and not stand idle.

PIERO
 O, let us hug your bosoms!

VINDICE Come, my lords,
 30 Prepare for deeds; let other times have words. Exeunt

165 falls In view of 'lift up' and 'put down', the most obvious meaning must be operative here; one might paraphrase, 'time produces different kinds of overthrow'.
 166 Grievs...funerals griefs enhance joy, and feasts overcome the sadness of funerals
 168 foully bent lewdly inclined
 170 firm secure
 171 Strike...more play one more tune or theme; i.e. perform one more action
 172 have at a colloquial declaration of intent, as at 3.5.138 mark target (i.e. Lussurioso, the new duke); vulva (when applied to what the Duke said)

 175 out out of the game, without office or influence
 183 masque an entertainment at festive occasions at court or in great halls; it consisted of dancing and acting, performers being masked or visored.
 5.2.1-2 My...countries continuing the music imagery from 5.1 and quibbling on 'strike' as 'play (a tune)'
 3 flow...milk i.e. are too mild and gentle livers punning on 'liver' as 'inhabitant' and as the seat of violent passions and courage 7 Wind up This image of preparation for action might be of a windlass (suggested in 'height') or of the tightening of a crossbow or strings of a musical instrument.

 10 toward in preparation
 13 affect aspire tale i.e. the allegorical narrative of the masque
 18 observing...form keeping to the set order of the dance
 19 strain measure
 20 handsomely 'conveniently' as well as 'elegantly'
 23 Weightily, effectually i.e. the victims will sigh heavily and to good effect (i.e. they will die)
 27 drunk down overcome by drink

- 5.3 In a dumb show, the possessing of the young Duke Lussurioso with all his Nobles; then sounding music. A furnished table is brought forth; then enters the Duke and his Nobles to the banquet
- FIRST NOBLE
Many harmonious hours and choicest pleasures
Fill up the royal numbers of your years.
- LUSSURIOSO
My lords, we're pleased to thank you, though we know
'Tis but your duty now to wish it so.
- SECOND NOBLE
That shine makes us all happy.
- THIRD NOBLE [aside to other Nobles]
His grace frowns.
- 5 SECOND NOBLE [aside to other Nobles]
Yet we must say he smiles.
- FIRST NOBLE [aside to other Nobles]
I think we must.
- LUSSURIOSO [aside]
That foul, incontinent Duchess we have banished.
The bastard shall not live. After these revels
I'll begin strange ones. He and the stepsons
10 Shall pay their lives for the first subsidies.
We must not frown so soon, else 't'ad been now.
- FIRST NOBLE
My gracious lord, please you prepare for pleasure;
The masque is not far off.
- LUSSURIOSO
We are for pleasure.
A blazing star appeareth
- 15 Beshrew thee! What art thou mad'st me start?
Thou hast committed treason.—A blazing star!
- FIRST NOBLE
A blazing star? O, where, my lord?
- LUSSURIOSO
Spy out.
- SECOND NOBLE
See, see, my lords, a wondrous dreadful one.
- LUSSURIOSO
I am not pleased at that ill-knotted fire,
That bushing, flaring star. Am not I duke?
It should not quake me now. Had it appeared 20 Before it, I might then have justly feared.
But yet they say, whom art and learning weds,
When stars wear locks they threaten great men's heads.
Is it so? You are read, my lords.
- FIRST NOBLE
May it please your grace,
It shows great anger.
- LUSSURIOSO
That does not please our grace.
- 25 SECOND NOBLE
Yet here's the comfort my lord: many times,
When it seems most, it threatens farthest off.
- LUSSURIOSO
Faith, and I think so too.
- FIRST NOBLE
Beside, my lord,
You're gracefully established with the loves
Of all your subjects; and for natural death,
30 I hope it will be threescore years a-coming.
- LUSSURIOSO
True. No more but threescore years?
- FIRST NOBLE
Fourscore, I hope, my lord.
- SECOND NOBLE
And fivescore, I.
- THIRD NOBLE
But 'tis my hope, my lord, you shall ne'er die.
- LUSSURIOSO
Give me thy hand. These others I rebuke.
35 He that hopes so is fittest for a duke.
Thou shalt sit next me. Take your places, lords.
We're ready now for sports; let 'em set on.
[To the blazing star] You thing, we shall forget you quite anon.
- THIRD NOBLE
I hear 'em coming, my lord.

5.3.0.1-4 In...banquet Lussurioso and his entourage enter twice, first for the dumb-show of his enthronement and then for the banquet. The initial mime might perhaps use all available actors, but Lussurioso sits at table with only the three nobles who speak and who are killed with him at 5.3.41.2. In performance, the First and Second Noble may have been Sordido and Nencio, though at 5.1.85 these two named characters seem to be thought of as attendants rather than nobles.

0.1 possessing putting in possession, formal investiture

0.2 sounding resounding, sonorous 5 shine smiling aspect, implying the conventional analogy between ruler and sun

10 subsidies payment; a subsidy was literally a levy exacted by a monarch, or a fiscal aid granted to him or her by parliament.

11 else...now or else it would have been now (that I should have ordered their execution)

13.1 A blazing star a common Jacobean stage effect, consisting 'either of a firework on a line or flaming material suspended in an iron cage or cresset, and burned for up to a minute' (Holdsworth)

14 thee...thou Lussurioso apostrophizes the planet.

15 committed treason i.e. by threatening him, since comets portended princes' deaths

17 dreadful a stronger word than now: 'foul of dread'

18 ill-knotted looking forward to the image of hair in line 23

19 bushing growing thick (used of hair, or, figuratively, of a comet's tail)

21 it my becoming duke

22 whom...weds who combine skill and learning

23 When...locks i.e. when they are comets

24 read well read

27 seems most is most manifest, makes the greatest display

- Enter the masque of revengers, the two brothers
Vindice and Hippolito, and two Lords more
- 40 LUSSURIOSO [aside] Ah, 'tis well.
Brothers and bastard, you dance next in hell.
The revengers dance; at the end, steal out their swords, and these four kill the four at the table in their chairs. It thunders
- VINDICE Mark, thunder!
Dost know thy cue, thou big-voiced crier?
Dukes' groans are thunder's watchwords.
- HIPPOLITO So, my lords,
45 You have enough.
- VINDICE Come, let's away, no ling'ring.
HIPPOLITO Follow! [To the two Lords] Go!
Exeunt Hippolito and the two Lords
- VINDICE No power is angry when the lustful die.
When thunder claps heaven likes the tragedy. Exit
*Enter the other masque of intended murderers, stepsons Ambitioso and Supervacuo, Bastard
Spurio, and a Fourth Man, coming in dancing.
The Duke Lussurioso recovers a little in voice and groans—calls, 'A guard! Treason!' At which they all start out of their measure and, turning towards the table, they find them all to be murdered*
- LUSSURIOSO O, O!
SPURIO Whose groan was that?
LUSSURIOSO Treason! A guard!
AMBITIOSO How now, all murdered?
50 SUPERVACUO Murdered!
FOURTH NOBLE And those his nobles!
AMBITIOSO [aside] Here's a labour saved;
I thought to have sped him.—'Sblood, how came this?
SUPERVACUO Then I proclaim myself; now I am Duke.
AMBITIOSO Thou Duke? Brother thou liest.
[He stabs Supervacuo]
SPURIO Slave, so dost thou.
- [He stabs Ambitioso]
FOURTH NOBLE Base villain, hast thou slain my lord and master?
55 [He stabs Spurio]
Enter the first men, [Vindice, Hippolito, and the two Lords of the masque of revengers]
- VINDICE Pistols, treason, murder, help, guard! My lord
The Duke!
[Enter Antonio with Attendants and Guards]
HIPPOLITO Lay hold upon this traitor.
[Guards seize the Fourth Noble]
- LUSSURIOSO O!
VINDICE Alas, the Duke is murdered.
HIPPOLITO And the nobles.
VINDICE Surgeons, surgeons! [Aside] Heart, does he breathe so long?
- ANTONIO A piteous tragedy, able to make 60 An old man's eyes bloodshot.
- LUSSURIOSO O!
VINDICE Look to my lord the Duke. [Aside] A vengeance throttle him!—
Confess, thou murd'rous and unhallowed man,
Didst thou kill all these?
- FOURTH NOBLE None but the bastard, I. 65
VINDICE How came the Duke slain, then?
FOURTH NOBLE We found him so.
LUSSURIOSO O, villain—VINDICE Hark.
LUSSURIOSO Those in the masque did murder us.
VINDICE La you now, sir.
O, marble impudence! Will you confess now?
FOURTH NOBLE 'Sblood, 'tis all false.
ANTONIO Away with that foul monster, 70
Dipped in a prince's blood.
FOURTH NOBLE Heart, 'tis a lie.

40.2 two Lords more Presumably Piero is one of these, and returns with Vindice and Hippolito at 5.3.55.2
41 dance...hell already pointing to the symbolism of the dance of masquers as a Dance of Death
42-3 Mark...crier? This aural omen, following on the visual, is addressed with a levity that complicates its status and effect: 'cue' gestures knowingly towards the sound-effects men in the tiring-house; then God/Jove is reduced to town or court crier; and by line 48

he has become a satisfied spectator at a play: the idea of God as judicial spectator of the world stage is orthodox and commonplace, but there is a certain flippancy in Vindice's tone.
44 watchwords signals to begin an attack
45 enough i.e. enough revenge
48 claps punning on applause and a clap of thunder
48.4-7 The Duke...murdered This second half of Middleton's long stage direction simply foreshadows the dialogue and action that follow.

52 sped killed
57.1 Enter...Guards Since the Guards are needed to take away the Fourth Noble at 5.3.72.1 and Vindice and Hippolito at 5.3.125.1, unless Antonio is accompanied by other attendants he will have nobody to whom to address the play's closing lines. Presumably all available members of the cast enter with him here.
59 Heart exclamation (from 'God's heart')
68 La you now a mild exclamation
69 marble hardened

ANTONIO	Let him have bitter execution.	ANTONIO	It was the strangeliest carried; I ne'er heard of the like.
	[Exit Fourth Noble under guard]	HIPPOLITO	'Twas all done for the best, my lord.	95
VINDICE [aside]	New marrow! No, I cannot be expressed.— How fares my lord the Duke?	VINDICE	All for your grace's good. We may be bold To speak it now. 'Twas somewhat witty-carried, Though we say it. 'Twas we two murdered him.
LUSSURIOSO	Farewell to all.	ANTONIO	You two?
75 He that climbs highest has the greatest fall. My tongue is out of office.		VINDICE	None else, i'faith, my lord. Nay, 'twas well managed.
VINDICE	Air, gentlemen, air! [They step back] [Whispering to Lussurioso] Now thou'lt not prate on't, 'twas Vindice murdered thee—	ANTONIO	Lay hands upon those villains. [Guards seize Vindice and Hippolito]
LUSSURIOSO O!		VINDICE	How, on us?	100
VINDICE	Murdered thy father—	ANTONIO	Bear 'em to speedy execution.
LUSSURIOSO O!		VINDICE	Heart, was't not for your good, my lord?
VINDICE	And I am he. [Lussurioso dies]	ANTONIO	My good?
80 Tell nobody.—So, so, the Duke's departed.		VINDICE	Away with 'em. Such an old man as he! You that would murder him would murder me.
ANTONIO	It was a deadly hand that wounded him. The rest, ambitious who should rule and sway, After his death were so made all away.	VINDICE	Is't come about?
VINDICE	My lord was unlikely.	HIPPOLITO	'Sfoot, brother, you begun.	105
HIPPOLITO	Now the hope Of Italy lies in your reverend years.	VINDICE	May not we set as well as the Duke's son? Thou hast no conscience; are we not revenged? Is there one enemy left alive amongst those? 'Tis time to die when we are ourselves our foes. When murd'ers shut deeds close, this curse does seal 'em:	110
VINDICE	Your hair will make the silver age again, When there was fewer but more honest men.	ANTONIO	If none disclose 'em they themselves reveal 'em. This murder might have slept in tongueless brass, But for ourselves, and the world died an ass. Now I remember too, here was Piato Brought forth a knavish sentence once:	115
ANTONIO	The burden's weighty and will press age down. May I so rule that heaven may keep the crown.	VINDICE	'No doubt', said he, 'but time Will make the murderer bring forth himself'. 'Tis well he died; he was a witch. And now, my lord, since we are in for ever,
VINDICE	The rape of your good lady has been 'quited With death on death.	ANTONIO	Just is the law above. But of all things it puts me most to wonder How the old Duke came murdered.
ANTONIO	Just is the law above. But of all things it puts me most to wonder How the old Duke came murdered.	VINDICE	O, my lord.

73 marrow used figuratively to mean 'delicious food for my revenge' (bone marrow being considered a delicacy)
 84 unlikely unsuitable
 86 silver age in classical mythology a time of simplicity and happiness; with a pun on Antonio's grey-white hair 89 keep protect
 90 'quited requited, avenged
 97 witty-carried cleverly executed
 105 come about turned out so, but the phrase catches the sense of sudden reversal

 106 set die, punning on 'son'/'sun'
 107 conscience (a) sense of what is right, (b) understanding, (c) conviction. The word may well be used in ironic awareness of the contradictions, in the context, among the available meanings.
 109 'Tis time to die recalling 'a time to be born, and a time to die' in Ecclesiastes, 3:2
 110-11 When... 'em a variation on the proverbial 'Murder will out'; 'seal 'em' =

seal their fate
 112 brass the memorial tablets for the victims
 114-17 Now... himself The sententious remark ('sentence') was really the First Noble's; Vindice's recognition here is of the irony of his response to it: 'He were an ass then, i'faith' (5.1.160); though not disguised as Piato, he did speak in an aside.
 118 witch because of his prophetic powers
 119 are in are involved in the business

120 This work was ours, which else might have been slipped,
 And, if we list, we could have nobles clipped
 And go for less than beggars; but we hate
 To bleed so cowardly. We have enough, i'faith:
 We're well, our mother turned, our sister true;
 125 We die after a nest of dukes. Adieu.

Exeunt [Vindice and Hippolito under guard]

ANTONIO

How subtly was that murder closed! Bear up
 Those tragic bodies. 'Tis a heavy season.
 Pray heaven their blood may wash away all treason.

Exeunt

Finis

120 slipped neglected

121 list chose

nobles clipped noblemen beheaded (for their part in the masque of revengers); punning on the 'clipping' or fraudulent paring of the edges of the gold coins known as nobles

124 turned converted

125 nest of dukes suggesting a nest of snakes

126 closed concealed

126-7 Bear . . . bodies Since 5.3 has turned seven characters into corpses, any attempt to get them all off the stage would involve either ludicrous comings and goings or at least fourteen bearers, so presumably the play ends without Antonio's command having been put into effect. At the Globe the actors playing the slaughtered men would simply have risen to take their bows.

YOUR FIVE GALLANTS

Text edited by Ralph Alan Cohen with John Jowett, annotated and introduced by Ralph Alan Cohen

Your Five Gallants plays better than it reads. This is especially true of the 1608 quarto edition printed by George Eld, the only version of the text available until 232 years later when Alexander Dyce published The Works of Middleton. Eld's quarto breaks the promise of the title-page to give the reader the play 'As it hath beene often in Action at the Black-friers' by transposing two of the play's scenes and thereby badly knotting up a story with an already tangled narrative line. Even leaving aside the sins of Eld's print shop, Your Five Gallants is a play in which Thomas Middleton's strengths as a playwright are not readily apparent on the printed page. Indeed, Your Five Gallants is worth serious consideration partly because it illustrates not only that a playwright can write a good play without leaving on the printed page many traces of the genius we associate with his most famous works, but also that the theatrical dimension invisible to us on the page can even be stronger in plays that appear 'thin' textually.

Your Five Gallants resembles Middleton's other early city comedies: it works as much to exhibit (or expose) the manners of contemporary London as to tell a story. For the contemporary Londoner the imagined city setting was not just the backdrop for these plays; it was the unseen connection between characters and the understood motivation for their behaviour. In part, these plays amounted to staged versions of prose works like Thomas Dekker's The Gull's Hornbook or the numerous writings of Robert Greene (whose motto Middleton glances at 1.1.205–6). These popular books warned of the follies and vices of the City in the same way that native New Yorkers complain proudly of the perils of Manhattan. Londoners who went to Your Five Gallants no more expected to see Aristotle's rules observed than does the viewer who turns on the television to watch comedy sketches from Saturday Night Live or Monty Python. What they expected to see was a comic representation of their world. Accordingly, in Your Five Gallants Middleton not only gave them characters drawn from London life, he also put those characters into familiar and specific places such as a gaming room at the Mitre tavern (2.4) and the middle aisle of St Paul's Cathedral (4.4). For Middleton's audience at the Blackfriars—some gentry, some law students from the Inns of Court, some from London's growing middle class, but all 'gallants'—much of the fun in the play derives from the same kind of topographical humour in any fraternity or college skit: they laughed to see themselves and their haunts staged.

Nevertheless, Your Five Gallants can succeed with modern audience unfamiliar with the world of early seventeenth-century London. In October 1991, Your Five Gallants was produced in James Madison University's Theater II, a 'black box' theatre—as far as we know, the only revival so far of the play. The rules of this production were meant to duplicate what might have been the case at an intimate indoor theatre of the Renaissance: universal lighting, an audience on three sides, two entrances upstage, a bare stage, a space 'above', a company of twelve (during the masque, the play requires seventeen people, but three of those have no lines), and a duration of two hours not including a ten-minute 'interlude'. In the context of university theatre, public response is hard to measure, but the reception of the play was more than usually enthusiastic. Maximum seating capacity was 140. Four of the six shows were sold out; opening night and the Saturday matinee drew over 100; and the production almost doubled the gate for any of the other sixteen shows in that space during the 1991–2 academic year. Your Five Gallants attracted and held those audiences because Middleton is a master of those aspects of the theatrical medium that do not readily appear on the page. In particular, Middleton's reliance on blocking, props, and costume—none of which are visible to a reader—results in a play that works on the stage in a way it cannot work on the page.

As to blocking, we cannot know how the Blackfriars Children (who staged the play in 1606 or 1607) arranged the movement of the actors, but three long scenes in which most of the play's characters remain on-stage (2.1 at Primero's bawdy-house, 2.4 at the Mitre tavern, and the final scene with its mock masque) show that Middleton designed the play to give his audience a crowded stage with a multiplicity of actions. When such group scenes occur in Shakespeare's works, they focus on main characters or on some central situation. For example, however many characters may be on stage for the Boar's Head scene in 1 Henry IV, Falstaff and Hal are the focus of attention. Other large scenes such as the trial in Merchant of Venice or the assassination of Caesar or the 'Pyramus and Thisbe' scene point to one business. Even Ben Jonson, whose plays, like Middleton's, crowd a large number of characters into an imagined setting such as Smithfield in Bartholomew Fair, filters the action through some central observer (Adam Overdo) whose comments can help a reader's orientation. By contrast, in Middleton's play, there is no single business. The scene at Primero's bawdy-house, for example, comprises no fewer than twenty-four distinct actions; and, as the title of the play with its promise of five major characters suggests, there is neither a central character nor a central point of view. Such a carousel of activity, though difficult to follow on the page, is wonderfully abundant entertainment in the theatre where the space itself holds all the characters together and where an audience knows immediately what the silent characters in a scene are doing.

In the play's three crowded scenes, moreover, Middleton shows a variety of designs for the action. In Primero's brothel the movement is largely centripetal; Primero acts as a sort of ringmaster while the gallants and their whores move in pairs by turns to centre stage. By contrast, in the scene at the Mitre tavern, the movement appears to be centrifugal. The central action is the dice game where the gallants and the two gulls are gaming, but throughout the scene various actions—Tailby and Bungler pawning things to Frip for gambling money, Goldstone setting up scams, the Boy supplying Pursenet with money stolen from the players—spin off to the apron of the stage. Finally, the rules of the masque choreograph the dance-like movement of the last scene. Together these three scenes demonstrate Middleton's advanced understanding of stage movement and of the need for visual variety; they are non-verbal proofs of his theatrical ingenuity.

Your Five Gallants thus achieves on the stage a satisfying multiplicity that is difficult to perceive in the more linear medium of print. Nor does this multiplicity come at the cost of unity, because Middleton uses costumes and props as a visual glue to hold the various parts of the play together. For example, Goldstone filches a cloak from Fitzgrave (disguised as 'Bowser') and then pawns the cloak to Frip, whose practice of wearing his clients' pawned clothes gets him into trouble when Pursenet, seeing the cloak, mistakes him for Fitzgrave ('Bowser') and attacks him, at which point Fitzgrave himself enters and accuses Frip of theft. The sight of the cloak connects these characters and does so in a way that reminds an audience of their roles in the story—Goldstone, the shameless and lucky con-man; Frip, the conscienceless pawnbroker; Pursenet, the hot-headed and unlucky highwayman; and Fitzgrave, the victimized representative of true gallantry.

The play's key property—in the sense both of a possession and of a stage prop—is the chain of pearls that Fitzgrave gives to Katherine in the second scene of the play. Pursenet's Boy steals the chain of pearls from Katherine, and an audience watches it go from Katherine to the Boy, who gives it to Pursenet, who gives it to his whore, who gives it to Tailby, who has it robbed by Pursenet, who drops it to be found by Goldstone, who (rather than be arrested for stealing it) returns it to Pursenet, who pawns it to Frip, who presents it to Katherine, who recognizes it as 'the very chain of pearl was filched from me!' In this way, the chain of pearls, largely invisible to the reader, strings together the disparate parts of the play for the audience and simultaneously helps to provide the play's thematic content. When Pursenet discovers that he has stolen from Tailby the same chain of pearls that he had given to his whore, he reacts with a speech that sums up the vanity of possession while it connects that theme firmly to that chain of pearls (which, as a circle made up of circles, is an emblem of the circle of possession):

Does my boy pick and I steal to enrich myself, to keep her, to maintain him? Why this is the right sequence of the world: a lord maintains her, she maintains a knight, he maintains a whore, she maintains a captain. So, in like manner, the pocket keeps my boy, he keeps me, I keep her, she keeps him; it runs like quicksilver from one to another. (3.I.I 31–8)

The ambiguous pronouns—he, she, her, him, one, another—clearly extend beyond the world of the play, and, in an acting space where the spectators are lit equally with the actors, such a speech irresistibly suggests to an actor that he search the audience for his referents. In the James Madison University production, Pursenet started pointing to different audience members to illustrate each noun and pronoun from 'a lord maintains her' through to the end of the speech. This assertion of a connection between the fictive and the real worlds was one of the production's funniest and most successful moments. It is a moment designed by a playwright who uses his understanding of the acting space, the actors, and the audience to comment on the fluidity of his social world and its relationship to property.

Middleton sets up this revelation about property from the play's first scene in Frip's pawn shop, a scene which takes over fifteen minutes in performance but which, until its final minute, does not even mention the play's main plot, the wooing of Katherine. What the scene does instead is show Frip, the pawnbroker, at work, and through him and his profession it allows Middleton to introduce the theme of the instability of property. Frip recites how much he lent out for certain specific pieces of clothing. He rejects clothes from a parish where he fears the plague is too active. He gives a small pawn for a gentlewoman's clothes. He welcomes Primero, the bawd, who has come to find clothing for his latest recruit. Frip offers to trade him clothes for lessons in a card trick. When Primero's young prostitute arrives, Frip gets her favour by showing her the clothes. Finally, Frip chooses a suit of pawned clothing to wear for the 'wooing business' at Katherine's. Broken into these parts, the scene is about clothing and money, clothing and the plague, clothing and card tricks, clothing and declined gentry, clothing and sex, clothing and sex again, and clothing and ambition.

In short, Middleton seems to have chosen to postpone any storyline for an atmospheric scene that would associate the vices and ills of London—greed, the plague, gambling, prostitution—with clothes that go from hand to hand. Having established that association, Middleton makes the continual exchange of clothes a metaphor for all of the other contagious ills of society: what goes around, comes around.

Middleton embodies this wisdom in his characterization of Tailby, the ladies' man who is a sort of seventeenth-century precursor of the surfer and who expresses his 'easy come, easy go' approach in his nonchalance about fortune either good or bad. At Primero's bawdy-house (2.1), the women compete to give him valuables. He asks them for nothing; they simply provide. Later at the Mitre tavern, he literally loses his shirt at the gambling table, but in the next scene, before he even gets out of bed, an unnamed mistress sends him a suit of clothes. And while his servant Jack is dressing him, Tailby remembers that he 'pawned a good beaver hat to master Fripp last night' and adds that he feels 'the want of it now'. Precisely at that moment a knock at the door announces Mistress Newblock's servant, and we discover that she has sent Tailby 'a beaver hat—with a band best in fashion' (Interim 2.51–2). Tailby, so beloved of whores, happily accepts the idea that fortune is a strumpet, and Middleton makes him an emblem for the theme of the fickleness of property and the meaninglessness of finery.

Unlike Jonson, however, who uses his city comedies to apply the 'iron rod' to vice, Middleton is rarely the moralist, and whatever moral instruction Your Five Gallants provides is muted by the play's general good-naturedness. Tailby and Pursenet in particular are endearing rogues. Tailby is so worldly that he has reached a Zen-like state of calm and generosity, and Pursenet is a highwayman who is as naïve about the world as he is inept at his profession. He seems genuinely shocked by the world's bad manners: he objects to the victim who fights back—'Sfoot, this gull lays on without fear or wit' (3.2.3–4); he complains of a mark who, by keeping one hand in a pocket at a greeting, makes stealing a purse difficult—'are we grown so beasts, do we salute by halves?' (4.4.29–32); and he fumes at his courtesan for her infidelity—'you are a strumpet!' (3.4.22–3). Her amused reply—'O, news abroad, sir . . . you knew that the first night you lay with me' (3.4.22–3)—puts into perspective Pursenet's self-righteousness and is one of several occasions in the play when the whores in the play, whom Middleton has simply designated as '1 Courtesan', '2 Courtesan', '3 Courtesan', and 'Novice', assert their individuality. Middleton's portrayal of them, as for example at the beginning of Act 5 when they voice their resentment of privileged amateurs like Mistress Newcut, is neither judgemental nor sentimental, and contributes to the overall geniality of the play.

Throughout Your Five Gallants Middleton enhances that quality of detached good humour by acknowledging with a sort of metatheatrical wink the conventions of the theatre. When Primero reminds Fripp at the end of the first scene that they have forgotten the 'wooing business', the playwright seems almost to say with a wink, 'oops, nearly forgot the plot!' In doing so, he reminds the audience of the playwright's prerogatives in the construction of his play. Twice, Middleton plays games with the arbitrariness of stage time. At the end of 4.1, when Goldstone exits with a cloak he has stolen from Fitzgrave's lodging and Fripp enters instantly wearing the same cloak, Middleton has treated his Blackfriars audience to a theatrical 'jump cut' that derives its humour as much from the elasticity of theatrical time as it does from the joke that Fripp is a fence who automatically ends up wearing any stolen property. Similarly, Middleton gives his audience a metatheatrical 'nudge nudge' when he has Pursenet suddenly shift from Tailby's London lodging to the geographically distant locale of Coombe Park in 3.1; whether this is managed on stage by an exit and immediate re-entry or, as seems more likely, by movement over the stage, the representation of time and space become the subject of a joke in itself. Middleton actually stresses his creative geography by having Pursenet refer to the speed of his movement from one scene to another: 'Walk my horse', he says to the Boy, 'behind yon thicket—' (3.1.34), and then he boasts to the audience of his 'gelding's celerity over hedge and ditch' (3.1.38–40).

These moments in which Middleton shares the fun of the theatre game with his audience are more than incidental to an understanding of how Your Five Gallants works on the stage—as 'in-jokes' they link the playwright to audience and the audience to one another. To understand the effect of such moments imagine the original production in its Blackfriars setting. Surrounding a platform on at least three sides was an audience of London's 'night people'—people with the leisure, the daring, and the resources to brave the city after dark, they were the equivalent of the club world in a big city. On-stage they saw a company of children speaking as they speak, dressing as they dress, and pursuing the activities that they themselves pursue, perhaps that very night. Around the stage they saw themselves; on the stage they saw themselves in miniature. Even the title of the play—Your Five Gallants—implicated them, London's gallantry, in the world before them and made them responsible for it: they were watching their 'five gallants'.

In the context of this gallery of mirror images, Middleton's constant reminders of the artifice of playmaking—the admitted postponement of the main plot, the absurd coincidences, the toying with theatrical time—serve to remind his audience that they are indeed looking in a mirror. That effect culminates in the masque which both resolves and concludes the play. In the three years since the Stuart royal family had come into their new kingdom, their delight in masques had made the form an ever more fashionable entertainment, and the appeal of masques to his upwardly mobile audience gave Middleton a voguish metatheatrical tool—an entertainment within an entertainment—to extend the mirroring effect in the play. As the indoor sport of royalty, the masque also lends a kind of authority to the true gallant, Fitzgrave, who uses it as a trap for the five false gallants. What Fitzgrave calls their 'large impudence' entices Fripp, Primero, Goldstone, Pursenet, and Tailby to believe that they should participate in a princely entertainment, but they lack the wit and the Latin to recognize the roles that they are playing. Since they cannot see themselves in the mirror of their own theatrical entertainment, the masque exposes them as rogues and simultaneously separates them from the true gallants in the audience, or at least from those true gallants with the wisdom to see themselves in Middleton's play.

Middleton aimed to put on a good show, and he wrought from the materials of theatre—performance, space, time, audience, and the event itself—a play which gives ample proof of his skill as dramatist. That skill brought to the stage a coherent and memorable work of contemporary satire. Readers who approach Your Five Gallants with the theatre and Middleton's audience clearly in mind will find a play well worth the reading. When the Victorian Anthony Trollope condemned the work as 'tedious' and 'bad', he had read it without seeing it. He missed the show.

Prologue Presenter or prologue [enters. The action on stage happens as he announces it]

PRESENTER Passing over the stage: the bawd-gallant, with three wenches gallantly attired; meets him the whore-gallant, the pocket-gallant, the cheating-gallant; kiss these three wenches and depart in a little whisper and wanton action. Now, for the other, the broker-gallant, he sits at home yet, I warrant you, at this time of day, summing up his pawns. Hactenus quasi inductio, a little glimpse giving.

Exit, [having discovered the broker-gallant, Frip, in a wretched cloak, summing up his pawns in a shop-book of accounts]

I.I Actus Primus
[Frip continues to sum up his pawns.] Enter a Fellow, [with Arthur]

ARTHUR Is your pawn good and sound, sir?

FIRST FELLOW I'll pawn my life for that, sir.

ARTHUR Place yourself there, then, I will seek to prefer it presently. My master is very jealous of the pestilence; marry, the pox sits at meat and meal with him.

[The Fellow] starts back

FRIP [reading] 'Lent the fifth day of September to Mistress Onset, upon her gown, taffeta petticoat with three broad silver laces: three pound fifteen shillings.

'Lent to Justice Cropshin, upon both his velvet jackets: five pound ten shillings.

'Lent privately to my lady Newcut, upon her gilt casting-bottle and her silver lye-pot: fifty-five shillings—'

ARTHUR Sir—

FRIP 'Lent to Sir Oliver Needy upon his taffeta cloak, beaver hat, and perfumed leather jerkin: six pound five shillings—'

ARTHUR May it please your worship—

FRIP 'Lent to Master Andrew Lucifer, upon his flame coloured doublet and blue taffeta hose—' [To Arthur] 20 Top the candle, sirrah; methinks the light burns blue. When came that suit in?

ARTHUR 'T'as lain above the year now.

FRIP Fire and brimstone! cut it out into matches; the white linings will serve for tinder. 25

ARTHUR And with little help, sir; they are almost black enough already. [Presenting the Fellow] Sir, here's another come with a pawn.

FRIP Keep him aside awhile and reach me hither the bill of the last week. 30

ARTHUR 'Tis here at hand, sir.

FRIP Now, sir, what's your pawn?

FIRST FELLOW The second part of a gentlewoman's gown, sir; the lower half, I mean.

FRIP I apprehend you easily: the breeches of the gown. 35

FIRST FELLOW Very proper, for she wears the doublet at home. A guest that lies in my house, sir. She looks every hour for her cousin out o'th' country.

FRIP O, her cousin lies here? A may mistake in that. My friend, of what parish is your pawn? 40

FIRST FELLOW Parish? Why, St Clement's, sir.—[To Arthur] I'll come to you presently. [Exit Arthur]

FRIP What parish is your pawn, my friend? [Reading from the bill] St Bride's: five; St Dunstan's: none; St Clement's: three. Three at Clement's! Away with your pawn, sir; your parish is infected. I will neither purchase 45 the plague for six pence in the pound and a groat bill-money, nor venture my small stock into contagious parishes. You have your answer; fare-you-well, as fast as you can, sir. 50

FIRST FELLOW The pox arrest you, sir, at the suit of the suburbs—

FRIP Ay, welcome, welcome.

Prologue.1 bawd-gallant Primer runs a brothel.

2-3 whore-gallant Tailby lives off his sexual affairs.

3 pocket-gallant Pursenet is a thief. He has a young boy to help him pick pockets. A pursenet was a net-like bag that closed with a drawstring and was used for trapping small animals, especially rabbits or conies, and in that sense the name is doubly apt for someone who snatches purses and preys on yokels, a practice called 'cony-catching'.

cheating-gallant Goldstone is a con man.

4 three wenches i.e. the Courtesans

5 broker-gallant Frip is a pawnbroker.

His name is short for Frippery, either old clothes or the place where they were sold.

7 Hactenus quasi inductio to this point, so to speak, an induction

8.2 in a wretched cloak Perhaps specifically a usurer's cloak. The dramatic function is the transformation at I.I.278.1.

I.I.3 prefer promote

4 jealous of vigilant about the pestilence the plague, which broke out in London in summer months

5 pox plague (here not venereal disease)
sits...him i.e. is his constant companion, concerns him even at meals

9 Cropshin The name means 'one of the refuse sort of herrings' (Nashe), suggesting that, in contrast with Mistress Onset, he is sexually feeble.

I1 Newcut The name of a card game. It could have a sexual implication; in Thomas Heywood's A Woman Killed with Kindness the husband says his wife is 'best at newcut', and the intending seducer comments, 'If you play at newcut I'm soonest hitted of any here' (ed. R. W. Van Fossen (1961), 8.152-5).

I2 casting-bottle bottle for sprinkling perfumed waters (also hinting at the obscene sense 'penis' or 'dildo')

lye-pot decorative vessel for lye used as a hairwash

20 taffeta glossy silk fabric

21 Top snuff

burns blue Blue flames were supposed to be a bad omen; Frip is superstitious.

24 matches cloth strips dipped in sulphur, used as tinder

29 bill weekly account of plague deaths in each parish

35-6 breeches...doublet implying that she is domineering, as in proverbial 'she wears the breeches' (Dent, B645)

39 A may mistake Frip is suggesting that a country person who comes to London is apt to be victimized, or to die of plague.

47-8 A groat bill-money Frip's charge for the bill of exchange. A groat was worth fourpence.

52 suburbs the location of brothels. Hence pox is here 'venereal disease'.

FIRST FELLOW For I think plague scorns your company.
 FRIP I rank with chief gallants; I love to smell safely. Exit 55 in the vacation to master proctor upon his spiritual gown: five angels; and upon his corporal doublet: fifteen shillings. Sum: three pound five shillings.
Enter his man [Arthur], bringing a trunk
 ARTHUR Sir.
 60 FRIP Now, sir.
 ARTHUR Here's one come in with a trunk of apparel.
 FRIP Whence comes it?
 ARTHUR From St Martin's in the Field.
 FRIP St Martin's in the Field?—St Mary Maudlin: two; St 65 Martin's: none. Here's an honest fellow; let him appear,
 sir.
 ARTHUR [calling] You may come near, sir.
 [Enter a Second Fellow]
 FRIP O, welcome, welcome. What's your pawn, sir?
 SECOND FELLOW Faith, a gentlewoman's whole suit, sir.
 70 FRIP Whole suit? 'Tis well.
 SECOND FELLOW A poor kind soul, troubled with a bad husband, one that puts her to her shifts here.
 FRIP He puts her from her shifts, methinks, when she is fain to pawn her clothes.
 75 SECOND FELLOW Look you, sir, a fair satin gown; new taffeta petticoat.
 FRIP Stay, this petticoat has been turned?
 SECOND FELLOW Often turned up and down, an you will,
 but never turned, sir.
 80 FRIP Cry you mercy, indeed.
 SECOND FELLOW A fine white beaver, pearl band, three falls.
 I ha' known her have more in her days.
 FRIP Alas, an she be but a gentlewoman of any count or charge, three falls are nothing in these days; know that.
 85 Tut, the world's changed: gentlewomen's falls stand upright now; no sin but has a bolster that it may lie at ease. Well, what do you borrow of these, sir?

SECOND FELLOW Twelve pound, an you will, sir.
 FRIP How!
 SECOND FELLOW They were not hers for twenty. 90
 FRIP Why, so: our pawn is ever thrice the value of our money, unless in plate and jewels. How should the months be restored and the use, else? We must cast it for the twelve month—so many pounds, so many months, so many eighteen pences; then the use of 95 these eighteen pences; then the want of the return of those pounds. All these must be laid together, which well considered, the valuation of the pawn had need to sound treble. Can six pound pleasure the gentlewoman?
 SECOND FELLOW It may please her, but like a man of three 100 score—in the limberest degree.
 FRIP I have but one word more to say in't: twenty nobles is all and the utmost that I will hazard upon't.
 SECOND FELLOW She must be content with't. The less borrowed, the better paid. Come. 105
 FRIP Arthur.
 ARTHUR At hand, sir.
 FRIP Tell out twenty nobles and take her name in a bill.
 SECOND FELLOW I'm satisfied, sir.
 [Exeunt Second Fellow and Arthur]
 FRIP Welcome, good St Martin's in the Field, welcome. 110
 Welcome—I know no other name.
Enter bawd-gallant, Primero
 PRIMERO What, so hard at your prayers?
 FRIP A little, sir, summing up my pawns here. What,
 Master Primero? Is it you, sir gallant? And how does 115 all the pretty sweet ladies, those plump, kind, delicate blisses, ha, whom I kiss in my very thoughts? How do they, gallant?
 PRIMERO Why, gallant, if they should not do well in my house, where should it be done, boy? Have I not a glorious situation? 120
 FRIP O, a gallant receipt, violet air, curious garden, quaint walks, fantastical arbors, three back doors, and a coach

56 proctor an administrator in ecclesiastical and civil law-cases spiritual ecclesiastical. But the sense 'of the spirit' leads to the antonym corporal, which might mean 'large of body', 'worn on the body', or 'material'.
 57 angels gold coins bearing the image of the archangel Michael; worth ten shillings, and an appropriate coin as payment for a 'spiritual' pawn.
 69 suit evidently 'entourage, wardrobe'
 72 puts her to her shifts proverbial for 'makes her take desperate measures' (Dent, S337). Frip's reply takes shifts as petticoats.
 77 turned renovated by reversing the fabric
 78 up and down in the bawdy sense of having been raised and lowered in sexual encounters
 80 Cry you mercy pardon me
 81 beaver fur hat falls veils that hung from the back of a hat; but leads on to a bawdy pun on 'falling' to sexual temptation

 83 count account (probably punning on cunt)
 84 charge (a) costly expenditure, (b) sexual onslaught
 85 the world's changed Proverbially, 'The world changes every day' (Dent, W892.1).
 85-6 stand upright are accounted righteous
 92-3 the months the amount of time lost for investment
 93 use interest
 93-9 We...gentlewoman The logic of the calculation is (deliberately?) hard to follow. Eighteen pence per pound per month plus interest would make up about one pound per pound after a year, perhaps Frip's justification for offering half the second-hand price, or about one-third of the price new.
 93 cast calculate

98 valuation value
 99 sound treble i.e. (a) be three times the amount handed over, (b) be as high as a treble note in music
 101 limberest limpest
 102 nobles coins worth six shillings and eight pence; thus Frip raises his offer by thirteen shillings and four pence.
 108 Tell count
 111.1 Primero named after a popular card game in which four cards were dealt to each player and counted at three times their value; cf. ll. 144-5
 118 do well Frip asks about the ladies' well-being; Primero gives a sexual implication to do.
 121 receipt reception room, with overtones of commerce appropriate to a brothel violet i.e. perfumed curious...quaint Both words suggest 'ingeniously artficed'.
 122 walks pathways

- gate. Nay, thou'rt admirably seated: little furniture will serve thee; thou'rt never without movables.
- 125 PRIMERO I praise my stars. Ah, the goodly virginities that have been cut up in my house, and the goodly patrimonies that have lain like sops in the gravy. And when those sops were eaten, yet the meat was kept whole for another, and another, and another. For, as
- 130 in one pie twenty may dip their sippets, so upon one woman forty may consume their patrimonies.
- FRIP Excellent, Master Primero.
- PRIMERO
Well, I'll pray for women while I live.
They're the profitablest fools, I'll say that for 'em,
A man can keep about his house—the prettiest kind
- 135 fowl,
So tame, so gentle e'en to strangers' hands,
So soon familiar, suffer to be touched
Of those they ne'er saw twice. The dove's not like 'em.
- FRIP Most certain, for that's honest. But I have a suit to
- 140 you.
PRIMERO And so have I to you.
FRIP That happens well; grant mine, and I'll grant yours.
PRIMERO A match.
- FRIP Make me perfect in that trick that got you so much
- 145 at primero.
PRIMERO O, for the thread tied at your partner's leg, the twitch?
FRIP Ay, that 'twitch', an you call't so.
- PRIMERO
That secret twitch got me five hundred pound
Ere 'twas first known, and since I ha' sold it well.
- 150 Five hundred pound laid down shall not yet buy
The fee simple of my twitch. I would be here with't;
'Twas a blessed invention.
I had been a beggar many a lousy year
- 155 But for my twitch. It was the prettiest twitch.
Many over-cheated gulls have fattened me
With the bottom of their patrimonies
E'en to the last sop, gaped while I fed 'em,
Who now live by that art that first undid 'em.
- 160 But I must swear you to be secret, close.
FRIP As a maid at ten.
- PRIMERO Had you sworn but two years higher, I would ne'er ha' believed you.
- FRIP Nay, I let twelve alone;
For, after twelve has struck, maids look for one.
- 165 PRIMERO I look for one, too, and a maid, I think.
FRIP What, to come hither?
PRIMERO Sure she follows me. A pretty fat-eyed wench with a Venus in her cheek. Did but raiment smile upon her, she were nectar for great dons, boy. And that's my
- 170 suit to thee.
FRIP And that's granted already. Of what volume is this book, that I may fit a cover to't?
PRIMERO Faith, neither in folio nor in decimo sexto, but in octavo between both, a pretty middle-sized trug.
- 175 FRIP Then I have fitted her already in my eye, i'faith. Here came a pawn in e'en now will make shift to serve her as fit. Look you, sir gallant: satin, taffeta, beaver; fall and all.
PRIMERO Is it new?
FRIP New? You see it bears her youth as freshly—
PRIMERO A pretty suit of clothes, i'faith, but put case the party should come to redeem 'em of a sudden?
- FRIP Pooh, then your wit's sickly. Have not I the policy, think you, to seem extreme busy and defer 'em till the
- 185 morrow, against which time that pawn shall be secretly fetched home and another carried out to supply the place?
PRIMERO I like thy craft well there.
FRIP A general course. O, frippery is an unknown benefit, sir gallant!
PRIMERO And what must I give you for the hire now, i'faith?
FRIP Of the whole suit for the month?
PRIMERO Ay, for the month.
- 195 FRIP Go to, you shall give me but twelve pence a day, Master Primero; you're a friend, and I'll use you so. 'Tis got up at your house in an afternoon, i'faith, the hire of the whole month. Ye must think I can distinguish spirits and put a difference between you and others.
- 200 You pay no more, i'faith.
PRIMERO I could have offered you no less myself.
FRIP Tut, a man must use a friend as a friend may use him. Your house has been a sweet house to me, both for

124 movables (a) pieces of furniture, (b) things able to be set in motion, i.e. prostitutes

127 sops piece of bread for soaking up gravy or sauce

130 sippets pieces of toasted bread

133 pray for Equivocates between 'pray on behalf of' and 'pray to have'.

138 like equal to

152 fee simple an estate inherited unconditionally. Primero is comparing the value of his card trick to a family estate.

I...with't I wish I had it with me

165 look for one i.e. are on the lookout for a man; but, in the clock image, 'expect one o'clock'. In l. 166, 'expect to meet someone'.

169 Venus wanton or sexually attractive look

170 dons distinguished men (more specifically, Spanish aristocrats); cf. l. 255. The predicated word is gods, as nectar was the drink of the gods.

173 that...to't Books were usually sold unbound.

174-5 folio...decimo sexto...octavo book sizes. An octavo is twice the size of a decimo sexto, but a quarter of the size of a folio.

175 trug trull

182 put case what if

190 frippery...benefit Mock-proverbial, as though frippery were thrift. The proverb 'Thrift is a great revenue' is not recorded until 1659, but as it translates Cicero it may already have been familiar.
unknown inestimable

- 205 pleasure and profit; I'll give you your due. 'Omne tulit punctum—', you have always kept fine punks in your house, that's for pleasure, '—qui miscuit utile dulci', and I have had sweet pawns from 'em, that's for profit, now.
[Enter Novice]
- PRIMERO You flatter, you flatter, sir gallant. But, whist, here she enters. I prithee, question her.—[To Novice] O, you're welcome.
- FRIP Is this your new scholar, Master Primero?
- PRIMERO Marry, is she, sir.
- FRIP I'll commend your judgement in a wench, while I live.
- 215 That face will get money; i'faith, 'twill be a get-penny, I warrant you.—[To Novice] Go to, your fortune was choice, pretty bliss, to fall into the regard of so kind a gentleman.
- NOVICE I hope so, sir.
- 220 FRIP See what his care has provided already for you; you'll be simply set out to the world. If you'll have that care now to deserve his pains, O, that will be acceptable. And these be the rudiments you must chiefly point at: to counterfeit cunningly, to wind in gentlemen with powerful attraction, to keep his house in name and custom, to dissemble with your own brother, never to betray your fellows' imperfections nor lay open the state of their bodies to strangers, to believe those that give you, to gull those that believe you, to laugh at all under taffeta. And these be your rudiments.
- 230 PRIMERO There's e'en all, i'faith. We'll trouble you with no more; nay, you shall live at ease enough. For nimming away jewels and favours from gentlemen (which are your chief vails), I hope that will come naturally enough to you. I need not instruct you; you'll have that wit, I trust, to make the most of your pleasure.
- NOVICE I hope one's mother-wit will serve for that, sir.
- PRIMERO O, properest of all, wench: it must be a she wit that does those things, and thy mother was quick enough at it in her days.
- 240 FRIP Give me leave, sister, to examine you upon two or three particulars, an you make you ready. Be not ashamed, here's none but friends. Are you a maid?
- NOVICE Yes, in the last quarter, sir.
- 245 FRIP Very proper; that's e'en going out. A maid in the last quarter; that's a whore in the first. Let me see: new moon on Thursday; she'll be changed by that time, too. Are you willing to pleasure gentlemen?
- NOVICE We are all born to pleasure our country, forsooth.
- FRIP Excellent. Can you carry yourself cunningly and seem often holy? 250
- NOVICE O, fear not that, sir; my friends were all Puritans.
- FRIP I'll ne'er try her further.
- PRIMERO She's done well, i'faith. I fear not now to turn her loose to any gentleman in Europe. 255
- FRIP You need not, sir. Of her own accord, I think she'll be loose enough without turning.—Arthur.
- [Enter Arthur]
- ARTHUR Here, sir.
- FRIP Go, make haste; shift her into that suit presently.
- ARTHUR It shall be done. 260
- PRIMERO Arthur. Do't neatly, Arthur!
- ARTHUR Fear't not, sir.
- PRIMERO Follow him, wench.
- NOVICE With all my heart, sir. [Exeunt Novice and Arthur]
- PRIMERO But, master, 265
In what are we forgetful all this while?
- FRIP
In what?
- PRIMERO The wooing business, man.
- FRIP
Heart, that's true.
- PRIMERO
The gallants will prevent us.
- FRIP
Are you certain?
- PRIMERO
I can avouch it; there's a general meeting
At the deceased knight's house this afternoon. 270
There's rivalship enough.
- FRIP
No doubt in that.
- PRIMERO
Would either thou or I might bear her from 'em.
- PRIMERO
My hopes are not yet faint.
- FRIP
Nor mine.
- PRIMERO
Tut, man,
Nothing in women's hearts sooner win place
Than a brave outside and an impudent face. 275
- FRIP And for both those, we'll fit it.
- PRIMERO
Ay, if the devil be not in't. Make haste.
- FRIP I follow straight. Exit Primero
[Frip takes off his cloak, revealing bright clothes]
Vanish, thou fog, and sink beneath our brightness,
Abashed at the splendour of such beams. 280

205 I'll...due proverbial (Dent, D634)

205-7 'Omne tulit punctum...qui miscuit utile dulci' 'He gets every vote who mixes the sweet and the useful' (Horace, Ars Poetica). Adopted as a motto by the playwright and pamphleteer Robert Greene (1560?-1592). Frip twists and puns on the meaning.

206 punks whores (Frip's mistranslation of 'punctum')

221 simply finely

223 point at aim towards

225-6 in name and custom in reputation

and in profitable business

229-30 under taffeta i.e. (a) who wear fine clothes; or (b) who wear less than fine clothes. By the sumptuary law, in theory at least those below the rank of knight or knight's son, or without substantial landed income, were not permitted to wear taffeta or satin cloaks.

232 nimming stealing, filching

233 favours presents

234 vails perquisites, gratuities

243 here's none but friends proverbial (Dent, F743.1)

244 in the last quarter in the last quarter of the moon; i.e. at least until recently. (Or 'during the last quarter', suggesting abstinence from sex during menstruation.)

245 proper fitting that's e'en going out i.e. the last quarter of the moon is just finishing

249 We...country Echoes the proverb, 'We are not born for ourselves'.

252 friends here probably 'relatives'

277 if the devil be not in't proverbial (Dent, D250.11)

- We scorn thee, base eclipser of our glories,
That wouldst have hid our shine from mortals' eyes.
Now, gallants, I am for you; ay, and perhaps before
you!
You can appear but glorious from yourselves,
And have your beams but drawn from your own 285 light;
But mine from many, many make me bright.
Here's a diamond that sometimes graced the finger of a countess; here sits a ruby that ne'er lins blushing for the party that pawned it; here a sapphire. O providence and fortune! My beginning was so poor, I would fain 290 forget it, and I take the only course, for I scorn to think on't: slave to a trencher, observer of a salt-cellar, privy to nothing but a close-stool or such unsavoury secret.
But as I strive to forget the days of my serving, so I shall once remember the first step of my raising. For 295 having hardly raked five mark together, I rejoiced so in that small stock, which most providently I ventured by water—to Blackwall, among fishwives; and in small time, what by weekly return and gainful restitution, it 300 risse to a great body, beside a dish of fish for a present that stately preserved me a seven-night.
Nor ceased it there, but drew on greater profit,
For I was held religious by those
That do profess like abstinence,
305 And was full often secretly supplied
By charitable Catholics,
Who censured me sincerely abstinate,
When merely I for hunger, not for zeal,
Ate up the fish—and put their alms to use.
310 Ha, ha, ha!
But those times are run out, and, for my sake,
Zealous dissemblance has since fared the worse.
Let me see now, whose cloak shall I wear today to continue change? O, Arthur.
[Enter Arthur]
315 ARTHUR Here, sir.
FRIP Bring down Sir Oliver Needy's taffeta cloak and beaver hat—I am sure he is fast enough in the Knight's Ward—and Andrew Lucifer's rapier and dagger with the embossed girdle and hangers—for he's in his third sweat by this time, sipping of the doctor's bottle or 320 picking the ninth part of a rack of mutton dry-roasted, with a leash of nightcaps on his head like the Pope's triple crown, and as many pillows crushed to his back, with 'O, the needles!'—for he got the pox of a seamster, and it pricked so much more, naturally. 325
Quick, Arthur, quick. [Exit Arthur]
Now to the deceased knight's daughter,
Whom many gallants sue to, I 'mongst many. For Since impudence gains more respect than virtue,
And coin than blood—which few can now deny—330 Who're your chief gallants, then, but such as I? Exit
- Enter Mistress Katherine, with Fitzgrave, a gentleman* 1.2
- FITZGRAVE
You do your beauties injury, sweet virgin,
To lose the time they must rejoice in youth.
There's no perfection in a woman placed
But wastes itself, though it be never wasted.
Then judge your wrongs yourself.
- KATHERINE Good Master Fitzgrave, 5
Through sorrow for the knight my father's death—
Whose being was the perfection of my joys
And crown of my desires—I cannot yet
But forcedly on marriage fix my heart.
Yet heaven forbid I should deject your hopes;
10 Conceive not of me so uncharitably.
I should belie my soul if I should say
You are the man I never should affect.
I understand you thus far: you're a gentleman
Whom your estate and virtues may command 15
To a far worthier breast than this of mine.
- FITZGRAVE
O cease, I dare not hear such blasphemy.
What is without you worthy, I neglect;
In you is placed the worth that I respect.
Vouchsafe, unequalled virgin, to accept 20
This worthless favour from your servant's arm:
The hallowed beads whereon I justly kept
The true and perfect number of my sighs.

287 sometimes at one time288 lins ceases292–3 slave...secret Fripp's occupations as serving-man were so menial that he describes himself in relation to the mere objects he worked with. The phrases also suggest ambition to curry favour and advancement. [He gives her a chain of pearl]
 KATHERINE
 Mine cannot equal yours, yet in exchange
 25 Accept and wear it for my sake.
 [She gives him a jewel]
 FITZGRAVE Even as my soul I'll rate it.
 Enter five gallants [Goldstone, Pursenet, Tailby, Frip, Primero] at the farther door, [Pursenet's Boy with them]
 GOLDSTONE Heart! Fitzgrave in such bosom-single loves?
 PURSENET So close and private with her?
 TAILBY Observe 'em: he grows proud and bold.
 30 FRIP Why, was not this a general meeting?
 PRIMERO By her own consent. Death, how I could taste his blood!
 KATHERINE [to Fitzgrave] See, the gentlemen
 At my request do all present themselves.
 GOLDSTONE
 35 Manifold blisses wait on her desire
 Whose beauty and whose mind so many honour!
 KATHERINE
 I take your wishes thankfully.—Kind gentlemen
 All here assembled, over whose long suits
 I ne'er insulted,
 40 Nor, like that common sickness of our sex,
 Grew proud in the abundance of my suitors
 Or number of the days they sued unto me—
 Dutiful sorrow for my father's death,
 Not wilful coyness hath my hours detained
 45 So long in silence.
 I'm left to mine own choice; so much the more
 My care calls on me. If I err through love,
 'Tis I must chide myself; I cannot shift
 The fault unto my parents—they're at rest—
 50 And I shall sooner err through love than wealth.
 GOLDSTONE
 Good.
 PURSENET
 Excellent.
 TAILBY That likes me well.
 PRIMERO Hope still.
 [During the following speech, Pursenet's Boy steals the chain of pearl that Fitzgrave gave her]
 KATHERINE
 And my affections do pronounce you all
 Worthy their pure and most entire deserts.

Yet they can choose but one;
 Nor do I dissuade any of his hopes,
 55 Because my heart is not yet throughly fixed
 On marriage or the man,
 But crave the quiet respite of one month—
 The month unto this night—against which time
 I do invite you all to that election,
 60 Which, on my unstained faith and virgin promise,
 Shall light amongst no strangers, but yourselves.
 May this content you?
 GALLANTS
 Glad and content.
 KATHERINE 'Tis a good time to leave.
 Till then commend us to your gentlest thoughts. 65
 Exit
 GALLANTS Enough.
 [Exeunt all the gallants but Pursenet. As they go, they look scurvily upon Fitzgrave, and he upon them]
 FITZGRAVE Ugh!
 BOY [to Pursenet] Hist, master, hist.
 The Boy in a corner with his master, pocket-gallant [Pursenet]
 PURSENET Boy, how now?
 BOY Look you, sir. 70
 PURSENET Her chain of pearl.
 BOY I snecked it away finely.
 PURSENET Active boy,
 Thy master's best revenue, his life and soul—
 Thou keep'st 'em both together. Whip away! 75
 Exit Boy
 Fall back, fall belly; I must be maintained.
 Hope is no purchase, nor care I if I miss her.
 Why I rank in this design with gallants
 There's full cause: policy invites me to it.
 'Tis not for love, or for her sake alone; 80
 It keeps my state suspectless and unknown. Exit
 FITZGRAVE
 Their looks run through and through me, and the stings
 Of their snake-hissing whispers pierced my hearing.
 They're mad she graced me with one private minute
 Above their fortunes. I have observed 'em often 85
 Most spitefully aspected toward my happiness
 Beyond all others'; but the cause I know not.
 A quiet month the virgin has enclosed
 Unto herself. Suitors stand without till then;

26.2 at the farther door i.e. the stage door further away from Katherine and Fitzgrave. In the lines immediately following there are two separate groupings of figures.
 27 bosom-single loves one-to-one amorous exchanges
 28–9 close and private . . . proud and bold with innuendos of sexual intimacy and arousal

39 insulted exulted
 72 snecked took, snatched
 76 Fall back, fall belly he who hesitates (falls back) starves. A punning variant on the proverbial conflict of interest between back and belly: 'The belly robs the back', 'The belly is starved by the back', or, as W. Averell (1588) imagined the back addressing the belly, 'Your disorder in feeding hath made the members weak and my garments bare' (Tilley, B290). The phrasing echoes the proverb 'Fall back, fall edge' (Dent, B12).

 77 is no purchase is no plunder; i.e. brings no material benefit
 82 run like a sword-blade
 86 aspected Refers to their facial expressions, but also, metaphorically, to the astrological influence of planets in certain positions.

90 In which space cunningly I'll wind myself
 Into their bosoms. I have bethought the shape—
 Some credulous scholar, easily infected
 With fashion, time, and humour. Unto such
 Their deepest thoughts will, like to wanton fishes,
 95 Play above water and be all parts seen;
 For since at me their envy pines, I'll see Whether their lives from touch of blame sit free.

2.1 Actus Secundus

*Enter Primero, the bawd-gallant, meeting Mistress
 Newcut, a merchant's wife*

PRIMERO Mistress Newcut, welcome. Here will be choice of gallants for you anon.
 NEWCUT Is all clear? May I venture? Am I not seen of the wicked?
 5 PRIMERO Strange absurdity, that you should come into my house and ask if you be not seen of the wicked. Push, I take't unkindly, i'faith! What think you of my house?
 'Tis no such common receptacle.
 NEWCUT Forgive me, sweet Master Primero; I can be 10 content to have my pleasure as much as another, but I must have a care of my credit. I would not be seen—anything else. My husband's at sea, and a woman shall have an ill report in this world let her carry herself never so secretly. You know't, Master Primero. And 15 what choice of gallants be they? Will they be proper gentlemen, think you?
 PRIMERO Nay, sure they are as proper as they will be already.
 NEWCUT I must have choice, you know; I come for no
 20 gain, but for sheer pleasure and affection.
 PRIMERO You see your old spy-hole yonder? Take your stand; please your own eye. I'll work it so the gallants shall present themselves before you, and in the most conspicuous fashion.
 25 NEWCUT That's all I can desire. [Giving him some money]
 Till better come, look you.

PRIMERO What mean you, lady?
 NEWCUT A trifle, sir, to buy you silver spurs. Good sir, accept it. [She withdraws]
 PRIMERO 'Silver spurs'—a pretty emblem. Mark it, all her 30 gifts are about riding still. The other day she sent me boot-hose wrought in silk and gold; now, silver spurs.
 Well, go thy ways; thou'rt as profitable a spirit as e'er lighted into my house. [Calling] Come, ladies, come; 'tis late. To music, when?
 35 [Enter two Courtesans and the Novice, with musical instruments]

FIRST COURTESAN You're best command us, sir. [To the other women] Our pimp's grown proud.

PRIMERO [to audience]
 To fools and strangers these are gentlewomen
 Of sort and worship, knights' heirs, great in portions,
 Boarded here for their music.
 40 And oftentimes 'tas been so cunningly carried
 That I have had two stol'n away at once
 And married at Savoy, and proved honest shopkeepers.
 And I may safely swear they practised music:
 They're natural at prick-song. A small mist
 45 Will dazzle a fool's eye, and that's the world.
 So I can thump my hand upon the table
 With an austere grace and cry 'one, two, and three',
 Fret, stamp, and curse, 'foh!', 'twill pass well for me.
 [Enter Primero's Boy]

How now, sirrah.
 50 BOY They're coming in, sir; and strangers in their company.

PRIMERO Tune apace, ladies. Be ready for the song, sirrah.
Enter all: [the gallants Goldstone, Pursenet and his Boy, Tailby, and Frip; with Bungler, and Fitzgrave in disguise as a scholar named Bowser]

GOLDSTONE [presenting 'Bowser'] Nay, I beseech you, gal-55 lants, be more inward with this gentleman; his parts deserve it.

PURSENET Whence comes he, sir?
 GOLDSTONE Piping hot from the university; he smells of buttered loaves yet; an excellent scholar, but the 60 arrantest ass. For this our solicitor, he's a rare fellow

90-1 In...bosoms While Katherine is 'enclosed | Unto herself', Fitzgrave will penetrate the gallants' secrets.

 6 Push a dismissive exclamation, as in
 'pooh!'
 8 'Tis...receptacle i.e. I don't receive just anyone here. Common receptacle suggests analogy with a prostitute. Questions of number of people, social class, and moral probity are comically confused in the suggestion that no one wicked would be found at a classy brothel.

 21 your...yonder It is perhaps in the upper acting area above the stage, as suggested by watchtowers at 5.1.3-4.
 31 riding with a sexual innuendo. Middleton's references to spurs often imply sexual goading.

 buttered bread for breakfast.
 60 this our solicitor i.e. Bungler, who is 'soliciting'
he's i.e. he's considered five-and-forty mile hence, believe that. His friends are of the old fashion—all in their graves; and now has he the leisure to follow all new fashions—ply the brothels, practise salutes and cringes.

 65 PURSENET O.
 GOLDSTONE [to Fitzgrave] Now, dear acquaintance,
 I'll bring you to see fashions.
 FITZGRAVE What house is this, sir?
 GOLDSTONE
 O, of great name. Here music is professed;
 Here sometimes ladies practise—and the meanest,
 70 Daughters to men of worship—
 Whom gentlemen such as ourselves may visit,
 Court, clip, and exercise our wits upon.
 It is a professed courtesy.
 FITZGRAVE A pretty recreation, i'faith.
 75 GOLDSTONE I seldom saw so few here; you shall have 'em sometimes in every corner of the house, with their viols betwixt their legs and play the sweetest strokes—
 'twould e'en filch your soul almost out of your bosom.
 FITZGRAVE Pox on't, we spoil ourselves for want of these 80 things at university!
 GOLDSTONE You have no such natural happiness. Let's draw near.
 PRIMERO Gentlemen, you are all most respectively welcome.
 85 GOLDSTONE We are bold and insatiate suitors, sir, to the breath of your music and the dear sight of those ladies.
 PRIMERO
 And what our poor skill can invite you to,
 You are kindly welcome. You must pardon 'em,
 gentlemen:
 Virgins, and bashful; besides, new beginners.
 90 'Tis not a whole month since they were first entered.
 GOLDSTONE [aside] Seven year in my knowledge.
 PRIMERO
 They blush at their very lessons; they will not endure
 To hear of a stop, a prick, or a semiquaver.
 FIRST COURTESAN O, out upon you!
 PRIMERO
 95 La, I tell you—you'll bear me witness, gentlemen,
 If their complaints come to their parents' ears—
 They're words of art; I teach 'em naught but art.
 GOLDSTONE Why, 'tis most certain.
 BUNGLER For all scholars know that musica est ars.

ALL THE COURTESANS O, beastly word! 100
 PRIMERO Look to the ladies, gentlemen.
 GOLDSTONE [to a Courtesan] Kiss again.
 PURSENET [to a Courtesan] Come, another.
 TAILBY This' a good interim. [Exit] 105
 PRIMERO [to Bungler] What have you done, sir?
 BUNGLER Why, what have I done?
 PRIMERO Saw you their stomachs queasy, and come with such gross meat?
 BUNGLER Why, is't not Latin, sir?
 PRIMERO Latin? Why then let the next to't be Latin too. 110
 PURSENET [to a Courtesan] So, enough.
 GOLDSTONE [to Primero] Nay, I can assure you thus far:
 I that never knew the language have heard so much, that ars is Latin for 'art'. And it may well be, too, for there's more art in't nowadays than ever was. 115 PRIMERO Is't possible? I am sorry, then, I have followed it so far.
 FIRST COURTESAN A scholar call you him?
 PRIMERO Music must not jar; the offence is satisfied. Come, to the song. [To his Boy] Begin, sir. 120 [Primero's Boy sings] the song, [the Courtesans accompanying]; and he [Primero] keeps time, shows several humours and moods. [PurseNET's Boy in his pocket nims away Fitzgrave's jewel
here, and exit
 BUNGLER Not a whole month since you were entered, ladies?
 FITZGRAVE None that shall see their cunning will believe
 it.
 PRIMERO It is no affliction, gentlemen? 125
 BUNGLER I care not much, i'faith, if I write down to my father presently to send up my sister in all haste, that I may place her here at this music school.
 NEWCUT [to the audience, appearing at her hiding place] 'Slid,
 'tis the fool my cousin! I would not for the value of 130 three recreations he had seen me here!
 PRIMERO [to FriP] How like you your new prize?
 FRIP Pray, give me leave; I have not yet sufficiently admired her.
 [He courts the Novice, giving her jewels]
 PRIMERO 'Slife, he's in a sick trance! 135
 GOLDSTONE [to the audience] My wits must not stand idle.
 A cheat or two among these mistresses
 Would not be ill-bestowed. I affect none

 70 men of worship respectable men,

 practised
 77 viols stringed instruments like violas and cellos. The bass viol was held between the legs; hence Goldstone's sexual innuendoes.
 80 at university Music was taught as an academic subject, but the universities were all-male.

 happiness at university is 'unnatural':
 homosexual.

 110 let...too i.e. you might as well say that what is next to the arse is Latin too
 115 in't The inoffensive referent is music.

 123 cunning skill. Cun- probably puns on cunt.

- 140 But for my prey, such are their affections.
I know it; how could drabs and cheaters live else?
Then since the world rolls on dissimulation,
I'll be the first dissembler.
[He moves to the Second Courtesan]
- FIRST COURTESAN [to Pursenet] Prithee, love, comfort, choice, my only wish; in thee I am confined. Deny me 145 anything? A slight chain of pearl?
PURSENET Nay, an't be but slight—
FIRST COURTESAN Being denied,
I prize it slight; but given me by my love,
Light shall not be so dear unto my eye,
150 Mine eye unto the body, as the gift.
PURSENET
How have I power to deny this to you,
That command all? My fortunes are thy servants,
And thou the mistress both of them and me.
[He gives her the chain of pearl]
- FIRST COURTESAN
The truest that e'er breathed.
GOLDSTONE [to the Second Courtesan]
To a gentleman
155 That thus so long and has so sincerely loved you
As I myself, ne'er was less pity shown.
SECOND COURTESAN
Why, I never was held cruel.
GOLDSTONE But to me.
SECOND COURTESAN
Nor to you.
GOLDSTONE Go to, 't'as scarred you much.
SECOND COURTESAN
I'm sorry your conceit is so unkind
To think me so.
160 GOLDSTONE When had I other argument?
I've often tendered you my love and service—
And that in no mean fashion—
Yet were you never that requiteful mistress
That graced me with one favour.
165 'Slight, not so much as such a pretty ring.
[He takes her ring]
Pox on't, 't'as almost broke my heart!
SECOND COURTESAN He's took it off. 'Sfoot! Master Bowser!
GOLDSTONE Nay, where a man loves most, there to be scanted.
170 SECOND COURTESAN My ring. Come, come.
GOLDSTONE
What reckon I a satin gown or two
If she were wise.
SECOND COURTESAN
Life, my ring, sir, come.
GOLDSTONE
Have you the face, i'faith?
SECOND COURTESAN Give me my ring.
- GOLDSTONE Prithee, hence. By this light, you get none on't.
SECOND COURTESAN How!
GOLDSTONE
I hold your favours of more pure esteem
Than to part from 'em. Faith, I do, howe'er
You think of me.
SECOND COURTESAN Push! Pray, sir.
GOLDSTONE Hark you, go to. You have lost much by 180 unkindness; go your ways.
SECOND COURTESAN 'Sfoot!
GOLDSTONE But yet there's no time past; you may redeem
it.
SECOND COURTESAN Come, I cannot miss it, i'faith. Beside, 185 the gentleman that bestowed it on me swore to me it cost him twenty nobles.
GOLDSTONE Twenty nobles? Pox of twenty nobles.
But you must cost me more, you pretty villain—
Ah, you little rogue.
SECOND COURTESAN
Come, come; I know you're but in jest. 190
GOLDSTONE
In jest? No, you shall see.
SECOND COURTESAN [to audience]
No way will get it.
As good give it him now and hope for somewhat.
GOLDSTONE True love made jest?
SECOND COURTESAN I did but try thy faith, how fast thou'dst 195 hold it. Now I see a woman may venture worthy favours to thy trust and have 'em truly kept; and I protest, had I drawn't from thee, I should ne'er ha' loved thee; I know that.
GOLDSTONE 'Sfoot, I was ne'er so wronged in my life.
Think you I am in jest with you? What, with my 200 love?
I could find lighter subjects, you shall see;
And time will show how much you injure me.
SECOND COURTESAN
The ring, were't thrice worth, I freely give,
For I know you will requite it.
GOLDSTONE Will I live?
SECOND COURTESAN
Enough.
GOLDSTONE [to audience]
Why, this was well come off now. 205
Where's my old servingman? Not yet returned.
[Enter Fulk]
O, here he peeps. Now, sirrah?
FULK May it please your worship. [Aside to Goldstone, showing him two beakers] They're done artificially, i'faith, 210 boy.
GOLDSTONE Both the great beakers?
FULK Both, lad.
GOLDSTONE Just the same size?

159 conceit thought, understanding 160 argument theme (his protestations of love)

167 'Sfoot 'God's foot', a common oath

183-4 But ... redeem it i.e. it's not too late

185 miss do without

204 Will I live? proverbial (Dent, L374.1)

205 well come off referring to both the ring and the outcome of the contest

209 artificially artfully

- 215 FULK Ay, and the marks as just.
GOLDSTONE So, fall off respectively now.
FULK [aloud to Goldstone]
My lord desires your worship of all love—
GOLDSTONE
His lordship must hold me excused till morning;
I'll not break company tonight. Where sup we,
gallants?
PURSENET At' Mermaid.
GOLDSTONE
220 Sup there who list; I have forsworn the house.
FULK [to audience] For the truth is this plot must take effect
at' Mitre. [Exit]
GOLDSTONE Faith, I'm indifferent.
BUNGLER So are we, gentlemen.
225 PURSENET Name the place, Master Goldstone.
GOLDSTONE Why, the Mitre, in my mind, for neat attendance, diligent boys and—push!—excels it far.
ALL THE REST Agreed, the Mitre, then.
PURSENET Boy! [To audience] Some goodness toward: the 230 Boy's whipped away.
FITZGRAVE [stamping] The jewel! Heart, the jewel!
GOLDSTONE How now, sir? What moved you?
FITZGRAVE Nothing, sir.
A spice of poetry, a kind o' fury,
A disease runs among scholars.
235 GOLDSTONE Mass, it made you stamp.
FITZGRAVE [stamping again] Whoo!
'Twill make some stamp and stare, make a strange noise,
Curse, swear, beat tire-men, and kick players' boys.
The effects are very fearful.
PURSENET Bless me from't!
FITZGRAVE
240 O, you need not fear it, sir.—Hell of this luck!
GOLDSTONE Hark, he's at it again.
PURSENET
Some pageant plot or some device for the tilt-yard;
Disturb him not.
FITZGRAVE [to audience]
How can I gain her love
When I have lost her favour?
PURSENET [to Bungler] Look you, sir.
245 GOLDSTONE [showing Fripp the Second Courtesan's ring] What money hast about thee? I must be fain to pawn a fair stone here for ordinary expenses. A pox of my tenants;
- I give 'em twenty days after the quarter, and they cut out forty.
FRIP Why, you might take the forfeiture of their leases
then.
GOLDSTONE I know I might, but what's their course? The rogues comes me up all together, with geese and capons and petitions in pigs' snouts, which would move any man, i'faith, were his stomach ne'er so great; and to 255 see how pitifully the pullen will look, it makes me after relent and turn my anger into a quick fire to roast 'em.
Nay, touch't, and spare it not.
FRIP 'Tis right. Well, what does your worship borrow of this, sir?
260 GOLDSTONE The stone's twenty nobles.
FRIP Nay, hardly.
GOLDSTONE As I am a right gentleman.
FRIP It comes near it, indeed. Well, here's five pound in gold upon't.
265 GOLDSTONE 'Twill serve; and the ring safe and secret?
FRIP As a virgin's.
GOLDSTONE
I wish no higher.—What, gallants, are you constant?
Does the place hold?
ALL THE REST The Mitre.
270 GOLDSTONE [to Primero] Sir, in regard of our continued boldness and trouble—which love to your music hath made us guilty of—shall we entreat your worship's company, with these sweet ladies, your professed scholars, to take part of a poor supper with myself and these 275 gentlemen at the Mitre?
FRIP Pray, Master Primero.
PURSENET [to Primero] I beseech you, sir, let it be so.
PRIMERO O, pardon me, sweet gentlemen, the world's apt to censure; I have the charge of them, they're left in 280 trust, they're virgins, and I dare not hazard their fames.
The least touch mars 'em, and what would their right worshipful parents think if the report should fly to them that they were seen with gentlemen in a tavern?
GOLDSTONE All this may be prevented. What serves your 285 coach for? They may come coached and masked.
PRIMERO You put me to't, sir.
Yet I must say again: I fear the drawers
And vintner's boys will be familiar with them,
And think 'em mistresses.
290 PURSENET
There are those places where respect seems slighter;

215 fall off respectively assume a respectful distance (as a servant)

219 Mermaid a famous tavern; along with the Mitre, a favourite of the literary and fashionable men about town. 'Mermaide', the spelling in the early printed edition, suggests its reputation.

222 Mitre See previous note. Middleton links the Mitre to the theatre audience in Mad World: 'this will be a true feast, a right Mitre supper, a play and all' (5.1.83-4).

229 toward on the way

235 Mass 'by the mass', an oath

236 Whoo Fitzgrave, realizing that he lost his composure and nearly gave away his disguise, stages this second 'fit' of the 'disease' of scholars.

238 tire-men theatrical costume-managers. Fitzgrave imagines himself as an abusive playwright.

242 tilt-yard the tilting-ground at Westminster. Jacobean tilts were occasions for masque-like pageantry scripted by playwrights.

244 favour her love token (the jewel Fitzgrave had from Katherine)

247 ordinary tavern

248 quarter quarterly date on which rent is due

248-9 cut out make out of it

253 comes me come

256 pullen poultry

266 ring Fripp's reply jokes on the sense 'vagina'.

- More censure is belonging to the Mitre.
You know that, sir.
- PRIMERO Gentlemen, you prevail.
GOLDSTONE
We'll all expect you there.
PRIMERO And we'll not fail.
FRIP
295 The devil will ne'er dissemble with them so,
As you for them.
GOLDSTONE Come, sir.
FRIP What else? Let's go.
Exeunt [all but Primero, the Courtesans, and the Novice]
Enter whore-gallant [Tailby]
- PRIMERO
How cheer you, sir?
TAILBY Faith, like the moon, more bright;
Decreased in body, but remade in light.
Here, thou shalt share some of my brightness with
me.
[He gives him money]
- PRIMERO
300 By my faith, they are comfortable beams, sir. [Exit]
FIRST COURTESAN
Come, where have you spent the time now from my sight?
I'm jealous of thy action.
TAILBY Push!
I did but walk a turn or two in the garden.
FIRST COURTESAN
What made you there?
TAILBY Nothing but cropped a flower.
305 FIRST COURTESAN Some woman's honour, I believe.
TAILBY [giving her a flower]
Foh, is this a woman's honour?
FIRST COURTESAN Much about one:
When both are plucked their sweetness is soon gone.
TAILBY
Prithee, be true to me.
FIRST COURTESAN When did I fail?
TAILBY
Yet I am ever doubtful that you're firm.
FIRST COURTESAN
310 I do account the world but as my spoil to adorn thee.
My love is artificial to all others,
But purity to thee. Dost thou want gold?
Here, take this chain of pearl, supply thyself.
[She gives him the chain of pearl]
Be thou but constant, firm, and just to me,
- Rich heirs shall want e'er want come near to thee. 315
TAILBY
Upon thy lip I seal sincerity.
[He kisses her.] Exit [First Courtesan]
SECOND COURTESAN Was this your vow to me?
TAILBY
Pox, what's a kiss to be quite rid of her;
She's sued so long I was ashamed of her.
'Twas but her cheek I kissed neither, to save her longing. 320
SECOND COURTESAN
'Tis not a kiss I weigh.
TAILBY Had you weighed this,
'T'ad lacked above five ounces of a true one;
No kiss that e'er weighed lighter.
SECOND COURTESAN 'Tis thy love that I suspect.
TAILBY
My love? Why, by this—What shall I swear by? 325
SECOND COURTESAN [giving him Fitzgrave's jewel]
Swear by this jewel. Keep thy oath; keep that.
TAILBY
By this jewel, then, no creature can be perfect
In my love but thy dear self.
SECOND COURTESAN I rest.
[Exit Second Courtesan]
TAILBY [seeing the Novice] Ha, ha, ha!
Let's laugh at 'em, sweet soul.
NOVICE Ay, they may laugh at me; 330
I was a novice and believed your oaths.
TAILBY
Why, what do you think of me? Make I no difference
'Tween seven years' prostitution and seven days?
Why, you're but in the wane of a maid yet.
You wrong my health in thinking I love them; 335
Do not I know their populous imperfections?
Why, they cannot live till Easter. Let 'em show
The fairest side to th' world, like hundreds more whose clothes
E'en stand upright in silver, when their bodies
Are ready to drop through 'em. Such there be; 340
They may deceive the world; they ne'er shall me.
NOVICE Forgive my doubts,
And for some satisfaction wear this ring,
From which I vowed ne'er, but to thee, to part.
[She gives him the ring that Goldstone pawned to Frip]
TAILBY
With which thou ever bind'st me to thy heart. 345
Exeunt

292 More censure better judgement
300 comfortable comforting, cheering 302 jealous of thy action suspicious of what you've been doing

304 What made you what did you do
306 Much about very similar to 320 neither and no more to save her longing in contrast with proverbial 'to lose one's longing' (Dent, L422)

332 difference distinction

2.2 Enter Fitzgrave, [disguised as Bowser]
 FITZGRAVE
 My pocket picked! This was no brothel house?
 A music school? Damnation has fine shapes.
 I paid enough for th' song: I have lost a jewel
 To me more precious than their souls to them
 5 That gave consent to filch it. I'll hunt hard,
 Waste time and money, trace and wheel about,
 But I will find these secret mischiefs out.
 [Enter Katherine's Servant]
 How now, what's he?
 O, a servant to my love. Being thus disguised,
 I'll learn some news. [Giving money] Now, sir, you 10 belong to me.
 KATHERINE'S SERVANT I do, sir, but I cannot stay to say so.
 Nay, good sir, detain me not; I am going in all haste to enquire or lay wait for a chain of pearl nimm'd out of her pocket the fifth of November—a dismal day.
 15 FITZGRAVE Ha, a chain of pearl, say'st thou?
 KATHERINE'S SERVANT A chain of pearl, sir, which one Master Fitzgrave, a gentleman and a suitor, fastened upon her as a pledge of his love.
 FITZGRAVE Ha?
 KATHERINE'S SERVANT
 20 Urge me no more; I have no more to say—
 Your friend, Hieronimo Bedlam. Exit
 FITZGRAVE Thou'rt a mad fellow indeed.
 Some comfort yet that hers is missing too;
 I feel my soul at much more ease: both stol'n.
 25 When griefs have partners, they are better borne. Exit

2.3 Enter whore-gallant [Tailby]
 TAILBY
 O, the parting of us twain,
 Hath caused me mickle pain,
 And I shall ne'er be married
 Until I see my muggle again.
 5 NEWCUT [appearing at her hiding place] Hist!
 [Enter Primero]
 PRIMERO Ha?
 NEWCUT The nimble gentleman in the celestial stockings!
 PRIMERO H'as the best smock-fortune to be beloved of 10 women.—
 Vallee loo lo lille lo lilo,
 Vallee loo lee lo lillo.

TAILBY
 Vallee loo lo lille lilo,
 Vallee loo lee lo lillo.
 NEWCUT Ah, sweet gentleman, he keeps it up stately.
 PRIMERO [to Tailby] Well held, i'faith, sir.—Mass, and 15 now I remember too, I think you ne'er saw my little banqueting box above since I altered it.
 TAILBY Why, have you altered that?
 PRIMERO O, divinely sir; the pictures are all new run over 20 again.
 TAILBY Fie!
 PRIMERO For what had the painter done, think you? Drew me Venus naked (which is the grace of a man's room, you know) and, when he had done, drew a number of oaken leaves before her. Had not lawn been a 25 hundred times softer, made a better show, and been more gentlewoman-like?
 TAILBY More ladylike, a great deal.
 PRIMERO Come, you shall see how 'tis altered now. I do not think but you'll like her. Exeunt 30

[Music within. A dicing-table is set forth. Then]
 2.4 enter all at once: [Primero, First and Second Courtesans, Goldstone, Novice, Pursenet, Tailby,
 Fripp, Bungler, Fulk, Arthur, and Pursenet's Boy]

PRIMERO Where be your liveries?
 FIRST COURTESAN They attend without.
 PRIMERO Go, call the coach! Gentlemen, you have excelled in kindness as we in boldness.
 TAILBY So, you think amiss, sir? 5
 GOLDSTONE
 Kind ladies, we commit you to sweet dreams,
 Ourselves unto the fortune of the dice.—
 Dice, ho!
 FIRST COURTESAN [aside to Tailby]
 You rest firm mine?
 TAILBY E'en all my soul to thee.
 [Exit First Courtesan]
 SECOND COURTESAN [aside to Tailby]
 You keep your vows?
 TAILBY Why, do I breathe or see? 10
 [Exit Second Courtesan]
 NOVICE [aside to Tailby]
 Is your love constant?
 TAILBY Ay, to none but thee.
 [Exeunt Novice and Primero]

2.2.14 fifth of November date of the 1605 Gunpowder Plot, in which a group of Catholics planned to blow up Parliament
 21 Hieronimo Bedlam A name doubly associated with insanity: Hieronimo goes insane in Thomas Kyd's Spanish Tragedy; and 'Bedlam', the Hospital of St Mary of Bethlehem, was an insane asylum.
 2.3.2 mickle much
 4 muggle a term of affection. The exact sense is unknown; perhaps a variant of migale, 'fieldmouse'.

8 smock-fortune luck with women
 10-11 Vallee loo...lillo Perhaps an imitation hunting call, as with a horn. It is Primero's signal to Tailby, who replies in kind.
 14 he...stately with a sexual equivocation
 17 banqueting box probably an alcove partitioned off for private entertainment, with banquet in the obsolete sense of a course of sweetmeats, fruit, and wine
 19 run over retouched (antedates OED's one

 25 lawn sheer linen
 2.4.0.1 Music within The editorial stage direction allows a space between Tailby and Primero leaving the stage and re-entering; it also sets the scene at the Mitre, where supper is drawing to a close within.
 1 liveries uniformed servingmen. Primero is maintaining the fiction that the courtesans are ladies of rank.

- Now gone? Ay, now I love nor them nor thee;
'Slife, I should be cloyed should I love one in three.
[Enter Fitzgrave, disguised as Bowser]
- PURSENET O, here's Master Bowser now.
15 FITZGRAVE Save you, sweet gentlemen.
TAILBY Sweet Master Bowser, welcome!
PURSENET [calling] When come these dice?
VINTNER [within] Anon, anon, sir.
PURSENET Yet 'anon, anon, sir.'
- 20 GOLDSTONE [aside to Fulk] Hast thou shown art in 'em?
FULK [aside to Goldstone]
You shall be judge, sir: here be the tavern beakers, [showing beakers concealed on his person] and here peep out the fine alchemy knaves, looking like—well, sir, most of our gallants, that seem what they are not.
25 GOLDSTONE [aloud] Peace, villain, am not I in presence?
FULK [aside to Goldstone] Why, that puts me in mind of the jest, sir.
GOLDSTONE [aloud] Again, you quarreler?
[They continue speaking aside]
FULK Nay, compare 'em, and spare 'em not.
GOLDSTONE
- 30 The bigness of the bore, just the same size;
the marks, no difference. Away, put money in thy pocket, and offer to draw in upon the least occasion.
FULK I am no babe, sir. [He starts to exit]
GOLDSTONE Hist!
- 35 FULK What's the matter now?
GOLDSTONE Give me a pair of false dice, e'er you go.
FULK Pox on't, you're so troublesome, too; you cannot remember a thing before. If I stay a little longer, I shall be stayed anon. [Exit]
[Enter Vintner]
- 40 VINTNER Here be dice for your worships.
PURSENET O, come, come.
GOLDSTONE The vintner himself! [To audience] I'll shift away these beakers by a sleight.
[He switches the beakers for counterfeit] VINTNER [seeing Goldstone handle the beakers] Master Goldstone!
- 45 GOLDSTONE How now, you conjuring rascal!
VINTNER Bless your good worship, you're in humours,
methinks.
GOLDSTONE Humours! Say that again.
50 VINTNER I said no such word, sir—[To audience] Would I had my beakers out on's fingers!
- GOLDSTONE What's thy name, vintner?
VINTNER Jack, an please your worship.
GOLDSTONE Turn knight like thy companions, scoundrel.
Live upon usury; wear thy gilt spurs at thy girdle for fear of slubbering. 55
VINTNER O no, I hope I shall have more grace than so, sir.
Pray, let me help your worship.
GOLDSTONE Cannot I push 'em together without your help?
VINTNER O, I beseech your worship; they're the two standards of my house. 60
GOLDSTONE Standards! There lie your standards.
[He gives the Vintner the counterfeit beakers] VINTNER Good, your worship. [To audience] I am glad they are out of his fingers. My wife shall lock 'em up presently; they shall see no sun this twelve-month's day for this trick. 65
GOLDSTONE Let me come to the sight of your 'standards'
again.
VINTNER Your worship shall pardon me. Now you shall not see 'em in haste, I warrant ye. 70
[Exit Vintner with fake beakers]
GOLDSTONE I do not desire't. Ha, ha!
FITZGRAVE Why, Master Goldstone!
GOLDSTONE I am for you, gallants. Master Bowser, cry you mercy, sir; why supped you from us?
FITZGRAVE Faith, sir, I met with a couple of my fellow pupils at university, and so we renewed our acquaintance and supped together. 75
GOLDSTONE Fie, that's none of the newest fashion, I must tell you that, Master Bowser. You must never take acquaintance of any o' th' university when you are at London, nor any of London when you're at university. You must be more forgetful, i'faith; every place ministers his acquaintance abundantly. 80
BUNGLER He tells you true, sir.
GOLDSTONE I warrant you, here's a gentleman will ne'er commit such an absurdity. 85
BUNGLER Who, I? No, 'tis well known, if I be disposed I'll forget any man in a seven-night and yet look him in the face. Nay, let him ride but ten mile from me and come home again, it shall be at my choice whether I'll remember him or no. I have tried that. 90
GOLDSTONE This is strange, sir.
BUNGLER 'Tis as a man gives his mind to't, sir. And, now you bring me in, I remember 'twas once my fortune to be cozened of all my clothes and, with my clothes, my 95

13 cloyed clogged, burdened (not, presumably, 'satiated')

14 Bowser The name means 'college bursar'.

18 Anon, anon, sir Perhaps recalling I Henry IV 2.5.36–56, in which Hal and Poins tease a drawer.

21 beakers drinking vessels

23 alchemy knaves the fake beakers which Goldstone intends to switch for the Vintner's: alchemy because they are base metal that will be 'transformed' to silver or gold (compare the name Goldstone)

32 draw in i.e. join the dicing

39 stayed either 'prevented' or 'arrested'

47 humours an odd mood

54 Turn . . . companions James I had cheapened knighthood by selling the title; Goldstone is suggesting that other mere vintners have become knights. Probably also an allusion to Shakespeare's Sir Jack Oldcastle/Falstaff, especially in view of the joke on 'anon, anon, sir' at ll. 18–19.

55 gilt spurs the gaudy excess of newly-

made knights

56 slubbering muddying. The nouveaux knights won't wear their expensive new spurs on their boots for fear of getting them dirty.

61 standards vessels authorized as holding a full measure of drink

62 There lie your standards Plays on standards as objects that stand.

83 ministers his acquaintance looks after those it knows

- money. A poor shepherd, pitying me, took me in and relieved me.
- GOLDSTONE 'Twas kindly done of him, i'faith.
- BUNGLER Nay, you shall see, now: 'twas his fortune likewise, not long after, to come to me in much distress, i'faith, and with weeping eyes, and do you think I remembered him?
- GOLDSTONE You could not choose.
- BUNGLER By my troth, not I. I forgot him quite, and never remembered him to this hour.
- GOLDSTONE And yet knew who he was?
- BUNGLER As well as I know you, i'faith. 'Tis a gift giv'n to some above others.
- GOLDSTONE [to audience] To fools and knaves; they never miss on't.
- BUNGLER Does any make such a wonder at this? Why, alas, 'tis nothing to forget others; what say you to those that forget themselves?
- [Enter Fulk]
- GOLDSTONE Nay, then, to dice. Come, set me, gallants, set. [The gallants go to the table, and Pursenet's Boy picks their pockets the while]
- FRIP [standing aside from gamesters] Ay, fall to't, gentlemen. I shall hear some news from some of you anon. I have th'art to know which lose and ne'er look on; I'll be ready with all the worst money I can find about me.—Arthur!
- ARTHUR Here, sir.
- FRIP Stand ready.
- ARTHUR Fear not me, sir.
- GOLDSTONE [offering his dice to Tailby] These are mine, sir.
- FRIP [examining his coins] Here's a washed angel; it shall away. Here's Mistress Rose-noble Has lost her maidenhead—cracked in the ring. She's good enough for gamesters and to pass From man to man, for gold presents at dice Your harlot: in one hour won and lost thrice; Every man has a fling at her.
- TAILBY [losing at dice] Again!
- Pox of these dice!
- BUNGLER 'Tis ill to curse the dead, sir.
- PURSENET Mew!
- TAILBY Where should I wish the pox but among bones?
- FITZGRAVE He tells you right, sir.
- TAILBY I ne'er have any luck at these odd hands. None here to make us six? Why, Master Frip?
- FRIP I am very well here, I thank you, sir. I had rather be telling my money myself than have others count it for me. 'Tis the scurviest music in the world, methinks, to hear my money jingle in other men's pockets; I never had any mind to't, i'faith.
- TAILBY 'Slud, play six or play four; I'll play no more.
- GOLDSTONE 'Sfoot, you see there's none here to draw in.
- FULK Rather than you should be destitute, gentlemen, I'll play my ten pound—if my master's worship will give me leave.
- PURSENET Come.
- TAILBY He shall, he shall.
- GOLDSTONE Pray excuse me, gentlemen. [To Fulk] 'Sfoot! How now, Goodman rascal? What, because you served my grandfather when he went ambassador, and got some ten pound by th' hand, has that put such spirit in you to offer to draw in among gentlemen of worship, knave?
- TAILBY Pray, sir, let's entreat so much for once.
- PURSENET [to Goldstone] 'Tis a usual grace, i'faith, sir; you've many gentlemen will play with their men.
- BUNGLER Ay, and with their maids too, i'faith.
- PURSENET [to Goldstone] Good sir, give him leave.
- GOLDSTONE [to Fulk] Yes, come, an you be wary on't. I pray, draw near, sir.
- FULK Not so, sir.
- TAILBY Come, fool, fear nothing. I warrant thee; he's given thee leave. Stand here by me. Come, now. Set round, gentlemen, set.
- PURSENET How the poor fellow shakes!—Throw lustily, man.
- FULK At all, gentlemen.
- [He throws dice and wins]
- TAILBY Well said, i'faith.
- PURSENET They're all thine.
- TAILBY By my troth, I am glad the fellow has such luck; 'twill encourage him well.
- FULK [betting against Goldstone] At my master's worship alone.
- [Fulk throws and wins]
- GOLDSTONE Now, Sir Slave!
- FULK At my master's worship alone.

124 washed bathed in acid to dissolve gold off it, so of reduced value
angel a gold coin

125 Rose-noble a gold coin (noble) with a rose on it. Punningly taken as a woman's name (probably with Rose also in the sense 'vulva'). Throughout the play money that goes from hand to hand is likened to women who do the same.

126 cracked in the ring (a) of the coin: with a crack in the rim extending to the decorative ring around the rose, at which point the coin lost its value;

(b) of the woman: 'lost her maidenhead', with ring as 'vagina'. Proverbial (Dent, R130.1).

127 gamesters (a) wenchers, (b) gamblers

128 presents represents

131 'Tis... dead proverbial ('Speak well of the dead', Dent, D124)

Mew derisive exclamation

132 Where... bones A common curse was to wish the pox on someone's bones. Dice were made of bones.

134 these odd hands i.e. an odd number of card-hands, hence players. Tailby is superstitious about odd numbers.

141 'Slud 'God's blood', a severe oath

149 goodman form of address to someone below the rank of gentleman, often prefixed to his occupation, as in 'goodman tailor'

151 by th' hand right away

156 play Bungler's riposte brings out the sense 'have sexual play'.

167 At all Accompanies the throwing of dice to signal that the game is on and all are included.

168 Well said well done

- [Fulk throws and wins]
 GOLDSTONE So, saucy rascal!
 FULK At my master's worship alone.
 [Fulk throws and wins]
 GOLDSTONE You're a rogue and will ever be one!
 FULK By my troth, gentlemen, at all again, for once.
 [Fulk throws and wins]
 180 TAILBY Take 'em to thee, boy, take 'em to thee. Thou'rt worthy of 'em, i'faith.
 GOLDSTONE Gentlemen, faith, I am angry with you. Go and suborn my knave against me here, to make him proud and peremptory?
 185 TAILBY Troth, that's but your conceit, sir. The fellow's an honest fellow and knows his duty, I dare swear for him.
 PURSENET Heart, I am sick already. [He leaves the table]
 GOLDSTONE Whither goes Master—
 PURSENET Play on, I'll take my turn, sir. [Aside] Boy!
 190 BOY Master?
 PURSENET Pist.
 [The Boy secretly shows Pursenet the money he's stolen]
 A supply. Carry't closely, my little fogger. How much?
 BOY Three pound, sir.
 PURSENET Good boy. Take out another lesson. [Returning to the gallants] How now, gentlemen?
 195 TAILBY Devil's in't; did you e'er see such a hand?
 PURSENET I set you these three angels.
 BOY [to audience] My master may set high, for all his stakes are drawn out of other men's pockets.
 200 FULK As I said, gentleman?
 PURSENET Deuce, ace.
 FULK At all your right worshipful worships.
 [Fulk wins]
 ALL THE REST Death and vengeance!
 GOLDSTONE Hell, darkness!
 [Goldstone pretends to strike Fulk]
 205 TAILBY Hold, sir.
 PURSENET Master Goldstone!
 GOLDSTONE Hinder me not, sweet gentlemen.—You rascal!
 I banish thee the board.
 TAILBY I'faith, but you shall not, sir!
 210 GOLDSTONE Touch a die, an thou dar'st. Come you in with your lousy ten pound, you slave, among gentlemen of worship, and win thirty at a hand?
 TAILBY Why, will you kick against luck, sir?
 BUNGLER As long as the poor fellow ventures the loss of 215 his own money, who can be offended at his fortunes?
- FULK I have a master here! Many a gentleman would be glad to see his man come forward. [He is seized by Goldstone] Aha!
 PURSENET [to Goldstone] Pray, be persuaded, sir.
 GOLDSTONE 'Slife, here's none cuts my throat in play but 220
 he, I have observed it. An unluckly slave 'tis.
 BUNGLER Methinks his luck's good enough, sir.
 GOLDSTONE Upon condition, gentlemen, that I may ever bar him from the board hereafter, I am content to wink at him. 225
 PURSENET Faith, use your own pleasure hereafter; he's won our money now! [To Fulk] Come to th' table, sir, your master's friends with you.
 FULK Pray, gentlemen.
 TAILBY [to the audience, leaving the table] The fiend's in't, 230
 I think; I left a fair chain of pearl at my lodging too, like an ass, and ne'er remembered it; that would ha' been a good pawn now. [Offering his rapier, dagger, and hangers] Speak, what do you lend upon these, Master Frip? I care not much if you take my beaver hat, too, 235 for I perceive 'tis dark enough already, and it does but trouble me here.
 FRIP Very well, sir. Why, now I can lend you three pound,
 sir—
 TAILBY Prithree, do't quickly then. 240
 FRIP There 'tis in six angels.
 TAILBY Very compendiously.
 [He returns to the table]
 FRIP Here, Arthur; run away with these presently; I'll enter 'em into th' shop-book tomorrow.
 [Exit Arthur. Frip records the sale]
 245 Item, one gilt-hatched rapier and dagger, with a fair embroidered girdle, and hangers, with which came also a beaver hat, with a correspondent band.
 TAILBY [to Goldstone] Push! I'faith, sir, you're to blame;
 you have snibbed the poor fellow too much; he can scarce speak; he cleaves his words with sobbing. 250
 FULK Haf—Haf—Haf—Haf at all, gentlemen.
 [He throws and wins]
 GOLDSTONE Ah, rogue! I'll make you know yourself.
 FULK At the fairest.
 [He throw and loses]
 PURSENET Out, i'faith—two aces.
 GOLDSTONE I am glad of that. Come, pay me all these, 255
 goodman Cloak-bag.
 PURSENET Why, are you the fairest, sir?
 GOLDSTONE You need not doubt of that, sir. [To Fulk] Five angels, you scoundrel.

192 fogger person given to underhand practices for gain; engrosser

194 Take out another lesson go back to your studying (i.e. picking pockets)

196 Devil's in't proverbial (Dent, D250.111)

201 Deuce, ace Pursenet's bet on the dice: a two and a one

216 a master i.e. a fine master (sarcastic)

221 unluckly bringing ill luck, malicious.

Bungler takes Goldstone to mean that Fulk has ill luck himself.

224–5 wink at turn a blind eye to

242 compendiously expeditiously

245 gilt-hatched gold-engraved

249 snibbed rebuked

252 make...yourself i.e. make you recognize your lowly status by making you lose you winnings. 'Know thyself' was proverbial (Dent, K175).

253 At the fairest Evidently declares a game against the player with most money on the table.

256 Cloak-bag i.e. porter (named by what he carries)

- 260 TAILBY Fie o' these dice! Not one hand tonight.—There they go, gentlemen. At all, i'faith.
[He throws and loses]
PURSENET Pay all with two treys and a quatre.
TAILBY All curses follow 'em! Pay yourselves withal; I'll pawn myself to't, but I'll see a hand tonight. Not once 265 hold in? [Taking off his doublet] Here, Master Fripp, lend me your hand—quick, quick, so.
FRIPP What, do you borrow of this doublet now?
TAILBY Ne'er saw the world three days.
FRIPP Go to; in regard you're a continual customer, I'll use 270 you well and pleasure you with five angels upon't.
TAILBY
Let me not stand too long i'th' cold for them.
BUNGLER
Had ever country gentleman such fortune?
All swooped away! I'd need repair to th' brokers.
TAILBY If you be in that mind, sir, there sits a gentleman 275 will furnish you upon any pawn as well as the public'st broker of 'em all.
BUNGLER Say you so, sir? There's comfort in that, i'faith.
[He goes to Fripp]
FRIPP [recording] Item, upon his orange tawny satin doublet, five angels.
280 BUNGLER But by your leave, sir, next comes the britches—
FRIPP O, I have a tongue fit for anything—
BUNGLER Saving your tail, sir. 'Tis given me to understand that you are a gentleman i'th' hundred and deal in the premises aforesaid.
285 FRIPP Master Bungler, Master Bungler, you're mightily mistook. I am content to do a gentleman a pleasure for once, so his pawn be neat and sufficient.
BUNGLER Why, what say you to my grandfather's seal ring here?
290 FRIPP Ay, marry, sir; this is somewhat like.
BUNGLER Nay, view it well. An ancient arms, I can tell you.
FRIPP What's this, sir?
BUNGLER The great codpiece with nothing in't.
295 FRIPP How!
BUNGLER The word about it: 'Parturiunt montes'.
FRIPP What's that, I pray, sir?
BUNGLER 'You promise to mount us.'
FRIPP And belike he was not so good as his word.
- BUNGLER So it should seem by the story, for so our names came to be Bunglers.
FRIPP A lamentable hearing, that so great a house should shrink and fall to ruin.
[Bungler exchanges the ring for money and joins the table again]
PURSENET Two quates and yet lose it! Heart! [Aside] Boy, i'faith, what is't?
300 BOY Five pound, sir.
PURSENET [to audience] By my troth, this boy goes forward well. Ye shall see him come to his preferment i'th' end!
GOLDSTONE [looking at Tailby] Why, how now, who's that, gentlemen, a barge-man?
305 TAILBY I never have any luck, gallants, till my doublet's off; I'm not half nimble enough. At this old cinquanter driv'el-beard.
[He throws and loses]
FULK Your worship must pay me all these, sir.
TAILBY There, and feast the devil with 'em.
310 PURSENET Hell gnaw these dice.
GOLDSTONE What, do you give over, gallants?
FULK [aside to Goldstone] Is't not time?
TAILBY I protest I have but one angel left to guide me home to my lodging.
315 GOLDSTONE [aside to Fulk] How much, think'st?
FULK Some fourscore angels, sir.
GOLDSTONE Peace, we'll join powers anon and see how strong we are in the whole number. [To audience] Mass, yon gilt goblet stands so full in mine eye, the whoreson tempts me. It comes like cheese after a great feast, to digest the rest. He will hardly 'scape me, i'faith; I see that by him already.
320 [Enter Vintner]
Back for a parting blow now.—Boy!
VINTNER Anon, anon, sir.
325 GOLDSTONE Fetch a pennyworth of soft wax to seal letters.
VINTNER I will, sir. [Exit]
TAILBY Nay, had not I strange casting? Thrice together, two quates and a deuce.
PURSENET Why, was not I as often haunted with two treys and a quatre?
330 [Enter Vintner]
VINTNER There's wax for your worship.—Anon, anon, sir. [Exit]

262 two treys and a quatre two threes and a four

268 Ne'er . . . days i.e. not three days old

281 a . . . anything i.e. a taste for any sort of clothing. Bungler makes that claim into a dirty joke ('a tongue good for anything except the anus').

283 gentleman i'th' hundred Bungler's euphemism for usurer, converging (a) one who charges a percentage (part of a hundred) in interest, (b) a respectable country gentleman (since a 'hundred' was a subdivision of a shire)

290 this is somewhat like proverbial (Dent, S623.11)

296 'Parturiunt montes' 'The mountains are in labour'. The quotation, from Horace's Ars Poetica, was proverbial (Dent, M1215). It continues: ' . . . and a silly mouse will be born'. Bungler sees the engraved emblem of the opening mountain as a codpiece, and misunderstands the Latin motto.

298 mount us Bungler might understand this to mean 'raise us in honour' and miss its bawdy sense. Bungler can mean 'unperforming husband'.

299 so good as his word Plays on the proverb (Dent, W773.1) by turning word from 'promise' to 'motto'.

308 preferment promotion to a higher status or position

310 barge-man as would row a barge without his doublet

312 cinquant man of fifty or more (hence drivel-beard). Probably puns on cinque-quatre, the numbers four and five on the dice.

316 Hell gnaw these dice Based on proverbial 'Hell gnaw his bones' (Dent, B527.10, queried).

325 full prominent (playing on the sense 'full of drink')

- GOLDSTONE [to Fulk] Screen me a little, you whoreson old crossbiter.
 [Goldstone uses wax to stick the goblet beneath the table]
- 340 FULK Why, what's the business? Filchiton, Hobgoblit.
 PURSENET And what has Master Bowser lost?
 FITZGRAVE Faith, not very deeply, sir; enough for a scholar, some half a score royals.
 PURSENET 'Sfoot, I have lost as many with spurs at their heels.
- 345 [Enter Vintner and two drawers]
 GOLDSTONE Come, gallants, shall we stumble?
 TAILBY What's o'clock?
 DRAWER [to the other] Here's none on't, Dick; the goblet's carried down.
- 350 GOLDSTONE [to Tailby] Nay, 'tis upon the point of three.— Boy, drawer, what's to be done, sirs?
 VINTNER All's paid, and your worships are welcome; only there's a goblet missing, gentlemen, and cannot be found about house.
- 355 GOLDSTONE How, a goblet?
 PURSENET What manner o' one?
 VINTNER A gilt goblet, sir, of an indifferent size.
 GOLDSTONE 'Sfoot, I saw such a one lately.
 VINTNER It cannot be found now, sir.
- 360 GOLDSTONE Came there no strangers here?
 VINTNER No, sir.
 GOLDSTONE This' a marvellous matter, that a goblet should be gone, and none but we in the room. The loss is near all here as we are. Keep the door, vintner.
- 365 VINTNER No, I beseech your worship.
 GOLDSTONE By my troth, vintner, we'll have a privy search for this. What? We are not all one woman's children.
 VINTNER I beseech ye, gentlemen, have not that conceit of me that I suspect your worships.
- 370 GOLDSTONE Tut, you are an ass. Do you know every man's nature? There's a broker i'th' company.
 PURSENET [aside to his Boy] 'Slife, you have not stole the goblet, boy, have you?
 BOY Not I, sir.
- 375 PURSENET I was afraid. [To the others] 'Tis a good cause, i'faith. Let each man search his fellow.—We'll begin with you.
 [He searches his Boy]
 TAILBY I shall save somebody a labour, gentlemen, for I'm half searched already.
- 380 PURSENET I thought the goblet had hung here, i'faith. None here, nor here.
- GOLDSTONE Seek about' floor. What was the goblet worth, vintner?
 VINTNER Three pound ten shillings, sir. No more.
 GOLDSTONE Pox on't, gentlemen, 'tis but angels apiece; it shall be a brace of mine rather than I would have our reputations breathed upon by all comers; for you must think they'll talk on't in all companies: such a night, in such a company, such a goblet. 'Sfoot, it may grow to a gangrene in our credits and be incurable.
- 385

- TAILBY Faith, I am content.
 FRIP So am I.
 PURSENET There's my angel, too.
 GOLDSTONE So, and mine. [To Vintner] I'll tell thee what: the missing of this goblet has dismayed the gentlemen much.
 VINTNER I am sorry for that, sir.
 GOLDSTONE [Giving the Vintner the money he's collected] Yet they send thee this comfort by me. If they see thee but rest satisfied and depart away contented, which will appear in thy countenance, not three times thrice the worth of the goblet shall hang between them and thee, both in their continual custom and all their acquaintances.
 VINTNER I thank their worships all. I am satisfied.
 GOLDSTONE Say it again.—Do you hear, gentlemen?
 VINTNER I thank your worships all. I am satisfied.
 [Exeunt Vintner and drawers]
 GOLDSTONE Why, la, was not this better than hazarding our reputations upon trifles, and in such public as a tavern, such a questionable place?
 TAILBY True.
 PURSENET Faith, it was well thought on.
 GOLDSTONE Nay, keep your way, gentlemen.—I have sworn, Master Bowser, I will be last, i'faith.
 [Exeunt all but Goldstone and Fulk]
 Rascal, the goblet.
 FULK Where, sir?
 GOLDSTONE Peep yon, sir, under.
 FULK [finding the goblet under the table] Here, sir.
 [Exeunt Goldstone and Fulk]
- Finis Actus Secundus*
- In the midst of the music, enter one [Mistress Cleveland's Servant] bringing in a suit of satin; knocks at Tailby's door. Enter his man [Jack]*
- JACK Who knocks?
 MISTRESS CLEVELAND'S SERVANT A Christian. Pray, is not this Master Tailby's lodging? I was directed hither.

339 crossbiter swindler, accomplice in swindling

340 Filchiton, Hobgoblit Probably imitation thieving cant. Filchiton is based on filch, 'steal, pilfer'. Hobgoblit is an alteration of hobgoblin playing on goblet. Fulk jestingly invokes a mischievous spirit to cheer on Goldstone's thievery.

343 royals coins worth ten shillings or half of a pound sterling; Fitzgrave is casually estimating that he's lost five pounds

344–5 spurs...heels i.e. spur-royals, coins worth fifteen shillings

364 Keep secure, lock

367 one woman's children i.e. equally honest

386 brace pair

Interim 1.0.1 In...music In the Blackfriars theatre where the play was originally performed, a musical interlude was regularly performed between acts. Here, exceptionally, the music is interrupted by the episodes identified in this edition as entr'acte scenes (i.e. scenes performed during the interlude).

JACK Yes, this is my master's lodging.
 5 MISTRESS CLEVELAND'S SERVANT Cry you mercy, sir. Is he yet stirring?
 JACK He's awake, but not yet stirring, for he played away half his clothes last night.
 MISTRESS CLEVELAND'S SERVANT My mistress commends her secrets unto him and presents him, by me, with a new 10 satin suit here.
 JACK Mass, that comes happily.
 MISTRESS CLEVELAND'S SERVANT And she hopes the fashion will content him.
 15 JACK There's no doubt to be had of that, sir. Your mistress's name, I pray?
 [Mistress Cleveland's Servant whispers]
 You're much preciously welcome.
 MISTRESS CLEVELAND'S SERVANT I thank you uncommonly, sir.
 20 JACK The suit shall be accepted, I warrant you, sir.
 MISTRESS CLEVELAND'S SERVANT That's all my mistress desires, sir.
 JACK Fare you well, sir.
 MISTRESS CLEVELAND'S SERVANT Fare you well, sir. [Exit]
 25 JACK This will make my master leap out of the bed for joy, and dance Wigmore's Galliard in his shirt about the chamber. [Exit]

Interim 2 The music plays on a while, then enter Tailby, [and] his man [Jack] after, trussing him

TAILBY Came this suit from Mistress Cleveland?
 JACK She sent it secretly, sir.
 TAILBY A pretty, requiteful squall. I like that woman that can remember a good turn three months after the date;
 5 it shows both a good memory and a very feeling spirit.
 JACK This came fortunately, sir, after all your ill luck last night.
 TAILBY I'd beastly casting, Jack.
 JACK O, abominable, sir; you had the scurviest hand; the 10 old servingman swooped up all.
 TAILBY I am glad the fortune lighted upon the poor fellow. By my troth, 't made his master mad!

JACK Did you mark that, sir? I warrant he has the dogged'st master of any poor fellow under the dog-sign. I'd rather serve your worship—I'll say that behind your 15 back, sir—for nothing: as indeed I have no standing wages at all, your worship knows.
 TAILBY O, but your vails, Jack, your vails considered when you run to and fro between me and mistresses.
 JACK I must confess my vails are able to keep an honest 20 man, go I where I list.
 TAILBY Go to, then, Jack.
 JACK But those vails stand with the state of your body, sir; as long as you hold up your head. If that droop once, farewell you, farewell I, farewell all; and droop it will,
 25 though all the caudles in Europe should put to their helping hands to't. 'Tis e'en as uncertain as playing: now up, now down; for if the bill rise to above thirty, here's no place for players, so if your years rise to above 30 forty, there's no room for old lechers.
 TAILBY And that's the reason all rooms are taken up for young Templars?
 JACK You're in the right, sir.
 TAILBY Pize on't, I pawned a good beaver hat to Master Frip last night, Jack; I feel the want of it now.
 35 [Knocking within]
 Hark, who's that knocks?
 [Enter Mistress Newblock's Servant]
 MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT Is Master Tailby stirring?
 JACK What's your pleasure with him? He walks here i'th' hall.
 MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT [to Tailby] Give your worship
 40 good morrow.
 TAILBY Welcome, honest lad.
 MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT A letter from my mistress.
 TAILBY Who's thy mistress?
 MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT Mistress Newblock.
 45 TAILBY Mistress Newblock, my sincere love. How does she?
 MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT Faith, only ill in the want of your sight.
 TAILBY Alas, dear sweet, I've had such business; I protest I ne'er stood still since I saw her.
 50

13 fashion style

26 Wigmore's Galliard A galliard was a particularly energetic and spirited dance. The line may be a cue for Wigmore's Galliard to be played between the entr'acte episodes. It was a popular tune, and is extant; see Companion, p. 143.

Interim 2.0.1 music Another musical interlude suggesting the passage of time, in this case a sort of 'jump cut' in which the audience is to imagine that Tailby has awakened and Jack has begun to dress him in the newly delivered suit. See previous note.

0.2 trussing him fastening his clothes

1 Cleveland with the sexual innuendo

'place of cleaving, cleft'

3 squall little creature

4 turn in Tailby's bawdy sense, a sexual encounter

8 casting Refers to both throwing of dice and shedding clothes.

14 dogged'st most curriish, most cruel dog-sign The constellation Canis Major, held to be astrologically unlucky.

18 vails tips

24 hold up your head in the bawdy sense 'maintain your erection'

26 caudles warm medicinal drinks (and recipes for them)

26–7 put...to't proverbial (Dent, H97)

28 if...thirty A 1604 ordinance of the Privy Council required the closing of theatres when more than thirty deaths from plague were reported in a week.

32 Templars law students who took rooms at the Inner and Middle Temples or Inns of Court just west of the Blackfriars theatre. Tailby's joke—that the young Templars have all the women—presumably would have pleased many in his audience.

34 Pize probably a variant of 'pox'

37 stirring up and about (with a possible innuendo: 'engaged in sexual activity')

50 ne'er stood still have had no free time (with a bawdy play on stand as 'have an erection')

- MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT She has sent your worship
a beaver hat here, with a band best in fashion.
- TAILBY How shall I requite this dear soul?
- MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT 'Tis not a thing fit for me to 55 tell you, sir, for I have three years to serve yet. Your worship knows how, I warrant you.
- TAILBY I know the drift of her letter, and, for the beaver, say I accept it highly.
[He puts the letter in his pocket]
- MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT O, she will be a proud 60 woman of that, sir.
- TAILBY And hark thee, tell thy mistress, as I'm a gentleman, I'll dispatch her out of hand the first thing I do, o' my credit. Canst thou remember these words, now?
- MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT Yes, sir: as you are a 65 gentleman, you'll dispatch her out of hand the first thing you do.
- TAILBY Ay, o' my credit.
- MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT O, of your credit; I thought not of that, sir.
- 70 TAILBY Remember that, good boy.
- MISTRESS NEWBLOCK'S SERVANT Fear it not now, sir. [Exit]
- TAILBY I dreamt tonight, Jack, I should have a secret supply out o'th' city.
- JACK Your dream crawls out partly well, sir.
[Knocking within]
- 75 What news there now?
Enter another, [Mistress Tiffany's Servant]
- MISTRESS TIFFANY'S SERVANT I have an errand to Master
Tailby—
- JACK Yonder walks my master. [Exit Jack]
- MISTRESS TIFFANY'S SERVANT Mistress Tiffany commends
80 her to your worship, and has sent you your ten pound in gold back again, and says she cannot furnish you of the same lawn you desire till after All-Hallowtide—
- TAILBY Thank her she would let me understand so much.
[Exit Servant]
- 85 Ha! Ha! This wench will live. Why, this was sent like a workwoman now; the rest are botchers to her.
Faith, I commend her cunning. She's a fool
That makes her servant fellow to her heart;
It robs her of respect, dams up all duty,
Keeps her in awe e'en of the slave she keeps.
- 90 This takes a wise course; I commend her more:
Sends back the gold I never saw before.
- Well, women are my best friends, i'faith. Take lands;
give me
Good legs, firm back, white hand, black eye, brown hair,
And add but to these five a comely stature.
Let others live by art, and I by nature. 95
Exit. [The music concludes]
- ☉
- Actus Tertius* 3.1
- Enter Tailby reading [the] letter [he had put in his pocket]*
- TAILBY (reads) 'My husband is rode from home; make no delay. I know if your will be as free as your horse, you will see me yet ere dinner. From Kingston, this eleventh of November.'—Ha! These women are such creatures, 5 such importunate sweet souls, they'll scarce give a man leave to be ready. That's their only fault i'faith; if they be once set upon a thing, why, there's no removing of 'em till their pretty wills be fulfilled. O, pity thy poor oppressed client here, sweet Cupid, that has scarce six 10 hours' vacation in a month, his causes hang in so many courts; yet never suffer my French adversary nor his big-swollen confederates to overthrow me,
Who without mercy would my blood carouse
And lay me in prison—in a doctor's house.
Thy clemency, great Cupid.—Peace, who comes here? 15
[Enter Purset]
- PURSET Sir gallant, well encountered.
- TAILBY
I both salute and take my leave together.
- PURSET Why, whither so fast, sir?
- TAILBY
Excuse me, pray, I'm in a little haste;
My horse waits for me.
- PURSET What, some journey toward? 20
- TAILBY A light one, i'faith, sir.
- PURSET
I am sorry that my business so commands me
I cannot ride with you; but I make no question
You have company enough.
- TAILBY
Alas, not any—nor do I desire it. 25
Why, 'tis but to Kingston yonder.

58–9 highly . . . proud Both words suggest sexual arousal, and the fur hat may allude to the female genitals.

62 dispatch her out of hand A vague but loaded turn of phrase; she is to understand 'relieve her right away'.

73 out o'th' city from outside the city

79 Tiffany Meaning a kind of transparent silk. Compare the lawn (sheer linen) she can be expected to supply (l. Interim 82).

82 All-Hallowtide All Hallow's Day, the first of November

85 workwoman (a) woman who does needlework, (b) proficient working woman, expert at her trade

89 awe fear

3.1.0.2 Enter Tailby He will now be fully dressed and wearing his cloak, establishing that the location is now outdoors.

6–8 if . . . fulfilled Plays on thing as 'penis' and wills as 'vaginas'.

9–11 client . . . courts Tailby gives this legal terminology a bawdy turn.

11 my French adversary i.e. syphilis, the 'French disease'

12 big-swollen confederates i.e. prostitutes swollen with venereal disease. Perhaps also suggests another occupational hazard: a pregnant mistress.

21 light (a) slight, short; (b) bawdy, promiscuous

26 Kingston Because it had the first bridge west of London, Kingston-on-Thames was an important thoroughfare and a favourite hunting-ground for highwaymen.

PURSENET O, cry you mercy, sir.
 TAILBY 'Scape but one reach, there's little danger thither.
 PURSENET True, a little, of Coombe Park.
 TAILBY You've named the place, sir; that's all I fear, i'faith.
 PURSENET Farewell, sweet Master Tailby. [Exit Tailby]
 30 This fell out happily.
 I'll call this purchase mine before I greet him;
 E'en where his fear lies most, there will I meet him.
[He crosses the stage and disguises himself with a scarf]
 Boy.
[Enter Boy]
 BOY Sir?
 35 PURSENET Walk my horse behind yon thicket. Give a word if you descry.
 BOY I have all perfect, sir. [Exit Boy]
 PURSENET So, he cannot now be long. What, with my boy's dexterity at ordinaries and my gelding's celerity 40 over hedge and ditch, but we make pretty shift to rub out a gallant. For I have learned these principles: Stoop thou to th' world, 'twill on thy bosom tread; It stoops to thee if thou advance thy head.
 The mind being far more excellent than fate,
 45 'Tis fit our mind then be above our state.
 Why should I write my extremities in my brow, To make them loathe me that respect me now?
 If every man were in his courses known, Legs that now honour him might spurn him down.
 50 To conclude, nothing seems as it is but honesty, and that makes it so little regarded amongst us.
 BOY [within] Eela! Ha! Ho!
 PURSENET The boy! He's hard at hand; I'll cross him suddenly. And here he comes.
[Enter Tailby]
 55 Stand!
 TAILBY Ha!
 PURSENET Deliver your purse, sir.
 TAILBY I feared none but this place, i'faith. Nay, when my mind gives me a thing once—
 60 PURSENET Quick! Quick, sir, quick!
 I must dispatch three robberies yet ere night.
 TAILBY I'm glad you have such good doings, by my troth, sir.
 PURSENET You'll fare never a whit the better for your 65 flattery, I warrant you, sir.

TAILBY I speak sincerely. 'Tis pity such a proper-parted gentleman should want—nor shall you, as long as I have't about me.
[PurseNET begins to search Tailby, taking from him the chain of pearl, a purse, and a folded letter]
 Nay, search and spare not: there's a purse in my left pocket, as I take it, with fifteen pound in gold in't, and there's a fair chain of pearl in the other. Nay, I'll deal truly with you. It grieves me, i'faith, when I see such goodly men in distress; I'll rather want it myself than they should go without it.
 PURSENET And that shows a good nature, sir.
 75 TAILBY Nay, though I say it, I have been always accounted a man of a good nature; I might have hanged myself ere this time else. Pray, use me like a gentleman: take all, but injury not my body.
 PURSENET You must pardon me, sir, I must a little play the usurer and bind you, for mine own security.
 TAILBY Alas, there's no conscience in that, sir; shall I enter into bond and pay money too?
 PURSENET Tut, I must not be betrayed.
 TAILBY Hear me but what I say, sir: I do protest I would 85 not be he that should betray a man, to be prince of the world.
 PURSENET Mass, that's the devil, I thank you heartily, for he's called prince o' th' world.
 TAILBY You take me still at worst.
 90 PURSENET Swear on this sword, then, to set spurs to your horse, not to look back, to give no marks to any passenger.
 TAILBY Marks? Why, I think you have left me ne'er a penny, sir.
 95 PURSENET I mean no marks of any.
 TAILBY I understand you, sir.
 PURSENET Swear, then.
 TAILBY I'faith, I do, sir.
 PURSENET Away.
 100 TAILBY I'm gone, sir. [To audience] By my troth, of a fierce thief he seems to be a very honest gentleman. Exit
 PURSENET
 Why, this was well-adventured: trim a gallant!
 Now with a courteous and long-thirsting eye,
 Let me behold my purchase,
 105 And try the soundness of my bones with laughter.
 How! Is not this the chain of pearl I gave
 To that perjured harlot? 'Tis, 'sfoot, 'tis,
 The very chain! O, damnèd mistress! Ha!
 And this the purse which not five days before

92 marks signs (with a pun on the coin in Tailby's reply)

103 trim rob

111 spur-royals coins which bore an emblem resembling a spur and were worth five shillings more than a royal

The very gold! 'Slife, is this no robbery!
 How many oaths flew toward heaven,
 Which ne'er came halfway thither, but, like firedrakes,
 115 Mounted a little, gave a crack, and fell?—
 Feigned oaths bound up to sink more deep to hell.
 What folded paper's this? Death, 'tis her hand!
 'Master Tailby, you know with what affection I love you.'—You do?—'I count the world but as my prey to 120 maintain you.'—The more dissembling quean, you, I must tell you.—'I have sent you an embroidered purse here with fifty fair spur-royals in't,'—a pox on you for you labour, wench!—'and I desire you, of all loves, to keep that chain of pearl from Master Pursesnet's 125 sight.'—He cannot, strumpet; I behold it now, unto thy secret torture.—'So fare thee well, but be constant and want nothing.'—As long as I ha't, i'faith; methinks it should have gone so. Well, what a horrible age do we live in, that a man cannot have a quean to himself; 130 let him but turn his back, the best of her is chipped away like a court loaf, that when a man comes himself, h'as nothing but bombast; and these are two simple chippings here. Does my boy pick and I steal to enrich myself, to keep her, to maintain him? Why, this is 135 right the sequence of the world: a lord maintains her, she maintains a knight, he maintains a whore, she maintains a captain. So, in like manner, the pocket keeps my boy, he keeps me, I keep her, she keeps him;
 it runs like quicksilver from one to another. 'Sfoot, I 140 perceive I have been the chief upholder of this gallant all this while. It appears true: we that pay dearest for our pasture are ever likely worse used. 'Sfoot, he has a nag can run for nothing, has his choice, nay, and gets by the running of him. O, fine world, strange devils, 145 and pretty, damnable affections.

BOY [within] Lela! Ha! Ho!
 PURSENET The boy again.
 [Enter Boy]
 What news there?
 BOY Master! Pist, master!
 PURSENET How now, boy?
 BOY I have descried a prize.
 PURSENET Another, lad?
 BOY The gull. The scholar.
 PURSENET Master Bowser?
 BOY Ay, comes along this way.
 PURSENET Without company?
 BOY As sure as he is your own.
 PURSENET Back to thy place, boy.

[Exit Boy]

I have the luck today to rob in safety

Two precious cowards.—Whist! I hear him.

[Enter Fitzgrave, disguised as Bowser]

Stand!

160

FITZGRAVE You lie. I came forth to go.

PURSENET

Deliver your purse.

FITZGRAVE 'Tis better in my pocket.

PURSENET

How now, at disputations, Signor Fool?

FITZGRAVE

I've so much logic to confute a knave, a thief, a rogue.[He overpowers Pursesnet, whose scarf slips from his face]

PURSENET

Hold! Hold, sir, an you be a gentleman; hold, let me rise.

165

FITZGRAVE [to audience]Heart, 'tis the courtesy of his scarf unmasked him to
 me

Above the lip by chance. I'll counterfeit.

[To Pursesnet] Light, because I am a scholar! You think belike that scholars have no mettle in 'em, but you shall find—

170

[Pursesnet tries to run]

I have not done with you, cousin.

PURSENET

As you're a gentleman—

FITZGRAVE

As you're a rogue!

PURSENET

Keep on upon your way, sir.

FITZGRAVE

You bade me stand.

PURSENET

I have been once down for that.

FITZGRAVE

And then deliver.

PURSENET

Deliver me from you, sir.—O, pox on't, He's wounded me! Eela! Ha! Ho! My horse! My horse, boy!

175

[Exit, running, leaving the letter behind]

FITZGRAVE

Have you your boy so ready? O, thou world,
 How art thou muffled in deceitful forms!
 There's such a mist of these, and still hath been,
 The brightness of true gentry is scarce seen.
 180 This journey was most happily assigned;
 I have found him dross both in his means and mind.
 What paper's this he dropped? I'll look on't as I go.[Exit]114 fire-drakes fireworks120 quean prostitute131 court loaf i.e. a loaf with the crusts or chippings (l. 98) cut off (implying that at court the best part of the bread is removed with the crust)

132 bombast literally 'cotton wool, stuffing'; describing the middle of the loaf141 we that pay dearest Ironic for a thief, unless he is caught.143 has his choice i.e. has the nag to ride whenever he wants144 him Emendation to 'her' would make Pursesnet's analogy clearer.

- 3.2 [Enter Pursenet and his Boy]
 PURSENET A gull call you him? Let me always set upon wise men; they'll be afraid of their lives; they have a feeling of their iniquities, and knows what 'tis to die with fighting. 'Sfoot, this gull lays on without fear or wit. How deep's it, say'st thou, boy?
 5 BOY By my faith, three inches, sir.
 PURSENET La, this was long of you, you rogue!
 BOY Of me, sir?
 PURSENET Forgive me, dear boy; my wound ached, and I
 10 grew angry. There's hope of life, boy, is there not?
 BOY Pooh, my life for yours.
 PURSENET A comfortable boy in man's extremes! I was ne'er so afraid in my life but the fool would have seen my face; he had me at such advantage he might have commanded my scarf. I 'scaped well there; 't'ad choked me;
 15 My reputation had been past recovery;
 Yet live I unsuspected and still fit
 For gallants' choice societies. But here I vow, 20 If e'er I see this Bowser when he cannot see me—
 Either in by-lane, privilege place, court-alley—
 Or come behind him when he's standing high,
 Or take him when he reels from a tavern late,
 Pissing again a conduit, wall, or gate;
 25 When he's in such a plight, and clear from men,
 I'll do that I am ashamed to speak till then. [Exeunt]
- 3.3 Enter [Fitzgrave and] two [Gentleman-Gallants] FITZGRAVE Nay, read forward. I have found three of your gallants, like your bewitching shame, merely
 5 A GENTLEMAN-GALLANT [reading] 'Master Tailby—' FITZGRAVE That's he.
 A GENTLEMAN-GALLANT 'I count the world but as my prey to maintain you.'
 FITZGRAVE That's just the phrase and style of 'em all to 10 him; they meet all together in one effect, and it may well hold, too, for they all jump upon one cause: subaudi lechery.
 A GENTLEMAN-GALLANT
 What shapes can flattery take! Let me entreat you,
 Both in the virgin's right and our good hopes,
 15 Since your hours are so fortunate, to proceed.
- FITZGRAVE
 Why, he's base that faints until he crown his deed.
 Exeunt
- Enter [at one door] Pursenet [his arm bandaged] and [at another door] his First Courtesan 3.4
 PURSENET [to audience]
 See that dissembling devil, that perjured strumpet.
 FIRST COURTESAN
 Welcome, my soul's best wish!—O, out alas,
 Thy arm bound in a scarf? I shall swoon instantly.
 [She appears to faint]
 PURSENET Heart, and I'll fetch you again in the same tune:
 O, my unmatched love, if any spark of life
 5 Remain, look up, my comfort, my delight, my—
 FIRST COURTESAN
 O, good, O good!
 PURSENET [to audience]
 The organ of her voice is tuned again;
 There's hope in women when their speech returns.
 See, like the moon after a black eclipse,
 10 She by degrees recovers her pure light.—
 How cheers my love?
 FIRST COURTESAN
 As one new waked out of a deadly trance,
 The fit scarce quiet.
 PURSENET 'Twas terrible for the time;
 I'd much ado to fetch you.
 FIRST COURTESAN 'Shrew your fingers!
 15 How came my comfort wounded? Speak.
 PURSENET Faith, in a fray last night.
 FIRST COURTESAN
 In a fray? Will you lose your blood so vainly?
 Many a poor creature lacks it. Tell me, how?
 What was the quarrel?
 PURSENET Loath to tell you that.
 20 FIRST COURTESAN
 Loath to tell me?
 PURSENET Yet 'twas my cause of coming.
 FIRST COURTESAN
 Why then must not I know it?
 PURSENET Since you urge it, you shall:
 You're a strumpet.
 FIRST COURTESAN O, news abroad, sir!
 PURSENET Say you so?
 FIRST COURTESAN Why, you knew that the first night you
 25 lay with me.

3.2.7 long of you your fault

15–16 choked me Probably implying 'caused me to be hanged'.

2–3 merely sophistical utterly duplicitous

11 subaudi a Latin term telling the listener to supply in his or her mind the true word

3.4.4, 15 fetch you bring you round

7 O, good, O good Evidently she expects that the rhyme-word will be 'wife'. This prompts a quick recovery, perhaps because she doesn't want marriage.

15 'Shrew your fingers Pursenet has revived her by caressing her, or she exclaims at his injured fingers.

- PURSENET Nay, not to me only, but to the world.
 FIRST COURTESAN Speak within compass, man.
 PURSENET Faith, you know none; you sail without.
 FIRST COURTESAN I have the better skill, then.
 30 PURSENET At my first step into a tavern-room to spy that chain of pearl, wound on a stranger's arm, you begged of me.
 FIRST COURTESAN How, you mistook it, sure.
 PURSENET By heaven, the very self-same chain.
 35 FIRST COURTESAN O, cry you mercy, 'tis true; I'd forgot it:
 'tis St George's Day tomorrow; I lent it to my cousin only to grace his arm before his mistress.
 PURSENET Notable cunning.
 FIRST COURTESAN And is this all now, i'faith?
 40 PURSENET Not; I durst go further.
 FIRST COURTESAN Why, let me never possess your love if you see not that again o' Thursday morning. I take't unkindly, i'faith, you should fall out with me for such a trifle.
 45 PURSENET Better and better.
 FIRST COURTESAN Come, a kiss, and friends.
 PURSENET Away.
 FIRST COURTESAN By this hand, I'll spoil your arm an you will not.
 50 PURSENET More for this than the devil.
 [They kiss.]
 [Enter Goldstone, Tailby, Fitzgrave (disguised as Bowser), Bungler, Second Courtesan, and PurseNET's Boy]
 GOLDSTONE Yea, at your book so hard.
 PURSENET
 Against my will. [Aside, looking at Fitzgrave] Are you there, Signor Logic?
 A pox of you, sir.
 GOLDSTONE Why, how now? What has fate sent us here,
 55 in the name of Venus, goddess of Cyprus.
 PURSENET A freebooter's pink, sir, three or four inches deep.
 GOLDSTONE No more? That's conscionable, i'faith.
 TAILBY Troth, I'm sorry for't: pray, how came it, sir?
 PURSENET Faith, by a paltry fray in Coleman Street.
 60 FITZGRAVE [to audience] Coombe Park, he would say.
 PURSENET No less than three at once, sir, made a triangle with their swords and daggers, and all opposing me.
 FITZGRAVE And amongst those three, only one hurt you,
 sir?
 PURSENET Ex for ex. 65
 TAILBY Troth, and I'll tell you what luck I had, too, since
 I parted from you last.
 PURSENET What, I pray?
 TAILBY The day you offered to ride with me—I wish now I'd had your company—'sfoot, I was set upon in 70
 Coombe Park by three, too.
 PURSENET Bah!
 TAILBY Robbed, by this light, of as much gold and jewels
 as I valued at forty pound.
 PURSENET Sure Saturn is in the fifth house. 75
 TAILBY I know not that; he may be in the sixth an he will,
 for me. I am sure they were in my pocket, wheresoever they were; but I'll ne'er refuse a gentleman's company again when 'tis offered me, I warrant you.
 GOLDSTONE I must remember you 'tis Mitre night, ladies. 80 SECOND COURTESAN Mass, 'tis indeed Friday today; I'd quite forgot; when a woman's busy, how the time runs away.
 FIRST COURTESAN [aside to Tailby]
 O, you've betrayed us both.
 TAILBY I understand you not.
 FIRST COURTESAN
 You've let him see the chain of pearl I gave you.
 TAILBY
 Who? Him? Will you believe me? By this hand 85
 He never saw it.
 FIRST COURTESAN
 Upon a stranger's arm, he swore to me.
 TAILBY
 Mass, that may be, for the truth is, i'faith,
 I was robbed on't at Coombe Park.
 FIRST COURTESAN 'Twas that betrayed it. 90
 TAILBY Would I had stayed him;
 He was no stranger; he was a thief, i'faith,
 For thieves will be no strangers.
 FIRST COURTESAN How shall I excuse it?
 BUNGLER [catching the Boy, who was picking his pocket] Nay,
 I have you fast enough, boy. You rogue. 95
 BOY Good sir, I beseech you, sir, let me go.

27 within compass within limits, with restraint (proverbial: Dent, C577). In l. 28 'without [compass]' implies both 'without restraint' and, as the navigational compass needle always points north, 'without constancy'.
 36 St George's Day 23 April. The excuse, alluding to the festivities held on that day, is all the more implausible as we are elsewhere told the month is November (see 2.2.14 and 3.1.2-5).

45-6 Better and better ... a kiss, and friends both proverbial (Dent, B329.11, F753)
 56 freebooter's plunderer's pink (a) hole cut for fashion, (b) stab wound
 59 Coleman Street known for its prosperous and law-abiding residents.
 65 Ex for ex Perhaps 'tit for tat'. Bullen asks, 'Can this expression mean ecce, for example?'. If so, ex might be short for ecce signum, 'behold the sign', 'here is the proof of it', perhaps playing on 'X' as the cross of Christian symbolism and the supposed shape of the exchanged wounds.

 75 Saturn is in the fifth house Astrology divides the heavens into twelve 'houses' and for each planet ascribes particular influence to two of these 'houses'; Saturn 'in the fifth house' is a gloomy astrological situation.
 80 remember remind

He thumps

BUNGLER A pickpocket! Nay, you shall, to Newgate, look you. [To PurseNET] Is this your boy, sir?
 PURSENET How now, boy? A monster! Thy arm limed fast
 100 in another's pocket? Where learned you that manners? What company have you kept alate that you are so transformed into a rogue? That shape I know not. [To Bungler] Believe me, sir, I much wonder at the alteration of this boy, where he should get this nature. As good a 105 child to see, too, and as virtuous; he has his creed by heart, reads me his chapter duly every night; he will not miss you one title in the nine commandments.
 BUNGLER There's ten of 'em.
 PURSENET I fear he skips o'er one: 'thou shalt not steal'.
 110 BUNGLER Mass, like enough.
 PURSENET
 Else grace and memory would quite abash the boy.— Thou graceless imp! Ah, thou prodigious child Begot at some eclipse, degenerate rogue, Shame to thy friends, and to thy master eke;
 115 How far digressing from the noble mind Of thy brave ancestors that lie in marble With their coat-armours o'er 'em!
 BUNGLER Had he such friends?
 PURSENET The boy is well descended, though he be a rogue and has no feeling on't. Yet for my sake and for my reputation's, seek not the blood of the boy; he's near allied to many men of worship now yet living; a fine old man to his father; it would kill his heart, i'faith; he'd away like a chrisom.
 120 BUNGLER Alas, good gentleman.
 PURSENET [to the Boy]
 Ah, shameless villain, complain'st thou? Dost thou want?
 BOY No, no, no, no.
 PURSENET
 Art not well clad? thy hunger well resisted?
 BOY Yes, yes, yes, yes.
 PURSENET
 But thou shalt straight to Bridewell.
 130 BOY Sweet master!
 PURSENET
 Live upon bread and water, and chap-choke.

BOY I beseech your worship!
 BUNGLER Come, I'll be his surety for once.
 PURSENET You shall excuse me indeed, sir.
 BUNGLER He will mend; a may prove an honest man for 135 all this. I know gallant gentlemen now that have done as much as this comes to in their youth.
 PURSENET Say you so, sir?
 BUNGLER And as for Bridewell, that will but make him worse; a will learn more knavery there in one week 140 than will furnish him and his heirs for a hundred year.
 PURSENET Deliver the boy?
 BUNGLER Nay, I tell you true, sir, there's none goes in there a quean but she comes out an arrant whore, I warrant you.
 145 PURSENET The boy comes not there for a million.
 BUNGLER No, you had better forgive him by ten parts.
 PURSENET True, but a must not know it comes from me. [To Boy] Down o' your knees, you rogue, and thank this gentleman has got your pardon.
 150 BOY [to Bungler] O, I thank your worship.
 PURSENET [aside to Boy] A pox on you for a rogue; you put me to my set speech once a quarter.
 GOLDSTONE [to the other gallants] Nay, gentlemen, you quite forget your hour. Lead, Master Bowser.
 155
Exeunt all but Goldstone and [Second] Courtesan
 SECOND COURTESAN Let me go; you're a dissembler.
 GOLDSTONE How?
 SECOND COURTESAN Did not you promise me a new gown?
 GOLDSTONE Did I not? Yes, faith, did I, and thou shalt have it. [Calling offstage] Go, sirrah, run for a tailor presently.—Let me see, for the colour now: orange tawny? peach colour? What say'st to a watchet satin?
 160 [Enter Tailor]
 SECOND COURTESAN O, 'tis the only colour I affect.
 TAILOR A very orient colour, an't please your worships; I made a gown on't for a gentlewoman t'other day, and it does passing well upon her.
 165 GOLDSTONE A watchet satin gown—
 TAILOR There your worship left, sir.
 GOLDSTONE Laid about, tailor—
 TAILOR Very good, sir.
 170 GOLDSTONE With four fair laces.
 TAILOR That will be costly, sir.

97 Newgate the most famous of London's prisons, and the way-station to the gallows at Tyburn
 99 A monster The conjunction of Bungler and the Boy is seen as a strange and unnatural beast. There is a suggestion that the hand in the pocket is an act of sexual deviance.
limed caught, as with birdlime smeared on twigs to catch birds with its stickiness. The catcher has become the caught, for more usually a thief would be said to take his plunder with limed fingers.

106 chapter of the Bible
 107 title heading; i.e. one commandment
 112 prodigious of unnatural and ominous birth, monstrous
 114 eke archaic word for 'also'. PurseNET's feigned horror is reflected in his overly traditional diction.
 115 digressing departing, transgressing
 116 in marble represented in marble funeral statuary
 117 coat-armours coats of arms
 118 friends relatives
 124 a chrisom an infant who dies. Presumably suggests a quiet and unexpected 'cot death'.

 130 Bridewell a prison
 131 chap-choke chaps were cheeks; hence 'choke on your own caved-in cheeks'
 146 the...million proverbial ('not for a million', Dent, M963.11)
 147 by ten parts i.e. it would be ten times better
 150 has that has 161-2 orange tawny orange-brown
 162 watchet light blue
 164 orient lustrous
 168 There your worship left that's where your worship left off

175 GOLDSTONE How, you rogue, costly? Out o'th' house, you slip-shod, sham'-legged, brown-thread, penny-skeined rascal.

[He chases the Tailor away]

SECOND COURTESAN Nay, my sweet love.

GOLDSTONE Hang him, rogue; he's but a botcher neither. Come, I'll send thee a fellow worth a hundred of this if the slave were clean enough. Exeunt

Finis Actus Tertius

4.1

Actus Quartus

[During the music, a cloak is set on the stage.]

Enter Goldstone, calling 'Master Bowser'

GOLDSTONE Master Bowser, Master Bowser! Ha, ha, ho! Master Bowser!

FITZGRAVE [within] Holla!

GOLDSTONE What, not out of thy kennel, Master Bowser?

5 FITZGRAVE [within] Master Goldstone, you're an early gallant, sir!

GOLDSTONE [to audience] A fair cloak yonder, i'faith.—By my troth, abed, Master Bowser? You remember your promise well o'ernight!

10 FITZGRAVE [within] Why, what's o'clock, sir?

GOLDSTONE Do you ask that now? Why, the chimes are spent at St Bride's.

FITZGRAVE [within] 'Tis a gentleman's hour. Faith, Master Goldstone, I'll be ready in a trice.

15 GOLDSTONE Away, there's no trust to you.

FITZGRAVE [within] Faith, I'll come instantly.

GOLDSTONE [aside] Nay, choose whether you will or no; by my troth, your cloak shall go before you.

20 FITZGRAVE [within] Nay, Master Goldstone, I ha' sworn—do you hear, sir?

GOLDSTONE Away, away! Faith, I'm angry with you: pox, abed now! I'm ashamed of it.

[Exit Goldstone with the cloak]

[Enter Fitzgrave, in his shirt]

FITZGRAVE Foot, my cloak! My cloak! Master Goldstone, 'slife, what mean you by this, sir? You'll bring it back 25 again, I hope. [Getting no response] No, not yet? By my troth, I care very little for such kind of jesting; methinks this familiarity now extends a little too far—unless it be a new fashion come forth this morning secretly; yesterday 'twould have shown unmannerly and saucily.

30 I scarce know yet what to think on't. Well, there's no great profit in standing in my shirt; I'll on with my clothes; he's bound me to follow the suit. My cloak's a stranger; he was made but yesterday, and I do not love to trust him alone in company. Exit

Enter Frip [wearing Fitzgrave's cloak]

4.2

FRIP What may I conjecture of this Goldstone? He has not only pawned to me this cloak, but the very diamond and sapphire which I bestowed upon my new love at Master Primero's house. The cloak's new, and comes fitly to do me great grace at a wedding this morning to which I was solemnly invited. I can continue change more than the proudest gallant of 'em all; yet never bestow penny of myself, my pawns do so kindly furnish me. But the sight of these jewels is able to cloy me, did I not preserve my stomach the better for the wedding dinner. A gift could never have come in a more patient hour, nor to be better digested. Is she proved false?—But I'll not fret today, nor chafe my blood.

Enter Pursenet

PURSENET [to audience] Ha, yonder goes Bowser; the place is fit. [Calling offstage] Boy, stand with my horse at corner.—I owe you for a pink three inches deep, sir.

5

[He wounds Frip, who falls]

FRIP O, O, O!

PURSENET Take that in part of payment for Coombe Park!

10

FRIP O, O, O!

Exit [Pursenet]

Enter Fitzgrave, [disguised as Bowser]

FITZGRAVE How now, who's this? 'Sfoot, one of our gallants knocked down like a calf. Is there such a plague of 'em here at London they begin to knock 'em o'th' head already?

15

FRIP O, Master Bowser, pray, lend me your hand, sir; I am slain.

20

FITZGRAVE

Slain and alive? O, cruel execution!

What man so savage-spirited durst presume

To strike down satin on two taffetas cut,

Or lift his hand against a beaver hat?

FRIP [rising, with help from Fitzgrave]

Some rogue that owes me money, and had no other means

25

To a wedding dinner. I must be dressed myself,

methinks.

FITZGRAVE How! Why, this is my cloak! Life, how came my cloak hither?

FRIP Is it yours, sir? Master Goldstone pawned it to me this morning fresh and fasting, and borrowed five pound upon't.

Enter Fitzgrave, [at a distance, disguised as Bowser]

4.3 Enter Goldstone and [Bungler, meeting Marmaduke]
 BUNGLER How now, Marmaduke, what's the wager?
 MARMADUKE Nay, my care is at end, sir, now I am come to the sight of you. My mistress your cousin entertains you to take part of a dinner with her at home at her house,
 5 and bring what gentleman you please to accompany you.
 BUNGLER Thank my sweet coz; I'll munch with her, say.
 MARMADUKE I'll tell her so.
 BUNGLER Marmaduke.
 10 MARMADUKE Sir?
 BUNGLER Will there be any stock-fish, think'st thou?
 MARMADUKE How, sir?
 BUNGLER Tell my coz I've a great appetite to stock-fish, i'faith. [Exit Marmaduke]
 15 Master Goldstone, I'll entreat you to be the gentleman that shall accompany me.
 GOLDSTONE Not me, sir.
 BUNGLER You, sir.
 GOLDSTONE By my troth, concluded. What state bears thy 20 coz, sirrah?
 BUNGLER O, a fine merchant's wife—
 GOLDSTONE Or rather: a merchant's fine wife.
 BUNGLER Trust me, and that's the properer phrase here at London, and 'tis as absurd, too, to call him fine 25 merchant, for, being at sea, a man knows not what pickle he is in.
 GOLDSTONE Why, true—
 BUNGLER Yet my coz will be served in plate, I can tell you; she has her silver jugs and her gilt tankards.
 30 GOLDSTONE Fie!
 BUNGLER Nay, you shall see a house dressed up, i'faith; you must not think to tread o'th' ground when you come there.
 GOLDSTONE No? How then?
 35 BUNGLER Why, upon paths made of fig-frails and white blankets cut out in steaks.
 GOLDSTONE Away. [To audience] I have thought of a device.—Where shall we meet an hour hence?
 BUNGLER In Paul's.
 40 GOLDSTONE Agreed. Exit Bungler

FITZGRAVE
 The broker-gallant and the cheating-gallant;
 Now I have found 'em all. I so rejoice
 That the redeeming of my cloak I weigh not.
 I have spied him.
 GOLDSTONE Pox, here's Bowser. 45
 FITZGRAVE Master Goldstone, my cloak! Come, where's my cloak, sir?
 GOLDSTONE O, you're a sure gentleman, especially if a man stand in need of you; he may be slain in a morning to breakfast ere you vouchsafe to peep out of your lodging. 50 FITZGRAVE How!
 GOLDSTONE No less than four gallants, as I'm a gentleman, drew all upon me at once and opposed me so spitefully that I not only lost your cloak i'th' fray—
 FITZGRAVE [to audience] Comes it in there? 55
 GOLDSTONE But my rich hangers, sirrah; I think thou hast seen 'em.
 FITZGRAVE Never, i'faith, sir.
 GOLDSTONE Those with the two unicorns all wrought in pearl and gold? Pox on't; it frets me ten times more 60 than the loss of the paltry cloak. Prithee, an thou lov'st me, speak no more on't; it brings the unicorns into my mind, and thou wouldst not think how the conceit grieves me. I will not do thee that disgrace, i'faith, to offer thee any satisfaction, for in my soul I think thou 65 scorn'st it; thou bear'st that mind, in my conscience; I have always said so of thee. Fare thee well; when shall I see thee at my chamber, when?
 FITZGRAVE Every day, shortly.
 GOLDSTONE I have fine toys to show thee. 70
 FITZGRAVE You win my heart then. Exit Goldstone

On whose pale cheeks favour and fortune plays!
Call you these your five gallants? Trust me, they're rare fellows:
They live on nothing. Many cannot live on something;
Here they may take example. Suspectless virgin,
How easy had thy goodness been beguiled!

So to the world their base arts may be shown. Exit
- 4.4 Enter Pursenet and his Boy
PURSENET Art sure thou saw'st him receive't, boy?
BOY Forty pound in gold, as I'm a gentleman born.
PURSENET Thy father gave thee ram's-head, boy.
BOY No, you're deceived, my mother gave that, sir.
5 PURSENET What's thy mother's is thy father's.
Enter Piamont
BOY I'm sorry it holds in the rams-head. See, here he walks; I was sure he came into Paul's. The gold had been yours, master, long ere this, but that he wears both his hands in his pockets.
10 PURSENET How unfortunately is my purpose seated! What the devil should come in his mind to keep in his hands so long? The biting but of a paltry louse would do me great kindness now; I knew not how to requite
it. Will no rascal creature assist me? Stay! What if I did 15 impudently salute 'em out? Good. Boy, be ready, boy.
BOY Upon the least advantage, sir.
PURSENET [to Piamont] You're most devoutly met in Paul's,
sir.
PIAMONT So are you, but I scarce remember you, sir.
20 PURSENET O, I cry you mercy, sir; I pray pardon me. I fear
I have tendered an offence, sir; troth, I took you at the first for one Master Dumpling, a Norfolk gentleman.
PIAMONT There's no harm done yet, sir.
PURSENET [to audience] I hope he is there by this time.—
25 How now, boy, hast it?
BOY No, by troth, have I not; this labour's lost; 'tis in the right pocket, and he kept that hand in sure enough.
PURSENET [to audience] Unpractised gallant! Salute me but with one hand, like a counterfeit soldier?
30 O, times and manners! Are we grown beasts?
Do we salute by halves? Are not our limbs at leisure?
Where's comely nurture, the Italian kiss,
- Or the French cringe with the Polonian waist? Are all forgot?
Then misery follows. Surely fate forbade it;
Had he employed but his right hand, I'd had it. 35
[Enter Bungler]
It must be an everlasting device, I think, that procures both his hands out at once.
[He feigns a swoon, Piamont and Bungler go to assist him, and the Boy picks Piamont's pocket]
[Exeunt Pursenet and Boy]
PIAMONT [to Bungler] Do you walk, sir?
BUNGLER No, I stay a little for a gentleman's coming too.
PIAMONT Farewell then, sir; I have forty pound in gold 40 about me, which I must presently send down into the country.
BUNGLER Fare you well, sir. [Exit Piamont]
I wonder Master Goldstone spares my company so long;
'tis now about the navel of the day, upon the belly of 45
noon.
Enter Goldstone and his man [Fulk], disguised both GOLDSTONE [aside to Fulk] See where he walks; be sure you let off at a twinkling now.
FULK [aside to Goldstone] When did I miss you? [Aloud to Goldstone] Your worship has forgot; you promised 50 Mistress Newcut, your cousin, to dine with her this day.
GOLDSTONE Mass, that was well remembered.
BUNGLER I am bold to salute you, sir.
GOLDSTONE Sir. 55
BUNGLER Is Mistress Newcut your cousin, sir?
GOLDSTONE Yes, she's a cousin of mine, sir.
BUNGLER Then I am a cousin of yours by the sister's side.
GOLDSTONE Let me salute you then; I shall be glad of your 60 farther acquaintance.
BUNGLER I am a bidden guest there, too.
GOLDSTONE Indeed, sir.
BUNGLER Faith, invited this morning.
GOLDSTONE Your good company shall be kindly embraced,
65 sir.
BUNGLER I walk a turn or two here for a gentleman, but I think he'll either overtake me or be before me.
GOLDSTONE 'Tis very likely, sir. [Giving money to Fulk]
There, sirrah; go to dinner, and about two wait for 70 me.

- BUNGLER Nay, let him come between two and three, cousin, for we love to sit long at dinner i'th' City.
[Exit Fulk]
- GOLDSTONE Come, sweet cousin.
- BUNGLER Nay, cousin; keep your way, cousin. Good cousin, I will not, i'faith, cousin. Exeunt
- 4.5 Enter Mistress Newcut and Marmaduke, [who is setting the dinner table]
- NEWCUT Why, how now, sirrah, upon twelve of the clock and not the cloth laid yet? Must we needs keep Exchange time still?
- MARMADUKE I am about it, forsooth.
- 5 NEWCUT You're 'about it, forsooth'! You're still about many things, but you ne'er do one well. I am an ass to keep thee in th' house now my husband's at sea; thou hast no audacity with thee, a foolish dreaming lad, fitter to be in the garret than in any place else; no grace nor manly behaviour. When didst thou ever come to me but with thy head hanging down? O, decheerful prentice, uncomfortable servant! [Exit Marmaduke]
- 10 Pray heaven the gull my cousin has so much wit left as to bring Master Tailby along with him—my comfort, my delight—for that was the chiefest cause I did invite him. I bade him bring what gentleman he pleased to accompany him; as far as I durst go. Why may he not then make choice of Master Tailby? Had he my wit or feeling he would do't.
- 15 Enter Bungler and Goldstone, disguised
- 20 BUNGLER Where's my sweet cousin here? Does she lack any guests?
- NEWCUT Ever such guests as you; you're welcome, cousin.
- GOLDSTONE I am rude, lady.
- NEWCUT You're most welcome, sir.
- 25 BUNGLER There will be a gallant here anon, coz; he promised faithfully.
- NEWCUT Who is't? Master Tailby?
- BUNGLER Master Tailby? No, Master Goldstone.
- NEWCUT Master Goldstone? I could think well of that
- 30 Goldstone were't not for one vile trick he has.
- GOLDSTONE What's that, lady?
- NEWCUT In jest he will pawn his punks for suppers.
- GOLDSTONE That's a vile part in him, i'faith, an he were my brother.
- 35 NEWCUT Pray, gentlemen, sit awhile; your dinner shall come presently. [Exit]
- GOLDSTONE [to audience]
- Yea, Mistress Newcut, at first give me a trip? A close bite always asks a secret nip.
- BUNGLER My cousin here is a very kind-natured soul, i'faith, in her humour.
- 40 GOLDSTONE Pooh, you know her not so well as I, coz; I have observed her in all her humours. You ne'er saw her a little waspish, I think.
- BUNGLER I have not i'faith.
- GOLDSTONE Pooh, then ye ne'er saw pretty humour in your life. I can bring her into't when I list.
- 45 BUNGLER Would you could, i'faith.
- GOLDSTONE Would I could? By my troth, an I were sure thou couldst keep thy countenance, coz, what a pretty jest have I thought upon already to entertain time before dinner.
- 50 BUNGLER Prithee, coz, what is't? I love a jest o' life, i'faith.
- GOLDSTONE Ah, but I am jealous you will not keep your countenance, i'faith.
- BUNGLER Why, ye shall see a pretty story of a humour.
- 55 GOLDSTONE Faith, I'll try you for once. You know my cousin will wonder when she comes in to see the cloth laid and ne'er a salt upon the board.
- BUNGLER That's true, i'faith.
- GOLDSTONE [taking the silver salt-cellar] Now will I stand a while out of sight with it, and give her humour play a little.
- 60 BUNGLER Coz, dost thou love me? An thou wilt ever do anything for me, do't.
- GOLDSTONE Marry, I build upon your countenance.
- 65 BUNGLER Why, dost thou think I'm an ass, coz?
- GOLDSTONE I would be loathe to undertake it else, for if you should burst out presently, coz, the jest would be spoiled.
- 70 BUNGLER Why, do not I know that? Away, stand close. So, so. Mum, cousin! [Exit Goldstone with salt-cellar]
- A merry companion, i'faith; here will be good sport anon.
- [Enter Mistress Newcut]
- Whist, she comes!
- NEWCUT I make you stay long for a bad dinner here, cousin; if Master Goldstone were come, the meat's e'en ready.
- 75 BUNGLER Some great business detains him, cousin, but he'll not be long now.
- NEWCUT Why, how now? Cud's my life—
- 80 BUNGLER Why?
- NEWCUT Was ever mistress so plagued with a shittle-headed servant? Why, Marmaduke!
- MARMADUKE [within] I come, forsooth.
- NEWCUT Able to shame me from generation to generation.
- 85 [Enter Marmaduke]
- MARMADUKE Did you call, forsooth?

75 I will not, i'faith Bungler is being polite and refusing to go before Goldstone—but Goldstone doesn't know the way.

 a salt, a salt, a salt, a salt?
 MARMADUKE How many salts would you have? I'm sure I set the best i'th' house upon the board.
- BUNGLER How, cousin?—(Sings) Cousin, cousin, did call cozen.
- 95 NEWCUT Did you see a salt upon the board when you came
 in?
 BUNGLER [bursting out in a laugh] Pooh!
 NEWCUT Come, come; I thought as much. Beshrew your fingers, where is't now?
- 100 BUNGLER Your cousin yonder—
 NEWCUT Why, the man's mad.
 BUNGLER [calling offstage] Cousin! Hist, cousin!
 NEWCUT What say you?
 BUNGLER Pooh, I call not you; I call my cousin. Come 105 forth with th' salt, cousin. [Looking offstage] Ha? How?
 Nobody? Why, was not he that came in e'en now your cousin?
 NEWCUT My cousin? O, my bell-salt! O, my great bell-salt!
Enter Goldstone [as himself]
- BUNGLER The tenor bell-salt. O, here comes Master Gold-110 stone now, cousin; he may tell us some news on him.
 [To Goldstone] Did you not meet a fellow about door,
 with a great silver salt under his arm?
 GOLDSTONE No, sure, I met none such.
 NEWCUT Pardon me, sir; I forgot all this while to bid 115 you welcome. I shall loathe this room for ever. [To Marmaduke] Take hence the cloth, you unlucky maple-faced rascal. [Exit Marmaduke]
 Come, you shall dine in my chamber, sir.
 GOLDSTONE No better place, lady.
Exeunt [Newcut and Goldstone
by one door, Bungler by another]
- 4.6 Enter Piamont
 PIAMONT No less than forty pound in fair gold at one lift! The next shall swoon and swoon again till the devil fetch him, ere I set hand to him. Heart, nothing vexes me so much but that I paid the goldsmith for the 5 change, too, not an hour before. Had I left it alone in the chain of silver as it was at first, it might have given me some notice at his departure. 'Sfoot, I could fight with
- a windmill now. Sure 'twas some unlucky villain. Why should he come and salute me wrongfully too, mistake me at noonday? Now I think on't in cold blood, it could 10 not be but an induction to some villainous purpose.
 Well, I shall meet him.
Enter Pursenet
 PURSENET [to audience] This forty pound came fortunately to redeem my chain of pearl from mortgage. I would not 15 care how often I swooned to have such a good caudle to comfort me; gold and pearl is very restorative.
 PIAMONT [to audience] See, yonder's the rogue I suspect for foul play. I'll walk muffled by him, offer some offence or cause of a quarrel, only to try his temper. If he be 20 a coward, he's the likelier to be a rogue—an infallible
 note.
 [He muffles himself, then bumps into Pursenet] PURSENET What? A pox ail you, sir! Would I had been aware of you.
 PIAMONT Sir, speak you to me?
 PURSENET Not I, sir; pray keep on your way; I have nothing 25 to say to you.
 PIAMONT You're a rascal.
 PURSENET You may say your pleasure, sir; but I hope I go not like a rascal.
 PIAMONT Are you fain to fly to your clothes because you're 30 gallant? Why, there's no rascal like your gallant rascal, believe that.
 PURSENET You have took me at such an hour, faith, you may call me e'en what you please; nothing will move
 35 me.
 PIAMONT No? I'll make somewhat move you!
 [He unmuffles and draws his sword] Draw! I suspected you were a rogue, and you have pursued it up well with a coward!
 PURSENET [to audience] Who?—My patron.
 PIAMONT Keep out, you rascal.
 40 PURSENET [to audience] The guest that did me the kindness in Paul's.—Hold, as you are a gentleman. You'll give me breath, sir?
 [He runs away, dropping the chain of pearl]
 PIAMONT Are you there with me? A vengeance stop you;

 I will breathe myself upon him. Since I can have no

4.7 [Enter Goldstone]
GOLDSTONE
When things are cleanly carried, sign of judgement:
I was the welcom'st gallant to her alive
After the salt was stolen; then a good dinner,
A fine provoking meal which drew on apace
5 The pleasure of a day-bed, and I had it;
This here one ring can witness. When I parted, Who but 'sweet Master Goldstone'? I left her in that trance.
What cannot wit, so it be impudent,
Devise and compass? I would fain know that fellow
now
10 That would suspect me but for what I am;
He lives not. 'Tis all in the conveyance.
[He sees the chain of pearl]

What?

Thou look'st not like a beggar; what mak'st thou
On the ground? I have a hand to help thee up.—
A fair chain of pearl.
15 Surely, a merchant's wife gives lucky handsel.
They that find pearl may wear't at a cheap rate.
Marry, my lady dropped it from her arm
For a device to toll me to her bed:
I've seen as great a matter.
[Enter Primero and Fripp]
20 Who be these? I'll be too crafty for you.—
O, Monsieur Primero, Signor Fripp; is it you, gallants?
FRIPP Sweet Master Goldstone!
[Fripp and Goldstone] whisper [apart]. Enter Tailby
TAILBY [to audience] Every bawd exceeds me in fortune:
Master Primero was robbed of a carcanet upon Monday 25 last, laid the goldsmiths, and found it. I ha' laid goldsmith, jeweller, burnisher, broker, and the devil and all, I think, yet could never so much as hear of that chain of pearl. He was a notable thief; he works close.—Peace! Who be these? Ha, let me see: by this 30 light, there it is! Back, lest they see thee. A happy minute. Goldstone! What an age do we breathe in! Who that saw him now would think he were maintained by purses? So, who that meets me would think I were maintained by wenches? As far as I can see, 'tis all 35 one case, and holds both in one court; we are both maintained by the common roadway. Keep thou thine own heart thou liv'st unsuspected; I leese you again
now. [Exit Tailby]

GOLDSTONE But I pray you, tell me,
Met you no gentlewomen by the way you came? 40
FRIPP
Not any. What should they be?
GOLDSTONE Nay, I do but ask
Because a gentlewoman's glove was found
Near to the place I met you.
PRIMERO Faith, we saw none, sir.
[Enter Tailby and two Constables]
TAILBY Good officers, upon suspicion of felony. 45
FIRST CONSTABLE Very good, sir.
SECOND CONSTABLE What call you the thief's name you do suspect?
TAILBY Master Justinian Goldstone.
SECOND CONSTABLE [to the other Constable] Remember: Mas- 50
ter Justice Goldstone. [To the other Constable and Tailby]
A terrible world the whilst, my masters.
TAILBY Look you, that's he; upon him, officers.
SECOND CONSTABLE I see him not yet; which is he, sir?
TAILBY Why, that. 55
SECOND CONSTABLE He a thief, sir? Who, that gentleman i'th' satin?
TAILBY E'en he.
SECOND CONSTABLE Farewell, sir; you're a merry gentleman.
TAILBY As you will answer it, officers, I'll bear you out; 60
I'll be your warrant.
SECOND CONSTABLE Nay, an you say so. What's his name
then?
TAILBY Justinian Goldstone.
SECOND CONSTABLE Master Justinian Goldstone, we appre- 65
hend you, sir, upon suspicion of felony.
GOLDSTONE Me?
TAILBY You, sir.
FIRST CONSTABLE I charge you, in the King's name, gentlemen, to assist us. 70
GOLDSTONE Master Tailby?
TAILBY The same man, sir.
GOLDSTONE Life, what's the news?
TAILBY Ha' you forgot Coombe Park?
GOLDSTONE Coombe Park? No, 'tis in Kingston way. 75
TAILBY I believe you'll find it so.
GOLDSTONE I not deny it.
SECOND CONSTABLE Bear witness: he's confessed.
GOLDSTONE What have I confessed, pair of coxcombs indubitable? 80
TAILBY
I was robbed finely of this chain of pearl there,
And forty fair spur-royals.
GOLDSTONE Did I rob you?

FRIP I dreamt this would be his end.
- 85 GOLDSTONE See how I am wronged, gentlemen:
As I have a soul, I found this chain of pearl
Not three yards from this place, just when I met you.
- TAILBY Ha, ha!
FRIP [to Goldstone] Yet the law's such, if he but swear 'tis 90 you, you're gone.
- GOLDSTONE Pox on't that e'er I saw't!
FRIP [to Tailby] Can you but swear 'tis he? Do but that,
and you tickle him, i'faith.
- TAILBY Nay, an it come once to swearing, let me alone.
- 95 FRIP Say and hold; he called my jewels counterfeit and so cheated the poor wench of 'em.
- SECOND CONSTABLE Come, bring him away. Come!
GOLDSTONE 'Twill call my state in question!
[Enter Pursenet]
- PURSENET
I think what's got by theft doth never prosper;
Now lost my chain of pearl.
[He sees Goldstone with the chain of pearl, and seizes it]
- 100 Come, Master Goldstone,
Let't go; this' mine, i'faith.
- GOLDSTONE The chain of pearl?
PURSENET By my troth, it's mine.
- GOLDSTONE By my troth, much good do't you, sir.
[He hands Pursenet the chain of pearl]
- 105 FRIP I'm glad in my soul, sir.—(Gnaws)
- FIRST CONSTABLE [to Pursenet] Deliver your weapons.
PURSENET How?
FIRST CONSTABLE You're apprehended upon suspicion of felony.
- PURSENET Felony? What's that?
- 110 TAILBY Was it you, i'faith, sir, all this while, that did me that kindness to ease both my pockets at Coombe Park?
- PURSENET I, sir? Pray, gentlemen, draw near; let's talk among ourselves.—[To a Constable] Stand apart, scoundrel.—Must every gentleman be upbraided in public 115 that flies out now and then upon necessity, to be themes for pedlars and weavers? This should not be; 'twas never seen among the Romans, nor read we of it in the time of Brute. Are we more brutish now? Did I list to blab, do not I know your course of life, Master Tailby, 120 to be as base as the basest, maintained by me, by him, by all of us, and a' second hand from mistresses?—I've their letters here to show.
Why should you be so violent to strip naked
- Another's reputation to the world,
Knowing your own so leprous? 125
Beside, this chain of pearl and those spur-royals
Came to you falsely, for she broke her faith
And made her soul a strumpet with her body
When she sent those; they were ever justly mine.
[To Primero] Pray what moves you, sir? Why should 130 you shake your head? You're clear? Sure, I should know you, sir; pray, are not you sometimes a pandar and oftener a bawd, sir? Have I never sinned in your banqueting boxes, your bowers and towers, you slave that keeps fornication upon the tops of trees? The very 135 birds cannot engender in quiet for you. Why, rogue that goes in good clothes made out of wench's' cast gowns—
PRIMERO Nothing goes so near my heart as that!
PURSENET Do you shake your slave's noddle? 140
TAILBY [turning to Frip] And here's a rascal looked a-swash too—saving the presence of Master Goldstone—a filthyslimey-lousy-nittical broker, pricked up in pawns from the hatband to the shoe-string; a necessary hook to hang gentlemen's suits out i'th' air, lest they should 145 grow musty with long lying (which his pawns seldom are guilty of); a fellow of several scents and steams—French, Dutch, Italian, English—and therefore his lice must needs be mongrels. Why, bill-money—
GOLDSTONE I am sorry to hear this among you. You've 150 all deceived me; truly, I took you for other spirits. You must pardon me henceforward; I have a reputation to look to; I must be no more seen in your companies.
- FRIP Nay, nay, nay, nay, Master Goldstone; you must not
'scape so, i'faith. One word before you go, sir. 155
GOLDSTONE Pray, dispatch then; I would not for half my revenues, i'faith now, that any gallants should pass by in the mean time and find me in your companies. Nay, as quick as you can, sir.
- FRIP You did not take away Master Bowser's cloak t'other 160 morning, pawned it to me, and borrowed five pound upon't?
- GOLDSTONE Ha?
FRIP 'Twas not you neither that finely cheated my little novice at Master Primero's house of a diamond and 165 sapphire, and swore they were counterfeit, both glass, mere glass, as you were a right gentleman?
- GOLDSTONE 'Slife, why were we strangers all this while?
'Sfoot, I perceive we are all natural brothers. A pox 170 on's all; are we found, i'faith?
FRIP A cheater!

99 what's... prosper Proverbially, 'ill-gotten gains never prosper' (Dent, G301).

104 (Gnaws) grimaces, speaks between clenched teeth

115-16 themes... weavers i.e. subject matter for popular ballads (or gossip)

118 Brute Aeneas' great-grandson Brutus, supposed by the English to have founded Britain

121 a' at

134 bowers and towers Probably the names or descriptions of rooms in Primero's house, suggestively vaginal and phallic.

135 keeps... trees i.e. gives fanciful arboreal names to the upstairs rooms for fornication. Perhaps also refers to the timbers of which the brothel (and the theatre) were constructed.

141 a-swash swaggering; suspicious

142-3 filthy-slimey-lousy-nittical nittical: filled with nits, the eggs of lice

143 pricked up decked out

147 steams noxious vapours

149 bill-money a note of charges. Tailby seems to be equating Frip with the money he charges.

- GOLDSTONE A thief, a lecher, a bawd, and a broker!
 FIRST CONSTABLE [to the other] What mean they to be so merry? I'm afraid they laugh at us and make fools on's.
- 175 GOLDSTONE [to gallants] Push! Leave it to me.—[To Constables] How now, who would you speak withal?
 FIRST CONSTABLE Speak withal? Have we waited all this while for a suspected thief.
- GOLDSTONE How! You're scarce awake yet, I think. Look well: does any appear like a thief in this company? Away, you slaves; you stand loitering, when you should look to the commonwealth! You catch knaves apace now, do you not? They may walk by your nose, you rascals. [Exeunt Constables]
- 185 ALL THE REST Sweet Master Goldstone!
 GOLDSTONE You lacked spirit in your company till I came among you. Here be five on's; let's but glue together. [They take hands]
 Why, now the world shall not come between us.
- PURSENET If we be true among ourselves.
- 190 GOLDSTONE Why, true; we cannot lack to be rich, for we cannot lack riches, nor can our wenches want, nor we want wenches.
- PRIMERO Let me alone to furnish you with them.
- TAILBY And me.
- GOLDSTONE
 There's one care past. And as for the knight's daughter,
 Our chiefest business and least thought upon—
- PURSENET That's true, i'faith.
- TAILBY How shall we agree for her?
- GOLDSTONE With as much ease
 200 As for the rest. Tomorrow brings the night;
 Let's all appear in the best shape we may—
 Truth is, we have need on't—
 And when amongst us five she makes election,
 As one she shall choose—
- PURSENET True, she cannot choose.
- GOLDSTONE
 205 That one so fortunate amongst us five Shall bear himself more portly, live regarded,
 Keep house, and be a countenance to the rest.
- ALL THE REST Admiral!
- GOLDSTONE For instance:
 210 [To Pursenet] Put case yourself, after some robbery done,
 Were pursued hardly; why, there were your shelter,
 You know your sanctuary. Nay, say you were taken;
 His letter to the justice will strike't dead.
 'Tis policy to receive one for the head.
- ALL THE REST
 Let's hug thee, Goldstone.
- GOLDSTONE What have I begot? 215
- PURSENET What, sir?
- GOLDSTONE I must plot for you all; it likes me rarely.
- TAILBY Prithee, what is't, sir?
- GOLDSTONE 'Twould strike Fitzgrave pale,
 220 And make the other suitors appear blanks.
- FRIP
 For our united mysteries!
- GOLDSTONE
 What if we five presented our full shapes
 In a strange, gallant, and conceited masque?
- PURSENET
 In a masque? Your thoughts and mine were twins.
- TAILBY
 So the device were subtle, nothing like it. 225
- FRIP Some poet must assist us.
- GOLDSTONE Poet?
 You'll take the direct line to have us staged!
 Are you too well, too safe? Why, what lacks Bowser,
 An absolute scholar, easy to be wrought;
 230 No danger in the operation.
- PURSENET But have you so much interest?
- GOLDSTONE What, in Bowser? Why my least word commands him.
- TAILBY Then no man fitter. 235
- PURSENET And there's Master Fripp, too, can furnish us of masquing suits enough.
- FRIP
 Upon sufficient pawn I think I can, sir.
- PURSENET
 Pawn? Jew, here take my chain.
 [He gives Fripp the chain of pearl]
 Pawns among brothers? We shall thrive,
 240 But we must still expect one rogue in five,
 And think us happy too.
 [Enter Fitzgrave, disguised as Bowser]
- GOLDSTONE Last man we spoke on, Master Bowser.
- ALL THE GALLANTS Little Master Bowser, sweet Master Bowser, welcome, i'faith! 245
- FITZGRAVE Are your fathers dead, gentlemen, you're so merry?
- GOLDSTONE By my troth, a good jest. Did not I commend his wit to you, gentlemen? Hark, sirrah Rafe Bowser, cousin Bowser, i'faith: there's a kind of portion in town, 250 a girl of fifteen hundred, whom we all powerfully affect,
 and determine to present our parts to her in a masque.
- FITZGRAVE In a masque?

204 cannot choose has no alternative
 206 portly dignified, imposing
 207 be a countenance to provide a false appearance of good reputation for 208 Admiral admirable. An appropriate portmanteau between admirable and noun admiral as the gallants are agreeing to choose a leader.

213 strike't dead proverbial for 'do magnificently, work wonders' (Dent, S933.111)
 214 receive one for the head accept one as leader
 221 mysteries guilds. Fripp refers to the 'trades' of the five gallants.
 222 shapes fine forms; theatrical parts 225 So provided that device emblematic form of the masque, contrivance 228 staged i.e. played on the professional stage

 232 interest influence
 250 portion dowry; here, a woman with a dowry worth fifteen hundred pounds

- 255 GOLDSTONE Right, sir; now a little of thy brain for a device to present us firm, which we shall never be able to do ourselves, thou know'st that, and with a kind of speech wherein thou mayst express what gallants are bravely.
- FITZGRAVE Pooh, how can I express 'em otherwise but bravely? Now for a Mercury and all were fitted.
- 260 PURSENET Could not a boy supply it?
FITZGRAVE Why, none better.
PURSENET I have a boy shall put down all the Mercuries i'th' town; a will play a Mercury naturally at his finger's end, i'faith.
- 265 FITZGRAVE Why then we are suited. For torch-bearers and shield-boys, those are always the writer's properties; you're not troubled with them.
- GOLDSTONE Come, my little Bowser; do't finely now, to the life.
- 270 FITZGRAVE I warrant you, gentlemen.
FRIP [taking Fitzgrave aside] Hist! Give me a little touch above the rest, an you can possibly; for I mean to present this chain of pearl to her.
FITZGRAVE Now I know that, let me alone to fit you.
- Exeunt*
- Finis Actus Quartus*
- ❁
- 5.1 Actus Quintus
Enter [three] Courtesans [(including the Novice as the Third Courtesan), and Mistress Newcut, with a mourning veil]
- FIRST COURTESAN [to Newcut] Come forth, you wary, private-whispering strumpet! Have we found your close haunts, your private watchtowers, and your subtle means?
- 5 NEWCUT How then?
- SECOND COURTESAN You can steal secretly hither, you mystical quean, you, at twilight, twitterlights; You have a privilege from your hat, forsooth, To walk without a man, and no suspicion;
- 10 But we poor gentlewomen that go in tires Have no such liberty; we cannot do thus. Custom grants that to you that's shame in us.
NEWCUT Have you done yet?
- SECOND COURTESAN You broke the back of one husband already, and now th'other's dead with grief at sea with your secret expenses, close stealths, cunning filches, and continued banquets in corners. Then, forsooth, you must have your milk-baths to white you, your rose-leaves to sweeten you, your bean-flour bags to sleek you and make you soft, smooth, and delicate for lascivious entertainment.
- NEWCUT So, and you think all this while you dance like a thief in a mist you're safe, nobody can find you? Pray, were not you a fellmonger's daughter at first, that run away with a new courtier for the love of gentlewomen's clothes, and bought the fashion at a dear rate, with the loss of your name and credit? Why, what are all of you, but rustical insides and City flesh, the blood of yeomen and the bum of gentlewomen—
Enter Fitzgrave, [disguised as Bowser]
- SECOND COURTESAN What, shall we suffer a changeable fore-part to out-tongue us? Take that.
[They attack Newcut]
- NEWCUT Murder! Murder!
- FITZGRAVE How now? Why, ladies, a retreat! Come, you have shown your spirits sufficiently; you're all land captains, and so they shall find that come in your quarters; but have you the law-free now to fight and scratch among yourselves and let your gallants run away with others?
- FIRST COURTESAN How!
- SECOND COURTESAN Good—
- FIRST COURTESAN Sweet Master Bowser.
- NEWCUT Another?
- FITZGRAVE Why then, I perceive you know nothing. Why, they are in the way of marriage: a knight's daughter here in town makes her election among 'em this night.
- 45 FIRST COURTESAN This night?
- FITZGRAVE This very night, and they all present themselves in a masque before her. Know you not this?
- SECOND COURTESAN O, traitor Master Goldstone.
- THIRD COURTESAN Perjured Master Tailby.
- 50 NEWCUT Without soul!
FIRST COURTESAN She will chase him.
FITZGRAVE You have more cause to join

259 Mercury i.e. a boy to act as Mercury the herald. At l. 262 the sense becomes 'thieves', as Mercury was associated with theft.

263-4 at his finger's end i.e. expertly (from the proverb, 'to have it as one's finger's ends', Dent, F245). See also note to 3.4.99.

266 properties proprietorships; also theatrical properties or props

274 fit find something that suits; secretly, 'fittingly punish'

5.1.0.2 [three] Courtesans The Third Courtesan might be the Novice of the earlier scenes, except that in 5.2 the five

'whores' must include three Courtesans, the Novice, and Mistress Newcut.

0.3 Mistress Newcut She now seems to be wearing mourning dress: see notes to ll. 8 and 31, and l. 64.

7 twitterlights twilight (perhaps playing on the verb twitter, 'quiver with excitement')

8 your hat The widow's hat and veil (or perhaps the plain hat of a merchants' wife) allows her more public freedom than the fancy tires of the supposed gentlewomen. Widows were relatively independent of male control.

19 bean-flour bags an early version of both the powder puff and deodorant pad

29 bum buttocks

31 fore-part ornamental covering for the breast (referring, perhaps, to her new widow's attire); also, bawdily, 'front part', i.e. genitals (in contrast with bum)

34-5 land captains i.e. brave warriors, but quibbling on the sense 'highwaymen'

36 quarters soldiers' lodgings; also 'hind-quarters' or 'skirts' have . . . law-free i.e. are you exempt from the laws (though OED records law-free only as an adjective)

- And play the grounds of friendship 'mongst yourselves
Than rashly run division. I could tell you
A means to pleasure you.
- 55 FIRST COURTESAN Good Master Bowser!
FITZGRAVE
But that you're women and are hardly secret—
SECOND COURTESAN
We vow it seriously!
FITZGRAVE You should be all there in presence,
See all, hear all, and yet not they perceive you.
THIRD COURTESAN
So that—
NEWCUT Sweet Master Bowser, I—
60 FITZGRAVE I can stand you in stead,
For I frame the device—
ALL THE COURTESANS If ever—
FITZGRAVE Will you do't?
Hark you—
[They whisper]
FIRST COURTESAN
Content.
SECOND COURTESAN And I'll make one.
THIRD COURTESAN
And I another. We'll mar the match.
NEWCUT
When that good news came of my husband's death,
65 Goldstone promised me marriage and swear to me—
SECOND COURTESAN
I'll bring his oaths in question.
THIRD COURTESAN So will I.
FITZGRAVE
Agree among yourselves, for shame!
FIRST COURTESAN Are we resolved?
SECOND COURTESAN
In this who would not feign?
THIRD COURTESAN Friends all, for my part.
NEWCUT
Here's my lip for mine.
THIRD COURTESAN Round let it go.
[They kiss]
SECOND COURTESAN
All wrath thus quenched.
- FIRST COURTESAN And I conclude it so. 70
Exeunt [women]
- FITZGRAVE
How all events strike even with my wishes!
Their own invention damns them.
[Enter Piamont, Bungler, and the two Gentleman-Gallants]
Now, gentlemen,
Stands your assistance firm?
FIRST GENTLEMAN-GALLANT Why, 'tis our own case;
I'm sorry you should doubt.
SECOND GENTLEMAN-GALLANT
We'll furnish you.
- BUNGLER
Are these our gallants?
FITZGRAVE Are our gallants these? 75
[Enter Painter, with five shields]
PAINTER Here be five shields, sir.
FITZGRAVE Finished already? That's well. I'll see thy master shortly.
PAINTER I'm satisfied. Exit
PIAMONT Prithce, let's see, Master Fitzgrave.
80 FITZGRAVE I have blazed them.
FIRST GENTLEMAN-GALLANT What's this?
BUNGLER Foooh, you should be a gallant too, for you're no university scholar.
FITZGRAVE Look, this is Purset: the device, a purse wide 85 open and the mouth downward; the word, 'Alienis ecce crumenis.'
FIRST GENTLEMAN-GALLANT What's that?
FITZGRAVE 'One that lives out of other men's pockets.'
PIAMONT That's right.
90 FITZGRAVE Here's Goldstone's: three silver dice.
FIRST GENTLEMAN-GALLANT They run high: two cinques and a quatre!
FITZGRAVE They're high-men, fit for his purpose; the word,
'Fratremque patremque.'
95 SECOND GENTLEMAN-GALLANT Nay, he will cheat his own brother; nay, his own father, i'faith.
FITZGRAVE So much the word imports. Master Primero—
BUNGLER Pox, what says he now?
FITZGRAVE The device, an unvalued pearl hid in a cave;
100 the word, 'Occultos vendit honores.'

53-4 play the grounds...run division Puns on musical terminology: ground as the repeated bass phrase, division as the elaborate improvisatory treble line played over it.

60 stand you in stead put you in place

65 swear swore

69-70 Here's...so The women either exchange kisses and speak of drink metaphorically, or actually pass round a goblet of wine.

71 strike Perhaps a metaphor of music sounding, or of bells striking on time.

72 Their i.e. the gallants' invention (a) ingenuity, (b) device (the masque)

72.1-2 Piamont...Gentleman-Gallants

These four gallants, together with Fitzgrave, make up a virtuous fivesome in contrast with the knavish gallants of the play's title.

75 Are...these? This shared line stresses the irony of the play's title and its overriding satirical point as Fitzgrave turns Bungler's enquiry to a rhetorical question: 'are our five gallants anything like these two?' Alternatively, the painter enters early enough for the line to refer to the emblems on the shields.

81 blazed (a) described heraldically, blazoned; (b) divulged, defamed

83 should must

86 word motto

86-7 Alienis ecce crumenis 'here he is with the purse of another'

94 high-men dice loaded to turn up high numbers

95 Fratremque patremque '(against) both brother and father'

100 unvalued (a) priceless, (b) hidden from valuation

101 Occultos vendit honores 'he sells hidden honours'. Honours, the English equivalent of honores, could mean 'chastities, maidenheads', as is reflected in Fitzgrave's translation.

- FIRST GENTLEMAN-GALLANT What's that?
 FITZGRAVE 'One that sells maidenheads by wholesale.'
 SECOND GENTLEMAN-GALLANT Excellently proper.
 105 FITZGRAVE Master Fripp—
 SECOND GENTLEMAN-GALLANT That Pythagorical rascal: in a gentleman's suit today, in a knight's tomorrow.
 FITZGRAVE The device for him, a cuckoo sitting on a tree;
 the word, 'En avis ex avibus'—'one bird made of many', 110 for you know, as the sparrow hatches the cuckoo, so the gentleman feathers the broker.
 FIRST GENTLEMAN-GALLANT Let me admire thee, Master
 Fitzgrave.
 FITZGRAVE They will scorn, gentlemen; and to assist them 115 the better, Pursenet's boy, that little precious pickpocket, has a compendious speech in Latin, and, like a Mercury, presents their dispositions more liberally.
 FIRST GENTLEMAN-GALLANT Never were poor gallants so abused.
 120 FITZGRAVE Hang 'em; they're counterfeits; no honest spirit will pity 'em.
 This is my crown:
 So good men smile, I dread no rascal's frown.
 Away, bestow yourselves secretly o'erhead; this is the 125 place appointed for the rehearsal to practise their behaviours.
 FIRST GENTLEMAN-GALLANT We are vanished.
 [Exeunt all but Fitzgrave, and appear above]
 [Enter below Goldstone, Pursenet, Tailby, Fripp, Primero, and Pursenet's Boy]
 GOLDSTONE Master Bowser.
 PURSENET Well said, i'faith. Off with your cloaks, gallants;
 130 let's fall roundly to our business.
 TAILBY Is the boy perfect?
 FITZGRAVE That's my credit, sir, I warrant you.
 FRIPP If our little Mercury should be out, we should scarce be known what we are.
 135 FITZGRAVE I have took a course for that; fear it not, sir.
 Look you, first here be your shields.
 GOLDSTONE Ay, where be our shields?
 PURSENET Which is mine?
 TAILBY Which is mine, Master Bowser? This?
 140 FITZGRAVE I pray, be contained a little, gentlemen; they'll come all time enough to you, I warrant.
 PURSENET This Fripp is grown so violent.
 FITZGRAVE Yours to begin withal, sir?
 PURSENET Well said, Master Bowser.
- FITZGRAVE First, the device, a fair purse wide open, the 145 mouth downward; the word, 'Alienis ecce crumenis.'
 PURSENET What's that, prihee?
 FITZGRAVE 'Your bounty pours itself forth to all men.'
 PURSENET And so it does, i'faith; that's all my fault—
 150 bountiful.
 FITZGRAVE Master Goldstone, here's yours, sir: three silver dice; the word, 'Fratremque patremque.'
 GOLDSTONE And what's that?
 FITZGRAVE 'Fortune of my side.'
 GOLDSTONE Well said, little Bowser, i'faith. 155
 TAILBY [to Fitzgrave] What say you to me, sir?
 FITZGRAVE For the device, a candle in a corner; the word,
 'Consumptio victus.'
 TAILBY The meaning of that, sir?
 FITZGRAVE 'My light is yet in darkness, till I enjoy her.' 160
 TAILBY Right, sir!
 PRIMERO Now mine, sir?
 FITZGRAVE The device, an unvalued pearl hid in a cave.
 PRIMERO Ah, ha, sirs!
 FITZGRAVE The word, 'Occultos vendit honores.' 165
 PRIMERO Very good, I warrant.
 FITZGRAVE 'A black man's a pearl in a fair lady's eye.'
 PRIMERO I said 'twas some such thing.
 FRIPP My turn must needs come now; am I fitted, Master
 Bowser? 170
 FITZGRAVE Trust to me; your device here is a cuckoo sitting on a tree.
 FRIPP The Welsh lieger; good.
 FITZGRAVE The word, 'En avis ex avibus.'
 FRIPP Ay, marry, sir. 175
 FITZGRAVE Why, do you know what 'tis, sir?
 FRIPP No, by my troth, not yet, sir.
 FITZGRAVE O, 'I keep one tune; I recant not.'
 FRIPP I'm like the cuckoo in that, indeed; where I love, I 180 hold.
 FITZGRAVE Did I not promise you I would fit you?
 GOLDSTONE They're all very well done, i'faith, and very scholar-like, though I say't before thy face, little Bowser; but I would not have thee proud on't now. Come, if this be performed well— 185
 FITZGRAVE Who, the boy? He has performed deeper matters than this.
 PIAMONT [above] Ay, a pox on him; I think was in my pocket now, an truth were known.
 BUNGLER [above] I caught him once in mine. 190

103 wholesale puns on *hole-sale*106 Pythagorical changing in identity (after Pythagoras' theory of transmigration of souls)109 En avis ex avibus 'here is a bird out of other birds'. The cuckoo has its eggs hatched by other birds.114 They will scorn i.e. the shields will deride the gallants122 crown probably figured as a victor's wreath with an emblematic motto

125-6 behaviours deportment, acting of roles129 Well said well done131 Is the boy perfect has the boy memorized his lines158 Consumptio victus 'a consumption of sustenance'

167 A...eye proverbial (Dent, M79)

black Perhaps Primero wears black. The sense he fails to recognize is 'wicked'.173 The Welsh lieger a name for the cuckoo (proverbial—Dent, A233—but not before Middleton)178 I keep one tune The cuckoo proverbially has but one song (Dent, C894). recant probably both 'retract' and 'sing another tune'

- FITZGRAVE Suppose the shields are presented, then you begin, boy.
- BOY 'I, representing Mercury, am a pickpocket and have his part at my fingers' ends; page I am to that great and secret thief, Magno illo et secreto latroni.'
- 195 FITZGRAVE [to Pursenet] There you make your honour, sir.
- BOY At 'latroni'.
- [Pursenet bows]
- You have it, sir.
- PURSENET 'Latroni'; that's mine.
- 200 FITZGRAVE [apart] He confesses the thief's his.
- PURSENET Remember, boy, you point 'latroni' to me.
- BOY To you, master; proceed.
- FITZGRAVE 'These four are his companions, the one a notable cheater that will cozen his own father.' Master Goldstone.
- 205 GOLDSTONE Let me alone, Master Bowser; I can take mine own turn.
- FITZGRAVE Why—
- GOLDSTONE Peace!
- [He bows]
- 210 FITZGRAVE 'The second, a notorious lecher maintained by harlots, Cuius virtus consumptio corporis.'
- TAILBY That's I, Master Bowser.
- FITZGRAVE There you remember your honour, sir.
- [Tailby bows]
- 215 BOY 'Ille leno pretiosissimus, virgineos ob lucrum vendens honores.'
- PURSENET It sounds very well, i'faith.
- BOY 'Postremus ille, quamvis apparatu splendidus, is no otherwise but a broker; these feathers are not his own, sed avis ex avibus—'
- [Frip bows]
- 220 'all which to be nothing but truth will appear by the event.'
- FITZGRAVE I'faith, here's all now, gentlemen.
- GOLDSTONE Short and pithy.
- TAILBY A good boy, i'faith, and a pregnant.
- PURSENET I dare put trust in the boy, sir.—Forget not, 225 sirrah, at any hand, to point that same 'latroni' to me.
- BOY I warrant you, master.
- GOLDSTONE Come, gentlemen, the time beckons us away.
- FITZGRAVE Ay, furnish, gentlemen; furnish.
- PURSENET Hark, one word, Master Bowser, what's that same 'latroni'? I have a good mind to that word, i'faith. 230 FITZGRAVE 'Latroni'? Why, 'sheriff of the shire'.
- PURSENET I'faith? And I have shriven some shires in my days. Exeunt [the five Gallants and the Boy]
- FITZGRAVE [to those above] Now, gentlemen, are you satisfied and pleased? 235
- FIRST GENTLEMAN-GALLANT Never more amply.
- FITZGRAVE
- Amongst us now falls that desired lot,
For we shall blast five rivals with one plot. [Exeunt]
- Enter the virgin [Katherine] between two Ancient Gentlemen* 5.2
- KATHERINE
- Grave gentlemen, in whose approved bosoms
My deceased father did repose much faith,
You're dearly welcome. Pray sit, command music,
See nothing want to beautify this night,
That holds my election in her peaceful arms— 5
Feasts, music, hymns, those sweet celestial charms.
- [She sits]
- FIRST ANCIENT GENTLEMAN [sitting]
May you be blessed in this election.
- SECOND ANCIENT GENTLEMAN [sitting]
That content may meet perfection.
- Hymn*
- [SINGERS] [within]
- Sound lute, bandora, gittern,
Viol, virginals, and cithern! 10

193–221 I...event Evidently, the Boy and Fitzgrave share in rehearsing the Boy's Latin speech, which for the convenience of the audience has been mostly translated into English. The insults, which are intrinsic to the speech, are probably not understood by the gallants because they are imagined to hear the speech in Latin.

195 Magno...latroni 'for that great and secret thief'

196 honour bow (punning on 'moral reputation')

211 Cuius...corporis 'whose virtue is an employment (and a wasting away) of the body'

214–15 Ille...honores 'this is a very rich pimp because he sells virgin reputations for money'

217 Postremus...splendidus 'this is the most inferior, although sumptuous in his pomp'

218 these...own proverbial, as in Timon,

3.30 (Dent, B375)

219 sed but

224 pregnant resourceful

226 at any hand on any account

229 furnish get ready

233 shriven robbed (punning on sheriff)

5.2.0.1 the virgin Suggests a ceremonial costume denoting Katherine as such, perhaps a white robe.

8.1–5.2.18.15 Hymn...action The masque abandons the device rehearsed in 5.1 involving Pursenet's Boy as Mercury. He is nevertheless present because he is apprehended on suspicion of stealing the pearls, and so probably plays a shield-boy. The direction after l. 18 summarizes the entire masque, and anticipates the bowing, delivery of the shields, and dancing that occupy ll. 5.2.19–5.2.25.6. In substance this edition preserves the original text. The action may be reconstructed as follows. The hymn, to the accompaniment of offstage musicians, is sung by the torch-bearers and shield-boys, who enter as they are singing. The groups separate by the middle of the hymn, and in ll. 16–18 you is addressed by the singers to the masquers, and that to an appropriate shield. Contrary to the sequence suggested by the printed text, the cornetts probably sound before the masquers bow to Katherine. Perhaps a flourish of cornetts announces the presentation of each shield. After the presentations, the action goes on as described in ll. 5.2.25.1–6.

9 bandora stringed instrument like the lute but with a deeper sound

gittern stringed instrument like a guitar

10 virginals keyboard instrument similar to the harpsichord

cithern another guitar-like instrument

- Voices spring and lift aloud
Her name that makes the music proud!
This night perfection
Makes her election.
- 15 Follow, follow, follow, follow round;
Look you to that; nay, you to that; nay, you to that:
Anon you will be found, anon you will be found,
Anon you will be found.
Cornetts.
Enter the masque, thus ordered: a torch-bearer, a shield-boy, then a masquer, so throughout; then the shield-boys fall at one end, the torch-bearers at the other; the masquers i'th' middle. The torch-bearers are the five gentlemen [Fitzgrave, Piamont, Bungler, and the two Gentleman-Gallants]; the shield-boys, the whores in boys' apparel [the two Courtesans, the Novice, and Mistress Newcut; also Pursenet's Boy as the fifth]; the masquers, the five gallants [Goldstone, Pursenet, Tailby, Frip, Primero]. They bow to her [Katherine]; she rises and shows the like; they dance, but first deliver the shields up. She reads.

FITZGRAVE Here.
GOLDSTONE We are all betrayed. | | |
- FITZGRAVE Betrayed? You're no sort to be betrayed; you have not so much worth. Nay, struggle not with the net; you are caught for this world.
- FIRST COURTESAN Would we were out.
- 40 FITZGRAVE [to gallants]
'Twas I framed your device, do you see, 'twas I!
The whole assembly has took notice of it:
[To Goldstone] That you are a gallant cheater—
So much the pawning of my cloak contains—
[To Pursenet] You a base thief—think of Coombe Park, and tell me—
- 45 [To Tailby] That you're a hired smockster. [To Primero]
Here's her letter
In which we are certified that you are a bawd.
- FIRST ANCIENT GENTLEMAN
The broker has confessed it.
- SECOND ANCIENT GENTLEMAN
So has the boy.
- TAILBY That boy will be hanged; he stole the chain at first and has thus long maintained his master's gallantry.
- 50 FITZGRAVE [to Katherine]
All which we here present, like captive slaves
Waiting that doom which their presumption craves.
- KATHERINE
How easily may our suspectless sex
With fair-appearing shadows be deluded!
Dear sir, you have the work so well begun
- 55 That, took from you, small glory would be won.
- FITZGRAVE
Since 'tis your pleasure to refer to me
The doom of these, I have provided so:
They shall not altogether lose their cost;
See, I have brought wives for 'em.
- 60 [The three Courtesans, the Novice, and Mistress Newcut unmask]
- GOLDSTONE Heart, the strumpets!—Out, out!
- TAILBY
Having assumed out of their impudence
The shape of shield-boys.
- FRIP
To heap full confusion.
- FIRST COURTESAN
Rather confine us to strict chastity,
A mere impossible task, than to wed these
- 65 Whom we loathe worse than the foul'st disease.
- GOLDSTONE [to Fitzgrave]
O, grant 'em their requests.
- FITZGRAVE
The doom is passed;
So, since your aim was marriage,
Either embrace it in these courtesans
Or have your base acts and felonious lives
- 70 Proclaimed to the indignation of the law,
Which will provide a public punishment.
As for the boy and that infectious bawd,

THE BLOODY BANQUET: A TRAGEDY

Text introduced and annotated by Julia Gasper, edited by Julia Gasper and Gary Taylor

THE title The Bloody Banquet draws attention to the final scene of this play, in which the Tyrant compels his wife, the young Queen Thetis, publicly to eat the corpse of her lover, Tymethes. The same title could serve for Seneca's tragedy Thyestes, or indeed for Shakespeare and Peele's tragedy, Titus Andronicus. The Bloody Banquet is greatly influenced by the tradition of Senecan horror, but its success is not to be judged by how closely it conforms to a classical model. This is a play which sets its own goals and, to a great extent, attains them.

The Bloody Banquet uses as its immediate source an Elizabethan prose novel, William Warner's Pan his Syrinx, in which a version of the gruesome banquet appears in a somewhat less horrific form than Seneca's. While its source can be called a diluted myth, The Bloody Banquet is an ambitious play whose authors, Dekker and Middleton, display not only their classical learning but also considerable originality and dramatic power. In their hands the gruesome banquet becomes a metaphor for all the gender and power relationships in the play.

The story of Atreus and Thyestes is only one of several Greek myths in which the motif of the gruesome, cannibalistic banquet recurs. In Greek legend, the Titan Cronos ate his children because he feared being supplanted. In the play, Armitrites expresses the same sentiment over the dead bodies of his son and daughter: 'Yes, and we safe, our death we need less fear, | Usurpers' issue oft proves dangerous, | We depose others, and they poison us.' Cronos' fears are self-fulfilling because his son Zeus, concealed by his mother Rhea, grows up to take revenge by poisoning him and forcing him to disgorge all his devoured offspring. No such kind reversal is possible in Thyestes' case, but the story suggests a conflation of the processes of digestion and gestation (both words deriving ultimately from the same Latin root gesto, to bear or carry) which elucidates the original meaning of the gruesome banquet myth. 'Incorporation... turns into a surrogate pregnancy', as Marina Warner has said.

A closely related legend concerns Tantalus, the son of Zeus and King of Lydia, the country which provides the setting for The Bloody Banquet. Tantalus is said to have served up his son Pelops to the gods in order to test whether they could tell human from animal flesh. He was suitably punished with starvation in the afterlife. Tantalus was traditionally the grandfather of Thyestes, and in Seneca's play there is an allusion to him in Act IV at the point where Atreus is carrying out the murder of Thyestes' three young sons, one of whom is called Tantalus after his ancestor.

Other versions of the myth include the story of King Astiages of Media, told by Herodotus: he killed the children of Harpagus and served them to their father in a pie, then for the second course brought in their heads, hands, and feet. This story is retold by Seneca in the third book of his moral essays, 'On Anger', which was a widely-studied text in the Renaissance. The extent of Seneca's influence on Elizabethan drama, particularly the drama written for the public stage, has been questioned by G. K. Hunter, and in some respects there may have been exaggeration and inexactitude (certainly in the case of T. S. Eliot's opinions). But there can be little doubt that Seneca and Ovid were the Latin authors through whom the gruesome banquet myth was known to Dekker, Middleton, and Shakespeare.

A further example is the legend of Philomela, told by Ovid and used as a source for Titus Andronicus. Philomela's sister Procne, discovering that her husband Tereus had raped Philomela, killed Itys, her own son by Tereus, and served him to Tereus, who ate him unknowingly.

There are three components of this myth. First, a father eats his own children. Second, he is a king. Third, he is deceived or he deceives others. Without the third element, it would seem an ideal metaphor for tyranny. Aristotle took it for granted that government was the extension of the father's authority over the family and household. So the father eating his own children would be a logical image of tyranny, the perversion of government. A strong Renaissance tradition characterized Seneca as a critic of tyranny, a view confirmed by recent opinion, which suggests that a similar political agenda animates Elizabethan and Jacobean emulations of Senecan horror. In a society whose concepts of the state were usually organic, an image of physiological horror which perverts family relationship represents tyranny, not as a cold abstraction, but as an atrocity.

However, there is also the deception component. It never occurs to Thyestes, any more than to Oedipus, to exonerate himself because his trespass was committed unintentionally. Guilt is guilt and they damn themselves ruthlessly. Thyestes' pollution can be understood by comparing it to a rape such as Philomela's or Lucretia's, in another story taken up by Middleton: Thyestes' body has been contaminated because this forbidden flesh has entered it. Likewise Proserpine swallowed the seeds of the pomegranate in ignorance but paid the penalty. Christian theology insists that Adam, when he ate the apple, was not deceived. Roman logic damns him even if he was. There is no escape for Thyestes from the terrible knowledge of what he has done, which is a hell in itself.

The tragedy of Thyestes indicates a culture with a highly developed sense of pollution, transgression, and guilt, but no doctrine of redemption. Moral guilt is not the whole issue, however: Thyestes is tortured because in ingesting his own children, he has done the last thing he would have wished to do. If the purpose of any living organism is to perpetuate its own genes, he has frustrated the object of his whole existence.

The gruesome banquet myth grapples with the problem of defilement, for which in the classical culture there was no solution but death. It would be unwise to limit the scope or the significance of this myth: it is a symbol which assumes new meanings in a succession of cultural metamorphoses. In the Christian culture, the gruesome banquet becomes transformed into the Communion, and takes on a soteriological significance. The problem of sin, which is subtly different from the pagan notion of defilement but closely related to it, is resolved through paradox, as the communicants eat the flesh and drink the blood, not of their own children, but of the Host's offspring. By doing this, their own defilement is washed away and they are, like Thyestes and his sons, incorporated into one body.

The only moral of Thyestes is 'never hope for reconciliation with your enemy.' Thyestes is destroyed through his idealism, his nobility, which did not seek revenge. Revenge, Seneca's play asserts, is the law of nature, and in abjuring it Thyestes only brings a more frightful injury on himself. Yet revenge is also mysterious and problematic. The motives of Atreus are obscure, and the Latin language does not distinguish clearly between private revenge, divine vengeance, and public penalty: it uses the words poena or ultio to mean any of these things.

Its relationship to rape provides one insight into the gruesome banquet myth—and is what gives the Philomela myth its inner logic. Tereus' crime against Philomela is avenged in a fashion that makes him understand what she has suffered. Titus Andronicus seeks revenge through the gruesome banquet for the many crimes endured by his family—but in the Elizabethan play the Mediterranean myth subtly shifts. The cruel Tamora eats her own children, and thus receives them back into her own body. She re-assimilates them, and her horror is derived from a contemplation of the mysterious relation of parent to child, in which the exact boundaries of the individual are impossible to define.

At this point we encounter a gender transformation. In all the vernacular Elizabethan examples of this myth, the banqueter is female, and she is compelled to eat a male victim. In all the classical examples, the banqueter is male, and so also are the victims; women may serve up the gruesome banquet, but they never partake of it until the Renaissance. Another change in the myth is that in later versions it is no longer the child, but the lover of the woman who is now eaten. In The Bloody Banquet Tymethes, by being betrothed to Amphridote, the stepdaughter of the Queen, could be regarded as the Queen's son as well as her lover. Such in-law relationships were taken very seriously in the Renaissance and figured in the tables of matrimonial exclusion. In other words, the sexual relationship between Tymethes and the Queen would have been regarded as incestuous, as well as adulterous. The Bloody Banquet thus anticipates Freud's linking of cannibalism to incest.

Classical and Renaissance features of the myth are combined in a neo-Latin play of 1592, William Alabaster's Roxana. In this play, which was closely based on an Italian source (Grotto's La Dalida), a cannibalistic banquet is served to Oromasdes, king of Bactria, by his wife Atossa. When he has eaten it, she reveals that it contained the flesh of his mistress, Roxana, and Roxana's two children by him. This combines both the child-eating and the lover-eating versions, as in a sense does The Bloody Banquet. Furthermore, Roxana earlier has been compelled to carry out the murder of her own children, somewhat like Tamora who eats her own sons in Titus, or again like the Queen who actually murders Tymethes. It is as if Renaissance versions could not resist centring on a female figure. It is not impossible that Dekker or Middleton knew Roxana, which was performed at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1592; they may have encountered a manuscript, and in The Bloody Banquet we find the unusual name Roxano for a character who does not in any way derive from Warner. In the play's cast list his name is oddly misspelled in a feminine form, 'Roxona', which may only be a misprint, but in a later play of Middleton's (Hengist, King of Kent) the name Roxana is used for a woman. There are also plot resemblances: for instance, in Roxana the heroine takes refuge in the forest when Bactria is invaded and conquered by Oromasdes, while in The Bloody Banquet the Old Queen does the same at the invasion of Armatrites. Whether or not Dekker and Middleton knew Alabaster's play, their play and his share typical Renaissance features of the myth.

Those features are also present in Dekker and Middleton's undoubtedly source, the story of Thetis in Warner's Pan his Syrinx. Warner's narrative was in itself a conflation of elements of the classical gruesome banquet with another story, the legend of Fair Rosamund which (as Wallace Bacon points out) goes back at least as far as Caxton's Golden Legend; analogues are found in the Gesta Romanorum, the Heptameron of Marguerite of Navarre (story 32), Painter's Palace of Pleasure (I, 57), and Whetstone's Aurelia. Another example appears in Machiavelli's Florentine History, Middleton's source for The Witch (a play with some interesting links to The Bloody Banquet, noted in the commentary). In the story of Rosamund and its analogues, an unfaithful wife is compelled to drink from the skull of her lover (or, in some versions, her father). Warner increased the gruesome banquet element by having her also forced to consume his flesh. However, the young Queen is never in any doubt about what she is eating and drinking, and so the deception element of the myth disappears. This change may relate to the difference between classical concepts of defilement and Christian concepts of guilt, knowledge being crucial for the latter. Her knowledge of what she eats makes the young Queen, in the final scene, an almost iconographic figure of what Julia Kristeva calls abjection, and what Gary Taylor (2002) calls ‘the edible complex.’

While The Bloody Banquet is not slavishly Senecan, the dramatists did attempt to make it, in some respects, more Senecan than Warner’s version. In the last scene, Dekker added some details which restore the deception element in another form: while it is the young Queen who is compelled to consume the remains of Tymethes, his father the Old King of Lydia enters as a guest and, upon hearing the story related, he realizes that the remains are those of his own son. The pieces of the myth are all there, but they are fragmented (like Tymethes himself, it is tempting to say). The play’s ending turns a little too quickly from the horror to attempt what is almost a happy ending. It is not a tragicomedy, for too many deaths and disasters have taken place, but such problems of genre are quite typical of Dekker (who seems to have written the ending). It is also possible that this abruptness results from a Caroline abridgement, since—as Schoenbaum suggested—the play was apparently adapted and shortened at some point between its first performances and its publication in 1639.

Dekker and Middleton moved away from the Senecan model in an explicitly Christian direction, emphasizing redemption in the Lapyrus plot and suggesting the hand of Providence at work in the downfall of Armatrites’ dynasty. This typical humanist eclecticism, mixing classical and Christian motifs, is one of the things that makes Renaissance drama stimulating, and without it the dramatists could not have created such a powerful scene as 4.3 with its blend of transmuted myth, theological mystery, and sheer theatrical shock. It surely deserves to be acted.

Moreover, the play has its own hidden coherence in a pattern of ideas concerning food, sex, vice, virtue, and the role of the female. There was a strongly held belief, stated by both Aristotle and Hippocrates, that sexual intercourse vitiated the male and nourished the female, because semen passed from the male to the female, resulting in loss and weakness to the man. This belief survived into the Victorian word for ejaculation (‘spend’) and also into the French term for the same thing (la perte, which has the further meanings of loss, ruin, and destruction). Since semen was believed to be made out of blood, lovemaking that was too frequent or too passionate led to the female effectively devouring the man: it would become a bloody banquet. At the same time it was believed that a woman’s blood was turned into breast milk, and so a woman nourished her children with her own life-force. Middleton surely drew on this belief in the stanza from The Ghost of Lucrece that concludes ‘Here’s blood for milk . . .’ (136–42). In The Bloody Banquet, the Old Queen is presented with two young children at the breast, but starving so that she cannot feed them. The young Queen feasts on men, while her virtuous antithesis feeds and nurtures them.

When Lapyrus has turned traitor by being tempted through a woman, Eurynome, he can redeem himself by renouncing the woman (she is never heard of again) and serving the good Old Queen: his expiation involves starving himself while he searches for food for her and her offspring. That good Queen renounces her roles as both wife and mother during the period of expiation, reducing herself to a mere wet-nurse (that is, a nourisher), of her one remaining child. In this way, strength is restored to the good king and queen, so that they eventually regain their throne with a surviving heir. Abstinence helps to restore potency.

When the Tyrant greets his young Queen, he says ‘This night we’ll banquet in these blissful arms’, but the ironic implication is that his voracious desire will result in her consuming him, not the other way around. Uxoriousness is the first step in his destruction, his loss of potency. Tymethes is a wastrel who ends up being literally consumed by a woman. The play abounds in lines connected with this theme, linking its plot and imagery into one compelling whole. Even when Amphridote turns from virtue to despair, the means she uses is poison: when the good woman becomes bad, she ceases to be a nourisher and becomes a poisoner. Poison is the perversion of her gender role. Mazerer attempts to poison Tymethes, but fails miserably. This network of ideas provides one more link back to Seneca, for while in the classical gruesome banquet the parent devours the child, in the Lapyrus plot (which seems to have been written by Dekker) the wholesome antithesis, a mother feeding her children from her own body, is given centrality.

Middleton specialized in the depiction of wicked women, and even in a play where most of the men—the Tyrant, Tymethes, Mazerer, Roxano—are base and unscrupulous, the wickedness of the young Queen stands out. It has more dramatic impact, perhaps because it is more culturally transgressive. It is not unprepared. Act 4 scene 3—in which the young Queen makes Tymethes kneel in prayer by the side of her bed, then shoots him dead with two pistols—is the dramatic climax of the play. She has warned him of death often before, but somehow we do not quite expect this. We assume, if anything, that the furious husband or the obliging pander would carry out the execution, not the Queen herself. In Warner, the husband simply finds the guilty pair (‘the naughty packs’) in bed together, and beheads the lover on the spot. Middleton knew that was too hackneyed to have the kind of impact he desired. Everything in this scene wanders far from the source, introducing mythological elements and theological mysteries far beyond the scope of Warner.

Tymethes’ mad determination to unmask his mysterious lover in her rich palace recalls the Cupid and Psyche legend: but the genders are reversed. Here it is the man whose curiosity proves his downfall, and the woman who sorrowfully withdraws her love from him. Psyche of course was not killed, but given a chance to expiate her sin. The young Queen instructs Tymethes to kneel and repent of his sins, which he imagines to be his only penalty until she pulls the trigger. In her soliloquy over his body she points out that she has treated him generously by letting him pray for mercy first so that he will go to heaven. It reminds us of Hamlet’s inability to kill

Claudius while he was at prayer, and raises the question, so fascinating to Calvinists such as Middleton and Dekker and most of their audience: how could you ever be sure who was saved and who was damned?

Middleton also introduced the succeeding incident, with its black humour, when the young Queen tries to explain Tymethes' dead body to her intruding husband by claiming that he was a total stranger who had been trying to rape her. He exclaims: 'O let me embrace thee for a brave, unmatched, Precious, unvalued, admirable whore!' The business of the false rape-charge is an ancient and oppressive myth. It goes back in classical culture at least as far as the story of Phaedra and Hippolytus, and in the Jewish-Christian tradition to that of Joseph and Potiphar's wife in Genesis 39 (stories whose similarities were noted by scholars of the Renaissance). The myth also persists in twentieth-century works (e.g. Forster's A Passage to India). Middleton probably had both the biblical and the classical stories in mind, particularly the latter since Seneca wrote a tragedy on the subject of Phaedra. We know that Middleton was acquainted with it because he quotes from it in Latin in The Revenger's Tragedy: Curae leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent. In The Bloody Banquet, the young Queen appears to be the second wife of the Tyrant, as Phaedra was of King Theseus; Hippolytus was thus Phaedra's stepson, while Tymethes is betrothed to the young Queen's stepdaughter. Phaedra indirectly causes Hippolytus' death, for in desperately fleeing her slanders his chariot overturns and he is killed. Phaedra commits suicide over his fragmented remains: 'Hippolytus! Is this how I must find you? | Is this what I have made of you? What creature— | Some Sinis, some Procrustes?—Cretan bull | Bellowing in a Daedalian labyrinth, | Horned hybrid—can have torn you into pieces?'

But the differences are very revealing. Tymethes is far from an innocent young man: he has accepted the queen's advances readily, along with a large cash payment, then boasted of his adventure to Zenarchus and given his virgin love a jewel actually filched from the sleeping Queen. Moreover, the young Queen does not lie from simple motives of malice, as Phaedra and the nameless wife of Potiphar do. She does so out of self-preservation, fearing a husband who has locked her up like an animal and can now kill her on the spot for her adultery. The Middleton story does not, as its antecedents did, confine moral blame only to the woman, and it offers more insight into the pressures and constraints which can lead men or women to resort to duplicity.

It is no accident that the jealous husband is referred to throughout the play as 'the tyrant', even by his own servants. He is a domestic as well as a public tyrant in every sense. He usurps Lydia, incarcerates his wife (Roxano is bluntly described as her 'keeper') and predictably opposes his daughter's choice of husband. In Thyestes it is Atreus who is the usurper, but Armatrites is a Machiavellian tyrant, rather than a Senecan one, because he brings specious justifications and pragmatic evaluations of everything that he does. Armatrites has invented his betrayal by the young Queen through his own previous treachery to the King of Lydia, without which Tymethes would never have had opportunity to get into this particular entanglement. The web of treachery, of cause and effect, is carefully woven.

The final scene of The Bloody Banquet presents a spectacle of tyranny overthrown, but it is also much more than that. The guilty young Queen is now presented as an object for compassion as she endures her public humiliation. In her, disparate strands of the myth are woven together: she is eating her lover but again in another sense eating her own child, and she is also a penitent eating in humility the child of her host, the Old King. Perhaps we are meant to believe that through it she achieves redemption before her death. At any rate, none of the horror is merely sensational and this scene is a complex achievement. The soldiers' cry of 'Speranza!' alludes back to the opening of the play, while the discharge of pistols which kills the Tyrant echoes the earlier one in the climactic central scene when Tymethes was dispatched by the young Queen.

This ending is more politically forthright than later plays in the Dekker canon: in The Noble Spanish Soldier the wicked King of France takes poison by accident rather than being killed by the conspirators. Middleton, on the other hand, had few inhibitions about dramatizing tyrannicide. His canon supplies a large proportion of the Jacobean genre that Albert Tricomi calls 'anti-court drama'. Chronologically, the tyrannicide in The Bloody Banquet apparently belongs to the period between those in The Revenger's Tragedy (1606) and The Lady's Tragedy (1611). Taylor (2002), on the basis of topical allusions and stylistic tests, places it c.1609.

In The Lady's Tragedy once more we have a female protagonist who lacks a baptismal name married to an usurper who is known generically as 'Tyrant'. That Tyrant's death in the final scene—fondling her corpse, poisoned by kissing the pigment he has commanded to be painted on her lips and cheeks—is a stroke of necrophiliac horror closely comparable to that in the final scene of The Bloody Banquet. Both can be compared to Vindice's fondling of the skull of his beloved, at the beginning of The Revenger's Tragedy, and his later use of that skull, appropriately painted with poison, to kill the lecherous and tyrannical Duke. Such comparisons do not prove that one man wrote all three plays; the proof of Middleton's authorship of all three comes from many kinds of interlocking stylistic evidence. In the case of The Bloody Banquet, Middleton's authorship of the Young Queen plot was first suggested by E. H. C. Oliphant in 1925, and confirmed by Gary Taylor in 2000; we provide further evidence in this edition. But the narrative, thematic, and emotional links between The Revenger's Tragedy, the Young Queen plot in The Bloody Banquet, and The Lady's Tragedy create an intelligible pattern of tragedies with a family resemblance, written between 1606 and 1611.

Like The Bloody Banquet, The Lady's Tragedy opens with the entrance of the new usurper of the kingdom. In the later play, Sophonirus tells the Tyrant that cuckoldry is good for one's health. He speaks from experience, declaring 'I draw my life out by the bargain | Some twelve years longer than the times appointed, | When my young prodigal gallant kick up's heels | At one-and-thirty, and lies dead and rotten | Some five-and-forty years before I'm confined' (I.I.44-8). Here are the fundamental assumptions that underlie The Bloody Banquet: sexual activity vitiates the system, whereas male chastity conserves the body's strength. The penalty for sexual abandonment is, literally, death.

Both The Bloody Banquet and The Lady's Tragedy are plays of horror, a genre not nowadays rated very highly on the scale of aesthetic achievement. But their transgression of certain boundaries of 'good taste'—an ironic phrase, in this context—is surely as deliberate as that of, say, Oscar Wilde's Salome. The composition of more than one work in a similar vein probably indicates that the first was a success on stage. Nobody repeats a failure. The first anthology of memorable passages from English Renaissance drama—John Cotgrave's English Treasury (1655)—quotes The Bloody Banquet fifteen times: more than any other Middleton play but The Revenger's Tragedy, more than any Shakespeare play but Hamlet. Nobody quotes a failure. In its own time, The Bloody Banquet seems to have been a theatrical and literary success. Only good modern productions of high standard might help us understand why.

KING Will nothing satisfy but all?
 TYRANT Without all, nothing.
 30 The kingdom, and not under, suits our blood.
 Flies are not eagles' preys, nor thanks our food.
 And for Cilicia, our other sphere—
 Our son Zenarchus, let thy beams move there.
 ZENARCHUS
 Rather, my lord, let me move pity here
 35 Unto that reverend fate-afflicted king—
 For whom, with his disconsolate son (my friend
 And plighted brother) I here kneel as suitor.
 [Zenarchus and Tymethes kneel]
 O my most noble father, still retain
 The seal of honour and religion.
 40 A kingdom rightfully possessed by course
 Contains more joy than is usurped by force.
 TYRANT [aside] The boy hath almost changed us.
 MAZERES [aside]
 He cools.—My lord, remember: you are possessed.
 TYRANT What, with the devil?
 MAZERES
 45 The devil! The dukedom, the kingdom, Lydia.
 All pant under your sceptre; the sway's yours.
 Be not bought out with words. A kingdom's dear.
 Kiss fortune, keep your mind, and keep your state.
 You're laughed at if you prove compassionate.
 TYRANT
 50 Thanks to Mazerés; he hath refreshed our spirits.—
 Zenarchus, 'tis thy death if thou proceed.
 Thy words we threat; rise silent, or else bleed.
 [Zenarchus and Tymethes rise]
 KING
 Who can expect but blood where tyrants govern?
 TYRANT
 55 We are not yet so cruel to thy fortune
 As was Lapyrus, thy own nephew, treacherous—
 That stole upon thy life, besieged thee basely,
 And had betrayed thee to thine enemies' anger
 Had we not beat his strength to his own throat
 And made him shrink before us. All can tell 60 In him 'twas monstrous; 'tis in us but . . . well,
 A trick of war, advantage, policy—
 Nay, rather recompense.
 There's more deceit in peace: 'tis common there
 T'unfold young heirs; the old may well stand bare.
 65 You have your life, be thankful—and 'tis more Than your perfidious nephew would consent to,
 Had he surprised you first. Your fate is cast.

The sooner you be gone, 'twill prove the safer.
 KING
 On thee, Lapyrus, and thy treacheries, fall
 The heavy burden of an old man's curse. 70
 FIDELIO
 Your Queen with her two infants fled the city,
 Affrighted at this treason and new wars.
 KING
 News of more sadness than the kingdom's loss!
 She fled upon her hour, for had she stayed
 She'd either died, been banished or betrayed.— 75
 I have some servants here.
 AMORPHO All these, my lord.
 KING All these? Not all. You did forget:
 I am not worth the flattering. I am done,
 Old and at set; honour the rising sun.
 80 If any for love serve me, which is he?
 Now let him shame the world and follow me.
 FIDELIO
 That's I, my lord.
 AMORPHO And I.
 KING What, two of you?—
 Let it be enrolled
 Two follow a king when he is poor and old. 85
Exit cum suis
 SERTORIO Farewell, king.
 I'll play the flounder: keep me to my tide.
 LODOVICO
 And so will I: this is the flowing side.
 MAZERES [to Tyrant]
 Those men are yours, my lord.
 TYRANT We'll grace them chiefly.—
 Wait for employment, place and eminence;
 90 The like to each that to our bounty flies,
 For he that falls to us shall surely rise.—
 [Menarchus and the Tyrant speak apart]
 His son Tymethes little frights our thoughts:
 He's young, and given to pleasure, not to plots.
 MAZERES
 Your grace defines him right. He may remain;
 95 The Prince, your son, binds him in a love-chain.
 There's little fear of him.
 TYRANT Their loves are dear.
 Base boy, he leaves his father to live here.
 MAZERES
 His presence sets a gloss on your attempts;
 They have their lustre from him.
 TYRANT He's their countenance. 100

 5 What fate pursues the good old King my husband,
 I cannot learn, which is my worst affliction.
 O treacherous Lapyrus! Impious nephew!
 All horrors of a guilty breast keep with thee!—
 10 Either, poor babes, you must pine here for food,
 Or have the wars drink your immaculate blood.
Cry within, 'Follow! Follow!'
 O fly, lest life and honour be betrayed. Exit

1.3 Enter Lapyrus disguised [with a false beard, etc.]
 LAPYRUS
 Villain and fugitive, where wilt thou hide
 Th'abhorred burden of thy wretched flesh?
 In what disguise canst thou be safe and free,
 Having betrayed thy country? Base Lapyrus!
 [He prepares to kill himself]
 5 Earth, stretch thy throat: take down this bitter pill,
 Loathing the hateful taste of his own ill.
Enter the [old] Queen and two soldiers [now thieves] pursuing her

OLD QUEEN
 O help! Good heaven, save a poor wretch from slaughter!

FIRST THIEF [to Second Thief]
 Stop her mouth first. Soldiers must have their sport.
 'Tis dearly earned; they venture their blood for't.

LAPYRUS [aside]
 10 A mother so enforced by pitiless slaves?
 Let me redeem my honour in her rescue,
 And in this deed my former baseness die.

SECOND THIEF [to Old Queen] Come, come.

OLD QUEEN
 If ever woman bore you—

LAPYRUS [coming forward] Whoe'er bore them,
 15 Monsters begot them. Merciless damned villains!

BOTH [THIEVES]
 Hold, hold, sir; we are soldiers, but do not love to fight. Exeunt [soldiers]

OLD QUEEN [to Lapyrus]
 Let me dissuade you from all hope of recompense
 Save thanks and prayers, which are the beggar's gifts.

LAPYRUS
 20 You cannot give me that I have more need of
 Than prayers, for my soul hath a poor stock.
 There's a fair house within, but 'tis ill furnished:
 There wants true tears for hangings, penitent falls—
 For without prayers, soldiers are but bare walls.
 Whence are you? that with such a careful charge
 Dare pass this dangerous forest?

25 OLD QUEEN Generous sir,

I was of Lydia once, as happy then
 As now unfortunate, till one Lapyrus,
 That traitorous villain, nephew to the King,
 Sought the confusion of his state and him,
 30 And with a secret army girt his land
 When peace was plighted by his enemy's hand,
 Little expecting such unnatural treason
 From forth a kinsman's bosom; all admired
 But I his miserable queen.
 LAPYRUS [aside]
 O sink into perdition! Let me hear no further. 35

OLD QUEEN
 I'll tell you all—for your so late attempt
 Confirms you honest, and my thoughts so keep you.
 I, frighted at new wars and his false breath,
 Chose rather with these babes this lingering death.

LAPYRUS [aside]
 40 O, in her words I endure a thousand deaths!

OLD QUEEN
 The truth of this sad story hath been yours;
 Now, courteous sir, may I request your name?
 That in my prayers I may place the same.

LAPYRUS [aside]
 I'll put my death into her woeful hands.

OLD QUEEN
 45 I hear you not, sir. I desire your name.

LAPYRUS
 To add some small content to your distress,
 Know that Lapyrus, whom your miseries
 May rightly curse and be revenged justly,
 Lurks in this forest equally distressed.

OLD QUEEN
 50 Lurks in this forest that abhorred villain?

LAPYRUS
 These eyes did see him—and faith, lady, say
 If you should meet that worst of villains here,
 That treacher, monster, what would you attempt?

OLD QUEEN
 55 His speedy death. I should forget all mercy,
 Had I but means fully to express my vengeance.

LAPYRUS
 You would not, Queen.

OLD QUEEN No? By these infants' tears
 That weep for hunger, I would throughly do't.

LAPYRUS
 See, yonder he comes.

OLD QUEEN O where?

LAPYRUS Here, take my sword.
 Are you yet constant? Shame your sex, and be so.
 Will you do't?

OLD QUEEN I see him not. 60

	Strike him through his guilt and treachery And let him see the horrors of his perjured soul. Are you ready?		ZENARCHUS Come, come, drive away these fits. Faith, I'll have thee merry.
	OLD QUEEN Pray let me see him first. [Lapyrus] pulls off his false beard and kneels		TYMETHES As your son and heir at his father's funeral.
	LAPYRUS You see him now—now do't!		ZENARCHUS Thou seest my sister constantly affects thee.
65	OLD QUEEN Lapyrus! O fortunate revenge! Now all thy villainies Shall be at once requited: thy country's ruin, The King thy uncle's sorrow, my own miseries, Shall at this minute all one vengeance meet.— Alas, he doth submit, prays, and relents.		TYMETHES There were no mirth nor music else for me.
70	Who could wish more? None made from woman can. Small glory 'twere to kill a kneeling man. When he in penitent sighs his soul commends Thou send'st him to the gods, thyself to th' fiends.— But hearken to thy piteous infants' cries,		ZENARCHUS Sir, in this castle the old King my father, O'erworn with jealousy, keeps his beautiful wife; I think thou never saw'st her.	5

	LAPYRUS [rising] Will misery yet a longer life afford, To see a queen so poor, not worth her word?		TYMETHES I speak my affection.
85	OLD QUEEN I am better than my word; my word was death.		ZENARCHUS Nay on my knowledge she's worth jealousy, Enter Roxano Though jealousy be far unworth a king.	10

	OLD QUEEN I pardon all, Lapyrus.		ZENARCHUS How cheers the Queen? They whisper
	LAPYRUS Do not do't.		TYMETHES [aside] Have I not seen this fellow before now? He has an excellent presence for a pander; I know not his office.
90	OLD QUEEN And only to one penance I enjoin thee For all thy faults past: while we here remain Within this forest, this thy task shall be— To procure succour to my babes and me.		ZENARCHUS [to Roxano] Use those words to her.	15
	LAPYRUS And if I fail, may the earth swallow me.		ROXANO They shall be used, my lord—and any thing That comes to using, let it come to me.	Exit

 30 What mad lords are your jealous people then,
 That lock their wives from all men but their men?
 Make 'em their keepers, to prevent some greater.
 So oft it happens to the poor's relief:
 Keepers eat venison, when their lords eat beef.
Enter young Queen with a book in her hand
 35 See, see, she comes.
 TYMETHES [aside]
 Honour of beauty! There man's wishes rise.
 Grace and perfection lighten from her eyes;
 Amazement is shot through me.
 ZENARCHUS 'Tis Tymethes, lady,
 Son to the banished King.
 40 QUEEN Is this he?
 ZENARCHUS It is, sweet lady.
 QUEEN [aside]
 I never knew the force of a desire
 Until this minute struck within my blood.
 I fear one look was destined to undo me.
 ZENARCHUS
 Why, Tymethes! Friend?
 TYMETHES Ha?
 45 ZENARCHUS A courtier,
 And forget your first weapon? Go and salute
 Our lady mother.
 QUEEN [aside] He makes towards us.—
 You're Prince Tymethes? So I understand.
 TYMETHES
 The same unfortunate, most gracious lady,
 50 Supremest of your sex in all perfections.
 QUEEN
 Sir, you're forgetful. This is no place for courtship,
 Nor we a subject for't. Return to your friend.
 TYMETHES [aside] All hopes killed in their blossom.
 QUEEN [aside]
 Too cruelly, in faith, I put him by.—
 55 Wine for our son Zenarchus! 'Twas done kindly.
Enter Roxano with wine
 You, son, and our best visitant—
 ZENARCHUS Duty binds me.
 QUEEN
 Begin to me, Zenarchus; I'll have't so.
 [Zenarchus pledges her, then gives her the cup]
 TYMETHES [aside]
 Why then there's hope she'll take occasion

To drink to me; she hath no means t'avoid it.
 QUEEN [aside]
 I'll prevent all loose thoughts, drink to myself. 60
Drinks and gives Roxano the cup
 My mind walks yonder, but suspèct walks here.
 TYMETHES [aside]
 The devil's on that side and engrosses all,
 Smiles, favours, common courtesies—none can fall
 But he has a snatch at 'em. Not drink to me?
 QUEEN [to Roxano]
 Make you yon stranger drink.
Roxano offers it him
 TYMETHES [refusing the cup] Pox on't, not I. 65
 QUEEN [aside]
 I speak strange words against my fantasy.
 ZENARCHUS
 Prithee, Tymethes, drink!
 TYMETHES I am not dry.
 ZENARCHUS
 I think so too; dry, and so young? 'Twere strange.
 Come prithee, drink to the Queen, my mother.
 TYMETHES
 You shall rule me.—Unto that beauteous majesty! 70
 [He pledges the Queen, then gives her the cup]
 QUEEN Thanks, noble sir.
 [Aside] I must be wary; my mind's dangerous.—
 I'll pledge you anon, sir.
Gives Roxano the cup. [Exit Roxano]
 TYMETHES [aside]
 Heart! How contempt ill fortune does pursue!
 Not drink, nor pledge: what was she born to do? 75
 I'll stay no longer, lest I get that flame
 Which nothing but cold death can quench or tame.—
 Zenarchus, come. Exit
 ZENARCHUS I go.—
 Music of mind to the Queen.
 QUEEN To you no less. 80
 ZENARCHUS
 And all that you can wish, or I express. Exit
 QUEEN Thanks to our son!—
 Th'other took leave in silence, but left me
 To speak enough both for myself and he.
 Tymethes? That's his name. Poor heart, take heed: 85
 Look well into th'event ere thou proceed.
 Love, yet be wise; impossible, none can.
 If e'er the wise man claim one foolish hour,

31 their men their servants

34.1 book (probably a prayer book or Bible: see 3.2)

46 first weapon i.e. tongue (but suggesting 'penis')

55 son stepson

57 Begin (For the woman to pledge first would suggest excessive familiarity or forwardness.)

58-9 Why... t'avoid it Normally pledging goes in a round: A (Zenarchus) pledges B (Young Queen), who pledges C (Tymethes), who pledges A (Zenarchus).

60 I'll... myself She drinks the second toast without pledging to anyone, disappointing Tymethes' expectation. He was hoping for this as a sign of flirtation.

61 My... here (Her thoughts are on Tymethes, but she fears observation by Roxano and Zenarchus.)

62 devil's i.e. Roxano

65 refusing the cup (because she has not pledged him first in the correct sequence.

His show of pique is flirtatious in itself.)

66 strange unfriendly fantasy inclination, desire

67 dry (a) thirsty; (b) deficient in semen

78 Exit Now that Tymethes has done the courteous thing and pledged the Queen, she postpones replying to him. He misinterprets this as a snub (because of his fallen social status), and retaliates by leaving without a word.

86 th'event consequence

- 'Tis when he loves; he's then in folly's power.
 I need not fear the servants that o'erwatch me;
 Their faiths lie in my coffers, in effect,
 More true to me than to my lord's suspèct.
 The fears and dangers that most threaten me
 Live in the party that I must enjoy,
 And that's Tymethes. Men are apt to boast.
 He may in full cups blaze and vaunt himself
 Unto some meaner mistress, make my shame
 The politic engine to beat down her name,
 And from thence force a way to the King's ears.
 Strange fate: where my love keeps, there keep my fears.
Enter Tyrant [apart]
 TYRANT [aside]
 Alone? Why, where's her guard? Suffer her alone?
 Her thoughts may work; their powers are not her own.
 Women have of themselves no entire sway;
 Like dial needles they wave every way,
 And must be thoroughly taught to be kept right
 And point to none but to their lord's delight.
 Time to convey and plot? Leave her alone!—
 Why, villains!
 [Enter Roxano and guard]
 [To Queen] Kiss me, my perfection.
 [They kiss]
 This night we'll banquet in these blissful arms.
 QUEEN
 Your nights are music, and your words are charms.
 TYRANT Kiss me again, fair Thetis.
 [They kiss. He] walks off with her, and the guard follows
 ROXANO
 My lady is scarce perfect in her thoughts,
 Howe'er she framed a smile upon the tyrant.
 I have some skill in faces—and yet they never were more deceitful. A man can scarce know a bawd from a midwife by the face, an hypocritical puritan from a devout Christian, if you go by the face. Well, all's not straight in my lady. She hath certain crooked cogitations, if a man had the liberty to search 'em.
 If aught point at my advice or performance, she may fortunately disclose it: she knows my mettle, and what it yields to an ounce. She cannot be deceived in't:
 here's service, and secrecy, and no lady can wish more, beside a monkey. She is assured of our faculties; there's none of us all that stand her smock-sentinels but would venture a joint to do her any pleasurable service, and I think that's as much as any woman desires.—Mass, here she comes.
Enter [young] Queen sad
 'Tis some strange physis; I know by the working.
 QUEEN [aside]
 It cannot be kept down with any argument.
 'Tis of aspiring force; sparks fly not downward,
 No more this received fancy of Tymethes.
 I threaten it with my lord's jealousy,
 Yet still it rises against all objections.
 I see my dangers, in what fears I dwell;
 There's but a plank on which I run to hell,
 Yet were't thrice narrower I should venture on.
 None dares do more for sin than woman can.
 Misery of love—Roxano? I am observed.—
 What news, Roxano?
 ROXANO None that's good, madam.
 QUEEN No? Which is the bad?
 ROXANO
 The worst of all is, madam, you are sad.
 QUEEN Indeed I am not merry.
 ROXANO
 Would I knew the means would make you so!
 I would turn myself into any shape or office
 To be the author on't, sweet lady.
 QUEEN Troth,
 I have that hope of thee, I think thou wouldst.
 ROXANO
 Think it? 'Sfoot, you might swear safely in that action
 And never hurt your oath. I ne'er failed yet.
 QUEEN
 'Twere sin to injure thee; I know thou didst not.
 ROXANO
 Nay, I know I did not.
 QUEEN But, my trusty servant,
 This plot requires art, secrecy and wit,
 Yet out of all can hardly work one safety.
 ROXANO
 Not one? That's strange. I would 'twere put to me.
 I'll make it arrive safe whate'er it be.
 QUEEN
 Thou couldst not, my Roxano. Why, admit I love,
 Now I come to thee.
 ROXANO Admit you love?
 Why, all's safe enough yet.

95 Men... boast (Her scruples are pragmatic, not ethical.)
 97-8 make... name mention his success with me in order to impress some other woman and persuade her to yield to him
 101 Alone? (He not only incarcerates her, but demands that she be kept under constant observation.)

104 dial compass
 105 thoroughly thoroughly
 109 banquet feast (sexually)
 116 puritan non-conformist Protestant: see Puritan Widow
 121 mettle spirit (punning on 'metal')
 123 service (sexual pun)
 124 monkey expensive and fashionable pet

(notoriously lecherous)
 125 stand (punning on 'sexually erect') smock-sentinels guardians of her chastity. (Smocks were worn as undergarments or nightwear.)
 126 venture a joint risk a limb (probably bawdy)

QUEEN Ay, but a stranger?

160 ROXANO Nay, now we are all spoiled, lady. I may look for my brains in my boots—now you have put home to me indeed, madam. A stranger? There's a hundred deaths i'th' very name, besides vantage.

QUEEN I said I should affright thee.

165 ROXANO Faith, no fool can fright me, madam, commonly called a stranger.

QUEEN Hast thou the will? Or dar'st thou do me good?

ROXANO Do thee good, sweet lady? As far as I am able, ne'er doubt it. Let me but cast about for safety, and I'll do anything, madam.

170 QUEEN Ay, ay, our safeties, which are mere impossibles. Love forgets all things but its proper objects.

ROXANO What is he? And his name?

QUEEN Tymethes, in a most unlucky minute

175 Led hither by our son-in-law Zenarchus.

ROXANO Hmm...is that the most fortunate, spider-catching, smock-wrapped gentleman?

QUEEN Yet if he know me—

ROXANO What then?

QUEEN I am undone.

ROXANO And is it possible a man should lie with a woman, and yet not know her? And yet 'tis possible too—

180 Thank my invention, follow that game still.

QUEEN He must not know me. Then I love no further, Although for not enjoying him I die. My lord's pale jealousy does so o'erlook me 185 That if Tymethes know what he enjoys It may make way unto my lord's mistrust; Then, since in my desire such horrors move, I'll die no other than the death of love.

She swoons, and Roxano holds her in his arms

ROXANO Lady! Madam, do you hear? Have you leisure to swoon now, when I have taken such pains i'th' business to take order for your safety, set all things right? Why, Madam!

190 QUEEN What says the man?

ROXANO Why, he says like a gentleman, every inch of him, and will perform the office of a gentleman: bring you together, put you together, and leave you together. What gentleman can do more?

QUEEN And all this safely?

ROXANO And all this safely. Ay, by this hand will I, or else would I might never do anything to purpose. If he have but the first part of a young gentleman in him, 'tis granted, madam. I have crotchets in my brain that you shall see him and enjoy him, and he not know where he is, nor who it is.

QUEEN How? Shall he not know me?

200 ROXANO Why 'tis the least part of my meaning he should, lady. Do you think you could possibly be safe, an he know you? Why, some of your young gallants are of that vainglorious and preposterous humour that if they lay with their own sisters you should hear 'em prate on't! This is too usual. There's no wonder in't. What I have said, I will swear to perform: you shall enjoy him ere night, and he not know you next morning.

QUEEN Thou art not only necessary but pleasing, There, catch our bounty.

[She gives him gold]

Manage all but right,

215 As now with gold, with honours we'll requite.

ROXANO I am your creature, lady. [Exit Queen]

Pretty gold,

And by this light methinks most easily earned. There's no faculty, say I, like a pander, and that makes so many nowadays die i'th' trade. I have your gold, lady,

220 And eke your service. I am one step higher; This office makes a gentleman a squire. Exit

2.1

[In the act-time, a tree with fruit set out, and the trapdoor is opened.] Enter Clown and two Shepherds [carrying boughs]

FIRST SHEPHERD Come, fellow Corydon, are the pits digged?

159 stranger i.e. not her husband, or Roxano; but also 'foreigner'

160 now...spoiled (She has dashed his hopes. His preceding speeches have suggested that he would like to sleep with her himself.)

163 besides vantage and a little more (perhaps suggesting 'not counting my commission')

175 son-in-law stepson

176-7 spider-catching (comparing women to spiders, because they 'ensnare' men: Tymethes ensnares women, who normally ensnare men)

177 smock-wrapped (a) successful with women; (b) wrapped in a lady's smock like a spider's victim in a web

180 not know her (punning on the cognitive and sexual senses)

182 Then therefore

184 o'erlook supervise

188 die (punning on 'have an orgasm')

194 inch (alluding to penis measurements)

195 perform...gentleman (probably bawdy)

201 first part (a) prime personal quality or attribute; (b) most important body part, i.e. penis

202 crotchets fanciful devices

205, 208 know (punning again)

207 an if

217 your creature (a) your servant; (b) only what you have made me

219 faculty branch of art or science

223 squire pimp

2.1 Middleton, probably with Dekker.

1 Corydon (conventional name for a shepherd in pastoral literature)

- CLOWN Ay, and as deep as an usurer's conscience, I warrant thee.
- 5 SECOND SHEPHERD Mass, and that's deep enough; 'twill devour a widow and three orphans at a breakfast. Soft, is this it?
- FIRST SHEPHERD Ay, ay, this is it.
- CLOWN Nay, for the deepness I'll be sworn. But come, my masters, and lay these boughs crossover, so, so, 10 artificially, and may all those whoreson muttonmongers the wolves hole here, which eat our sheep.
[The lay boughs over the open pit]
- SECOND SHEPHERD I wonder what wolves those are which eat our sheep, whether they be he-wolves or she-wolves?
- CLOWN 15 They should be he-wolves by their loving mutton, But by their greediness they should be she-wolves, For the belly of a she-wolf Is never satisfied till it be dammed up.
- FIRST SHEPHERD Why are the she-wolves worse than the he's?
- CLOWN 20 Why, is not the dam worse than the devil, pray?
- FIRST SHEPHERD You have answered me there indeed.
- CLOWN Why, man, if all the earth were parchment, the sea ink, every stick a pen, and every knave a scrivener, they were not all able to write down the knaveries of 25 she-wolves.
- SECOND SHEPHERD A murrain on them, he's or she's! They suck the blood of none but our lambs.
- CLOWN O always the weakest goes to the wall—as for example, knock down a sheep and he tumbles forwards, knock down a woman and she tumbles backwards. 30
- FIRST SHEPHERD Sirrah, I wonder how many sorts of wolves there be?
- CLOWN Marry, just as many sorts as there be knaves in the cards.
- 35 SECOND SHEPHERD Why, that's four.
- CLOWN First, there are your court-wolves, and those be foul eaters and clean drinkers.
- SECOND SHEPHERD And why 'clean drinkers'?
- CLOWN Why, because when they be drunk they commonly cast up all, and so make cleansing work on't. 40
- SECOND SHEPHERD So sir, those are clean drinkers, indeed.
- CLOWN The next are your country-wolves: nothing chokes them but plenty. They sing like sirens when corn goes out by shipfulls, and dance after no tune but after 'an angel a bushel'. 45
- FIRST SHEPHERD The halter take such corn-cutters!
- SECOND SHEPHERD [to Clown] Are there no city-wolves?
- CLOWN A rope on them! Yes, huge routs, you shall have Long Lane full of them. They'll feed upon any whore, carrion, thief, or anything. 50
- FIRST SHEPHERD Have they such maws?
- CLOWN Maws? Why, man, fiddlers have no better guts. I have known some of them eat up a lord at three bites.
- SECOND SHEPHERD Three bonds, you mean.
- CLOWN A knight is nobody with them; a young gentleman 55 is swallowed whole, like a gudgeon.
- FIRST SHEPHERD I wonder that gudgeon does not choke him.
- CLOWN A gudgeon choke him? If the throat of his conscience be sound, he'll gulp down anything. Five of 60 your silken gallants are swallowed easier than a damask prune—for our city-wolves do so roll my young prodigal first in wax (which is soft), till he look like a gilded pill, and then so finely wrap him up in satin (which is sleek), that he goes down without chewing, and thereupon 65 they are called slippery gallants.
- FIRST SHEPHERD I'll be no gentleman for that trick.
- CLOWN The last is your sea-wolf, a horrible ravener too: he has a belly as big as a ship, and devours as much silk at a gulp as would serve forty dozen tailors against 70 a Christmas Day or a running at tilt.
- FIRST SHEPHERD Well, well, now our trap is set what shall we do with the wolves we catch?
- CLOWN Why, those that are great ones and more than our matches we'll let go, and the lesser wolves we will 75 hang: shall it be so?
- BOTH SHEPHERDS Ay, ay, each man to his stand.
Exeunt [severally]

10 artificially with careful design

11 hole here fall in this hole

15 mutton (a) female sheep; (b) prostitutes

17 belly (a) stomach; (b) womb

18 dammed up stuffed full

20 dam mother

28 weakest . . . wall proverbial: the weakest go under.

30 backwards i.e. onto her back, ready to be sexually mounted

39–40 drunk . . . all (probably alluding to notorious incidents of drunken vomiting in the Jacobean court)

42–6 nothing . . . corn-cutters The farmers export grain, either to get higher prices for it abroad, or to keep prices up at home by creating a shortage. (Such exports were forbidden by proclamation in June 1608.)

45 angel gold coin worth ten shillings

46 corn-cutters farmers (but punning on chiropodist, 'persons who cuts corns from the feet')

49 Long Lane street in the City of London (north of St Paul's, running from Smithfield to the Barbican) occupied by usurers, pawnbrokers and rogues

52 guts (a) stomachs, appetites; (b) animal guts used to make strings for musical instruments

53 bites (a) mouthfuls; (b) bits

62–3 roll . . . wax i.e. get him to sign legal documents or bonds, which are sealed with wax

64 satin (a) cloth used in expensive fashionable clothing; (b) satin ribbons with which deeds and other legal documents were tied up

68 sea-wolf pirate (subject of sensational news accounts in 1609, and an increasing problem for English shipping)

71 Christmas . . . tilt (occasions for which courtiers would order new clothes)

74–6 great ones . . . hang (proverbial)

2.2 Enter Lapyrus solus

LAPYRUS
Foul monster-monger, who must live by that
Which is thy own destruction: why should men
Be nature's bond-slaves? Every creature else
Comes freely to the table of the earth;
5 That which for man alone doth all things bear
Scarce gives him his true diet anywhere.
What spiteful winds breathe here, that not a tree Spreads forth a friendly arm? Distressèd Queen,
And most accursèd babes! The earth that bears you
Like a proud mother scorns to give you food.
[He sees fruit on the tree]

10 Ha!
Thanks, fate! I now defy thee, starveling hunger.
Blessed tree, four lives grow in thy fruit. Run, taste it
then:
Wise men serve first themselves, then other men.
He falls in the pit

15 O me accursèd and most miserable!
Help, help! Some angel lay a list'ning ear
To draw my cry up!—None to lend help? O,
Then pine and die.
Enter Clown

CLOWN A wolf caught, a wolf caught!
LAPYRUS O help! I am no wolf, good friend.
20 CLOWN No? What art thou then?
LAPYRUS A miserable wretch.
CLOWN An usurer?
LAPYRUS No, no.
CLOWN A broker then?
LAPYRUS

25 Mock not a man in woe: in a green wound
Pour balsam, and not physis.
CLOWN 'Snails, he talks like a surgeon.—If you be one,
why do you not help yourself, sir?
LAPYRUS

I am no surgeon, friend; my name's Lapyrus.
30 CLOWN How? A wolf caught, ho!—Lap what Lap ho!
LAPYRUS
Lapyrus is my name; dost thou not know me?

CLOWN Yes, for a wolfish rascal that would have worried his own country.
LAPYRUS
Torture me not, I prithee. I am that wretch;
A villain I was once, but I am now— 35
CLOWN The devil in the vault! You, sirrah, that betrayed your country and the old King your uncle, there lie till one wolf devour another, thou treacherous rascal.
[Cover the pit, and] exit

LAPYRUS
O me most miserable and wretched creature!
I now do find there's a revenging fate 40
That dooms bad men to be unfortunate.

Enter Zenarchus, Tymethes, Amphridote, and Mazeres [following behind them] 2.3

TYMETHES
We are observed.
ZENARCHUS By whom?
TYMETHES Mazeres follows us.
AMPHRIDOTE
O, he's my protested servant, your sole rival.
TYMETHES The devil he is!
AMPHRIDOTE
You'll make a hot suitor of him anon.
TYMETHES
He may be hot in th'end; his good parts sue for't. 5
ZENARCHUS
He eyes us still.
TYMETHES He does. You shall depart, lady.
I'll take my leave o' purpose in his presence.
He's jealous, and a kiss runs through his heart:
I'll make a thrust at him upon your lip.
MAZERES [aside]
Death! Minute favours? Every step a kiss? 10
I think they count how the day goes by kissing;
'Tis past four since I met 'em.
TYMETHES
I've hit him in the gall; instead of blood,
He sheds distractions, which are worse than wounds.
ZENARCHUS But sirrah! 15

2.2 Dekker.

0.1 solus alone (Latin)

1-6 Foul... anywhere Lapyrus wonders why Nature has made it so difficult for human beings to find anything edible in the wilds where he is: humans can only find or grow food by hard labour, which is 'thy own destruction', i.e. he has almost exhausted himself in the search. Men are 'Nature's bond-slaves' because they are required to work, unlike other animals.

5 That... bear (According to Genesis, man had dominion over all living things.)

9 bears (a) carries; (b) gives birth to 10 proud mother (Upper-class mothers rarely breast-fed their babies, employing wet-nurses instead.)

12 Blessed tree (alluding to the trees at opposite ends of Christian historical symbolism: the tree in Eden whose fruit Eve and Adam ate, and the 'tree'/cross on which Christ was crucified)
four lives himself, the Old Queen and her two children

13.1 pit (an image of hell, represented in the medieval and Renaissance plays by the space under the stage)

21 miserable (suggesting 'miser' to the Clown, hence 'usurer')

25 green fresh or recent

26 balsam, and not physis soothing medicine, not an unpleasant purgative

27 'Snails 'by God's nails', i.e. the nails used in the crucifixion (strong oath)

28 help yourself (recalling Biblical, 'Physician, heal thyself')

2.3 Middleton.

0.1 Enter (If the tree is still visible onstage, the courtiers are probably imagined strolling outdoors—where they can be accosted by a poor beggar.)

2 protested servant declared suitor

4 hot eager

5 hot in th'end end up in Hell parts qualities (sarcastic)

13 hit... gall galled him

14 distractions mental disturbances (mad jealousy)

- MAZERES [aside]
 Stays he to prove my rival? Cursed be th'hour
 Wherein I advised the King for his stay here!
 I have set slaves t'entrap him, yet none prosper.
 I'll lay no more my faith upon their works.
 20 They're weak and loose and like a rotten wall;
 Leaning on them may hazard my own fall.
 I'll use a swifter course, cut off long journeys
 And tedious ways that run my hopes past breath:
 I'll take the plain roadway and hunt his death. Exit
- TYMETHES
 25 So, so, he departs with a knit brow! No matter.
 When his frown begets earthquakes, haply then
 'Twill shake me too. I shall stand firm till then.
Enter Roxano, disguised
- ROXANO [aside]
 Mass, here a walks. I am far enough from myself.
 I challenge all disguises except drinking 30 To hide me better; I give way to that—for that indeed will thrust a white gentleman into a suit of mud. But whist, I begin to be noted.
- ZENARCHUS Ay, he changed upon't.
 TYMETHES I marked him.
- 35 ROXANO [coming forward, hat in hand] Good your honours, your most comfortable charitable relief and devotion to a poor star-crossed gentleman.
 TYMETHES Pox on thee!
 ROXANO I'm bare enough already, if it like your honour.
- 40 TYMETHES [to Zenarchus and Amphridote] He did?
 ROXANO [aside] 'Pox on thee'? Your young gallants love to give no alms, but that that will stick by a man; that's one virtue in 'em. He's not content to have my hat off, but he would have my hair off too. [To Tymethes] Thank 45 your good lordship!
 TYMETHES [to Amphridote] No! Was that his action?
 AMPHRIDOTE It called him lord.
 ZENARCHUS Nay, he's a villain.
- ROXANO [to them] Good your honours! I have been a man
 50 in my time—
 TYMETHES Why, what art thou now?
 ROXANO —kept goodly beasts, had three wives, two men uprising, three maids down lying. O good your kind honours!
- 55 TYMETHES 'Sfoot, I am a beggar myself.
 ROXANO Perhaps your lordship gets by it. Good your sweet honour!
- TYMETHES [to Zenarchus and Amphridote]
 This fellow would be whipped.
 ROXANO Your Lordship has forgot since you were a beggar.
 TYMETHES
 I'll give thee somewhat for that jest in truth. 60
 [He goes to Roxano. They talk apart]
 ROXANO But now you are in private, shut your purse, and open your ear, sir.
 TYMETHES How?
 ZENARCHUS [to Amphridote]
 He's dealing his devotion; hinder him not.
 ROXANO I am not literally a beggar, as puritanical as I 65 appear. The naked truth is you are happily desired—
 TYMETHES Ha?
 ROXANO —of the most sweet, delicate, divine, pleasing,
 ravishing creature—
 TYMETHES Peace, peace, prithee peace! 70
 ROXANO —that ever made man's wishes perfect.
 TYMETHES
 Nay, say not so. I saw one creature lately
 Exceeds all human form for true perfection:
 This may be beauteous—
 ROXANO This for white and red, sir!
 Her honour and my oath sue for that pardon: 75
 You must not know her name, nor see her face.
 TYMETHES How?
 ROXANO
 She rather chooseth death in her neglect
 Than so to hazard life or lose respect.
 TYMETHES
 How shall I come at her?
 ROXANO Let your will 80
 Subscribe to the sure means already wrought,
 She shall be safely pleased, you safely brought.
 TYMETHES
 Ha! And is this sheer faith, without any trick in't?
 ROXANO
 Let me perish in this office else; and I need wish
 No more damnation than to die a pander. 85
 TYMETHES Thou speakest well. When meet we?
 ROXANO
 Five is the fixèd hour, upon tomorrow's evening.
 TYMETHES
 So, the place?
 ROXANO Near to the further lodge.

At last the Clown gets it, and dandles it, expressing all signs of joy to them. Enter again the Queen; she looks for her babe and, finding it gone, wrings her hands. The shepherds see her, then whisper together, then beckon to her. She joyfully runs to them; they return her child; she points to her breasts, as meaning she should nurse it; they all give her money; the Clown kisses the babe and her, and so exeunt several ways. 3.1 [Incipit Actus Tertius]
Enter Roxano with his disguise in his hand

ROXANO
 This is the farther lodge, the place of meeting;
 The hour scarce come yet. Well, I was not born to this.
 There's not a hair to choose betwixt me and a pander in this case, shift it off as well as I can. I do envy 5 this fellow's happiness now, and could cut his throat at pleasure. I could e'en gnaw feathers now to think of his downy felicity. I that could never aspire above a dairy wench, the very cream of my fortunes—that he should bathe in nectar, and I most unfortunate in buttermilk, 10 this is good dealing now, is't?

Enter Mazerès, musing

MAZERES [aside]

I'll have some other, for he must not live.

ROXANO [aside]

Who's this? My lord Mazerès, discontent?
 He's been to seek me twice, and privately.

I wonder at the business. I'm no statesman:
 15 if I be, 'tis more than I know. I protest therefore, I dare not call it in question. What should he make with me?
 I'll discover myself to him. If th'other come i'th' mean time, so I may be caught bravely; yet 'tis scarce the hour. I'll put it to the trial.

MAZERES [aside]

20 Roxano in my judgement had been fittest,
 And farthest from suspect of such a deed,
 Because he keeps i'th' castle.

ROXANO [coming forward] My loved lord.

MAZERES

Roxano!

ROXANO The same, my lord.

MAZERES

I was to seek thee twice.

Tell me Roxano, have I any power in thee?

25 Do I move there, or any part of me
 Flow in thy blood?

ROXANO As far as life, my lord.

MAZERES As far as love, man,

I ask no further.

ROXANO Touch me then, my lord,
 And try my mettle.

MAZERES First, there's gold for thee,
 30 [He gives him gold]

After which follow favour, eminence,
 And all those gifts which fortune calls her own.
 ROXANO Well, my lord.

MAZERES

There's one Tymethes, son to the banished King,
 Lives about court; Zenarchus gives him grace.

35 That fellow's my disease. I thrive not with him.
 He's like a prison chain shook in my ears.

I take no sleep for him; his favours mad me.

My honours and my dignities are dreams

40 When I behold him. That right arm can ease me.

I will not boast my bounties, but forever

Live rich and happy. Thou art wise; farewell. Exit

ROXANO Hmm, what news is here now? 'Thou art wise;
 farewell'? By my troth, I think it is a part of wisdom

45 to take gold when it is offered. Many wise men will do't: that I learned of my learned counsel. This is worth thinking on now. To kill Tymethes, so strangely beloved by a lady, and so monstrously detested by a lord? Here's gold to bring Tymethes, and here's gold to 50 kill Tymethes. Ay, let me see, which weighs heaviest?

 By my faith, I think the killing gold will carry't! I shall, like many a bad lawyer, run my conscience upon the greatest fee: who gives most is like to fare best. I like my safety so much the worse in this business in that Lord

55 Mazerès is his professed enemy. He's the King's bosom:
 he blows his thoughts into him. And I had rather be torn with whirlwinds than fall into any of their furies.

Troth, as far as I can see, the wisest course is to play
 the knave, lay open this venery, betray him.—But see,

60 my lord again.

Enter Mazerès

MAZERES

Hast thou thought of me? May I do good upon thee?
 I'll out of recreation make thee worthy,

Play honours to thy hand.

ROXANO

My lord?

MAZERES

Art thou resolved an I will be thy lord?

ROXANO It will appear I am so.

65 Be proud of your revenge before I name it.

Never was man so fortunate in his hate.

I'll give you a whole age but to think how.

3.1 Middleton. What is now 3.2 may originally have belonged here, thus contrasting the Young Queen and the Old Queen.

6 gnaw feathers chew his pillow (in frustration)

7 downy (a) made of down, like expensive bedding; (b) exquisitely soft, like skin

7–8 dairy wench (commoner, and hence considered less desirable, sexually, than a

Queen)

18 bravely i.e. without his disguise

23 I... thee I've been to look for you

25–6 Do... blood Do I have any influence with you

30 mettle spirit (punning on 'metal')

46 learned counsel (another dig at the avarice of lawyers)

55 bosom confidant

62 out of recreation (a) from the sheer pleasure of doing it; (b) in recompense for the sexual recreation you enable

63 Play deal out to you (like cards)

hand (a) possession; (b) hand of cards, filled with high cards, which represent 'honoured' persons like kings, queens, etc.

MAZERES
 Thou mak'st me thirst.
 ROXANO Tymethes meets me here.
 MAZERES
 70 Here? Excellent! On, Roxano: he meets thee here...
 ROXANO
 I meant at first to betray all to you, sir:
 Understand that, my lord.
 MAZERES I'faith, I do.
 ROXANO Then thus, my lord—he comes.
Enter Tymethes
 MAZERES [aside to Roxano]
 75 Withdraw behind the lodge; relate it briefly.
 [They withdraw]
 TYMETHES [aside]
 A delicate sweet creature? 'Slight, who should it be?
 I must not know her name, nor see her face?
 It may be some trick to have my bones bastinadoed well, and so sent back again. What say you to a blanketting?
 80 Faith, so 'twere done by a lady and her chambermaids I care not, for if they toss me i'th' blankets I'll toss them i'th' sheets, and that's one for th'other. A man may be led into a thousand villainies. But the fellow swore enough, and here's blood apt enough to believe him.
 MAZERES [aside to Roxano]
 85 I both admire the deed, and my revenge.
 ROXANO [aside to Mazerès]
 My lord, I'll make your way.
 MAZERES Thou mak'st thy friend.
Exit
 [Roxano puts on his disguise, and meets Tymethes]
 TYMETHES
 Art come? We meet e'en jump upon a minute.
 ROXANO
 Ay, but you'll play the better jumper of the two;
 I shall not jump so near as you by a handful.
 TYMETHES
 How! At a running leap?
 90 ROXANO That is more hard:
 At a running leap you may give me a handful.
 TYMETHES So, so, what's to be done?
 ROXANO
 Nothing but put this hood over your head.
 TYMETHES How? I never went blindfold before.
 95 ROXANO You never went otherwise, sir, for all folly is blind.
 Besides, sir, when we see the sin we act,

We think each trivial crime a bloody fact.
 TYMETHES Well followed of a servingman.
 ROXANO Servingmen always follow their masters, sir.
 TYMETHES No, not in their mistresses. 100
 ROXANO There I leave you, sir.
 TYMETHES I desire to be left when I come there, sir.
 But faith, sincerely, is there no trick in this?
 Prithee deal honestly with me.
 ROXANO
 105 Honestly? if protestation be not honest,
 I know not what to call it.
 TYMETHES Why, if she affect me
 So truly, she might trust me with her knowledge.
 I could be secret to her chief actions: why, I love women too well—
 ROXANO She'll trust you the worse for that, sir. 110
 TYMETHES
 Why, because I love women?
 ROXANO O sir, 'tis most common:
 He that loves women, is ne'er true to woman.
 Experience daily proves he loveth none
 With a true heart, that affects more than one.
 TYMETHES
 Your wit runs nimble, sir; pray use your pleasure. 115
 ROXANO
 Why then, good night, sir.
He puts on the hood
 TYMETHES Mass, the candle's out.
 ROXANO
 O sir, the better sports taste best i'th' night,
 And what we do i'th' dark, we hate i'th' light.
 TYMETHES
 A good doer mayst thou prove, for thy experience.
 Come, give me thy hand. Thou mayst prove an honest lad; 120
 But however, I'll trust thee.
 ROXANO O sir, first try me.
 But we protract good hours. Come, follow me, sir.—
 [Aside] Why, this is right your sportive gallants' prize:
 Before they'll lose their sport, they'll lose their eyes.
Exeunt, [Roxano leading Tymethes]

Enter the [young] Queen and four servants, she with a book in her hand 3.2

QUEEN
 O my fear-fighting blood! Are you all here?

3.2 Perhaps written by the adapter, or moved here from its original position before 3.1, in order to replace a scene in which Lapyrus (now a faithful servant) enters leading the Old King (his master) toward an intended rendezvous with the Old Queen; this would be in ironic contrast with Roxano's exit with Tymethes. If the lost scene contained further comment on the exiles' lack of food, it would also have contrasted with the extravagant banquet of 3.3. The scene's authorship is uncertain.

o.2 a book the Bible, on which she asks the servants to swear

Act 3 Scene 2

The Bloody Banquet.

FIRST SERVANT All at your pleasure, madam.
 QUEEN
 That's my wish, and my opinion
 Hath ever been persuaded of your truths,
 5 And I have found you willing t'all employments
 We put into your charge.
 SECOND SERVANT In our faiths, madam.
 THIRD SERVANT
 For we are bound in duty to your bounty.
 QUEEN
 Will you to what I shall prescribe swear secrecy?
 FOURTH SERVANT
 Try us, sweet lady, and you shall prove our faiths.
 QUEEN
 10 To all things that you hear or see,
 I swear you all to secrecy.
 I pour my life into your breasts;
 There my doom or safety rests.
 If you prove untrue to all,
 15 Now I rather choose to fall
 With loss of my desire, than light
 Into the tyrant's wrathful spite.
 But in vain I doubt your trust.
 I never found your hearts but just.
 20 On this book your vows arrive,
 And, as in truth, in favour thrive.
 [The servants swear upon the book]
 OMNES
 We wish no higher; so we swear.
 QUEEN
 Like jewels all your vows I'll wear.
 Here, take this paper; there those secrets dwell.
 25 Go read your charge, which I should blush to tell.
 [The servants take the paper and exeunt]
 All's sure; I nothing doubt of safety now,
 To which each servant hath combined his vow.
 Roxano, that begins it trustily—
 I cannot choose but praise him. He's so needful.
 30 There's nothing can be done about a lady
 But he is for it. Honest Roxano!
 Even from our head to feet he's so officious.
 The time draws on. I feel the minute's here.
 No clock so true as love that strikes in fear. [Exit]
 3.3 Soft music. [Two seats and] a table with lights set out, arras spread [by the Queen's servants]. Enter Roxano leading Tymethes, [hooded]. Mazeret meets them.
 TYMETHES How far lack I yet of my blind pilgrimage?
 MAZERES Whist, Roxano!

ROXANO You are at your—[to Mazeret] In, my lord, away:
 I'll help you to a disguise.
 MAZERES Enough. Exit 5
 TYMETHES
 Methinks I walk in a vault all underground.
 ROXANO
 And now your long lost eyes again are found.
Pulls off the hood
 Good morrow, sir.
 TYMETHES By the mass, the day breaks.
 ROXANO
 Rest here, my lord, and you shall find content
 Catch your desires; stay here, they shall be sent. 10
 TYMETHES
 Though it be night, 'tis morning to that night
 Which brought me hither.
 Ha! The ground spread with arras? What place is
 this?
 Rich hangings? Fair room gloriously furnished?
 Lights and their lustre? Riches and their splendour? 15
 'Tis no mean creature's, these dumb tokens witness.
 Troth, I begin t'affect my hostess better.
 I love her in her absence, though unknown,
 For courtly form that's here observed and shown.
*Loud music. Enter two [visored servants] with a banquet, other two [visored servants] with lights:
 they set 'em down and depart, making obeisance.
 Roxano takes one of them aside*
 ROXANO
 Valesta? Yes, the same. 'Tis my lady's pleasure 20
 You give to me your coat and visor, and attend without
 Till she employ you. [Exit one servant]
 So, now this disguise
 Serves for my lord Mazeret, for he watches
 But fit occasion.—Lecher, now beware.
 Securely sit and fearless quaff and eat: 25
 You'll find sour sauce still, after your sweet meat.
Exit [with coat and visor]
 TYMETHES
 The servants all in visors? By this light,
 I do admire the carriage of her love—
 For I account that woman above wise
 Can sin and hide the shame from a man's eyes. 30
 They never do their easy sex more wrong
 Than when they venture fame upon man's tongue.
 Yet I could swear concealment in love's plot,
 But happy woman that believes me not.
 Whate'er is spoke, o'er to be spoke seems fit. 35
 All still concludes her happiness and wit.

20 vows arrive i.e. place your hands and swear
 30–2 nothing... officious (unintentionally suggesting his sexual interest)
 32 officious eager to please
 3.3 Middleton.

17 t'affect to love
 26 sour sauce i.e. betrayal
 28 carriage manner, management
 32 venture... tongue risk telling a man their name, enabling him to repeat it, and thereby ruin their reputation man's tongue (probably alluding to cunninglingus)

 35 Whate'er... fit anything that is spoken once, is fit to be spoken again

Loud music. Enter Roxano, Mazerés [visored and disguised] and the [three other visored] servants with dishes of sweetmeats. Roxano places them [on the table]. Each, having delivered his dish, makes low obeisance to Tymethes

ROXANO

This banquet from her own hand received grace,
Herself prepared it for you—as appears
By the choice sweets it yields, able to move
40 A man past sense to the delights of love.
I bid you welcome as her most prized guest,
First to this banquet, next to pleasure's feast.

TYMETHES

Whoe'er she be, we thank her and commend
Her care and love to entertain a friend.

ROXANO

45 That speaks her sex's rareness, for to woman
The darkest path love treads is clear and common.
She wishes your content may be as great
As if her presence filled that other seat.

TYMETHES

Convey my thanks to her, and fill some wine.

MAZERES [stepping forward to pour wine]

My lord?

ROXANO [aside]

50 My lord Mazerés caught the office.
I can't but laugh to see how well he plays
The devil in a visor,
Damns where he crouches. Little thinks the prince
Under that face lurks his life's enemy.
55 Yet he but keeps the fashion: great men kill
As flatterers stab, who laugh when they mean ill.

MAZERES [aside]

Now could I poison him fitly, aptly, rarely.
My vengeance speaks me happy: there it goes.
[He poisons the cup]

TYMETHES

Some wine!

MAZERES It comes, my lord.

Enter a Lady with [another cup of] wine

LADY

60 My lady begun to you, sir, and doth commend
This to your heart, and with it her affection.

TYMETHES

I'll pledge her thankfully.

[Tymethes] spills the wine [Mazerés gave him, and pledges with the cup the lady brought]

There!—[To Mazerés] Remove that.

MAZERES

And in this my revenge must be removed
Where first I left it. Now my abused wrath
65 Pursues thy ruin in this dangerous path.

ROXANO [aside]

That cup hath quite dashed my lord Mazerés.

TYMETHES [to the Lady]

Return my faith, my reverence, my respect,
And tell her this, which courteously I find:
She hides her face, but lets me see her mind.

[Exit Lady]

ROXANO [aside] I would not taste of such a banquet to feel 70 that which follows it for the love of an empress. 'Tis more dangerous to be a lecher than to enter upon a breach. Yet how securely he munches!
His thoughts are sweeter than the very meats before
him.

He little dreams of his destruction,
75 His horrid fearful ruin, which cannot be withstood.
The end of venery is disease or blood.

Soft music. Enter the [young] Queen masked in her nightgown, her maid with a shirt and a nightcap.
[The maid puts down the shirt and nightcap.
Exeunt the Queen and maid severally]

TYMETHES

I have not known one happier for his pleasure
Than in that state we are. 'Tis a strange trick,
And sweetly carried. By this light, a delicate creature!
80 And should have a good face, if all hit right.
For they that have good bodies and bad faces
Were all mismatched, and made up in blind places.

ROXANO

The wind and tide serve, sir; you have lighted
Upon a sea of pleasure. Here's your sail, sir, 85 And your top streamer: a fair-wrought shirt and nightcap.

TYMETHES I shall make

A sweet voyage of this.

ROXANO

Ay, if you knew all, sir.

TYMETHES

Is not all known yet? What's to be told?

ROXANO

Five hundred crowns in the shirt sleeve in gold.
90

TYMETHES

How?

ROXANO

'Tis my good lady's pleasure.
No clouds eclipse her bounty; she shines clear.
Some like that pleasure best that costs most dear.
Yet I think your lordship is not of that mind now.
You like that best that brings a banquet with it,
95 And five hundred crowns.

TYMETHES

Ay, by this light do I.

And I think thou art of my mind.

ROXANO We jump somewhat near, sir.

TYMETHES But what does she mean to reward me aforehand? I may prove a eunuch now, for aught she knows.
100

60 begun to you (flirtatiously taking the initiative, as she had refused to do at 1.4.55-78)

77.2 maid (probably the lady-in-waiting who appeared earlier in the scene)

89 told (a) said; (b) tolled, counted

ROXANO O sir, I ne'er knew any of your hair but he was absolute at the game.

TYMETHES Faith, we are much of a colour. But here's a note; what says it?

He reads

105 Our love and bounty shall increase
So long as you regard our peace.
Unless your life you would forego,
Who we are, seek not to know.
Enjoy me freely: for your sake
110 This dangerous shift I undertake.
Be therefore wise; keep safe your breath.
You cannot see me under death.

I'd be loth to venture so far for the sight of any creature under heaven.

115 ROXANO Nay, sir, I think you may see a thousand faces better cheap.

TYMETHES

Well, I will shift me instantly, and be content
With my groping fortune. Exit

ROXANO O sir, you'll grope to purpose. Exit

120 MAZERES [removing his visor] I'll after thee,
And see the measure of my vengeance upheaped.
His ruin is my charge. I have seen that
This night would make one blush thorough this visor.
Like lightning in a tempest her lust shows,
125 Or drinking drunk in thunder, horrible—
For on this act a thousand dangers wait.
The King will seize him in his burning fury
And seal his vengeance on his reeking breast.
Though I make pander's use of ear and eye,
130 No office' vile to damn mine enemy.
This course is but the first. 'Twill not rest there;
The next shall change him into fire and air. Exit

[Finis Actus Tertius]

4.1 [Incipit Actus Quartus]

Enter Tymethes and Zenarchus

TYMETHES Nay, did e'er subtlety match it?

ZENARCHUS

'Slight, led to a lady hoodwinked,
Placéd in state and banqueted in visors!

TYMETHES

5 All, by this light: but all this nothing was
To the delicious pleasures of her bed.

ZENARCHUS

Who should this be?

TYMETHES Nay, enquire not, brother.

I'd give one eye to see her with the other.

Seest thou this jewel? In the midst of night

I slipped it from her veil, unfelt of her.

'T may be so kind unto me as to bring

Her beauty to my knowledge. 10

ZENARCHUS Canst not guess at her,

Nor at the place?

TYMETHES At neither, for my heart.

Why, I'll tell thee, man, 'twas handled with such art,

Such admired cunning, what with my blindness

And their general darkness, that when mine eyes

Received their liberty I was ne'er the nearer. 15

To them in full form I appeared unshrouded,

But all their sights to me were masked and clouded.

Enter Tyrant and Mazerès, observing

ZENARCHUS

'Fore heaven, I do admire the cunning on't.

TYMETHES

Nay, you cannot outvie my admiration. 20

I had a feeling on't, beyond your passion.

ZENARCHUS

Well, blow this over; see, our sister comes.

Enter Amphridote

[Tyrant and Mazerès speak apart]

TYRANT

Art sure, Mazerès, that he courts our daughter?

MAZERES

I'm sure of more, my lord: she favours him.

TYRANT

That beggar?

MAZERES

Worse my lord, that villain traitor— 25

And yet worse my lord.

TYRANT How?

MAZERES

Pardon, my lord, a riper time

Shall bring him forth. Behold him there, my lord.

Tymethes kisses her

TYRANT

Dares she so far forget respect to us,

And dim her own lustre to give him grace? 30

MAZERES

Favours are grown to custom 'twixt 'em both:

Letters, close banquets, whisperings, private meetings.

TYRANT I'll make 'em dangerous meetings.

AMPHRIDOTE [to Tymethes]

In faith, my lord, I'll have this jewel. 35

TYMETHES

'Tis not my gift, lady.

101-2 any...game anybody with hair like yours who was not a superb lover

103 we...colour your hair is pretty much the same colour as mine

110 shift (a) tricky business; (b) transfer of affections

112 under death without the penalty of death

116 better cheap at less cost

117 shift me (a) get moving; (b) transform myself

122 charge office, duty that that thing, something which

125 drunk in thunder (a) incapacitated in dangerous circumstances; (b) defiantly immoral, despite threats from heaven

130 No...enemy I'll stoop to anything to destroy Tymethes.

4.1 Middleton.

2 'Slight contraction for 'by God's light' (oath)

21 feeling physical sensation

22 blow this over keep quiet about this

36 my gift mine to give

- [She gives him the jewel]
- 30 TYRANT That is the same, and all that e'er was his.
 AMPHRIDOTE I gave it you, my lord.
 TYRANT Who gave it thee?
 AMPHRIDOTE Tymethes.
 TYRANT He! Who gave it him?
 AMPHRIDOTE I know not that, my lord.
 TYRANT Then here it sticks.—Mazerés!
- MAZERES My lord?
 TYRANT 'Tis my Queen's, my Queen's, Mazerés.
 35 How to him came this?
 MAZERES I can resolve your highness.
 TYRANT Can Mazerés?
 MAZERES He is some ape: the husk falls from him now,
 And you shall know his inside. He's a villain,
 40 A traitor to the pleasures of your bed.
 TYRANT O, I shall burst with torment.
 MAZERES He's received this night
 Into her bosom.
 TYRANT I feel a whirlwind in me
 Ready to tear the frame of my mortality.
 MAZERES I traced him to the deed.
 TYRANT And saw it done?
 MAZERES I abused my eyes in the true survey on't,
 45 Tainted my hearing with lascivious sounds;
 My loyalty did prompt me to be sure
 Of what I found so wicked and impure.
 TYRANT 'Tis springtide in my gall. All my blood's bitter—
 Puh, lungs too.
 MAZERES This night.
 50 TYRANT Lodovico!
Enter Lodovico
 LODOVICO My lord.
 TYRANT How cam'st thou up? Let's hear.
 LODOVICO My lord, my first beginning was a broker.
 TYRANT A knave from the beginning; there's no hope of him.
 Sertorio!
- Enter Sertorio*
 SERTORIO Here, my lord.
 TYRANT We know thee just.
 How cam'st thou up? Let's hear.
 SERTORIO From no desert
 55 That I can challenge but your highness' favour.
 TYRANT Thou art honest in that answer. Go:
 Report we are forty leagues off rid forth:
 Spread it about the castle cunningly.
 SERTORIO I'll do it faithfully, my lord.
 TYRANT Do't cunningly.
 60 Go! If thou shouldst do't faithfully, thou liest.
 [Exit Sertorio]
 I'm lost by violence through all my senses.
 I'm blind with rage.—Mazerés, guide me forth.
 I tread in air, and see no foot nor path;
 I've lost myself, yet cannot lose my wrath.
 65 Exeunt all but Amphridote
 AMPHRIDOTE What have I heard? It dares not be but true.
 Tymethes taken in adulterate trains,
 And with the Queen, my mother? Now I hate him,
 As beauty abhors years, or usurers charity.
 He does appear unto my eye a leper
 70 Enter Mazerés
 Full of sin's black infection, foul adultery.
 Cursèd be the hour in which I first did grace him
 And let Mazerés starve in my disdain,
 That hath so long observed me with true love,
 Whose loyalty in this approves the same.
 75 MAZERES Madam.
 AMPHRIDOTE My love?
 'My lord' I should say, but would say 'my love'.
 MAZERES [kneeling]
 I do beseech your grace for what I've done
 Lay no oppressing censure upon me.
 80 I could not but in honesty reveal it,
 Not envying in that he was my rival
 Nor in the force of any ancient grudge,
 But as the deed in its own nature craved,
 So 'mong the rest it was revealed to me,
 85 Appearing so detested that yourself,
 Gracious and kind, had you but seen the manner,
 Would have thrown by all pity and remorse
 And took my office, or one more in force.
 AMPHRIDOTE Rise, dear Mazerés, in our favours rise.
 90 So far am I from censure to reprove thee
 That in my hate to him I choose and love thee.

33 sticks pierces (his heart)

55-6 From...challenge for no merit that I can allege

MAZERES [rising]
 If constant service may be called desert,
 I shall deserve.

AMPHRIDOTE Man hath no better part.

MAZERES (aside)
 95 Why, this was happily observed and followed.—
 The King will to the castle late tonight
 And tread through all the vaults; I must attend.

AMPHRIDOTE
 I wish that at first sight thou'dst forced his end. Exit

MAZERES
 100 'Tis better thus. So my revenge imports.
 Now thrive my plots! The end shall make me great:
 She mine, the crown sits here. I am then complete. Exit

4.3 Enter [young] Queen and her maid with a light

QUEEN
 So, leave us here awhile; bear back the light.
 I would not be discovered if he come.
 [The maid shuts the lantern]
 You know his entertainment. So, be gone. [Exit maid]

5 I am not cheerful, troth, what point soe'er
 My powers arrive at. I desire a league
 With desolate darkness, and disconsolate fancies.
 There is no music in my soul tonight.
 What should I fear, when all my servants' faiths
 Sleep in my bounty, and no bribes nor threats
 10 Can wake 'em from my safety? For the King,
 He's forty leagues rode forth; I heard it lately.
 Yet heaviness, like a tyrant, proud in night,
 Usurps my power, rules where it hath no right.
She sleeps. Enter Roxano as she sleeps, with Tymethes hoodwinked

TYMETHES
 Methinks this a longer voyage than the first?

ROXANO
 15 Pleasures once tasted makes the next seem worse.

TYMETHES
 Is that the trick?

ROXANO O sir, experience proves it.
 You came at first to enjoy what you ne'er knew;
 Now all is but the same whate'er you do.

TYMETHES
 I'll prove that false: the sight of her is new.

ROXANO
 20 I have forgot a business to my lord Mazerés;
 My safety to the King relies upon't.
 You are in the house, my lord: this is the withdrawing room.

TYMETHES I see nothing.

ROXANO No matter, sir, as long as you have feeling 25
 enough.

TYMETHES
 Is the hood off?

ROXANO 'Tis here in my hand, sir.
 I must crave pardon, leave you here awhile.
 But as you love my safety and your own
 Remove not from this room till my return. 30

TYMETHES
 Well, here's my hand: I will not.

ROXANO 'Tis enough, sir. Exit

TYMETHES
 Hist, art gone? Then boldly I step forth,
 Cunning discoverer of an unknown beauty
 As subtle as her plot. Thou art masked too:
Opens a dark lantern
 Show me a little comfort, in this condensive darkness. 35
 Play the flatterer: laugh in my face.
 Why, here's enough to perfect all my wishes.
 With this I taste of that forbidden fruit
 Which, as she says, death follows; death, 'twill sting.
 Soft, what room's this? Let's see, 'tis not the former 40
 I was entertained in; no, it somewhat differs:
 Rich hangings still, court deckings, ay, and all—
He spies the Queen
 O all that can be in man's wish comprised
 Is in thy love immortal, in thy graces!
 [He touches her]
 I am not the same flesh; my touch is altered. 45
She awakes

QUEEN
 Hast thou betrayed me? What hast thou attempted?

TYMETHES
 Nothing that can be prejudicial
 To the sweet peace of those illustrious graces.

QUEEN O my most certain ruin!

TYMETHES
 50 Admirèd lady, hear me, hear my vow.

QUEEN
 O miserable youth, none saves thee now.

TYMETHES
 By that which man holds dearest, dreadful Queen,
 And all that can be in a vow contained,
 I'll prove as true, secret, and vigilant
 As ever man observed with serious virtue 55
 The dreadful call of his departing soul.
 Your own soul to your secrets shall not prove more
 true
 Than mine to it, to them, to all, to you.

QUEEN
 O misery of affection built on breath!

93-4 desert...part (a rhyme)

100-1 great...complete (a rhyme)

101 here i.e. on his own head. (He would have to eliminate Zenarchus.)

4.3 Middleton. This scene is greatly elaborated from its brief source in Warner (p. 49), where the lover is killed by the jealous husband.

30 Remove not do not leave

33 discoverer unveiler. Middleton is here drawing on the Cupid and Psyche myth, but with the genders reversed.

35 condensive dense

44 immortal (comparing her to a goddess, as in the myth of Cupid and Psyche)

- 60 Were I as far past my belief in heaven
As in man's oaths, I were the foulest devil.
- TYMETHES
May I eat and ne'er be nourishèd,
Live and know nothing, love without enjoying,
If ever—
- QUEEN Come, this is more than needs.
- TYMETHES There's comfort then.
- QUEEN
65 You that profess such truth, shall I enjoin you
To one poor penance then to try your faith?
TYMETHES Be't what it will, command it.
- QUEEN
Spend but this hour, wherein you have offended,
In true repentance of your sin, and all
70 Your hasty youth stands guilty of—and being clear,
You shall enjoy that which you hold most dear.
- TYMETHES
And if this penance I perform not truly,
May I henceforth ne'er be received to favour.
[Tymethes kneels, as praying]
- QUEEN
Why then, I'll leave you to your task awhile.
[She speaks aside]
- 75 Most wretched, doubtful, strange-distracted woman,
E'en drawn in pieces betwixt love and fear,
I weep in thought of both. Bold venturous youth,
Twice I writ death, yet would he seek to know me.
He'll make no conscience where his oaths bestow me.
Exit
- TYMETHES
80 I'm glad all's so well past, and she appeased.
I swear I did expect a harder penance
When she began to enjoin me. Why, this is wholesome
For soul and body, though I seldom use it.
Her wisdom is as pleasing as her beauty.
- 85 I never knew affection hastier born,
With more true art and less suspicion.
It so amazed me to know her my mistress,
I had no power to close the light again,
Enter the [young] Queen with two pistols
Unhappy that I was.—Peace, here she comes.
90 Down to thy penance: think of thy whole youth.
From the first minute that the womb conceived me
- To this full-heaped hour, I do repent me,
With heart as penitent as a man dissolving,
Of all my sins, born with me, and born of me,
Dishonest thoughts and sleights, the paths of youth. 95
So thrive in mercy as I end in truth!
She shoots him dead
- QUEEN
Fly to thy wish! I pray it may be given.
Man in a twinkling is in earth and heaven.
I dealt not like a coward with thy soul,
Nor took it unprepared. 100
I gave him time to put his armour on
And sent him forth like a celestial champion.
I loved thee with more care and truer moan,
Since thou must die, to taste more deaths than one.
Too much by this pity and love confesses. 105
Had any warning fast'ned on thy senses,
[]
Rash, unadvisèd youth, whom my soul weeps for,
How oft I told thee this attempt was death!
Yet would'st thou venture on, fond man, and knew? 110
But what destruction will not youth pursue?
Here long mightst thou have lived, been loved, enjoyed,
Had not thy will thy happiness destroyed!
Thought'st thou by oaths to have thy deeds well borne?
Thou shouldst have come when man was ne'er
forsworn. 115
They are dangerous now; witness this breach of thine.
Who's false to his own faith, will ne'er keep mine.
We must be safe, young man, the deeds unknown.
There are more loves; honours, no more than one.
Yet spite of death, I'll kiss thee.
[She kisses the corpse]
- O strange ill, 120
That for our fears we should our comforts kill!
Whom shall I trust with this poor bleeding body?
Yonder's a secret vault runs through the castle;
There for a while convey him. Hapless boy,
That never knew how dear 'twas to enjoy! 125
Enter Tyrant with a torch
O I'm confounded everlastingly,
Damned to a thousand tortures in that sight.

65 enjoin command70 being clear having been cleared (of your sins, by prayer and penance)79 make...me not have any compunctions about breaking his promise and talking about me everywhere92 full-heaped hour hour full of accumulated sins93 dissolving dying (the soul being the only part of a human not able to dissolve, therefore immortal)

96 thrive...truth Compare 1.3.82 where the Old Queen says to Lapyrus 'Rise, rise, he that repents is ever saved.' Repentance at the eleventh hour was not excluded by Calvinist beliefs: in Dekker's The Virgin Martyr the persecutor unexpectedly proves to be one of the elect, repenting at the last. But it is unclear whether Tymethes' final words are sincere; his prayer, like that of Claudius in Hamlet, may be only an empty form.

114 well borne tolerated116 this breach of thine your broken promise

120.1 She...corpse A powerful tragic moment, anticipating the necrophilia of The Lady's Tragedy. Her soliloquy recalls Phaedra's over the body of Hippolytus in Seneca's tragedy Phaedra (from which Middleton quotes in Revenger 1.4.23, 4.2.193-8).

What shall I frame?—My lord!
She runs to him

TYRANT
 What's she?

QUEEN O my sweet dearest lord!

TYRANT Thy name?

QUEEN
 130 Thy poor affrighted and endangered Queen.
 TYRANT O, I know thee now.
 QUEEN
 Did not your majesty hear the piteous shrieks
 Of an enforced lady?
 TYRANT Yes, whose were they?
 QUEEN
 Mine, my most worthy lord. Behold this villain, 135 Sealed with his just desert. Light here, my king.
 This violent youth, whom till this night I saw not,
 Being, as it seems, acquainted with the footsteps
 Of that dark passage, broke through the vault upon
 me
 And with a secret lantern searched me out,
 140 And seized me at my orisons, alone,
 And bringing me by violence to this room,
 Far from my guard or any hope of rescue,
 Intending here the ruin of my honour;
 But in the strife, as the good gods ordained it,
 145 Reaching for succour, I lighted on a pistol,
 Which I presumed was not without his charge.
 Then I redeemed mine honour from his lust,
 So he that sought my fall lies in the dust.

TYRANT
 O, let me embrace thee for a brave, unmatchable, 150 Precious, unvalued, admirable—whore.
 QUEEN Ha! What says my lord?
 TYRANT
 Come hither. Yet draw nearer. How came this man
 To's end? I would hear that. I would learn cunning.
 Tell me that I may wonder, and so lose thee.
 155 There is no art like this. Let me partake
 A subtlety no devil can imitate.
 Speak: why is all so contrary to time?
 He down and you up? Ha, why thus?

QUEEN
 I am sorry for my lord; I understand him not.

TYRANT
 The deed is not so monstrous in itself
 As is the art which ponders home the deed.
 The cunning doth amaze me past the sin,
 That he should fall before my rage begin.

QUEEN My lord?

TYRANT
 Come hither yet. One of those left hands give me;
 165 Thou hast no right at all.
 QUEEN What would my lord?
 TYRANT
 Nothing but put a ring upon a finger.
 QUEEN
 That's a wrong finger for a ring, my lord.
 TYRANT
 And what was he on whom you bounteously
 Bestowed this jewel?
 [He puts the jewel on her finger]
 QUEEN (aside) I do not like that word.
 170 TYRANT
 Look well upon't: dost know it? Ay, and start.
 QUEEN O heaven, how came this hither?
 Your highness gave me this; this is mine own.
 TYRANT
 'Tis the same ring, but yet not the same stone.
 Mystical strumpet, dost thou yet presume
 175 Upon thy subtle strength? Shak'st thou not yet?
 Or is it only art makes women constant,
 Whom nature makes so loose?
 I looked for gracious lightning from thy cheeks
 (I see none yet), for a relenting eye
 (I can see no such sight). Lust keeps in all.— 180 My witness! Where's my witness? Rise in the same form.
Enter from below, Mazeres habited like Roxano
 QUEEN O I'm betrayed.
 TYRANT [to Mazeres]
 Is not yon woman an adulteress?
 MAZERES Yes, my good lord.
 185 TYRANT
 Was not this fellow caught for her desire?
 Brought in a mist? Banqueted and received
 To all her ample pleasures!
 MAZERES True, my lord:

128 frame invent

129 What's she? ... Thy name? The Tyrant addresses his wife as if she were a stranger, because the revelation of her guilt has made him feel he does not know her. See also note to 5.1.229.

134–48 For this false rape-charge (not in the source story), see the myth of Phaedra and Hippolytus, and the story of Potiphar's wife in Genesis 39 (which were compared to each other by Renaissance Senecan scholars).

135 Light look, alight

150 unvalued impossible to value, priceless

(with ironic suggestion of 'worthless')

154 wonder (punning on 'wander', and ironically suggesting 'and get rid of you in the same way')

158 He... up (sexual innuendo)

161 ponders home thinks through

165 left hands In Roman tradition, used to touch the private parts, and hence considered impure (as in modern 'sinister'); the Latin slang for masturbation was 'the left-hand whore'. The right hand was used for public acts such as greeting or swearing an oath (hence modern 'rectitude'). Her actions are so sinister and impure that he imagines she should have two left hands and no right hand.

167 ring (slang for 'vagina')

168 wrong finger (The Tyrant deliberately places the ring on the wrong finger, because she has allowed her 'ring' to be penetrated by the wrong man's 'finger'.)

170 jewel (often used as a symbol for a woman's sexual purity)

174 stone (punning on 'testicle')

179 gracious lightning blushing as a sign of the repentance caused by God's grace

I brought him, saw him feasted and received—
 TYRANT
 Down, down, we have too much.

190 QUEEN O 'tis Roxano.
 MAZERES [aside]
 So, by this sleight I have deceived 'em both.
 I'm took for him I strive to make her loathe.
 Exit [below]

TYRANT
 Needs hear more witnesses? I'll call up more.

QUEEN
 O no, here lies a witness 'gainst myself
 195 Sooner believed than all their hirèd faiths.
 Doom me unto my death, only except
 The lingering execution of your look;
 Let me not live tormented in that brow.
 I do confess.

TYRANT O, I felt no quick till now.
 200 All witnesses to this were but dead flesh;
 I was insensible of all but this.
 Would I had given my kingdom, so conditioned
 That thou hadst ne'er confessed it.
 Now I stand by the deed, see all in action,
 205 The close conveyance, cunning passages,
 The artful fetch, the whispering, close disguising,
 The hour, the banquet, and the bawdy tapers,
 All stick in mine eye together. Yet thou shalt live.

QUEEN
 Torment me not with life; it asks but death.

TYRANT
 210 O hadst thou not confessed! Hadst thou no sleight?
 Where was thy cunning there?
 I see it now in thy confession.
 Thou shalt not die as long as this is meat.
 Thou killed'st a buck which thou thyself shalt eat.

QUEEN
 Dear sir?

TYRANT
 215 Here's deer struck dead with thy own hand;
 'Tis venison for thy own tooth. Thou know'st the relish:
 A dearer place hath been thy taster. Ho!
 Sertorio! Lodovico!
 They enter

AMBO Here, sir.

TYRANT
 Drag hence that body; see it quartered straight.
 [Exeunt Sertorio and Lodovico with the body of
Tymethes]
 220 No living wrath can I extend upon't,
 Else torments, horrors, gibbets, racks and wheels
 Had with a thousand deaths presented him
 Ere he had tasted one.—Yet thou shalt live.
 Here, take this taper lighted, kneel, and weep.

[Queen kneels]
 I'll try which is spent first, that or thine eye. 225
 I'll provide food for thee; thou shalt not die.
 If there be hell for sins that men commit,
 Marry a strumpet and she keeps the pit. Exit

QUEEN
 I feared this misery long before it came.
 My ominous dreams and fearful dreadfulness 230
 Promised this issue long before 'twas born.
 Enter Mazerès [in his own clothes]

MAZERES [aside]
 Yonder she kneels, little suspecting me
 The neat discoverer of her venery.
 I were full safe had I Roxano's life,
 Which in this stream I fish for.—How now, lady? 235
 So near the earth suits not a living queen.

QUEEN
 Under the earth were safer and far happier.

MAZERES
 What is't that can drive you to such discomforts,
 To prize your glories at so mean a rate?

QUEEN
 The treachery of my servants, good my lord. 240

MAZERES
 Dare they prove treacherous (most ignoble vassals!)
 To the sweet peace of so divine a mistress?

QUEEN
 I'm sure one villain, whom I dearly loved,
 Of whom my trust had made election chief,
 Perfidiously betrayed me to the fury 245
 Of my tempestuous unappeasèd lord.

MAZERES
 Let me but know him, that I may bestow
 My service to your grace upon his heart,
 And thence deserve a mistress like yourself.
 Enter Roxano from below

QUEEN
 O me, too soon behold him!

MAZERES Madam, stand by, 250
 Let him not see the light.

ROXANO [aside] Now I expect reward.

MAZERES
 He dies, were he my kinsman, for that guilt,
 Though 'twere as far to's heart as 'tis to th' hilt.

ROXANO
 Ha? What was that?
 [Mazerès] runs at Roxano [with his sword, and pierces him]
 There's a reward with a vengeance.

MAZERES
 Fall villain, for betraying of thy lady. 255
 Such things must never creep about the earth
 To poison the right use of service—a traitor!

202 so conditioned on condition that 216–17 relish...taster (sexual innuendo, perhaps alluding to oral sex; but vaginal sex was classically perceived as female consumption of the male.)

 218 AMBO both (Latin)

225 I'll...eye I'll see whether your eyes dry up from weeping before the taper is consumed by burning.

QUEEN
 This is some poor revenge. Thanks, good my lord.
 Into that cave with him, from whence he rose 260 Not long since and betrayed me to the King.
 MAZERES [to Roxano]
 O villain, in, and overtake thy soul.
 [He drops Roxano's body back into the pit]
 QUEEN
 Here's a perplexèd breast: let that warm steel
 Perform but the like service upon me,
 And live the rarest friend to a queen's wish.
 MAZERES
 265 O pardon me, that were too full of evil.
 I threat not angels, though I smite the devil:
 Doubt not your peace; the King will be appeased.
 There I'll bestow my service.
 QUEEN We are pleased.
 MAZERES [aside]
 As much as comes to nothing; I'll not sue 270 To urge the King from that I urged him to. Exit
 QUEEN
 Betrayed where I reposed most trust? O heaven,
 There is no misery fit match for mine.
 Enter Tyrant, Sertorio, Lodovico, bringing in Tymethes' limbs
 TYRANT
 275 So, bring 'em forward yet, there; there bestow 'em.
 Before her eyes lay the divided limbs
 Of her desirèd paramour. So. You're welcome,
 Lady, you see your cheer: fine flesh, coarse fare.
 Sweet was your lust; what can be bitter there?
 By heaven, no other food thy taste shall have,
 Till in thy bowels those corpse find a grave.
 280 Which to be sure of, come: I'll lock thee safe
 From the world's pity.—Hang those quarters up!—
 [Sertorio and Lodovico hang up Tymethes' limbs]
 The bottom drink's the worst in pleasure's cup.
 Exeunt omnes
 [Finis Actus Quartus]

⊗

5.1 [Incipit Actus Quintus]
 Enter Zenarchus solus
 ZENARCHUS
 O my Tymethes! Truest joy on earth!
 Hath thy fate proved so flinty, so perverse,
 To the sweet spring both of thy youth and hopes?
 This was Mazerès' spite, that cursèd rival.
 5 And if I fail not, his own plot shall shower

Upon his bosom like a falling tower.
 Enter Tyrant
 My worthy lord.
 TYRANT O, you should have seen us sooner.
 ZENARCHUS Why my lord?
 TYRANT
 The quarters of your friend passed by in triumph, 10
 A sight that I presume had pleased you well.
 ZENARCHUS
 I call a villain to my father's pleasure
 No friend of mine. The sight had pleased me better
 Had I, not like Mazerès, run my hate
 Into the sin before it grew to act, 15
 And killed it ere't had knotted. 'Twas rare service
 (If your vexed majesty conceive it right)
 In politic Mazerès, serving more
 In this discovery his own vicious malice
 Than any true peace that should make you perfect— 20
 Suffering the hateful treason to be done
 He might have stopped in his confusion.
 TYRANT
 Most certain.
 ZENARCHUS Good your majesty, bethink you
 In manly temper and considerate blood:
 Went he the way of loyalty or your quiet, 25
 After he saw the courtesies exceed,
 'T'abuse your peace, and trust 'em with the deed?
 TYRANT
 O no, none but a traitor would have done it.
 ZENARCHUS
 For my lord, weigh't indifferently.
 TYRANT I do, I do.
 ZENARCHUS
 What makes it heinous, burdensome and monstrous, 30
 Fills you with such distractions, breeds such furies
 In your incensèd breast, but the deed doing?
 TYRANT O!
 ZENARCHUS
 Th'intent had been sufficient for his death,
 And that full satisfaction; but the act— 35
 TYRANT Insufferable.—
 Sertorio! Where's Sertorio?
 Enter Sertorio
 SERTORIO My lord?
 TYRANT
 Seek out Mazerès suddenly. [Exit Sertorio]
 Peace, Zenarchus.
 Let me alone to trap him.
 ZENARCHUS It may prove.

261 overtake thy soul i.e. in the plunge downwards towards Hell, of which the vault provides an image. The soul has already set off at the moment Roxano died.

276 cheer (a) entertainment, food and drink; (b) happiness

coarse (punning on 'corse', corpse)

279 corpse remains, 'corps' (plural)

282 bottom ... cup dregs are bitter

5.1.0.1–5.1.1.0.1 Middleton.

2 flinty hard

10 passed ... triumph were paraded in public, as memorials of a conquest (ironic)

16 knotted i.e. knitted together in sexual union

rare service good work (sarcastic)

22 his confusion its confounding

- [He speaks aside to Tymethes' limbs]
 40 Behold, my friend, how I express my love.
 TYRANT
 O villain! Had he pierced him at first sight,
 Where I have one grief, I had missed ten thousand
 by't.
Enter Mazerés and Sertorio
 MAZERES [aside] I dreamt of some new honours
 For my late service, and I wondered how 45 He could keep off so long from my desert.
 TYRANT Mazerés?
 MAZERES
 My loved lord.
 TYRANT I am forgetful.
 I am in thy debt some dignities, Mazerés.
 What shift shall we make for thee? Thy late service
 Is warm still in our memory and dear favour.
 50 Prithee, discover to's the manner how Thou took'st 'em subtly.
 MAZERES I was received
 Into a waiter's room, my lord.
 TYRANT Thou wast!
 MAZERES
 And in a visor helped to serve the banquet.
 TYRANT Ha, ha!
 MAZERES
 55 Saw him conveyed into a chamber privately.
 TYRANT
 And still thou let'st him run?
 MAZERES I let him play, my lord.
 TYRANT Ha, ha, ha!
 MAZERES
 I watched still near, till her arms clasped him.
 TYRANT And there thou let'st him rest?
 60 MAZERES There he was caught, my lord.
 TYRANT So art thou here.—
 [To Sertorio] Drag him to execution. He shall die
 With tortures 'bove the thought of tyranny.
Exit [Tyrant, with Mazerés borne off by Sertorio]
 ZENARCHUS
 No words are able to express my gladness.
 65 'Tis such a high born rapture that the soul
 Partakes it only.
Enter Amphridote and Lodovico [and speak apart]
 AMPHRIDOTE My lord Mazerés led Unto his death?
 LODOVICO It proves too true, dear princess.
 [Exit]
 AMPHRIDOTE [aside]
 Cursed be the mouth that doomed him, and forever
 Blasted the hand that parts him from his life.
 70 Was there none fit to practise tyranny on
 But whom our heart elected? Misery of love!
- I must not live to think on't.
 ZENARCHUS [aside] Here's my sister.
 I could not bring that news will please her better.—
 My news brings that command over your passions,
 You must be merry.
 AMPHRIDOTE Have you warrant for't, brother? 75
 ZENARCHUS
 Yes, strong enough, i'faith. Hear me: Mazerés
 By this time is at his everlasting home.
 Where'er his body lies, I struck the stroke.
 I wrought a bitter pill that quickly choked him.
 AMPHRIDOTE [aside]
 O me, my soul will out!—Some wine there, ho! 80
 ZENARCHUS
 Wine for our sister!—for the news is worth it.
Enter Lodovico with wine
 AMPHRIDOTE
 It will prove dear to both.—So, give it me.
 [She takes the wine]
 Now leave us.
 [Exit Lodovico]
 ZENARCHUS
 Revenge ne'er brought forth a more happy issue
 Than I think mine to be.
She poisons the wine
 AMPHRIDOTE [aside]
 I'm setting forth, Mazerés.—Here, Zenarchus! 85
 [She drinks]
 ZENARCHUS
 Thou art not like this hour, jovial.
 AMPHRIDOTE
 I shall be after this.
 ZENARCHUS That does't, if any.
 Wine doth both help defects, and causeth many.
 Here's to the deed, faith, of our last revenge.
 [He drinks]
 AMPHRIDOTE
 Dying men prophesy: faith, 'tis our last end. 90
 Now I must tell you, brother, that I hate you,
 In that you have betrayed my loved Mazerés.
 ZENARCHUS What's this?
 AMPHRIDOTE
 His deed was loyal, his discovery just:
 He brought to light a monster and his lust. 95
 ZENARCHUS Nay, if you grow
 So strumpet-like in your behaviour to me,
 I'll quickly cool that insolence.
 [He threatens her]
 AMPHRIDOTE Peace, peace.
 There is a champion fights for me unseen;
 I need not fear thy threats.
 ZENARCHUS Indeed no harlot 100
 But has her champion, besides bawd and varlet.
 O!

52 room place, role

56 run continue

82 dear (punning on 'costly')

100 harlot whore (because she has switched her love from one man to another)

AMPHRIDOTE
 Why, law you now! Such gear will ne'er thrive with you.

ZENARCHUS
 I'm sick of thy society, poison to mine eyes.

105 AMPHRIDOTE
 'Tis lower in thy breast the poison lies.

ZENARCHUS
 How?

AMPHRIDOTE
 'Tis for Mazer's.

ZENARCHUS
 O you virtuous powers!
 What, a right strumpet? Poison, under love?

AMPHRIDOTE
 That man can ne'er be safe that divides love.
She dies

ZENARCHUS
 Nor she be honest can so soon impart.
 110 O 'ware that woman that can shift her heart!
[He] dies
Thunder and lightning. A blazing star appears.
Enter Tyrant

TYRANT
 Ha? Thunder? And thou marrow-melting blast,
 Quick-winged lightning, and thou blazing star,
 I like not thy prodigious bearded fire.
 Thy beams are fatal.
[He sees the bodies]

115 Ha! Behold the influence
 Of all their malice in my children's ruins!
 Their states malignant powers have envied,
 And both in haste, struck with their envies, died.
 'Tis ominous.—Within there!
Enter Sertorio and Lodovico

LODOVICO
 Here, my lord.

TYRANT
 Convey those bodies awhile from my sight.

120 SERTORIO Both dead, my lord.

TYRANT
 Yes, and we safe; our death we need less fear.
[Exit Sertorio and Ludovico with bodies]
 Usurper's issue oft proves dangerous:
 We depose others, and they poison us.
 I have found it on records; 'tis better thus.

Enter the Old King, Lapyrus, Fidelio, Amorpho, all disguised like pilgrims [and speak apart]

LAPYRUS [to old King]
 My lord, this castle is but slightly guarded. 125

KING
 'Tis as I hoped and wished. Now bless us heaven!
 What horrid and inhuman spectacle
 Is yonder that presents itself to sight?

FIDELIO
 It seems three quarters of a man hung up.

KING
 What tyranny hath been exercised of late? 130
 I dare not venture on.

AMORPHO
 Fear not, my lord: our habits give us safety.

LAPYRUS
 Behold, the tyrant maketh toward us.

TYRANT
 Holy and reverent pilgrims, welcome!

KING
 Bold strangers, by the tempest beaten in. 135
 TYRANT Most welcome still.
 We are but stewards for such guests as you:
 What we possess is yours, to your wants due.
 We are only rich for your necessities.

KING
 A generous, free, and charitable mind 140
 Keeps in thy bosom, to poor pilgrims kind.

TYRANT
 'Tis time of day to dine, my friends.—Sertorio!
Enter Sertorio

SERTORIO
 My lord?

TYRANT Our food.

SERTORIO 'Tis ready for your highness. 145
[Exit Sertorio]

Loud music. A banquet brought in, and by it a small table for the [young] Queen

TYRANT
 Sit, pray sit, religious men, right welcome
 Unto our cates. Grave sir, I have observed 145
 You waste the virtue of your serious eye
 Too much on such a worthless object as that is.
 A traitor when he lived called that his flesh;
 Let't hang. Here's to you! We are the oldest here.

103 law you (oath of uncertain meaning) gear doings, goings-on (deliberately vulgar)
 107 right genuine under under cover of, in the name of 108 that divides love who comes between two people who love each other (i.e.
 Amphridote and Mazer's)
 109 Nor ... impart A woman cannot be virtuous if she so hastily confers [love].
 110.2-5.1.248.1 Thunder ... omnes Dekker.
 110.2 blazing star nova or comet, regarded as ominous

 121-4 Yes ... thus This brutal speech recalls the Cronos myth, another version of the bloody banquet. The Titan Cronos devoured his own children out of fear that they would grow up to supplant him; he was (like the Tyrant) supplanted anyway.
 124.2 pilgrims A useful disguise if you wanted to claim hospitality. One or more scenes in which Lapyrus and the Old King were welcomed by the King of Lycia, and Lapyrus married his daughter

 Euronome, were probably removed by

SIR ROBERT SHERLEY HIS ENTERTAINMENT IN CRACOVIA

Text edited and annotated by Jerzy Limon and Daniel J. Vitkus, introduced by Daniel J. Vitkus

MOST of Middleton's 1609 pamphlet on Sir Robert Sherley is a prose translation of a Latin poem by Andrew Leech, a Scottish Jesuit living in Poland. Leech must have met Sir Robert Sherley during the winter of 1608–9 in Cracow. Sherley, appointed by the Shah of Persia as ambassador to the princes of Europe, was travelling from court to court, seeking support for a Perso-Christian alliance against the Turks.

The literary career of Andrew Leech had begun in London in 1603 with Latin verses celebrating the accession of King James. But between 1606 and 1609 he published in Cracow, under his Latin name (Andreas Loeaechius), at least five books of Latin verse. Some of those texts link him to Habsburg patrons and to the court of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in Cracow where a sophisticated internationalist culture existed around the monarch, Sigismund III. Sigismund was a militant counter-Reformation Catholic who sponsored a tremendous expansion of the Jesuit movement within Poland and Lithuania. His long reign (1587–1632) represents the apex of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth's power, affluence, and culture. Sigismund's support for an alliance with Persia against Turkey is not surprising, since his borders were often harassed by the Ottomans and their vassals (including slave-raiding parties from the Tatar khanate).

The Scottish expatriate community under Sigismund may have been extensive. John Chamberlain, writing from the English court on 24 March 1621, recounts that Polish ambassadors 'tell what numbers of Scots are fostered in Poland, which after their account are more than 30,000 families'. Leech belongs to the same Latin Renaissance of expatriate Catholic Scots that would produce John Barclay's Argenis (published in Paris in 1621), the last masterpiece of Latin literature, and the last international bestseller in Latin.

No such masterpiece, the neoclassical Encomia Nominis & Negocii D. Roberti Sherlaei is an unusually anxious panegyric because it betrays so much concern about Sherley's exotic status. Leech commends Sherley's 'fame and honour' (295) and praises his 'honoured enterprises' (293), but much of the text raises questions (for English Protestant readers, at least) about Sherley's ties to Persia and his loyalty to England. Middleton's translation states that 'England may very justly accuse Persia of wrong for detaining him from her' (205–6); a personified Mother England tells Persia 'that against all law of nations, thou robbest me of my subject' (249–50); and Sherley himself celebrates his 'liberty' from England (271) while proclaiming at the same time, 'I am a servant to that great master' (274), the Shah.

Middleton acknowledges through a musical analogy that the Entertainment is a song of praise for Sherley played 'upon an instrument tuned and directed by another' (64–5), but he may have known nothing of 'Loeaechius' and his background. Middleton's text is not simply a word-for-word translation. He adds an original introductory section, including a letter 'To the Reader'; he removes some passages that might be read as offensive, cutting a couple of sections that might have been interpreted in England as treasonous; he inserts a translated passage from the ancient Greek author Strabo. The additions from Strabo (taken from the fifteenth book of his Geographia) present the Persians as virtuous pagans, thereby concealing their Islamic identity and praising their martial discipline and virility. Somewhat surprisingly, Middleton's translation retains some provocative statements suggesting that England was isolated from a cosmopolitan Christianity. 'What is the cause that Sherley has not all this while lived in the same country, that first lent him breath?' (302–3). The answer is that 'a spirit so great was not to be contained within so small a circle, as his country' (303–5). The Latin original belittles England, and suggests that Robert Sherley (and by analogy, Leech himself) is a great spirit who left Protestant England to join the greater, common cause of Christendom and to promote a grand alliance against the Turks.

Repackaging the Latin poem for English consumption, Middleton tried to allay and redirect xenophobic anxieties by stressing that Sherley's service as a Persian ambassador would bring honour to England and succour to Christians besieged by 'that hell-hound brood of Mahomet . . . the barbarous Turks' (164–6). Middleton opens the Entertainment with a general defence of travel that is an implicit defence of Robert Sherley's transgressive hybridity. Declaring that 'Travel is the golden mine that enriches the poorest country and fills the barrenest with abundant plenty' (49–50), Middleton enters into a contemporary debate about the effects of travel. Returned travellers and travel writers had to contend with domestic distrust of their tales and 'true reports'. For instance, William Parry, who accompanied Anthony and Robert Sherley on their voyage to Persia, wrote A new and large discourse of the travels of Sir Anthony Sherley Knight . . . to the Persian empire (1601), a text that begins with this sentence: 'It hath been, and yet is, a proverbial speech amongst us, that travellers may lie by authority.' It was not only lies that English homebodies feared, but also the contaminating importation of foreign goods and foreign ideas. That fear is evident, for example, in Bishop Joseph Hall's Quo Vadis? A Just Censure of Travel (1617). Hall articulates English xenophobia through the discourse of religious sectarianism. He concedes that there are two ethically justifiable purposes for travel, 'matter of traffic, and matter of state', but he warns merchant travellers to 'take heed, lest they go too far, that they leave God behind them; that whiles they buy all other things good cheap, they make not an ill match for their souls'.

Middleton's pamphlet acknowledges its alien origins (in Catholic Poland and in Shiite Persia) but plays down Sherley's Catholic connections and presents the Shah as a quasi-Christian figure. Its description of 'the Persian himself confessing and worshipping Christ' (89–90) is intentionally ambiguous. (The Shah was tolerant of Christians and rumoured to wear a cross, but remained a Muslim all his life.) Middleton's Christ-worshipping 'Persian' serves as an example of the compatibility and convertibility of foreign powers in the imagined 'league' (131) that would include both the Shah and the 'Christian kings' (129) of Europe. This trans-sectarian, international alliance is embodied by Robert Sherley himself, who converted to Catholicism while in Persia. Sherley is described by Leech as wearing 'rich garments . . . woven by Grecian workmen' (230–1), riding a 'Thracian courser' (234–5), and bearing a 'victorious scimitar' (237) that has spilled 'so much blood of those, that are enemies to the Persians' (238–9). Sherley had served in the Shah's army against the Turks, and he was now touring the Continent wearing a silken caftan and a turban decorated with a jewel-encrusted crucifix (see illustration). The Loeaechius poem was probably given to Middleton by Sherley's 'agent Master Moore', who had 'lately arrived in England' (358–9), also 'Attired in . . . Persian habits' (358). In his epistle 'To the Reader', Middleton compares the pamphlet to an exotic import, 'this Persian robe, so richly woven with the praises only of Sir Robert Sherley' (10–11), but he seeks to reassure his readers that this imported text(ile) comes 'at a low price' (12). In early modern England, anxiety about contact and exchange with foreign culture generated objections to the importation of luxury goods and to the presence of aliens in London. Consequently, Middleton attempts to present the hybridized Sherley, 'this famous English Persian' (360), in a positive light, as 'our famous English traveller' (375–6), a brave soul who had demonstrated English honour and virtue to the wider world without going 'too far'.

The object of Middleton's defensive praise was the youngest of three brothers whose controversial activities had already demonstrated to the English court that travel often breeds trouble, not moral or monetary profit. The eldest brother, Sir Thomas Sherley, captured and imprisoned by the Turks for piracy in 1603, was ransomed and returned to England in 1606—then in September 1607 committed to the Tower, accused of conspiring to divert the Levant trade from England to Venice. He was released in 1608 (but by 1611 would be in prison again, this time for debt). Sir Anthony Sherley led an abortive military expedition to Italy in 1598, then went from Venice to Persia, where the unauthorized English embassy was hospitably received by the Shah. Sponsored by Abbas I, Anthony left Persia in 1599 for Europe on a mission to persuade the princes of Europe to ally themselves with Persia against the Ottomans. He never returned to Persia, ending his days in poverty in Madrid.

Robert Sherley had accompanied his older brother Anthony to Persia in 1598, and stayed there until 1608, when the Shah assigned him the diplomatic mission Anthony had botched. Among the letters he carried was one from the Shah addressed to King James, which suggested that 'the Turk ought to be assaulted by diverse ways' and that a joint military operation 'to ruin him and to blot out his name' should be mounted (Shirley, App. C). Sherley journeyed first to Moscow, next to the court of Sigismund III, and then to the imperial court at Prague, to Florence, and to Rome. According to the Venetian ambassador in Rome, Sherley delivered an oration there in which he claimed that 'When the Turk was defeated and Constantinople taken . . . his master intended to become a Christian and to render entire obedience to the Apostolic See' (Calendar of State Papers Venetian 11: 648). He arrived in Spain in December 1609, but his prolonged negotiations there proved fruitless. Sherley's 'coming into England' (5), announced in the Entertainment, did not occur until June 1611, more than two years after publication of the pamphlet.

Given Middleton's known sympathies for an English brand of Calvinism and his affiliation with the Protestant citizens of London, why would he write what G. B. Shand has characterized as 'a piece of advance public relations work' for Robert Sherley, an orientalized Catholic who had been 'entertained' by the militant counter-Reformation court of Sigismund III? One motive may have been a pressing need for cash. We know that Middleton adapted and prepared the Entertainment before May 30, 1609, because on that day its publisher, John Budge, was fined for having had the pamphlet printed without permission. Legal records dating from December 1608 to July 1609 show Middleton—deprived of theatrical income by the closure of the theatres due to plague—being sued for failing to repay loans to two different creditors. Middleton may have been paid by Sherley's harbingers, including 'Master Moore', to translate a Latin poem for London publication; certainly, he would have been paid something by the London publisher. He must have hoped for patronage from Robert Sherley's brother and father, to whom he dedicated his text. Author and publisher probably noted the Sherleys' fame and popularity, whose exploits had been romanticized by other pamphlets and by a stage play, The Travels of the Three English Brothers (first performed in 1607). Merchants and courtiers may have scorned the Sherleys, but among the common people they had taken on, through the media of cheap print and stage performance, the image of heroic adventurers.

Middleton may also have been personally sympathetic to the idea of a 'Universal peace' (165) that would establish Christian amity throughout Europe—and enable a crusade against an Islamic empire that was pushing back the borders of Christendom. Furthermore, he had reason to believe that King James would favour Sherley's mission. As early as 1589, James had begun to promote religious reconciliation among Christian nations and express hostility toward the Ottoman sultanate. In 1601 James wrote to the Shah of Persia, Abbas I, praising him for his military success against the Ottomans and implying that soon James himself would offer assistance to Persia. In the same letter, James expressed admiration for Sir Anthony Sherley, the Shah's ambassador. As W. B. Patterson has shown in King James VI and I and the Reunion of Christendom, throughout his reign James pursued an accommodation between all Christian princes and sects. In 1618, the King was to sponsor Middleton's The Peacemaker, in which England is praised as 'the factory of peace'. The persistence beyond the Reformation of a 'Common Corps of Christendom' led to frequent calls for a crusade against the Turks, and James himself had developed a conciliar theology which prepared the way for a possible rapprochement with the Church of Rome. Under the threat of Spanish power, Elizabeth I and her councilors had forged an alliance with Turkey and had fostered the Levant trade, but when in 1603 James succeeded to the English throne, he immediately expressed his dislike of this affiliation with the Turks. According to Thomas Wilson, James 'denied absolutely' at the commencement of his reign in England to sign commercial agreements with the Ottomans, 'saying, that for merchant's causes he would not do things unfitting a Christian prince' (Baumer, 36n).

James's peacemaking policies in support of Christian solidarity and his hostility toward the Ottomans help to explain the warm welcome that Robert Sherley obtained at the Jacobean court in 1611. In the end, though, Sherley's efforts to drum up support for an anti-Ottoman alliance and a new commercial arrangement with Persia were decisively thwarted by powerful commercial interests committed to trade with Turkey. One English courtier, John Chamberlain, doubted the success of Sherley's 'projects', because 'the way is long and dangerous, the trade uncertain, and must quite cut off our traffic with the Turk'. English commerce with the Ottoman empire, ongoing since 1570, was controlled by the Levant Company, a powerful organization firmly opposed to any Anglo-Persian alliance against the Turks. Middleton's translation exhorted Christian princes to put martial valour and the sacred cause of a crusade before venal motives, but pro-Turkish mercantile priorities prevailed over Sherley's proposal. Middleton's Entertainment may have helped to publicize and promote Sherley's mission, but ultimately the effort to enlist James in a coalition against the Turks failed. Sherley left England for Spain (and then Persia) in early 1613.

The Entertainment marks the beginning of Middleton's interest in foreign affairs, but the next time that he would write about an ambassador coming from Spain to negotiate an alliance with England, it would be Gondomar in A Game of Chess, and Middleton would write in opposition, not support, of a partnership with foreign and Catholic powers.

Sir Robert Sherley his Entertainment in Cracovia

Sent ambassador in the name of the King of Persia to Sigismund the Third, King of Poland and Swecia, and to other princes of Europe.

His royal entertainment into Cracovia, the chief city of Poland, with his pretended coming into England.

Also, the honourable praises of the same Sir Robert Sherley, given unto him in that kingdom, are here likewise inserted.

To the Reader

Reader, this Persian robe, so richly woven with the praises only of Sir Robert Sherley (thy countryman) comes to thee at a low price, though it cost him dear that wears it, to purchase so much fame, as hath made it so excellent. It is now his, forever, thine so long as it is his; for every good man (as I hope thou art) doth participate in the renown of those that are good, and virtuous.

He hath been a traveller a long time: give him now a welcome home; the arms of his own country embracing him will be more joyful to him than all those of so many foreign kingdoms, with which he hath so often been honoured.

If a man that hath ventured through the world may deserve thy love, thou canst not choose but bestow as much of it upon him, as upon any. Look upon him truly, and thou shalt find a large general chronicle of time writ in a little volume.

He comes laden with the trophies of war, and the honours of peace. The Turk hath felt the sharpness of his sword, and against the Turk is he now whetting the swords of Christian princes. Much more could I speak of him, but that I should do wrong to the common laws of civility, by taking away that reverence from strangers, whom (from countries afar off) you shall presently hear giving ample testimonies of his nobleness.

Vale:

News from Persia and Poland, touching Sir Robert Sherley, being sent ambassador to divers princes of Europe, famed as well for his wisdom and experience, as for his knowledge and understanding of many tongues.

Albeit that man can receive his birth but from one place, yet is he born a freeman of all the cities of the world. The whole earth is his country, and he that dwelleth farthest off, is by the laws of nature, as near to him in love as his kindred and acquaintance. This general charter being given by the King of this universal crown, to all nations, hath caused men from time to time (by the virtue of that privilege) to forsake the places of their first being, and to travel into other countries. The benefits that kingdoms have gotten by this means cannot in so small a volume (as this in hand) be comprehended. Travel is the golden mine that enriches the poorest country and fills the barrenest with abundant plenty. It is the chain that at first tied kingdoms together and the musical string that still maintains them in concord, in leagues and in unity. The Portuguese have hereby crowned themselves and their posterity with garlands of never dying honour. The Spaniards have their names (for this) so deeply engraven in the chronicles of fame, that they can never be forgotten. The French likewise and the Dutch, have raised their glories to a nobler height, only by these adventures. In imitation of all whose labours, or rather in emulation of all their fames, our Englishmen have not only stept as far as any of them all, but gone beyond the most and the best of them. And not to reckon those men of worth (in this kind) of our own nation, whose voyages and travels (by sea and land) to set down, were able to fill whole volumes, I will only at this time (not with a loud and shrill trumpet, as they deserve, but as it were upon an instrument tuned and directed by another) give only a soft touch of the praises of this worthy gentleman Sir Robert Sherley, of whose adventures, dangers, and various fortunes, both good and bad, to draw a true picture in the right and lively colours would as easily feed men's eyes with gazing admiration, as the large pictured tables of others have filled them with wonder.

Being therefore contented (at this time) to swim but in a shallow stream of his fame, sithence greater sails are likely hereafter (and that very shortly) to swell with the true report of his actions, you shall understand that Sir Robert Sherley, after a long, a chargeable, and a dangerous progress through most (if not all) the kingdoms in Europe, receiving entertainment from the princes of those dominions fitting to such a guest, desire of glory still more and more burning within him. At the length, he left Europe and travelled into Asia, receiving noble entertainment at the hands of the king of Persia. In whose court he so well and so wisely bore himself in all his actions, that the Persian (with much of his love, of which he tasted most plenteously) heaped on his head many honourable favours.

85 That common enemy of Christ and Christians, (the Turk) lifting up his sword continually (for the most part) not only against the Polack, the Hungarian, Bohemian, and other princes of Christendom, but also thirsting after the rich empire of Persia and showing a mortal hatred to that kingdom by being ever by in arms against it, it was thought fit that (the Persian himself confessing and worshipping Christ) aid should be required at the hands of Christian princes in the Persian's behalf, against so barbarous, so ambitious and so general an enemy. Hereupon honour of such an embassy was conferred (by the King of Persia) upon Sir Robert Sherley, as a man worthy and apt to treat with Christian princes in so weighty a business, he himself being a Christian born, and a gentleman that had travelled and by experience knew the conditions, state, and policies of most of their kingdoms.

95 First therefore was he employed into Poland, where by Sigismund (the King of Poland and of Swecia) he was received with great magnificence and applause, both of the Polack himself and of his people.

100 And because it is not fit that every common and popular ear should stand listening to the private business of princes in a designation that concerns the universal state of Christendom, we will not therefore at this time be interpreters of the Persian's embassy but rather wait his expected coming who hath in charge to deliver it by word of mouth himself.

110 In the mean time notwithstanding (forbearing to reckon up the rich presents given by the Poland king to Sir Robert, the honours done to him by the Polish lords, and the favours thrown upon him by the common people) you shall be witnesses only to those (not unworthy) praises of him, by which his fame (amongst scholars by those of the better sort) was lifted up at the time of his staying in Poland.

Encomiums or praises, as well upon the name as negotiation, of Sir Robert Sherley, an English knight, sent ambassador from the King of the Persians, to the princes of Europe.

Mercurius, seeing the ambassador ready to take his journey,

125 resigneth unto him his office, as being messenger or herald to the gods, according to the fiction of poets, and with that office bestoweth the gift of eloquence upon him, because he may have power to persuade the princes to whom he is sent. And withal adds a wish that those Christian kings whom he is to solicit may not be cold in joining their forces together, but that they may enter into an honourable, a pious and inviolable league against that common enemy, the Turk. 130

Mercury's speech.

135 Thou (O Sherley), being born an Englishman, art sent from the Persian empire to the kingdoms that lie in Europe. Thy place is full of honour, thy message of weight: discharge thou therefore boldly those things which the great Lord of Persia commands thee to do. It is not chance that throws this high office upon thee, but a full synod (or parliament) of all the gods do appoint thee to be their messenger to the great kings of the earth. For this cause, I that am heaven's winged messenger, seeing thee ready to depart, present myself thus before thee and uttering only so much, as in the letters of thy name lies mystically hidden, and that is this: 140

145 Heus Labor,—tu Res hoc ore Tueris Persarum.—
O exceeding labour! Yet thou art the man that must defend the state of the Persians, even by the force of my eloquence. Go on therefore, be thou Mercurius in the courts of kings. I give thee my place; I give it to thee, that art more worthy of it then myself. O that the princes of Europe would knit an indissoluble league together with thy master (the Persian monarch) and tie all their sinews to one arm, that a noble war may be begotten. Let Bellona (the goddess of battles) breath courage into the breasts of soldiers; and let no country be dishonoured by bearing men that have no hearts to come into the field. O let not that covetous dragon, which once watched the golden firmament, sleep in the bosoms of kings and with his poison infect them with that covetous disease of hoarding up gold. Cast off (O you princes) your sensual pleasures, and let it be your ambition to wear garlands of oak, which are the crowns of conquerors. Prefer immortal fame before all those dangers, over which you must of necessity pass, be they never so invincible in the show of undertaking, and aspire only to that life which shall remain when your bodies lie dead. Heaven (in your doing so) shall smile upon your enterprises. Hell shall be conquered, and that hell-hound brood of Mahomet be utterly confounded. Universal peace shall crown the world and the barbarous Turks feel the sinews and puissant arms of Europe. 155

The travells of Sir Robert Sherley

- To the nations (unto whom the ambassador is sent on great and serious affairs, as rightly may be conjectured) a desire and wish is made that all kings in Christendom may entertain this holy war with the same courage, constancy and zeal, that the Persian doth.
- 170 Hearken O you Polanders, Italians, French, and you Germans; enrich your chronicles with an act of a wonder never heard of in the world before: for behold, a Briton is sent on a royal message from the King of the Persians. A Briton is sent, but who is it? Such a one he is, as by his name (being before anagrammatized) he may apparently be deciphered.
- 175 Ast Liber, Servus Hero.
Free born and a servant only unto his sovereign.
- 180 He, even he, is sent to you (O you nations of Europe) from the confines of the Persians, bringing along with him the name of his Lord and with that name the sound of an approaching war.
- 185 The destinies begin to promise some great matter: the God of battles (hereupon) speaks cheerfully. God himself prepares the armour; muster yourselves together therefore (O you kings) and with a religious defence draw your swords against the Turks.
- A gratulatory compendious speech, to Sir Robert Sherley, commending both his virtue and present fortune.
- 190 O Sherley, thou that art an honour to the Persians as well as to the Britons, within whose head dwelleth experience and wisdom, and upon whose tongue eloquence writeth her charms: whatsoever he was that at first durst say that Fortune was blind and that she bestowed extraordinary benefits upon undeserving men, let him know that all this while he hath been in an error. For Fortune had more eyes than Argus when she crowned this Englishman with so many Persian honours and offices. That monarch (O thou renowned Briton) whose sword is dreadful to the Thracian tyrant, makes thee a partner in the cares and burdens of his empire: for he hath seen, yea, he hath ever seen and found thee constant in execution of all his just and royal commands.
- 195 The empire of the Persian is here commended: the kings and princes of Europe being called to give witness how much glory the dexterity of Sir Robert Sherley hath added to the Persian monarchy; upon which, he appears to the Persians a gentleman of such merit, as that England may very justly accuse Persia of wrong for detaining him from her.
- 200 The fame of the Persian empire doth not grow up only in a mean soldier, for their cities are full of renowned and worthy captains: from the ancient discipline and stratagems of war, are the glories of the Persians sprung up and continue famous, but (O thou
- honoured Englishman) she derived her first principles from thy practice and knowledge. Far be my words from the base servitude of flattery: for within a short time, kings shall rise up as witnesses of what I speak. Let thine own country envy the kingdom of Persia for enjoying this honour (which by thee is given her). Yea, let her challenge thee to be delivered back again as her own, yet let her claim be made in such manner that England and Persia may not grow into quarrel about thee, but rather thus let them both share thee. Let rich Persia enjoy thy presence and reckon thee in the number of her citizens, and be proud in the possession of a man so worthy. Let England glory that she alone is happy in thy birth, and that she bears the honour of giving thee thy name. But howsoever (O thou, the dignity and lustre of two renowned kingdoms) go thou on in thine intended embassy, and perform these behests which the great Persian thy lord hath imposed upon thy integrity.
- 215 A short Speech uttered as it were by the whole body of the Polish court, to Robert Sherley, ambassador from the invincible King of the Persians.
- 220 It is not thy rich garments, embroidered so thick with gold and woven by Grecian workmen, that draws our eyes into admiration by beholding thee; it is not thy sparkling jewels, nor those costly precious stones that adorn thy robe, which dazzle our sight; it is not thy comely riding, nor skilful managing of that Thracian courser upon whose back thou sittest, whilst the proud beast itself champs on the glistering bit in disdain to be so curbed, that makes us to look after thee. It is not that victorious scimitar of thine, wherewith thou hast made the earth drunk so often with so much blood of those that are enemies to the Persians, that causes us to stand gazing at thy presence. No, it is the beauty of thy mind wherewith our eyes are enchanted. It is the excellent music of thy tongue, that so ties our ears to thy charms: thou being able to speak and to answer so many several nations in their own proper languages.
- 230 England's complaint to Persia for her Sherley.
- 245 O Persia! thou glorious kingdom, thou chief of empires; the palace sometimes where wisdom only kept her court, the land that was governed by none but by wisemen; yet must I tell thee, and with grief dost thou enforce me to tell thee, that against all law of nations, thou robbest me of my subject. Why should the right of another be thine? It is justice for every one to keep their own. But thou makest up thy gain by my loss. Is this equity? Is this tolerable? Cease to do it and send home (O Persia) that son of mine to me that am his mother: for to me only is he due. But (aye me) the

- 178 Ast Liber, Servus Hero translated in the next sentence
- 181 confines borders
- 182 war Again, in the source we have a direct address to Paul V, here omitted.
- 187 compendious comprehensive though brief
- 195 Argus Argus had one hundred eyes, only two of which closed at any one time. He was killed by Hermes, and Hera saw to it that his eyes were placed in the peacock's tail.
- 197 Thracian Thrace was a large European country located to the south-west of the Black Sea and to the north of the Aegean Sea. Today, part of Turkey or Bulgaria. In Middleton's text 'Thracian' means simply 'Turkish'.
- 200 commands For some reason, Middleton did not include a translation of the passage that follows in the original, which consists of Sherley's address to his liberty, being an explication of the third line of his anagram: 'Libertas, ero
- Servus'.
- 223 lustre glory
- 225 behests vows, duties
- 226 integrity uncorrupted virtue
- 234 Thracian Turkish
- 235 courser a swift horse
- 236 champs bites
- 237 scimitar a curved, single-edged sword used by the Turks and Persians (and the Poles, as a matter of fact)
- 241-4 It is . . . proper languages Sir Robert's reputation as a linguist was confirmed by other writers, including Thomas Herbert (Relation of Some Yeares Travaile).

255 honours of his own country, and the palaces of my kingdom, are by him (belike) neglected and seem not worth the looking on; and though to the eye of the world I may perhaps appear beautiful and great, yet in his eye I show no bigger than a small corner of the world. I do envy thee therefore (O Persia) only for him; yet 260 sithence I cannot enjoy him, fare thou well, O thou my darling, and with that farewell bear along with thee the praises which I give thee. I rob Persia, Persia robs not me: my loss is to me more honour, for the Persian empire borrows her brightness from the beams of one of the sons of England.

265 Sherley to his native country.
O thou my country, if I should pay back into thy hands so much as by bonds due unto thee from me, I should then lay down my life at thy feet. But my thoughts aim at greater matters: it is not breath I would pay thee, but fame; take thou from me so much 270 honour as may make me live for ever. Liberty is the goal to which I run, but such a liberty it is, as may free me from the common baseness of the multitude and make me worthy to be respected by the eye of a king.

275 Servus hero, I am a servant to that great master, to whose feet all the Persians bow and do reverence: I am his servant that I may be his messenger and bear the treaties of such a king to other kings in Christendom. I am destined out to deliver his mind in their own languages, to foreign princes and to the monarchs of the earth. Let them therefore come together, and quickly shall the 280 Turkish fury be calmed, and being weakened in her own strengths, shall be glad to kneel to the power and mercy of others. And thou (O my native country), if thou wouldst be pleased to knit thy forces in this just and universal war, to what dignities may thou advance thyself? Whatsoever is dishonourable hath a base descention and 285 sinks beneath hell, but whatsoever is good and honest lifts up the unblemished brow on high and makes it level with the front of heaven.

290 The author's wish and request to Virtue that she would give unto Sherley such a fruitful harvest of his labours that, having conquered the hardness of them, his name may aspire to the full height of his desert.

O Virtue! the noblest and boldest guide, thou that givest to men the due crown of praises, prosper thou the honoured enterprises of Sherley; but touching those paths which must lead him to titles of fame and honour, make them even and certain before 295 him: he hath no desire to have his name eaten out by the rust of idleness, no; he will never unworthily sink beneath his own proposed fortune.

300 Another of the same author, touching Sir Robert Sherley being called as it were by Fate to manage the affairs of foreign princes.

What is the cause that Sherley hath not all this while lived in the same country that first lent him breath? This is the reason: a spirit so great was not to be contained within so small a circle as his country. Besides,

He is the child of Fate and highly sings

Of kingly embassies to none but kings.

Crowned with these praises as you hear in Poland and leaving the fame of his memorable actions behind him, bending his course to other princes of Christendom with the same royal embassy of honourable and Christian confederacy against Mahomet and his adherents, it shall not be amiss here to speak of the kingdom of Persia, where Sir Robert received such honourable entertainment, suitable to his noble actions and the virtues of his mind, as also of the manners, fashions, rites, and customs that are and have been observed by the Persians. And first, for their religion which they have observed of old, doing worship and reverence in their upright zeal to the Sun, Moon, Venus, Fire, Earth, Water, and Winds, erecting neither altars nor statues, but in open fields offering their sacrifices, which sacrifices were superstitious and full of idle ceremonies too tedious to be here rehearsed. For their kings, the golden line of them is drawn out of one family. That custom amongst the Persians never as yet suffered change or alteration, and so severe their laws are in effect to the punishing of all rebellious, treasonable and disobedient people, that whosoever he be that is found repugnant in the least demeanor to the will and affection of the King, he is presently seized upon by the tormentors, his head and arms chopped off, and with his detested body thrown into some common field, without either grave or covering.
And for their palaces and royal mansions, this hath ever been the continued custom among them, that every king hath had his seat royal erected on some high hill or mountain, the bowels of which he makes his safe treasure house, where all his riches, jewels, and tribute moneys are with exceeding carefulness kept hid and secret.
And so much they do detest sterility and barrenness, that from the highest to the lowest they take many wives in marriage, counting the fruitful propagation of the empire, the only happiness they can raise to it, and so much they thirst after human fruitfulness, that the kings themselves propound great gifts and rewards to those that in one year brings forth the greatest harvest of mankind. From five year old to four-and-twenty the male children practise to ride great horses, to throw the vulnerable and inevitable dart, to shoot in arbaests or long steel bows, and all such manly exercises which shames many other Christian countries and may justly upbraid them of effeminacy and laziness.

Their victuals, for the most part, by which the common sort of people are fed and do live by, are acorns and hedge-pears, their bread coarse and hard, their drink the running spring. For their apparel, the princes and those that live in greatest respect amongst them adorn their bodies with a triple robe, and another garment in the fashion of a cloak hanging down to their knees, the inward linings all of white silks and the outward facing like

Attired in some of which ordinary Persian habits his agent Master Moore is lately arrived in England, bringing happy tidings of this famous English Persian, as also of his coming to England to the exceeding great joy of his native country, laden with honours through every kingdom, as the deserving ornaments of his virtue and labour. And thus, ingenuous reader, have I set down by true and most credible information a brief epitome of Sir Robert Sherley's entertainment into Cracovia, the chief city of Poland, together with all those several speeches delivered to him by the scholars of that country, which although they may seem to the nice ear of our times, not altogether so pure and polished as the refined labour of many English wits, yet therein they strived to express both their fashion and affection to the worthy virtues of Sir Robert, and for a taste of their style and manner of writing, it shall not be amiss if you cast your eye upon these verses following, composed by a scholar worthily reputed in that country, one Andreas Loeaechius, and those are they which at this I borrow to shut up the honourable praises of our famous English traveller. 375

Worthy Sir,

5 The sellsame office of love and due praises which the world put itself into, at your long desired arrival in England, falls happily upon me to perform the like duty toward your worthy brother, nor can I recite more encomiums of his actions, then those of your own hath rightly and properly challenged to themselves; I'll speak thus much of you both, and the world shall judge it free from flattery: you well may be own brothers in birth, that are so near kin to one another in actions of fame and honour: so commending you both to eternizing memory of your own virtues and fortunes, I remain an unworthy 15 observer of them both.

To the most illustrious Master Robert Sherley, a man both of the greatest spirit and of the greatest character; an English knight, and in the name of the king of Persia, ambassador to the princes of Europe.

O honoured man, rivalling the ancestral spirit, bright light, of Britain,

You who do not allow the glory of your people to perish:

Heaven [lit. "the pole star"] does not give all things to one person, But Apollo gives songs, Mars strength, Mercury financial genius.

You alone have all these things: strength is here, eloquent speech is here.

Others possess a jealous majesty; you have wondrous deeds.

Persia casts itself upon you with a double gift: with the heart of warlike Mars and the mind of Pallas.

So much honour is allowed you that the talent of a Scot can scarcely detract from it,

But the poet's love is weightier than his talent.

On the contrary, it is enough for the poet to have sung the praises of a man so worthy of esteem,

For he has confessed to you that he is unrefined both in song and in speech.

I say little, lest I detract from you in the centuries to come;

But I sing for my faith, so as to provide your wonted measure of fame.

5 Sir, not long since it was my happiness to meet with a little poem in Latin, as full freighted with the praises of your worthy renowned son, as is his breast with virtues; which no sooner mine eye had visited, but the general fame of his nobleness invited me to make his praises as worthiness that but one tongue should sound forth his encomiums, who in so many tongues hath purchased glory, I thought it a part of humanity, and the office of a native countryman, since his honours were so spacious and general, to make his praises speak more tongues than one, and amongst all, especially, I chose the voice of his 15 own country as the fittest trumpet of his fame, for whose honour he hath chiefly adventured his life and fortunes.

To you therefore the happy father of so worthy a son, I dedicate both my love and labour, knowing the universal taste of his nobleness cannot come to the dear thirst of his

THE TWO GATES OF SALVATION

or THE MARRIAGE OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENT

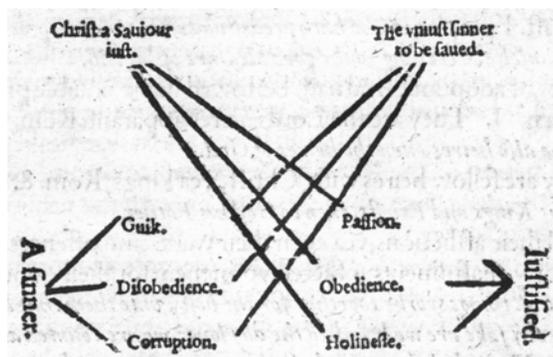

or GOD'S PARLIAMENT HOUSE

Text edited and annotated by Paul Mulholland, introduced by Lori Anne Ferrell

HISTORY is rarely a matter of names and dates, but in the case of Thomas Middleton's 1609 text The Two Gates of Salvation, both nomenclature and chronology are essential to an understanding of the author's political and religious world-view. Two Gates was reissued in 1620 as The Marriage of the Old and New Testament; it was reissued a second time in 1627 as God's Parliament House. Here change over time is reflected, significantly, in titles transformed to suit a volatile political climate; here, too, is a simple reason for the relative obscurity of this particular piece. If Middleton's unique exploration of the relationship between the first and second testaments has remained unprinted since the seventeenth century, it is not because of its subject, or the work's anomalous position in the Middleton œuvre, but because of the confusion caused by its various and nonattributive title-pages. It has only recently been established that the 'Thomas Middleton' whose name appears in the preface to Two Gates is the poet, playwright, and chronologer of seventeenth century London.

The Two Gates of Salvation is a treatise of biblical typology, often called a 'harmony', which in two sections presents an arrangement of parallel scriptural texts. Throughout, the harmony of the Old and New Testaments is quite literally invoked by Middleton: 'Hearken therefore to the mutual sounds,' he writes, 'which their heavenly music sends forth' (a.I.6-8). The themes presented in this work thus conform to the expectations of the genre; it is to the rhetoric of the second section, and the overall format of the piece, that we must turn to discover the unique nature of The Two Gates of Salvation and to speculate about Middleton's own religious affiliations.

After a short section devoted to the prophecies of Christ's birth, life, and passion, Middleton extends his paradigm to represent the Old Testament anticipation of New Testament doctrine. This is a more unusual and complicated undertaking, something noted by Middleton himself, who writes at the end of the first section, 'what follows of him [Christ] now, shall appear more largely, though more irregularly'. This section, which comprises 39 of the original's 55 pages, is expansive in more ways than one. What Middleton calls 'largeness' is in fact theological speculation, in which the Old Testament does not so much prefigure Christ's teachings as provide a commentary to them. In a methodology reflective of

An example, from William Perkins's A Golden Chain, of the graphic depiction of salvation theology.

Calvin's in Institutes of the Christian Religion, the Law is pressed into the service of the Gospel in The Two Gates of Salvation.

While Middleton's rhetorical approach is typical of the theological concerns of protestantism, his parallel-text presentation of these concerns makes Two Gates remarkable in the context of early seventeenth-century religious prose. The 'harmony' of the testaments is presented to the reader in graphic form, by the literal juxtaposition of the scriptures on opposing pages. This polyphonic format is unusual, even in a world where various schemata were employed to explain doctrine, as in the church calendars affixed to the Bishops' Bible, or, more notably, in William Perkins's A Golden Chain, where the doctrinal path of election is travelled over connecting lines and geometric figures. Rather than use a diagrammatic outline of unfolding events or logical progression, Middleton instead depends on simultaneous presentation to make his 'harmony'.

This format of mutuality is especially necessary to the polemical intent of the second half of the work, which is political as well as religious. By displaying the testamental texts side by side, Middleton makes a stronger case for his theology, which is strongly Calvinist. Middleton's Calvinism, however, is less significant to a political reading of The Two Gates of Salvation than the kind of Calvinist Middleton appears to be. For Middleton's beliefs, as evinced in his only extant theological treatise, occupy a grey area, a characteristic danger zone where Calvinist religion could shade over into Puritan politics, goaded by the events of the volatile reign of James I.

The Civil War of the 1640s has been called by an earlier generation of historians 'England's Puritan Revolution' and by recent historians 'Britain's Wars of Religion'. During the time span represented by Two Gates's three publication dates, the religious consensus that had loosely bound James I's loyal subjects began to unravel, as the King appeared increasingly conciliatory to continental Catholicism, and, upon his death, as relations broke down between Charles I and his Parliaments over religious issues. The Two Gates of Salvation displays a theology that would have appeared more confrontative in 1620 than it did in 1609, more so in 1627 than in 1620. Middleton's presentation of scriptural mutuality, therefore, graphically echoes and underscores the calls for alliance and cooperation that characterize the political treatises, published sermons, and parliamentary rhetoric of the period. This was, after all, a time when differences over religion were perceived and decried with increasing vigour: the age that created the idea of the 'Puritan' as a symbol of religious harmony gone discordant.

To examine the rhetorical—and nominal—strategies of this treatise is to realize the importance of understanding its politics as well as its theology. Middleton's desire for political harmony is essential to an understanding of the work as a reflection of the Jacobean milieu wherein it was conceived, written, published, and re-issued. The period used to be described in terms of doctrinal conflict between 'Puritans', who were Calvinists, and 'Anglicans', who were not. This is a dichotomy that is no longer credible in the face of extensive recent scholarship. Jacobean religion ran across a broader doctrinal spectrum than such arbitrary distinctions can negotiate. More importantly, perhaps, the Church of England was an entity as much secular as spiritual. In this context, theological nuance, political alliance, and simple timing could mean the difference between moderate Calvinism, stiff-necked Calvinism, and Puritanism.

This state of affairs could exist because Jacobean protestantism, in general, combined the rhetoric of Calvinism with the religious practices of an unreformed past. The Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion raised doctrinal ambiguity to a religious art form. While most of the Church of England's orthodox theologians were Calvinists, their adherence to Calvin's ideas as contained in his uncompromising Institutes was less clear-cut. Unfettered by a well-defined official orthodoxy, there existed in the Church varieties of Calvinism (as well as doctrinal opinions best described as anti-Calvinist), each distinguished in part by its treatment of the doctrine of predestination. Until the final years of his reign, the King tolerated a broad range of opinion on predestination, as long as the Royal Supremacy went unchallenged and order and uniformity governed the Church's ceremonies.

Generally speaking, Puritans and Calvinists in the Jacobean Church were united in terms of theology. But doctrine constitutes only part of a religious programme. What was called 'Puritanism' at this time was not primarily a matter of dogma—it was a cultural phenomenon with political connotations. What fashioned a Puritan out of a Calvinist in this period was the former's increasingly impatient attitude toward unreformed (and thus 'papist' or 'idoltrous') Church practices, conjoined with an inflexible style of Calvinism. At the time Middleton first published The Two Gates of Salvation, however, such opinions were usually absorbed into the Church of England's broad-based and ill-defined theological consensus.

Consensus, however, is not quiescence. In the absence of an official Calvinist gloss to the Articles of Religion, efforts to define the religion of England flourished in religious treatises and political tracts. The Two Gates of Salvation is representative of the politics of moderation that governed Jacobean polemic. But while Middleton's rhetoric is consensual, it is deceptively so. As with other printed works in this period, we must look beyond Calvinist doctrine to find Puritan tendencies. But instead of reading between the lines, we only have to glance across the page.

The first section of The Two Gates of Salvation is a straightforward biblical typology, in which the protestant tradition of the genre is somewhat refined in the preface. There Middleton's debt to the Reformed tradition can be seen in his claim that 'kings, priests, and prophets' (Preface.69) foreshadow the person of Christ; Calvin, following Martin Bucer, maintained in Book Two of the Institutes that these functions made up triplex munus Christi, the threefold ministry of Christ. There is, however, nothing peculiarly Calvinist in Middleton's treatment of prophecy in this section, or in its simple marginal glosses. Middleton's use of the Geneva Bible in Two Gates has been demonstrated, but there is nothing distinctively Calvinist in this—the Bishops' Bible and the Geneva Bible were used interchangeably in the early seventeenth century, even by such anti-Calvinists as Lancelot Andrewes.

The distinctive doctrinal content of The Two Gates of Salvation is found in its second section, where Middleton admits his approach is one that favours 'material fullness' rather than 'formal niceness'. Loosening his theological tie, Middleton moves comfortably across the broad range of religious belief available in Jacobean England. This section reveals not only the content of Middleton's Calvinism, therefore, but also just what kind of Calvinist Middleton was.

We can easily identify Middleton's theology in Two Gates's exposition of predestination. Its preface introduces the doctrine:

God, being throughly angered with mankind for disobedience, put a sharp bridle into his mouth. That bridle was the law; that law was a curst judge and ready to condemn. But the King of heaven being as full of mercy as of justice, abated the edge of the axe, and to a heavy sentence added a comfortable pardon.

(Preface.33–9)

Here Middleton employs a common metaphor. The idea of the Law as a ‘bridle’ used to restrain creatures naturally unable to discipline themselves was most vividly described by Martin Luther in his On the Bondage of the Will, written 1525. Following Luther, protestant theologians viewed the Fall as destructive, not only of eternal life, but also of free-will. Since humankind could not presume to merit salvation, either by inclination or by effort, they were dependent on a gratuitous act of the divine free-will to obtain justification.

The doctrine of election in itself is not peculiarly Calvin’s but it was Calvinist; in fact, allowing for differences of emphasis, it is a feature of all protestant doctrines of salvation, following Augustine’s On the Predestination of the Saints. Protestant, even Calvinist theologians, however, tended to speak only of predestination to salvation. Not so Calvin himself, whose capacity to take arguments to their logical and extreme conclusions is displayed in Book Three of the Institutes: ‘[God] does not create all in like condition, but ordains eternal life for some and eternal damnation for others’ (xxi.5). For Calvin, the omnipotence of God and the captivity of the human will meant that a special decision was also required in the case of the unregenerate. The divine will is thus doubly-binding: both Elect and Reprobate were predestined to their fate.

The doctrine of double predestination is a distinctive feature of Calvin’s theology. It was also its most vulnerable tenet, constantly under attack by anti-Calvinists unscrupulous and combative enough to make it a straw man. Reformers more than willing to call themselves Calvinists at this time found it hard to explain why they thought God had summarily consigned the majority of the human race to damnation; most simply said that God’s ways were inscrutable and not subject to inquiry. Willingness to explore and defend the double decree, therefore, identified bona fide, die-hard followers of Calvin. Their task became harder over time, as all styles of Calvinism drew increasing fire in the 1620s and 30s.

The Two Gates of Salvation follows the more rigorous line of Calvin. Citing Matthew 7:22–3, ‘...Then Christ will say unto them, I never knew you’, Middleton explains in his marginal gloss that ‘this is not of Ignorance, but because he will cast them away’ (6.II.c). The text Middleton chooses to prefigure this passage, Psalm 6, ‘the Lord hath heard the voice of my weeping’, underscores the harshness of a deserved fate. But this choice of Old Testament text also softens the harsh edge of Calvin’s theology, by emphasizing God’s mercy towards the ‘broken-hearted, ... that are lively touched with the feelings of their sins’ (9.I.c). Here Middleton echoes the Calvinist William Perkins, who counselled his readers that these anguished ‘prickings of the heart’ could be the welcome sign of their election to salvation.

Middleton presents the decree of election as an action done on behalf of humanity, who have been absolved of the responsibility to fulfil the impossible demands of the Law. In this scheme, predestination is curative rather than punitive. He cites Ezekiel 34:12:

As a shepherd searcheth out his flock when he hath been among his sheep that are scattered, so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places, where they have been scattered... (39.I.I–4)

On the opposite page, Middleton cites as corresponding text Matthew 25:32, invoking the caretaking ideal of the Old Testament text, but then extending it to include the idea of judgement:

[H]e shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats, and he shall set the sheep on his right hand, and the goats on the left. (39.II.I–4)

Middleton’s methodology reflects the Calvinist strategies of the Geneva Bible in providing marginal glosses to guide the reader through an interpretation of the texts. This does not mean, however, that he appropriates Geneva’s marginalia; as Paul Mulholland has shown, Middleton’s interpretation of the Matthew scripture, ‘The Judgement-day, the Elect, and the Reprobate’, is unique. By aligning this double-predestinarian reflection on Matthew with an Old Testament text glossed as ‘a comfort to the Church in all dangers’, Middleton echoes the language, if not the ambiguity, of the Thirty-Nine Articles, in which Article 17 describes predestination as a ‘comfortable doctrine’.

Middleton’s debt to Calvin and the Articles of Religion of the Church of England is an important reminder of the status of strict Calvinism in the reign of James I. Middleton reflects the protestant status quo when he defends the doctrine of election; when he defends the doctrine of double predestination, he reflects a rigorous but acceptable dogma. If pressed, most bishops, many court preachers, and other respectable religious polemicists in 1609 would have supported the same doctrine. At the time Two Gates was published, therefore, Middleton’s intriguing combination of biblical typology, Calvin’s rhetoric, and twin-text format would have been enlightening and quite possibly persuasive, but not very provocative.

The Two Gates of Salvation displays other, extra-doctrinal opinions, however, that identify Middleton as not only rigorously Calvinist but potentially puritan. He juxtaposes Isaiah 29:13–4, glossed here as ‘a fearful judgement against hypocrites’, to Matthew 15:7–8, ‘This people... honoureth me with their lips...but in vain they worship me, teaching for doctrines, men’s precepts’ (20.I.c, 20.II.I–4). Middleton’s comments on the New Testament text betray his disapproval of the sacramental and ceremonial practices of the Jacobean Church: ‘They are condemned for hypocrisy, because they made the kingdom of God to stand in outward things.’ This marginal condemnation of idolatry, aligned with the scriptural injunction against confusing ‘men’s precepts’ with God’s, blames the unreformed state of the Church of England on its government by bishops—or, by extension, on the Royal Supremacy itself.

These ideas, in conjunction with his belief in double predestination, can help to label Middleton as a Puritan, but they by no means make the label certain. It is more reliable to consider the effect this text would have had in its next two publications. By 1620, as opposition to the Spanish match grew, and ceremonialists and anti-Calvinists rose to hitherto unprecedented positions of power in the Church, the fragile religious peace established by James I was shattered. Puritan rhetoric, a censorious voice more or less absorbed into a still-reforming Church, began to be viewed by the King as the inharmonious noise of political opposition. The Two Gates of Salvation thus became increasingly discordant with each re-publication.

This brings us to the subsequent titles of Two Gates and its very late inclusion in the Middleton canon. Margot Heinemann has pointed to the publication of The Marriage of the Old and New Testament as evidence of Middleton's Puritanism in 1620; with the discovery of the 1609 version, it is tempting to roll back the date of Middleton's Puritanism as well. But Middleton's ideas need to be placed back into the historical contexts they occupied during a time of rapid social, cultural, and religious change. It might be best to see in The Two Gates of Salvation evidence of beliefs initially unremarkable, but that later would prove provocative. Like many other Jacobean Calvinists, Thomas Middleton became a Puritan over time—not because his ideas had radically changed, but because the times had.

Preface

The Marriage of the Old and New Testament

God's anger is short, his mercy infinite; he seldom sendeth a punishment but presently after followeth a pardon. Read his everlasting chronicle, The Bible, and you shall find this true. First he chideth and then smileth, strikes and then cureth, drowns the world for sin and then gives the rainbow as a sign he will do so no more. But passing by the least, let our considerations stay upon the greatest. Adam was in paradise, and there fell; he no sooner fell there but he was driven from thence; he no sooner was banished but, to comfort him, Christ was promised. Though Adam fled from God, yet God fled

15 not from him; but howsoever our first father stood condemned, we, his posterity, had a reprieve from a Messiah that was to come. The blessing which we lost in Adam was to be recovered by the seed of Abraham; Moses was the first witness to it, and after 20 him all the prophets. In Adam were we both happy and miserable. Happy if we had continued in the first estate, and miserable if, like maimed soldiers, we had not been fetched off when we lay wounded by sin; but our surgeon was at hand. Man sinned and the son of man was to suffer. The treason of the first Adam put the second to death, and the death of the second quitted all the sins of the first. So that

This commentary pays particular attention to Middleton's sources. In composing The Two Gates Middleton appears to have had before him three versions of the Bible or, at the minimum, two versions of the complete Bible and yet another version of the New Testament: the Geneva Bible, the version of the New Testament 'Englished by L. Tomson' (possibly as part of a separate edition of the complete Geneva Bible), and the Bishops' Bible.

The Geneva Bible was a translation initiated by a group of Protestant refugees who had fled England and settled in Geneva during the reign of the Catholic Queen Mary (1553-8). The presence in Geneva of John Calvin and John Knox among others had helped to establish the city as a Protestant seat of learning and biblical scholarship. Originally printed and published in Geneva in 1560, the Bible was the first in English to divide scripture into verses. A prominent and distinguishing feature was its generous marginal commentary which betrayed a Calvinist or what would later be termed a Puritanical bias in matters of doctrine and scriptural interpretation and, especially in Revelation, anti-Roman Catholic sentiment. In its attempt to take account of Hebrew and Aramaic idiom in the Old Testament and Apocryphal texts and reference to the recent work of the age's foremost biblical scholar, Theodore Beza, on the New Testament the Geneva Bible marked a distinct advance in biblical scholarship over previous English versions. The Calvinist slant, despite the Bible's dedication to Elizabeth, however, prevented adoption for reading in English churches and the granting of royal approval. The Geneva Bible nevertheless became the standard version in English households; more than seventy complete editions as well as numerous separate editions of the New Testament were printed between 1560 and 1644, of which the first published in England is dated 1575.

A revised version of the Geneva New Testament by Laurence Tomson was first published in 1576. Tomson's translation proved popular and was subsequently frequently mated with the Geneva Old Testament and Apocrypha. It preserves much of its predecessor's phraseology and reproduces many, though not all, of the Geneva's annotations complete with that version's doctrinal posture and supplemented by the translator's own extensive contributions. Among the traits that set it apart from the Geneva New Testament is Tomson's idiosyncratic use of 'that' to translate the Greek article, τῆς, which is discernible in two of Middleton's citations.

Although the scholarship of the Geneva Bible was generally acknowledged to have superseded that of all earlier English translations, its failure to attract royal approval and authorization for use in churches left a conspicuous gap which the Bishops' Bible, first published in 1568, was intended to fill. The Bible's name derives from the distribution of the labours of translation and revision among sixteen or more bishops and other high-ranking churchmen overseen by Archbishop Matthew Parker. The Great Bible (1539), which had formerly been sanctioned for church use, was employed as the basis of the Bishops' Bible. In clear reference to the Geneva Bible, Parker remarked in a letter to Elizabeth's chief minister, Sir William Cecil, that the new Bible avoided provision of 'bitter notes upon any text'. Such notes as accompanied scriptural passages side-stepped controversy and confined themselves to matters calling for straightforward and unprovocative explanation. Within four years of initial publication the translation of the Psalms included in the Bible was replaced by that of the Book of Common Prayer, which in turn was essentially that of the Great Bible. This move was undoubtedly dictated by the form of the Psalms incorporated into the service of the Established Church since adoption of the Great Bible for church use. Psalm citations in The Two Gates uniformly match the wording of the Prayer Book Psalter and commonly printed in Bishops' Bible from 1572.

CELESTIAL PARALELS.

we were beaten out of paradise and entertained into heaven. The tree of good and evil brought forth an apple to cast us all away, and the tree of shame bore a fruit to save us all for ever. God, being throughly angered with mankind for disobedience, put a sharp bridle into his mouth. That bridle was the law; that law was a curst judge and ready to condemn. But the King of heaven being as full of mercy as of justice, abated the edge of the axe, and to a heavy sentence added a comfortable pardon. The balsamum of grace healed the wounds of the law; law did both promise and threaten. The gospel should perform and reconcile. The bitterness of the law was tasted, but the sweetness of grace could not be relished but by hope. It was fit, therefore, that we lying so sick should be kept in hand that a physician was coming; and hereupon was Christ promised, even from the beginning. He was promised not once but often. Often, to show that God was mindful of our saving health; and by many mouths was the news brought to seal up the tidings with more assurance and credit. Moses was the first that took upon him the office of a trumpeter and proclaimed the coming of a Messiah at least four thousand years before he set forth; and because he was to spring from the stock of Judah, he, like an industrious herald, took especial pains in drawing that genealogy. It rested not so, for old Jacob lying on his deathbed foretold that Shiloh should come; and who was that Shiloh but Messiah? Balaam, instead of cursing, altered his tunes through the charms of the most high, and sung sweetly of a saviour. What is that ladder which Jacob saw in his dream, reaching from earth to heaven, but that scale of our ascending up thither (Jesus Christ)? And what other paschal lamb stand we in need of than of him who is the true Passover? To preserve the memory of this expected redeemer more lively, sundry pictures of him, as it were, were drawn in	30 35 40 45 50 55 60 65	70 75 80 85 90 95 100 105	the persons of others. Kings, priests, and prophets were appointed to be shadows of him that was the true and only substance. In Isaac, when he was ready to be sacrificed, was the figure of Christ going to be crucified. In Joshua, leading the children of Israel into the land of Canaan, was a type of our heavenly Joshua, Christ Jesus, conducting us to everlasting happiness. In the person of David he was the chief king and a conqueror. In Solomon, the builder up of the spiritual temple. In Hezekiah, the destroyer of all idolatry. After these were faithful messengers sent out whose errands were prophecies, and their prophecies ending only in a Messiah. Above the rest Esay sings loudest and clearest: he names Christ's forerunner and draws out Christ's kingdom in lively colours; his offices, his life, and his death are by him foretold. Jeremy celebrateth his birth, Ezekiel and Daniel boast of his coming. Hosea makes him a captain over Judah and Israel. Joel, a shepherd to gather the scattered sheep; Amos, a builder to raise up the tabernacle which was fallen; Jonah goes into the grave before him to show how many days he himself should lie there. Obadiah, Micah, Nahum, and all the rest of the heavenly singers bear a part in suchlike hymns: they have their voices in this high parliament, for the nearer the time approached in which Christ was to come, the louder did they proclaim him, and with more greedy eyes stood waiting for his presence, as people do for a strange king that is to take possession of a new kingdom. They waited not in vain; neither was expectation deluded, for God, to prove that his prophets were no liars, was as good as his word: he kept his day, and sent a Saviour; in him the obligation of the ritual law was cancelled, in him all Jewish ceremony ended, in him all promises had performances, all foretellings their finishings. paid, through his means the prophets and evangelists hold hands and embrace. It is he that hath married the Old and New Testament together; five thousand years and more hath a parliament been held about his birth-right, and both the upper house and the lower house, heaven and earth, are now agreed upon it. In conclusion, this chronicle he writes of himself, and this epitome do we set forth of his acts, Consummatum est, all is now finished.

What is finished? Whatsoever was foretold, all the prophets gave out that the prince of heaven should dwell upon earth, and lo, the omnipotent king, his father, hath sent him hither. Shall I set down the gests of his progress? These they are: he first set out from his celestial palace and lodged in the womb of a virgin, when he left that blessed habitation he lay next in a manger, from the manger he went to the cross, from the cross to the sepulchre, and from that sepulchre returned home again into heaven. Sweetly therefore hath it been sung by one of the most excellent singers in David's temple: 'Nothing', saith he, 'was ever foretold by the prophets of Christ which was not done; nothing was done by Christ which was not foretold. It would take up a life to compare the prophets and evangelists, the predictions and the history, and largely to discourse how the one foretells and the other answers.'

Cast therefore your eyes upon this building, survey it from the foundation to the battlements; here shall you behold a wedding passing through two gates, the one having sundry paths beaten out, and all leading to one way; the other directed by one path only whose steps do guide to all happiness.

The first is the court-gate at which prophets are the porters to open it, whilst angels are the footmen and forerunners, bringing news that the king is upon coming.

The second gate is an entrance to the very palace where the king shows himself in person after he is come. Four evangelists are the four heralds that sound forth his approaching and proclaim him king 110 both of heaven and earth; here sits he crowned with the world at his feet, and his people round about him; he sits crowned with thorns, despised of the world, and betrayed by his people; but because you may take perfect knowledge of him, whom so they crowned, despised, and betrayed, a true relation shall be made of his honourable descent (being sprung from kings), of his marvellous birth (his mother being a pure virgin), of most base betraying him (the traitor feeding at his own table), of his ignominious death (the tree being accursed). And last of all, of his wondrous burial and most glorious resurrection, triumphing over death and hell. To prove all these things, behold witnesses stand ready on both sides who, viva voce, give in this evidence of him, viz.

Observations to be taken in reading this book

Upon every first page or leaf stand the prophets, and on the other page, right against it, are the evangelists: the one foretells the coming, the birth, the passion, etc., of Christ; the other shows wherein all the prophecies of him are fulfilled.

So that after you have read the words of the prophets at the upper end of the first leaf, marked thus ⊕, with a circled cross, you are, if you would truly follow the method of this book, next to read the words of the evangelists on the other side, marked likewise as the former ⊕, with a circled cross.

And so still if you read any verse quoted with any other marks, as + † ¶, etc., behold the like mark on the other side just opposite to it; for the matter of the one is answerable to, and makes plain, the other.

In reading the prophets you shall find that they speak of things to come as if they were already past; but note that they do this of purpose to show the certainty of all their prophecies, which they know could not choose but happen because God himself was the revealer of those secrets to them.

111-12 five thousand years and more The chronology corresponds roughly to some contemporary historical thinking. Edmund Coote in The English Schoolmaster (1596) gives the year 1596 as 5524 years from the creation, a figure more or less in keeping with the 1597 Geneva Bible's 5564 years; Thomas Buckminster's Almanack and Prognostication for the Year 1598 sets the creation 5560 years earlier. The Bishops' Bible (1602) in its 'Genealogy of Adam' prefixed to the scriptures, however, places Christ's birth at 5199 years from the creation of the world.

On this side are placed the prophets, giving testimony of so much as is revealed to them of Christ; and because the stock of which, according to the flesh, he was to come is one of the first matters which they handle, you shall first see how the prophets derive his pedigree, and then, on the other side, how the evangelist confirms it. Harken therefore to the mutual sounds which their heavenly music sends forth.

References to passages in the body of the work are by section number, testament (I for Old, II for New), and line number or marginal column (s for source, c for commentary). Thus 65.II.4 refers to section 65, New Testament passage, line 4. The early printed text contains two numbered sequences of sections, the first running from 1 to 17 and the second from 1 to 92; in this edition the first sequence is printed with roman numerals to distinguish it from the second. The introductory and concluding sections in these sequences are identified as a, xviii, o, and 92a in references.

On this side the evangelists are ready to subscribe to all that which the prophets set down. The one draws Christ in picture, the other shows him in person. His kindred are scattered amongst the prophets and reckoned together amongst the evangelists. Moses fetcheth his descent from Abram and David, not showing the direct line; but Matthew, the first work he doth, draws out his true genealogy.

I shall see him, but not now; I shall behold him, but not near; there shall come a star of Jacob and a scepter shall rise of Israel, and shall smite the coasts of Moab, and destroy all the sons of Sheth. Num. 24:17

viii

The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents; the kings of Arabia and Saba shall bring gifts; all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall do him service. He shall live, and unto him shall be given of the gold of Sheba; they shall also pray for him continually, and daily bless him. Ps. 72:10

When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt. Hos. 11:1

x

Therefore the Lord thy God humbled thee, and made thee hungry, and fed thee with man which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know it, that he might teach thee that man liveth not by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth a man live. Deut. 8:3

xi

There shall no evil happen unto thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling: for he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways; they shall bear thee in their hands, that thou hurt not thy foot against a stone. Ps. 91:11

vii.I Geneva, with an apparently accidental reversal of 'all the' in the final clause in the early edition

viii.I The opening to 'gifts', 2, is closer to Geneva (Bishops' has 'give' in place of 'bring') except for provision of 'Arabia', which is the Bishops' reading; but Geneva provides a marginal gloss identifying 'Sheba' as a part of Arabia, which may have been responsible for the switch (cf. xvii.II). The phraseology of the next verse, Ps. 72:11, down to 'service' is Bishops'; and the final verse, from Ps. 72:15, mixes Geneva ('he shall live, and unto him') and Bishops' ('shall be given of the gold of'), and then reverts to Geneva for 'Sheba' (Bishops' reads 'Arabia') to the end. Preservation of 'Sheba' is curiously at odds with the earlier change to 'Arabia'.

viii.II 'frankincense' points to Geneva-Tomson (Geneva reads 'incense'); although this term appears also in Bishops', this version's phrasology otherwise differs markedly.
c The sense of this passage appears in various locations in St Augustine (e.g. several Epiphany sermons: Sermon 202.2, Migne, Patrologiæ Latinae, vol. 38, 1034; Sermones Supposititii 136.4, 6, Migne, vol. 39, 2014, 2015, and 139.2, Migne, vol. 39, 2018), but the source of this specific wording has not been traced; 'Gold is offered as to a great king, frankincense as to a god, myrrh is presented as to one who will die for the salvation of all.'

The great light of the Gentiles.		Yet the darkness shall not be according to the affliction that it had, when at the first he touched lightly the land of Zabulon and the land of Nephthalim; nor afterward when he was more grievous by the way of the sea beyond Jordan in Galilee of the Gentiles. xv.I Bishops'

c Geneva glosses Zech. 9:9: 'Which declareth that they should not look for such a king as should be glorious in the eyes of man, but should be poor, and yet in himself have all power to deliver his: and this is meant of Christ, as Matt. 21:5'; the marginal commentary to xv.II

xvii.II Geneva or Geneva-Tomson, with the substitution of 'Zecharias' for 'Jeremias', possibly prompted by the accompanying gloss: 'Seeing this prophecy is read in Zech. 11:12 it cannot be denied but Jeremy's name crept into the text through the printer's fault, or by some other's ignorance: it may be also that it came out of the margin, by reason of the abbreviation of the letters, the one being "iou", the other "zou", which are not much unlike. But in the Syrian text the prophet's name is not set down at all', or by Hall's comment in The Passion Sermon, sig. Matt. 6:25 Therefore I say unto you, Be not careful for your life, what ye shall eat, or what you shall drink: nor yet for your body, what you shall put on; is not the life more worth than meat, and the body than raiment? Behold the fowls of the heavens, etc. The carefulness of this life is worthily checked by thinking on the providence of God.

Matt. 7:22, 23 Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not by thy name prophesied, and by thy name cast out devils, and by thy name done many great works? Then Christ will say unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity. ‘I never knew you’: this is not of ignorance, but because he will cast them away.

Matt. 8:2, 3, 4

And lo, there came a leper and worshipped him, saying, Master, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. And Jesus, putting forth his hand, touched him, saying, I will; be thou clean. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed. Then Jesus said unto him, See thou tell no man, but go and show thyself unto the priest, and offer the gift that Moses commanded for a witness to them.

29

O Lord, our governor, how excellent is thy name in all the world, thou that hast set thy glory above the heavens! Out of the mouth of very babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength, because of thine enemies, that thou mightst still the enemy and the avenger.

Ps. 8:1, 2

Meaning that he had planted his church in a place most plentiful and abundant.

Now will I sing to my beloved a song of my beloved to his vineyard. My beloved had a vineyard in a very fruitful hill; and he hedged it, and gathered out the stones of it, and he planted it with the best plants, and he built a tower in the midst thereof, and made a winepress therein; then he looked that it should bring forth grapes, but it brought forth wild grapes.

Isa. 5:1, 2

31

The same stone which the builders refused is become the headstone in the corner; this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes.

Ps. 118:22, 23

Christ is a sanctuary to his elect, to the rest a stumbling stone.

And he shall be as a sanctuary; but as a stumbling stone and as a rock to fall upon to both the houses of Israel, and as a snare and as a net to the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

Isa. 8:14, Zech. 12:3, Dan. 2

Sacrifices ceasing, which Christ accomplished by his death and resurrection.

After threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be slain, and shall have nothing, and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the battle it shall be destroyed by desolations. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week; and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of the abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation determined shall be poured upon the desolate.

Dan. 9:27

It desolate meaning Jerusalem and the sanctuary.

The deliverance of the church by Christ, called here by the name of the archangel Michael.

At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince, which standeth for the children of thy people, and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there began to be a nation, unto that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book.

'Experience': for the comfort of sinners.

He is despised, and abhorred of men; he is such a man as hath good experience of sorrows and infirmities; we have reckoned him so vile that we hid our faces from him.

Isa. 53:3

49

My God, my God, look upon me, why hast thou forsaken me? And art so far from my health, and from the words of my complaint?

Ps. 22:1

50

They gave me gall to eat; and when I was thirsty, they gave me vinegar to drink.

'Their worm': a continual gnawing of conscience, which shall never suffer them to rest.

From month to month, and from sabbath to sabbath, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord. And they shall go forth and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me, for their worm shall not die; neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh.

Isa. 66:24

52

The land shall never be without poor, and therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thy hand unto thy brother that is needy and poor in thy land.

Deut. 15:11

For his humility, he shall receive glory.

Therefore will I give him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong, because he hath poured out his soul unto death, and he was counted with the transgressors, and he bore the sin of many, and prayed for the trespassers.

Isa. 53:12

Of Christ's birth and office.

Unto us a child is born, and unto us a son is given; upon his shoulder doth the rule lie, and he shall call his name Wonderful, the Giver of Counsel, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace; the increase of his government and peace shall have none end; he shall sit upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to stablish it with equity and righteousness from henceforth for evermore.

Isa. 9:6, 7, Dan. 7:14, Mic. 4:7

55

The word of the Lord came unto Elias, saying, Up and get thee to Sarepta, which is in Sidon, and remain there: behold I have commanded a widow there to sustain thee.

Hab. 1:5

73

I will send the Messiah promised, and restore by him the spiritual Israel.

In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen down, and close up the breaches thereof; and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it as in the days of old, that they may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen, because my name is called upon them, saith the Lord that doth this.

Amos 9:11, 12

74

If we have forgotten the name of our God, and holden up our hands to any strange god, shall not God search it out? For he knoweth the very secrets of the heart; for thy sake also we are killed all the day long, and are counted as sheep appointed to be slain.

Ps. 44:21, 22

Against those that murmur against God in time of adversity.

Woe be unto him that striveth with his maker, the potsherd with the potsherds of the earth; shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? Or thy work, It hath none hands? O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the Lord. Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand, so are you in mine hand, O house of Israel.

Isa. 45:9, Jer. 18:6

I will sow her unto me in the earth; and I will have mercy upon her that was not pitied; and I will say unto them which were not my people, Thou art my people; and they shall say, Thou art my God. The number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor told; and in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, it shall be said unto them, Ye are sons of the living God.

Hos. 2:23, 1:10

Acts 10:42, 43		Jesus commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is he that is ordained of God a judge of quick and dead; to him also give all the prophets witness, that through his name all that believe in him shall receive remission of sins.	There is no other name under heaven to be saved by.
	72
Acts 13:40, 41		Beware, lest that come upon you, which is spoken of in the prophets: Behold, you despisers, and wonder, and vanish away, for I work a work in your days, you will not believe it, though it be told you.	Against their incredulity.
	73
Acts 15:16, 17		After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and the ruins thereof will I build again, and I will set it up, that the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, which doth all these things.	The promise kept.
	74
Rom. 8:35, 36		Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation or anguish? Or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? As it is written, For thy sake are we killed all day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter.	'The love of Christ': that is, wherewith Christ loveth us.
	75
Rom. 9:20, 21		But, O man, who art thou which pleadest against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Hath not the potter power of the clay, to make of the same lump one vessel to honour, and another to dishonour?	Predestination. This similitude aptly agreeth in the first creation of mankind.
	76
Rom. 9:25, 26		I will call them my people, which were not my people; and her, beloved, which was not beloved. And it shall be in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, that there they shall be called the children of the living God.	Our vocation is free, and of grace, even as our predestination is.

71.II probably Geneva on the basis of the present tense of 'believe', 4 (Geneva-Tomson reads 'believed') c Geneva-Tomson glosses Acts 10:37: 'The sum of the gospel (which shall be made manifest at the latter day, when Christ himself shall sit as judge both of the quick and dead) is this, that Christ promised to the fathers, and exhibited in his time with the mighty power of God (which was by all means showed) and at length crucified to reconcile us to God, did rise again the third day, that whosoever believeth in him, should be saved through the remission of sins.'

72.II Geneva or Geneva-Tomson, with 'therefore' omitted after 'Beware', 1, and 'ye despisers' altered to 'you despisers', 2. The final line, 'you... told you' conforms to none of the versions of the Bible and was presumably influenced by the parallel reading from Habakkuk.

Spiritual joys and raptures. How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that declareth and publisheth peace, that declareth good tidings, and publisheth salvation, saying unto Zion, Thy God reigneth. Isa. 52:7, Nah. 1:15

78

Meaning the Gentiles that knew not God. I have been sought of them that asked not; I was found of them that sought me not; I said, Behold me, behold me, unto a nation that called not upon my name. I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people, which walked in a way that was not good, even after their own imaginations. Isa. 65:1, 2

79

Let their table be made a snare to take themselves withal, and let the things (that should have been for their wealth) be unto them an occasion of falling; let their eyes be blinded that they see not, and ever bow down their backs. Ps. 69:23, 24

80

The true deliverance from sin and Satan. The Redeemer shall come unto Zion, and unto them that turn from iniquity in Jacob, saith the Lord. And I will make this my covenant with them, saith the Lord. My spirit that is upon thee, and my words, which I have put in thy mouth, shall not depart out of thy mouth, nor out of the mouth of thy seed, nor out of the mouth of the seed of thy seed, saith the Lord, from henceforth even for ever. Isa. 59:20, 21

81

God only wise. Who hath measured the waters in his fist? And counted heaven with the span, and comprehended the dust of the earth in a measure? And weighed the mountains in a weight, and the hills in a balance? Who hath instructed the Spirit of the Lord? Or was his counsellor, or taught him? Of whom took he counsel, and who instructed him, and taught him in the way of judgement, or taught him knowledge, and showed unto him the way of understanding? Isa. 40:12, 13, 14

His omnipotence. 13

82

All shall acknowledge me for God. Look unto me, and you shall be saved: all the ends of the earth shall be saved, for I am God, and there is none other; I have sworn by myself, the word is gone out of my mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That every knee shall bow unto me, and every tongue shall swear by me. Isa. 45:22, 23

The Prophets.

	83
The wonderful love of God.		Since the beginning of the world they have not heard, nor understood with the ear, neither the eye seen another God beside thee, which doth so to him that waiteth for him.	Isa. 64:4
	84
Even in death God will give life.		I will redeem them from the power of the grave; I will deliver them from death: O death, I will be thy death; O grave, I will be thy destruction.	Hos. 13:14
	85
'A covenant', meaning Christ alone.		In an acceptable time have I heard thee, and in a day of salvation have I helped thee: and I will preserve thee, and will give thee for a covenant of the people, that thou mayst raise up the earth, and obtain the inheritance of the desolate heritages.	Isa. 49:8
	86
God in arms, to the delivering of his church.		He put on righteousness as an habergeon, and an helmet of salvation upon his head; and he put on the garments of vengeance for clothing, and was clad with zeal as a cloak.	Isa. 59:17
	87
Meaning Christ; 'the rod of his mouth', which is his word.		With righteousness shall he judge the poor, and with equity shall he reprove for the meek of the earth; and he shall smite the earth with the rod of his mouth, and with the breath of his lips shall he slay the wicked.	Idem 11:4
	88
		Thou Lord in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands; they shall perish but thou shalt endure; they all shall wax old as doth a garment; and as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed; but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail.	Ps. 102:25, 26, 27
	89
Meant by Jerusalem.		Lo, I begin to plague the city, where my name is called upon, and should you go free? You shall not go quit: for I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth, saith the Lord of hosts.	Jer. 25:29

Worthy Sir,

5 Such fruits as, for the diet of the soul, I have prepared for myself do I most gladly bestow upon you. Prophets were the first grafters of them, evangelists the gatherers of them, and the tree on which they grow is Christ; it was 10 a heavenly pleasure to me to climb up to these branches, and I hope it shall be a heavenly banquet to you to taste that which they bear. This book is as it were a map of a large kingdom wherein you may see so much drawn forth as was promised by the King of heaven and earth should 15 be bestowed upon his only begotten son. The city of the soul is builded above, and through these two gates must she pass if she travel to salvation. The one gate was opened more than five thousand years ago (even presently after the world was made), for to Adam himself was a Messiah 20 promised. At that gate, prophets stood waiting, and telling news of his coming. But to us the other gate is opened, and we are assured that our shepherd is come; Christ hath been a dweller with us upon earth. In whose birth, life, words, deeds, passion, death, resurrection, and ascension is fulfilled whatsoever of him was foretold. I am a mere stranger to your eye (though not to the good fame that lives of you 25 familiarily conversant). But sithence the voyage of every professed Christian lies but one way, and that way is set down here by the principles of spiritual navigation, accept of my poor knowledge therein, I beseech you, which offers itself, not as a guide unto your journey (you no doubt 30 having skill enough of your own), but as a perfect circle of my love, filled with many wishes that after you have gone through this first gate of a momentary life, you may enter in at that second, which leadeth to all eternity and happiness. 35

THE ROARING GIRL or MOLL CUTPURSE

Edited by Coppélia Kahn

The Roaring Girl

OR Moll Cut-Purse.

As it hath lately bene Acted on the Fortune-stage by the Prince his Players.

Written by T. Middleton and T. Dekkar.

Printed at London for Thomas Archer, and are to be sold at his shop in Popes head-palace, neere the Royall Exchange. 1611.

MARY FRITH, the notorious London figure who inspired Middleton and Dekker to create the heroine of The Roaring Girl, may well have been the first English woman to perform in a public theatre. Sometime in the spring of 1611, according to church court records, she sat on the stage of the Fortune Theatre 'in the public view of all the people there present, in man's apparel, and played upon her lute and sang a song'. The Epilogue to The Roaring Girl, moreover, promises a repeat performance from her 'some few days hence... on this stage'. The 'original' of the play's roaring girl, a woman who dressed as a man, appears here in writing as a performer. And she could have made her stage debut in the very play that fictionalized her as a comic heroine, for (as allusions to contemporary events in the text indicate) The Roaring Girl was probably first performed at about the same time as Moll's stage appearance, in late April or early May of 1611, at the Fortune Theatre. Its printed version, entered in the Stationers' Register on 18 February, 1612, only nine days after Mary Frith appeared in the customary white robe at Paul's Cross to do penance for her behaviour at the theatre the preceding spring (and for other offences), was probably intended to capitalize on that public appearance. As reported by John Chamberlain, her penance was as much a performance as her singing and playing onstage at the Fortune:

she wept bitterly and seemed very penitent, but it is since doubted [suspected] she was maudlin drunk, being discovered to have tippled of three quarts of sack before she came to her penance.

New evidence of Mary Frith's transgressiveness has recently come to light. On September 26, 1611 (between her performance at the Fortune and her penance at St Paul's), the London Court of Aldermen cites her for unspecified 'divers misdemeanours', probably other than cross-dressing, and sends her to Newgate.

A purportedly factual life of Mary Frith, much influenced by stereotypes of criminal biography, was published in 1662. Recent research by Gustav Ungerer reveals that unlike the play's heroine, Mary Frith married—and carried on a profitable business as broker of stolen goods while also serving as intermediary between pickpockets (of whom she had been one for many years), their victims, and the authorities. He suggests that her cross-dressing was indeed performance, through which she tried 'to carve a niche for herself... in the entertainment business of Southwark and the City of London'.

In effect, Dekker and Middleton's Moll Cutpurse is a nexus of interchanges between the living woman and the fictional character, the performed and the real. And within any one textual representation of her, we find ambiguities and inconsistencies that expose constructions of gender in this patriarchal society, despite their apparent rigidity, as shifting and multivalent. Moreover, 'like a fat eel through a Dutchman's fingers', Moll slips between classes as well as genders, as did Mary Frith. She is equally at home with nobles, middle-class artisans, or criminals, but interacts with all of them so as to expose and explore social tensions increased by extremes of wealth and poverty in an expanding, nascently capitalistic consumer economy. In collaborating on The Roaring Girl Dekker and Middleton, both deeply familiar with London's social topography, fused their talents; though one of the two probably wrote certain scenes, both writers shaped the whole play.

As Marjorie Garber suggests, cross-dressing like Moll's 'offers a challenge to easy notions of binarity, putting into question the categories of "female" and "male"'. Unlike the Shakespearean comic heroines who disguise themselves as boys so that they can covertly pursue the men they love, but abandon their assumed identities when obstacles to marriage are overcome, Moll never conceals her socially ascribed identity as a woman, doesn't stop dressing like a man, and refuses to marry. By wearing breeches and carrying a sword, she assumes the social position and prerogatives of a man—without either renouncing her social identity as a woman or conforming to its dictates. Thus she transgresses one of the most fiercely defended cultural boundaries of early modern Europe. In the final scene, when her fleeting disguise as a bride is plucked off, she puckishly declares to the bridegroom's appalled father, 'Methinks you should be proud of such a daughter— | As good a man as your son!' She has demonstrated that 'being a man' might be, as Judith Butler claims, 'a kind of persistent impersonation that passes as the real'. And the same proposition applies, of course, to 'being a woman'.

Indeed, in diverse kinds of cultural traditions women did impersonate men. Female cross-dressing flourished not only as a literary motif but also as a social practice, part of a struggle over women's place in early modern Europe that was just as characteristic of the period as the rhetoric of divinely ordered hierarchies frequently marshalled to quell it. In seventeenth and eighteenth century Holland, 119 cases of women living or trying to live as men over a period of years have been documented; in England, where female cross-dressing hasn't yet been fully researched, about fifty instances are known. Those in Holland who dressed and lived as men were usually poor, labouring class women under the age of twenty-five, orphaned or in conflict with their families, and away from home in pursuit of work. If they couldn't earn a living as servants, the usual alternatives were begging, vagrancy, and prostitution, so they joined an army or shipped off to sea as sailors, some accompanying husbands or lovers.

The English ballad figure of 'the warrior maid' closely parallels these instances of female cross-dressing in social life. 'Mary Ambree', the first of about one hundred such ballads written over the next three centuries, was published about a decade before The Roaring Girl's first performance, in 1600. It tells the story of a woman who becomes a soldier to avenge her lover's death and fights valiantly as a man in the siege of Gaunt. In these ballads as in a fictional biography of 'Long Meg', a cross-dressing woman in Henry VIII's London, love is almost always the heroine's motive for 'manly' deeds, and fully compatible with them. Like The Roaring Girl, which pursues a conventional comic courtship plot while celebrating a manly heroine who rejects marriage, these ballads represent an unresolved combination of the erotic with the martial, the conventionally feminine with the (masculine) heroic.

In so far as cross-dressing women simply tried to be taken for men, they were conforming to gender norms—but in so far as they succeeded (and it is only those who were ultimately discovered that we know about), they tend to support Butler's claim that gender is a 'persistent impersonation'. Though Dekker and Middleton's characterization of Moll bears more than a trace of the warrior maid tradition, it also differs strikingly, for on only one occasion and for one specific purpose (exposing Laxton) does Moll try to pass as a man. Otherwise, she pursues her eccentric bi-modal career of speaking and acting on women's behalf while acting and speaking as she is dressed—'like a man'.

Moll wasn't the only woman in sixteenth or seventeenth century London, then, to wear a doublet. We can also find precedents for her dress among bourgeois or gentry women, for whom a 'broad-brimmed hat and wanton feather' topping 'ruffianly short locks' became the latest fashion in the 1570s and 1580s, and again around 1620. Unlike Moll—if we can believe hostile male witnesses—these women used men's clothes specifically to enhance their femininity, wearing 'the loose, lascivious civil embracement of a French doublet, being all unbuttoned to entice'. This description is taken from Hic Mulier; or, The Man Woman (1620), a pamphlet indicting the fashion and, even more, the behaviours it elicited from its wearers: 'vile and horrible profanations', 'ruffianly and uncivil actions' that make women man in body by attire, man in behaviour by rude complement, man in nature by aptness to anger, man in action by pursuing revenge, man in wearing weapons, man in using weapons . . . so much man in all things that they are neither men nor women, but just good for nothing.

Moll's male dress isn't designed for sexual enticement and she rejects all sexual advances. Nonetheless, in the play as in the pamphlet, clothes make the man, as it were. Men's clothes prompt or authorize the wearer to impersonate male behaviour, to perform a stylized kind of aggressive, self-assertive masculinity like that of the 'roaring boy', a recognized social type in early seventeenth century London on which Mary Frith patterned herself.

Hic Mulier (in Latin, an impossible phrase yoking a masculine pronoun to the feminine noun for woman) was promptly answered by Haec Vir (a similarly incorrect, oxymoronic Latin phrasing pertaining to a man). The woman in Haec Vir defends her right to dress as she pleases on the grounds that women 'are as freeborn as men, have as free election, and as free spirits'. She denies the dogma of female subjection, and dress as the sign of it. Instead, she calls clothing merely a matter of custom—absurd, foolish, and like the rest of the world, 'a warehouse of change', from which men and women alike are empowered by their creator to choose. This powerful argument, however, is followed by a conclusion that takes precisely the opposite tack, in which the woman argues that if men will only abandon their feminizing fashions and resume 'those manly things which you have forsaken', then women will 'like rich jewels hang at your eares to take our instructions'. Together this pair of pamphlets suggests the range of conflicting positions about gender difference as essence and as social construction that is dramatized in The Roaring Girl.

As Ann Rosalind Jones and Peter Stallybrass argue, among the various discourses that seek to distinguish male from female, 'gender is never grounded: there is no master discourse which is called upon to fix the essence of gender'. Certainly religion claimed that kind of authority by appealing to the Bible and reading Eve's creation as a paradigm for the hierarchy of male over female. According to Genesis, God made Eve to supply that 'help' that Adam wanted, and thus Adam and Eve were seen as the first husband and wife. In sermon after sermon, preachers insist that 'the husband is the head of the woman, as Christ is the head of the Church', making marriage the general model of women's subjection to patriarchal authority. Nonetheless, numerous handbooks of marriage specifying the roles of husband and wife arrive, as Catherine Belsey points out, at a confusing position for the woman, who is configured as 'an authoritative mistress' over servants and children but nonetheless 'a subjected wife' in relation to her husband, whose position within the family is always clearly that of governor. In The Roaring Girl, the troubled marriages of the Gallipots and the Openworks articulate a similar confusion of authority. For example, Mistress Gallipot claims higher social rank than her husband, and her role in attracting and serving customers is crucial to his business as apothecary, yet she rebukes him for being too 'cookish', too fond and subservient, as if goading him to enact his proper role as governor.

Given the actual instability in discourses that purport to be clear and authoritative about sexual difference, it is no surprise that clothing is called upon to serve as a 'sign distinctive to discern betwixt sex and sex', in the words of Philip Stubbes, writing against cross-dressing women in 1583. He continues: 'therefore one to wear the apparel of another sex is to...adulterate the verity of his own kind', implying that the woman who dons a doublet alters her gender, actually becoming partly male in nature—as if clothing had the magical power to alter flesh and spirit. (Dekker and Middleton play with this idea in the double entendre of scene 4, implying that the breeches for which the tailor measures Moll must accommodate a male organ.) Stubbes calls male-dressed women 'Hermaphroditi, that is, monsters of both kinds, half women, half men', epithets applied to Moll by Sir Alexander and his friends, who say she is 'woman more than man, | Man more than woman... A monster!' (2.132-3, 137). If women costumed as men may become virtual men and perform as men, they not only threaten male governance; they also call masculinity as a fixed essence into question.

Moreover, clothing was a 'sign distinctive' not only of gender but also of social rank. The male voice of Hic Mulier equates such appropriation of manliness in dress and behaviour with a collapse of all social difference, asking 'Must but a bare pair of shears pass between noble and ignoble, between the generous spirit and the base mechanic? Shall we all be coheirs of one honour, one estate, and one habit?' The sumptuary laws (in effect till 1604) and Elizabeth's royal proclamations frequently reiterating them were meant to maintain hierarchy in the face of unprecedented social mobility. When a prosperous merchant could afford to wear the velvet reserved for a lord, arguments against women's cross-dressing easily modulated into dire warnings against the levelling of ranks.

The Roaring Girl dramatizes the interdependency of fashion, money, gender, and rank that is a major preoccupation of city comedy. In the courtship plot that pits son against father and then reconciles them, Sir Alexander Wengrave, proud of his place and his wealth, opposes his son's match with Mary Fitzallard because he considers her dowry of 5000 marks (considerably larger than usual) insufficient. He equates the woman with her money. When she pursues Sebastian, disguising herself as a seamstress delivering an order of fashionable collars, the play superimposes the working woman who makes and sells commodities onto the bourgeois woman who is herself a commodity.

Just as strikingly, scene 3 opens with the three citizen wives framed in their shops, displaying themselves and their wares as objects of the gallants' acquisitive gaze. They are selling items necessary to the self-presentation of the stylish gentleman: tobacco, ruffs, feathers. 'Gentlemen, what is't you lack?' cries Mistress Openwork in the time-honoured language of street vendors (5.1), inadvertently suggesting that both status and gender can be signified through what men buy and wear. Laxton and Goshawk each hope to profit from these women, one financially, the other sexually. And the women seek from the gallants a sexual pleasure that the economic partnership of marriage doesn't afford them. Moll is the only female shopper, roving from stall to stall as freely as the men, but Laxton tries to buy her, too, giving her ten gold angels to join him in a rendezvous—the same ten angels he wheedled from Mistress Gallipot. Moll flings them back at him when they meet, with a stinging indictment of lechers who prey on 'distressed needlewomen and trade-fallen wives' (5.95).

Moll's masculine clothing enables her to intervene in the circulation of goods, money, and women that shores up masculine identities by keeping women in their place. Her costume and behaviour function like a 'persistent impersonation' that isn't meant to pass for the real. Rather, its point is precisely to show that a woman can act like a man, can perform masculinity and do what men do, but on her own behalf. 'I scorn to prostitute myself to a man', she cries as she challenges Laxton, 'I that can prostitute a man to me' (5.111-12). In a play world of male characters who intrigue, swindle, and fail to govern themselves or others well, ranging from gentlemen such as the greedy Sir Alexander and impotent Laxton to displaced rascals such as Trapdoor and Tearcat, 'honest Moll' stands up for herself. Scene 5, in which she turns her assignation with Laxton into a swordfight and a bruising denunciation of men like him, best demonstrates this strategy at work.

The scene recalls the figure of the warrior woman in Renaissance epics such as Spenser's The Faerie Queene and Ariosto's Orlando Furioso and in popular literature such as Long Meg of Westminster: the woman disguised as a warrior who challenges and defeats a braggart male in a swordfight, then reveals herself as a woman by removing her helmet and letting down her long hair. Thus she reaffirms her essential difference from the man, and shows him up as less than a man; she normalizes gender difference. Here the playwrights give the motif a new twist, in that the 'real' Moll revealed when she takes off her cloak isn't the 'normal' woman Laxton counts on, the woman who can be reduced to a sexual object, but rather one who fights like a man yet speaks as a woman identified with women, to defend them from men's slander.

'Thou'rt one of those', she charges, 'That thinks each woman thy fond flexible whore', a man who interprets any woman's behaviour as indicating her innate seducibility (5.72-3). Even worse, she says, he speaks of chaste, virtuous women as whorish, gives them 'a blasted name', and ruins them. In this speech, the longest in the play, Moll focuses not on dress but on language deployed by men as the power that subjects women, first by eroticizing them, and then by slandering them as unchaste. Here the play refracts a problem faced by women generally in early modern England, for whom chastity was the sine qua non of social acceptability. As Susan Amussen argues, citing defamation cases tried in church courts, 'Women's reputations were far more narrowly rooted in sexual behaviour...[and] more easily threatened than men's'. Mistress Gallipot's false story of a precontracted marriage with Laxton is a desperate (and highly comic) expedient to protect her reputation. In a more serious vein, the play often makes a point of the disparity between Moll's reputation for whorishness and thievery, and her actual chastity and uprightness.

This brings us to a seeming contradiction, reminiscent of Hic Mulier, in the way male characters respond to Moll's male dress. Instead of simply making her more of a man and thus less appealing as a woman, it heightens her sexual attractiveness. Laxton sees her as a figure of extraordinary sexual potency who would challenge or even exhaust the virility of men who desire her. Though Sir Alexander considers Moll 'half woman, half man' and thus a monster, he also takes her apparel as a sign that she's a whore. (London court records show that women dressing as men were often accused of prostitution.) Thus he links it with the name Moll which, as he tells Sebastian, is typically a whore's name (4.160-2). That it is also a nickname for Mary suggests, as is the case in A Chaste Maid in Cheapside, that the virgin and the whore are both types of male desire, a bifurcated image of woman constructed by patriarchal discourse. This linkage is inscribed in the plot of The Roaring Girl, in which Sebastian pretends to court Moll for the sake of winning

Mary, and the two women appear successively as his bride in the final scene.

In scene 8, however, when both Mary and Moll wear breeches, the playwrights explore a different configuration of desire. Sebastian says when he kisses Mary, 'Methinks a woman's lip tastes well in a doublet' (8.47)—possibly because the doublet recalls a male love object, a boy who could be the 'ingle' or sexual partner of a gallant, one of his many pleasures, like those in the list Sir Davy Dapper reels off: 'A noise of fiddlers, tobacco, wine, and a whore...fencers and ningles' (7.64-8). The fact that both Mary and Moll would be played by boy actors makes it possible, as Lisa Jardine and others have argued, that boy actors playing female characters (especially those in male costume) might appeal to men homoerotically as well as heterosexually. The homoerotic implications of scene 8, however, are somewhat at odds with the heterosexual implications of the marriage plot, as are the 'two noble friends' Sir Beauteous Ganymede (ganymede being a synonym for ingle) and Sir Noland who escort the real bride in the final scene.

Though Moll promotes the marriage of Mary and Sebastian, she herself adamantly refuses to marry, which she explains and justifies in a sequence of contradictions that mirrors the controversy over women in texts like Hic Mulier and Haec Vir. On the one hand, she rejects marriage because 'a wife ought to be obedient', but she herself is 'too headstrong to obey'; she presents herself as an exception to a norm she doesn't question. On the other hand, she declares

I have the head now of myself, and am man enough for a woman; marriage is but a chopping and changing, where a maiden loses one head, and has a worse i'th' place. (4.43-7)

Here she criticizes marriage, implying that it involves violence against women and submission to an unfit male authority. Yet in doing so, she draws on the hierarchical opposition of head to body that, in patriarchal discourse, subtends and reinforces that of male to female. She can find no other language than this in which to assert her headship, her autonomy. So long as Moll remains outside marriage and resists normalization as a woman, though, she modifies the threat she poses to men, for as a 'headstrong' woman who is nobody's wife, she challenges no husband's mastery. The price she pays for her freedom, however, is the abridgement of her own sexuality, which is dramatized in the play's most original scene—saturated with sexual doubles entendres—when she plays the viol and sings. Reversing the passive/active, female/male relationships usually imaged in literary representations of erotic activity, she plays rather than being played upon, but 'fingering' and stroking an instrument held between her legs can be interpreted both as heterosexual and as auto-erotic. The haunting, dream-like lyrics of her songs mysteriously suggest female autonomy in a community of women:

I dream there is a mistress,
 And she lays out the money;
 She goes unto her sisters,
 And never comes at any. (8.103–6)

Like many of her speeches, they also protest the hypocrisy of those who impugn her chastity: 'Yet she began, like all my foes, | To call whore first' (8.122–3). 'Except in dreams', as Jean E. Howard suggests, 'Moll cannot be an autonomous sexual subject and escape being called a whore.'

Most readers have found her, nonetheless, irresistible as both focus and source of the play's energies. Oddly, both the Victorian editor Bullen and the modernist poet-critic T. S. Eliot share an uncritical delight in Moll Cutpurse. To Bullen she is an 'Amazon of the Bankside' with 'the thews of a giant and the gentleness of a child', while in his influential 1927 essay Eliot finds her 'a real and unique human being', yet also 'a type of the sort of woman who has renounced all happiness for herself and who lives only for a principle'. In a different vein, Eliot applied to Middleton Kathleen Lynch's thesis that Elizabethan–Jacobean comedy dramatized the rise of the merchant class to gentry status. Thus he helped to nudge interpretation away from its fascination with Moll toward the socio-economic approach to city comedy represented by L. C. Knights (1938). Knights, however, concentrates solely on the intrigues of citizens and gallants, ignoring Moll, while in the first book devoted to city comedy (1968), Brian Gibbons neglects to discuss the play at all. Five years later Alexander Leggatt's book on city comedy breaks this critical silence on Moll, arguing that the playwrights make her chastity not a docile submission to prevailing mores but 'the assertion of an individual will'. He locates this extraordinary assertiveness, however, entirely in her chastity, without even mentioning her male dress.

It is only with the advent of feminist criticism that The Roaring Girl is being understood as a probing critique of intersecting class and gender ideologies, rather than as a play about a historical curiosity. Recent essays by Rose (1984) and Howard (1988, 1992) set it in the context of a hierarchical social system trying to regulate both class and gender under the intense pressure of economic and cultural change. Shepherd (1981) and Helms (1989) view Moll as avatar of a classic literary type, the warrior woman, but like Rose and Howard, read that type in terms of a social contest over what gender means. Several critics focus on marriage as the key point in this contest: Comensoli (1987), Hendricks (1990), and Miller (1990) examine the commodifying effects of the exchange of women by men through marriage. Others, such as Dawson (1993), Nakayama (1993), and Orgel (1993), look at the performative dimensions of Moll's dual gender identity as part of an interplay among various cultural representations of gender. Garber (1991) interprets the play as a manifestation of cultural anxiety about masculinity as much as femininity, a play that, fascinated with fashion and clothing, theorizes in them the fashioning of gender. This rich, stimulating body of work places The Roaring Girl at the centre of cultural change in early modern England, opening it up to questions that are, at the same time, current in the 1990s: does cross-dressing subvert or recuperate an oppositional gender ideology? Can the performance of gender effectively challenge oppressive political and economic structures?

Until a 1951 production by the Brattle Street Theatre in Cambridge, Massachusetts, there is no record that The Roaring Girl was revived. The Brattle Street production pleased audiences as a fast-paced Restoration farce, with Nancy Walker playing Moll as 'a... combination of Groucho Marx and Mae West.' The intrigues between citizens and gallants were radically trimmed, but songs and a 'Keystone Cops' chase sequence were added. Of the six other performances since, two command special interest. Sue-Ellen Case's 1979 adaptation at the University of California, Berkeley, was the first that opened the play to feminist inquiry. Case emphasized the intersection of acting conventions with gendered power structures. Using a main stage for a 'straight' performance of the text and an adjacent stage for a concurrent dressing room drama, she cast the entire play with female actors. By intercutting dialogue from The Roaring Girl with the actors' mocking, probing backstage interrogations of it, she implied that the characters in the play, the all-male actors of Middleton's theatre, and the female actors were all playing gender roles scripted by male dominance and heterosexuality. The actress most critical of such structures is accused of scene-stealing, and bound and gagged by the others. Moll's part inspires provocative comment such as 'All plays are about male identification. But not about women doing it'. Her centrality as heroine is undermined, however, and attention re-focused on the patriarchal system that configures all characters: 'It's about money and how it buys sex... in the hands of the male'.

The 1983 Royal Shakespeare Company production of The Roaring Girl, directed by Barry Kyle and starring Helen Mirren as Moll, similarly emphasized the play's critique of the social order while trying to make it appealing as a comedy. A risky revival of a little-known play, it was paired with The Taming of the Shrew to increase box-office draw (thus also setting up the inevitable comparison with Shakespeare). Mirren won praise for her performance of Moll as a working class heroine with a Cockney accent who 'radiates mirth'. But some reviewers were put off by the implications of the set, which included 'a set of cog-wheels representing Tudor capitalism', in line with Kyle's interpretation of the play as 'a moral comedy about the class system breaking down in a Jacobean world of profiteering and self-interest'. Critical response, heavily influenced by the idealizing praise of Moll in Eliot's 1927 essay, betrays a certain disappointment with the play as a comedy and an edgy resistance to what is perceived as the obscurity of its wordplay and intrigues—which is surely no greater than that of Shakespeare. In the decade since 1983, however, feminist scholarship has made the play legible as a document of early modern culture contiguous with our own times. Moreover, the popular success of films such as The Crying Game (1992), and of plays such as M. Butterfly (1988) that challenge traditional thinking about gender as innate and fixed, may encourage performances of The Roaring Girl that release its intellectual and dramatic energies anew.

Epistle To the Comic Play-readers, Venery and Laughter

The fashion of play-making I can properly compare to nothing so naturally as the alteration in apparel: for in the time of the great-crop doublet, your huge bombasted plays, quilted with mighty words to lean purpose, was only then in fashion; and as the doublet fell, neater inventions began to set up. Now in the time of spruceness, our plays follow the niceness of our garments: single plots, quaint conceits, lecherous jests dressed up in hanging sleeves; and those are fit for the times and the terms. Such a kind of light-colour summer stuff, mingled with diverse colours, you shall find this published comedy—good to keep you in an afternoon from dice, at home in your chambers; and for venery you shall find enough, for sixpence, but well couched an you mark it. Prologue

A play (expected long) makes the audience look For wonders—that each scene should be a book, Composed to all perfection; each one comes And brings a play in's head with him: up he sums, What he would of a roaring girl have writ— If that he finds not here, he mews at it. Only we entreat you think our scene Cannot speak high, the subject being but mean. A roaring girl, whose notes till now never were, Shall fill with laughter our vast theatre: That's all which I dare promise; tragic passion, And such grave stuff, is this day out of fashion. I see attention sets wide ope her gates Of hearing, and with covetous listening waits

To know what girl this roaring girl should be— 15
For of that tribe are many. One is she
That roars at midnight in deep tavern bowls,
That beats the watch, and constables controls;
Another roars i'th' day-time, swears, stabs, gives braves,
Yet sells her soul to the lust of fools and slaves: 20
Both these are suburb-roarers. Then there's besides
A civil, city-roaring girl, whose pride,
Feasting, and riding, shakes her husband's state,
And leaves him roaring through an iron grate.
None of these roaring girls is ours: she flies 25
With wings more lofty. Thus her character lies—
Yet what need characters, when to give a guess,
Is better than the person to express?
But would you know who 'tis? would you hear her name?
She is called Mad Moll; her life, our acts proclaim. 30

- 24 through an iron grate behind the iron-barred window of a cell in debtors' prison
- 26 character distinctive traits
- 30 Mad Moll wild, eccentric, not conforming to standards of female behaviour; cf. 1.102, note
- 1.0.1 Mary Fitzallard Mary connotes chastity, especially in conjunction with Moll (see 1.73, note).
- sempster one who sews garments for a living, either man or woman
- 0.2 case for bands a box for neck-bands or collars
Neatfoot suggests skill and efficiency as a servant; pun on oxfoot prepared as food
- 0.4 trencher wooden plate or shallow dish, common in noble or fashionable households at this time
- 1-2 The young gentleman...son Sebastian, Sir Alexander's son and heir, in love with Mary Fitzallard
Sir Alexander's Sir Alexander Wengrave; 'grave' suggests his dignity as Justice of the Peace. In the original quarto, spelled 'Went-grave' only in the dramatis personae, suggesting his response to Mary Fitzallard's dowry.
- 4 transcendent affected diction typical of Neatfoot
- 6 fructify...come for suggests sexual consummation
- 8 tree of generation suggests Mary's desired union with Sebastian, which would make her part of his family tree
- 9 erected no longer seated, punning on erection as sexual arousal

MARY Thanks, sir.
 NEATFOOT And withal certify him that I have culled out for him, now his belly is replenished, a daintier bit or modicum than any lay upon his trencher at dinner.
 15 Hath he notion of your name, I beseech your chastity?
 MARY One, sir, of whom he bespake falling-bands.
 NEATFOOT Falling bands, it shall so be given him. If you please to venture your modesty in the hall, amongst a 20 curl-pated company of rude servingmen, and take such as they can set before you, you shall be most seriously, and ingeniously welcome.
 MARY I have dined indeed already, sir.
 NEATFOOT —Or will you vouchsafe to kiss the lip of a cup of rich Orleans in the buttery amongst our waiting-25 women?
 MARY Not now in truth, sir.
 NEATFOOT Our young master shall then have a feeling of your being here presently. It shall so be given him.
 MARY
 I humbly thank you, sir. Exit Neatfoot
 30 But that my bosom
 Is full of bitter sorrows, I could smile
 To see this formal ape play antic tricks;
 But in my breast a poisoned arrow sticks,
 And smiles cannot become me. Love woven sleightly,
 Such as thy false heart makes, wears out as lightly,
 35 But love being truly bred i'th' soul, like mine,
 Bleeds even to death at the least wound it takes.
 The more we quench this, the less it slakes. O me!
Enter Sebastian Wengrave with Neatfoot
 SEBASTIAN A sempster speak with me, sayst thou?
 NEATFOOT Yes, sir, she's there, viva voce, to deliver her 40 auricular confession.
 SEBASTIAN With me, sweetheart? What is't?
 MARY I have brought home your bands, sir.
 SEBASTIAN Bands? Neatfoot!
 NEATFOOT Sir.

SEBASTIAN Prithee look in, for all the gentlemen are upon 45
 rising.
 NEATFOOT Yes, sir, a most methodical attendance shall be given.
 SEBASTIAN And, dost hear, if my father call for me, say I am busy with a sempster. 50
 NEATFOOT Yes, sir, he shall know it that you are busied with a needlewoman.
 SEBASTIAN In's ear, good Neatfoot.
 NEATFOOT It shall be so given him. Exit
 SEBASTIAN Bands? You're mistaken, sweetheart, I bespake 55 none. When, where, I prithee? What bands? Let me see them.
 MARY
 Yes, sir, a bond fast sealed with solemn oaths,
 Subscribed unto, as I thought, with your soul,
 Delivered as your deed in sight of heaven, 60
 Is this bond cancelled? Have you forgot me?
 SEBASTIAN
 Ha! Life of my life! Sir Guy Fitzallard's daughter!
 What has transformed my love to this strange shape?
 Stay; make all sure; so. Now speak and be brief,
 Because the wolf's at door that lies in wait 65
 To prey upon us both. Albeit mine eyes
 Are blessed by thine, yet this so strange disguise
 Holds me with fear and wonder.
 MARY
 Mine's a loathed sight.
 Why from it are you banished else so long? 70
 SEBASTIAN
 I must cut short my speech: in broken language,
 Thus much, sweet Moll, I must thy company shun.
 I court another Moll; my thoughts must run
 As a horse runs that's blind: round in a mill,
 Out every step, yet keeping one path still. 75
 MARY
 Um! Must you shun my company? In one knot in which the couple joined hands (with union before God, after which they were regarded as husband and wife, but weren't considered fully married until a wedding ceremony took place in church.

Before the ceremony, 'banns' had to be called in church on three successive Sundays, announcing the expected wedding ceremony so that those who knew of any impediment could voice their objection. | 73 | Moll the roaring girl. As a proper noun
'moll' means a whore, a thief's female companion, or a female thief. Moll's surname, Cutpurse, associates her with thieves who robbed people by cutting the cord that attached purses to clothing.
Purse could also refer to the scrotum.
Given Moll's appropriation of masculine prerogatives and the reactions it provokes, 'Cutpurse' hints at castration, the removal of the testicles. Roaring boys were swaggering, quarrelsome young men given to gaming, whoring, and thieving, in defiance of law and social mores. |

Have both our hands by th'hands of heaven been tied
 Now to be broke? I thought me once your bride—
 Our fathers did agree on the time when—80 And must another bedfellow fill my room?
 SEBASTIAN
 Sweet maid, let's lose no time. 'Tis in heaven's book Set down that I must have thee; an oath we took
 To keep our vows; but when the knight, your father,
 Was from mine parted, storms began to sit 85 Upon my covetous father's brows, which fell
 From them on me. He reckoned up what gold This marriage would draw from him, at which he swore
 To lose so much blood could not grieve him more.
 He then dissuades me from thee, called thee not fair,
 90 And asked, 'What is she but a beggar's heir?'
 He scorned thy dowry of five thousand marks.
 If such a sum of money could be found,
 And I would match with that, he'd not undo it,
 Provided his bags might add nothing to it;
 95 But vowed, if I took thee—nay more, did swear it—
 Save birth from him I nothing should inherit.
 MARY
 What follows then—my shipwreck?
 SEBASTIAN Dearest, no.
 Though wildly in a labyrinth I go,
 My end is to meet thee: with a side wind
 100 Must I now sail, else I no haven can find,
 But both must sink forever. There's a wench
 Called Moll, Mad Moll, or Merry Moll, a creature
 So strange in quality, a whole city takes Note of her name and person. All that affection
 105 I owe to thee, on her, in counterfeit passion,
 I spend to mad my father; he believes
 I dote upon this roaring girl, and grieves
 As it becomes a father for a son
 That could be so bewitched; yet I'll go on 110 This crooked way, sigh still for her, feign dreams
 In which I'll talk only of her: these streams
 Shall, I hope, force my father to consent
 That here I anchor, rather than be rent
 Upon a rock so dangerous. Art thou pleased, 115 Because thou seest we are waylaid, that I take

A path that's safe, though it be far about?
 MARY
 My prayers with heaven guide thee!
 SEBASTIAN Then I will on,
 My father is at hand; kiss and be gone.
 Hours shall be watched for meetings. I must now,
 As men for fear, to a strange idol bow. 120
 MARY
 Farewell!
 SEBASTIAN
 I'll guide thee forth. When next we meet,
 A story of Moll shall make our mirth more sweet. Exeunt

Enter Sir Alexander Wengrave, Sir Davy Dapper, Sir Adam Appleton, Goshawk, Laxton, and Gentlemen Sc. 2

OMNES
 Thanks, good Sir Alexander, for our bounteous cheer.
 ALEXANDER
 Fie, fie, in giving thanks you pay too dear!
 SIR DAVY
 When bounty spreads the table, faith, 'twere sin,
 At going off, if thanks should not step in.
 ALEXANDER
 No more of thanks, no more. Ay marry, sir,
 5 Th'inner room was too close; how do you like
 This parlour, gentlemen?
 OMNES O, passing well!
 SIR ADAM
 What a sweet breath the air casts here—so cool!
 GOSHAWK
 I like the prospect best.
 LAXTON See how 'tis furnished.
 SIR DAVY
 A very fair sweet room.
 ALEXANDER Sir Davy Dapper,
 10 The furniture that doth adorn this room
 Cost many a fair grey groat ere it came here;
 But good things are most cheap when they're most
 dear.
 Nay, when you look into my galleries—

77 our hands... tied refers to precontract; see 56–8, note

80 bedfellow If they have had sexual intercourse (which could be implied here), then they would be considered married; could also refer to another match for Sebastian.

81 heaven's book refers to precontract as sacred, binding

91 five thousand marks worth £3,330, well above the average dowry offered by gentry in 1600–1624, and only slightly below the average offered by peers

94 bags money bags

102 Mad Moll mad in the sense of not conforming to conventions of behaviour for women; spirited, wild (cf. Prologue.30 and 1.73, note)

103 quality character; occupation

111 streams currents

113 rent torn apart

2.0.1 Wengrave see 1.1, note

0.1–2 Sir Davy Dapper Dapper suggests smart dress, brisk movements.

0.2 Sir Adam Appleton in alluding to the Adam of Genesis, suggests both venerable age and human fallibility

Goshawk female hawk used in falconry; refers to his predatory schemes

Laxton 'lacks stone' (testicle), implying his impotence and his landlessness (see 2.57, note)

5 marry exclamation denoting surprise or emphasis; from the Virgin Mary

7 parlour a spacious and handsomely furnished sitting room

9 prospect view of landscape

12 fair grey groat A groat was a silver coin worth fourpence; figuratively, any small sum. Sir Alexander, though, stresses its worth in 'fair'.

14 galleries long, narrow rooms in manor houses for the display of family portraits often hung very closely together

Scene 2

The Roaring Girl.

How bravely they are trimmed up—you all shall 15 swear
 You're highly pleased to see what's set down there:
 Stories of men and women, mixed together
 Fair ones with foul, like sunshine in wet weather.
 Within one square a thousand heads are laid 20 So close that all of heads the room seems made;
 As many faces there, filled with blithe looks,
 Show like the promising titles of new books
 Writ merrily, the readers being their own eyes,
 Which seem to move and to give plaudities.
 25 And here and there, whilst with obsequious ears
 Thronged heaps do listen, a cutpurse thrusts and leers
 With hawk's eyes for his prey—I need not show him:
 By a hanging villainous look yourselves may know
 him,
 The face is drawn so rarely. Then, sir, below,
 30 The very floor, as 'twere, waves to and fro,
 And like a floating island, seems to move
 Upon a sea bound in with shore above.
Enter Sebastian and Greenwit
 OMNES
 These sights are excellent!
 ALEXANDER I'll show you all;
 Since we are met, make our parting comical.
 SEBASTIAN
 35 This gentleman—my friend—will take his leave, sir.
 ALEXANDER
 Ha? Take his leave, Sebastian? Who?
 SEBASTIAN This gentleman.
 ALEXANDER
 Your love, sir, has already given me some time,
 And if you please to trust my age with more,
 It shall pay double interest—good sir, stay.
 GREENWIT
 I have been too bold.
 40 ALEXANDER Not so, sir. A merry day
 'Mongst friends being spent, is better than gold saved.
 Some wine, some wine! Where be these knaves I keep?
Enter three or four Servingmen and Neatfoot
 NEATFOOT
 At your worshipful elbow, sir.

ALEXANDER You are
 Kissing my maids, drinking, or fast asleep.
 NEATFOOT
 Your worship has given it us right.
 ALEXANDER You varlets, stir! 45
 Chairs, stools, and cushions.
Servants bring on wine, chairs, stools and cushions
 Prithoe, Sir Davy Dapper,
 Make that chair thine.
 SIR DAVY 'Tis but an easy gift,
 And yet I thank you for it, sir; I'll take it.
 ALEXANDER
 A chair for old Sir Adam Appleton.
 NEATFOOT
 A backfriend to your worship.
 SIR ADAM Marry, good Neatfoot, 50
 I thank thee for it: backfriends sometimes are good.
 ALEXANDER
 Pray make that stool your perch, good Master Goshawk.
 GOSHAWK
 I stoop to your lure, sir.
 ALEXANDER Son Sebastian,
 Take Master Greenwit to you.
 SEBASTIAN Sit, dear friend.
 ALEXANDER
 55 Nay, Master Laxton. (To Servant)—Furnish Master
 Laxton
 With what he wants, a stone—a stool, I would say, a stool.
 LAXTON
 I had rather stand, sir.
Exeunt [Neatfoot and] Servants
 ALEXANDER
 I know you had, good Master Laxton. So, so—
 Now here's a mess of friends; and gentlemen,
 Because time's glass shall not be running long, 60
 I'll quicken it with a pretty tale.
 SIR DAVY Good tales do well
 In these bad days, where vice does so excel.
 SIR ADAM
 Begin, Sir Alexander.
 ALEXANDER Last day I met

19–24 Within one square . . . give plaudities
 Sir Alexander's description of his galleries modulates into a vision of the tiered galleries of the Fortune Theatre (the only public theatre built as a square) in which the faces of the audience crowded together resemble those in the galleries' portraits, and then, figuratively, the titles of books displayed on library shelves.
 24 plaudities conflates plaudite (Latin), customary appeal for applause made by actors at end of play, with applause
 26 heaps multitudes
 26–7 a cutpurse . . . for his prey In court records and other writings, the Fortune was associated with cutpurses and pickpockets.

 30–2 The very floor . . . with shore above likens the Fortune's floor, crowded with standing spectators, to a sea and the stage to an island
 32.1 Greenwit suggests youth, naïvete
 34 comical happy
 45 varlets servants, or abusively, knaves 46 Chairs, stools, and cushions Even in wealthy houses chairs were not plentiful and were often reserved for those of highest rank.
 50 backfriend chair supporting his back;
 pun on 'backfriend' as pretended or false friend, and on officer arresting debtor, laying hands on him from behind

 52–3 perch . . . lure word play on Goshawk's name; in falconry, a hawk stoops to the lure when it comes down for its food 56 a stone . . . a stool a jab at Laxton's impotence, punning on 'wants' as lacks, and 'stone' as testicle 57 stand be capable of erection; refers to his impotence
 59 mess proverbially, 'four make up a mess'; a group of four 60–1 Because time's glass . . . a pretty tale to make time seem short, I'll tell a story to please you

- 65 An aged man upon whose head was scored
A debt of just so many years as these
Which I owe to my grave: the man you all know.
- OMNES
His name, I pray you, sir?
- ALEXANDER Nay, you shall pardon me.
But when he saw me, with a sigh that brake,
Or seemed to break, his heart-strings, thus he spake:
70 'O my good knight', says he—and then his eyes
Were richer even by that which made them poor,
They had spent so many tears, they had no more—
'O sir', says he, 'you know it, for you ha' seen
Blessings to rain upon mine house and me.
75 Fortune, who slaves men, was my slave; her wheel
Hath spun me golden threads, for, I thank heaven,
I ne'er had but one cause to curse my stars.'
I asked him then what that one cause might be.
- OMNES
So, sir.
- ALEXANDER
He paused, and as we often see
80 A sea so much becalmed there can be found
No wrinkle on his brow, his waves being drowned
In their own rage; but when th'imperious winds
Use strange invisible tyranny to shake
Both heaven's and earth's foundation at their noise,
85 The seas swelling with wrath to part that fray
Rise up and are more wild, more mad, than they:
Even so this good old man was by my question
Stirred up to roughness; you might see his gall Flow even in's eyes; then grew he fantastical.
- SIR DAVY
90 Fantastical? Ha, ha!
- ALEXANDER
Yes, and talked oddly.
- SIR ADAM
Pray, sir, proceed. How did this old man end?
- ALEXANDER
Marry, sir, thus:
He left his wild fit to read o'er his cards;
95 Yet then, though age cast snow on all his hairs,
He joyed, 'Because', says he, 'the god of gold
Has been to me no niggard. That disease
- Of which all old men sicken, avarice,
Never infected me—'
- LAXTON (aside) He means not himself, I'm sure. 100
- ALEXANDER 'For like a lamp
Fed with continual oil, I spend and throw
My light to all that need it, yet have still Enough to serve myself. O but', quoth he,
105 'Though heaven's dew fall thus on this aged tree,
I have a son that's like a wedge doth cleave,
My very heart-root.'
- SIR DAVY Had he such a son?
- SEBASTIAN (aside) Now I do smell a fox strongly.
- ALEXANDER
Let's see; no, Master Greenwit is not yet
So mellow in years as he, but as like Sebastian, 110 Just like my son Sebastian—such another.
- SEBASTIAN (aside) How finely, like a fencer, my father fetches his by-blows to hit me; but if I beat you not at your own weapon of subtlety—
- ALEXANDER
115 'This son', saith he, 'that should be
The column and main arch unto my house,
The crutch unto my age, becomes a whirlwind
Shaking the firm foundation.'
- SIR ADAM 'Tis some prodigal.
- SEBASTIAN (aside) Well shot, old Adam Bell!
- ALEXANDER
120 No city monster neither, no prodigal,
But sparing, wary, civil, and—though wifeless—
An excellent husband; and such a traveller,
He has more tongues in his head than some have teeth.
- SIR DAVY
I have but two in mine.
- GOSHAWK So sparing and so wary,
What then could vex his father so?
- ALEXANDER O, a woman. 125
- SEBASTIAN A flesh-fly: that can vex any man!
- ALEXANDER
A scurvy woman,
On whom the passionate old man swore he doted.
'A creature', saith he, 'nature hath brought forth
130 To mock the sex of woman.' It is a thing

64 scored marked; word play on physical signs of age and 'score' as notch cut on stick in keeping accounts

75-6 Fortune... golden threads combines the wheel of Fortune and the Fates' spinning wheel, both emblems of Fortune's control over human life; may also allude to Fortune Theatre (see 19-24, note)

88 gall bile, a bodily substance associated with bitterness; here, merged with tears

89 fantastical eccentric, strange

94 read o'er his cards take note of the hand fortune dealt him

101 like a lamp draws on a parable (Luke 8:16) which had become proverbial: 'a candle lights others and consumes itself'

106 wedge tool used for splitting wood or stone

108 smell a fox as in 'smell a rat', meaning suspect a trick; fox can also mean a kind of sword (see fencing imagery in 112-14)

113 by-blows side strokes with a sword

114 subtlety craftiness, cunning device

118 prodigal alludes to parable of the prodigal son (Luke 15:11-32), who squandered his paternal inheritance

119 Adam Bell refers to famous archer and outlaw; also plays on Sir Adam's name

122 husband plays on senses of 'spouse' and of 'household manager' who is thrifty, careful

122-3 traveller... teeth Travellers' stories were thought to be exaggerated, fanciful.

126 flesh-fly fly that lives on and lays eggs in dead flesh; implies that Moll is a prostitute and by infecting her customers with venereal disease, makes her living from their 'dead flesh'

127 scurvy contemptible

130-2 a thing... | Ere she was all made associates Moll's masculine dress with the monstrous, that which transgresses the laws of nature, by likening her to a deformed infant born prematurely

Scene 2

The Roaring Girl.

One knows not how to name: her birth began
 Ere she was all made. 'Tis woman more than man,
 Man more than woman, and which to none can hap,
 The sun gives her two shadows to one shape;
 135 Nay, more, let this strange thing walk, stand, or sit,
 No blazing star draws more eyes after it.

SIR DAVY
 A monster! 'Tis some monster!

ALEXANDER
 She's a varlet!

SEBASTIAN [aside] Now is my cue to bristle.

ALEXANDER
 A naughty pack.

SEBASTIAN 'Tis false!

ALEXANDER
 Ha, boy?

SEBASTIAN 'Tis false!

ALEXANDER
 What's false? I say she's naught.

140 SEBASTIAN I say that tongue
 That dares speak so—but yours—sticks in the throat
 Of a rank villain. Set yourself aside.

ALEXANDER
 So, sir, what then?

SEBASTIAN Any here else had lied.
 (aside)—I think I shall fit you.

ALEXANDER
 Lie?

SEBASTIAN
 Yes.

SIR DAVY
 145 Doth this concern him?

ALEXANDER Ah, sirrah boy,
 Is your blood heated? Boils it? Are you stung?
 I'll pierce you deeper yet. O my dear friends,
 I am that wretched father, this that son
 150 That sees his ruin, yet headlong on doth run.

SIR ADAM
 Will you love such a poison?

SIR DAVY Fie, fie!

SEBASTIAN You're all mad!

ALEXANDER
 Thou'rt sick at heart, yet feel'st it not. Of all these,
 What gentleman, but thou, knowing his disease
 Mortal, would shun the cure? O Master Greenwit,
 Would you to such an idol bow?

155 GREENWIT Not I sir.

ALEXANDER
 Here's Master Laxton: has he mind to a woman

As thou hast?

LAXTON No, not I, sir.

ALEXANDER Sir, I know it.

LAXTON
 Their good parts are so rare, their bad so common,
 I will have naught to do with any woman.

SIR DAVY
 'Tis well done, Master Laxton.

ALEXANDER O thou cruel boy, 160
 Thou wouldst with lust an old man's life destroy.
 Because thou seest I'm halfway in my grave,
 Thou shovel'st dust upon me: would thou mightest have
 Thy wish, most wicked, most unnatural!

SIR DAVY
 Why sir, 'tis thought Sir Guy Fitzallard's daughter 165
 Shall wed your son Sebastian.

ALEXANDER Sir Davy Dapper,
 I have upon my knees wooed this fond boy
 To take that virtuous maiden.

SEBASTIAN Hark you a word, sir.
 You on your knees have cursed that virtuous maiden,
 And me for loving her; yet do you now 170
 Thus baffle me to my face? Wear not your knees
 In such entreats! Give me Fitzallard's daughter!

ALEXANDER
 I'll give thee ratsbane rather!

SEBASTIAN Well then, you know
 What dish I mean to feed upon.

ALEXANDER Hark, gentlemen,
 He swears to have this cutpurse drab to spite my gall. 175

OMNES
 Master Sebastian!

SEBASTIAN I am deaf to you all!
 I'm so bewitched, so bound to my desires,
 Tears, prayers, threats, nothing can quench out those fires
 That burn within me! Exit

ALEXANDER
 Her blood shall quench it then. 180
 Lose him not: O dissuade him, gentlemen!

SIR DAVY
 He shall be weaned, I warrant you.

ALEXANDER Before his eyes
 Lay down his shame, my grief, his miseries.

132-3 woman . . . woman Like a hermaphroditic, also considered a monstrosity, she belongs to both genders indeterminately.
 134 two shadows possibly, a different shadow for each gender
 136 blazing star comet
 139 naughty pack person of bad character
 140 naught immoral; wanton

141 but except
 144 I shall fit you echoes the revenger-hero's famous line from Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy (c.1582-92): 'Why then, I'll fit you', 4.1.70 (ed. Mulryne)
 158 common plays on senses of frequently found and promiscuous 159 naught See 140; 'to do naught' means to have sex with someone; Laxton equivocates, implying that he refuses to have sex, that he can't have sex (because of impotence), and that he will have it indiscriminately.

 171 baffle subject to public disgrace; cheat
 173 ratsbane rat poison
 175 drab whore

- OMNES
No more, no more; away!
- Exeunt all but Sir Alexander*
- ALEXANDER
185 I wash a negro,
Losing both pains and cost. But take thy flight:
I'll be most near thee when I'm least in sight.
Wild buck, I'll hunt thee breathless: thou shalt run on,
But I will turn thee when I'm not thought upon.
Enter Ralph Trapdoor [with a letter]
- 190 Now, sirrah, what are you? Leave your ape's tricks and speak.
TRAPDOOR A letter from my captain to your worship.
ALEXANDER O, O, now I remember, 'tis to prefer thee into my service.
- 195 TRAPDOOR To be a shifter under your worship's nose of a clean trencher, when there's a good bit upon't.
ALEXANDER [reads letter]
Troth, honest fellow.—[Aside—Hm—ha—let me
see—
This knave shall be the axe to hew that down
At which I stumble: h'as a face that promiseth
200 Much of a villain; I will grind his wit,
And if the edge prove fine make use of it.
Come hither sirrah, canst thou be secret, ha?
TRAPDOOR As two crafty attorneys plotting the undoing of their clients.
ALEXANDER
205 Didst never, as thou hast walked about this town,
Hear of a wench called Moll—Mad, Merry Moll?
TRAPDOOR Moll Cutpurse, sir?
ALEXANDER The same; dost thou know her then?
TRAPDOOR As well as I know 'twill rain upon Simon and 210 Judes day next. I will sift all the taverns i'th' city, and drink half-pots with all the watermen o'th' Bankside, but if you will, sir, I'll find her out.
ALEXANDER That task is easy; do't then. Hold thy hand up.
What's this? Is't burnt?
- TRAPDOOR No, sir, no: a little singed with making fireworks.
ALEXANDER There's money. Spend it; that being spent,
fetch more.
TRAPDOOR O sir, that all the poor soldiers in England had such a leader! For fetching, no water-spaniel is like me. 220
ALEXANDER
This wench we speak of strays so from her kind
Nature repents she made her; 'tis a mermaid
Has tolled my son to shipwreck.
TRAPDOOR I'll cut her comb for you.
ALEXANDER
I'll tell out gold for thee then; hunt her forth,
225 Cast out a line hung full of silver hooks
To catch her to thy company: deep spendings
May draw her that's most chaste to a man's bosom.
TRAPDOOR The jingling of golden bells, and a good fool with a hobbyhorse, will draw all the whores i'th' town 230 to dance in a morris.
ALEXANDER Or rather, for that's best, they say sometimes
She goes in breeches; follow her as her man.
TRAPDOOR And when her breeches are off, she shall follow
me! 235
ALEXANDER Beat all thy brains to serve her.
TRAPDOOR Zounds, sir, as country wenches beat cream, till butter comes.
ALEXANDER Play thou the subtle spider: weave fine nets
To ensnare her very life.
TRAPDOOR Her life?
ALEXANDER Yes, suck 240
Her heart-blood if thou canst. Twist thou but cords
To catch her; I'll find law to hang her up.
TRAPDOOR
Spoke like a worshipful bencher!
ALEXANDER
Trace all her steps; at this she-fox's den
Watch what lambs enter; let me play the shepherd
245 To save their throats from bleeding, and cut hers.
TRAPDOOR
This is the goll shall do't.

185 I wash a negro proverbial: 'To wash an Ethiop (blackamoor, moor) white', meaning that an action is futile

189.1 Ralph Trapdoor Ralph puns on 'raff' (trash); Trapdoor refers to his efforts to trap Moll.

190 ape's tricks possibly refers to Trapdoor's attempt at courteous gestures

192 letter... to your worship Justices of the Peace such as Sir Alexander were responsible for administering laws concerning discharged soldiers who turned to begging and became vagrants.

195-6 To be a shifter... clean trencher to wait on table as your servant

209-10 Simon and Judes day 28 October, a feast day honouring the holy apostles, was closely associated with the annual

Lord Mayor's Pageants held in London the following day; in 1605, the celebration was postponed because of rain and foul weather.

210 sift search closely

211 watermen o'th' Bankside boatmen who ferried passengers from the City across the Thames to the Bankside in Southwark, where many public theatres were located

214 burnt branded as a felon; common punishment for first offences

222 mermaid suggests Moll's allegedly dual nature as both woman and man (see 130-3, note); also associated with sirens who lured sailors to shipwreck by singing

224 cut her comb humiliate by destroying her 'masculine' potency

225 tell out count out

229-31 The jingling of golden bells... dance in a morris A hobbyhorse is both a figure in the morris dance who wears bells and figuratively a whore; Trapdoor suggests that the morris dancer's golden bells and lewd capers will attract whores, as like is drawn to like.

233 her man her servant

237 Zounds abbreviation of 'by God's (Christ's) wounds'; considered profane and banned from the stage in the Act of Abuses, 1606

237-8 till butter comes punning on come as orgasm

243 bencher magistrate

247 goll hand, in thieves' jargon or 'cant'; see 10.134-372

Scene 2

The Roaring Girl.

ALEXANDER Be firm and gain me
 Ever thine own. This done, I entertain thee.
 How is thy name?
 TRAPDOOR
 250 My name, sir, is Ralph Trapdoor—honest Ralph.
 ALEXANDER
 Trapdoor, be like thy name, a dangerous step
 For her to venture on; but unto me—
 TRAPDOOR
 As fast as your sole to your boot or shoe, sir.
 ALEXANDER
 Hence then, be little seen here as thou canst;
 255 I'll still be at thine elbow.
 TRAPDOOR
 The trapdoor's set.
 Moll, if you budge you're gone. This me shall crown:
 A roaring boy the Roaring Girl puts down.
 ALEXANDER
 God-a-mercy, lose no time. Exeunt

Sc. 3 The three shops open in a rank: the first a pothecary's shop, the next a feather shop, the third a sempster's shop. Mistress Gallipot in the first, Mistress Tiltyard in the next, Master Openwork and his wife in the third. To them enters Laxton, Goshawk, and Greenwit

MISTRESS OPENWORK Gentlemen, what is't you lack? What is't you buy? See fine bands and ruffs, fine lawns, fine cambrics. What is't you lack, gentlemen, what is't you buy?

 LAXTON Yonder's the shop.
 GOSHAWK Is that she?
 LAXTON Peace!
 GREENWIT She that minces tobacco?
 LAXTON Ay: she's a gentlewoman born, I can tell you, though it be her hard fortune now to shred Indian 10 pot-herbs.
 GOSHAWK O sir, 'tis many a good woman's fortune, when her husband turns bankrupt, to begin with pipes and set up again.
 LAXTON And indeed the raising of the woman is the lifting 15 up of the man's head at all times: if one flourish, t'other will bud as fast, I warrant ye.
 GOSHAWK Come, thou'rt familiarly acquainted there, I grope that.
 LAXTON And you grope no better i'th' dark, you may 20 chance lie i'th' ditch when you're drunk.
 GOSHAWK Go, thou'rt a mystical lecher!
 LAXTON I will not deny but my credit may take up an ounce of pure smoke.
 GOSHAWK May take up an ell of pure smock! Away, go!
 25 [Aside] 'Tis the closest striker! Life, I think he commits venery forty foot deep: no man's aware on't. I, like a palpable smockster, go to work so openly with the tricks of art that I'm as apparently seen as a naked that I have in me to betray my friend when he puts bling stalls or booths, the shops might be represented by canvas-covered wooden frames, or by the three doors downstage against the tiring-house wall, as distinct from the usual two, that may have been a special feature of the Fortune stage.

 Tradesmen commonly set up stalls in front of their houses to display goods, which were made in workshops at home;
 their wives, pretty and well-dressed,
 attracted customers.

 pharmacist sold tobacco (widely popular since the 1590s, hailed as medicine and decried as a vanity) in addition to herbs and drugs.

 from Africa and the Americas, were popular luxury items used extravagantly on hats.
 0.3 sempster's shop sold made to order
 apparel, especially shirts, undergarments,

Mistress Gallipot Mistress denotes a married woman; her first name,
 Prudence, ironically alludes to her imprudent intrigue with Laxton. Gallipot, a small pot for ointments and medicines, refers to her husband's livelihood as apothecary.
 0.4 Mistress Tiltyard Her first name, Rosamond, is typical for heroines of romance, an ironic reference to her unromantic entanglement with Goshawk.
 Her surname denotes her husband's trade as feather-seller: a tiltyard is an enclosure for tilting (jousting with lances), a ceremonial, quasi-chivalric courtiers' pastime in which participants adorned their costumes with feathers.
 Master Openwork His surname refers to the kind of needlework required in his and his wife's trade as sempsters, and to his honesty; see 1.0.1, note; also 246–8, note, on needlework as metaphor for sex.

 attempts at secrecy in seduction turn out to be as open as the curiosities displayed in early collections or 'wonder cabinets', among them the 'embalmed child'—fetus displayed in glass as a curiosity—listed by Thomas Platter in 1599.

most trust in me—mass, yonder he is too—and by his injury to make good my access to her, I should appear as defective in courting as a farmer's son the first day of his feather, that doth nothing at Court but woo the hangings and glass windows for a month together, and some broken waiting-woman for ever after. I find those imperfections in my ventry, that were it not for flattery and falsehood, I should want discourse and impudence; and he that wants impudence among women is worthy to be kicked out at bed's feet.—He shall not see me yet.

At the tobacco shop

GREENWIT Troth, this is finely shred.

LAXTON O, women are the best mincers!

MISTRESS GALLIPOT 'T had been a good phrase for a cook's wife, sir.

LAXTON But 'twill serve generally, like the front of a new almanac, as thus: calculated for the meridian of cooks' wives, but generally for all Englishwomen.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT Nay, you shall ha't sir: I have filled it for you.

She puts it to the fire

LAXTON The pipe's in a good hand, and I wish mine always so.

GREENWIT But not to be used o' that fashion!

LAXTON O pardon me, sir, I understand no French. [Aside to Goshawk] I pray be covered. Jack, a pipe of rich smoke.

GOSHAWK Rich smoke: that's sixpence a pipe, is't?

GREENWIT To me, sweet lady.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT [aside to Laxton] Be not forgetful; respect my credit; seem strange; art and wit makes a fool of suspicion; pray be wary.

LAXTON [aside to Mistress Gallipot] Push! I warrant you. [To them] Come, how is't, gallants?

GREENWIT Pure and excellent.

LAXTON I thought 'twas good, you were grown so silent. You are like those that love not to talk at victuals, though they make a worse noise i' the nose than a common fiddler's prentice, and discourse a whole supper with snuffling. [Aside to Mistress Gallipot] I must speak a word with you anon.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT [aside to Laxton] Make your way wisely then.

GOSHAWK O, what else, sir? He's perfection itself, full of manners, but not an acre of ground belonging to 'em.

GREENWIT Ay, and full of form; h'as ne'er a good stool in's chamber.

GOSHAWK But above all religious: he preyeth daily upon elder brothers.

GREENWIT And valiant above measure: he's run three streets from a sergeant.

LAXTON [blowing smoke in their faces] Puh, puh.

GREENWIT and GOSHAWK [coughing] O, puh, ho, ho. [They move away]

LAXTON So, so.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT What's the matter now, sir?

LAXTON I protest I'm in extreme want of money. If you can supply me now with any means, you do me the greatest pleasure, next to the bounty of your love, as ever poor gentleman tasted.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT What's the sum would pleasure ye, sir? Though you deserve nothing less at my hands.

LAXTON Why, 'tis but for want of opportunity thou knowest. [Aside] I put her off with opportunity still! By this light I hate her, but for means to keep me in fashion with gallants; for what I take from her, I spend upon other wenches, bear her in hand still. She has wit enough to rob her husband, and I ways enough to consume the money. [To gallants] Why, how now? What, the chincough?

GOSHAWK Thou hast the cowardliest trick to come before a man's face and strangle him ere he be aware. I could find in my heart to make a quarrel in earnest.

LAXTON Pox, an thou dost—thou knowest I never use to fight with my friends—thou'll but lose thy labour in't.

32 mass shortened form of 'by the mass', referring to Catholic church service

34-5 the first day of his feather on his first day attending the sovereign at court, where feathers were much worn

36 hangings tapestries or draperies hung against walls as decoration

37 broken sexually defiled

39 discourse ability to converse politely, pleasingly (for purpose of seduction)

39-40 impudence . . . among women presumptuous boldness; Goshawk implies that a man should abandon respect for women when seducing them

43 mincers best at chopping small; playing on sense of affectedly dainty

47 almanac a cheap, popular book containing astrological predictions, proverbs, medical advice, useful information of various kinds meridian noon; referring to astrological calculations

47-8 cooks' wives . . . all Englishwomen parody of title-pages of almanacs, appealing to the widest market

51 pipe's in a good hand bawdy suggestion of pipe as penis

53 o' that fashion put to the fire, alluding to the symptoms of syphilis

54 French 'French pox' was a common term for venereal disease.

55 be covered replace your hat

56 sixpence a pipe six times the cost of the cheapest place in a playhouse

57 To me a pipe for me

59 seem strange don't be too familiar

61 Push! exclamation

65 victuals articles of food; here, meals

66-8 noise i' the nose . . . snuffling symptoms of venereal disease

67 fiddler's prentice Fiddles and fiddlers often suggest sexual play; prentice is a shortened form of apprentice.

73 manners punning on manors; Laxton possesses no land

74 form etiquette; pun on form meaning bench

76 preyeth pun implying that Laxton schemes to get lands from heirs (the eldest son usually inherited the father's estate; see 4.61-5, and 4.62-4, note)

78-9 he's run three streets from a sergeant implies that Laxton is both cowardly and deeply in debt (sergeants arrested debtors)

90 nothing less anything but money

91 thou Laxton switches from 'you' to the more intimate form

92-3 By this light daylight; an emphatic assertion

95 bear her in hand lead her on

98 chincough whooping cough; Laxton blows smoke in their faces

Enter Jack Dapper, and his man Gull

Jack Dapper!
 105 GREENWIT Monsieur Dapper, I dive down to your ankles.
 JACK DAPPER Save ye, gentlemen, all three, in a peculiar salute.
 GOSHAWK He were ill to make a lawyer: he dispatches three at once!
 110 LAXTON So well said! [Receiving purse from Mistress Gallipot]
 But is this of the same tobacco, Mistress Gallipot?
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT The same you had at first, sir.
 LAXTON I wish it no better: this will serve to drink at my chamber.
 115 GOSHAWK Shall we taste a pipe on't?
 LAXTON Not of this, by my troth, gentlemen; I have sworn before you.
 GOSHAWK What, not Jack Dapper?
 LAXTON Pardon me sweet Jack, I'm sorry I made such 120 a rash oath, but foolish oaths must stand. Where art going, Jack?
 JACK DAPPER Faith, to buy one feather.
 LAXTON One feather? [Aside] The fool's peculiar still!
 JACK DAPPER Gull.
 125 GULL Master?
 JACK DAPPER Here's three halfpence for your ordinary, boy;
 meet me an hour hence in Paul's.
 GULL [aside] How? Three single halfpence? Life, this will scarce serve a man in sauce: a ha'p'orth of mustard, 130 a ha'p'orth of oil, and a ha'p'orth of vinegar—what's left then for the pickle herring? This shows like small beer i'th' morning after a great surfeit of wine o'ernight.
 He could spend his three pound last night in a supper amongst girls and brave bawdy-house boys. I thought his pockets cackled not for nothing: these are the eggs 135 of three pound. I'll go sup 'em up presently. Exit Gull LAXTON [aside] Eight, nine, ten angels. Good wench, i'faith, and one that loves darkness well. She puts out a candle with the best tricks of any drugster's wife in England; 140 but that which mads her, I rail upon opportunity still, and take no notice on't. The other night she would needs lead me into a room with a candle in her hand to show me a naked picture, where no sooner entered, but the candle was sent of an errand; now I, not intending 145 to understand her, but like a puny at the inns of ventry, called for another light innocently. Thus reward I all her cunning with simple mistaking. I know she cozens her husband to keep me, and I'll keep her honest, as long as I can, to make the poor man some part of amends.

 An honest mind of a whoremaster! [To Gallants] How 150 think you amongst you? What, a fresh pipe? Draw in a third man.
 GOSHAWK No, you're a hoarder: you engross by th'ounces!
At the feather shop now
 JACK DAPPER
 Puh, I like it not.
 MISTRESS TILTYARD
 What feather is't you'd have, sir?
 These are most worn and most in fashion 155
 Amongst the beaver gallants, the stone-riders,
 The private stage's audience, the twelpenny-stool
 gentlemen:
 I can inform you 'tis the general feather.
 JACK DAPPER
 And therefore I mislike it—tell me of general!
 Now a continual Simon and Jude's rain 160
 Beat all your feathers as flat down as pancakes.

103.1 Jack Dapper Son of Sir Davy Dapper. Jack is a generic name for an ordinary fellow; the surname suggests smart dress and brisk movements similar to his father's (see 2.0.1-2, note).
his man Gull Man means manservant; a gull is a fool or simpleton.
 105 dive down in an exaggerated bow, like a dive-dapper, bird that dives into water; playing on Dapper's name 106 Save ye short for 'God save ye' peculiar single; special
 108-9 lawyer... three at once! He would make a bad lawyer (ironically, because he is efficient, doesn't prolong business).
 113 drink smoke
 122 one feather Feathers were proverbially linked to fools, as in 'a feather for a fool'.
 123 peculiar odd; playing on 106
 126 ordinary eating house serving a fixed-price meal, or the meal itself, here a very cheap one; ordinaries were often considered meeting places for rogues and outlaws
 127 Paul's probably Paul's Walk, the middle aisle of St Paul's Cathedral, a meeting place for high and low

128 Life short for 'God's life'
 129 in sauce he can only buy sauce, not the meal itself ha'p'orth halfpenny's worth
 131-2 small beer weak beer, recommended for the morning after a night of heavy drinking
 134 brave handsome
 135-6 his pockets cackled... eggs of three pound The coins in Jack's pockets chinked like hens cackling before laying eggs; Gull's small change is like the eggs.
 136 presently right now
 137 angels the money he received from Mistress Gallipot; an angel, a coin worth ten shillings at this time, was named for its design of St Michael slaying the dragon
 138 loves darkness well... puts out a candle implies that she is promiscuous
 139 drugster's apothecary's
 140 rail... still complain that circumstances keep us from having sex
 144 sent of an errand put out
 145 understand playing on stand as erection; have sex puny freshman at university or Inns of Court, residential colleges of law 147 cozens tricks, deceives

 148 keep support me; hold my affection
 150 whoremaster lecher
 153 hoarder Laxton hasn't shared the tobacco (actually, money) Mistress Gallipot gave him earlier (see 110-11)
 156 beaver gallants gallants wearing fashionable, costly beaver hats; because the beaver was considered lustful, may suggest sexual desire, potency stone-riders riders of stallions, playing on stone as testicle; implies masculine sexual potency 157 private stage's indoor theatres that charged more than public (outdoor) theatres; attended by wealthier people, of somewhat higher rank twelpenny-stool gentlemen Stools for sitting onstage were available in both public and private theatres, and were much favoured by gallants.
 158 the general feather most fashionable feather
 160 Simon and Jude's rain see 2.209-10

- Show me—a—spangled feather.
 MISTRESS TILTYARD O, to go a-feasting with!
 You'd have it for a hench-boy; you shall.
At the sempster's shop now
- OPENWORK
 165 Mass, I had quite forgot!
 His honour's footman was here last night, wife:
 Ha'you done with my lord's shirt?
- MISTRESS OPENWORK What's that to you, sir?
 I was this morning at his honour's lodging
 Ere such a snail as you crept out of your shell.
- OPENWORK
 O, 'twas well done, good wife.
- MISTRESS OPENWORK I hold it better, sir,
 Than if you had done't yourself.
- 170 OPENWORK Nay, so say I:
 But is the countess's smock almost done, mouse?
- MISTRESS OPENWORK
 Here lies the cambric, sir, but wants, I fear me.
- OPENWORK
 I'll resolve you of that presently.
 [Makes sexual gesture]
- MISTRESS OPENWORK
 Heyday! O audacious groom,
 175 Dare you presume to noblewomen's linen?
 Keep you your yard to measure shepherd's holland!
 I must confine you, I see that.
At the Tobacco Shop now
- GOSHAWK What say you to this gear?
- LAXTON I dare the arrantest critic in tobacco to lay one 180 fault upon't.
Enter Moll in a frieze jerkin and a black safeguard
- GOSHAWK Life, yonder's Moll.
 LAXTON Moll, which Moll?
 GOSHAWK Honest Moll.
- LAXTON Prithce let's call her. Moll!
 ALL Moll, Moll, pist, Moll!
 185 MOLL How now, what's the matter?
 GOSHAWK A pipe of good tobacco, Moll?
 MOLL I cannot stay.
 GOSHAWK Nay Moll—puh—prithce hark, but one word,
 i'faith.
 190 MOLL Well, what is't?
 GREENWIT Prithce come hither, sirrah.
 LAXTON [aside] Heart, I would give but too much money to be nibbling with that wench. Life, sh'as the spirit of four great parishes, and a voice that will drown all 195 the city! Methinks a brave captain might get all his soldiers upon her, and ne'er be beholding to a company of Mile End milksops, if he could come on, and come off quick enough. Such a Moll were a marrowbone before an Italian: he would cry bona-roba till his ribs were 200 nothing but bone. I'll lay hard siege to her—money is that aquafortis that eats into many a maidenhead: where the walls are flesh and blood, I'll ever pierce through with a golden auger.
 GOSHAWK Now thy judgement, Moll—is't not good?
 205 MOLL Yes, faith, 'tis very good tobacco. How do you sell an ounce? Farewell. God buy you, Mistress Gallipot.
 GOSHAWK Why Moll, Moll!
 MOLL I cannot stay now, i'faith; I am going to buy a shag ruff—the shop will be shut in presently.
 210 GOSHAWK 'Tis the maddest, fantasticalest girl! I never knew so much flesh and so much nimbleness put together!
 LAXTON She slips from one company to another like a fat eel between a Dutchman's fingers.—[Aside] I'll watch my time for her.
 215 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Some will not stick to say she's a man, and some both man and woman.

162 spangled decorated with spangles; speckled

163 hench-boy page

you shall you shall have it

171 mouse term of endearment

172 wants isn't yet finished

176 yard measuring stick; penis shepherd's holland coarse linen fabric

 first made in Holland

178 gear stuff; here, tobacco

180.I frieze jerkin short coat with collar and (usually) sleeves, made of coarse woollen cloth; worn by men safeguard outer skirt worn by women to protect clothing from dirt when riding horseback (Moll enters the play wearing both male and female dress)

192 sirrah often used to address women

193 Heart short form of 'God's heart', an exclamation

195 four great parishes possibly those of Southwark, composed of four parishes much larger than any of those within the city: St Savior's, St Olave's, St

 Thomas's, and St George's

196-7 get all his soldiers upon her Medical writers debated the contributions made by female and male in conceiving a child; some followed Aristotle in believing that the male gave it form or spirit, and the female, matter, while others followed Galen in thinking the female contributed both matter and form.
 Laxton reasons that a 'mannish' woman like Moll will produce only male children.

198 Mile End a field south of Mile End Road used as a drill ground for citizens' militia come on, and come off military terms for advance and retire, with sense of sexual conquest

199-200 marrowbone before an Italian
 Bones containing marrow were considered a delicacy and an aphrodisiac;
 Italians were reputedly lustful.

200-I cry bona-roba . . . nothing but bone
 Bona-roba is a term for prostitute; the (supposedly) lusty Italian would exhaust himself in having sex with her till his marrow, believed the seat of animal vitality, was consumed.

201 lay hard siege military language
 connoting aggressive sexual pursuit

202 aquafortis nitric acid, a powerful solvent and corrosive

204 auger long pointed tool for boring holes in wood; a phallic image

206 How at what price?

207 God buy you God redeem you; equivalent to 'good-bye'

209-10 shag ruff a fluted collar standing up around the neck, made of worsted or silk cloth with a velvet nap on one side

211 fantasticalest from fantastical, meaning eccentric or strange; see 2.89, note

214 eel a favourite food in Holland

216-17 a man . . . both man and woman
 Mistress Gallipot echoes Sir Alexander's remarks; see 2.129-30, 132-3.

Scene 3

The Roaring Girl.

LAXTON That were excellent: she might first cuckold the husband and then make him do as much for the wife!
The feather shop again
 220 MOLL Save you—how does Mistress Tiltyard?
 JACK DAPPER Moll!
 MOLL Jack Dapper!
 JACK DAPPER How dost, Moll?
 MOLL I'll tell thee by and by—I go but to th'next shop.
 225 JACK DAPPER Thou shalt find me here this hour about a feather.
 MOLL Nay, an a feather hold you in play a whole hour, a goose will last you all the days of your life!
The sempster shop
 Let me see a good shag ruff.
 230 OPENWORK Mistress Mary, that shalt thou, i'faith, and the best in the shop.
 MISTRESS OPENWORK How now?—Greetings! Love terms, with a pox between you! Have I found out one of your haunts? I send you for hollands, and you're i'the low countries with a mischief. I'm served with good ware by th'shift, that makes it lie dead so long upon my hands, I were as good shut up shop, for when I open it, I take nothing.
 235 OPENWORK Nay, and you fall a-ringing once the devil cannot stop you; I'll out of the belfry as fast as I can. Moll.
 MISTRESS OPENWORK Get you from my shop!
 MOLL I come to buy.
 MISTRESS OPENWORK I'll sell ye nothing; I warn ye my house and shop.
 245 MOLL
 You, goody Openwork, you that prick out a poor living
 And sews many a bawdy skin-coat together,
 Thou private pandress between shirt and smock,
 I wish thee for a minute but a man:
 Thou shouldst never use more shapes, but as th'art, 250
 I pity my revenge. Now my spleen's up,
 I would not mock it willingly.
Enter a fellow with a long rapier by his side
 Ha, be thankful,
 Now I forgive thee.
 MISTRESS OPENWORK Marry, hang thee! I never asked forgiveness in my life. 255
 MOLL You, goodman swine's face!
 FELLOW What, will you murder me?
 MOLL You remember, slave, how you abused me t'other night in a tavern?
 FELLOW Not I, by this light. 260
 MOLL No, but by candlelight you did: you have tricks to save your oaths, reservations have you, and I have reserved somewhat for you. [Strikes him] As you like that, call for more: you know the sign again.
 FELLOW Pox on't! Had I brought any company along with me to have borne witness on't, 'twould ne'er have grieved me; but to be struck and nobody by, 'tis my ill fortune still. Why tread upon a worm, they say, 'twill turn tail; but indeed a gentleman should have more manners. Exit 270
 LAXTON Gallantly performed, i'faith, Moll, and manfully! I love thee for ever for't. Base rogue, had he offered but the least counter-buff, by this hand, I was prepared for him.
 MOLL You prepared for him? Why should you be prepared 275 for him? Was he any more than a man?

218 cuckold A wife made her husband a cuckold by sleeping with another man; the term conveys scorn for the man who cannot keep his wife sexually satisfied. There is no fully equivalent term for the wife of an unfaithful husband.
 227-8 feather...goose Moll evokes the traditional association between feathers, geese, and foolishness; see 123.
 234-8 I send you for hollands... I take nothing an extended double entendre in which the sempster's language bears consistently sexual meaning. She claims that when she sends her husband to get cloth (hollands, linen from Holland) he pursues women with lecherous intent (low countries, for genitals). The ware (cloth, or sexual service) that he devises by this shift (subterfuge, or erotic play, shift meaning both an undergarment and a clever trick) leaves her dead (sexually unsatisfied) so that she takes in nothing (doesn't turn profits sexually or financially).

239 fall a-ringing proverbial language for the shrewish (articulate, assertive) wife
 241 Moll Openwork fades from the dialogue to emerge at 313 talking to Goshawk; he then exits with Moll at 406 244 warn ye deny you entry to 246 goody goodwife
prick out Seamstresses didn't belong to guilds and were often quite poor, thus some eked out a living through prostitution (see 1.52, note, and 5.95).
 247 skin-coat double entendre in which sewing also means bringing whore and customer together, and skin-coat stands for sexual intercourse 248 Thou Moll shows her contempt by shifting to the more intimate form; see 91-2, note.
private pandress secret bawd shirt and smock man and woman
 249 but a man transformed to a man (presumably so that Moll could challenge her with physical combat)
 250 shapes she would no longer deceive people

 251 pity forego
spleen's temper's
 252.1 Enter a fellow... rapier See Persons.23-4; a quarrelsome gallant, the first of several bit parts comprised in the term Ministri, servants and others defined mainly by social role or vocation long rapier long, pointed, two-edged sword
 256 goodman title for yeomen and others beneath the rank of gentlemen
 261-2 tricks... reservations ways of equivocating when you swear that a statement is true
 266 borne witness on't witnessed my being struck (so that he would have grounds for retaliation)
 268-9 tread upon a worm... 'twill turn tail proverbial; even the humblest person will resent an injury and retaliate (also plays on tail as male or female sexual parts)
 273 counter-buff blow in return

- LAXTON No, nor so much by a yard and a handful, London measure.
- 280 MOLL Why do you speak this, then? Do you think I cannot ride a stone-horse unless one lead him by th'snaffle?
- LAXTON Yes, and sit him bravely, I know thou canst, Moll. 'Twas but an honest mistake through love, and I'll make amends for't any way; prithee, sweet plump Moll, when shall thou and I go out o' town together?
- 285 MOLL Whither? To Tyburn, prithee?
- LAXTON Mass, that's out o' town indeed! Thou hangest so many jests upon thy friends still. I mean honestly to Brentford, Staines, or Ware.
- MOLL What to do there?
- 290 LAXTON Nothing but be merry and lie together; I'll hire a coach with four horses.
- MOLL I thought 'twould be a beastly journey. You may leave out one well; three horses will serve if I play the jade myself.
- 295 LAXTON Nay, push! Thou'rt such another kicking wench. Prithee be kind and let's meet.
- MOLL 'Tis hard but we shall meet, sir.
- LAXTON Nay, but appoint the place then. There's ten angels in fair gold, Moll: you see I do not trifle with you—do but say thou wilt meet me, and I'll have a coach ready for thee.
- 300 MOLL Why, here's my hand I'll meet you, sir.
- LAXTON [aside] O good gold!—[To her] The place, sweet Moll?
- 305 MOLL It shall be your appointment.
- LAXTON Somewhat near Holborn, Moll.
- MOLL In Gray's Inn Fields then.
- LAXTON A match.
- MOLL I'll meet you there.
- LAXTON The hour? 310
- MOLL Three.
- LAXTON That will be time enough to sup at Brentford.
Fall from them to the other
- OPENWORK I am of such a nature, sir, I cannot endure the house when she scolds; sh'as a tongue will be heard further in a still morning than St Antholin's bell. She rails upon me for foreign wenching, that I, being a freeman, must needs keep a whore i'th' suburbs, and seek to impoverish the liberties. When we fall out, I trouble you still to make all whole with my wife. 315
- GOSHAWK No trouble at all: 'tis a pleasure to me to join things together. 320
- OPENWORK Go thy ways. [Aside] I do this but to try thy honesty, Goshawk.
The feather shop
- JACK DAPPER How likest thou this, Moll?
- MOLL O, singularly: you're fitted now for a bunch. [Aside] He looks for all the world with those spangled feathers like a nobleman's bedpost. The purity of your wench would I fain try: she seems like Kent unconquered, and I believe as many wiles are in her. O, the gallants of these times are shallow lechers: they put not their courtship home enough to a wench; 'tis impossible to know what woman is thoroughly honest, because she's ne'er thoroughly tried. I am of that certain belief there are more queans in this town of their own making than of any man's provoking: where lies the slackness then? 325
330
335

277 a yard and a handful punning on yard as penis; London mercers customarily gave a little more than the exact measure

280 stone-horse stallion (see 156); also figuratively a man, and an ironic reference to Laxton's impotence th'snaffle a simple kind of bridle-bit, without a curb

285 Tyburn place of execution for criminals in London

288 Brentford, Staines, or Ware towns conveniently near London for a day's amusement or a sexual rendezvous. Ware, twenty miles north of London, housed the famous great bed of Ware (10 feet 9 inches square); Staines lay seventeen miles west and Brentford, the closest of the three, only ten miles west of the city.

294 jade a worn out, ill-tempered horse; 'to play the jade' means to act like a whore

297 'Tis hard but of course

306 Holborn a main thoroughfare of London, along which the inns of court (law schools) were located; gardens in its western part were locales for illicit sex

307 Gray's Inn Fields Gray's Inn was a distinguished law school; its open fields were frequented by criminal elements.

312.1 Fall from them to the other signals a shift of focus from one group to another

315 St Antholin's bell a church in Watling Street where Puritan preachers not under church jurisdiction held an early morning lecture for which the bell was rung at 5 a.m.; the noise was resented by some in the neighbourhood

317–18 suburbs...liberties The city had no control over the suburbs, so that prostitution supposedly could flourish more easily in them; the liberties (named because they were free from manorial rule or obligation to the crown) were territories both within and outside the city over which no single city or county authority had jurisdiction or control. Mistress Openwork ironically suggests that her husband, as a guild member and citizen of London, goes against his own interests by seeking his sexual pleasures in the suburbs.

318 fall out quarrel

319 trouble you ask you make all whole make peace

320–1 join things together Goshawk ironically alludes to his own sexual interests

322 Go thy ways as you please

325 singularly very much; alluding to Jack's intention of buying a single feather (see 123, 225)

327 nobleman's bedpost The 'state beds' of the great manor houses built by the gentry and nobility had four posts supporting a canopy, or tester, which were often decorated with bunches of feathers.

328 Kent unconquered commonly said of this county, which unlike others, retained its original laws and customs pre-dating the Norman conquest

330–1 put...home They don't go far enough, get to the point (implying sexual penetration).

332 honest chaste; virtuous in a sexual sense

333 tried tested, put to the proof

334 queans loose (unchaste) women; whores

Many a poor soul would down, and there's nobody will pish 'em!
 Women are courted but ne'er soundly tried,
 As many walk in spurs that never ride.
The sempster's shop

340 MISTRESS OPENWORK O abominable!
 GOSHAWK Nay, more, I tell you in private, he keeps a whore i'th' suburbs.
 MISTRESS OPENWORK O spittle dealing! I came to him a gentlewoman born: I'll show you mine arms when you 345 please, sir.
 GOSHAWK [aside] I had rather see your legs, and begin that way!
 MISTRESS OPENWORK 'Tis well known he took me from a lady's service where I was well-beloved of the steward.
 350 I had my Latin tongue and a spice of the French before I came to him, and now doth he keep a suburban whore under my nostrils.
 GOSHAWK There's ways enough to cry quit with him. Hark in thine ear. [Whispers]
 355 MISTRESS OPENWORK There's a friend worth a million.
 [Before the feather shop]
 MOLL I'll try one spear against your chastity, Mistress
 Tiltyard, though it prove too short by the burr.
Enter Ralph Trapdoor

TRAPDOOR [aside] Mass, here she is! I'm bound already to serve her, though it be but a sluttish trick. [To her] 360 Bless my hopeful young mistress with long life and great limbs, send her the upper hand of all bailiffs and their hungry adherents!
 MOLL How now, what art thou?
 TRAPDOOR A poor ebbing gentleman that would gladly wait
 365 for the young flood of your service.
 MOLL My service! What should move you to offer your service to me, sir?
 TRAPDOOR The love I bear to your heroic spirit and masculine womanhood.
 370 MOLL So, sir, put case we should retain you to us: what parts are there in you for a gentlewoman's service?

TRAPDOOR Of two kinds right worshipful: movable and immovable—movable to run of errands, and immovable to stand when you have occasion to use me.
 MOLL What strength have you? 375
 TRAPDOOR Strength, Mistress Moll? I have gone up into a steeple and stayed the great bell as 't has been ringing;
 stopped a windmill going.
 MOLL And never struck down yourself?
 TRAPDOOR Stood as upright as I do at this present. 380
Moll trips up his heels; he falls
 MOLL Come, I pardon you for this; it shall be no disgrace to you. I have struck up the heels of the high German's size ere now. What, not stand?
 TRAPDOOR I am of that nature where I love, I'll be at my mistress' foot to do her service. 385 MOLL Why, well said! But say your mistress should receive injury: have you the spirit of fighting in you—durst you second her?
 TRAPDOOR Life, I have kept a bridge myself, and drove seven at a time before me. 390
 MOLL Ay?
 TRAPDOOR [aside] But they were all Lincolnshire bullocks,
 by my troth.
 MOLL Well, meet me in Gray's Inn Fields between three and four this afternoon, and upon better consideration 395 we'll retain you.
 TRAPDOOR I humbly thank your good mistress-ship. [Aside]
 I'll crack your neck for this kindness. Exit
Moll meets Laxton
 LAXTON Remember three.
 MOLL Nay, if I fail you, hang me. 400
 LAXTON Good wench, i'faith.
Then Moll meets Openwork
 MOLL Who's this?
 OPENWORK 'Tis I, Moll.
 MOLL Prithee tend thy shop and prevent bastards!
 OPENWORK We'll have a pint of the same wine, i'faith, 405
 Moll. [Exit Openwork with Moll]

336 would down would 'fall' from chastity; have illicit sex
 339 walk in spurs that never ride Horseriding often carries sexual meanings; here, many are ready to ride (have sex) who never have the chance.
 343 spittle shortened form of hospital, probably referring to St Mary's Spittle which specialized in treating venereal disease, and its neighbourhood, frequented by thieves and prostitutes
 344 arms the shield or emblem that signifies her family's status as gentry
 349 steward person in charge of a gentle or noble household, responsible for expenditures, servants, etc.
 350 a spice of the French a little French; associated with venereal disease, called the French pox and (especially in women) with loose sexual behaviour
 353 cry quit with pay back, get back at 357 burr ring of iron behind handle of lance used in tilting (see 3.0.4, note); playing on 'Tiltyard'
 364 ebbing unfortunate, impoverished
 365 young flood flow of tide upriver service the position of servant; here also implies sexual 'service' 370 put case suppose
 371 parts abilities, talents; also, sexual organs (see 'stand', 374)
 372-3 movable and immovable punning on 'parts', 371
 380 Stood as upright punning on erection
 382-3 high German's size a German fencer, tall and of great strength, in London at this time
 385 foot playing on French foutre, to have sex with; continuing the implications of 'service' (see 364-5) that Moll will dominate him sexually 388 second support in attacking or defending 389-90 kept a bridge... before me military actions
 392 Lincolnshire bullocks cattle from a county well known for them; undercuts his claim of valour in 389-90
 402 Who's this? Seemingly, Openwork is eluding his wife.
 405 same wine a common pun on bastard, a sweet Spanish wine

The bell rings

GOSHAWK Hark, the bell rings; come, gentlemen. Jack Dapper, where shall's all munch?

JACK DAPPER I am for Parker's Ordinary.

LAXTON

410 He's a good guest to'm, he deserves his board:
He draws all the gentlemen in a term-time thither.
We'll be your followers, Jack: lead the way.
Look you, by my faith, the fool has feathered his nest well.

Exeunt Gallants

Enter Master Gallipot, Master Tiltyard, and servants with water spaniels and a duck 415 TILTYARD Come, shut up your shops. Where's Master Openwork?

MISTRESS OPENWORK Nay, ask not me Master Tiltyard.

GALLIPOT Where's his water-dog? Puh—pist—hurr—hurr—pist.

420 TILTYARD Come wenches, come, we're going all to Hogsden.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT To Hogsden, husband?

GALLIPOT Ay, to Hogsden, pigsney.

MISTRESS TILTYARD I'm not ready, husband.

TILTYARD Faith, that's well. (Spits in the dog's mouth)

425 Hum—pist—pist.

GALLIPOT Come Mistress Openwork, you are so long.

MISTRESS OPENWORK I have no joy of my life, Master Gallipot.

430 GALLIPOT Push! Let your boy lead his water spaniel along, and we'll show you the bravest sport at Parlous Pond. Hey Trug, hey Trug, hey Trug! Here's the best duck in England, except my wife.
Hey, hey, hey! Fetch, fetch, fetch!

Come, let's away:

Of all the year, this is the sportful'st day. [Exeunt] 435

Enter Sebastian solus

Sc. 4

SEBASTIAN

If a man have a free will, where should the use
More perfect shine than in his will to love?
All creatures have their liberty in that;

Enter Sir Alexander and listens to him

Though else kept under servile yoke and fear,
The very bondslave has his freedom there. 5

Amongst a world of creatures voiced and silent,
Must my desires wear fetters?—[Aside] Yea, are you
So near? Then I must break with my heart's truth,
Meet grief at a back way. [Aloud] Well: why, suppose
The two-leaved tongues of slander or of truth
Pronounce Moll loathsome; if before my love
She appear fair, what injury have I?

I have the thing I like. In all things else
Mine own eye guides me, and I find 'em prosper;
Life, what should ail it now? I know that man
Ne'er truly loves—if he gainsay't, he lies— 15

That winks and marries with his father's eyes;
I'll keep mine own wide open.

Enter Moll and a Porter with a viol on his back

ALEXANDER [aside] Here's a brave wilfulness.

A made match: here she comes; they met o' purpose.

PORTER Must I carry this great fiddle to your chamber,
Mistress Mary? 20

MOLL Fiddle, Goodman hog-rubber? Some of these porters bear so much for others, they have no time to carry wit for themselves.

PORTER To your own chamber, Mistress Mary? 25

408 shall's shall we

409 Parker's Ordinary see 126

410 to'm to him, i.e., to Parker

411 term-time when law courts were in session and London was full of visitors

413 fool... feathered referring to Jack Dapper's purchase of feathers; see 123

413.3 water spaniels and a duck type of dog used for retrieving water fowl; duck-hunting was a popular pastime

417-18 Puh... pist whistles or other sounds, for calling the dog

419-20 Hogsden Hoxton, an area north of London with open fields, popular for excursions

422 pigsney term of endearment, possibly playing on Hogsden

424 Spits in the dog's mouth expression of affection toward and means of befriending a dog

430 Parlous Pond pond in London popular for swimming, not far from the Fortune Theatre and on the way to Hogsden; so named because of drownings that occurred there (parlous is a corruption of 'perilous')

431 Trug name of dog; can also mean prostitute

435 sportful'st day an enthusiastic exclamation, or possibly a reference to May Day (1 May) or Shrove Tuesday (the pre-Lenten festivity) on which 'the pancake bell' rang at 11 a.m. and apprentices stopped work, sometimes rioting and destroying property

4.8 break with abandon, renounce (since his father is present, he must dissemble)

9 Meet grief... way express grief covertly

10 two-leaved tongues recalls both the forked tongue of the devil in the form of a serpent, who speaks a mixture of slander and truth, and Virgil's Fama or

Rumour (Aeneid 4.173-97, Loeb ed.), who speaks both truth and untruth

17 winks closes his eyes

18.1 viol a stringed instrument played with a bow, very popular with both men and women at this time. Playing an instrument often carried the meaning of sexual play, with the player assumed to be either male or female and the 'instrument' of either sex; because the viol was held between the knees (hence Ital. gamba, leg) it was especially suggestive. Here a female player takes the active role of 'player' (cf. scene 8 and Introduction)

19 made match arranged meeting

20 great fiddle great could mean pregnant; to fiddle could mean to play sexually with a woman

22 hog-rubber abusive term for a swineherd

MOLL Who'll hear an ass speak? Whither else, goodman pageant bearer? They're people of the worst memories.
Exit Porter

SEBASTIAN Why, 'twere too great a burden, love, to have them carry things in their minds and o' their backs together.

MOLL Pardon me, sir, I thought not you so near.

ALEXANDER [aside] So, so, so.

SEBASTIAN
 I would be nearer to thee, and in that fashion That makes the best part of all creatures honest.
 No otherwise I wish it.

MOLL Sir, I am so poor to requite you, you must look for nothing but thanks of me: I have no humour to marry. I love to lie o' both sides o'th'bed myself; and again o'th'other side, a wife, you know, ought to be obedient, but I fear me I am too headstrong to obey, therefore I'll ne'er go about it. I love you so well, sir, for your good will, I'd be loath you should repent your bargain after, and therefore we'll ne'er come together at first. I have the head now of myself, and am man enough for a woman; marriage is but a chopping and changing, where a maiden loses one head, and has a worse i'th' place.

ALEXANDER [aside]
 The most comfortablest answer from a roaring girl, That ever mine ears drunk in.

SEBASTIAN This were enough
 Now to affright a fool forever from thee,
 When 'tis the music that I love thee for.

ALEXANDER [aside]
 There's a boy spoils all again!

MOLL Believe it, sir,
 I am not of that disdainful temper,

But I could love you faithfully.

ALEXANDER [aside] A pox
 On you for that word. I like you not now;
 You're a cunning roarer, I see that already.

MOLL But sleep upon this once more, sir; you may chance shift a mind tomorrow: be not too hasty to wrong yourself. Never while you live, sir, take a wife running: many have run out at heels that have done't. You see, sir, I speak against myself, and if every woman would deal with their suitor so honestly, poor younger brothers would not be so often gulled with old cozening widows that turn o'er all their wealth in trust to some kinsman, and make the poor gentleman work hard for a pension. Fare you well, sir.

SEBASTIAN Nay, prithee one word more!

ALEXANDER [aside] How do I wrong this girl; she puts him off still.

MOLL Think upon this in cold blood, sir; you make as much haste as if you were a-going upon a sturgeon voyage. Take deliberation, sir, never choose a wife as if you were going to Virginia. [Moves away from him]

SEBASTIAN And so we parted, my too cursed fate! [Retires]

ALEXANDER [aside] She is but cunning; gives him longer time in't.

Enter a Tailor

TAILOR Mistress Moll, Mistress Moll! So ho ho, so ho!

MOLL There boy, there boy. What dost thou go a-hawking after me with a red clout on thy finger?

TAILOR I forgot to take measure on you for your new breeches. [Takes measurements]

ALEXANDER [aside] Heyday, breeches! What, will he marry a monster with two trinkets? What age is this? If the wife go in breeches, the man must wear long coats like a fool.

27 pageant bearer Pageants were spectacular displays or tableaux, either erected on fixed stages, placed on moving cars, or carried by porters in municipal celebrations.

33 fashion marriage

34 the best part most

37 humour inclination

38 again besides

39 o'th'other side ambiguously, the other side of the bed, or of the question of marriage

44 have the head a term from horsemanship that picks up the metaphor behind 'headstrong' (39): to give a horse his head means to let him go freely. Moll 'has the head of herself' in that she governs herself, without being subject to a husband (see I Cor. 11:3, 'the head of the woman is the man').

44-5 man enough for a woman echoes Sir Alexander's description of her as 'woman more than man, | Man more than woman' (2.1.32-3), but more positively implies that the 'masculine'

trait of self-governance doesn't disturb her femaleness

45-7 marriage...i'th' place Chopping implies some violence in defloration or loss of maidenhead in marriage, and in the change to being governed by the husband as one's 'head'.

48 roaring girl see 1.72, note

59 running on the run

62-4 younger brothers...cozening widows

Moll contrasts her frankness to the tactics of wealthy widows, who keep suitors (here, younger brothers with modest inheritance, or none) from their wealth by secretly transferring legal control over it to male relatives; otherwise, it would normally pass by law to their second husbands.

66 pension denied possession of his wife's estate, the husband must obey her wishes to get even an allowance

71-2 sturgeon voyage a long fishing voyage; i.e., you will actually have to live with the wife you choose

73 Virginia as if you were going on a long voyage to a faraway place with uncertain prospects. The Virginia Company established Jamestown, the first colony, in 1607; in its early years, more than half the settlers died within a few months of arrival.

74 And so we parted...fate! For his father's ears, Sebastian pretends to be downcast at being refused by Moll.

77 So ho cry in hare-hunting and falconry; hence 'a-hawking' in 78

79 red clout piece of cloth for measuring, or to stick pins and needles into

83 a monster with two trinkets see 2.1.32-3; having the features of both sexes, like a hermaphrodite

84 breeches...long coats proverbial; floor-length coats or skirts were worn by young children, women, and professional fools or jesters. Sir Alexander takes clothing to mark or even determine gender, and gender is dichotomized; male and female have mutually exclusive traits (cf. 2.1.29-36).

- MOLL What fiddling's here? Would not the old pattern have served your turn?
- TAILOR You change the fashion, you say you'll have the great Dutch slop, Mistress Mary.
- 90 MOLL Why sir, I say so still.
- TAILOR Your breeches then will take up a yard more.
- MOLL Well, pray look it be put in then.
- TAILOR It shall stand round and full, I warrant you.
- MOLL Pray make 'em easy enough.
- 95 TAILOR I know my fault now; t'other was somewhat stiff between the legs. I'll make these open enough, I warrant you.
- ALEXANDER [aside] Here's good gear towards! I have brought up my son to marry a Dutch slop and a French doublet: a codpiece daughter.
- 100 TAILOR So, I have gone as far as I can go.
- MOLL Why then, farewell.
- TAILOR If you go presently to your chamber, Mistress Mary, pray send me the measure of your thigh by some honest body.
- 105 MOLL Well sir, I'll send it by a porter presently. Exit
- TAILOR So you had need: it is a lusty one. Both of them would make any porter's back ache in England! Exit
- SEBASTIAN [comes forward]
- I have examined the best part of man—
Reason and judgement—and in love, they tell me,
They leave me uncontrolled. He that is swayed
By an unfeeling blood, past heat of love,
His springtime must needs err: his watch ne'er goes right
That sets his dial by a rusty clock.
- ALEXANDER [comes forward]
- 115 So—and which is that rusty clock, sir, you?
- SEBASTIAN
The clock at Ludgate, sir, it ne'er goes true.
- ALEXANDER
But thou goest fals'er; not thy father's cares
Can keep thee right, when that insensible work
Obeys the workman's art, lets off the hour,
And stops again when time is satisfied;
120 But thou run'st on, and judgement, thy main wheel,
- Beats by all stops as if the work would break,
Begun with long pains for a minute's ruin,
Much like a suffering man brought up with care,
At last bequeathed to shame and a short prayer.
- 125 SEBASTIAN
I taste you bitterer than I can deserve, sir.
- ALEXANDER
Who has bewitched thee, son? What devil or drug
Hath wrought upon the weakness of thy blood
And betrayed all her hopes to ruinous folly?
O wake from drowsy and enchanted shame,
Wherein thy soul sits with a golden dream
Flattered and poisoned! I am old, my son—
O let me prevail quickly,
For I have weightier business of mine own
Than to chide thee. I must not to my grave
As a drunkard to his bed, whereon he lies
Only to sleep, and never cares to rise.
Let me dispatch in time; come no more near her.
- SEBASTIAN
Not honestly? Not in the way of marriage?
- ALEXANDER
What sayst thou? Marriage? In what place?—The sessions-house?
140 And who shall give the bride, prithee?—An indictment?
- SEBASTIAN
Sir, now ye take part with the world to wrong her.
- ALEXANDER
Why, wouldst thou fain marry to be pointed at?
Alas the number's great, do not o'erburden't.
Why, as good marry a beacon on a hill,
Which all the country fix their eyes upon,
As her thy folly dotes on. If thou long'st
To have the story of thy infamous fortunes
Serve for discourse in ordinaries and taverns,
Thou'rt in the way; or to confound thy name,
150 Keep on, thou canst not miss it; or to strike
Thy wretched father to untimely coldness,
Keep the left hand still, it will bring thee to't.
Yet if no tears wrung from thy father's eyes,

86 fiddling's fidgeting; sexual play (see 3.67, note). 'Tailor' could mean male or female sexual organ.

89 great Dutch slop wide-cut baggy breeches; see title-page woodcut of Moll

91 yard unit of measure; also penis

93 stand round and full as in erection; the tailor virtually attributes a penis to Moll

96 stiff again, refers to erection

98 gear doings; genitals

100 codpiece daughter again, implying that because she wears male dress, she must be a man anatomically—but at the same time, still a woman, combining what ought to be mutually exclusive; see 83–4, note; Epistle.16–18, note; and Introduction

107 lusty vigorous; lustful

112 unfeeling blood In Renaissance humours psychology, sexual passion derives from blood, a warm, moist humour which decreases with age; Sebastian objects to being 'swayed' by his father's cold, 'unfeeling blood' (referring also to their blood relationship).

113–14 springtime... rusty clock plays on spring as a season and as part of a clock, both alluding to the human life cycle; youth can't develop properly if it moves to the rhythms of age

116 clock at Ludgate one of the ancient city gates, according to legend built by King Lud in 66 BC; made into a prison for debtors and bankrupts by Richard II

121–2 Sebastian's 'uncontrolled' (111) passion drives his judgement to run wildly till it breaks, like a clock running too fast and breaking down.

128 blood youthful passion

132 Flattered encourage with false hopes

134 weightier business presumably, settling his estate or his soul to rights before he dies

140 sessions-house court house

150 in the way on the way to it name family name and reputation

152 untimely coldness premature death

153 left hand the opposite of the right; associated with error, evil, disaster

Scene 4

The Roaring Girl.

155 Nor sighs that fly in sparkles from his sorrows,
Had power to alter what is wilful in thee,
Methinks her very name should fright thee from her,
And never trouble me.

SEBASTIAN
Why is the name of Moll so fatal, sir?

ALEXANDER
160 Many one, sir, where suspect is entered,
Forseek all London from one end to t'other
More whores of that name than of any ten other.

SEBASTIAN
What's that to her? Let those blush for themselves;
Can any guilt in others condemn her?

165 I've vowed to love her: let all storms oppose me
That ever beat against the breast of man,
Nothing but death's black tempest shall divide us.

ALEXANDER
O folly that can dote on naught but shame!

SEBASTIAN
Put case a wanton itch runs through one name
170 More than another: is that name the worse
Where honesty sits possessed in't? It should rather Appear more excellent and deserve more praise
When through foul mists a brightness it can raise.
Why, there are of the devil's, honest gentlemen,
And well descended, keep an open house;
175 And some o'th'good man's that are arrant knaves.
He hates unworthily that by rote contemns,
For the name neither saves nor yet condemns;
And for her honesty, I have made such proof on't

180 In several forms, so nearly watched her ways,
I will maintain that strict against an army,
Excepting you, my father. Here's her worst:
Sh'as a bold spirit that mingles with mankind,
But nothing else comes near it, and oftentimes

185 Through her apparel somewhat shames her birth;
But she is loose in nothing but in mirth:
Would all Molls were no worse!

ALEXANDER [aside]
This way I toil in vain and give but aim

To infamy and ruin: he will fall,
My blessing cannot stay him; all my joys
190 Stand at the brink of a devouring flood
And will be wilfully swallowed, wilfully!
But why so vain let all these tears be lost?
I'll pursue her to shame, and so all's crossed. Exit

SEBASTIAN
He is gone with some strange purpose whose effect
195 Will hurt me little if he shoot so wide
To think I love so blindly. I but feed
His heart to this match to draw on th'other,
Wherein my joy sits with a full wish crowned—
Only his mood excepted, which must change
200 By opposite policies, courses indirect:
Plain dealing in this world takes no effect.
This mad girl I'll acquaint with my intent,
Get her assistance, make my fortunes known:
'Twixt lovers' hearts she's a fit instrument,
205 And has the art to help them to their own.
By her advice, for in that craft she's wise,
My love and I may meet, spite of all spies. Exit

Enter Laxton in Gray's Inn Fields with the Coachman

Sc. 5
LAXTON Coachman!
COACHMAN Here, sir.
LAXTON [gives money] There's a tester more; prithee drive thy coach to the hither end of Marybone Park—a fit
5 place for Moll to get in.
COACHMAN Marybone Park, sir?
LAXTON Ay, it's in our way, thou knowest.
COACHMAN It shall be done, sir.
LAXTON Coachman.
COACHMAN Anon, sir. 10
LAXTON Are we fitted with good frampold jades?
COACHMAN The best in Smithfield, I warrant you, sir.
LAXTON May we safely take the upper hand of any coached velvet cap or tuftaffety jacket? For they keep a wild 15 swaggering in coaches nowadays—the highways are stopped with them.

155 sparkles implying that his heart is hardened by sorrow; Sebastian's conduct strikes it, producing sparks
160 Many one...suspect many an officer, when a person is suspected of an offence, or under surveillance
161 Forseek seek thoroughly, to the point of being weary 169 Put case imagine that
174 of the devil's those of the devil's party
176 o'th'good man's good men; also married men ('goodman' was title for married man)
179 honesty chastity
180 nearly closely
181 strict strictly, rigorously
183 mankind men; as adjective, denotes masculine quality in a woman, thus can also mean 'is somewhat mannish'

184 But nothing...near it in no other way does she approach men
188 give...aim in archery, to guide one's aim by charting the result of the previous shot
201 By...courses indirect i.e., by Sebastian pretending to court Moll, which will make his father more favourably inclined toward Mary
203 mad spirited, eccentric; see I.102
208 spite in spite of
5.0.1 Gray's Inn Fields see 3.307, note
3 tester small coin worth sixpence
4 Marybone Park near Oxford Street; named for St Mary-le-Bourne (on the brook) or St Mary-le-Bonne (the good), also playing on 'marybone' for marrow-bone, marrow considered a seat of vitality and an aphrodisiac (see 3.199, note). The park was known as a centre of prostitution, thus its name evokes the same juxtaposition of whore and virgin as does Moll's name; see I.73, note, and Introduction.

11 frampold spirited
12 Smithfield famous market for horses and cattle near London
13 coached travelling by coach, which was newly fashionable 14 tuftaffety taffeta with raised, velvety patterns in different colours from the ground colour; costly, worn by the wealthy

- COACHMAN My life for yours, and baffle 'em too, sir!
Why, they are the same jades—believe it sir—that have drawn all your famous whores to Ware.
- 20 LAXTON Nay, then they know their business; they need no more instructions.
- COACHMAN They're so used to such journeys, sir, I never use whip to 'em; for if they catch but the scent of a wench once, they run like devils.
- Exit Coachman with his whip*
- 25 LAXTON Fine Cerberus! That rogue will have the start of a thousand ones, for whilst others trot afoot, he'll ride prancing to hell upon a coach-horse! Stay, 'tis now about the hour of her appointment, but yet I see her not. (The clock strikes three) Hark, what's this? One, two
- 30 three: three by the clock at Savoy; this is the hour, and Gray's Inn Fields the place, she swore she'd meet me. Ha, yonder's two Inns-o'-Court men with one wench: but that's not she; they walk toward Islington out of my way. I see none yet dressed like her: I must look
- 35 for a shag ruff, a frieze jerkin, a short sword, and a safeguard, or I get none. Why, Moll, prithee make haste or the coachman will curse us anon.
- Enter Moll like a man*
- MOLL [aside] O here's my gentleman! If they would keep their days as well with their mercers as their hours
- 40 with their harlots, no bankrupt would give sevenscore pound for a sergeant's place. For would you know a catchpole rightly derived: the corruption of a citizen is the generation of a sergeant. How his eye hawks for venery! [To him] Come, are you ready, sir?
- 45 LAXTON Ready? For what, sir?
- MOLL Do you ask that now, sir? Why was this meeting 'pounded?
- LAXTON
I thought you mistook me, sir.
You seem to be some young barrister;
- 50 I have no suit in law—all my land's sold,
- I praise heaven for't, 't has rid me of much trouble.
MOLL Then I must wake you, sir; where stands the coach?
LAXTON Who's this?—Moll? Honest Moll?
MOLL So young, and purblind? You're an old wanton in your eyes, I see that. 55
LAXTON Thou'rt admirably suited for the Three Pigeons at Brentford. I'll swear I knew thee not.
MOLL I'll swear you did not: but you shall know me now!
LAXTON No, not here: we shall be spied i'faith! The coach is better; come. 60
MOLL Stay.
She puts off her cloak and draws
LAXTON
What, wilt thou untruss a point, Moll?
MOLL Yes, here's the point
That I untruss: 't has but one tag, 'twill serve though To tie up a rogue's tongue!
LAXTON How?
MOLL [putting down gold] There's the gold
With which you hired your hackney, here's her pace: 65
She racks hard and perhaps your bones will feel it. Ten angels of mine own I've put to thine:
Win 'em and wear 'em!
LAXTON Hold, Moll! Mistress Mary—
MOLL
Draw, or I'll serve an execution on thee
Shall lay thee up till doomsday. 70
LAXTON
Draw upon a woman? Why, what dost mean, Moll?
MOLL
To teach thy base thoughts manners! Thou'rt one of those
That thinks each woman thy fond flexible whore:
If she but cast a liberal eye upon thee,
Turn back her head, she's thine; or amongst company, 75
By chance drink first to thee, then she's quite gone,

17 baffle shame

18–19 jades... whores a jade was a worn-out or mean-tempered horse; whores were often called jades

19 Ware town near London known as site for sexual rendezvous; see 3.288, note

25 Cerberus in classical mythology, three-headed dog guarding entrance to hell

30 Savoy hospital built on site of Savoy Palace, between the Thames and the Strand

33 Islington suburb north of London used for outings and sexual meetings

35–6 shag ruff... safeguard Laxton remembers Moll much as she was dressed on her entrance (see 3.180.1), in both men's and women's garments

38–9 keep their days figuratively, pay their debts

39 mercers dealers in textiles, especially costly silks and velvets

42 catchpole sergeant who arrested people

for debt

42–3 rightly derived... sergeant Moll summarizes a cycle of downward social mobility; tradesmen who go bankrupt because gallants don't pay them become sergeants, who arrest gallants for debt.

43–4 hawks for venery see Epistle.1, note

47 'pointed appointed

49 barrister lawyer

50 all my land's sold perhaps suggests a parallel between his lack of stones (testicles), signifying impotence, and his lack of land, a kind of social impotence

54 purblind totally blind

56 Three Pigeons tavern in Brentford; see 3.288, note

58 know me now know what I really think of you; in lines 59–60, he thinks she means carnal knowledge, gained by having sex with someone

62 untruss a point undo a lace (laces fastened hose to doublet); Laxton may think, mistakenly, that by starting to remove her hat or cloak, Moll is trying to entice him

point sword point

63 tag hard end of lace, allowing it to be threaded through eyelet

65 hackney horse for ordinary riding; prostitute pace speed; gait (playing on a prostitute's sexual movements)

66 racks hard runs fast, shaking the rider

68 Win 'em and wear 'em proverbial: take your chance

69–70 serve... lay thee up deliver a writ that will put you in jail or incapacitate you (using legal language for a threat of physical force)

70 doomsday the day of judgement (playing on 'execution', 69)

73 fond foolishly infatuated flexible malleable, impressionable

74 liberal generous; flirtatious

There's no means to help her. Nay, for a need,
 Wilt swear unto thy credulous fellow lechers
 That thou'rt more in favour with a lady
 80 At first sight than her monkey all her lifetime.
 How many of our sex by such as thou
 Have their good thoughts paid with a blasted name
 That never deserved loosely or did trip
 In path of whoredom beyond cup and lip?
 85 But for the stain of conscience and of soul,
 Better had women fall into the hands
 Of an act silent than a bragging nothing:
 There's no mercy in't. What durst move you, sir,
 To think me whorish? A name which I'd tear out
 90 From the high German's throat if it lay ledger there
 To dispatch privy slanders against me!
 In thee I defy all men, their worst hates
 And their best flatteries, all their golden witchcrafts
 With which they entangle the poor spirits of fools—
 95 Distressed needlewomen and trade-fallen wives,
 Fish that must needs bite or themselves be bitten—
 Such hungry things as these may soon be took
 With a worm fastened on a golden hook.
 Those are the lecher's food, his prey. He watches 100 For quarrelling wedlocks and poor shifting sisters:
 'Tis the best fish he takes. But why, good fisherman,
 Am I thought meat for you, that never yet
 Had angling rod cast towards me? 'Cause you'll say
 I'm given to sport, I'm often merry, jest;
 105 Had mirth no kindred in the world but lust?
 O shame take all her friends then! But howe'er
 Thou and the baser world censure my life,
 I'll send 'em word by thee, and write so much
 Upon thy breast, 'cause thou shalt bear't in mind:
 110 Tell them 'twere base to yield where I have conquered.
 I scorn to prostitute myself to a man,
 I that can prostitute a man to me!
 And so I greet thee.

LAXTON Hear me!

MOLL Would the spirits
 Of all my slanderers were clasped in thine,
 That I might vex an army at one time! 115
They fight
 LAXTON I do repent me; hold!
 MOLL You'll die the better Christian then.
 LAXTON I do confess I have wronged thee, Moll.
 MOLL
 Confession is but poor amends for wrong,
 Unless a rope would follow.
 LAXTON I ask thee pardon. 120
 MOLL
 I'm your hired whore, sir!
 LAXTON I yield both purse and body.
 MOLL
 Both are mine and now at my disposing.
 LAXTON
 Spare my life!
 MOLL I scorn to strike thee basely.
 LAXTON
 Spoke like a noble girl, i'faith.
 —[Aside] Heart, I think I fight with a familiar, or the 125 ghost of a fencer! She's wounded me gallantly. Call you this a lecherous voyage? Here's blood would have served me this seven year in broken heads and cut fingers, and it now runs all out together! Pox o' the Three Pigeons! I would the coach were here now to 130 carry me to the surgeon's. Exit
 MOLL
 If I could meet my enemies one by one thus,
 I might make pretty shift with 'em in time,
 And make 'em know, she that has wit and spirit
 May scorn to live beholding to her body for meat, 135
 Or for apparel, like your common dame
 That makes shame get her clothes to cover shame.
 Base is that mind that kneels unto her body
 As if a husband stood in awe on's wife;
 My spirit shall be mistress of this house 140

77 for a need in a pinch
 80 monkey monkeys were ladies' pets
 84 cup and lip refers to pledging faith by drinking wine or beer in a betrothal ceremony, as a sign of marital union; figuratively, protests censure of women for having sex with their future husbands before the wedding ceremony (as in fact many women did)
 85 But for except for 87 act silent man who has sex with a woman but doesn't talk about it bragging nothing man who brags of having sex with a woman when he hasn't 89–90 tear...throat To lie in the throat means to lie deliberately, without justification.
 90 high German's see 3.382 ledger ambassador
 91 privy secret (as in secrets of state, playing on 90)
 95 trade-fallen fallen in social rank, from gentry to merchant class; see 3.12–14, note
 96 Fish proverbial: 'The great fish eat the small.' Moll reverses the usual emphasis, making predatory behaviour in women a response to circumstances rather than simply a vice in itself.
 100 wedlocks wives shifting deceiving
 102 meat food, punning on 'meet', suitable, and suggesting 'whore'
 113 greet as in 'salute'; also, attack
 117 Christian If believers confess their sins before death, they are saved from damnation and may expect to enter heaven.
 120 rope hanging; figuratively, any punishment
 125 familiar a demon or evil spirit supposed to assist a witch
 126 gallantly finely; like a gallant
 127 lecherous voyage sexual adventure
 133 make...shift dispose of them nicely
 135 to live...for meat to feed herself by selling her body as a prostitute
 136 common dame whore, or, ordinary housewife
 137 shame...shame shamefully works as a prostitute to buy clothes to cover the 'shame' of her naked body; or, as shamefast (modest, chaste) wife 'earns' her clothes from her husband
 139 husband...wife based on patriarchal comparison of the mind, which ideally should rule the body, to a husband, who ideally should rule over his wife; a prostitute allows her body to rule her mind (spirit, conscience)
 140 My spirit...mistress cf. 138–40, in which 'mind' is figured as 'husband'; here, spirit is feminine and rules the house

As long as I have time in't.
Enter Trapdoor
 O
 Here comes my man that would be: 'tis his hour.
 Faith, a good well-set fellow, if his spirit
 Be answerable to his umbles. He walks stiff,
 145 But whether he will stand to't stiffly, there's the point!
 H'as a good calf for't, and ye shall have many a woman
 Choose him she means to make her head by his calf;
 I do not know their tricks in't. Faith, he seems
 A man without; I'll try what he is within.
 TRAPDOOR [aside]
 150 She told me Gray's Inn Fields 'twixt three and four.
 I'll fit her mistress-ship with a piece of service:
 I'm hired to rid the town of one mad girl.
She jostles him
 —[To her] What a pox ails you, sir?
 MOLL He begins like a gentleman.
 155 TRAPDOOR Heart, is the field so narrow, or your eyesight?—
She comes towards him
 Life, he comes back again!
 MOLL Was this spoke to me, sir?
 TRAPDOOR I cannot tell, sir.
 MOLL Go, you're a coxcomb!
 TRAPDOOR Coxcomb?
 MOLL You're a slave!
 TRAPDOOR I hope there's law for you, sir!
 MOLL Yea, do you see sir?
Turns his hat
 160 TRAPDOOR Heart, this is no good dealing. Pray let me know what house you're of.
 MOLL One of the Temple, sir.
Fillips him
 TRAPDOOR Mass, so methinks.
 MOLL And yet, sometime I lie about Chick Lane.

TRAPDOOR I like you the worse because you shift your lodging so often; I'll not meddle with you for that trick, 165
 sir.
 MOLL A good shift, but it shall not serve your turn.
 TRAPDOOR You'll give me leave to pass about my business, sir?
 MOLL Your business? I'll make you wait on me
 Before I ha' done, and glad to serve me too! 170 TRAPDOOR How sir, serve you? Not if there were no more men in England!
 MOLL But if there were no more women in England, I hope you'd wait upon your mistress then.
 TRAPDOOR Mistress! 175
 MOLL O you're a tried spirit at a push, sir.
 TRAPDOOR What would your worship have me do?
 MOLL You a fighter?
 TRAPDOOR No, I praise heaven, I had better grace and more manners. 180
 MOLL As how, I pray, sir?
 TRAPDOOR Life, 't had been a beastly part of me to have drawn my weapons upon my mistress; all the world would 'a' cried shame of me for that.
 MOLL Why, but you knew me not. 185
 TRAPDOOR Do not say so, mistress; I knew you by your wide straddle as well as if I had been in your belly.
 MOLL Well, we shall try you further; i'th' mean time, we give you entertainment.
 TRAPDOOR Thank your good mistress-ship. 190
 MOLL How many suits have you?
 TRAPDOOR No more suits than backs, mistress.
 MOLL Well, if you deserve, I cast off this next week,
 And you may creep into't.
 TRAPDOOR Thank your good worship.
 MOLL Come, follow me to St Thomas Apostles: 195
 I'll put a livery cloak upon your back
 The first thing I do.
 TRAPDOOR I follow my dear mistress. Exeunt

142 man that would be he who wants to be my manservant
 144 umbles edible inward parts of an animal, usually a deer; figuratively, insides
stiff resolute, playing on erection 145 stand to't reference to erection 147 to make her head by his calf choose a husband by his calf, i.e., physical attractiveness
 148 tricks stratagems for choosing
 151 fit furnish
 157 coxcomb fool
 158 law for you law to deal with people like
 you

161 what house which one of the Inns of Court
 162 the Temple a lawyer affiliated with the Middle Temple or the Inner Temple (named for the property of the Knights Templar which they leased)
 162.1 Fillips him gives him a sharp blow
 163 Chick Lane in the suburb of Smithfield, known as a haunt of thieves and ruffians 165 I'll not meddle with you because he fears one from Chick Lane for that trick because you change lodging
 167 shift punning on shift as change of residence and as trick, device serve your turn suit your purpose 176 tried proven at a push in an emergency; playing on

 'push' as the sexual act
 182 part piece of behaviour
 187 straddle walking, standing, or sitting with legs wide apart
as well... in your belly as well as if you were my mother
 189 give you entertainment engage you as a servant
 195 St Thomas Apostles church located in neighbourhood of clothing shops

Sc. 6

Enter Mistress Gallipot as from supper, her husband after her

GALLIPOT What, Prue! Nay, sweet Prudence!
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT What a pruing keep you! I think the baby would have a teat, it kyes so. Pray be not so fond of me, leave your city humours. I'm vexed at you to see how like a calf you come bleating after me.
 5 GALLIPOT Nay, honey Prue, how does your rising up before all the table show? And flinging from my friends so uncivilly? Fie, Prue, fie! Come.
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Then up and ride, i'faith.
 10 GALLIPOT Up and ride? Nay, my pretty Prue, that's far from my thought, duck. Why mouse, thy mind is nibbling at something. What is't? What lies upon thy stomach?
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Such an ass as you! Heyday, you're best turn midwife or physician; you're a pothecary already, but I'm none of your drugs.
 15 GALLIPOT Thou art a sweet drug, sweetest Prue, and the more thou art pounded, the more precious.
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Must you be prying into a woman's secrets? Say ye?
 20 GALLIPOT Woman's secrets?
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT What? I cannot have a qualm come upon me but your teeth waters till your nose hang over it.
 GALLIPOT It is my love, dear wife.
 25 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Your love? Your love is all words; give me deeds! I cannot abide a man that's too fond over me, so cookish! Thou dost not know how to handle a woman in her kind.
 GALLIPOT No, Prue? Why, I hope I have handled—
 30 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Handle a fool's head of your own!—
 Fie, fie!

GALLIPOT Ha, ha, 'tis such a wasp, it does me good now to have her sting me, little rogue.
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Now fie how you vex me! I cannot abide these apron husbands: such cotqueans! You overdo your things; they become you scurvily. 35
 GALLIPOT [aside] Upon my life, she breeds. Heaven knows how I have strained myself to please her night and day. I wonder why we citizens should get children so fretful and untoward in the breeding, their fathers being for the most part as gentle as milch kine. [To her] Shall I leave thee, my Prue? 40
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Fie, fie, fie.
 GALLIPOT Though shalt not be vexed no more, pretty kind rogue; take no cold, sweet Prue. Exit 45
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT As your wit has done! Now Master Laxton, show your head: what news from you? [Produces a letter] Would any husband suspect that a woman crying, 'Buy any scurvy-grass', should bring love letters amongst her herbs to his wife? Pretty trick! Fine conveyance! Had jealousy a thousand eyes, a silly woman with scurvy-grass blinds them all. 50
 Laxton, with bays
 Crown I thy wit for this: it deserves praise.
 This makes me affect thee more, this proves thee wise; 55
 'Lack, what poor shift is love forced to devise?
 To the point.
She reads the letter
 'O Sweet Creature'—a sweet beginning—'pardon my long absence, for thou shalt shortly be possessed with my presence. Though Demophon was false to Phyllis, I will be to thee as Pan-da-rus was to Cres-sida; though Aeneas made an ass of Dido, I will die to thee ere I do so. O sweetest creature, make much of me, for no man beneath the silver moon shall make more of a woman 60

6.0.1 as from supper presumably late afternoon or evening of the same day as scene 5
 2 pruing pestering; nonce word derived from Prudence
 3 kyes baby talk for 'cries'

 49 scurvy-grass spoonwort, an herb growing along the Thames; its juice was used as a remedy for scurvy
 51 a thousand eyes alludes to Argus, a giant with eyes all over his body, whom Hera commanded to watch over Io when Zeus was enamored of her silly simple, helpless
 53 bays a garland of bay leaves, traditional reward for poetic achievement
 55 affect love
 56 'Lack alack, exclamation of despair shift trick

60 Demophon...Phyllis When Demophon sailed to Athens, promising to return to his wife Phyllis at a certain time, she gave him a box containing an object sacred to Rhea, the goddess of earth, which he was not to open unless he decided not to return. He settled in Cyprus, and Phyllis hanged herself; then he opened the box, was driven mad by its contents, and died by accidentally falling on his own sword.
 61 Pan-da-rus...Cres-sida (She hesitates over unfamiliar words.) Pandarus wasn't Cressida's lover but rather the go-between who assisted her love affair with Troilus; the reference ironically undercuts Laxton's profession of fidelity, and moreover implies that he will not be Mistress Gallipot's lover.
 62 Aeneas...Dido After Aeneas abandoned Dido to pursue his destiny of founding Rome, she killed herself.
die to thee become as though dead, with play on die meaning to have an orgasm 64-5 make more...of thee be more loving, with ironic meaning of profiting from

- 65 than I do of thee. Furnish me therefore with thirty pounds—you must do it of necessity for me. I languish till I see some comfort come from thee. Protesting not to die in thy debt, but rather to live so, as hitherto I have and will,
- 70 Thy true Laxton ever.
Alas, poor gentleman! Troth, I pity him.
How shall I raise this money? Thirty pound?
'Tis thirty sure: a three before an O—
I know his threes too well. My childbed linen?
75 Shall I pawn that for him? Then if my mark
Be known, I am undone! It may be thought
My husband's bankrupt. Which way shall I turn?
Laxton, what with my own fears, and thy wants,
I'm like a needle 'twixt two adamant.
- 80 Enter Master Gallipot hastily
GALLIPOT Nay, nay, wife, the women are all up—[Aside]
Ha? How? Reading o' letters? I smell a goose, a couple of capons, and a gammon of bacon from her mother out of the country, I hold my life—
Steal—steal—
[He sneaks behind her]
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
O beshrew your heart!
GALLIPOT What letter's that? I'll see't.
She tears the letter
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
85 O would thou hadst no eyes to see
The downfall of me and thyself! I'm for ever,
For ever I'm undone.
GALLIPOT What ails my Prue?
What paper's that thou tear'st?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT Would I could tear
My very heart in pieces, for my soul
90 Lies on the rack of shame that tortures me
Beyond a woman's suffering.
GALLIPOT What means this?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
Had you no other vengeance to throw down,
But even in height of all my joys—
GALLIPOT Dear woman!
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
When the full sea of pleasure and content
- Seemed to flow over me?
GALLIPOT As thou desirest
To keep me out of Bedlam, tell what troubles thee!
Is not thy child at nurse fallen sick, or dead?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
O no!
GALLIPOT
Heavens bless me! Are my barns and houses
Yonder at Hockley Hole consumed with fire?
100 I can build more, sweet Prue.
MISTRESS GALLIPOT 'Tis worse, 'tis worse!
GALLIPOT
My factor broke? Or is the Jonas sunk?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
Would all we had were swallowed in the waves,
Rather than both should be the scorn of slaves!
GALLIPOT
I'm at my wit's end!
MISTRESS GALLIPOT O my dear husband,
105 Where once I thought myself a fixed star
Placed only in the heaven of thine arms,
I fear now I shall prove a wanderer.—
O Laxton, Laxton, is it then my fate
To be by thee o'erthrown?
GALLIPOT Defend me, wisdom,
From falling into frenzy! On my knees,
Sweet Prue, speak! What's that Laxton who so heavy Lies on thy bosom?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT I shall sure run mad!
GALLIPOT
I shall run mad for company then. Speak to me—
I'm Gallipot, thy husband. Prue! Why, Prue!
115 Art sick in conscience for some villainous deed
Thou wert about to act? Didst mean to rob me?
Tush, I forgive thee. Hast thou on my bed
Thrust my soft pillow under another's head?
I'll wink at all faults, Prue; 'las that's no more 120 Than what some neighbours near thee have done before.
Sweet honey Prue, what's that Laxton?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT O!
GALLIPOT
Out with him!

73 an O zero; also, term for female genitals

74 childbed linen bed linen used for confinement and childbirth, sometimes finely embroidered and costly

75 mark sign of personal ownership

79 adamants hard stones confused with loadstones or magnets; she is pulled two ways, by her attraction to Laxton and her desire to stay married

80 up risen from the supper table

83 hold bet

84 steal his movement as he creeps behind her to read the letter over her shoulder beshrew your heart common expression, often used lightly, meaning 'devil take your heart'

85-137 O would thou hadst no eyes...

never! To deceive her husband, Mistress Gallipot adopts an extravagant style associated with tragedy; in this comic context, the style amounts to parody.

96 Bedlam corruption of Hospital of St Mary of Bethlehem in London, which treated the insane; bedlam came to mean any kind of madhouse

97 child at nurse The well-to-do customarily sent infants away from home to be suckled by wet nurses.

100 Hockley Hole Hockley-in-the-Hole, a village near London

102 factor financial representative broke ruined financially

Jonas trading vessel in which Gallipot presumably has a financial interest; ironically named, since the cargo of the Biblical Jonah's ship was cast overboard in the storm (see Jonah 1:5)

106 fixed star one which appears to hold the same position, as distinguished from a wandering star or planet, which circles the sun

108 wanderer unfaithful, wanton

111 On my knees i.e., I beg you

120 wink at pretend not to see
'las Alas

Scene 6

The Roaring Girl.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT
 O, he's born to be my undoer!
 This hand which thou call'st thine, to him was given;
 125 To him was I made sure i'th' sight of heaven.

GALLIPOT
 I never heard this thunder!

MISTRESS GALLIPOT Yes, yes, before
 I was to thee contracted, to him I swore.
 Since last I saw him, twelve months three times told 130 The moon hath drawn through her light silver bow;
 For o'er the seas he went, and it was said—
 But rumour lies—that he in France was dead.
 But he's alive! O he's alive! He sent
 That letter to me, which in rage I rent,
 Swearing with oaths most damnably to have me
 135 Or tear me from this bosom. O heavens save me!

GALLIPOT
 My heart will break—shamed and undone for ever!

MISTRESS GALLIPOT
 So black a day, poor wretch, went o'er thee never!

GALLIPOT
 If thou shouldst wrestle with him at the law,
 Thou'rt sure to fall; no odd sleight, no prevention.
 I'll tell him thou'rt with child.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT Um!
 140 GALLIPOT Or give out
 One of my men was ta'en abed with thee.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT
 Um, um!

GALLIPOT
 Before I lose thee, my dear Prue,
 I'll drive it to that push.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT Worse, and worse still!
 You embrace a mischief to prevent an ill.

GALLIPOT
 145 I'll buy thee of him, stop his mouth with gold:
 Think'st thou 'twill do?

MISTRESS GALLIPOT O me, heavens grant it would!
 Yet now my senses are set more in tune,
 He writ, as I remember in his letter,
 That he in riding up and down had spent,
 150 Ere he could find me, thirty pounds: send that,
 Stand not on thirty with him.

GALLIPOT Forty, Prue.

Say thou the word, 'tis done. We venture lives
 For wealth, but must do more to keep our wives.
 Thirty or forty, Prue?

MISTRESS GALLIPOT Thirty, good sweet;
 Of an ill bargain let's save what we can 155 I'll pay it him with my tears. He was a man,
 When first I knew him, of a meek spirit:
 All goodness is not yet dried up, I hope.

GALLIPOT
 He shall have thirty pound; let that stop all.
 Love's sweets taste best when we have drunk down 160 gall.
Enter Master Tiltyard and his wife, Master Goshawk, and Mistress Openwork
 Gods-so, our friends! Come, come, smooth your cheek;
 After a storm, the face of heaven looks sleek.

TILTYARD Did I not tell you these turtles were together?

MISTRESS TILTYARD How dost thou, sirrah? Why, sister
 165 Gallipot!—

MISTRESS OPENWORK Lord, how she's changed!

GOSHAWK Is your wife ill, sir?

GALLIPOT Yes indeed, la, sir, very ill, very ill, never worse.

MISTRESS TILTYARD How her head burns; feel how her 170 pulses work.

MISTRESS OPENWORK Sister, lie down a little: that always does me good.

MISTRESS TILTYARD In good sadness, I find best ease in that too. Has she laid some hot thing to her stomach?

MISTRESS GALLIPOT No, but I will lay something anon.
 175 TILTYARD Come, come, fools, you trouble her. Shall's go, Master Goshawk?

GOSHAWK Yes, sweet Master Tiltyard.
 [Talks apart with Mistress Openwork]
 Sirrah, Rosamond, I hold my life Gallipot hath vexed 180 his wife.

MISTRESS OPENWORK She has a horrible high colour indeed.

GOSHAWK We shall have your face painted with the same red soon at night, when your husband comes from his rubbers in a false alley; thou wilt not believe me that 185 his bowls run with a wrong bias?

MISTRESS OPENWORK It cannot sink into me that he feeds upon stale mutton abroad, having better and fresher at home.

GOSHAWK What if I bring thee where thou shalt see him
 190 stand at rack and manger?

125 made sure... heaven betrothed, bound by a precontract (see 1.56-8, note)
 129 The moon... silver bow The moon is identified with Diana as huntress; drawing her bow signifies the passage of one month.
 139 odd sleight clever trick
 143 push extremity
 151 Stand not on don't refuse on principle to give him
 154 Thirty see 209, note

160 gall bile, signifying bitterness
 161 Gods-so corruption of 'by God's soul' or 'God save my soul'
 163 turtles turtle-doves, associated with love
 173 good sadness in all seriousness
 174 hot thing to her stomach as medication; playing on hot as lustful, thing as penis, with sexual innuendo 184 rubbers a set of (usually three) games, playing on rub as sexual movement; in 183-5 Goshawk insinuates, as he has before, that Openwork is having an affair false alley bowling alley; figuratively, false woman or whore 185 bowls... bias he bowls with unnatural crookedness (bowling balls were normally made to move obliquely), meaning that he is unfaithful

 187 stale mutton mutton is slang for whore
 190 stand at rack and manger like a horse with plenty of food; plainly revealed as unfaithful

MISTRESS OPENWORK I'll saddle him in's kind and spur him till he kick again!
GOSHAWK Shall thou and I ride our journey then?
MISTRESS OPENWORK Here's my hand.
195 GOSHAWK No more.—[To Tiltyard] Come Master Tiltyard, shall we leap into the stirrups with our women and amble home?
TILTYARD Yes, yes; come wife.
MISTRESS TILTYARD In troth, sister, I hope you will do well 200 for all this.
MISTRESS GALLIPOT I hope I shall. Farewell good sister, sweet Master Goshawk.
GALLIPOT Welcome, brother; most kindly welcome, sir.
OMNES Thanks, sir, for our good cheer.
Exeunt all but Gallipot and his Wife
GALLIPOT
205 It shall be so, because a crafty knave
Shall not outreach me, nor walk by my door
With my wife arm in arm, as 'twere his whore.
I'll give him a golden coxcomb: thirty pound.
Tush, Prue, what's thirty pound? Sweet duck, look cheerly.
210 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Thou art worthy of my heart, thou buy'st it dearly.
Enter Laxton muffled
LAXTON [aside] Uds light, the tide's against me! A pox of your pothecaryship! O for some glister to set him going!
'Tis one of Hercules' labours to tread one of these city
215 hens, because their cocks are still crowing over them.
There's no turning tail here; I must on.
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
O husband, see, he comes!
GALLIPOT Let me deal with him.
LAXTON Bless you, sir.
GALLIPOT Be you blessed too, sir, if you come in peace.
220 LAXTON Have you any good pudding-tobacco, sir?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
O pick no quarrels, gentle sir! My husband
Is not a man of weapon, as you are.
He knows all: I have opened all before him

Concerning you.
LAXTON [aside] Zounds, has she shown my letters?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
Suppose my case were yours, what would you do? 225
At such a pinch, such batteries, such assaults,
Of father, mother, kindred, to dissolve
The knot you tied, and to be bound to him?
How could you shift this storm off?
LAXTON If I know, hang me!
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
Besides a story of your death was read 230
Each minute to me.
LAXTON [aside] What a pox means this riddling?
GALLIPOT
Be wise, sir, let not you and I be tossed
On lawyers' pens: they have sharp nibs and draw
Men's very heart-blood from them; what need you,
sir,
To beat the drum of my wife's infamy, 235
And call your friends together, sir, to prove
Your precontract, when she's confessed it?
LAXTON Um, sir,—
Has she confessed it?
GALLIPOT Sh'as, faith, to me, sir,
Upon your letter sending.
MISTRESS GALLIPOT I have, I have.
LAXTON [aside]
If I let this iron cool, call me slave!
240 —[To her] Do you hear, you dame Prudence? Think'st thou, vile woman,
I'll take these blows and wink?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT Upon my knees.—
LAXTON
Out, impudence!
GALLIPOT Good sir—
LAXTON You goatish slaves!—
No wild fowl to cut up but mine?
GALLIPOT Alas, sir,
You make her flesh to tremble: fright her not; 245
She shall do reason, and what's fit.

191–2 saddle him...kick again continuing Goshawk's horse metaphors, meaning 'I'll get back at him for his misdeeds, using his own methods'
193–4 Shall thou...my hand they agree to have sex, parodying the betrothal ceremony
197 amble a leisurely horseriding pace
208 coxcomb derogatory term for head, implying foolishness; Gallipot threatens to beat Laxton along with paying him the money
209 thirty pound A fancy riding suit cost twenty pounds; a knighthood purchased from the king, thirty pounds; a small cottage, possibly forty pounds.
211.I Enter Laxton muffled Here as in all his subsequent entrances, Laxton's concealment suggests that the drubbing

he received from Moll in scene 5 has left him ashamed, injured, or vulnerable to creditors because of the ten angels he lost to her. (Debtors commonly concealed themselves so as to escape arrest.)
212 Uds light corruption of 'by God's light', a mild oath
213 glister suppository or enema
214 Hercules' labours the twelve extraordinary feats of strength and bravery performed by the legendary Greek hero tread copulate with; used of male bird with female 216 turning tail with sexual innuendo on tail as genitals
220 pudding-tobacco compressed tobacco in rolls resembling a pudding or sausage
224 letters the plural implies that their liaison has been going on for some time

232–3 tossed | On lawyers' pens financially drained by fees for prolonged legal manoeuvres
235 beat the drum of make public
236–7 call your friends...precontract Gallipot imagines Laxton asserting the legal force of the alleged precontract by assembling the family members who witnessed it.
236 friends relatives
240 iron cool reference to the proverb, 'Strike while the iron is hot'; Laxton would play along with Mistress Gallipot's ruse, to blackmail her husband and extort more money
243 goatish lustful; goats were considered very sexually active 244 wild fowl a term for prostitutes

Scene 6

The Roaring Girl.

LAXTON I'll have thee, By which the serpent did the first woman beguile
 Wert thou more common than an hospital Did ever since all women's bosoms fill: 270
 And more diseased— You're apple-eaters all, deceivers still! Exeunt

GALLIPOT But one word, good sir!

LAXTON So, sir. Enter Sir Alexander Wengrave, Sir Davy Dapper, Sc. 7
 GALLIPOT Sir Adam Appleton at one door, and Trapdoor at another door

250 I married her, have lain with her, and got
 Two children on her body: think but on that.
 Have you so beggarly an appetite,
 When I upon a dainty dish have fed,
 To dine upon my scraps, my leavings? Ha, sir?
 Do I come near you now, sir?

LAXTON Be lady, you touch me.

GALLIPOT

255 LAXTON Would not you scorn to wear my clothes, sir?
 GALLIPOT Right, sir.

Then pray, sir, wear not her, for she's a garment
 So fitting for my body, I'm loath
 Another should put it on: you will undo both.
 Your letter, as she said, complained you had spent 260 In quest of her, some thirty pound: I'll pay it.
 Shall that, sir, stop this gap up 'twixt you two?

LAXTON

Well, if I swallow this wrong, let her thank you.
 The money being paid, sir, I am gone;
 Farewell. O women, happy's he trusts none!

MISTRESS GALLIPOT

265 GALLIPOT Dispatch him hence, sweet husband.
 Yes, dear wife.
 Pray, sir, come in; [To Wife] ere Master Laxton part,
 Thou shalt in wine drink to him.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT With all my heart.
Exit Gallipot

LAXTON How dost thou like my wit?
 Rarely: that wile

247-8 more common...diseased common, meaning sexually available, wanton; hospitals were sometimes associated with venereal disease

254 come near you do you see my point? Be lady corruption of 'by our lady' (the Virgin Mary)

255 wear my clothes clothes marked social rank

256-8 wear not her...put it on figuratively, suggests their intimacy as a couple, his affection for her, and a wife's function as social 'ornament' for her husband

259 complained lodged a complaint (in quasi-legal sense)

264 O women...trusts none proverbial

265 Dispatch him settle the business and send him away

268-71 that wile...deceivers still pictures Mistress Gallipot as Eve, attributing the serpent's guile in the garden of Eden to the woman he beguiled into eating the apple

7.2 A knave...in my debt Sir Alexander conceals the real nature of his dealings with Trapdoor by inventing this reason for his presence.

in mine eye here before me

5 A duck's egg...frog The duck (which may carry the sexual meaning of wild-fowl for prostitute; see 6.244) is Moll, who has swallowed the frog, i.e., Trapdoor's bait.

7 bouncing loud, blustering

8 ramp bold, vulgar, ill-behaved woman

9 tread used of male birds copulating with hens; see 6.213

11 oyster-wench woman who sells oysters, which were considered an aphrodisiac and a delicacy

13 barber's every Saturday night barbers, great sources of news, were busiest at this time

15-16 back gate sexual allusion to anal intercourse or coitus a tergo

18 bawdy made to look like a bawdy-house or brothel

20 shirt of mail garment made of mail, interlaced metal rings or overlapping plates; a type of armour

25-6 Close to your son...almanacs lie not playing on astrological predictions in almanacs, with sexual innuendo in 'conjunction' (close proximity of heavenly bodies)

27-9 safeguard...codpiece Moll has changed female clothing—safeguard (see 3.180.1, note), upper body or bodice fastened with laces in eyelets or holes, waistcoat, and placket—for male: deep slop or baggy breeches (see 4.89, and title-page woodcut), doublet fastened with buttons and button holes, and codpiece (see Epistle.14-17).

- upper body to buttonholes, her waistcoat to a doublet, her placket to the ancient seat of a codpiece; and you shall take 'em both with standing collars.
- ALEXANDER Art sure of this?
- TRAPDOOR As every throng is sure of a pickpocket; as sure as a whore is of the clients all Michaelmas Term, and of the pox after the term.
- ALEXANDER The time of their tilting?
- TRAPDOOR Three.
- ALEXANDER The day?
- TRAPDOOR This.
- ALEXANDER Away, ply it; watch her.
- TRAPDOOR As the devil doth for the death of a bawd, I'll watch her; do you catch her.
- ALEXANDER She's fast; here weave thou the nets. Hark—
- TRAPDOOR They are made.
- ALEXANDER I told them thou didst owe me money: hold it up, maintain't.
- TRAPDOOR Stiffly, as a Puritan does contention. [As in a quarrel] Fox, I owe thee not the value of a halfpenny halter!
- ALEXANDER Thou shalt be hanged in't ere thou 'scape so!
Varlet, I'll make thee look through a grate!
- TRAPDOOR I'll do't presently: through a tavern grate.
Drawer! Pish! Exit
- SIR ADAM
Has the knave vexed you, sir?
- ALEXANDER Asked him my money;
He swears my son received it! O that boy
Will ne'er leave heaping sorrows on my heart
Till he has broke it quite!
- SIR ADAM Is he still wild?
- ALEXANDER
As is a Russian bear.
- SIR ADAM But he has left
His old haunt with that baggage.
- ALEXANDER Worse still and worse!
He lays on me his shame, I on him my curse.
- SIR DAVY
My son, Jack Dapper, then shall run with him,
All in one pasture.
- SIR ADAM Proves your son bad too, sir?
- SIR DAVY
As villainy can make him: your Sebastian
Dotes but on one drab, mine on a thousand!
A noise of fiddlers, tobacco, wine, and a whore,
A mercer that will let him take up more,
Dice, and a water-spaniel with a duck; O,
Bring him abed with these! When his purse jingles,
Roaring boys follow at's tail, fencers and ningles—
Beasts Adam ne'er gave name to—these horse-leeches suck
My son; he being drawn dry, they all live on smoke.
- ALEXANDER
Tobacco?
- SIR DAVY
Right; but I have in my brain
A windmill going that shall grind to dust
The follies of my son, and make him wise
Or a stark fool. Pray lend me your advice.
- ALEXANDER and SIR ADAM
That shall you, good Sir Davy.
- SIR DAVY Here's the springe
I ha' set to catch this woodcock in: an action
In a false name—unknown to him—is entered I'th' Counter to arrest Jack Dapper.
- ALEXANDER and SIR ADAM Ha, ha, he!
- SIR DAVY
Think you the Counter cannot break him?
- SIR ADAM Break him?
Yes, and break's heart too, if he lie there long!
- SIR DAVY
I'll make him sing a counter-tenor, sure.
- SIR ADAM
No way to tame him like it; there he shall learn
What money is indeed, and how to spend it.

29 placket slit at top of skirt or petticoat to allow putting on; a feature typical of women's dress, it came to mean women per se and women's genitals. The word could also mean apron, petticoat, or pocket in a woman's skirt.

30 standing collars high straight collars worn by both sexes

33 whore . . . Michaelmas Term When law courts were in session, visitors flooded London for legal business and for pleasure, and prostitution was said to increase; Michaelmas Term ran from 9 or 10 October to 28 or 29 November.

35 tilting see 3.0.4, note; with sexual innuendo

42 fast fastened; fixed to the spot

44–52 see 2, note: they resume their ruse

46 Stiffly sexual allusion to erection, playing on 'hold it up', 44

48 halter rope with a noose used for hanging

50 grate prison grating, barred window; see Prologue.24, note

51 tavern grate red lattice work of alehouse window

52 Drawer one who draws liquor from the tap in an alehouse or tavern

57 Russian bear imported to England for bear baiting, a popular spectator sport

58 baggage disreputable woman or strumpet

63 drab whore

64 noise group (of musicians)

65 merc dealer in textiles; see 5.39, note

take up more buy more on credit

66 water-spaniel with a duck see 3.413.3

67 Bring him abed let him be delivered of, be rid of; punning on childbirth

68 Roaring boys see 1.73, note

ningles boy favourites or male lovers; satires of this period associate them with other pleasures and fashions enjoyed by gallants (see Sir Davy's list, 7.64–6)

69 Beasts Adam ne'er gave name to those indulging in sexual practices considered 'unnatural', not belonging to the animals in paradise to which Adam gave names horse-leeches extortioners; whores

72 windmill figuratively, visionary scheme

75 That shall you that shall you have

75–6 springe . . . woodcock proverbial; snare for catching small birds, such as woodcocks, which are easily caught

76 action legal proceedings, which Sir Davy has instigated using a false name

78 Counter one of two debtors' prisons in London, both named after the streets where they were located, in Cheapside: the Poultry Counter and the Wood Street Counter

79 break him break his will, reform him

81 counter-tenor punning on Counter, a male voice higher than tenor; may also hint at castration, used to produce castrati, high-voiced male singers

Scene 7

The Roaring Girl.

SIR DAVY
He's bridled there.

ALEXANDER
Ay, yet knows not how to mend it!
85 Bedlam cures not more madmen in a year
Than one of the counters does; men pay more dear
There for their wit than anywhere. A counter,
Why, 'tis an university! Who not sees?
As scholars there, so here men take degrees
90 And follow the same studies, all alike.
Scholars learn first logic and rhetoric;
So does a prisoner. With fine honeyed speech
At's first coming in he doth persuade, beseech
He may be lodged with one that is not itchy,
95 To lie in a clean chamber, in sheets not lousy.
But when he has no money, then does he try
By subtle logic and quaint sophistry
To make the keepers trust him.

SIR ADAM
Say they do?

ALEXANDER
Then he's a graduate!

SIR DAVY
Say they trust him not?

ALEXANDER
100 Then is he held a freshman and a sot,
And never shall commence; but, being still barred,
Be expelled from the Master's Side to th'Twopenny
Ward,
Or else i'th' Hole be placed.

SIR ADAM
When then, I pray,
Proceeds a prisoner?

ALEXANDER
When, money being the theme,
105 He can dispute with his hard creditors' hearts
And get out clear, he's then a Master of Arts!
Sir Davy, send your son to Wood Street College;
A gentleman can nowhere get more knowledge.

SIR DAVY
There gallants study hard.

ALEXANDER
True: to get money.

SIR DAVY
'Lies by th'heels, i'faith. Thanks, thanks; I ha' sent 110 For a couple of bears shall paw him.
Enter Sergeant Curtalax and Yeoman Hanger

SIR ADAM
Who comes yonder?

SIR DAVY
They look like puttocks; these should be they.

ALEXANDER
I know 'em;
They are officers. Sir, we'll leave you.

SIR DAVY
My good knights,
Leave me; you see I'm haunted now with sprites.
115 ALEXANDER and SIR ADAM Fare you well, sir.
Exeunt Sir Alexander and Sir Adam

CURTALAX
This old muzzle chops should be he by the fellow's description. [To Sir Davy] Save you, sir.

SIR DAVY
Come hither, you mad varlets; did not my man tell you I watched here for you?

CURTALAX
One in a blue coat, sir, told us that in this 120 place an old gentleman would watch for us, a thing contrary to our oath, for we are to watch for every wicked member in a city.

SIR DAVY
You'll watch, then, for ten thousand! What's thy name, honesty?

CURTALAX
Sergeant Curtalax, I sir.

SIR DAVY
An excellent name for a sergeant, Curtalax;
Sergeants indeed are weapons of the law:
When prodigal ruffians far in debt are grown,
Should not you cut them, citizens were o'erthrown.
130 Thou dwell'st hereby in Holborn, Curtalax?

CURTALAX
That's my circuit, sir; I conjure most in that circle.

SIR DAVY
And what young toward whelp is this?

HANGER
Of the same litter; his yeoman, sir. My name's
135 Hanger.

84 how to mend it how to cure his spend-thrift habits
87-108 counter . . . university . . . knowledge a frequent comparison, between the prisoner's acquisition of survival skills in prison and the scholar's course of study from bachelor's to master's to doctor's degrees
91 logic and rhetoric logic, forms and rules of reasoning; rhetoric, rules derived from classical authors for using language eloquently, to persuade; along with grammar, these comprised the trivium, a triad of studies basic to the liberal arts curriculum of the medieval university that continued to shape the Renaissance curriculum
100 freshman beginning student sot fool
101 commence take the full university degree of master or doctor barred prevented from graduating, with a pun on prison bars

102-3 Master's Side . . . th'Twopenny Ward . . . i'th' Hole in descending order of comfort and expense, the different wards (sections) of debtors' prison; prisoners had to pay for their food and lodging, and as their money ran out, they moved from one ward to the next, 'the Hole' being notorious for filth, misery, and disease
104-5 theme . . . dispute pedagogical terms; scholars were given 'themes', topics or propositions to be debated or 'disputed' in exercises
110 'Lies by th'heels in irons or the stocks; in jail
111 bears shall paw him figuratively, sergeants who arrested debtors by laying hands on their shoulders; they were sometimes called 'shoulder-clappers'
111.1 Curtalax short, broad sword; as a sergeant, he is an officer of the court who arrests debtors (see 111, note)
Yeoman Hanger a yeoman assisted an official; a hanger was a loop on the belt from which a sword hung (see title-page engraving of Moll) or a short sword hung from a belt; suggests his role as assistant 112 puttocks kites, birds of prey

114 sprites figuratively, sergeants who make bodily arrests, analogous to spirits who take possession of the soul
116 muzzle chops name for a man with prominent nose and jaw, like an animal's muzzle
118 mad foolish
120 One in a blue coat a servant
125 honesty an honest, honourable man
126-8 Curtalax . . . weapons of the law playing on the sergeant's name; see 111.1
130 cut strike sharply, playing on Curtalax
132 circuit . . . conjure alluding to the magician's action of drawing a circle before conjuring
134 toward bold, or conversely, docile

- SIR DAVY Yeoman Hanger.
One pair of shears, sure, cut out both your coats;
You have two names most dangerous to men's throats.
140 You two are villainous loads on gentlemen's backs;
Dear ware, this Hanger and this Curtalax.
CURTALAX We are as other men are, sir; I cannot see but he who makes a show of honesty and religion, if his claws 145 can fasten to his liking, he draws blood. All that live in the world are but great fish and little fish, and feed upon one another: some eat up whole men; a sergeant cares but for the shoulder of a man. They call us knaves and curs, but many times he that sets us on worries more 150 lambs one year than we do in seven.
SIR DAVY Spoke like a noble Cerberus! Is the action entered?
HANGER His name is entered in the book of unbelievers.
SIR DAVY What book's that?
CURTALAX The book where all prisoners' names stand; and 155 not one among forty when he comes in believes to come out in haste!
SIR DAVY Be as dogged to him as your office allows you to be.
CURTALAX and HANGER O sir!
SIR DAVY You know the unthrift Jack Dapper?
CURTALAX Ay, ay, sir, that gull? As well as I know my yeoman.
SIR DAVY And you know his father too, Sir Davy Dapper?
CURTALAX As damned a usurer as ever was among Jews!
165 If he were sure his father's skin would yield him any money, he would, when he dies, flay it off and sell it to cover drums for children at Barthol'mew Fair!
- SIR DAVY [aside] What toads are these to spit poison on a man to his face! [To them] Do you see, my honest 170 rascals? Yonder Greyhound is the dog he hunts with: out of that tavern, Jack Dapper will sally. Sa, sa! Give the counter! On, set upon him!
CURTALAX and HANGER We'll charge him upo'th' back, sir.
SIR DAVY Take no bail; put mace enough into his caudle.
Double your files! Traverse your ground!
175 CURTALAX and HANGER Brave, sir!
SIR DAVY Cry arm, arm, arm!
CURTALAX and HANGER Thus, sir.
SIR DAVY There boy, there boy, away: look to your prey, my true English wolves and—and so I vanish. Exit 180
CURTALAX Some warden of the sergeants begat this old fellow, upon my life! Stand close.
HANGER Shall the ambuscado lie in one place?
CURTALAX No, nook thou yonder.
Enter Moll and Trapdoor
MOLL Ralph. 185
TRAPDOOR What says my brave captain, male and female?
MOLL This Holborn is such a wrangling street.
TRAPDOOR That's because lawyers walks to and fro in't!
MOLL Here's such jostling as if everyone we met were 190 drunk and reeled.
TRAPDOOR Stand, mistress, do you not smell carrion?
MOLL Carrion? No, yet I spy ravens.
TRAPDOOR Some poor wind-shaken gallant will anon fall into sore labour; and these men-midwives must bring 195 him to bed i'the Counter: there all those that are great with child with debts lie in.
MOLL Stand up.
TRAPDOOR Like your new maypole!
HANGER [to Curtalax] Whist, whew!

138 One pair of shears proverbial for likeness, sameness

140 villainous regarded as vile, detestable loads referring to their mode of arrest, grabbing debtors from behind

141 ware metal goods, punning on their names

144-6 All...feed upon one another proverbial; see 5.96, Moll's variation on the same idea

146-7 a sergeant... the shoulder of a man again referring to his mode of arresting debtors; compare 111, 140

148 worries like wolves or dogs, seizes the throat of sheep with the teeth

150 Cerberus see 5.25, note; implicitly, compares debtors' prison to hell

152 book of unbelievers the register of prisoners (see 154); the opposite of the book of the faithful entering heaven

157 dogged strict, dutiful; playing on 'Cerberus'

164 As damned a usurer... among Jews Jews were expelled from England in 1290 by Edward I. Though some Jews were living in London at this time, none could have practised usury legally because the office that regulated Jewish usurers was no longer in existence; Curtalax voices prejudice rather than known practice.

165-7 his father's skin... Barthol'mew Fair Crimes commonly attributed to Jews may reflect a European fascination with the Jewish ritual of circumcision. At Bartholemew Fair, held in Smithfield on 24 August, St Bartholemew's Day, toys such as drums were sold (see Ben Jonson's comedy, Bartholemew Fair [1614]).

168 toads... poison toads were proverbially poisonous

170 Greyhound probably the name of a tavern; the place where Jack Dapper can be found

171 Sa, sa exclamation used by fencers delivering a thrust

172 counter fencing term for circular motion of sword, or, hunting term for going in the opposite direction to the course taken by the game

174 mace... caudle caudle, a warm drink of thin gruel, mixed with wine or ale, was often spiced with mace; pun on mace, the staff carried by sergeants as badge

of office, with which they made their arrests

175 Double... ground military terms: increase your file (row of soldiers) to double its length (absurd for only two soldiers), move from side to side

176 Brave excellent

177 Cry arm 'be ready for fight' or 'take up arms'

183 ambuscado force lying in ambush (sergeants waited in concealment at alehouses and other locales for debtors they arrested)

184 nook hide in a corner

187 Holborn see 3.306, note

192 ravens referring to lawyers as those who prey on people as ravens eat carrion

193 wind-shaken flawed in the centre, as timber cracked by high winds

194-6 sore labour... lie in comparison of debtors to pregnant women (great with child) in the final stage (sore) of labour who are brought to bed (for delivery) in prison by men-midwives (sergeants), where they lie in (await the birth)

199 Whist, whew whistling sounds, to get his partner's attention

Scene 7

The Roaring Girl.

200 CURTALAX [to Hanger] Hump, no!
 MOLL Peeping? It shall go hard, huntsmen, but I'll spoil your game. They look for all the world like two infected maltmen coming muffled up in their cloaks in a frosty morning to London.

205 TRAPDOOR A course, captain: a bear comes to the stake!
Enter Jack Dapper and Gull
 MOLL It should be so, for the dogs struggle to be let loose.
 HANGER [to Curtalax] Whew!
 CURTALAX [to Hanger] Hemp!
 MOLL Hark Trapdoor, follow your leader.

210 JACK DAPPER Gull.
 GULL Master?
 JACK DAPPER Didst ever see such an ass as I am, boy?
 GULL No, by my troth, sir, to lose all your money, yet have false dice of your own! Why, 'tis as I saw a great fellow 215 used t'other day: he had a fair sword and buckler, and yet a butcher dry-beat him with a cudgel!
 MOLL and TRAPDOOR Honest sergeant! [To Jack] Fly! Fly, Master Dapper, you'll be arrested else!
 JACK DAPPER Run, Gull, and draw!
 220 GULL Run master! Gull follows you!
Exit Jack Dapper and Gull CURTALAX [Moll holding him] I know you, well enough:
 you're but a whore to hang upon any man.
 MOLL Whores then are like sergeants: so now hang you!
 225 [To Trapdoor] Draw, rogue, but strike not: for a broken pate they'll keep their beds and recover twenty marks damages.
 CURTALAX You shall pay for this rescue! [To Hanger] Run down Shoe Lane and meet him!
 TRAPDOOR Shoo! Is this a rescue, gentlemen, or no?
 [Exeunt Curtalax and Hanger]

MOLL
 230 Rescue? A pox on 'em Trapdoor, let's away;
 I'm glad I have done perfect one good work today.

If any gentleman be in scrivener's bands,
 Send but for Moll, she'll bail him by these hands!
Exeunt

Enter Sir Alexander Wengrave solus

Sc. 8

ALEXANDER
 Unhappy in the follies of a son,
 Led against judgement, sense, obedience,
 And all the powers of nobleness and wit—
 O wretched father!
Enter Trapdoor
 Now, Trapdoor, will she come?

TRAPDOOR
 In man's apparel, sir; I am in her heart now,
 And share in all her secrets.

ALEXANDER
 Peace, peace, peace.
 Here, take my German watch, hang't up in sight
 That I may see her hang in English for't.

TRAPDOOR
 I warrant you for that now, next sessions rids her, sir.
 This watch will bring her in better than a hundred constables.

ALEXANDER
 Good Trapdoor, sayst thou so? Thou cheer'st my heart
 After a storm of sorrow. My gold chain, too:
 Here, take a hundred marks in yellow links.

TRAPDOOR
 That will do well to bring the watch to light, sir,
 And worth a thousand of your headborough's lanterns.

ALEXANDER
 Place that o' the court-cupboard, let it lie
 Full in the view of her thief-whorish eye.

TRAPDOOR
 She cannot miss it, sir; I see't so plain
 That I could steal't myself.

ALEXANDER
 Perhaps thou shalt, too;

15

200 Hump return signal
 202-3 infected maltmen During plague times, those who brought malt for sale to London returned to the countryside with contaminated rags for use as fertilizer, and became infected.
 203 muffled as debtors often were, to avoid arrest
 205 course in hunting, the animal being pursued (here, Jack Dapper) stake post to which bear was tethered for bear baiting
 206 dogs sergeants; compare 134-5
 213-14 to lose all . . . false dice he came prepared to cheat others, but was cheated himself instead 214-16 great fellow . . . dry-beat him with a cudgel may allude to an actual occurrence at the Fortune Theatre on 26
 February 1610/11, when two butchers
 'abused' some gentlemen
 217 Honest sergeant Moll tries to divert the sergeant's attention so that Jack Dapper can escape him.

 222-3 a whore to hang upon . . . like ser- geants Sergeants cling to debtors' shoulders as whores cling to customers;
 cf. 111, 140, 146-7.
 224-6 broken pate . . . damages If debtors resist arrest, sergeants will claim injury, pretend to need recuperation (keep their beds), and sue debtors for damages.
 224-5 broken pate cut head
 225 twenty marks A mark was an amount (not a coin), two-thirds of a pound;
 twenty marks was a considerable sum.
 228 Shoe Lane street running north from Fleet Street to Holborn
 229 Shoo expression of mild contempt, punning on Shoe Lane
 232 in scrivener's bands Scrivener could mean notary, or a broker who made loans for security; thus a debtor raising money to pay off debts might be further in debt to a scrivener.
 233 by these hands an oath, or a reference to herself as agent of rescue

 8.5 in her heart have her trust
 7 German watch the earliest portable timekeepers were made in Germany around 1500
 8 in English under English law
 9 sessions court session
 10 watch timepiece, punning on ward or parish officers who keep the watch at night
 12 gold chain worn by well-dressed gentlemen; perhaps an emblem of his office as Justice of the Peace
 13 a hundred marks £66 13s. 4d. (a mark was an amount worth two-thirds of a pound; see 1.91); an expensive item 15 headborough's parish police officer or constable; they carried lanterns on night watch
 16 court-cupboard sideboard with three tiers of open shelves, used to display silver dishes, known as 'plate'

20 That or something as weighty. What she leaves,
 Thou shalt come closely in and filch away,
 And all the weight upon her back I'll lay.

TRAPDOOR
 You cannot assure that, sir.

ALEXANDER No? What lets it?

TRAPDOOR
 Being a stout girl, perhaps she'll desire pressing;
 25 Then all the weight must lie upon her belly.

ALEXANDER
 Belly or back, I care not, so I've one.

TRAPDOOR
 You're of my mind for that, sir.

ALEXANDER
 Hang up my ruff band with the diamond at it;
 It may be she'll like that best.

30 TRAPDOOR It's well for her that she must have her choice—[Aside] he thinks nothing too good for her!—[To him] If you hold on this mind a little longer, it shall be the first work I do to turn thief myself: would do a man good to be hanged when he is so well provided for!

ALEXANDER
 35 So, well said! All hangs well; would she hung so too:
 The sight would please me more than all their glistenings.
 O that my mysteries to such straits should run,
 That I must rob myself to bless my son! Exeunt
Enter Sebastian with Mary Fitzallard like a page, and Moll [dressed as a man]

SEBASTIAN
 Thou hast done me a kind office, without touch
 40 Either of sin or shame: our loves are honest.

MOLL
 I'd scorn to make such shift to bring you together else.

SEBASTIAN
 Now have I time and opportunity
 Without all fear to bid thee welcome, love.
 (He kisses Mary)

MARY
 Never with more desire and harder venture.

MOLL
 How strange this shows, one man to kiss another. 45

SEBASTIAN
 I'd kiss such men to choose, Moll;
 Methinks a woman's lip tastes well in a doublet.

MOLL
 Many an old madam has the better fortune then,
 Whose breaths grew stale before the fashion came:
 If that will help 'em, as you think 'twill do, 50
 They'll learn in time to pluck on the hose too!

SEBASTIAN
 The older they wax, Moll. Troth, I speak seriously:
 As some have a conceit their drink tastes better
 In an outlandish cup than in our own,
 So methinks every kiss she gives me now 55
 In this strange form is worth a pair of two.
 Here we are safe, and furthest from the eye
 Of all suspicion: this is my father's chamber,
 Upon which floor he never steps till night.
 Here he mistrusts me not, nor I his coming; 60
 At mine own chamber he still pries unto me.
 My freedom is not there at mine own finding,
 Still checked and curbed; here he shall miss his purpose.

MOLL
 And what's your business, now you have your mind,
 sir?

SEBASTIAN
 At your great suit I promised you to come:
 65 I pitied her for name's sake, that a Moll
 Should be so crossed in love, when there's so many
 That owes nine lays apiece, and not so little.
 My tailor fitted her: how like you his work?

SEBASTIAN
 So well, no art can mend it for this purpose;
 70 But to thy wit and help we're chief in debt,
 And must live still beholding.

MOLL Any honest pity
 I'm willing to bestow upon poor ring-doves.

SEBASTIAN
 I'll offer no worse play.

MOLL Nay, and you should, sir,

21 closely secretly
 22 all the weight . . . lay I'll accuse her of stealing what you steal
 23 lets hinders
 24 stout robust, large pressing word play on pressing as peine forte et dure, a form of torture in which weights were loaded on the accused to force them to answer a charge, and with reference to the sexual act, the man
 'pressing on' the woman
 26 so I've one I don't care, so long as I incriminate her one way or the other
 28 ruff band small ruff; see 3.209, note 37 mysteries pun on secret practices, and technical skills proper to his craft, as in

'secrets of the trade'
 41 shift effort, with pun on shift as change of clothes (at Sebastian's request, she is disguised in order to pass as a male musician)
 46 to choose by choice
 48 madam derisive term for fashionable lady, implying affectation 49 Whose breaths . . . the fashion came who aged before male dress for women became fashionable
 50 that dressing as men
 52 The older they wax they'll still get older
 53 conceit fancy, notion
 54 outlandish foreign, strange
 56 pair of two set of two

65 great suit earnest pleading 66 for name's sake calling attention to the close conjunction of opposing images of women as whores and virgins (see I.O.I, note; I.73, note; and 5.4, note)
 68 owes nine lays meaning uncertain:
 owes probably means owns, and lays can mean either wagers (they won prizes in a contest) or lodgings (they keep as many as nine lodgings for meeting customers) 72 still forever
beholding beholden
 73 ring-doves wood-pigeons; figuratively, lovers
 74 play sport; sexual play

75 I should draw first and prove the quicker man!
 [Draws]
 SEBASTIAN
 Hold, there shall need no weapon at this meeting;
 But 'cause thou shalt not loose thy fury idle,
 [Takes down and gives her a viol]
 Here, take this viol: run upon the guts
 And end thy quarrel singing.
 MOLL Like a swan above bridge:
 80 For, look you, here's the bridge and here am I.
 SEBASTIAN Hold on, sweet Moll.
 MARY I've heard her much commended, sir, for one that was ne'er taught.
 MOLL I'm much beholding to 'em. Well, since you'll needs
 85 put us together, sir, I'll play my part as well as I can: it shall ne'er be said I came into a gentleman's chamber and let his instrument hang by the walls!
 SEBASTIAN Why well said, Moll, i'faith; it had been a shame for that gentleman then, that would have let 90 it hang still, and ne'er offered thee it.
 MOLL There it should have been still then for Moll, for though the world judge impudently of me, I ne'er came into that chamber yet where I took down the instrument myself.
 95 SEBASTIAN Pish, let 'em prate abroad! Thou'rt here where thou art known and loved; there be a thousand close dames that will call the viol an unmannerly instrument for a woman, and therefore talk broadly of thee, when you shall have them sit wider to a worse quality.

MOLL Push, I ever fall asleep and think not of 'em, sir; 100 and thus I dream.
 SEBASTIAN Prithee let's hear thy dream, Moll.
The Song
 MOLL
 I dream there is a mistress,
 And she lays out the money;
 She goes unto her sisters,
 She never comes at any. 105
Enter Sir Alexander behind them
 She says she went to th'Burse for patterns;
 You shall find her at St Kathern's,
 And comes home with never a penny.
 SEBASTIAN That's a free mistress, 'faith. 110
 ALEXANDER [aside] Ay, ay, ay, like her that sings it; one of thine own choosing.
 MOLL But shall I dream again?
 Here comes a wench will brave ye,
 Her courage was so great, 115
 She lay with one o' the navy,
 Her husband lying i' the Fleet.
 Yet oft with him she cavilled;
 I wonder what she ails;
 Her husband's ship lay gravelled 120
 When hers could hoise up sails.
 Yet she began, like all my foes,
 To call whore first; for so do those—
 A pox of all false tails!
 SEBASTIAN Marry, amen, say I! 125

75 draw first...man provoked by Sebastian's sexual innuendo, Moll draws her sword to defend her honour
 76 weapon playing on sword and on weapon as penis
 77 loose thy fury idle spend your energy (either aggressive, as in loosing an arrow, or sexual) to no purpose
 78 run upon the guts pun on running through with a sword, and drawing bow across strings (made of animal guts)
 79 swan above bridge alludes to the idea that swans sing just before they die; traditionally, swans drew Venus' chariot, and were also plentiful on the Thames around London bridge pun on bridge of viol (piece of wood over which strings are stretched) and bridge over a river
 85 put us together...play my part part in musical sense, but also implying a sexual encounter
 87 let his instrument hang by the walls viols were fashionable instruments, especially for men, and often hung on chamber walls; also, word play on instrument as penis
 88-90 it had been a shame...ne'er offered thee it intended as a compliment, implying that not to make sexual overtures to Moll would be the man's loss 92 judge impudently judge me (wrongly) to be forward, sexually aggressive, or, be impudent in judging me thus 93-4 took down the instrument myself approached a man sexually (Moll is again defending herself against a reputation for wanton behaviour)

 96 close secret, close-mouthed
 97 call the viol an unmannerly instrument punning on viol/vile/vial (penis), on unmannerly, and on instrument (see 87, 92-4): disapprove of women playing the viol/having sex with men
 98 talk broadly disapprove
 99 sit wider to a worse quality alluding to woman's position in playing the viol and in having sex: behave more unchastely
 101 dream in addition to normal sense, means make melody
 102 dream music, melody
 103 mistress a woman who governs a family, household, state or territory, or establishment of any kind, having control over and care of children, servants, dependents, etc.
 105 sisters ambiguously, female siblings; fellow members of a female religious order; fellow Christians who are female; fellow prostitutes; or, broadly, women who share her position in some sense
 106 never comes at doesn't accost anyone, like a prostitute; doesn't profit from anyone 107 th'Burse from Fr. bourse, purse: the original name for the Royal Exchange, a financial centre built in 1566 and surrounded by arcades for small shops selling fashionable wares appealing to women; more likely, refers to the New Exchange built in 1609 on the Strand, also with arcades and similar kinds of shops patterns models or specimens, perhaps of clothing or such fashionable items as were sold at the Burse, or decorative designs on china, carpets, wallpaper

 108 St Kathern's dockside district along the Thames in east London, from the Tower of London to Ratcliff, known for alehouses and taverns
 110 free generous, magnanimous; noble, gentle; may also imply sexual looseness
 114 brave challenge, defy 116 lay with had sex with; playing on 'lying' (117), staying, lodging at 117 the Fleet Fleet Prison, near the junction of Ludgate Hill and Fleet Street
 118 cavilled found fault with, quarrelled
 119 what she ails what ails her
 120 gravelled beached
 121 hoise up sails i.e., when she could manage, make progress; sometimes used of prostitutes attracting customers
 124 false tails derogatory for sexual partners who are false, fickle; punning on tales, to mean slander, false allegations

ALEXANDER [aside] So say I, too.
MOLL Hang up the viol now, sir; all this while I was in a dream: one shall lie rudely then, but being awake, I keep my legs together. A watch; what's a clock here?
130 ALEXANDER [aside] Now, now, she's trapped!
MOLL Between one and two; nay then, I care not. A watch and a musician are cousin-germans in one thing: they must both keep time well or there's no goodness in 'em.
The one else deserves to be dashed against a wall, and 135 t'other to have his brains knocked out with a fiddle-case.
What? A loose chain and a dangling diamond!
Here were a brave booty for an evening thief now;
There's many a younger brother would be glad
To look twice in at a window for't,
140 And wriggle in and out like an eel in a sandbag.
O, if men's secret youthful faults should judge 'em,
'Twould be the general'st execution
That e'er was seen in England!
There would be but few left to sing the ballads: there 145 would be so much work, most of our brokers would be chosen for hangmen—a good day for them!—they might renew their wardrobes of free cost then!
SEBASTIAN [to Mary]
This is the roaring wench must do us good.
MARY [to Sebastian]
No poison, sir, but serves us for some use,
Which is confirmed in her.
150 SEBASTIAN Peace, peace—
Foot, I did hear him sure, where'er he be.
MOLL
Who did you hear?
SEBASTIAN My father:
'Twas like a sigh of his—I must be wary.
ALEXANDER [aside]
No? Will't not be? Am I alone so wretched
155 That nothing takes? I'll put him to his plunge for't.
SEBASTIAN [aside to Moll and Mary]
Life, here he comes!—[Aloud to Moll] Sir, I beseech you take it.

Your way of teaching does so much content me,
I'll make it four pound; here's forty shillings, sir.
I think I name it right. [Aside to Moll] Help me, good
Moll.
—[Aloud] Forty in hand. [Offering money]
MOLL Sir, you shall pardon me, 160
I have more of the meanest scholar I can teach:
This pays me more than you have offered yet.
SEBASTIAN
At the next quarter,
When I receive the means my father 'lows me,
You shall have t'other forty.
ALEXANDER [aside] This were well now, 165
Were it to a man whose sorrows had blind eyes;
But mine behold his follies and untruths
With two clear glasses.
[He comes forward]
[To Sebastian] How now?
SEBASTIAN Sir?
ALEXANDER What's he there?
SEBASTIAN
You're come in good time, sir, I've a suit to you;
I'd crave your present kindness.
ALEXANDER What is he there? 170
SEBASTIAN A gentleman, a musician, sir: one of excellent fingering—
ALEXANDER Ay, I think so. [Aside] I wonder how they
'scaped her?
SEBASTIAN H'as the most delicate stroke, sir— 175
ALEXANDER A stroke indeed.—[Aside] I feel it at my heart!
SEBASTIAN Puts down all your famous musicians.
ALEXANDER Ay.—[Aside] A whore may put down a hundred of 'em!
SEBASTIAN Forty shillings is the agreement, sir, between 180 us; now, sir, my present means mounts but to half on't.
ALEXANDER And he stands upon the whole.
SEBASTIAN Ay indeed does he, sir.
ALEXANDER And will do still; he'll ne'er be in other tale. 185

128 rudely crudely, immodestly, with reference to 'dream' as music and the position of the viol player's legs 132 cousin-germans first cousins, punning on the 'German watch' (7)
137 brave splendid, fine looking 138 younger brother without paternal inheritance
140 eel . . . sandbag sinuously, nimbly
142 general'st execution i.e., more people would be condemned as criminals, and executed
144 ballads those that commemorated prisoners condemned to be hanged;
playing on execution, 142
145-7 brokers . . . free cost then hangmen traditionally received their victims' clothing; if hangmen were brokers (dealers in second hand clothing) they could profit greatly because they could replenish their stock without cost 149 No poison . . . some use proverbial; also an example of the Christian doctrine that everything in creation has a use 151 Foot abbreviation of mild oath, 'God's foot'

154 Will't not be? won't my scheme work?
155 takes takes effect put him to his plunge I'll bring this crisis to a head
161 have more of get more money from 168 What's he there? who is that man
there?
172-85 This series of doubles entendres referring to both musical and sexual playing could be read as a sequence:
'fingering' (172), 'delicate stroke' (175),
'puts down' (177), 'mounts to' (181),
'stands upon' (183), and 'tale' (185).
172 fingering in playing an instrument; in thieving; in sexual sense

173 they items displayed to tempt Moll:
watch, chain, diamond
174 'scaped escaped
175 delicate stroke in bowing the viol; in sexual act
176 stroke . . . at my heart paralytic stroke 177 Puts down excels; Sir Alexander takes it in a sexual sense
180 Forty shillings two pounds; could buy an inexpensive horse 181 mounts but to half only amounts to half, i.e., twenty shillings instead of the forty he offered in lines 158 and 160;
possibly playwrights' or scribe's error
183 stands upon insists on; playing on 'mounts' (181) in sexual sense 185 ne'er be in other tale will keep to the same story (as yours); with pun on tail
as sexual parts

SEBASTIAN Therefore I'd stop his mouth, sir, an I could.
 ALEXANDER Hum, true. There is no other way indeed.—
 [Aside] His folly hardens; shame must needs succeed.—
 [To Moll] Now sir, I understand you profess music.
 190 MOLL I am a poor servant to that liberal science, sir.
 ALEXANDER
 Where is it you teach?
 MOLL Right against Clifford's Inn.
 ALEXANDER Hum, that's a fit place for it; you have many scholars?
 MOLL And some of worth, whom I may call my masters.
 195 ALEXANDER [aside] Ay, true, a company of whoremas-ters!—[To Moll] You teach to sing, too?
 MOLL Marry, do I, sir.
 ALEXANDER I think you'll find an apt scholar of my son, especially for prick-song.
 200 MOLL I have much hope of him.
 ALEXANDER [aside] I am sorry for't, I have the less for that.
 [To Moll] You can play any lesson?
 MOLL At first sight, sir.
 205 ALEXANDER There's a thing called 'The Witch'—can you play that?
 MOLL I would be sorry any one should mend me in't.
 ALEXANDER
 Ay, I believe thee. [Aside] Thou has so bewitched my son,
 No care will mend the work that thou hast done.
 I have bethought myself, since my art fails,
 210 I'll make her policy the art to trap her.
 Here are four angels marked with holes in them,
 Fit for his cracked companions. Gold he will give her;
 These will I make induction to her ruin,
 And rid shame from my house, grief from my heart.
 —[To Sebastian] Here, son, in what you take content 215 and pleasure,

Want shall not curb you; [Gives money] pay the gentleman
 His latter half in gold.
 SEBASTIAN I thank you, sir.
 ALEXANDER [aside]
 O, may the operation on't end three:
 In her, life; shame in him; and grief in me. Exit
 SEBASTIAN
 Faith, thou shalt have 'em; 'tis my father's gift: 220
 Never was man beguiled with better shift.
 MOLL
 He that can take me for a male musician,
 I cannot choose but make him my instrument
 And play upon him! Exeunt

 Enter Mistress Gallipot and Mistress Openwork Sc. 9
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Is then that bird of yours, Master
 Goshawk, so wild?
 MISTRESS OPENWORK A goshawk, a puttock: all for prey!
 He angles for fish, but he loves flesh better.
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Is't possible his smooth face should have 5 wrinkles in't, and we not see them?
 MISTRESS OPENWORK Possible? Why, have not many handsome legs in silk stockings villainous splay feet for all their great roses?
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Troth, sirrah, thou sayst true. 10
 MISTRESS OPENWORK Didst never see an archer, as thou'st walked by Bunhill, look asquint when he drew his bow?
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Yes, when his arrows have flown toward Islington, his eyes have shot clean contrary towards Pimlico. 15
 MISTRESS OPENWORK For all the world, so does Master
 Goshawk double with me.
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT O fie upon him! If he double once, he's not for me.

186 stop his mouth pay him off
 190 liberal science In the seven liberal arts of the medieval curriculum, music was grouped with arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy in the four-part division called the quadrivium; see 7.91, note.
 191 Clifford's Inn the oldest of the Inns of Chancery, law schools that trained lawyers for the court of Chancery; located on Fleet Street between Chancery
 Lane and Fetter Street
 199 prick-song an accompanying melody written or 'pricked' down, as opposed to plainsong, which was improvised; with sexual sense
 204 'The Witch' possibly a contemporary ballad; implying that Moll has bewitched
 Sebastian (see 207)
 206 mend me excel me; correct me
 210 policy stratagem of posing as a musician
 211 angels gold coins worth ten shillings

(see 3.137, note)
marked with holes making them no longer current; thus if Moll tried to pass them, she would break the law
 212 cracked Metal was illicitly filed or 'clipped' from the edges of coins for profit; if clipping 'cracked' the circle around the sovereign's head embossed on the coin, it was no longer legal tender.
 'Cracked' coinage became a metaphor for flawed moral conduct and especially for women's 'cracked' sexual virtue.
 213 induction initial step, punning on sense of prologue to a play 222-4 He that can take me... play upon him Thus Middleton punningly alludes to several motifs in this scene: disguise, manipulation, and music.
 9.3 puttock kite; see 7.112, note
 8 silk stockings favoured by gallants because they showed off the leg better than woollen ones

splay feet flat feet that turn outwards 9 great roses ornamental knots of ribbon in the shape of a rose, tied to the shoe (see title-page woodcut of Moll)
 12 Bunhill street near Moorfields, marshy area north of city walls that, when laid out in walks in 1606, became popular for summer excursions; also used as training ground for city militia, and for duels asquint sideways
 14-15 Islington... Pimlico He aims toward Islington in the north-west (see 5.33, note) but he looks toward Pimlico, the inn in Hogsden to the north-east. The inn's name derives from a Roanoke Island place-name, one of a number of links connecting Hogsden with tobacco and Virginia (Coates).
 17 double with deceive, like the archer in 13-15

- 20 MISTRESS OPENWORK Because Goshawk goes in a shag-ruff band, with a face sticking up in't which shows like an agate set in a cramp-ring, he thinks I'm in love with him.
- MISTRESS GALLIPOT 'Las, I think he takes his mark amiss in thee.
- 25 MISTRESS OPENWORK He has, by often beating into me, made me believe that my husband kept a whore.
- MISTRESS GALLIPOT Very good.
- MISTRESS OPENWORK Swore to me that my husband this very morning went in a boat with a tilt over it to the Three Pigeons at Brentford, and his punk with him under his tilt!
- MISTRESS GALLIPOT That were wholesome!
- MISTRESS OPENWORK I believed it; fell a-swearing at him, cursing of harlots, made me ready to hoise up sail and be there as soon as he.
- 35 MISTRESS GALLIPOT So, so.
- MISTRESS OPENWORK And for that voyage, Goshawk comes hither incontinently; but sirrah, this water spaniel dives after no duck but me: his hope is having me at Brentford to make me cry quack!
- MISTRESS GALLIPOT Art sure of it?
- MISTRESS OPENWORK Sure of it? My poor innocent Openwork came in as I was poking my ruff; presently hit I him i'the teeth with the Three Pigeons. He forswore all, I up and opened all, and now stands he, in a shop hard by, like a musket on a rest, to hit Goshawk i'the eye when he comes to fetch me to the boat.
- 45 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Such another lame gelding offered to carry me through thick and thin—Laxton, sirrah—but I am rid of him now.
- MISTRESS OPENWORK Happy is the woman can be rid of 'em all! 'Las, what are your whisking gallants to our husbands, weigh 'em rightly, man for man?
- MISTRESS GALLIPOT Troth, mere shallow things.
- MISTRESS OPENWORK Idle, simple things: running heads; and yet—let 'em run over us never so fast—we shopkeepers, when all's done, are sure to have 'em in our purse-nets at length, and when they are in, Lord, what simple animals they are!
- MISTRESS OPENWORK Then they hang the head—
- MISTRESS GALLIPOT Then they droop—
- MISTRESS OPENWORK Then they write letters—
- MISTRESS GALLIPOT Then they cog—
- MISTRESS OPENWORK Then deal they underhand with us, and we must ingle with our husbands abed; and we must swear they are our cousins, and able to do us a pleasure at Court.
- MISTRESS GALLIPOT And yet when we have done our best, all's but put into a riven dish: we are but frumped at and labelled upon.
- MISTRESS OPENWORK O if it were the good Lord's will there were a law made, no citizen should trust any of 'em all!
- Enter Goshawk*
- MISTRESS GALLIPOT Hush sirrah! Goshawk flutters.
- GOSHAWK How now, are you ready?
- 75 MISTRESS OPENWORK Nay, are you ready? A little thing, you see, makes us ready.
- GOSHAWK Us? [To Mistress Openwork] Why, must she make one i' the voyage?
- MISTRESS OPENWORK O by any means: do I know how my husband will handle me?
- 80 GOSHAWK [aside] Foot, how shall I find water to keep these two mills going? Well, since you'll needs be clapped under hatches, if I sail not with you both till all split, hang me up at the mainyard and duck me. [Aside] It's but liquoring them both soundly, and then you shall see their cork heels fly up high, like two swans, when their tails are above water and their long necks under water,

20-1 shag-ruff band see 3.209-10, note
 21-2 with a face...cramp-ring an image of a small head surrounded by a large ruff; small figures carved in agate decorated seals, used for sealing letters with wax. Cramp rings, charms against illness, were distributed by the monarch on Good Friday.
 24 mark in archery, a target (continuing the archery image of 11-15); in falconry, a hawk's quarry or prey (playing on Goshawk's name)
 26 beating into me repeatedly telling me (with suggestion of a bird's beating wings)
 30 tilt awning over a boat
 31 Three Pigeons at Brentford inn which Laxton suggested for a rendezvous with Moll (see 3.288, note; 5.56, note)
 35 punk whore
 35 hoise up sail get going; compare 8.121, note
 39 incontinently immediately
 39-41 water spaniel...cry quack! cf. 'wild fowl', 6.244, note

44 poking my ruff when soaked in starch, ruffs were pleated by being folded over poking sticks, on which they dried
 44-5 hit I him i'the teeth aggressively accused him
 46-7 hard by near by 47 a musket on a rest the barrels of heavy, unwieldy muskets were set into forked poles driven into the ground
 53 whisking lively, smart
 55; 56 things playing on thing as penis
 56 running heads footmen, lackeys
 59 purse-nets bag-shaped nets the mouths of which were drawn together; used especially for catching rabbits (conies), hence referring to cony-catching (illicitly duping naive victims)
 61-2 hang the head...droop become dejected; playing on detumescence (to get limp)
 64 cog cheat; fawn, wheedle
 66 ingle caress with; cajole (to deceive husbands) 67-8 a pleasure at Court a favour from some court official; such claims were stratagems used by wives having affairs with gallants, to deceive husbands 70 all's...a riven dish riven means broken; i.e., our efforts have gone for nothing frumped at mocked

 76 little thing i.e., we're almost ready (with reference to thing as penis)
 81 handle treat (she claims to need Mistress Gallipot with her as protection)
 82 foot abbreviation of mild oath 'God's foot', with play on Fr. foutre, to have sex
 82-3 water...mills double entendre for having sex; water is figuratively semen
 83-4 clapped under hatches imprisoned on a ship; also refers to having sex
 84 split go to pieces; shipwreck
 85 hang me up...duck me traditional sailors' punishment
 86 liquoring...soundly making them drunk
 87 cork heels fashionable, and associated with women's lightness (wantonness)
 87-9 like two swans...diving to catch gudgeons pictures the women in flagrant sexual postures, like swans diving for small fish

90 diving to catch gudgeons. [To them] Come, come! Oars stand ready; the tide's with us. On with those false faces. Blow winds, and thou shalt take thy husband casting out his net to catch fresh salmon at Brentford.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT I believe you'll eat of a cod's-head of your own dressing before you reach halfway thither.
[They put on masks]

95 GOSHAWK So, so, follow close. Pin as you go.
Enter Laxton muffled

LAXTON Do you hear? [Talks apart with Mistress Gallipot]

MISTRESS GALLIPOT Yes, I thank my ears.

LAXTON I must have a bout with your potheary-ship.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT At what weapon?

100 LAXTON I must speak with you.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT No!

LAXTON No? You shall!

MISTRESS GALLIPOT Shall? Away soused sturgeon, half fish, half flesh!

105 LAXTON Faith, gib, are you spitting? I'll cut your tail, puss-cat, for this.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT 'Las poor Laxton, I think thy tail's cut already! Your worst!

LAXTON If I do not— Exit

GOSHAWK
110 Come, ha' you done?
Enter Master Openwork
[To Mistress Openwork] 'Sfoot, Rosamond, your husband!

OPENWORK
How now? Sweet Master Goshawk! None more welcome!
I have wanted your embracements. When friends meet,
The music of the spheres sounds not more sweet 115 Than does their conference. Who is this? Rosamond? Wife?—[To Mistress Gallipot] How now, sister?

GOSHAWK Silence, if you love me!

OPENWORK
Why masked?

90 false faces Masks made of velvet or other silk were worn by women of fashion to protect the complexion from the sun, to shield them from public gaze, or to conceal their identity.

92 fresh salmon figuratively, young whores

93 cod's-head fool's head, meaning that his plan will fail and expose him for a fool

95 Pin possibly, put on your masks

95.1 muffled see 6.211.1, note

98 bout round of fighting, with sexual implication

103 soused pickled, or soaked in liquor; an insult

103-4 half fish, half flesh proverbial for neither one thing nor another, referring to his impotence; if he lacks the sexual capacity of a man, he is assumed to be womanish

105 gib term for cat, especially male or castrated cat, used for woman as insult

107-8 tail's cut already alluding to his impotence

108 Your worst! do your worst (a challenge)

113 wanted missed

114 The music of the spheres In the Ptolemaic system, the planets, sun, moon, and fixed stars moved in concentric circles around the earth, creating friction which made music normally inaudible to human ears.

118 a-mumming Mummings, amateur performances for holiday festivities, were mimed; Mistress Openwork is telling her husband to be silent.

125-7 Many bad faces . . . privilege current Bad women (wicked, unchaste) pass for good because they wear expensive masks, making people think something valuable lies behind the mask.

127-8 as caves . . . beauties' graves Just as hoarding gold is morally wrong, so is hiding beauty behind a mask.

131 beldame hag

133 sprites spirits

135 stuff cloth of lesser quality

136 owl-light Dim light; drapers and sempsters were said to deceive customers by displaying wares in badly-lit shops.

137 strike this sail possibly, remove your mask, and prepare for trouble

139 in my brows Referring to a frown; Openwork pretends to think she means horns, conventional symbol of a cuckold.

141 flags . . . advanced Playhouses flew flags when open for performance.
comedy Openwork associates Goshawk's deception with play-acting.

MISTRESS OPENWORK
Does a mask grieve you, sir?

OPENWORK
It does.

MISTRESS OPENWORK
Then you're best get you a-mumming.

GOSHAWK [aside to Mistress Openwork]
'Sfoot, you'll spoil all!

MISTRESS GALLIPOT
May not we cover our bare faces with masks
As well as you cover your bald heads with hats? 120

OPENWORK
No masks; why, they're thieves to beauty, that rob eyes
Of admiration in which true love lies.
Why are masks worn? Why good? Or why desired?
Unless by their gay covers wits are fired
To read the vil'st looks. Many bad faces— 125
Because rich gems are treasured up in cases—
Pass by their privilege current; but as caves
Damn misers' gold, so masks are beauties' graves.
Men ne'er meet women with such muffled eyes,
But they curse her that first did masks devise, 130
And swear it was some beldame. Come, off with't.

MISTRESS OPENWORK
I will not!

OPENWORK
Good faces, masked, are jewels kept by sprites.
Hide none but bad ones, for they poison men's sights;
Show them as shopkeepers do their broidered stuff: 135
By owl-light; fine wares cannot be open enough.
Prithee, sweet Rose, come strike this sail.

MISTRESS OPENWORK
Sail?

OPENWORK
Ha?

Yes, wife, strike sail, for storms are in thine eyes.

MISTRESS OPENWORK
They're here, sir, in my brows, if any rise.

OPENWORK
Ha, brows? What says she, friend? Pray tell me why 140
Your two flags were advanced: the comedy?

- Come, what's the comedy?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT Westward Ho.
OPENWORK How?
MISTRESS OPENWORK
'Tis Westward Ho, she says.
GOSHAWK Are you both mad?
MISTRESS OPENWORK
Is't market day at Brentford, and your ware
Not sent up yet?
145 OPENWORK What market day? What ware?
MISTRESS OPENWORK A pie with three pigeons in't—'tis drawn and stays your cutting up.
GOSHAWK As you regard my credit—
OPENWORK Art mad?
150 MISTRESS OPENWORK Yes, lecherous goat! Baboon!
OPENWORK Baboon? Then toss me in a blanket.
MISTRESS OPENWORK [to Mistress Gallipot] Do I it well?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT [to Mistress Openwork] Rarely!
GOSHAWK [to Openwork]
Belike, sir, she's not well; best leave her.
OPENWORK No,
155 I'll stand the storm now, how fierce soe'er it blow.
MISTRESS OPENWORK
Did I for this lose all my friends? Refuse
Rich hopes and golden fortunes to be made
A stale to a common whore?
OPENWORK This does amaze me.
MISTRESS OPENWORK
O God, O God! Feed at reversion now?
A strumpet's leaving?
160 OPENWORK Rosamond!
GOSHAWK [aside] I sweat; would I lay in Cold Harbour.
MISTRESS OPENWORK Thou hast struck ten thousand daggers through my heart!
OPENWORK Not I, by heaven, sweet wife.
165 MISTRESS OPENWORK Go, devil, go! That which thou swear'st by, damns thee!
- GOSHAWK [aside to Mistress Openwork] 'S heart, will you undo me?
MISTRESS OPENWORK [to Openwork]
Why stay you here? The star by which you sail
Shines yonder above Chelsea; you lose your shore. 170
If this moon light you, seek out your light whore.
OPENWORK
Ha?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT
Push! Your western pug!
GOSHAWK Zounds, now hell roars!
MISTRESS OPENWORK
With whom you tilted in a pair of oars
This very morning.
OPENWORK Oars?
MISTRESS OPENWORK At Brentford, sir!
OPENWORK
Rack not my patience. Master Goshawk,
Some slave has buzzed this into her, has he not?—
I run a-tilt in Brentford with a woman?
'Tis a lie!
What old bawd tells thee this? 'Sdeath, 'tis a lie!
MISTRESS OPENWORK
'Tis one to thy face shall justify 175
All that I speak.
OPENWORK Ud' soul, do but name that rascal!
MISTRESS OPENWORK
No, sir, I will not.
GOSHAWK [aside] Keep thee there, girl. [To them] Then!
OPENWORK [to Mistress Gallipot]
Sister, know you this varlet?
MISTRESS GALLIPOT Yes.
OPENWORK Swear true;
Is there a rogue so low damned? A second Judas?
A common hangman? Cutting a man's throat? 185
Does it to his face? Bite me behind my back?
A cur-dog? Swear if you know this hell-hound!

142 Westward Ho cry of boatmen carrying passengers across the Thames; also title of a comedy by Dekker and Webster (1604)

144-5 Is't market day . . . up yet likens the prostitutes supposedly waiting for her husband at Brentford, a market town located on the trade route from London in the south-west of England, to goods for sale (see 3.288, note)

146 A pie with three pigeons in't playing on the Three Pigeons Inn, the supposed site of his meeting; pigeons, like ducks (see 38-41) and swans (see 86-8), are terms for prostitutes

147 stays waits for cutting up carving, as of roasted fowl, with sexual implication

150 goat! Baboon! both regarded as highly lustful

151 toss me in a blanket humiliating punishment

152 Do I it well? is my act convincing?

156 friends relatives (alluding to her social rank, supposedly higher than her husband's; see 3.12-14, 343-4, 348-50)

158 stale lover whose fidelity is mocked to amuse her rival ('common whore'); decoy

159-60 Feed at reversion . . . leaving Why should I take a whore's leftovers (i.e., Openwork)?

161 Cold Harbour neighbourhood near London Bridge known as refuge for the poor and sanctuary for debtors hiding from arrest; also, pun on 'Cold', as remedy for sweating

167 'S heart abbreviation for 'God's heart', mild oath

170 Chelsea west from London, on the way to Brentford, where Openwork supposedly will meet a prostitute

171 light . . . light pun on light as illumination and as fickle, wanton
172 western pug bargeman going westward from London; whore in Brentford, west of London

173 tilted pun on tilting as jousting with lances, as the sexual act, and as the boat covered with a tilt (see 30, note)

pair of oars boat rowed by two men

181 Ud' soul corruption of 'God bless my soul'

184 Judas from Judas Iscariot, the disciple who betrayed Christ; a betrayer who seems a friend

186 Bite . . . back backbiter; one who vilifies another behind his back

187 cur-dog mongrel; term of contempt hell-hound allusion to Cerberus, watchdog of hell (see 5.25, note)

Scene 9

The Roaring Girl.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT
 In truth I do. 215
 OPENWORK His name?
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Not for the world,
 To have you to stab him.
 GOSHAWK [aside] O brave girls: worth gold!
 OPENWORK
 A word, honest Master Goshawk.
Draws out his sword
 190 GOSHAWK What do you mean, sir?
 OPENWORK
 Keep off, and if the devil can give a name
 To this new fury, holla it through my ear,
 Or wrap it up in some hid character.
 I'll ride to Oxford and watch out mine eyes,
 195 But I'll hear the Brazen Head speak; or else
 Show me but one hair of his head or beard,
 That I may sample it. If the fiend I meet
 In mine own house, I'll kill him—the street,
 Or at the church door—there, 'cause he seeks to untie
 200 The knot God fastens, he deserves most to die!
 MISTRESS OPENWORK
 My husband titles him!
 OPENWORK Master Goshawk, pray, sir,
 Swear to me that you know him or know him not,
 Who makes me at Brentford to take up a petticoat
 Besides my wife's.
 GOSHAWK By heaven, that man I know not.
 MISTRESS OPENWORK
 Come, come, you lie!
 205 GOSHAWK Will you not have all out?
 —[To Openwork] By heaven, I know no man beneath the moon
 Should do you wrong, but if I had his name,
 I'd print it in text letters.
 MISTRESS OPENWORK Print thine own then;
 Didst not thou swear to me he kept his whore?
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT
 210 And that in sinful Brentford they would commit
 That which our lips did water at, sir? Ha?
 MISTRESS OPENWORK
 Thou spider, that hast woven thy cunning web
 In mine own house t'ensnare me: hast not thou

Sucked nourishment even underneath this roof
 And turned it all to poison, spitting it
 On thy friend's face, my husband—he as 'twere, sleeping—
 Only to leave him ugly to mine eyes,
 That they might glance on thee?
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Speak, are these lies?
 GOSHAWK
 Mine own shame me confounds.
 MISTRESS OPENWORK No more, he's stung.
 Who'd think that in one body there could dwell
 220 Deformity and beauty, heaven and hell?
 Goodness, I see, is but outside. We all set
 In rings of gold, stones that be counterfeit:
 I thought you none.
 GOSHAWK Pardon me.
 OPENWORK Truth, I do.
 This blemish grows in nature, not in you;
 225 For man's creation stick even moles in scorn
 On fairest cheeks. Wife, nothing is perfect born.
 MISTRESS OPENWORK
 I thought you had been born perfect.
 OPENWORK
 What's this whole world but a gilt rotten pill?
 For at the heart lies the old core still.
 230 I'll tell you, Master Goshawk, ay, in your eye
 I have seen wanton fire; and then to try
 The soundness of my judgement, I told you
 I kept a whore, made you believe 'twas true,
 Only to feel how your pulse beat, but find 235 The world can hardly yield a perfect friend.
 Come, come, a trick of youth, and 'tis forgiven;
 This rub put by, our love shall run more even.
 MISTRESS OPENWORK
 You'll deal upon men's wives no more?
 GOSHAWK No. You teach me
 A trick for that!
 MISTRESS OPENWORK
 Troth, do not; they'll o'erreach thee. 240
 OPENWORK
 Make my house yours, sir, still.
 GOSHAWK No.

192 this new fury Openwork imagines his wife as one of the furies, Greco-Roman goddesses of vengeance who punished those who committed certain serious crimes.
 holla shout
 193 hid character secret code
 194 watch out mine eyes stay awake watching, no matter how long
 195 Brazen Head alluding to the legendary magical bronze head of Brasenose College, Oxford; by making it speak, Friar Bacon tried to wall England with brass, but missed hearing it and failed

197 the fiend the one who has supposedly lied about him
 200 The knot God fastens the marital bond; compare 1.58–60
 201 titles calls by the right name
 203 take up a petticoat have sex
 208 text letters capital letters
 212–15 Thou spider . . . poison Spiders were associated with craftiness and treachery; cf. 2.239–40.
 226 moles small pieces of velvet or silk cut in decorative shapes and attached to women's faces to cover blemishes or call attention to an attractive feature 229 gilt rotten pill some sweetmeats (candies) were decorated with an edible gold covering

 237 trick habit; deception; prank
 238 rub obstacle; term in the game of bowls for touch of a bowl against others or unevenness in its passage put by set aside
 239 deal upon work on, exploit
 239–40 teach me | A trick i.e., your own trick has taught me not to 240 o'erreach overpower

OPENWORK I say you shall:
 Seeing, thus besieged, it holds out, 'twill never fall!
Enter Master Gallipot, and Greenwit like a summer; Laxton muffled, aloof off

OMNES How now?
 GALLIPOT [to Greenwit] With me, sir?
 245 GREENWIT You, sir. I have gone snuffling up and down by your door this hour to watch for you.
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT What's the matter, husband?
 GREENWIT I have caught a cold in my head, sir, by sitting up late in the Rose Tavern, but I hope you understand 250 my speech.
 GALLIPOT So, sir.
 GREENWIT I cite you by the name of Hippocrates Gallipot, and you by the name of Prudence Gallipot, to appear upon Crastino—do you see—Crastino Sancti Dunstani, 255 this Easter Term, in Bow Church.
 GALLIPOT Where, sir? What says he?
 GREENWIT Bow—Bow Church, to answer to a libel of precontract on the part and behalf of the said Prudence and another; you're best, sir, take a copy of the citation:
 260 'tis but twelvenpence.
 OMNES A citation?
 GALLIPOT You pocky-nosed rascal, what slave fees you to
 this?
 LAXTON Slave? [Comes forward; aside to Goshawk] I ha'
 265 nothing to do with you, do you hear, sir?
 GOSHAWK [aside to Laxton] Laxton, is't not? What vagary is this?
 GALLIPOT
 Trust me, I thought, sir, this storm long ago
 Had been full laid, when—if you be remembered—
 270 I paid you the last fifteen pound, besides
 The thirty you had first—for then you swore—
 LAXTON
 Tush, tush, sir, oaths—
 Truth, yet I'm loath to vex you.—Tell you what:

Make up the money I had an hundred pound,
 And take your bellyful of her.
 GALLIPOT An hundred pound? 275
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT
 What, a hundred pound? He gets none!
 What a hundred pound?
 GALLIPOT
 Sweet Prue, be calm; the gentleman offers thus:
 If I will make the moneys that are past
 A hundred pound, he will discharge all courts 280
 And give his bond never to vex us more.
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT
 A hundred pound? 'Las, take, sir, but threescore.
 —[Aside to Laxton] Do you seek my undoing?
 LAXTON I'll not bate one sixpence.
 —[Aside to Mistress Gallipot] I'll maul you, puss, for spitting.
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Do thy worst!
 —[Loud] Will fourscore stop thy mouth?
 LAXTON No.
 MISTRESS GALLIPOT You're a slave! 285
 Thou cheat; I'll now tear money from thy throat.
 Husband, lay hold on yonder tawny-coat.
 GREENWIT
 Nay, gentlemen, seeing your women are so hot,
 I must lose my hair in their company, I see.
 [Removes hair-piece]
 MISTRESS OPENWORK
 His hair sheds off, and yet he speaks not so much 290
 In the nose as he did before.
 GOSHAWK He has had
 The better surgeon. Master Greenwit,
 Is your wit so raw as to play no better
 A part than a summer's?
 GALLIPOT I pray, who plays
 295 A Knack to Know an Honest Man in this company?

242.2 summer summoner; officer of church court who summoned people to appear there Laxton muffled see 6.211, note aloof off at a distance
 245 snuffling speaking through the nose; symptom of venereal disease associated with summoners
 247 What's... husband? Mistress Gallipot addresses her husband, but Greenwit answers
 252 Hippocrates a Greek physician born about 460 BC and considered the founder of medicine; ironically appropriate for an apothecary
 254 Crastino...Dunstani the day after St Dunstan's Day, which was 19 May: 20 May 255 Easter Term session of church court beginning the fifteenth day after Easter and ending after Ascension Day
Bow Church church of St Mary le

Bow, built in the reign of William the Conqueror (1066-1087), named for its bow-shaped stone arches, the first in London; the church court held here was called the Court of Arches
 257-8 libel of precontract charge of marrying someone who was already betrothed to another by a precontract; see 1.56-8, note
 259 citation summons (legal document summoning someone to appear in court)
 262 pocky-nosed pocks or pustules were a symptom of venereal disease, and commonly attacked the nose; see 245, note fees you to is paying you for 266 vagary prank
 269 laid subsided
 270 last fifteen pound Not dramatized; Laxton has evidently continued to bilk Gallipot since 6.259-60.
 274 Make up...an hundred pound bring the total sum to a hundred pounds

 280 discharge all courts Gallipot thinks Laxton threatens other legal actions besides the present one.
 281 give his bond promise
 283 bate abate; subtract
 285 stop thy mouth satisfy you
 286 tear money from thy throat implies Laxton is lying; compare 5.89-90, note
 287 tawny-coat Greenwit, who wears a summoner's tawny-coloured livery
 288 hot angry; implying sexual eagerness; alludes to burning sensations of syphilis
 289 lose my hair playing on 'hot', 288, note
 293 wit so raw playing on Greenwit's name
 295 A Knack to Know an Honest Man Anonymous comedy of 1594 in which a character disguises himself to test the honesty of those he meets; as the action proceeds, the title becomes a catch phrase.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT
 Dear husband, pardon me, I did dissemble,
 Told thee I was his precontracted wife—
 When letters came from him for thirty pound,
 I had no shift but that.

GALLIPOT A very clean shift,
 But able to make me lousy.—On.

300 MISTRESS GALLIPOT Husband, I plucked—
 When he had tempted me to think well of him—
 Gilt feathers from thy wings, to make him fly
 More lofty.

GALLIPOT O' the top of you, wife. On.

MISTRESS GALLIPOT
 He, having wasted them, comes now for more,
 305 Using me as a ruffian doth his whore,
 Whose sin keeps him in breath. By heaven, I vow,
 Thy bed he never wronged more than he does now.

GALLIPOT
 My bed? Ha, ha, like enough! A shop-board will serve
 To have a cuckold's coat cut out upon;
 310 Of that we'll talk hereafter.—[to Laxton] You're a villain!

LAXTON
 Hear me but speak, sir, you shall find me none.

OMNES
 Pray, sir, be patient and hear him.

GALLIPOT I am
 Muzzled for biting, sir; use me how you will.

LAXTON
 The first hour that your wife was in my eye,
 315 Myself with other gentlemen sitting by
 In your shop tasting smoke, and speech being used
 That men who have fairest wives are most abused
 And hardly 'scaped the horn, your wife maintained
 That only such spots in city dames were stained 320 Justly, but by men's slanders; for her own part,
 She vowed that you had so much of her heart,
 No man by all his wit, by any wife
 Never so fine spun, should yourself beguile
 Of what in her was yours.

GALLIPOT Yet Prue, 'tis well;
 Play out your game at Irish, sir. Who wins? 325

MISTRESS OPENWORK
 The trial is when she comes to bearing.

LAXTON
 I scorned one woman, thus, should brave all men,
 And—which more vext me—a she-citizen.
 Therefore I laid siege to her: out she held,
 330 Gave many a brave repulse, and me compelled
 With shame to sound retreat to my hot lust.
 Then seeing all base desires raked up in dust,
 And that to tempt her modest ears I swore
 Ne'er to presume again, she said her eye
 335 Would ever give me welcome honestly;
 And—since I was a gentleman—if it run low,
 She would my state relieve, not to o'erthrow
 Your own and hers; did so. Then seeing I wrought
 Upon her meekness, me she set at naught;
 340 And yet to try if I could turn that tide,
 You see what stream I strove with. But sir, I swear
 By heaven and by those hopes men lay up there,
 I neither have nor had a base intent
 To wrong your bed. What's done is merriment;
 345 Your gold I pay back with this interest:
 When I had most power to do't, I wronged you least.

GALLIPOT
 If this no gullery be, sir—

OMNES No, no, on my life!

GALLIPOT
 Then, sir, I am beholden—not to you, wife—
 But Master Laxton, to your want of doing ill,
 350 Which it seems you have not. Gentlemen,
 Tarry and dine here all.

OPENWORK Brother, we have a jest
 As good as yours to furnish out a feast.

GALLIPOT
 We'll crown our table with it.—Wife, brag no more
 Of holding out: who most brags is most whore.

Exeunt

299 shift Mistress Gallipot refers to her stratagem; her husband takes the word to mean both undergarment and change.
 303 O' the top of you alluding to the sexual act
 305 ruffian pimp
 306 keeps him in breath supports him
 308-9 A shop-board . . . cut out upon A shopboard is a counter for displaying goods; a man can be made a cuckold in his own shop if his wife has sex with another man on the shopboard.
 313 Muzzled for biting I will be quiet and listen to you.
 318 hardly 'scaped the horn can't really avoid being cuckolded

319-20 only such spots . . . men's slanders city wives should be censured (stained) for unchastity (spots) only if it isn't men's slanders that incriminate them
 325 Irish board game similar to backgammon, played with dice and counters
 326 bearing term in both Irish and backgammon for removing pieces at end of game; playing on childbearing 327 scorned objected that brave defy
 329-31 laid siege . . . lust military metaphors for his aggressive sexual pursuit of her 332 raked up in dust like a fire covered with ashes to keep it from burning actively 334-5 her eye . . . honestly She would befriend me but remain chaste.

 336-8 if it run low . . . | Your own and hers If my money (state) ran low, she would pay me not to ruin (o'erthrow) your marriage by talking about our relationship.
 338 did so she paid me
 338-9 wrought | Upon her meekness worked on her compassion
 339 set at naught repulsed, rejected
 340 to try . . . tide to see if I could make her change
 347 gullery trickery
 351 jest in the sense of Fr. geste, tale of notable deeds, exploits
 352 furnish out fill out; embellish

Sc. 10

Enter Jack Dapper, Moll [dressed as a man], Sir
Beauteous Ganymede, and Sir Thomas Long

JACK DAPPER But prithee, Master Captain Jack, be plain and perspicuous with me: was it your Meg of Westminster's courage that rescued me from the Poultry puttocks indeed?

5 MOLL The valour of my wit, I ensure you, sir, fetched you off bravely when you were i' the forlorn hope among those desperates. Sir Beau-teous Ganymede here and Sir Thomas Long heard that cuckoo—my man Trapdoor—sing the note of your ransom from captivity.

10 SIR BEAUTEOUS Uds-so, Moll, where's that Trapdoor?

MOLL Hanged, I think, by this time; a justice in this town, that speaks nothing but 'Make a mittimus, away with him to Newgate', used that rogue like a firework to run upon a line betwixt him and me.

15 OMNES How, how?

MOLL Marry, to lay trains of villainy to blow up my life: I smelt the powder, spied what linstock gave fire to shoot against the poor captain of the galley-foist, and away slid I my man like a shovel-board shilling. He struts up and down the suburbs, I think, and eats up whores, feeds upon a bawd's garbage.

SIR THOMAS Sirrah Jack Dapper—

JACK DAPPER What sayst, Tom Long?

25 SIR THOMAS Thou hadst a sweet-faced boy, hail-fellow with thee to your little Gull: how is he spent?

JACK DAPPER Troth, I whistled the poor little buzzard off
o' my fist because when he waited upon me at the ordinaries, the gallants hit me i' the teeth still and said

I looked like a painted alderman's tomb, and the boy at my elbow, like a death's head. Sirrah Jack, Moll.

MOLL What says my little Dapper?

SIR BEAUTEOUS Come, come, walk and talk, walk and talk.

JACK DAPPER Moll and I'll be i' the midst.

MOLL These knights shall have squire's places, belike then.
Well, Dapper, what say you?

JACK DAPPER Sirrah Captain Mad Mary, the gull, my own father—Dapper, Sir Davy—laid these London boot-halers, the catchpoles, in ambush to set upon me.

OMNES Your father? Away, Jack!

JACK DAPPER By the tassels of this handkerchief, 'tis true; and what was his warlike stratagem, think you? He thought, because a wicker cage tames a nightingale, a lowly prison could make an ass of me.

OMNES A nasty plot!

JACK DAPPER Ay: as though a counter, which is a park in which all the wild beasts of the city run head by head, could tame me!

Enter the Lord Noland

MOLL Yonder comes my Lord Noland.

OMNES Save you, my lord.

LORD NOLAND Well met, gentlemen all: good Sir Beau-teous
Ganymede, Sir Thomas Long—and how does Master Dapper?

JACK DAPPER Thanks, my lord.

MOLL No tobacco, my lord?

LORD NOLAND No, faith, Jack.

10.0.2 Ganymede Jove's beloved cupbearer, renowned for his boyish beauty; in the Renaissance, a term for a lover of the same sex

Thomas Long conventional name for carrier of letters, goods, parcels

1 Jack generic name for a man; apparently used for Moll when she wears male clothing

2–3 Meg of Westminster's courage alludes to the legendary figure whose biography is a source for this play; see Introduction

3 Poultry puttocks officers of debtors' prison called the Poultry; for Poultry, see 7.7.8, note; for puttocks, see 7.11.2, note

5–6 fetched you off rescued you

6 i' the forlorn hope in military language, soldiers chosen to begin the attack; figuratively, persons in a desperate condition

8 cuckoo The cuckoo, a migratory bird, arrives in Britain in April and is considered a herald of spring; Trapdoor is first to suspect the sergeants who arrest Jack Dapper (see 7.191–5).

10 Uds-so corruption of 'God save my soul'

11 a justice Sir Alexander

12–13 Make a mittimus . . . Newgate Proverbial expression for a severe magistrate. Named for its first word mittimus (Lat. = send), a mittimus is a legal warrant to commit someone to jail; Newgate, London's main prison, was used for felons and debtors.

13–14 firework . . . a line a line of gunpowder used as a fuse to set off explosives

16 trains . . . to blow up my life compares Trapdoor, who was planted by Sir Alexander to trap Moll into stealing, with a line of gunpowder used to blow her up (see 13)

16–19 I smelt the powder . . . shilling not dramatized; Moll realized that Trapdoor was tricking her, and dismissed him

17 linstock staff with a forked head for holding the match used to light gunpowder in a musket

18 captain of the galley-foist derogatory terms; a galley-foist was a barge used by the Lord Mayor of London for state occasions

19 shovel-board shilling disk used in playing shuffle-board

20 eats up devastates; takes over (as a pimp); has sex with

21 garbage whores that pimps have abandoned; play on Ralph, Trapdoor's first name, and raff, trash (see 2.189.1, note)

24 hail-fellow on intimate terms

25 spent employed

26–7 whistled . . . o' my fist released (falconry term); dismissed

28 hit me i' the teeth accused, insulted me

29–30 painted alderman's tomb . . . death's head A coloured effigy of the deceased was placed on an alderman's tomb, along with a death's head as a memento mori (heads of guilds were magistrates in city government, next in dignity to the mayor).

34 squire's places Reversing the ceremonial position of a knight between two squires, Moll and Dapper walk in the middle with Sir Beau-teous and Lord Noland flanking them.

37–8 boot-halers marauding soldiers; highwaymen

40 tassels . . . handkerchief handkerchiefs about four inches square with buttons or tassels at each corner were worn, folded, in hats

45 counter debtors' prison; see 7.7.8, note
47.1 Noland derived from 'know' or 'noll' (head) and 'land', suggesting power and authority

54 No tobacco possibly alludes to James I's well-known opposition to tobacco, as expressed in A Counterblaste to Tobacco (1604)

- JACK DAPPER My Lord Noland, will you go to Pimlico with us? We are making a boon voyage to that nappy land of spice cakes.
- LORD NOLAND Here's such a merry ging, I could find in my heart to sail to the World's End with such company. Come gentlemen, let's on.
- JACK DAPPER Here's most amorous weather, my lord.
OMNES Amorous weather? (They walk)
- JACK DAPPER Is not amorous a good word?
Enter Trapdoor like a poor soldier with a patch o'er one eye, and Tearcat with him, all tatters
- TRAPDOOR Shall we set upon the infantry, these troops of foot? Zounds, yonder comes Moll, my whorish master and mistress; would I had her kidneys between my teeth!
- TEARCAT I had rather have a cow-heel.
- TRAPDOOR Zounds, I am so patched up, she cannot discover me. We'll on.
- TEARCAT Coraggio, then.
- TRAPDOOR Good your honours and worships, enlarge the ears of commiseration, and let the sound of a hoarse military organ-pipe penetrate your pitiful bowels to extract out of them so many small drops of silver as may give a hard straw-bed lodging to a couple of maimed soldiers.
- JACK DAPPER Where are you maimed?
- TEARCAT In both our nether limbs.
- MOLL Come, come, Dapper, let's give 'em something; 'las poor men, what money have you? By my troth, I love a soldier with my soul.
- SIR BEAUTEOUS Stay, stay, where have you served?
- SIR THOMAS In any part of the Low Countries?
- TRAPDOOR Not in the Low Countries, if it please your manhood, but in Hungary against the Turk at the siege of Belgrade.
- LORD NOLAND Who served there with you, sirrah?
- TRAPDOOR Many Hungarians, Moldavians, Valachians, and Transylvanians, with some Slavonians; and retiring home, sir, the Venetian galleys took us prisoners, yet freed us, and suffered us to beg up and down the country.
- JACK DAPPER You have ambled all over Italy then?
- TRAPDOOR O sir, from Venice to Roma, Vecchia, Bonogna, Romagna, Bologna, Modena, Piacenza, and Toscana with all her cities, as Pistoia, Volterra, Montepulciano, Arezzo, with the Siennese and diverse others.
- MOLL Mere rogues, put spurs to 'em once more.
- JACK DAPPER Thou lookest like a strange creature—a fat butter-box—yet speakest English. What art thou?
- TEARCAT Ick, mine here. Ick bin den ruffling Tearcat, den brave soldado. Ick bin dorick all Dutchlant gueresen. Der shellum das meere ine beasa, ine woert gaeb; Ick slaag um stroakes on tom cop, dastick den hundred touzun divel halle; frollick, mine here.
- SIR BEAUTEOUS Here, here—[About to give money] let's be rid of their jobbering.
- MOLL Not a cross, Sir Beauteous. You base rogues, I have taken measure of you better then a tailor can, and I'll fit you as you—monster with one eye—have fitted me.
- TRAPDOOR Your worship will not abuse a soldier!
- MOLL Soldier?—Thou deservest to be hanged up by that tongue which dishonours so noble a profession.—Soldier, you skeldering varlet?—Hold, stand, there should be a trapdoor hereabouts.

56 Pimlico an inn and place of entertainment at Hogsden

57 boon voyage prosperous, happy trip; cf. Fr. bon voyage
nappy foaming, heady (used of ale); refers to strong ale for which Pimlico was famed

58 spice cakes eaten with ale

59 ging gang

60 World's End a long journey, as far as one could go; several London taverns were so named

62 amorous malapropism for amiable, as suggested by responses in 63-4

64.2 Tearcat... all tatters "To tear a cat" means to rant like a swaggering hero; he is wearing ragged clothes.

66-7 whorish master and mistress Like Sir Alexander, he confounds the prostitute's supposed lust with the transgression of gender difference attributed to Moll's dress; see 2.1.32-3, 4.1.57-62.

69 cow-heel calf's foot jelly, a jellied broth used as a restorative

72 Coraggio Italian; have courage

75 bowels considered the source of pity, compassion

85 Low Countries England fought the forces of Spain, which occupied the present Holland and Belgium, from 1585 to 1587.

87-8 in Hungary... Belgrade Belgrade, capital of Serbia, was seized from Hungarian occupation by Solyman, Sultan of Turkey, in 1522; thus Trapdoor's claim is fallacious.

90-1 Hungarians... Slavonians soldiers from the regions under Hungarian rule

93 suffered allowed

96-9 Venice... others As in 86-8, 90-4, Trapdoor provides many place names, mixing cities with regions indiscriminately, and English with Italian forms (as was common) so as to convince his listeners that he is a widely travelled soldier.

96 Vecchia Civitavecchia, the port of Rome

96-7 Bonogna... Bologna city in Romagna, in northern Italy

97 Romagna region in Italy north of Tuscany
Toscana region in Italy north of Rome; Tuscany in English

98 Volterra town in Tuscany
Montepulciano town in Tuscany

99 Siennese inhabitants of Siena, city in Tuscany

102 butter-box contemptuous term for a Dutchman

103-6 As Dekker advises in The Gull's Hornbook (1609), those who fear arrest should pretend to be from a country at peace with England, so that they cannot be examined by a magistrate; hence, Tearcat's pretence of being a native Dutch speaker. His speech isn't meant to be strictly understood. It means roughly: I, my lord? I am the ruffling Tearcat, the brave soldier. I have travelled through all Dutchland. [He is] the greater scoundrel who gives an angry word. I beat him directly on the head, that you take out a hundred thousand devils. [Be] merry, sir.

109 jobbering jabbering

110 cross coin with cross stamped on one side

111-12 I'll fit you Moll echoes the same well-known line from The Spanish Tragedy as Sebastian did (2.1.44); also plays on 'tailor' in 110-12.

112 monster with one eye may refer to stage convention of representing the devil as one-eyed

116 skeldering begging, sponging, swindling

Pulls off his patch

- TRAPDOOR The balls of these glaziers of mine—mine eyes—120 shall be shot up and down in any hot piece of service for my invincible mistress.
- JACK DAPPER I did not think there had been such knavery in black patches as now I see.
- MOLL O sir, he hath been brought up in the Isle of Dogs, 125 and can both fawn like a spaniel and bite like a mastiff, as he finds occasion.
- LORD NOLAND [to Tearcat] What are you, sirrah? A bird of this feather too?
- TEARCAT A man beaten from the wars, sir.
- SIR THOMAS I think so, for you never stood to fight.
- 130 JACK DAPPER What's thy name, fellow soldier?
- TEARCAT I am called by those that have seen my valour, Tearcat.
- OMNES Tearcat?
- MOLL A mere whip-jack, and that is, in the commonwealth 135 of rogues, a slave that can talk of sea-fight, name all your chief pirates, discover more countries to you than either the Dutch, Spanish, French, or English ever found out; yet indeed all his service is by land, and that is to rob a fair, or some such venturous exploit. Tearcat—140 foot, sirrah, I have your name, now I remember me, in my book of horners: horns for the thumb, you know
how.
- TEARCAT No indeed, Captain Moll—for I know you by sight—I am no such nipping Christian, but a maunderer 145 upon the pad, I confess; and meeting with honest Trapdoor here, whom you had cashiered from bearing arms, out at elbows under your colours, I instructed him in the rudiments of roguery, and by my map made him sail over any country you can name, so that now 150 he can maunder better than myself.
- JACK DAPPER So then, Trapdoor, thou art turned soldier
now.
- TRAPDOOR Alas, sir, now there's no wars, 'tis the safest course of life I could take.
- MOLL I hope then you can cant, for by your cudgels, you, 155 sirrah, are an upright man.
- TRAPDOOR As any walks the highway, I assure you.
- MOLL And Tearcat, what are you? A wild rogue, an angler, or a ruffler?
- TEARCAT Brother to this upright man, flesh and blood, 160 ruffling Tearcat is my name, and a ruffler is my style, my title, my profession.
- MOLL Sirrah, where's your doxy?—Halt not with me.
- OMNES Doxy, Moll? What's that?
- MOLL His wench.
- 165 TRAPDOOR My doxy? I have, by the solomon, a doxy that carries a kinchin mort in her slate at her back, besides my dell and my dainty wild dell, with all whom I'll tumble this next darkmans in the strommel, and drink ben booze, and eat a fat grunting-cheat, a cackling-170 cheat, and a quacking-cheat.
- JACK DAPPER Here's old cheating!
- TRAPDOOR My doxy stays for me in a boozing ken, brave
captain.
- MOLL He says his wench stays for him in an ale-house. [To 175 Trapdoor and Tearcat] You are no pure rogues.
- TEARCAT Pure rogues? No, we scorn to be pure rogues;
but if you come to our libken, or our stalling-ken, you shall find neither him nor me a queer cuffin.
- MOLL So, sir, no churl of you.
- 180 TEARCAT No, but a ben cove, a brave cove, a gentry cuffin.
- LORD NOLAND Call you this canting?
- JACK DAPPER Zounds, I'll give a schoolmaster half a crown
a week and teach me this pedlar's French.

118 glaziers eyes, in cant (thieves' jargon)

122 patches referring to their clothes; playing on patches meaning fools,
clowns

123 Isle of Dogs peninsula in the Thames; reportedly, the king's hounds were kept
there

134 whip-jack rogue who masquerades as a former sailor, wandering, begging, and thieving

141 book of horners plays on the hornbook, consisting of a paper on which the alphabet and other rudiments of literacy were written, covered with a thin sheet of transparent horn and mounted on wood; used for teaching small children horns for the thumb piece of horn shaped like a thimble to protect thumb from knife blade when thief cuts purse

144 nipping He who cuts the purse is called the nip.

144-5 maunderer upon the pad wanderer on the road

146-7 cashiered from bearing arms military terms for dismissing from service

147 out at elbows proverbial for being poor, destitute

under your colours in your service

155 cant speak in the jargon of vagabonds and rogues; dialogue is largely in cant to 238

156 upright man first or second in the hierarchy of rogues named in cant, who dominate lesser rogues and have their choice of women; tall, large, loud-voiced men who carry truncheons and travel together in all-male groups

158 wild rogue thief travelling in a large group that meets in barns at night to have sex and plan robberies angler companion of upright man, who uses a long staff with a hook to angle (fish) through open windows for goods to steal

159 ruffler first or second in the hierarchy;
much like upright man (see 156, note)

163 doxy general term for adult, sexually available woman who might also be a prostitute or pickpocket

166 by the solomon by the mass

167-8 kinchin mort... wild dell Ranks in the hierarchy of female rogues:
kinchin mort, female infant carried on mother's back in a sheet; mort, mother who belongs sexually to one man;

dell, teen-age girl or virgin; wild dell, either born on the road, or a servant or young woman of gentle birth forced into a wandering or criminal life by circumstances.

169 darkmans night

strommel straw

170 ben booze good drink

170-1 grunting-cheat... quacking-cheat cheat means thing; grunting-cheat, pig;
cackling-cheat, chicken; quacking-cheat,
duck

172 old great, abundant

173 boozing ken alehouse

178 libken sleeping place stalling-ken house for receiving stolen goods

179-81 queer cuffin... gentry cuffin cuffin means man: queer cuffin, churl or Justice of the Peace; gentry cuffin, gentleman

181 a ben cove, a brave cove cove means man or fellow; ben cove, good fellow;

brave cove, gentleman

184 pedlar's French underworld slang

185 TRAPDOOR Do but stroll, sir, half a harvest with us, sir, and you shall gabble your bellyful.
MOLL [to Trapdoor] Come you rogue, cant with me.
SIR THOMAS Well said, Moll.—[To Trapdoor] Cant with her, sirrah, and you shall have money—else not a penny.
190 TRAPDOOR I'll have a bout if she please.
MOLL Come on, sirrah.
TRAPDOOR Ben mort, shall you and I heave a booth, mill a ken, or nip a bung? And then we'll couch a hogshead under the ruffmans, and there you shall wap with me, 195 and I'll niggle with you.
MOLL Out, you damned impudent rascal! [*Hits and kicks
him*]
TRAPDOOR Cut benar whids, and hold your fambles and your stamps!
200 LORD NOLAND Nay, nay, Moll, why art thou angry? What was his gibberish?
MOLL Marry, this, my lord, says he: 'Ben mort'—good wench—'shall you and I heave a booth, mill a ken, or nip a bung?'—shall you and I rob a house, or cut a 205 purse?
OMNES Very good!
MOLL 'And then we'll couch a hogshead under the ruff-mans',—and then we'll lie under a hedge.
TRAPDOOR That was my desire, captain, as 'tis fit a soldier 210 should lie.
MOLL 'And there you shall wap with me, and I'll niggle with you',—and that's all.
SIR BEAUTEOUS Nay, nay, Moll, what's that wap?
JACK DAPPER Nay, teach me what niggling is; I'd fain be 215 niggling.
MOLL Wapping and niggling is all one: the rogue my man can tell you.
TRAPDOOR 'Tis fadoodling, if it please you.
SIR BEAUTEOUS This is excellent; one fit more, good Moll.
220 MOLL [to Tearcat] Come, you rogue, sing with me.
The Song
A gage of ben Rome-booze
In a boozing ken of Rome-ville

TEARCAT
Is benar than a caster,
Peck, pannam, lap, or popler
Which we mill in Deuce-a-ville. 225

MOLL and TEARCAT
O, I would lib all the lightmans,
O, I would lib all the darkmans,
By the solomon, under the ruffmans,
By the solomon, in the harmans,

TEARCAT
And scour the queer cramp-ring,
And couch till a palliard docked my dell,
So my boozy nab might skew Rome-booze well. 230

MOLL and TEARCAT
Avast to the pad, let us bing,
Avast to the pad, let us bing.

OMNES Fine knaves, i'faith. 235

JACK DAPPER The grating of ten new cart-wheels, and the grunting of five hundred hogs coming from Romford market cannot make a worse noise than this canting language does in my ears. Pray, my Lord Noland, let's 240 give these soldiers their pay.
SIR BEAUTEOUS Agreed, and let them march.
LORD NOLAND [gives money] Here, Moll.
MOLL [to Trapdoor and Tearcat] Now I see that you are stalled to the rogue and are not ashamed of your 245 professions: look you, my Lord Noland here, and these gentlemen, bestows upon you two, two bords and a half: that's two shillings sixpence.
TRAPDOOR Thanks to your lordship.
TEARCAT Thanks, heroical captain.
MOLL Away. 250

TRAPDOOR We shall cut ben whids of your masters and mistress-ship wheresoever we come.
MOLL [to Trapdoor] You'll maintain, sirrah, the old justice's plot to his face?
TRAPDOOR Else trine me on the cheats: hang me!
255 MOLL Be sure you meet me there.
TRAPDOOR Without any more maundering, I'll do't.—
Follow, brave Tearcat.

185 harvest season
192-5 Ben mort...niggle with you Modestly avoiding 'wap' and 'niggle', Moll translates this speech: see 202-5, 207-12. Wap and niggle both mean to have sex, the implications of which anger her at 196-7.
198-9 Cut...stamps speak better words, and hold your hands and legs 218 fadoodling nonce word, euphemism for having sex
219 fit part of poem or song; strain of music
221-34 Moll translates the song, excepting the last two lines, at 264-74. A literal translation follows: A quart pot of good wine in an ale-house of London is better than a cloak, meat, buttermilk (or whey) or porridge which we steal in the country. O I would lie all the day,

I would lie all the night, by the mass, under the woods (or bushes), by the mass in the stocks, and wear bad bolts (or fetters), and lie till a rogue lay with my wench, so my drunken head might quaff wine well. Away to the highway, let us be off, etc.
231 palliard rogue, often Irish or Welsh, who wears patched clothing and travels with a wife and forged marriage document; may feign disease to draw pity 237 Romford town north-east of London that held a famous hog market every Tuesday (perhaps playing on 'Rome-ville')

244 stalled to the rogue initiated as rogues
246 bords shillings
251 cut ben whids speak good words
253-7 Moll and Trapdoor join forces against Sir Alexander, looking ahead to the denouement in scene 11
255 trine me on the cheats hang me on the gallows

- TEARCAT I prae, sequor; let us go, mouse.
Exeunt they two, manet the rest
- 260 LORD NOLAND Moll, what was in that canting song?
 MOLL Troth, my lord, only a praise of good drink, the only milk which these wild beasts love to suck, and thus it was:
- 265 A rich cup of wine,
 O it is juice divine!
 More wholesome for the head
 Than meat, drink, or bread;
 To fill my drunken pate,
 With that, I'd sit up late;
 270 By the heels would I lie,
 Under a lousy hedge die,
 Let a slave have a pull
 At my whore, so I be full
 Of that precious liquor—
- 275 and a parcel of such stuff, my lord, not worth the opening.
Enter a Cutpurse very gallant, with four or five men after him, one with a wand
- LORD NOLAND What gallant comes yonder?
 SIR THOMAS Mass, I think I know him: 'tis one of Cumberland.
- 280 FIRST CUTPURSE Shall we venture to shuffle in amongst yon heap of gallants, and strike?
 SECOND CUTPURSE 'Tis a question whether there be any silver shells amongst them, for all their satin outsides.
 OMNES Let's try!
- 285 MOLL Pox on him, a gallant? Shadow me, I know him: 'tis one that cumbers the land indeed. If he swim near to the shore of any of your pockets, look to your purses!
 OMNES Is't possible?
 MOLL This brave fellow is no better then a foist.
- 290 OMNES Foist? What's that?
 MOLL A diver with two fingers: a pickpocket. All his train study the figging-law, that's to say, cutting of purses and foisting. One of them is a nip: I took him once i'the twopenny gallery at the Fortune; then there's a cloyer, or snap, that dogs any new brother in that trade, and snaps will have half in any booty. He with the wand is
- both a stale, whose office is to face a man i'the streets whilst shells are drawn by another, and then with his black conjuring rod in his hand, he, by the nimbleness of his eye and juggling stick, will in cheaping a piece of plate at a goldsmith's stall, make four or five rings mount from the top of his caduceus and, as if it were at leap-frog, they skip into his hand presently.
- SECOND CUTPURSE Zounds, we are smoked!
 OMNES Ha?
 SECOND CUTPURSE We are boiled, pox on her; see Moll, the roaring drab!
- FIRST CUTPURSE All the diseases of sixteen hospitals boil her! Away!
- MOLL Bless you, sir.
 FIRST CUTPURSE And you, good sir.
 MOLL Dost not ken me, man?
 FIRST CUTPURSE No, trust me, sir.
- MOLL Heart, there's a knight, to whom I'm bound for many favours, lost his purse at the last new play i'the Swan—seven angels in't: make it good, you're best; do you see? No more.
- FIRST CUTPURSE A synagogue shall be called, Mistress Mary: disgrace me not; pocas palabras, I will conjure for you. Farewell. [Exeunt Cutpurses]
- 320 MOLL Did not I tell you, my lord?
 LORD NOLAND I wonder how thou camest to the knowledge of these nasty villains?
- SIR THOMAS And why do the foul mouths of the world call thee Moll Cutpurse? A name, methinks, damned and odious.
- MOLL
 Dare any step forth to my face and say,
 'I have ta'en thee doing so, Moll'? I must confess,
 In younger days, when I was apt to stray,
 I have sat amongst such adders, seen their stings—
 330 As any here might—and in full playhouses
 Watched their quick-diving hands, to bring to shame
 Such rogues, and in that stream met an ill name.
 When next, my lord, you spy any one of those—335 So he be in his art a scholar—question him,
 Tempt him with gold to open the large book

259 I prae, sequor Lat. go first, I will follow; a phrase from a play by Terence, Latin writer taught in grammar school

276.1 gallant smartly dressed

276.2 wand light walking stick or riding switch

278–9 Cumberland country in north-west England, probably chosen for the wordplay at 285–6

281 strike pick a pocket or cut a purse

283 silver shells money

289 foist pickpocket

292 figging-law cant for strategies used by cutpurses and pickpockets

293 foisting picking pockets

nip thief who actually cuts the purse

294 twopenny gallery at the Fortune gallery that cost two pennies for admission; for a description of the Fortune, see 2.19–24, note

294–6 cloyer...any booty thief who accompanies any novice, and divides booty with him

296–303 He with the wand...hand presently The stale has two jobs: he distracts a victim while another thief robs him, and he uses his wand to steal rings while bargaining for silver dishes at a goldsmith's shop.

302 caduceus the wand or staff with two serpents twined around it carried by Mercury, messenger of the gods and protector of thieves

304 smoked seen, identified as thieves

306 boiled same as smoked, 304, note

312 ken know

315–16 i'the Swan playhouse on the south bank of the Thames; the only extant contemporary drawing of a London theatre depicts the interior of the Swan

316 angels gold coins worth ten shillings; see 3.137, note

make it good get it back

318 synagogue meeting at which thieves choose officers, deal with business, etc.

319 pocas palabras common Spanish phrase meaning few words conjure appeal on your behalf; beseech

330 adders poisonous snakes; figuratively, criminals, wicked people

335 So so long as

Of his close villainies; and you yourself shall cant
 Better than poor Moll can, and know more laws
 Of cheaters, lifters, nips, foists, puggards, curbers,
 340 With all the devil's blackguard, than it is fit
 Should be discovered to a noble wit.
 I know they have their orders, offices,
 Circuits, and circles, unto which they are bound,
 To raise their own damnation in.

JACK DAPPER How dost thou know it?
 MOLL
 345 As you do: I show it you, they to me show it.
 Suppose, my lord, you were in Venice.

LORD NOLAND Well.
 MOLL
 If some Italian pander there would tell
 All the close tricks of courtesans, would not you
 Hearken to such a fellow?

LORD NOLAND Yes.
 MOLL And here,
 350 Being come from Venice, to a friend most dear
 That were to travel thither, you would proclaim
 Your knowledge in those villainies, to save
 Your friend from their quick danger: must you have
 A black ill name because ill things you know?
 355 Good troth, my lord, I am made Moll Cutpurse so.
 How many are whores in small ruffs and still looks?
 How many chaste whose names fill slander's books?
 Were all men cuckolds, whom gallants in their scorns
 Call so, we should not walk for goring horns.
 360 Perhaps for my mad going, some reprove me;
 I please myself, and care not else who loves me.

OMNES A brave mind, Moll, i'faith.
 SIR THOMAS Come, my lord, shall's to the ordinary?
 LORD NOLAND Ay, 'tis noon sure.
 365 MOLL Good my lord, let not my name condemn me to you or to the world; a fencer, I hope, may be called a coward: is he so for that? If all that have ill names in London were to be whipped and to pay but twelvenpence apiece to the beadle, I would rather have his office than a constable's.

JACK DAPPER So would I, Captain Moll: 'twere a sweet tickling office, i'faith. 370
Exeunt

Enter Sir Alexander Wengrave, Goshawk and Greenwit, and others

ALEXANDER
 My son marry a thief! That impudent girl
 Whom all the world stick their worst eyes upon!

GREENWIT
 How will your care prevent it?

GOSHAWK 'Tis impossible!
 They marry close; they're gone, but none knows whither.

ALEXANDER
 O gentlemen, when has a father's heart-strings
 5 Held out so long from breaking?
Enter a Servant

—Now what news, sir?

SERVANT
 They were met upo'th' water an hour since, sir,
 Putting in towards the Sluice.

ALEXANDER The Sluice? Come gentlemen,
 'Tis Lambeth works against us.

GREENWIT And that Lambeth
 Joins more mad matches than your six wet towns 10 'Twixt that and Windsor Bridge, where fares lie soaking.

ALEXANDER
 Delay no time, sweet gentlemen: to Blackfriars!
 We'll take a pair of oars and make after 'em.
Enter Trapdoor

TRAPDOOR
 Your son and that bold masculine ramp, my mistress,
 Are landed now at Tower.

ALEXANDER Heyday, at Tower?
 15

TRAPDOOR
 I heard it now reported. [Exit]

337 close secret
 339 cheaters those who win money by using false dice lifters those who steal valuable items such as plate (silver dishes), jewels, velvet, etc.
nips cutpurses
foists pickpockets
puggards thieves of an unspecified type curbers thieves who use hooks to steal goods out of open windows 340 the devil's blackguard attendants black in character and dress who guard the devil (a parody of courtiers attending the sovereign)
 343-4 Circuits...raise their own damnation in Magicians drew circles within which they raised spells.
 346-54 Suppose...you know? Allusion to Thomas Coryate's questionable defence of himself for providing information on

Venetian courtesans in Coryate's Crudities
 (1611)
 348 close tricks secret stratagems
 355 I...so I am given a bad reputation because I know about evil doings.
 358-9 cuckolds...horns horns were the sign of a cuckold; see 3.218, note
 360 mad going eccentric behaviour
 365 name reputation
 369-70 beadle...constable's The beadle, a minor officer of the parish church, punished petty offenders, usually by whipping them. Moll's point is that many people have bad reputations who, like her, don't deserve them; if they all were punished and fined, beadles would grow rich.
 372 tickling pleasing
 11.4 close secretly
 8 the Sluice an embankment along the south side of the Thames protecting Lambeth Marsh, swampy open country west of Southwark, from flooding; a landing place for those going to Lambeth

 9-10 Lambeth... | Joins more mad matches Couples could be married secretly outside of their home parishes in London by clergy in Lambeth.
 10-11 six wet towns...Windsor Bridge possibly refers to several towns on the banks of the Thames that were popular for sexual rendezvous 12 Blackfriars Blackfriars Stairs was a landing stage on the north (city) side of the Thames, presumably the one closest to Sir Alexander's house.
 14 ramp vulgar, ill-behaved woman; cf. 7.8,
 note
 15 Tower at either the wharf or the landing stages at the Tower of London

- ALEXANDER Which way, gentlemen,
 Shall I bestow my care? I'm drawn in pieces
 Betwixt deceit and shame.
Enter Sir Guy Fitzallard
- SIR GUY Sir Alexander.
 You're well met, and most rightly served;
 My daughter was a scorn to you.
- 20 ALEXANDER Say not so, sir.
 SIR GUY
 A very abject she, poor gentlewoman!—
 Your house has been dishonoured! Give you joy, sir,
 Of your son's gaskin-bride; you'll be a grandfather
 shortly
 To a fine crew of roaring sons and daughters:
 'Twill help to stock the suburbs passing well, sir.
- 25 ALEXANDER
 O, play not with the miseries of my heart!
 Wounds should be dressed and healed, not vexed, or left
 Wide open to the anguish of the patient,
 And scornful air let in; rather let pity
 30 And advice charitably help to refresh 'em.
- SIR GUY
 Who'd place his charity so unworthily,
 Like one that gives alms to a cursing beggar?
 Had I but found one spark of goodness in you Toward my deserving child, which then grew fond 35 Of your son's virtues, I had eased you now;
 But I perceive both fire of youth and goodness
 Are raked up in the ashes of your age, Else no such shame should have come near your house,
 Nor such ignoble sorrow touch your heart.
- ALEXANDER
 40 If not for worth, for pity's sake assist me!
- GREENWIT
 You urge a thing past sense; how can he help you?
 All his assistance is as frail as ours,
 Full as uncertain where's the place that holds 'em.
 One brings us water-news, then comes another 45 With a full-charged mouth like a culverin's voice,
 And he reports the Tower: whose sounds are truest?
- GOSHAWK
 In vain you flatter him. Sir Alexander—
- SIR GUY
 I flatter him? Gentlemen, you wrong me grossly.
- GREENWIT [aside to Goshawk]
 He does it well, i'faith.
- SIR GUY Both news are false,
 Of Tower or water: they took no such way yet.
- 50 ALEXANDER
 O strange: hear you this, gentlemen? Yet more plunges!
- SIR GUY
 They're nearer than you think for, yet more close,
 Than if they were further off.
- ALEXANDER How am I lost
 In these distractions!
- SIR GUY For your speeches, gentlemen,
 In taxing me for rashness, for you all,
 55 I will engage my state to half his wealth,
 Nay, to his son's revenues, which are less,
 And yet nothing at all till they come from him,
 That I could, if my will stuck to my power,
 Prevent this marriage yet, nay, banish her 60 For ever from his thoughts, much more his arms!
- ALEXANDER
 Slack not this goodness, though you heap upon me
 Mountains of malice and revenge hereafter!
 I'd willingly resign up half my state to him,
 So he would marry the meanest drudge I hire.
- 65 GREENWIT [to Sir Alexander]
 He talks impossibilities, and you believe 'em!
- SIR GUY
 I talk no more than I know how to finish;
 My fortunes else are his that dares stake with me.
 The poor young gentleman I love and pity;
 And to keep shame from him—because the spring
 70 Of his affection was my daughter's first,
 Till his frown blasted all—do but estate him
 In those possessions which your love and care
 Once pointed out for him, that he may have room
 To entertain fortunes of noble birth,
 75 Where now his desperate wants casts him upon her;
 And if I do not, for his own sake chiefly,
 Rid him of this disease that now grows on him,
 I'll forfeit my whole state, before these gentlemen.
- GREENWIT [to Sir Alexander]
 80 Troth, but you shall not undertake such matches;

21 A very abject she Sir Guy sarcastically mimics Sir Alexander's scorn for his daughter.

22 dishonoured by Sebastian's supposed marriage to Moll

23 gaskin-bride Gaskins were wide, knee-length breeches; as in 'codpiece daughter' (4.100), it is implied that male clothing makes Moll part man.

80 matches agreements

We'll persuade so much with you.
 ALEXANDER [to Sir Guy] Here's my ring; [Gives ring]
 He will believe this token. Fore these gentlemen
 I will confirm it fully: all those lands
 My first love 'lotted him, he shall straight possess
 In that refusal.
 85 SIR GUY If I change it not,
 Change me into a beggar!
 GREENWIT Are you mad, sir?
 SIR GUY 'Tis done!
 GOSHAWK Will you undo yourself by doing,
 And show a prodigal trick in your old days?
 ALEXANDER 'Tis a match, gentlemen.
 SIR GUY Ay, ay, sir, ay!
 90 I ask no favour, trust to you for none;
 My hope rests in the goodness of your son. Exit
 GREENWIT [aside to Goshawk]
 He holds it up well yet.
 GOSHAWK [aside to Greenwit]
 Of an old knight, i'faith.
 ALEXANDER
 Cursed be the time I laid his first love barren,
 Wilfully barren, that before this hour
 95 Had sprung forth fruits of comfort and of honour;
 He loved a virtuous gentlewoman.
Enter Moll [dressed as a man]
 GOSHAWK
 Life, here's Moll!
 GREENWIT
 Jack!
 GOSHAWK
 How dost thou, Jack?
 MOLL How dost thou, gallant?
 ALEXANDER
 Impudence, where's my son?
 MOLL Weakness, go look him!
 ALEXANDER
 Is this your wedding gown?
 100 MOLL The man talks monthly:
 Hot broth and a dark chamber for the knight;
 I see he'll be stark mad at our next meeting. Exit
 GOSHAWK
 Why sir, take comfort now, there's no such matter;
 No priest will marry her, sir, for a woman
 Whiles that shape's on: an it was never known,
 Two men were married and conjoined in one!
 Your son hath made some shift to love another.
 ALEXANDER
 Whate'er she be, she has my blessing with her:
 May they be rich and fruitful, and receive
 Like comfort to their issue as I take 110 In them. H'as pleased me now, marrying not this,
 Through a whole world he could not choose amiss.
 GREENWIT
 Glad you're so penitent for your former sin, sir.
 GOSHAWK
 Say he should take a wench with her smock-dowry:
 No portion with her but her lips and arms?
 115 ALEXANDER
 Why, who thrive better, sir? They have most blessing,
 Though other have more wealth, and least repent:
 Many that want most know the most content.
 GREENWIT
 Say he should marry a kind youthful sinner?
 ALEXANDER
 Age will quench that; any offence but theft
 120 And drunkenness, nothing but death can wipe away;
 Their sins are green even when their heads are grey.
 Nay, I despair not now, my heart's cheered, gentle-
 men:
 No face can come unfortunately to me.
Enter a Servant
 Now sir, your news?
 SERVANT Your son with his fair bride
 125 Is near at hand.
 ALEXANDER Fair may their fortunes be!
 GREENWIT
 Now you're resolved, sir, it was never she?
 ALEXANDER
 I find it in the music of my heart.
Enter Moll [in female dress] masked, in Sebastian's hand, and Sir Guy Fitzallard
 See where they come.
 GOSHAWK A proper lusty presence, sir.
 ALEXANDER
 Now has he pleased me right. I always counselled him
 130 To choose a goodly personable creature:
 Just of her pitch was my first wife, his mother.

82 he Sebastian (when Sir Guy tells him of his father's pledge)
 84 'lotted immediately
 85 change it not if I don't change Sebastian's marriage to Moll
 87 undo yourself by doing reverse your position, or, ruin your finances, by making this agreement
 88 prodigal trick ... old days alludes to the parable of the prodigal son (cf. 2.1.118, note); like him, Sir Alexander might squander his wealth in this agreement
 92 holds it up well keeps it going; see 49

98 Jack! generic name for man, addressed to Moll; see 10.1, note
 99 impudence implies her boldness in appearing before him, her immodesty in dressing as a man, and her supposed sexual misconduct look look for 100 monthly plays on links between the moon, its monthly cycle, menstruation, and madness
 101 Hot broth and a dark chamber common remedies for the agitations of mad people, intended to calm them

110 issue children
 114 smock-dowry dowry consisting only of her smock (undergarment)
 115 portion dowry
 119 sinner unchaste woman
 120-2 Age will quench that ... heads are grey Sir Alexander first says that unchastity stops as one grows older, then reverses himself by claiming that, like all sins except thieving and drunkenness, it persists till death.
 129 lusty gaily dressed; merry; lustful
 132 pitch height

- SEBASTIAN
Before I dare discover my offence, [Kneels]
I kneel for pardon.
- ALEXANDER
My heart gave it thee
135 Before thy tongue could ask it—
Rise; thou hast raised my joy to greater height
Than to that seat where grief dejected it.
[Sebastian rises]
Both welcome to my love and care for ever!
Hide not my happiness too long: all's pardoned;
140 Here are our friends. Salute her, gentlemen.
They unmask her
- OMNES
Heart, who? This Moll!
- ALEXANDER
O my reviving shame! Is't I must live
To be struck blind? Be it the work of sorrow
Before age take't in hand!
- SIR GUY
Darkness and death!
145 Have you deceived me thus? Did I engage My whole estate for this?
- ALEXANDER
You asked no favour,
And you shall find as little: since my comforts
Play false with me, I'll be as cruel to thee
As grief to father's hearts.
- MOLL
Why, what's the matter with you,
150 'Less too much joy should make your age forgetful?
Are you too well, too happy?
- ALEXANDER
With a vengeance!
- MOLL
Methinks you should be proud of such a daughter—
As good a man as your son!
- ALEXANDER
O monstrous impudence!
- MOLL
You had no note before, an unmarked knight;
155 Now all the town will take regard on you,
And all your enemies fear you for my sake.
You may pass where you list, through crowds most thick,
And come off bravely with your purse unpicked!
You do not know the benefits I bring with me:
160 No cheat dares work upon you with thumb or knife,
While you've a roaring girl to your son's wife!
- ALEXANDER
A devil rampant!
- SIR GUY
Have you so much charity
Yet to release me of my last rash bargain,
And I'll give in your pledge?
- ALEXANDER
No, sir, I stand to't:
I'll work upon advantage, as all mischiefs
165 Do upon me.
- SIR GUY
Content, bear witness all then,
His are the lands, and so contention ends.
Here comes your son's bride 'twixt two noble friends.
Enter the Lord Noland and Sir Beauteous Ganymede, with Mary Fitzallard between them, the Citizens and their Wives with them
- MOLL [to Sir Alexander]
Now are you gulled as you would be: thank me for't,
I'd a forefinger in't.
- SEBASTIAN
Forgive me, father;
170 Though there before your eyes my sorrow feigned,
This still was she for whom true love complained.
- ALEXANDER
Blessings eternal and the joys of angels
Begin your peace here to be signed in heaven!
How short my sleep of sorrow seems now to me,
175 To this eternity of boundless comforts
That finds no want but utterance and expression.
—[To Lord Noland] My lord, your office here appears so honourably,
So full of ancient goodness, grace, and worthiness,
I never took more joy in sight of man
180 Than in your comfortable presence now.
- LORD NOLAND
Nor I more delight in doing grace to virtue
Than in this worthy gentlewoman, your son's bride,
Noble Fitzallard's daughter, to whose honour
And modest fame I am a servant vowed;
185 So is this knight.
- ALEXANDER
Your loves make my joys proud.
—[To Servant] Bring forth those deeds of land my care laid ready—
[Servant fetches deeds]
And which, old knight, thy nobleness may challenge,
Joined with thy daughter's virtues, whom I prize now,

- 133 discover my offence confess my fault, playing on unmasking Moll as his bride
- 141 Heart shortened form of 'God's heart', a mild oath
This Moll! Several meanings are possible:
Moll's female identity is confirmed (this is Moll), or questioned (this is Moll?), or her appearance in female dress is simply distinguished from that in male dress (this Moll).
- 148 I'll be as cruel to thee I'll seize your estate because you haven't kept your part of our agreement.
- 150 'Less unless
- 153 monstrous impudence Monstrous recalls

- Sir Alexander's first account of Moll (see 2.130–2, note; 132–3, note); for impudence, see 99, note.
- 154 note distinction
unmarked unnoticed
- 158 come off escape
- 160 No cheat . . . thumb or knife No thief dares cut your purse; see 10.141, note.
- 162 devil rampant Playing on ramp, an abusive term used of Moll (see 7.8, note) and rampant, rearing on the hind legs to show fierceness, used of animals in heraldic emblems; indicates Sir Alexander's outrage at including Moll in his family lineage, signified by

- the heraldic emblems on a coat of arms.
- 164 your pledge your ring (given to him, 81); your promise to give your estate to
Sebastian
- 169 would be wish to be
- 170 forefinger as in the proverbial 'finger in the pie', with sexual implications
- 174 signed in heaven refers to wedding ceremony; see 1.82, note.
- 179 ancient venerable, old-fashioned
- 181 comfortable cheering
- 188 challenge lay claim to (in the sense of take credit for, because he negotiated
Sir Alexander's pledge of an estate to
Sebastian)

- 190 As dearly as that flesh I call mine own. Honesty and truth unslandered, —[To Mary] Forgive me, worthy gentlewoman, 'twas Woman manned but never pandered, 220
 my blindness: Cheaters booted but not coached,
 When I rejected thee, I saw thee not; Vessels older ere they're broached;
 Sorrow and wilful rashness grew like films If my mind be then not varied,
 Over the eyes of judgement, now so clear Next day following, I'll be married.
- 195 I see the brightness of thy worth appear.
 LORD NOLAND
 This sounds like doomsday.
 MARY
 Duty and love may I deserve in those,
 MOLL
 And all my wishes have a perfect close. Then were marriage best, 225
 For if I should repent, I were soon at rest.
- ALEXANDER
 That tongue can never err, the sound's so sweet.
 Here, honest son, receive into thy hands
 MOLL
 The keys of wealth, possessions of those lands
 Which my first care provided; they're thine own.
 Heaven give thee a blessing with 'em! The best joys
 That can in worldly shapes to man betide
 Are fertile lands and a fair fruitful bride,
 Of which I hope thou'rt sped.
 MOLL
 Some wrongs I've done thee.
 TRAPDOOR
 Is the wind there now?
 'Tis time for me to kneel and confess first, 230
 For fear it come too late and my brains feel it.
 —[To Moll] Upon my paws I ask you pardon, mistress.
- 205 SEBASTIAN I hope so too, sir.
 MOLL
 Pardon? For what, sir? What has your roguishness done
 now?
 SEBASTIAN
 Father and son, I ha' done you simple service here.
 TRAPDOOR
 I have been from time to time hired to confound you,
 For which thou shalt not part, Moll, unrequited. By this old gentleman.
- ALEXANDER
 Thou art a mad girl, and yet I cannot now
 MOLL
 Condemn thee. How?
 TRAPDOOR
 Pray forgive him; 235
 But may I counsel you, you should never do't.
 MOLL
 Condemn me? Troth an you should, sir, Many a snare to entrap your worship's life
 I'd make you seek out one to hang in my room: Have I laid privily—chains, watches, jewels—
 I'd give you the slip at gallows and cozen the people. And when he saw nothing could mount you up,
 [To Lord Noland] Heard you this jest, my lord? Four hollow-hearted angels he then gave you, 240
 LORD NOLAND What is it, Jack?
 MOLL
 He was in fear his son would marry me,
 But never dreamt that I would ne'er agree!
 LORD NOLAND
 Why? thou hadst a suitor once, Jack; when wilt marry?
 MOLL
 Who, I, my lord? I'll tell you when i'faith:
 When you shall hear
 Gallants void from sergeants' fear, 245
 And look upon thee freely with mine own.
 I see the most of many wrongs before thee
 Cast from the jaws of Envy and her people,
 And nothing foul but that. I'll never more Condemn by common voice, for that's the whore

- 193 films morbid growths
 201 first the estate he originally planned to give 205 sped provided
 206 simple service a modest expression for 'I have served you well'
 208-9 Thou... thee Sir Alexander shifts to the more familiar forms.
 208 mad see 1.102, note
 209 an if
 210 room place (she would find a substitute)
 217-24 When you shall hear... married parodies a form of religious prophecy that lists sins or social evils and makes their eradication the condition for the coming of God's final judgement, or reaching salvation, as line 225 indicates
 218 sergeants' fear fear of being arrested for debt
 219 Honesty chastity, with primary reference to women
 220 manned escorted or ruled (by husbands) of the spirit (1 Thess. 4); when women aren't too soon penetrated—in marriage, or by rape—then Moll will marry.
 222 Vessels... broached In Christian thought, the body is the vessel (container) of the spirit (1 Thess. 4); when women aren't too soon penetrated—in marriage, or by rape—then Moll will marry.
 223 varied changed
 225 doomsday see 217-24, note
 225-6 marriage... at rest alluding to proverb 'Marry in haste and repent at leisure' (Tilley M196)
 229 Is the wind there has the situation changed?
 232 paws dog-like, emphasizing his contrition
 234 confound ruin, destroy
 239 mount you up hang you on the gallows
 240 hollow-hearted angels four coins 'marked with holes in them' (see 8.211-14 and note), thus 'hollow-hearted' in no longer being current, i.e., legally exchangeable as money
 246 Envy malice, ill will
 248 voice opinion; rumour

250 That deceives man's opinion, mocks his trust,
Cozens his love, and makes his heart unjust.
MOLL
Here be the angels, gentlemen: they were given me
As a musician; I pursue no pity—
Follow the law, and you can cuckold me, spare not;
Hang up my viol by me, and I care not!
ALEXANDER
255 So far I'm sorry, I'll thrice double 'em
To make thy wrongs amends.
Come, worthy friends, my honourable lord,
Sir Beauteous Ganymede, and noble Fitzallard,
And you, kind gentlewomen, whose sparkling presence
260 Are glories set in marriage, beams of society,
For all your loves give lustre to my joys;
The happiness of this day shall be remembered
At the return of every smiling spring;
In my time now 'tis born, and may no sadness
265 Sit on the brows of men upon that day,
But as I am, so all go pleased away! [Exeunt]

Epilogue

A painter, having drawn with curious art
The picture of a woman—every part
Limned to the life—hung out the piece to sell.
People who passed along, viewing it well,
5 Gave several verdicts on it: some dispraised
The hair, some said the brows too high were raised,
Some hit her o'er the lips, misliked their colour,
Some wished her nose were shorter, some the eyes
fuller;

Others said roses on her cheeks should grow,
Swearing they looked too pale, others cried no. 10
The workman, still as fault was found, did mend it,
In hope to please all; but, this work being ended,
And hung open at stall, it was so vile,
So monstrous and so ugly, all men did smile
At the poor painter's folly. Such we doubt 15
Is this our comedy: some perhaps do flout
The plot, saying, 'tis too thin, too weak, too mean;
Some for the person will revile the scene,
And wonder that a creature of her being
Should be the subject of a poet, seeing, 20
In the world's eye, none weighs so light; others look
For all those base tricks published in a book—
Foul as his brains they flowed from—of cutpurses,
Of nips and foists, nasty, obscene discourses,
As full of lies, as empty of worth or wit, 25
For any honest ear or eye unfit.
And thus,
If we to every brain that's humorous
Should fashion scenes, we, with the painter, shall,
In striving to please all, please none at all. 30
Yet for such faults, as either the writers' wit
Or negligence of the actors do commit,
Both crave your pardons: if what both have done
Cannot full pay your expectation,
The Roaring Girl herself, some few days hence, 35
Shall on this stage give larger recompense;
Which mirth that you may share in, herself does woo
you,
And craves this sign: your hands to beckon her to
you.
Finis

252 pursue seek

253 cuck Set me in a cucking stool, a chair into which women who vocally challenged male authority (designated 'scolds') were strapped, then publicly immersed several times in water; a legal punishment and social ritual.

Epilogue.1 curious skillful, elaborate

3 Limned to the life in a lifelike way

6 brows eyebrows

7 hit her o'er the lips criticized the lips

13 open at stall at an open stall, stand

15 doubt suspect, fear

17 mean involving people of low social rank; in a literary sense, unadorned, modest

18 person character, i.e., Moll

21 weighs so light is considered so trivial, playing on light as wanton

22-6 book . . . eye unfit probably refers to a pamphlet by Samuel Rid taking issue with Dekker's pamphlet The Bel-man (1608), an exposé of the London underworld

24 nips and foists cutpurses and pickpockets; cf. 10.327-41

obscene repulsive

28 humorous afflicted with unsettled

humours, fanciful, capricious

31-3 writers' . . . | Both the two playwrights in collaboration, Dekker and Middleton

35-6 The Roaring Girl . . . larger recompense Probably refers to the appearance of Mary Frith, the figure on whom Moll is based, singing and playing a lute on the stage of the Fortune in man's clothing, probably at a performance of this play several months before it was published (see Introduction).

37 Which mirth . . . share in so that you may share in this mirth

38 this sign applause

NO WIT/HELP LIKE A WOMAN'S; OR, THE ALMANAC

Edited by John Jowett

'No Wit/Help like a Woman's, a comedy by Thomas Middleton, Gent.' waited until 1657 before it appeared in print. But the play was clearly written decades earlier in 1611, for Weatherwise repeatedly quotes from actual almanacs for that year published by Thomas Bretnor and Jeffrey Neve (George, 1966). It is probably no coincidence that on 29 December of the same year, 1611 a play called The Almanac was acted by Prince Henry's Men at Whitehall before King James. In all probability this is the same play, or a court adaptation of it (Eccles, 1987).

If No Wit is indeed the Prince Henry's Men's play, the company would presumably have staged its original performances at the Fortune Theatre, within months of their production of The Roaring Girl. The title No Wit/Help like a Woman's, like The Roaring Girl, promises that the play will focus on one or more female characters, and in each play the principal female is a resourceful figure who dresses herself as a man and in that guise offends social probity. In No Wit's world of scoundrels and fools, Mistress Low-water stands out as a character who, though disadvantaged by misfortune and by the social expectations of gender, is able to succeed remarkably well through her own resourceful wit. Thus the alternative titles place different emphasis on the play's balance. Women engineer the real plots of No Wit. Weatherwise, with his almanac, actually has no control over anything. He is butt of The Almanac's anti-providential wit and mainspring of its theatricality.

The play is known to have been revived in 1638 by James Shirley for the short-lived St Weburgh Street Theatre in Dublin. Shirley gave the play a new prologue and inserted a reference to the year of his production at 7.293; act intervals were evidently introduced (unless they derive from the 1611 court performance or an unrecorded revival), and further changes cannot be entirely ruled out. In more respects than most plays of the period, No Wit anticipates Restoration comedy, and in 1677 a farcical adaptation called The Counterfeit Bridegroom, or, The Defeated Widow (attributed to Aphra Behn or Thomas Betterton) was acted at Dorset Garden. The Low-water plot was imitated from The Counterfeit Bridegroom, either directly or indirectly, in a number of eighteenth-century plays (Balch, 1980). Middleton's play thus fell by the wayside, and it evidently remained unperformed for over three hundred years. In a marginal note in his copy of Dyce's edition, Anthony Trollope gave an ill-tempered verdict on its theatrical potential; he observed 'a certain activity' about the play 'that may have made it attractive on the stage to an audience devoid of all taste'. The play was finally revived in 1985 in London by the Wayward Players at the Bear Gardens, where it formed an effective double bill with Women, Beware Women and revealed the women as 'astonishingly good natured' (Potter, 1985), and again in 1991 by a student group at the University of Toronto, a production that confirmed, according to its director Robert Irish, the stage prominence of Weatherwise.

Trollope's response was not typical of his century. A. W. Ward (1875) found a mix of lively, accomplished writing and dubious moral situation, a view the 1885 editor A. H. Bullen echoed. In 1887 Algernon Charles Swinburne wrote of 'the unflinching charm of a style worthy of Fletcher himself'. Such praise can turn to disparagement; a recent editor, Johnson (1976), laments what he sees as the blunting influence of Fletcherian romance on the incisive style found in Middleton's earlier city comedies. A more positive evaluation comes from Rowe (1979), who sees the play as repeatedly denying and interrogating comic resolutions. This is a useful approach, but it should not be allowed to obscure the charm noted by Swinburne. If the play absurdifies comic convention, it does so in a spirit that is itself comic. If it probes the limits of tolerance, it is perhaps itself finally tolerant.

No Wit might be described as a female-oriented continuation of male-oriented city comedy. The rapacious Goldenfleece has defrauded Low-water of his fortune; now Mistress Low-water pursues a new kind of confrontation with Goldenfleece's Widow. The key men are dead (Goldenfleece), ineffectual (Low-water) or contemptible (the Widow's suitors). Initially Mistress Low-water seeks revenge on a would-be seducer, Sir Gilbert Lambstone, who is also a favoured suitor to the Widow. Disguised as a plucky young gentleman, Mistress Low-water appears as an uninvited guest at Weatherwise's banquet in honour of the Widow, and reveals Sir Gilbert's duplicity to the assembled company. The Widow responds by falling in love with her saviour, and decides to marry for love rather than money. Mistress Low-water plays the game for her own advantage, and the couple are duly wed. Now the disguised woman's survival as the young gallant and her need for revenge converge, for the 'husband' must inflict emotional cruelty in order to avoid being taken to bed and discovered as a woman. The Widow has chosen love over money only to be emotionally and sexually defrauded. The frustrated and injured Widow turns her attention to Mistress Low-water's brother Beveril, enabling the sister to accuse the Widow of sexual dishonesty, just as she did Sir Gilbert before her. A restitution of the gains from her first husband's financial misdemeanours is required before the new love-match between her and Beveril can be solemnized.

This contest between Mistress Low-water and the Widow Lady Goldenfleece relates to a ballad in The Exeter Garland (1720) called 'No Wit Like to a Woman's; or, The Old Woman Fitted by her Daughter'. The extant ballad tells of a daughter whose dowry is withheld by her rich widowed mother; she tricks her mother of the wealth by disguising herself as a beau and causing her mother to fall in love with her. Either the Exeter ballad and the play have a common source in a lost ballad, or the play is itself the source for the ballad.

For the play's other plot, Middleton followed Giambattista Della Porta's 1584 Italian comedy La Sorella ('The Sister'), which he presumably read in the Italian. The location turns from Della Porta's Venice to London; accordingly the Turks are familiarized as England's co-religionists but trade rivals, the Dutch. The manservant Saviourwit, a New Comedy witty rogue, is new to Middleton's play, and his cynicism helps to complicate La Sorella's moral simplicity.

Before the stage-action begins, Philip's father sent Philip and Saviourwit to the Low Countries to redeem Philip's long-lost Mother and sister from captivity with Dutch pirates. Having squandered the ransom, Philip returned home with a wife whom he now passes off as his redeemed sister Grace. This works well until his Mother is unexpectedly freed and returns home. Surprisingly, she agrees to connive with Philip against his father by pretending that Grace is his sister. But confusion multiplies when she meets Grace and discovers, to Philip's horror, that she is indeed that sister. It takes a second extraordinary twist of fate to set all to rights again.

Here are two causally independent plots. As the 1657 title itself suggests, the very idea of doubleness holds the play together. On the title-page the word 'wit' is bracketed above 'help', so as to give alternative readings. The 'wit' is above all the means by which Mistress Low-water helps herself, her husband, her brother Beveril, even, finally, the Widow. Philip's Mother is not particularly witty, but her lie on his behalf is of considerable help to him. Finally it takes the help of another woman, the Widow, to rescue Philip. The split title equates and contrasts the ideas of wit and help, and similarly correlates the two plots.

The apparent disjunction between the plots is in fact correlation in disguise. Both take financial loss in conjunction with the loss of a relative as a starting point. New marriages at first offer to compensate, but turn out to be disasters. Each plot hinges on a piece of female duplicity or role-playing—Mistress Low-water's disguise as a man, Philip's Mother's acceptance of Grace as her daughter—and push the pretence unnervingly towards becoming a reality. What is at issue is a false marriage—woman to woman, brother to sister. Each of these marriages becomes a meeting point for the laws of inheritance and wayward desire.

The outcomes are more secure marital resolutions in which confusion of identity is resolved by sleights of hand. It is important here that in both plots a character is available to double with one of the marriage partners. Philip's supposed and real sisters are dangerously interchangeable (Middleton gives the women's fathers the virtually synonymous names Sunset and Twilight), and the evasive device of the stand-in marital partner links this resolution with that for the Low-water plot. There it is the brother who is miraculously available to stand in for the sister and as it were reconstruct the homosexual marriage as heterosexual.

To put it another way, Grace, whose identity as Philip's sister is supposed to be the reality behind the false identity, who is repeatedly referred to as Philip's sister, and is specifically called 'Sister' in the stage direction following 8.159, becomes Philip's legitimate wife; in contrast Mistress Low-water changes from the Widow's spouse to her 'sister' (9.570, 9.578), in the sense 'sister-in-law'. Della Porta's title provides a keyword for the denouement of both plots. The unacceptable marriages are resolved by taking the sisterhood out of the incestuous marriage and inserting it as a separator to prevent the other from constituting itself as a union of women.

Of course mistaken identity and romantic confusion as a result of cross-dressing are conventions of Renaissance comedy. But Middleton retrieves the issues of sexuality from the comic formalities in several ways. Any links between these two autonomous plots are bound to highlight their common core of significance. The extreme involutions of the action draw attention to its artificiality, and so draw attention to the desperate need to avoid certain outcomes. And incest and female homoeroticism are actually confronted. Philip despairingly fears damnation for incest, and these fears inhabit the same part of the play as the Widow's lust for the man who is really Mistress Low-water. Philip perhaps articulates an anxiety about illicit sex on behalf of both sets of characters. The masque scene raises the matter of Mistress Low-water's apparent and real gender. Sir Gilbert despises the young gentleman's effeminacy, and in scourging widows who marry such androgynes he states what is the actual situation in an outraged but supposedly hypothetical comparison:

They marry now but the third part of husbands—
Boys, smooth-faced catamites—to fulfil their bed,
As if a woman should a woman wed. (9.90-2)

Much virtue in 'as if', especially as the actor playing Mistress Low-water would indeed have been a 'smooth-faced' boy. (And the actor playing the Widow would also have been a boy: the marriage perhaps threatens simultaneous collapse into both male and female homosexuality.) Rarely in Renaissance drama are such possibilities confronted so explicitly. It is all the more striking because, as Valerie Traub has pointed out, there was no Early Modern English word for lesbianism, a sexuality that was almost as Shirley imagines Dublin in his Prologue to No Wit, unchronicled, unmapped, invisible. And indeed even in the play it is incest rather than same-sex marriage that finds all too clear a place on the list of damnable sins.

The whole play can be seen as an action that forces incestuous and female-homoerotic marriage from actual event to similitude, 'as if'. Thanks to the doubling characters Beveril and Jane, incest and same-sex liaison are only temporary mistakes. The final outcomes may be taken as matters of fact, unless our sense of the factual has been so heavily undercut that they seem rather to be fantasies of normalization that bring about an acceptable ending. It is not beyond the bounds of Middleton's representation of human behaviour to suggest that earlier in the play Philip and the Widow get what they unconsciously desire. Marriages have taken place that, more or less to the audience's best knowledge, break the very laws on which marriage is founded. Incest doubles the family upon itself, and same-sex marriage denies the possibility of progeny. Like widowhood, lost or duplicitous mothers, and cross-dressing, they undermine male control of reproduction and inheritance. Every step towards recognizing these desires is a step away from a standard comedic ending, and they are not allowed finally to hold sway.

The stage-managed denouements may be read by the light of two earlier episodes that show the intractability of life to theatrical schemes. These are the major and sustained ensemble scenes of the banquet in Scene 4 and the subverted wedding masque in Scene 9. Weatherwise, central protagonist in the play as The Almanac, attempts to rule over both festivities, unintentionally or intentionally ensuring that the prescribed inner action of each is in the event twisted to a bizarre outcome.

For his 'conceited' banquet, Weatherwise arranges twelve places that correspond to the signs of the zodiac, each with a motto appropriate to the time of year represented by the sign. He devises sweet-dishes for his guests that are shaped like the twelve astrological signs. In allocating each guest to his or her seat he makes much play on the correspondence between person and sign, and on the part of the human body associated with each sign. The whole table becomes an emblem of the natural year, of human behaviour, and of the human body. The most immediate point of reference is the almanac lore to which Weatherwise is enslaved. Pocket-book almanacs usually included the figure of the 'anatomical man': a human body surrounded by a rectangular frame showing the twelve signs of the zodiac, each sign connected to the corresponding bodily limb or organ. This graphic table has become the banqueting table.

Almanacs were popular renditions of astrological learning. Weatherwise has produced a correspondingly debased rendition of aristocratic and royal feast-making. The zodiac signs are presumably confections of marzipan and sugar of the kind mentioned, and associated with lecherous feasting, in Women, Beware Women 3.1.270 and 3.2.74-5, where the bull, ram, and goat are again astrological signs. Sugar sculptures were standard items of conceited extravagance, and representative of the new levels of refinement and ingenuity being reached in food preparation. A court banquet would be a work of gastronomic contrivance designed to surprise and delight both eyesight and palate. An ingenious procession of dishes would manifest natural food substances in cunningly altered form. Thus the banquet could aspire to high artifice and even theatricality. At the Whitehall Banqueting Hall it might be prelude to a performance of a court masque—or indeed of a play such as The Almanac.

Weatherwise's banquet, here 'a course of sweetmeats, fruit, and wine, served . . . as a separate entertainment' (OED), is metonymic for such feasting. His pretentious vulgarity recalls Petronius Arbiter's Latin prose-and-verse fiction Satyricon. A lengthy section of this fragmented work describes Trimalchio's banquet. The Renaissance editions Middleton might have read preserve only small portions of this episode, but one of them is the opening passage which includes an account of a course of comestibles that are shaped like the signs of the zodiac or make punning reference to it. This text probably suggested to Middleton Weatherwise's edible zodiac signs. The parvenu Trimalchio, like Weatherwise, is superstitious, observing lucky and unlucky days. He has apparently mastered fortune (his wife is called Fortunata), and Weatherwise hopes to do likewise. Yet the astrologer falls well short of Trimalchio's lavish opulence. All and sundry crowd in to Trimalchio's feast, but Weatherwise needs to conscript his tenants to fill the empty seats. In the theatre the tenants would be mute hired men, and presumably filled the chairs whose backs faced the audience. But this theatrical pragmatism nicely coincides with a satire on Weatherwise's ill-disguised frugality. His tenants are pointedly marginalized, and plain foods such as beef and fish are only figuratively present on his table as Taurus and Pisces. Weatherwise fails in the mythical simple old-fashioned hospitality of the rural gentry, just as he fails to reproduce the style of princes.

The guests conspicuously lack the mannered courtliness that should crown the feast as a living art-form. Instead, conversation is marked by amusingly stilted incongruity. The Renaissance manners on display at the fictional repast in Book 4 of Stefano Guazzo's Civil Conversation (translated from the Italian by Bartholomew Young, 1586) offer a significant point of contrast. There are several correspondences between the conduct of the two banquets as social occasions. In Civil Conversation, a woman is appointed head of the feast, games are played with proverbial tags, and a drinking-vessel ingeniously shaped like a ship is passed round the guests. No Wit echoes these details, but where in Guazzo they were sources of compliment and delight, they are here occasions for awkwardness, embarrassment, and factional contempt for the inventor. Just as Middleton adds Saviourwit to the personae of La Sorella, he augments Guazzo's feast with a sardonic Clown who ridicules the sun-cup Weatherwise produces to pass through his zodiac. Guazzo provides a fictional model of 'civil conversation' that Weatherwise imitates in accidental parody.

All of his conceits turn out to be unsuitable, and unhelpful in his attempts to woo the Widow. At first he simply plays into the hands of his rivals. By the end of the scene he and the other suitors have been displaced by Mistress Low-water, the supposed young gentleman humiliated at the foot of the table.

The wedding masque is the occasion for the suitors' revenge. When the Widow commissions the scholar Beveril to supply an entertainment, her former suitors offer their services as actors, in order to turn an extravagant public compliment into an equally extravagant insult. The masque is again based on a theme familiar to Weatherwise from his almanacs: the division of human temperament into four types or humours related to the four elements of Earth, Air, Fire, and Water. Middleton may have based Beveril's masque on a sequence in Thomas Dekker's portion of The Magnificent Entertainment (Bergeron, 1985; see 2047-2119). Weatherwise visually presides over the show, suspended from the heavens as Air. The suitors displace Beveril's text for the masque, which would inferably have shown the Widow's love for her supposed husband as a perfect figuration of all the elements combined in harmony. Their actual speeches are calculatedly nasty, though the sheer absurdity of the suitors' transformations ensures that they cannot be taken too seriously.

As with the banquet scene, the proposed idealized view of human nature designed to flatter the Widow becomes in the event the very opposite. Human nature is deeply imperfect in this play, especially where sexual passion is concerned. If the conventions of marriage masque are corrupted, so too are the conventions of romantic comedy. The disguised heroine cannot marry; she is the wrong gender for the match in question, and she already has a spouse. Mistress Low-water is neither Shakespeare's premarital Viola nor Middleton's anti-marital Moll. Though she claims the moral high ground, and even, as her fortunes improve, sees herself as a post-diluvian Noah favoured by God (6.253-7), her charm has more to do with wit than virtue. That wit is hard pushed to excuse some of her actions, especially as the Widow, her victim, is herself too verbally witty, too sexually vulnerable, and finally too dignified to capitulate, by association with her dead husband, to the role of villain.

A redistribution of wealth is the precondition for final happiness. As the Widow accepts a lowered position in the financial order of things, and is accepted as a member of the middling-gentry community, she becomes the key to resolving Philip and Grace's difficulties. That resolution defies belief, and in the celebration that follows it is the roguish Saviourwit who says he 'could spring up and knock my head against yon silver ceiling for joy'. As in Revenger's Tragedy 3.5.2-4, where Vindice uses virtually the same words to express how he is ravished by his own success, or indeed Jonson's Sejanus 5.8-9, where the self-congratulatory would-be tyrant at each step feels his 'advanced head | Knock out a star in heaven', there are suggestions here of atheistic self-congratulation. Sejanus and Vindice meet their downfall, but the comic plot-machine of No Wit rewards those who wittily help themselves. The mysteries of concord between microcosm and macrocosm are reduced to an emblematic banqueting-table or debased in a show that consigns the Platonic ideal to the past; the science of astrology has retreated to banal almanac lore; the heavens are merely a painted ceiling. Weatherwise proves to be a lack-wit above all for his belief in schematic conceptualizations of the world; he is an urban-gentry Prospero who is chastened for his attempts at deploying providence for his own ends. As with Prospero, the Epilogue is left to him.

As the Epilogue centres on Weatherwise's almanac, it might hypothetically have been added for the court performance where the play was called The Almanac, or at any rate have been an optional afterthought to the original play. It distracts attention from the play's leading concerns to its leading comic character. Interestingly, though, in the final lines Weatherwise offers himself as a scapegoat for the play's faults:

Some faults perhaps have slipped I am to answer;
And if in anything your revenge appears,
Send me in with all your fists about mine ears.

In other words, perhaps, don't blame the women. The final three lines of the main play have likewise been spoken by a male character, and have been analogously addressed to the 'gentlemen' assembled on stage. But it is a perfunctory summing-up. The last exchange specific to the play's action comes in two lines immediately before, where Mistress Low-water says of the Widow, 'I am her servant for't', the Widow replies, 'Ha, worthy sister!', and then adds, without any apparent change of addressee, 'The government of all I bless thee with.' This exchange between the women jokingly looks back on their courtship, in that 'servant' plays on the sense 'suitor, wooer', the role that has been replaced now that Mistress Low-water, as woman and as her brother's sister, has become the Widow's 'worthy sister'. Mistress Low-water doesn't get a wife, but she does get a dowry. Beveril has just offered to make the Widow's wealth readily available to his sister. In response, Mistress Low-water's 'I am her servant for't' sets aside Beveril's theoretical power as husband-to-be and insists on acknowledging deference to the Widow. The Widow not only gives Mistress Low-water access to her wealth but puts her fully in control of it. She thus establishes an alliance between the women that strips her future husband of his potential rights. If the Widow addresses whom she seems to address and means what she says, her endowment of her sister-in-law is an astonishing financial transaction, especially in context of a period when the restrictions on female ownership of property were very considerable. The play cannot propose woman-to-woman marriage as the basis for a socially inclusive comic ending, but it can and evidently does propose a woman-to-woman financial exchange as the basis for that comic ending. This switch from the sexual to the economic aspect of marriage is the play's last moment of doubleness and substitution. It might be a stunning twist to the conventions of comic closure, one that goes far beyond questions of form and artifice. Perhaps the distracting Epilogue was needed from the play's inception after all.

How is't possible to suffice
 So many ears, so many eyes?
 Some in wit, some in shows
 Take delight, and some in clothes;
 5 Some for mirth they chiefly come,
 Some for passion, for both some;

Some for lascivious meetings, that's their errand,
 Some to detract, and ignorance their warrant.
 How is't possible to please

No wit like a Womans.

Sc. 1

Enter Philip, Sir Oliver Twilight's son, with Saviourwit, his father's man

[He draws his sword]

PHILIP I am at my wit's ends, Saviourwit.
SAVOURWIT And I am e'en following after you as fast as I can, sir.

PHILIP Then may the sharp point of an inward horror Strike me to earth, and save thy weapon guiltless. 35

PHILIP My wife will be forced from me, my pleasure!
5 SAVOURWIT Talk no more on't, sir. How can there be any hope i'th' middle when we're both at our wits' end in the beginning? My invention was ne'er so gravelled since I first set out upon't.

SANDFIELD Not in thy father?
PHILIP O defend me, friendship!
How much is truth abused when 'tis kept silent!

PHILIP Nor does my stop stick only in this wheel,
10 Though it be a main vexation; but I'm grated In a dear absolute friend, young Master Sandfield—

SAVOURWIT [to Sandfield] True, your anger's in an error all this while, sir. But that a lover's weapon now hears reason, 'Tis out still like a mad man's. Hear but me, sir. 40

SAVOURWIT Ay, there's another rub too.

'Tis my young master's injury, not yours, That you quarrel with him for; and this shows As if you'd challenge a lame man the field, And cut off's head because he has lost his legs. His grief makes him dead flesh, as it appeared 45 By offering up his breast to you; for, believe it, sir, Had he not greater crosses of his own, Your hilts could not cross him—

PHILIP Who supposes That I make love to his affected mistress, When 'tis my father works against the peace
15 Of both our spirits, and woos unknown to me. He strikes out sparks of undeservèd anger 'Twixt old steel friendship and new stony hate, As much forgetful of the merry hours The circuits of our youth hath spent and worn 20 As if they had not been, or we not born.

SANDFIELD How?
SAVOURWIT Not your hilts, sir. Come, I must have you friends. A pox of weapons! There's a whore gapes for't; put it up i'th' scabbard. 50

Enter Sandfield

SAVOURWIT See where he comes.
SANDFIELD Unmerciful in torment!
Will this disease never forsake mine eye?

SANDFIELD [putting up his sword] Thou'rt a mad slave.

PHILIP It must be killed first if it grow so painful.
Work it out strongly at one time, that th'anguish
25 May never more come near thy precious sight. If my eternal sleep will give thee rest, Close up mine eyes with opening of my breast. [He offers his breast]

SAVOURWIT Come, give me both your hands. You're in a quagmire both. Should I release you now, Your wits would both come home in a stinking pickle; Your father's old nose would smell you out presently.

SANDFIELD I feel thy wrongs at midnight, and the weight
30 Of thy close treacheries. Thou hast a friendship As dangerous as a strumpet's that will kiss Men into poverty, distress, and ruin; And to make clear the face of thy foul deeds, Thou work'st by seconds.

PHILIP Tell him the secret which no mortal knows 55 But thou and I, and then he will confess How much he wronged the patience of his friend.

SAVOURWIT Then thus the marigold opens at the splendour
Of a hot constant friendship 'twixt you both. [To Sandfield] 'Tis not unknown to your ear, some ten 60 years since, My mistress his good mother, with a daughter About the age of six, crossing to Jersey, Was taken by the Dunkirks, sold both, and separated. - Or what place held 'em, earth, the sea, or heaven,
 Came to the old man's ears, the knight my master;
 Till, about five months since, a letter came,
 Sent from the mother, which related all
 Their taking, selling, separation,
 And never meeting; and withal required
 Six hundred crowns for ransom, which my old master
 No sooner heard the sound but tolled the sum,
 Gave him the gold, and sent us both aboard.
 We landing by the way, having a care
 To lighten us of our carriage because gold
 Is such a heavy metal, eased our pockets
 In wench's aprons. Women were made to bear,
 But for us gentlemen 'tis most unkindly.
- SANDFIELD
 Well, sir?
- PHILIP A pure rogue still!
- SAVOURWIT Amongst the rest, sir,
 'Twas my young master's chance there to dote finely
 Upon a sweet young gentlewoman, but one
 That would not sell her honour for the Indies
 Till a priest struck the bargain, and then half
 A crown dispatched it.
 To be brief, wedded her and bedded her,
 Brought her home hither to his father's house;
 And with a fair tale of mine own bringing up,
 She passes for his sister that was sold.
- SANDFIELD
 Let me not lose myself in wond'ring at thee.
 But how made you your score even for the mother?
- SAVOURWIT
 Pish, easily. We told him how her fortunes
 Mocked us as they mocked her. When we were o'th' sea
 She was o'th' land; and, as report was given,
 When we were landed she was gone to heaven.
 So he believes two lies one error bred:
 The daughter ransomed, and the mother dead.
- SANDFIELD
 Let me admire thee, and withal confess
 My injuries to friendship.
- PHILIP They're all pardoned.
 These are the arms I bore against my friend.
- [He embraces Sandfield]
- SAVOURWIT
 But what's all this to th' present? This discourse Leaves you i'th' bog still.
- PHILIP On, good Saviourwit.
- SAVOURWIT
 For yet our policy has crossed ourselves;
 For the old knave my master, little thinking her Wife to his son, but his own daughter still,
 Seeks out a match for her.
- PHILIP Here I feel the surgeon
 At second dressing.
- SAVOURWIT And he's entertained,
 E'en for pure need—for fear the glass should crack
 That is already broken, but well soldered—
 A mere sot for her suitor, a rank fox,
 One Weatherwise, that woos by the almanac,
 Observes the full and change, an arrant moon-calf.
 And yet, because the fool demands no portion
 But the bare dow'r of her smock, the old fellow,
 Worn to the bone with a dry covetous itch
 To save his purse and yet bestow his child,
 Consents to masty lumps of almanac stuff
 Kned with May-butter.—Now as I have thought on't,
 I'll spoil him in the baking.
- SANDFIELD Prithee, as how, sirrah?
- SAVOURWIT
 I'll give him such a crack in one o'th' sides,
 He shall quite run out of my master's favour.
- PHILIP
 I should but too much love thee for that.
- SAVOURWIT Thus then,
 To help you both at once, and so good-night to you:
 After my wit has shipped away the fool,
 As he shall part I'll buzz into the ear
 Of my old master that you, sir, Master Sandfield,
 Dearly affect his daughter, and will take her
 With little or no portion. Well stood out in't!
 Methinks I see him caper at that news,
 And, in the full, cry 'O!' This brought about
 And wittily dissembled on both parts,
 You to affect his love, he to love yours,
 I'll so beguile the father at the marriage

SANDFIELD
 Let me applaud thee.

145 PHILIP [to Savourwit] Blest be all thy ends,
 That mak’st armed enemies embracing friends.
 About it speedily. Exit [with Sandfield]

SAVOURWIT I need no pricking.
 I’m of that mettle so well paced and free,
 There’s no good riders that use spur to me.
Enter Grace Twilight

150 O, are you come?
 GRACE Are any comforts coming?
 SAVOURWIT I never go without ’em.
 GRACE
 Thou sport’st with joys that utterance cannot perfect.
 [A noise within]

SAVOURWIT
 Hark, are they risen?
 GRACE Yes, long before I left ’em;
 155 And all intend to bring the widow homeward.
 SAVOURWIT
 Depart then, mistress, to avoid suspect.
 Our good shall arrive time enough at your heart.
 [Exit Grace]

Poor fools that evermore take a green surfeit
 Of the first-fruits of joys! Let a man but shake the tree, 160 How soon they’ll hold up their laps to receive comfort!
 The music that I struck made her soul dance.
*Enter the Lady Widow Goldenfleece, with Sir
 Gilbert Lambstone, Master Pepperton, Master
 Overdone, suitors; after them the two old men Sir Oliver Twilight and Master Sunset, with their daughters Grace Twilight, Jane Sunset*
 Peace.

Here comes the lady widow, the late wife
 To the deceased Sir Avarice Goldenfleece,
 165 Second to none for usury and extortion,
 As too well it appears on a poor gentleman,
 One Master Low-water, from whose estate
 He pulled that fleece that makes his widow weight.
 Those are her suitors now, Sir Gilbert Lambstone, 170 Master Pepperton, Master Overdone.

WIDOW
 Nay, good Sir Oliver Twilight, Master Sunset,
 We’ll trouble you no farther.

SUNSET and SIR OLIVER No trouble, sweet madam.

SIR GILBERT
 We’ll see the widow at home; it shall be our charge
 that.

WIDOW It shall be so indeed.
 Thanks, good Sir Oliver, and to you both
 175 I am indebted for those courtesies
 That will ask me a long time to requite.

SIR OLIVER Ah, ’tis but your pleasant condition to give it out so, madam!

WIDOW
 Mistress Grace and Mistress Jane, I wish you both 180 A fair contented fortune in your choices,
 And that you happen right.

GRACE and JANE Thanks to you, good madam.

WIDOW
 There’s more in that word ‘right’ than you imagine.
 I now repent, girls, a rash oath I took 185 When you were both infants, to conceal a secret.

GRACE What does’t concern, good madam?

WIDOW
 No, no; since you are both so well, ’tis well enough.
 It must not be revealed. ’Tis now no more
 Than like mistaking of one hand for t’other.
 A happy time to you both.

GRACE and JANE The like to you, madam.

GRACE [aside]
 I shall long much to have this riddle opened!

JANE [aside]
 I would you were so kind to my poor kinswoman,
 And the distressed gentleman her husband,
 Poor Master Low-water, who on ruin leans.
 195 You keep this secret as you keep his means.

 161.1 Goldenfleece The name points to the wealth that the Widow’s husband has filched (*fleece*d) from the Low-waters, and recalls the Greek myth of Jason’s quest for the Golden Fleece, which he won with the help of the enchantress Medea.
 161.2 Lambstone Suggests ‘Lamb-stone’, i.e. lamb’s testicle, and so the character’s virile lechery.
 Pepperton He might be peppered in the sense ‘infected with venereal disease’.
 161.3 Overdone The name implies he is sexually exhausted.

- WIDOW Thanks, good Sir Oliver Twilight. Welcome, sweet Master Pepperton. Master Overdone, welcome.
Exeunt; manet Sir Oliver with Saviourwit
- SIR OLIVER
 And goes the business well 'twixt those young lovers?
- SAVOURWIT
 Betwixt your son and Master Sunset's daughter
 The line goes even, sir.
- 200 SIR OLIVER Good lad, I like thee.
- SAVOURWIT
 But, sir, there's no proportion, height, or evenness
 Betwixt that equinoctial and your daughter.
- SIR OLIVER
 'Tis true, and I'm right glad on't.
- SAVOURWIT Are you glad, sir,
 There's no proportion in't?
- SIR OLIVER Ay, marry am I, sir.
- 205 I can abide no word that ends in 'portion'.
 I'll give her nothing.
- SAVOURWIT Say you should not, sir—
 As I'll ne'er urge your worship 'gainst your nature—
 Is there no gentleman, think you, of worth and credit
 Will open's bed to warm a naked maid?—
- 210 A hundred gallant fellows, and be glad To be so set a-work. Virginity
 Is no such cheap ware as you make account on
 That it had need with portion be set off;
 For that sets off a portion in these days.
- 215 SIR OLIVER Play on, sweet boy.
 O, I could hear this music all day long
 When there's no money to be parted from!
 Strike on, good lad!
- SAVOURWIT
 Do not wise men and great often bestow
 Ten thousand pound in jewels that lie by 'em?
 If so, what jewel can lie by a man
 More precious than a virgin? If none more precious,
 Why should the pillow of a fool be graced
 With that brave spirits which dearness have embraced?—
- 225 And then perhaps, ere the third spring come on,
 Sends home your diamond cracked, the beauty gone,
 And—more to know her, 'cause you shall not doubt
 her—
- A number of poor sparks twinkling about her.
- SIR OLIVER
 Now thou play'st Dowland's 'Lachrimae' to thy master.
- SAVOURWIT
 But shall I dry your eyes with a merry jig now,
 And make you look like sunshine in a shower?
- SIR OLIVER
 How, how, my honest boy, sweet Saviourwit?
- SAVOURWIT
 Young Master Sandfield, gallant Master Sandfield—
- SIR OLIVER
 Ha, what of him?
- SAVOURWIT Affects your daughter strangely.
- SIR OLIVER
 Brave Master Sandfield! Let me hug thy zeal
 Unto thy master's house. Ha, Master Sandfield!
 But he'll expect a portion.
- 235 SAVOURWIT Not a whit, sir,
 As you may use the matter.
- SIR OLIVER
 Nay, an the matter fall into my using,
 The devil a penny that he gets of me.
- 240 SAVOURWIT
 He lies at the mercy of your lock and key, sir.
 You may use him as you list.
- SIR OLIVER
 Sayst thou me so? Is he so far in doting?
- SAVOURWIT Quite over head and ears, sir. Nay, more, he means to run mad and break his neck off some high steeple if he have her not.
- 245 SIR OLIVER Now bless the young gentleman's gristles! I hope to be a grandfather yet by 'em.
- SAVOURWIT That may you, sir,
 To, marry, a chopping girl with a plump buttock
 Will hoist a farthingale at five years' old,
 And call a man between eleven and twelve
 To take part of a piece of mutton with her.
- 250 SIR OLIVER
 Ha, precious wag! Hook him in finely, do.
- SAVOURWIT
 Make clear the way for him first; set the gull going.
- 255 SIR OLIVER
 An ass, an ass; I'll quickly dash his wooing.

200 line verse, metre. Quibbles on the sense 'equatorial line,' anticipating equinoctial.

201 proportion (a) regular rhythm (b) due relation height Implies (a) quality of poetic style (b) elevation of a heavenly body above the horizon.

202 equinoctial (a) celestial equator (a glance at Weatherwise's interest in astrology) (b) terrestrial equator (probably hinting that Weatherwise has a rotund figure)

217 When...from (referring to payment for musical entertainment in taverns)

218 Strike play

224 which...embraced i.e. that have been conjoined with high value (with quibbles on dearness as 'affection' and embraced in its sexual sense)

227 more the better

228 sparks gallants (playing on the sense 'jewels' or 'sparkles')

229 Dowland's 'Lachrimae' i.e. John Dowland's Lachrimae, or Seven Tears (1604), a music collection with seven pavans based on Dowland's melancholy song 'Flow my Tears'.

230-1 But...shower From the proverb 'to laugh and cry like rain and sunshine'.

238 use the matter take advantage of the situation

244 over...ears (proverbial)

247 bless...gristles (an alteration of bless his bones that picks up on gristle as 'youthful, delicate man' and as having a phallic overtone)

250 chopping healthy, strong

251 farthingale framework of hoops supporting a skirt, made of whalebone. A phallic innuendo is possible.

253 take...mutton i.e. partake in lovemaking

255 gull fool

SAVOURWIT
 Why, now the clocks go right again. It must be a strange wit
 That makes the wheels of youth and age so hit.
 The one are dry, worn, rusty, furred, and soiled;
 260 Love's wheels are glib, ever kept clean and oiled.

SIR OLIVER
 I cannot choose but think of this good fortune.
 That gallant Master Sandfield!
Enter Weatherwise [with his almanac]
 WEATHERWISE [aside] Stay, stay, stay!
 What comfort gives my almanac today?
 Luck, I beseech thee!
 [He reads]
 265 'Good Days... Evil Days... June... July'. Speak a good word for me now, and I have her. Let me see. 'The fifth day, 'twixt hawk and buzzard. The sixth day, backward and forward.'—That was beastly to me, I remember.— 270 'The seventh day, on a slippery pin. The eighth day, fire and tow. The ninth day, the market is marred.'— That's long of the hucksters, I warrant you. But now, the eleventh day. Luck, I beseech thee now, before I look into't! 'The eleventh day, against the hair'.—A 275 pox on't, would that 'hair' had been left out! 'Against the hair'! That 'hair' will go nigh to choke me—had it been against anything but that, 'twould not have troubled me—because it lies cross i'th' way. Well, I'll try the fortune of a good face yet, though my almanac leave me i'th' sands.

SIR OLIVER [aside]
 280 Such a match, too! I could not wish a better.

WEATHERWISE Mass, here he walks!—Save you, sweet Sir Oliver! Sir Oliver Twilight!

SIR OLIVER O, pray come to me a quarter of a year hence;
 I have a little business now.

Exit

WEATHERWISE How, a quarter of a year hence? What, shall 285 I come to you in September?

SIR OLIVER
 Nor in November neither, good my friend.

WEATHERWISE You're not a mad knight; you will not let your daughter hang past August, will you? She'll drop 290 down under tree then. She's no winter fruit, I assure you, if you think to put her in crust after Christmas!

SIR OLIVER
 Sir, in a word, depart. My girl's not for you.
 I gave you a drowsy promise in a dream,
 But, broad awake now, I call't in again.
 Have me commended to your wit. Farewell, sir. 295

[Exit]

WEATHERWISE Now the devil run away with you, and some lousy fiddler with your daughter! May Clerkenwell have the first cut of her, and Houndsditch pick the bones! I'll never leave the love of an open-hearted widow for a 300 narrow-eyed maid again, go out of the roadway like an ass to leap over hedge and ditch. I'll fall into the beaten path again, and invite the widow home to a banquet.
 Let who list seek out new ways; I'll be at my journey's end before him.
 My almanac told me true how I should fare: 305
 Let no man think to speed against the hair. Exit

- A younger sister without portion, left
 10 No dowry in the Chamber beside wantonness?
 O miserable orphan!
 'Twixt two extremes runs there no blessèd mean,
 No comfortable strain, that I may kiss it?
 Must I to whoredom or to beggary lean,
 15 My mind being sound? Is there no way to miss it?
 Is't not injustice that a widow laughs,
 And lays her mourning part upon a wife;
 That she should have the garment, I the heart?
 My wealth her husband left her, and me her grief.
 20 Yet, stood all miseries in their loathèd'st forms
 On this hand of me, thick like a foul mist,
 And here the bright enticements of the world
 In clearest colours, flattery, and advancement,
 And all the bastard glories this frame jets in,
 25 Horror nor splendour, shadows fair nor foul,
 Should force me shame my husband, wound my soul.
Enter Mistress Jane, Sunset's daughter Cousin, you're welcome. This is kindly done of you To visit the despaired.
- JANE I hope not so, coz.
 The want of means cannot make you despaired.
 30 Love, not by wealth, but by desert is prized.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 You're pleased to help it well, coz.
- JANE I am come to you,
 Beside my visitation, to request you
 To lay your wit to mine, which is but simple,
 And help me to untie a few dark words
 35 Made up in knots—they're of the widow's knitting,
 That ties all sure—for my wit has not strength
 Nor cunning to unloose 'em.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER Good, what are they?—
 Though there be little comfort of my help.
- JANE
 She wished Sir Oliver's daughter and myself
 40 Good fortune in our choices, and repented her
 Of a rash oath she took when we were both infants
 A secret to conceal; but since all's well,
 She holds it best to keep it unrevealed.
 Now what this is, heaven knows.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER Nor can I guess.
 45 The course of her whole life, and her dead husband's,
 Was ever full of such dishonest riddles
 To keep right heirs from knowledge of their own.
 And now I'm put i'th' mind on't, I believe
 It was some prize of land or money given 50 By some departing friend upon their deathbed,
- Perhaps to yourself; and Sir Oliver's daughter
 May wrongfully enjoy it, and she hired—
 For she was but an hireling in those days—
 To keep the injury secret.
- JANE The most likeliest
 That ever you could think on!
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER Is it not? 55
- JANE
 Sure, coz, I think you have untied the knot.
 My thoughts lie at more ease. As in all other things,
 In this I thank your help; and may you live
 To conquer your own troubles and cross ends,
 As you are ready to supply your friends. 60
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 I thank you for the kind truth of your heart,
 In which I flourish when all means depart.
 [Jane begins to leave]
 Sure in that oath of hers there sleeps some wrong
 Done to my kinswoman.
Enter Footman
- JANE Who'd you speak withal?
 FOOTMAN The gentlewoman of this house, forsooth. 65
- JANE
 Whose footman are you?
- FOOTMAN One Sir Gilbert Lambstone's.
- JANE
 Sir Gilbert Lambstone's!—There my cousin walks.
- FOOTMAN
 Thank your good worship. [Exit Jane]
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER How now, whence are you?
- FOOTMAN [giving her a letter]
 This letter will make known.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER Whence comes it, sir?
- FOOTMAN
 From the knight my master, Sir Gilbert Lambstone. 70
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER Return't; I'll receive none on't.
 [She throws down the letter and turns away]
- FOOTMAN [aside] There it must lie then. I were as good run to Tyburn afoot and hang myself at mine own charges as carry it back again. Exit
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Life, had he not his answer? What strange impudence 75
 Governs in man when lust is lord of him!
 Thinks he me mad? 'cause I have no monies on earth
 That I'll go forfeit my estate in heaven,
 And live eternal beggar? He shall pardon me.
 That's my soul's jointure; I'll starve ere I sell that. 80

Yet I will read it, more to hate the writer.
 [She picks it up and reads]
 'Mistress Low-water,
 If you desire to understand your own comfort, hear me 85 out ere you refuse me. I'm in the way now to double the yearly means that first I offered you; and, to stir you more to me, I'll empty your enemy's bags to maintain you; for the rich widow the Lady Goldenfleece, to whom I have been a longer suitor than you a long adversary, 90 hath given me so much encouragement lately insomuch that I am perfectly assured the next meeting strikes the bargain. The happiness that follows this 'twere idle to inform you of. Only consent to my desires, and the widow's notch shall lie open to you. Thus much to 95 your heart I know you're wise. Farewell.
 Thy friend to his power,
 And another's,
 Gilbert Lambstone.'

In this poor brief what volumes has he thrust
 100 Of treacherous perjury and adulterous lust!
 So foul a monster does this wrong appear
 That I give pity to mine enemy here.
 What a most fearful love reigns in some hearts,
 That dare oppose all judgement to get means,
 105 And wed rich widows only to keep queans.
 What a strange path he takes to my affection,
 And thinks't the nearest way—'twill never be—
 Goes through mine enemy's ground to come to me.
 This letter is most welcome. I repent now
 110 That my last anger threw thee at my feet.
 My bosom shall receive thee.
 [She puts the letter in her bosom]
 Enter Sir Gilbert Lambstone

SIR GILBERT [aside] 'Tis good policy, too,
 To keep one that so mortally hates the widow.
 She'll have more care to keep it close herself;
 And look what wind her revenge goes withal,
 115 The self-same gale whisks up the sails of love.
 I shall loose much good sport by that.—Now, my sweet mistress!

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Sir Gilbert! You change suits oft; you were here
 In black but lately.

SIR GILBERT My mind ne'er shifts though.

120 MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside] A foul mind the whilst.—
 But sure, sir, this is but a dissembling glass

You sent before you. 'Tis not possible
 Your heart should follow your hand.
 SIR GILBERT Then may both perish!
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Do not wish that so soon, sir. Can you make
 A three-months' love to a rich widow's bed,
 125 And lay her pillow under a quean's head?
 I know you can't, howe'er you may dissemble't.
 You have a heart brought up better.

SIR GILBERT Faith, you wrong me in't.
 You shall not find it so. I do protest to thee,
 I will be lord of all my promises,
 130 And ere't be long thou shalt but turn a key
 And find 'em in thy coffer; for my love
 In matching with the widow is but policy
 To strengthen my estate and make me able
 To set off all thy kisses with rewards,
 135 That the worst weather our delights behold,
 It may hail pearl and shower the widow's gold.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 You talk of a brave world, sir.

SIR GILBERT 'Twill seem better
 When golden happiness breaks forth itself
 Out of the east port of the widow's chamber.
 140 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 And here it sets.

SIR GILBERT Here shall the down-fall be.
 Her wealth shall rise from her, and set in thee.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 You men have th'art to overcome poor women.
 Pray give my thoughts the freedom of one day,
 And all the rest take you.

SIR GILBERT
 I straight obey. [Aside] This bird's my own. 145
 Exit

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 There is no happiness but has her season
 Wherein the brightness of her virtue shines.
 The husk falls off in time that long shuts up
 The fruit in a dark prison; so sweeps by 150 The cloud of miseries from wretches' eyes,
 That yet, though fall'n, at length they see to rise.
 The secret powers work wondrously, and duly.

Wake, wake, and let not patience keep thee poor.

Make thy distress seem but a weeping dream,
And this the opening morning of thy comforts.
Wipe the salt dew off from thy careful eyes,
And drink a draught of gladness next thy heart
160 T'expel the infection of all poisonous sorrows.
- MASTER LOW-WATER
You turn me past my senses.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER Will you but second

I crave no more of thee but a following spirit.
Will you but grant me that?

No fear of the least ill. Take that to comfort thee.
- MASTER LOW-WATER
Yea?
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
Sleep not on't; this is no slumbering business.
'Tis like the sweating sickness: I must keep Your eyes still 'wake; you're gone if once you sleep.
- MASTER LOW-WATER

- Sc. 3 Enter Sir Oliver Twilight, with Master Sandfield, and Savourwit
- SIR OLIVER
Good Master Sandfield, for the great affection
You bear toward my girl, I am well pleased
You should enjoy her beauty. Heaven forbid, sir,
That I should cast away a proper gentleman,
5 So far in love, with a sour mood or so.
No, no, I'll not die guilty of a lover's neck-cracking.
Marry, as for portion, there I leave you, sir,
To the mercy of your destiny again;
I'll have no hand in that.
- SANDFIELD Faith, something, sir,
Be't but t'express your love.
- 10 SIR OLIVER I have no desire, sir,
To express my love that way, and so rest satisfied.
I pray take heed in urging, that too much
You draw not my love from me.
- SANDFIELD Fates foresee, sir.
- SIR OLIVER
Faith, then you may go seek out a high steeple
Or a deep water; there's no saving of you. 15
- SAVOURWIT [aside]
How naturally he plays upon himself!
- SIR OLIVER
Marry, if a wedding dinner, as I told you,
And three years' board, well lodged in mine house,
And eating, drinking, and a sleeping portion
May give you satisfaction, I am your man, sir; 20
Seek out no other.
- SANDFIELD I am content to embrace it, sir,
Rather than hazard languishment or ruin.
- SIR OLIVER
I love thee for thy wisdom. Such a son-in-law
Will cheer a father's heart. Welcome, sweet Master
Sandfield.
Enter Philip
Whither away, Philip?
- PHILIP To visit my love, sir, 25
Old Master Sunset's daughter.
- SIR OLIVER That's my Philip!
[To Philip and Sandfield] Ply't hard, my good boys both;
put 'em to't finely.
One day, one dinner, and one house shall join you.
- PHILIP and SANDFIELD
That's our desire, sir. Exeunt Philip and Sandfield
- SIR OLIVER Pish! Come hither, Savourwit. 30
Observe my son, and bring me word, sweet boy,
Whether h'as a speeding wit or no in wooing.
- SAVOURWIT
That will I, sir. [Aside] That your own eyes might tell ye.
I think it speedy your girl has a round belly. Exit
- SIR OLIVER
How soon the comfortable shine of joy
Breaks through a cloud of grief! 35
The tears that I let fall for my dead wife
Are dried up with the beams of my girl's fortunes.
Her life, her death, and her ten years' distress
Are e'en forgot with me. The love and care
That I owed her, her daughter shows it all. 40
It can but be bestowed, and there 'tis well.

 What news with him, trow? SERVANT Yes, sir. [Exit]

Enter Dutch Merchant, with a little Dutch Boy in great slops

DUTCH MERCHANT

SIR OLIVER Twilight?
 That's my name indeed, sir.
 I pray be covered, sir. You're very welcome.

DUTCH MERCHANT

This is my business, sir: I took into my charge
 A few words to deliver to yourself
 50 From a dear friend of yours that wonders strangely
 At your unkind neglect.
 SIR OLIVER Indeed? What might he be, sir?
 DUTCH MERCHANT Nay, you're i'th' wrong gender now.
 'Tis that distressed lady your good wife, sir.

SIR OLIVER

What say you, sir, my wife?
 55 DUTCH MERCHANT Yes, sir, your wife.
 This strangeness now of yours seems more to harden
 Th'uncharitable neglect she taxed you for.

SIR OLIVER

Pray give me leave, sir: is my wife alive?
 DUTCH MERCHANT

Came any news to you, sir, to th' contrary?
 SIR OLIVER

Yes, by my faith, did there.
 60 DUTCH MERCHANT Pray, how long since, sir?
 SIR OLIVER

'Tis now some ten weeks.
 DUTCH MERCHANT Faith, within this month, sir,
 I saw her talk and eat; and those, in our calendar,
 Are signs of life and health.

SIR OLIVER

Mass, so they are in ours.
 DUTCH MERCHANT

And these were the last words her passion threw me:
 65 'No grief', quoth she, 'sits to my heart so close
 As his unkindness and my daughter's loss.'
 SIR OLIVER

You make me weep, and wonder, for I swear
 I sent her ransom, and that daughter's here.
 DUTCH MERCHANT

Here? That will come well to lighten her of one grief.
 70 I long to see her for the piteous moan
 Her mother made for her.
 SIR OLIVER

That shall you, sir.—
 Within there!
 [Enter Servant]

SERVANT Sir.

SIR OLIVER

Here's strange boggling! I tell you, sir,
 Those that I put in trust were near me too.
 A man would think they should not juggle with me. 75
 My own son and my servant, no worse people, sir.

DUTCH MERCHANT

And yet oft-times, sir, what worse knave to a man
 Than he that eats his meat?
 SIR OLIVER

Troth, you say true, sir.
 I sent 'em simply, and that news they brought
 My wife had left the world; and with that son 80
 I sent to her, this brought his sister home.
 Enter Grace

Look you, sir, this is she.
 DUTCH MERCHANT

If my eye sin not, sir,
 Or misty error falsify the glass,
 I saw that face at Antwerp in an inn
 When I set forth first to fetch home this boy. 85

SIR OLIVER

How, in an inn?
 GRACE [aside] O, I am betrayed, I fear.
 DUTCH MERCHANT

How do you, young mistress?
 GRACE

Your eyes wrong your tongue, sir,
 And makes you sin in both. I am not she.
 DUTCH MERCHANT

No? Then I never saw face twice. Sir Oliver Twilight,
 I tell you my free thoughts. I fear you're blinded. 90
 I do not like this story. I doubt much
 The sister is as false as the dead mother.
 SIR OLIVER

Yea? Say you so, sir? I see nothing lets me
 But to doubt so too, then.
 [To Grace] So, to your chamber; we have done with
 you. 95
 GRACE [aside]

I would be glad you had.—Here's a strange storm!
 Sift it out well, sir. Till anon I leave you, sir. [Exit]

DUTCH MERCHANT

Business commands me hence, but as a pledge
 Of my return I'll leave my little son with you,
 Who yet takes little pleasure in this country, 100
 'Cause he can speak no English; all Dutch he.
 SIR OLIVER

A fine boy. He's welcome, sir, to me.

 DUTCH BOY [to Sir Oliver]
Ik dank je voor Uw Edelman vriendelijkheid.
 SIR OLIVER What says he, sir?
 DUTCH MERCHANT He thanks you for your kindness.
 SIR OLIVER Pretty knave!
 DUTCH MERCHANT
 Had not some business held me by the way,
 110 This news had come to your ear ten days ago.
 SIR OLIVER
 It comes too soon now, methinks. I'm your debtor.
 DUTCH MERCHANT
 But I could wish it, sir, for better ware.
 SIR OLIVER
 We must not be our own choosers in our fortunes.
Exit Dutch Merchant
 Here's a cold pie to breakfast: wife alive,
 115 The daughter doubtful, and the money spent!
 How am I juggled withal?
Enter Saviourwit
 SAVOURWIT It hits, i'faith, sir.
 The work goes even.
 SIR OLIVER O, come, come, come! Are you come, sir?
 SAVOURWIT
 Life, what's the matter now?
 SIR OLIVER There's a new reckoning come in since.
 SAVOURWIT [aside]
 Pox on't, I thought all had been paid.
 120 I can't abide these after-reckonings.
 SIR OLIVER
 I pray come near, sir; let's be acquainted with you.
 You're bold enough abroad with my purse, sir.
 SAVOURWIT
 No more than beseems manners and good use, sir.
 SIR OLIVER
 Did not you bring me word some ten weeks since
 My wife was dead?
 125 SAVOURWIT Yes, true, sir, very true, sir.
 SIR OLIVER
 Pray stay, and take my horse along with you.
 And, with the ransom that I sent for her,
 That you redeemed my daughter?
 SAVOURWIT Right as can be, sir.
 I never found your worship in a false tale yet.
 SIR OLIVER
 130 I thank you for your good word, sir; but I'm like
 To find your worship now in two at once.
- SAVOURWIT
 I should be sorry to hear that.
 SIR OLIVER I believe you, sir.
 Within this month my wife was sure alive—
 There's six weeks bated of your ten-weeks' lie—
 As has been credibly reported to me
 135 By a Dutch merchant, father to that boy,
 But now come over, and the words scarce cold.
 SAVOURWIT [aside]
 O strange! [To Sir Oliver] 'Tis a most rank untruth.
 Where is he, sir?
 SIR OLIVER
 He will not be long absent.
 SAVOURWIT [aside] All's confounded.
 [To Sir Oliver] If he were here, I'll tell him to his face,
 140 sir,
 He wears a double tongue that's Dutch and English.
 Will the boy say't?
 SIR OLIVER 'Las, he can speak no English.
 SAVOURWIT [aside]
 All the better. I'll gabble something to him.—
Hoyste kaloiste, kalooskin ee vou, dar sune, alla gaskin?
 DUTCH BOY Ik weet niet wat hij zegt.—Ik en verstaan U niet.
 145 SAVOURWIT
 Why, la, I thought as much!
 SIR OLIVER What says the boy?
 SAVOURWIT He says his father is troubled with an imperfection at one time of the moon, and talks like a madman.
 SIR OLIVER
 What, does the boy say so?
 SAVOURWIT I knew there was somewhat in't.
 150 Your wife alive! Will you believe all tales, sir?
 SIR OLIVER
 Nay, more, sir: he told me he saw this wench
 Which you brought home at Antwerp in an inn;
 Tells me I'm plainly cozened of all hands:
 'Tis not my daughter neither.
 SAVOURWIT [aside] All's broke out.
 155 [To Sir Oliver] How, not your daughter, sir? I must to't again.
 [To the Boy] Quisquinikin sadlamare, alla pisse kickin
sows-clows,
Hoff tofte le cumber shaw, bouns bus boxsceeno.
 DUTCH BOY Ik antwoord nooit geen klappende hik. Ik denk uit
 160 zijn zinnen.

104 Waar...dank-je 'Where is your bow and your thank-you'

105 Ik...vriendelijkheid 'I thank you for your kindness'. Edelman is literally 'nobleman'; this deferential form of address was antiquated.

108 knave fellow, rogue (with no opprobrium)

112 for exchanged for

114 cold pie to breakfast cold comfort (proverbial)

116 hits succeeds

126 stay wait

take...you i.e. don't gallop off ahead of me. From proverbial 'take me with you'.

134 bated deducted

145 Ik weet...niet 'I don't know what he says.—I understand you not'

153 Antwerp (centre of the English wool trade in Flanders)

154 of all hands on all sides

159-60 Ik antwoord...zinnen 'I never answer beating hiccups [i.e. nonsense]. I think [he is] out of his mind'

SAVOURWIT O, zein zennon! Aha, I thought how 'twould prove i'th' end. The boy says they never came near Antwerp—a quite contrary way, round about by Parma.

SIR OLIVER What's the same 'zein zennon'?

165 SAVOURWIT That is, he saw no such wench in an inn. 'Tis well I came in such happy time to get it out of the boy before his father returned again. Pray be wary, sir; the world's subtle. Come and pretend a charitable business in policy, and work out a piece of money on you!

170 SIR OLIVER Mass, art advised of that?

SAVOURWIT The age is cunning, sir; beside, a Dutchman will live upon any ground, and work butter out of a thistle.

SIR OLIVER
Troth, thou sayst true in that. They're the best thrivers

175 In turnips, artichokes, and cabbages; Our English are not like them.

SAVOURWIT O, fie, no, sir!

SIR OLIVER
Ask him from whence they came, when they came hither.

SAVOURWIT That I will sir.—Cullvaron lagooso, lageen, lagan, rufft, punkatee?

180 DUTCH BOY Neem U eige' te kakk'.

SAVOURWIT What, what? I cannot blame him then.

SIR OLIVER What says he to thee?

SAVOURWIT The poor boy blushes for him. He tells me his father came from making merry with certain of his countrymen, and he's a little steeped in English beer; there's no heed to be taken of his tongue now.

185 SIR OLIVER Hoyda! How com'st thou by all this? I heard him speak but three words to thee.

SAVOURWIT O, sir, the Dutch is a very wide language; you shall have ten English words even for one. As for example, gullder-goose: there's a word for you, master.

SIR OLIVER
Why, what's that same gullder-goose?

SAVOURWIT
'How do you and all your generation?'

SIR OLIVER
Why, 'tis impossible! How prove you that, sir?

195 SAVOURWIT 'Tis thus distinguished, sir: gull, 'how do you'; der, 'and'; goose, 'your generation'.

SIR OLIVER
'Tis a most saucy language. How cam'st thou by't?

SAVOURWIT
I was brought up to London in an eel-ship; There was the place I caught it first by th' tail.— [Aside] I shall be tripped anon. Pox, would I were gone!—
I'll go seek out your son, sir; you shall hear What thunder he'll bring with him.

200 SIR OLIVER Do, do, Saviourwit. I'll have you all face to face.

SAVOURWIT [aside] Cuds me!—What else, sir?— An you take me so near the net again, I'll give you leave to squat me. I have scaped fairly!

205 We are undone in Dutch; all our three-months' roguery
Is now come over in a butter firkin. Exit

SIR OLIVER
Never was man so tossed between two tales! I know not which to take, not which to trust. The boy here is the likeliest to tell truth, Because the world's corruption is not yet At full years in him. Sure he cannot know What deceit means; 'tis English yet to him. And when I think again, why should the father Dissemble for no profit? He gets none, 210 Whate'er he hopes for, and I think he hopes not. The man's in a good case, being old and weary, He dares not lean his arm on his son's shoulder For fear he lie i'th' dirt, but must be rather Beholding to a stranger for his prop.

220 Enter Dutch Merchant

DUTCH MERCHANT
I make bold once again, sir, for a boy here.

SIR OLIVER
O, sir, you're welcome. Pray resolve me one thing, sir: Did you within this month with your own eyes See my wife living?

DUTCH MERCHANT I ne'er borrowed any.
Why should you move that question, sir? Dissembling

225 Is no part of my living.

SIR OLIVER I have reason
To urge it so far, sir—pray be not angry though— Because my man was here since your departure, Withstands all stiffly, and, to make it clearer, 163 Parma In north Italy: an implausible detour.

170 Mass (an oath: 'by the mass')
art advised of have you considered

172-3 work ... thistle productively farmland on which only thistles grow. Comically varies the proverb 'To wring milk from a stone' with a product associated with the Dutch (see l. 207).

180 Neem ... kakk' 'Make shit of yourself'; i.e. make a fool of yourself

187 Hoyda (an exclamation of surprise)

191 gullder-goose Suggests gull the goose, slang for 'cheat the idiot', or gullder-goose, from the Dutch coin guilder, 'fool with his money'.

193 generation offspring

197 saucy (a) cheeky (because of the imputations of gullder-goose) (b) savoury, sauce-like (suggested by goose as food)

198 eel-ship The Dutch were reputed to be fond of eels.

199 by th' tail (as eels might be caught; with a possible pun on tale, as in l. 207)

202 thunder i.e. angry words

203 Cuds me (an expletive; literally 'God's me')

204-5 An ... squat me Saviourwit pictures himself as a tennis ball.

205 squat slam down, smash (as in the tennis stroke)

207 come over i.e. shipped to England butter firkin small cask of butter (as a typical import from Holland, and perhaps suggestive of the Merchant's appearance)

213 English i.e. foreign

217 in a good case well off (ironic)

218 He i.e. who

220 Beholding beholden

230 Questioned your boy in Dutch, who, as he told me,
Returned this answer first to him: that you
Had imperfection at one time o'th' moon,
Which made you talk so strangely.

DUTCH MERCHANT How, how's this?—
Zeg, jongen, ik ben gekweld met een dolligheid, een ontijf 235 van de maan, en koeterwalend?

DUTCH BOY Wee ik! Hij liegt in zijn bakkes die't zegt.

DUTCH MERCHANT Why, la you, sir! Here's no such thing.
He says he lies in's throat that says it.

SIR OLIVER Then the rogue lies in's throat, for he told me so,
240 And that the boy should answer at next question
That you ne'er saw this wench, nor came near Antwerp.

DUTCH MERCHANT Ten thousand devils!—Zei hij U ook niet, jongen, dat we niet kijf bij Antwerpen vandaan komen, noch zien de dochter daar?

245 DUTCH BOY Ik heb hem geen zulke dingen gezegd. Hij is een schelm, een rabauw!

DUTCH MERCHANT He says he told him no such matter; he's a knave and a rascal.

SIR OLIVER Why, how am I abused! Pray tell me one thing:
250 What's gullder-goose in Dutch?

DUTCH MERCHANT How, gullder-goose? There's no such thing in Dutch; it may be 'an ass' in English.

SIR OLIVER Hoyda! Then am I that ass in plain English. I am grossly cozened, most inconsiderately.

255 Pray let my house receive you for one night,
That I may quit these rascals, I beseech you, sir.

DUTCH MERCHANT If that may stead you, sir, I'll not refuse you.

SIR OLIVER A thousand thanks, and welcome!—
On whom can fortune more spit out her foam?

260 Worked on abroad, and played upon at home!

Exeunt

Sc. 4 Enter Weatherwise the gull, meeting the Clown and one or two servants bringing out a table [with twelve trenchers]

234-5 Zeg...koeterwalend? 'Tell me, boy,
I, am I tortured with a madness, a bad time of the moon, and raving?'

236 Wee...zegt 'Woe is me! He lies in his face that says it'

238 lies in's throat (proverbial)

242-4 Zei...daar? 'Didn't he tell you also, boy, that we certainly did not then come from Antwerp, nor saw the daughter there?' The sense required is 'Didn't you tell him...'

245-6 Ik...rabauw 'I have said no such thing to him. He is a rogue and a rascal'

252 an...English See note to l. 191.

256 quit requite

257 stead help

4.5 fetchd in (a) brought in (b) taken in, cheated

with the moon i.e. when the moon changes (with an allusion to menstruation)

6 roundlier more thoroughly

8 the...clock Hand and striking part of a clock have phallic innuendos, and dial suggests 'vulva'.

9 stand (a) put up with (b) have an erection

chamber (a) private room (b) vagina

13 are you double with (a) do you have two of (b) do you double up with 15 wore doublets A doublet was a man's body-garment. For women scandalously cross-dressing, see Roaring Girl.

Doublets also plays on double, l. 13, and so suggests promiscuity.

WEATHERWISE So, set the table ready. The widow's i'th' next room, looking upon my clock with the days and the months and the change of the moon. I'll fetch her in presently. [Exit]

CLOWN She's not so mad to be fetched in with the moon, 5 I warrant you. A man must go roundlier to work with a widow than to woo her with the hand of a dial, or to stir up her blood with the striking part of a clock. I should ne'er stand to show her such things in chamber.

Exeunt

Enter Weatherwise, with the Widow, Sir Gilbert
Lambstone, Master Pepperton, Master Overdone

WEATHERWISE Welcome, sweet widow, to a bachelor's 10 house here. A single man I, but for two or three maids that I keep.

WIDOW Why, are you double with them then?

WEATHERWISE An exceeding good mourning wit! Women are wiser than ever they were, since they wore doublets.
15 You must think, sweet widow, if a man keep maids they're under his subjection.

WIDOW That's most true, sir.

WEATHERWISE They have no reason to have a lock but the master must have a key to't.

WIDOW To him, Sir Gilbert; he fights with me at a wrong
20 weapon now.

[The Widow and Sir Gilbert talk apart]

WEATHERWISE [aside]

Nay, an Sir Gilbert strike, my weapon falls.

I fear no thrust but his. Here are more shooters,
But they have shot two arrows without heads;
25 They cannot stick i'th' butt yet. Hold out, knight,
And I'll cleave the black pin in th' midst o'th' white.

Exit

WIDOW [to Sir Gilbert] Nay, and he led me into a closet, sir, where he showed me diet drinks for several months, as scurvygrass for April, clarified whey for June, and the 30 like.

SIR GILBERT O madam, he is a most necessary property, an't be but to save our credit ten pound in a banquet.

WIDOW Go, you're a wag, Sir Gilbert!

19-20 They...to't (with a coital implication, developed in ll. 21-7)

24 shooters (pronounced the same as suitors)

25-6 they...yet Implies that Pepperton and Overdone are incapable of having an erection. Butt ('mark for archery practice') suggests 'vulva' or 'buttocks'.

27 the...white i.e. the peg in the middle of the inner white circle of the archer's target. 'Cleave the pin' was proverbial.

28 he i.e. Weatherwise

29 diet i.e. medicinal

30 scurvygrass (a plant believed effective against scurvy)

32 property means to an end, tool

34 wag mischievous joker

Scene 4

NO Wit Like a WOMANS.

35 SIR GILBERT How many there be in the world of his fortunes that prick their own calves with briers to make an easy passage for others, or, like a toiling usurer, sets his son a-horseback in cloth-of-gold breeches, while he himself goes to th' devil a-foot in a pair of old strossers!
40 But shall I give a more familiar sign?
His are the sweetmeats, but the kisses mine.
[He kisses her]
OVERDONE [aside] Excellent! A pox o' your fortune!
PEPPER-TON [to Overdone] Saucy courting has brought all modest wooing clean out of fashion. You shall have 45 few maids nowadays got without rough handling, all the town's so used to't; and most commonly too they're joined before they're married, because they'll be sure to be fast enough.
OVERDONE
Sir, since he strives t'oppose himself against us,
50 Let's so combine our friendships in our straits,
By all means graceful to assist each other.
For I protest it shall as much glad me
To see your happiness and his disgrace
As if the wealth were mine, the love, the place.
PEPPER-TON
55 And with the like faith I reward your friendship.
I'll break the bawdy ranks of his discourse
And scatter his libidinous whispers straight.—
Madam!
WIDOW How cheer you, gentlemen?
SIR GILBERT [aside] Pox on 'em!
They waked me out of a fine sleep; three minutes
60 Had fastened all the treasure in mine arms.
PEPPER-TON
You took no note of this conceit, it seems, madam.
WIDOW
Twelve trenchers, upon every one a month:
January, February, March, April—
PEPPER-TON
Ay, and their posies under 'em.
WIDOW
75 Pray what says May? She's the spring lady.
[She reads]
'Now gallant May in her array
Doth make the field pleasant and gay.'
OVERDONE [reading]
'This month of June use clarified whey
Boiled with cold herbs, and drink alway.'
WIDOW
'Drink't all away', he should say. 70
PEPPER-TON
'Twere much better indeed, and wholesomer for his liver.
SIR GILBERT
September's a good one here, madam.
WIDOW
O, have you chose your month? Let's hear't, Sir
Gilbert!
SIR GILBERT [reading]
'Now mayst thou physics safely take,
And bleed and bathe for thy health's sake. 75
Eat figs and grapes and spicery,
For to refresh thy members dry.'
WIDOW Thus it is still when a man's simple meaning lights among wantons. How many honest words have suffered corruption since Chaucer's days? A virgin would speak 80 those words then that a very midwife would blush to hear now, if she have but so much blood left to make up an ounce of grace. And who is this long on but such wags as you, that use your words like your wenches?
You cannot let 'em pass honestly by you but you must 85 still have a flirt at 'em.
PEPPER-TON You have paid some of us home, madam.
Enter Weatherwise
WEATHERWISE [aside] If conceit will strike this stroke, have at the widow's plumb-tree! I'll put 'em down all for a banquet.—Widow and gentlemen, my friends and 90 servants, I make you wait long here for a bachelor's pittance.
WIDOW O, sir, you're pleased to be modest.
WEATHERWISE No, by my troth, widow; you shall find it 95 otherwise.
Strike music. Enter [the Clown and servants with the] banquet, and six of Weatherwise's tenants with the twelve signs, made like banqueting-stuff, [in order:] Aries, Taurus, Gemini, Cancer, Leo,

Virgo, Libra, Scorpio, Sagittarius, Capricorn, Aquarius, and Pisces. [The tenants set the signs on the table, with Aries at the head and Pisces at the foot]

WIDOW What, the twelve signs!

WEATHERWISE These are the signs of my love, widow.

WIDOW

Worse meat would have served us, sir. By my faith, I'm sorry you should be at such charges, sir, 100 To feast us a whole month together here.

WEATHERWISE

Widow, thou'rt welcome a whole month and ever.

WIDOW

And what be those, sir, that brought in the banquet?

WEATHERWISE

Those are my tenants. They stand for fasting days.

SIR GILBERT

Or the six weeks in Lent.

WEATHERWISE

You're i'th' right, Sir Gilbert.—

105 Sweet widow, take your place at Aries here.

That's the head sign. A widow is the head

Till she be married.

WIDOW

What is she then?

WEATHERWISE

The middle.

WIDOW [sitting] 'Tis happy she's no worse.

WEATHERWISE

Taurus, Sir Gilbert Lambstone, that's for you.

They say you're a good town-bull.

110 SIR GILBERT [sitting]

O, spare your friends, sir.

WEATHERWISE

And Gemini for Master Pepperton.

He had two boys at once by his last wife.

PEPPERON [sitting]

I hear the widow find no fault with that, sir.

WEATHERWISE

Cancer the crab for Master Overdone,

115 For when a thing's past fifty it grows crookèd.

[Overdone sits]

WIDOW

Now for yourself, sir.

WEATHERWISE

Take no care for me, widow;

I can be anywhere. Here's Leo, heart and back;

Virgo, guts and belly.

I can go lower yet, and yet fare better,

Since Sagittarius fits me the thighs.

120

I care not if I be about the thighs;

I shall find meat enough.

[He sits]

WIDOW

But under pardon, sir,

Though you be lord o'th' feast and the conceit both,

Methinks it had been proper for the banquet

To have had the signs all filled, and no one idle.

125

WEATHERWISE I know it had; but whose fault's that, widow? You should have got you more suitors to have stopped the gaps.

WIDOW

Nay, sure, they should get us, and not we them.

There be your tenants, sir. We are not proud;

130

You may bid them sit down.

WEATHERWISE

By th' mass, it's true, too.

Then sit down, tenants, once, with your hats on; but spare the meat, I charge you, as you hope for new leases. I must make my signs draw out a month yet, with a bit every morning to breakfast, and at full-moon

135 with a whole one that's restorative. Sit round, sit round; and do not speak, sweet tenants. You may be bold enough, so you eat but little.

[The tenants sit]

How like you this now, widow?

WIDOW

It shows well, sir,

And like the good old hospitable fashion.

140

CLOWN How, like a good old hospital? My mistress makes an arrant gull on him.

WIDOW

But yet methinks there wants clothes for the feet.

95.6–8 The . . . foot The formally correct positions for the remaining signs would be to have Gemini, Leo, Libra, Sagittarius, and Aquarius along the side of the table to the left of Aries, and Taurus, Cancer, Virgo, Scorpio, and Capricorn opposite them. The staging would be more straightforward if Gemini and Taurus were transposed, so that Lambstone and Weatherwise could both face the audience, and if Virgo and Libra were transposed, so that at ll. 117–22 Weatherwise could proceed down one side of the table.

98 meat food

103 They . . . days (because they physically stand at various points in the zodiac 'year' to which no banqueting food is allotted)

105–6 Aries . . . sign The astrological signs were each thought to govern parts of the body: Aries, the head and face. The sign for Aries at the head of the table might be thought an inappropriate place for a female guest, especially as the ram is a male animal; though in Guazzo's Civil Conversation (see Introduction) a woman is appointed head of the feast, and the Widow's name Goldenfleece suggests the sheep or ram.

106 A . . . head (turning head to mean 'head of the family')

107 The middle (a) i.e. between husband and children in rank (b) pudendum

108 no worse i.e. (a) no lower in rank (b) not called a worse name

110 town-bull bull kept in turn by a village's farmers for servicing cows; 'stud'

116 Take no care for don't worry about

117–22 Here's . . . enough Further examples of the association between signs and parts of the body, with a joking allusion to their edibility.

119 lower i.e. (a) at table (b) in the body

120–2 Since . . . enough Weatherwise obliviously chooses a place where he is surrounded by tenants and at a distance from the Widow.

120 fits me accords with. Me is redundant except to emphasize the verb.

121 about (a) around, near (b) busy with

128 stopped the gaps (with a coital implication)

134 draw out last

143 the feet The part of the body associated with Pisces, whose place that wants clothes (i.e. is empty) is at the foot of the table. The Widow, four suitors, and six tenants fill the eleven occupied places.

WEATHERWISE That part's uncovered yet.—Push! No matter for the feet!
 145 WIDOW Yes, if the feet catch cold the head will feel it.
 WEATHERWISE Why then, you may draw up your legs, and lie rounder together.
 SIR GILBERT He's answered you well, madam.
 150 WEATHERWISE An you draw up your legs too, widow, my tenant will feel you there, for he's one of the calves.
 WIDOW Better and better, sir; your wit fattens as he feeds.
 CLOWN She's took the calf from his tenant and put it upon his ground now.
 [Enter a Servant]
 WEATHERWISE
 155 How now, my lady's man, what's the news, sir?
 SERVANT [to the Widow]
 Madam, there's a young gentleman below Has earnest business to your ladyship.
 WEATHERWISE
 Another suitor, I hold my life, widow.
 WIDOW [to the Servant]
 What is he, sir?
 SERVANT He seems a gentleman.
 160 That's the least of him, and yet more I know not.
 WIDOW
 Under the leave o'th' master of the house here, I would he were admitted.
 WEATHERWISE
 With all my heart, widow. I fear him not, Come cut and long tail. [Exit Servant]
 SIR GILBERT I have the least fear,
 165 And the most firmness; nothing can shake me.
 WEATHERWISE If he be a gentleman, he's welcome. There's a sign does nothing, and that's fit for a gentleman. The feet will be kept warm enough now for you, widow, for if he be a right gentleman he has his stockings warmed, 170 and he wears socks beside, partly for warmth, partly for cleanliness. And if he observe Fridays too, he comes excellent well; Pisces will be a fine fish dinner for him.
 WIDOW Why then you mean, sir, he shall sit as he comes.
 WEATHERWISE Ay; an he were a lord he shall not sit above
 175 my tenants. I'll not have two lords to them; so I may go look my rent in another man's breeches; I was not brought up to be so unmannerly!

Enter Mistress Low-water, as a gallant gentleman, her husband like a servingman after her
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside] I have picked out a bold time.—Much good do you, gentlemen. 180
 WEATHERWISE You're welcome as I may say, sir. 180
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER [to the Widow]
 Pardon my rudeness, madam.
 WIDOW No such fault, sir.
 You're too severe to yourself; our judgement quits you.
 Please you to do as we do?
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Thanks, good madam.
 WIDOW Make room, gentlemen.
 WEATHERWISE Sit still, tenants; I'll call in all your old leases 185 and rack you else.
 ALL TENANTS O, sweet landlord!
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER [to Master Low-water]
 Take my cloak, sirrah.—If any be disturbed, I'll not sit, gentlemen. I see my place.
 WEATHERWISE [aside] A proper woman turned gallant! 190 If the widow refuse me I care not if I be a suitor to him. I have known those who have been as mad and given half their living for a male companion.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 How, Pisces! Is that mine? 'Tis a conceited banquet.
 [She sits]
 WEATHERWISE If you love any fish, pray fall to, sir. If you 195 had come sooner, you might have happened among some of the flesh signs, but now they're all taken up. Virgo had been a good dish for you, had not one of my tenants been somewhat busy with her.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Pray let him keep her, sir. Give me meat fresh; 200 I'd rather have whole fish than broken flesh.
 SIR GILBERT
 What say you to a bit of Taurus?
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER No, I thank you, sir;
 The bull's too rank for me.
 SIR GILBERT How, sir?
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Too rank, sir.
 SIR GILBERT
 Fie, I shall strike you dumb, like all your fellows.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 What, with your heels or horns?

144 Push pish (a strong expletive)
 146 if...it (folk-wisdom that varies the proverb, 'The head and feet keep warm, the rest will take no harm')
 151 calves (a) lower legs (b) dolts (by extension of the sense 'young cows')
 152 Better and better (proverbial) he it
 153 calf (a) young cow (as an animal grazed on land) (b) the imputation of dolt 164 Come...tail Proverbial for 'come dogs of all kinds' (a cut is a dog with a docked tail), hence 'whatever happens, whoever comes'. Also suggests the genitals (cut meaning 'slit' or suggesting 'cunt', and tail able to apply to male or female organs), anticipating Mistress Low-water's disguised sexual identity.

 167 that's...gentleman (because the gentry had no trade or occupation)
 170 socks (part of a gentleman's costume)
 171 Fridays Fish was customarily eaten instead of meat on Fridays.
 173-5 Why...tenants Guests of higher social rank would usually sit nearer the head of the table.
 175 to in exchange for 176 look seek

 178-9 bold time time that calls for boldness
 182 quits requites
 186 rack charge excessive rent, extort
 190 A...gallant A hyperbolic comment on the gallant's effeminacy; Weatherwise does not actually see through the disguise.
 198 dish The slang sense 'attractive woman' was not current, but the word is here used metaphorically to similar effect.
 203 rank (a) foul, rancid (b) lustful
 204 your fellows i.e. fish

- 205 SIR GILBERT Perhaps with both. An honest citizen,
MISTRESS LOW-WATER Pityed her case, and married her to Aquarius,
It must be at dead low water, when I'm dead, then. An old water-bearer.
MASTER LOW-WATER [aside] And Pisces was her living ever after:
'Tis a brave Kate, and nobly spoke of thee. At Standard she sold fish, where he drew water. 245
- WEATHERWISE This quarrel must be drowned. Peccadill, my lady's fool! ALL THE REST
It shall be yours, sir.
- 210 CLOWN You're your own man, sir. WIDOW Meat and mirth too; you're lavish!
WEATHERWISE Prithee, step in to one o'th' maids— Your purse and tongue has been at cost today, sir.
CLOWN That I will, sir, and thank you too. SIR GILBERT [to Weatherwise] You may challenge all comers WEATHERWISE Nay, hark you, sir. Call for my sun-cup at these twelve weapons, I warrant you.
presently; I'd forgot it. Enter Clown, [without his doublet, with a cypress over his face, and bearing the sun-cup]
- 215 CLOWN How, your sun-cup?—Some cup, I warrant, that he stole out o'th' Sun Tavern! [Exit]
WIDOW [aside, looking on Mistress Low-water] CLOWN Your sun-cup, call you it? 'Tis a simple voyage 250
The more I look on him, the more I thirst for't. that I have made here: I have left my doublet within,
Methinks his beauty does so far transcend, for fear I should sweat through my jerkin, and thrown Turns the signs back, makes that the upper end. a cypress over my face, for fear of sun-burning.
- WEATHERWISE How now, who's this?—Why, sirrah!
CLOWN Can you endure it, mistress? 255
WIDOW Endure what, fool?
WEATHERWISE [taking the cup from the Clown] Fill the cup, coxcomb.
- CLOWN Nay, an't be no hotter I'll go put on my doublet again. Exit 260
WEATHERWISE What a whoreson sot is this! [To Master Low-water] Prithee, fill the cup, fellow, and give't the
widow.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER [to Master Low-water] Sirrah, how stand you? Bestow your service there upon her ladyship. 265 [Master Low-water fills the cup and offers it to the Widow]
- WIDOW
What's here, a sun?
WEATHERWISE It does betoken, madam,
A cheerful day to somebody.
- WIDOW [aside] It rises
Full in the face of yon fair sign, and yet
By course he is the last must feel the heat.—
Here, gentlemen, to you all, for you know the sun must 270 go through the twelve signs.

206 It... then Alludes to the stranding of fish on an exposed shore, quibbling on Mistress Low-water's name, and puns on dead as (a) absolute (b) not alive.

208 drowned (by drinking wine)
Peccadill An anglicization of peccadillo, alluding to the venial trespasses of a fool.

210 You're... man (implying Weatherwise is (a) not a servant (b) not married to my lady, so not in charge of the Clown (c) a decisive man)

211 step in to go inside to (but the Clown takes it as 'sexually enter')

213 sun-cup Evidently a goblet ornamented with a sun motif, to complement the zodiac signs.

216 Sun Tavern Located in London's New Fish Street.

219 Turns that it turns

223 a tale of these The signs are characterized in appropriate ways as London citizens.

229 shooter Refers to the bow and arrow of Sagittarius, and puns on sutor.

230 head chief (and referring to the head as the part of the body associated with Aries)

232 Crookèd Lane (adjoined New Fish Street)

234 Scorpio (appropriate as a usurer because of its sting)

236 Town-bull Street A comic alteration of the disreputable Turnbul Street. See note to l. 110.

239 Red Lion A tavern near the Tower of London.

240 Capricorn The word's association with goat's horns suggests someone who cuckolds.

242 Pityed her case Complicated by the quibble on case as 'vagina'.

245 Standard (a water conduit in Cheapside; with a phallic innuendo) sold fish With the implication 'practised prostitution'.

water With the implication 'semen'. Drew water probably refers to pimping.

246 It shall be yours (a phrase used to acknowledge a victory)

249.1 cypress piece of light, transparent cloth. If black, it would usually denote mourning.

250 simple fine (ironic)

- [She drinks]
 WEATHERWISE
 Most wittily, widow; you jump with my conceit right.
 There's not a hair between us.
 WIDOW [to Master Low-water] Give it Sir Gilbert.
 SIR GILBERT
 I am the next through whom the golden flame
 275 Shines when 'tis spent in thy celestial ram.
 The poor feet there must wait and cool a while.
 [He drinks]
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 We have our time, sir; joy and we shall meet.
 I have known the proud neck lie between the feet.
 [They drink in turn]
 WEATHERWISE So round it goes.
 280 Enter Clown
 CLOWN I like this drinking world well.
 [Pepperton drinks]
 WEATHERWISE [to Master Low-water] So fill t' him again.
 PEPPERON Fill t' me? Why, I drunk last, sir.
 WEATHERWISE
 I know you did, but Gemini must drink twice,
 Unless you mean that one of them shall be choked.
 WIDOW [aside]
 285 Fly from my heart all variable thoughts!
 She that's enticed by every pleasing object
 Shall find small pleasure, and as little rest.
 This knight hath loved me long; he's best and worthiest.
 I cannot but in honour see him requited.—
 Sir Gilbert Lambstone—
 290 MISTRESS LOW-WATER How? Pardon me, sweet lady,
 That with a bold tongue I strike by your words.—
 Sir Gilbert Lambstone?
 SIR GILBERT Yes, sir, that's my name.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 There should be a rank villain of that name.
 Came you out of that house?
 SIR GILBERT How, Sir Slave!
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 295 Fall to your bull; leave roaring till anon.
 WEATHERWISE Yet again! An you love me, gentlemen, let's have no roaring here. If I had thought that, I'd have sent my bull to the Bear Garden.
 PEPPERON Why, so you should have wanted one of your 300 signs.
- WEATHERWISE But I may chance want two now, an they fall together by the ears.
 WIDOW
 What's the strange fire that works in these two creatures?
 Cold signs both, yet more hot than all their fellows.
 [The cup comes round to Mistress Low-water]
 WEATHERWISE Ho, Sol in Pisces! The Sun's in New Fish
 305 Street; here's an end of this course.
 CLOWN [to the Widow] Madam, I am bold to remember your worship for a year's wages and an livery-cloak.
 WIDOW
 How, will you shame me? Had you not both last week, fool?
 CLOWN Ay, but there's another year passed since that.
 310 WIDOW
 Would all your wit could make that good, sir.
 CLOWN I am sure the sun has run through all the twelve signs since; and that's a year, these gentlemen can witness.
 WEATHERWISE The fool will live, madam.
 315 CLOWN Ay, as long as your eyes are open, I warrant him.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER [to Master Low-water] Sirrah!
 MASTER LOW-WATER Does your worship call?
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Commend my love and service to the widow;
 Desire her ladyship to taste that morsel.
 320 [She gives him the letter]
 MASTER LOW-WATER [aside]
 This is the bit I watched for all this while;
 But it comes duly.
 [He takes the letter to the Widow]
 SIR GILBERT [to Mistress Low-water]
 And wherein has this name of mine offended,
 That you're so liberal of your infamous titles,
 I but a stranger to thee? It must be known, sir, 325 Ere we two part.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Marry, and reason, good sir.
 WIDOW [reading the letter]
 O strike me cold! This should be your hand, Sir
 Gilbert?
 SIR GILBERT Why, make you question of that, madam? 'Tis one of the letters I sent you.
 WIDOW [rising as if to leave] Much good do you, gentlemen!
 330 ALL THE SUITORS [rising] How now? What's the matter?

- 272 jump accord
conceit idea, whim
 273 not a hair between (proverbial)
 275 when . . . ram i.e. after it has passed through Aries
 278 neck (associated with Taurus, hence Sir Gilbert)
feet (associated with Pisces, hence
 Mistress Low-water)
 291 strike by i.e. sound the time as prompted by (taking tongue as 'bell-clapper') 295 Fall to your bull i.e. set to eating your banqueting-stuff. Sir Gilbert may have risen to his feet in the previous line.
roaring (a) bellowing (b) brawling
 298 Bear Garden (a bull-baiting pit)
 302 fall . . . ears (proverbial) 304 Cold signs The temperament associated with each sign was described in terms of heat and moisture. Taurus was considered cold and dry, Pisces cold and wet.
 305 Sol the sun
 305–6 The . . . Street See note to l. 216.
 307 remember remind 315 will live i.e. must earn a living (but the Clown takes the words more literally)
 316 your eyes are open i.e. you are alive
 324 infamous titles insulting names
 326 reason with good reason

- WEATHERWISE Look to the widow; she paints white. Some aqua coelistic for my lady. [To the Clown] Run, villain!
- 335 CLOWN Aqua solister? Can nobody help her case but a lawyer, and so many suitors here?
- WIDOW
O treachery unmatched, unheard of!
- SIR GILBERT How do you, madam?
- WIDOW
O impudence as foul! Does my disease
Ask how I do? Can it torment my heart,
And look with a fresh colour in my face?
- SIR GILBERT
What's this, what's this?
- 340 WEATHERWISE I am sorry for this qualm, widow.
- WIDOW
He that would know a villain when he meets him,
Let him ne'er go to a conjuror;
[She shows him the letter]
Here's a glass
Will show him without money, and far truer.
[To Mistress Low-water] Preserver of my state, pray tell me, sir,
- 345 That I may pay you all my thanks together,
What blest hap brought that letter to your hand
Frames me so fast locked in mine enemy's power?
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
I will resolve you, madam. I have a kinsman
Somewhat infected with that wanton pity
350 Which men bestow on the distress of women,
Especially if they be fair and poor.
With such hot charity, which indeed is lust,
He sought t'entice, as his repentance told me,
Her whom you call your enemy, the wife
355 To a poor gentleman, one Low-water—
- WIDOW
Right, right, the same.
- MASTER LOW-WATER [aside]
Had it been right, 't'ad now been.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
And according to the common rate of sinners, Offered large maintenance, which with her seemed nothing;
For if she would consent, she told him roundly,
360 There was a knight had bid more at one minute
Than all his wealth could compass; and withal
- Plucked out that letter as it were in scorn;
Which by good fortune he put up in jest,
With promise that the writ should be returnable
The next hour of his meeting. But, sweet madam,
365 Out of my love and zeal I did so practise
The part upon him of an urgent wooer
That neither he nor that returned more to her.
- SIR GILBERT [aside]
Plague o' that kinsman!
- WEATHERWISE Here's a gallant rascal!
- WIDOW [to Mistress Low-water]
Sir, you have appeared so noble in this action,
370 So full of worth and goodness, that my thanks
Will rather shame the bounty of my mind
Than do it honour. [To Sir Gilbert] O, thou treacherous villain!
Does thy faith bear such fruit?
Are these the blossoms of a hundred oaths 375 Shot from thy bosom? Was thy love so spiteful
It could not be content to mock my heart—
Which is, in love, a misery too much—
But must extend so far to the quick ruin
Of what was painfully got, carefully left me,
380 And 'mongst a world of yielding needy women
Choose no one to make merry with my sorrows,
And spend my wealth on in adulterous surfeits,
But my most mortal enemy? O, spiteful!
Is this thy practice? Follow it; 'twill advance thee.
385 Go, beguile on. Have I so happily found
What many a widow has with sorrow tasted,
Even when my lip touched the contracting cup,
E'en then to see the spider? 'Twas miraculous!
Crawl with thy poisons hence, and for thy sake
390 I'll never covet titles and more riches,
To fall into a gulf of hate and laughter.
I'll marry love hereafter; I've enough,
And wanting that, I have nothing. There's thy way.
[She points to a door]
- OVERDONE
Do you hear, sir? You must walk.
- PEPPER TON Heart, thrust him downstairs! 395
- WEATHERWISE
Out of my house, you treacherous, lecherous rascal!
- SIR GILBERT [to them all]
All curses scatter you! [Exit]

332 paints white turns pale (literally, 'whitens her face with make-up')

333 aqua coelistic A cordial. The c is pronounced 's'.

334 solister The Clown's mishearing allows a pun on solicitor.

case (a) situation (b) lawsuit (c) vagina

339 look . . . face (a) appear to give fresh colour to my face (referring to the metaphorical disease) (b) look, with its own fresh colour, at my [pale] face (referring to Sir Gilbert)

340 qualm fit of sickness

342 glass magic crystal

347 Frames that forms, articulates, shows

356 Had . . . been i.e. the story is no more true than Low-water's present appearance (?)

363 put up pocketed

364 writ letter

376 Shot (a) uttered (b) sprouted

386 found found out

388 the contracting cup i.e. betrothal, figured as drinking a pledge

389 spider Thought to produce poison.

The image of the spider in the cup is associated with knowledge of a spouse's adultery in Winter's Tale 2.1.40–5.

392 To in order to

394 that i.e. love

Scene 4

No wit like a Womans.

WEATHERWISE Life, do you thunder here?
If you had stayed a little longer, I'd have ripped out some of my bull out of your belly again.

400 PEPPERTON [to Mistress Low-water] 'Twas a most noble discovery. We must love you for ever for't.

WIDOW [to Weatherwise]
Sir, for your banquet and your mirth we thank
you;—

You, gentlemen, for your kind company;—
[To Mistress Low-water] But you, for all my merry days to come,

Or this had been the last else.

405 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Love and fortune
Had more care of your safety, peace, and state,
madam.

WEATHERWISE [aside]
Now will I thrust in for't.

PEPPERTON [aside] I'm for myself now.

OVERDONE [aside]
What's fifty years? 'Tis man's best time and season.
Now the knight's gone, the widow will hear reason.

410 MASTER LOW-WATER [aside to Mistress Low-water]
Now, now the suitors flutter, hold on, Kate.
The hen may pick the meat while the cocks prate.

Exeunt

Sc. 5 Enter Master Sandfield, Philip (Sir Oliver Twilight's son), with Saviourwit

PHILIP [to Saviourwit]
If thou talk'st longer, I shall turn to marble,
And death will stop my hearing.

SANDFIELD Horrible fortune!

SAVOURWIT
Nay, sir, our building is so far defaced
There is no stuff left to raise up a hope.

5 PHILIP
O, with more patience could my flesh endure
A score of wounds, and all their several searchings,
Than this that thou hast told me.

SAVOURWIT Would that Flemish ram
Had ne'er come near our house! There's no going home

10 As long as he has a nest there, and his young one,
A little Flanders egg new-fledged. They gape
For pork, and I shall be made meat for 'em.

PHILIP
'Tis not the bare news of my mother's life—
May she live long and happy—that afflicts me
With half the violence that the latter draws.

15 Though in that news I have my share of grief,

As I had share of sin and a foul neglect,
It is my love's betraying that's the sting
That strikes through flesh and spirit; and since nor wit

From thee in whom I ne'er saw ebb till now
Nor comforts from a faithful friend can ease me, 20
I'll try the goodness of a third companion,
What he'll do for me.

[He draws his sword and offers to kill himself]

SANDFIELD Hold! Why, friend!

SAVOURWIT Why, master, is this all your kindness, sir: offer to steal into another country and ne'er take your leave on's? Troth, I take it unkindly at your hands, sir; but I'll put it up for once. 25
[He puts up Philip's sword]

Faith, there was no conscience in this, sir. Leave me here to endure all weathers, whilst you make your soul dance like a juggler's egg upon the point of a rapier?
By my troth, sir, you're to blame in't. You might have given us an inkling of your journey; perhaps others 30 would as fain have gone as you.

PHILIP
Burns this clay-lamp of miserable life,
When joy, the oil that feeds it, is dried up?
*Enter his Mother, new landed, with Master Beveril
(a gentleman scholar) and servants*

MOTHER
He has removed his house.

BEVERIL So it seems, madam.

MOTHER
I'll ask that gentleman. [To Philip] Pray can you tell me, sir, 35
Which is Sir Oliver Twilight's?

PHILIP Few can better, gentlewoman.
It is the next fair house your eye can fix on.

MOTHER
I thank you, sir.—Go on. [Exeunt servants]
He had a son

About some ten years since.

PHILIP That son still lives. 40

MOTHER I pray, how does he, sir?

PHILIP
Faith, much about my health. [Aside] That's never worse.—
If you have any business to him, gentlewoman,
I can cut short your journey to the house.
I'm all that ever was of the same kind. 45

MOTHER
O my sweet son! Never fell fresher joy
Upon the heart of mother!—This is he, sir.

397 thunder Draws on thunder (a) as a sign of Jove's wrath and (b) in the sense 'roar'.

398–9 Pd... again Refers to the eaten sign of Taurus; and perhaps varies the proverb 'I wish it were in your belly', a way of retorting an insult.

5.3 defaced destroyed

6 several distinct, various searchings probings (to cleanse and heal)

20 friend i.e. Sandfield

25 put it up (a) put up with it (b) put up the sword

32 clay-lamp The body was proverbially pictured as a house of clay.

33 joy, the oil The biblical 'oil of joy' was God's comfort for mourners (Isaiah 61:3).

33.1 new landed i.e. still dressed for the voyage. The servants may carry a trunk.

BEVERIL
 My seven years' travel has e'en worn him out
 Of my remembrance.
 SAVOURWIT [aside] O, this gear's worse and worse!
 PHILIP [kneeling to his Mother]
 50 I am so wonder-struck at your blest presence
 That through amazed joy I neglect my duty.
 MOTHER [raising him]
 Rise, and a thousand blessings spring up with thee!
 SAVOURWIT [aside]
 I would we had but one in the mean time;
 Let the rest grow at leisure.
 MOTHER
 55 But know you not this gentleman yet, son?
 PHILIP
 I take it's Master Beveril.
 BEVERIL My name's Beveril, sir.
 PHILIP [embracing him]
 Right welcome to my bosom!
 MOTHER You'd not think, son,
 How much I am beholding to this gentleman:
 As far as freedom. He laid out the ransom,
 Finding me so distressed.
 60 PHILIP 'Twas worthily done, sir,
 And I shall ever rest your servant for't.
 BEVERIL
 You quite forget your worth. 'Twas my good hap, sir,
 To return home that way after some travels,
 Where finding your good mother so distressed,
 65 I could not but in pity see her released.
 PHILIP
 It was a noble charity, sir. Heaven quit you!
 SAVOURWIT [aside]
 It comes at last.
 BEVERIL I left a sister here
 New married when I last took leave of England.
 PHILIP
 O, Mistress Low-water!
 BEVERIL Pray, sir, how does she?
 PHILIP
 70 So little comfort I can give you, sir,
 That I would fain excuse myself for silence.
 BEVERIL
 Why, what's the worst, sir?
 PHILIP Wrongs has made her poor.
 BEVERIL
 You strike my heart. Alas, good gentlewoman!

PHILIP Here's a gentleman;
 You know him: Master Sandfield.
 BEVERIL [to Sandfield] I crave pardon, sir. 75
 PHILIP
 He can resolve you from her kinswoman.
 SANDFIELD
 Welcome to England, madam.
 MOTHER Thanks, good sir.
 [The Mother, Beveril, and Sandfield speak apart]
 PHILIP [aside to Savourwit]
 Now there's no way to scape; I'm compassed round.
 My shame is like a prisoner set with halberds.
 SAVOURWIT
 80 Pish, master! Master, 'tis young flood again,
 And you can take your time now. Away, quick!
 PHILIP
 Push! Thou'st a swimming head!
 SAVOURWIT Will you but hear me?
 When did you lose your tide when I set forth with
 you?
 PHILIP
 That's true.
 SAVOURWIT
 85 Regard me then. Though you have no feeling,
 I would not hang by th' thumbs with a good will.
 PHILIP
 I hang by th' heart, sir, and would fain have ease.
 SAVOURWIT
 Then this or none: fly to your mother's pity,
 For that's the court must help you. You're quite gone
 At common law; no counsellor can hear you
 Confess your follies, and ask pardon for 'em. 90
 Tell her the state of all things; stand not nicely.
 The meat's too hard
 To be minced now; she breeds young bones by this time.
 Deal plainly; heaven will bless thee. Turn out all,
 And shake your pockets after it. 95
 Beg, weep, kneel, anything; 'twill break no bones,
 man.
 Let her not rest, take breathing time, nor leave thee
 Till thou hast got her help.
 PHILIP Lad, I conceive thee.

Scene 5

No wit like a Womans.

BEVERIL [to Sandfield]
 Ah, my poor sister!

MOTHER 'Las, good gentlewoman!
 My heart e'en weeps for her.
Philip shogs his Mother

PHILIP
 May I crave one word, madam?

MOTHER With me, son?
 The more, the better welcome.

SAVOURWIT [aside] Now, now, luck!
 I pray not often; the last prayer I made
 Was nine year old last Bartholomew-tide.
 'Twould have been a jolly chopper an 't'ad lived
 Till this time.

MOTHER [to Philip]
 Why do your words start back? Are they afraid
 Of her that ever loved them?

PHILIP I have a suit to you, madam.

MOTHER
 You have told me that already; pray, what is't?
 If't be so great my present state refuse it,
 I shall be abler; then command and use it.
 Whate'er't be, let me have warning to provide for't.

PHILIP [knelling]
 Provide forgiveness then, for that's the want
 My conscience feels. O, my wild youth has led me
 Into unnatural wrongs against your freedom once.
 I spent the ransom which my father sent,
 To set my pleasures free while you lay captive.

SAVOURWIT [aside]
 He does it finely, faith.

MOTHER And is this all now?
 You use me like a stranger; pray stand up.

PHILIP
 Rather fall flat; I shall deserve yet worse.

MOTHER [raising Philip]
 Whate'er your faults are, esteem me still a friend,
 Or else you wrong me more in asking pardon
 Than when you did the wrong you asked it for;
 And since you have prepared me to forgive you,
 Pray let me know for what; the first fault's nothing.

SAVOURWIT [aside]
 'Tis a sweet lady, every inch of her.

PHILIP
 Here comes the wrong then that drives home the rest.

PHILIP I saw a face at Antwerp that quite drew me
 From conscience and obedience. In that fray
 I lost my heart; I must needs lose my way.
 There went the ransom, to redeem my mind.

Stead of the money, I brought over her,
 And, to cast mists before my father's eyes,
 Told him it was my sister, lost so long,
 And that yourself was dead. You see the wrong.

MOTHER
 This is but youthful still.—O, that word 'sister'
 Afflicts me when I think on't!—I forgive thee
 As freely as thou didst it. For, alas,
 This may be called good dealing to some parts
 That love and youth plays daily among sons.

SAVOURWIT [aside]
 She helps our knavery well; that's one good comfort.

PHILIP
 But such is the hard plight my state lives in,
 That 'twixt forgiveness I must sin again,
 And seek my help where I bestowed my wrongs.
 O mother, pity once, though against reason!—
 'Cause I can merit none. Though my wrongs grieve
 ye,
 Yet let it be your glory to relieve me.

MOTHER
 Wherein have I given cause yet of mistrust,
 That you should doubt my succour and my love?
 Show me but in what kind I may bestow 'em.

PHILIP
 There came a Dutchman with report this day
 That you were living.

MOTHER Came he so lately?

PHILIP Yes, madam.
 Which news so struck my father on the sudden
 That he grows jealous of my faith in both.
 These five hours have I kept me from his sight,
 And wished myself eternally so hid;
 And, surely, had not your blest presence quickened
 The flame of life in me, all had gone out.
 Now to confirm me to his trust again
 And settle much aright in his opinion,
 Say but she is my sister, and all's well.

MOTHER
 You ask devotion like a bashful beggar
 That pure need urges, and not lazy impudence;
 And, to express how glad I am to pity you,
 My bounty shall flow over your demand.
 I will not only with a constant breath
 Approve that, but excuse thee for my death.

SAVOURWIT [aside] Why, here's a woman made as a man would wish to have her!

PHILIP
 O, I am placed higher in happiness
 Than whence I fell before!

 175 can keep our own.
 Now hufty-tufty, our pipes play as loftily!
 BEVERIL [to Sandfield] My sister fled?
 SANDFIELD
 Both fled; that's the news now. Want must obey;
 Oppressions came so thick, they could not stay.
 BEVERIL
 180 Mean are my fortunes, yet had I been nigh
 Distress nor wrong should have made virtue fly.
 MOTHER
 Spoke like a brother worthy such a sister.
 BEVERIL
 Grief's like a new wound: heat beguiles the sense;
 For I shall feel this smart more three days hence.
 185 Come, madam. Sorrow's rude, and forgets manners.
Exeunt; manet Savourwit
 SAVOURWIT Our knavery is for all the world like a shifting bankrupt: it breaks in one place, and sets up in another.
 He tries all trades, from a goldsmith to a tobacco-seller;
 we try all shifts, from an outlaw to a flatterer. He cozens 190 the husband and compounds with the widow; we cozen my master and compound with my mistress. Only here I turn o'th' right hand from him: he is known to live like a rascal, when I am thought to live like a gentleman.

Sc. 6 Enter Kate Low-water, with her man-husband, [both disguised as before]
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 I have sent in one to th' widow.
 MASTER LOW-WATER Well said, Kate.
 Thou ply'st thy business close. The coast is clear yet.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Let me but have warning,
 I shall make pretty shift with them.
 MASTER LOW-WATER That thou shalt, wench.
Exit
 [Enter Servant]
 SERVANT
 5 My lady, sir, commends her kindly to you,
 And for the third part of an hour, sir,
 Desires your patience.
 Two or three of her tenants out of Kent
 Will hold her so long busied.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Thank you, sir.
[Exit Servant]

'Tis fit I should attend her time and leisure. 10
 Those were my tenants once. But what relief
 Is there in what hath been, or what I was?
 'Tis now that makes the man. A last-year's feast
 Yields little comfort for the present humour.
 He starves that feeds his hopes with what is past. 15
[Enter Master Low-water, disguised as before]
 How now?
 MASTER LOW-WATER They're come, newly alighted.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Peace, peace.
 I'll have a trick for 'em; look you second me well
 now.
 MASTER LOW-WATER I warrant thee.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER I must seem very imperious, I can tell you;
 Therefore if I should chance to use you roughly, 20
 Pray forgive me beforehand.
 MASTER LOW-WATER With all my heart, Kate.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER You must look for no obedience in these clothes;
 That lies in the pocket of my gown.
 MASTER LOW-WATER Well, well, I will not then.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER I hear 'em coming; step back a little, sir. 25
*[Master Low-water steps back.] Enter Master Weatherwise, Master Pepperton, and Master
 Overdone, suitors*
 Where be those fellows? Who looks out there? Is there ne'er a knave i'th' house to take those gentlemen's horses? Where wait you today? How, stand you like a dreaming goose in a corner? The gentlemen's horses, forsooth! 30
 MASTER LOW-WATER Yes, an't like your worship. [Exit] PEPPERTON [to the other suitors] What's here? A strange alteration!
 WEATHERWISE A new lord! Would I were upon my mare's back again then! 35
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Pray, gentlemen, pardon the rudeness of these grooms.
 I hope they will be brought to better fashion.
 In the mean time, you're welcome, gentlemen.
 ALL THE SUITORS We thank you, sir.
 WEATHERWISE Life, here's quick work! I'll hold my life he's 40 struck the widow i'th' right planet.

176 hufty-tufty Expresses superiority and giddy behaviour; also imitative of the sound of pipes.
 186 shifting (a) deceitful (b) changing abode
 187 breaks (a) decamps (b) becomes bankrupt
 189 shifts (a) expedients, tricks, frauds (b) livelihoods
 190 compounds comes to an agreement
 192 o'th' right hand (a) to the right-hand side (b) in the right direction

6.1 said done
 2 ply'st (a) work away at (b) steer, tack (as with a sailing vessel) close (a) rigorously (b) secretly (c) close to the wind
The coast is clear (proverbial)
 4 pretty artful, clever shift contrivance, stratagem
 13 'Tis...man Varies the proverb 'manners make the man'.

14 humour mood, inclination
 22 these clothes (her disguise)
 23 the...gown i.e. (a) my female identity as constructed through clothing (b) my sexuality (evoked by a quibble on pocket and gown as 'vagina')
 26 looks out is on duty
 29 goose simpleton
 41 i'th' right planet i.e. when the right planet is dominant

[He looks in his almanac]
 Venus in Cauda! I thought 'twas a lecherous planet that goes to't with a caudle.
 [Enter Master Low-water, disguised as before]
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER How now, sir?
 45 MASTER LOW-WATER The gentlemen's horses are set up, sir.
 PEPPERTON No, no, no, we'll away.
 WEATHERWISE We'll away.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER How? By my faith, but you shall not yet, by your leave! [To Master Low-water] Where's Bess?
 50 Call your mistress, sir, to welcome these kind gentlemen my friends. [Exit Master Low-water]
 PEPPERTON and OVERDONE How, Bess? Peg?
 WEATHERWISE Plain Bess! I know how the world goes then; 55 he has been a-bed with Bess, i'faith. There's no trust to these widows; a young horsing gentleman carries 'em away clear.
 [Enter Master Low-water, disguised as before]
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER [to Master Low-water] Now where's your mistress, sir? How chance she comes not?
 MASTER LOW-WATER Sir, she requests you to excuse her for 60 a while; she's busy with a milliner about gloves.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Gloves?
 WEATHERWISE Hoyda, gloves too!
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER [to Master Low-water] Could she find no other time to choose gloves but now when my 65 friends are here?
 PEPPERTON No, sir, 'tis no matter; we thank you for your good will, sir. To say truth, we have no business with her at all at this time, i'faith, sir.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER O, that's another matter. Yet stay, 70 stay, gentlemen, and taste a cup of wine ere you go.
 OVERDONE No thank you, sir.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Master Pepperton? Master Weatherwise, will you, sir?
 WEATHERWISE I'll see the wine in a drunkard's shoes first, 75 and drink't after he has brewed it. But let her go;
 she's fitted, i'faith. A proud surly sir here; he domineers already; one that will shake her bones and go to dice with her money, or I have no skill in a calendar. Life, he that can be so saucy to call her 'Bess' already will call her 'prating quean' a month hence. Exeunt suitors 80
 MASTER LOW-WATER
 They have given thee all the slip.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER So, a fair riddance!
 There's three rubs gone; I've a clear way to th'
 mistress.
 MASTER LOW-WATER
 You'd need have a clear way, because you're a bad
 pricker.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Yet if my bowl take bank, I shall go nigh
 To make myself a saver. 85
 Here's alley-room enough; I'll try my fortune.
 I am to begin the world like a younger brother;
 I know that a bold face and a good spirit
 Is all the jointure he can make a widow;
 And't shall go hard but I'll be as rich as he, 90
 Or at least seem so, and that's wealth enough.
 For nothing kills a widow's heart so much
 As a faint bashful wooer. Though he have thousands,
 And come with a poor water-gruel spirit
 And a fish-market face, he shall ne'er speed. 95
 I would not have himself left a poor widower.
 MASTER LOW-WATER Faith, I'm glad I'm alive to commend thee, Kate. I shall be sure now to see my commendations delivered.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 I'll put her to't, i'faith.
 MASTER LOW-WATER But soft ye, Kate. 100
 How an she should accept of your bold kindness?
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 A chief point to be thought on, by my faith.
 Marry, therefore, sir, be you sure to step in, for fear I should shame myself, and spoil all.
 MASTER LOW-WATER Well, I'll save your credit then for 105
 once, but look you come there no more.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Away; I hear her coming.
 MASTER LOW-WATER I am vanished. Exit

42 Cauda Latin for 'tail'; here referring to the 'Dragon's Tail', almanac terminology for the passage of the Moon or a planet across the ecliptic from north of it to south (i.e. through the 'descending node'). The malevolent aspect of planets (for Venus, lust) was thought to be augmented at this time.
 43 caudle warm, spiced drink, here seen as an aphrodisiac. Puns on Cauda.
 45 set up put up in the stable
 49 Bess Short forms of the first name were considered appropriate only from husband to wife, or to a whore.
 52 Peg Another familiar name, emphasizing Overdone's astonishment at Bess.
 60 gloves (customary gifts from the bride to the groom's men)

 69 that's another matter that changes the situation
 75 brewed (a) fermented (b) poured out (i.e. vomited)
 76 fitted well matched, fittingly punished
 77-8 shake ... money Dice were made of bone.
 80 prating quean gossiping whore
 82 rubs impediments. Specifically, unevenness in the turf in a game of bowls.
mistress (a) 'jack' or target bowl (b) wooed woman 83 pricker (a) horseman, rider (b) someone who aims at the prick or target (c) wielder of a penis
 84 bank i.e. the raised bank of the bowling green, which could be used to curve the bowl round an obstacle (with a pun on the sense 'gaming stake')

 85 make ... saver i.e. compensate for my loss
 86 alley-room passage-way. An alley was an enclosure for bowls.
 87 younger brother (who could expect little or no inheritance and would have to seek his fortune)
 90 but I'll if I'll not
 95 fish-market i.e. pale and watery (in contrast with flesh-market)
 96 a poor widower (having married a wife both poor and sickly)
 105 credit (a) credibility (as a man) (b) reputation (as a virtuous wife)

Enter Widow

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

How does my life, my soul, my dear sweet madam?

WIDOW

I have wronged your patience, made you stand too long here.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

110 There's no such thing, i'faith, madam; you're pleased to say so.

WIDOW Yes, I confess I was too slow, sir.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER Why, you shall make me amends for that then with a quickness in your bed.

WIDOW That were a speedy 'mends, sir.

115 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Why then you are out of my debt. I'll cross the book, and turn over a new leaf with you.

WIDOW So with paying a small debt I may chance run into a greater.

120 MISTRESS LOW-WATER My faith, your credit will be the better then. There's many a brave gallant would be glad of such fortune, and pay use for't.

WIDOW Some of them have nothing else to do; they would be idle an 'twere not for interest.

125 MISTRESS LOW-WATER I promise you, widow, were I a setter-up, such is my opinion of your payment I durst trust you with all the ware in my shop.

WIDOW I thank you for your good will; I can have no more.

130 MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside] Not of me, i'faith, nor that neither an you know all.—Come, make but short service, widow: a kiss and to bed. I'm very hungry, i'faith, wench.

WIDOW What are you, sir?

135 MISTRESS LOW-WATER O, a younger brother, has an excellent stomach, madam, worth a hundred of your sons and heirs that stay their wedding stomachs with a hot bit of a common mistress, and then come to a widow's bed like a flash of lightning. You're sure of the first of me, not of the five hundredth of them. I never took physick yet in my life; you shall have the doctor continually with them, or some bottle for his deputy: out flies your monies for restoratives and strength'nings. In me, 'tis saved in your purse, and found in your children. They'll get peevish pothecaries' stuff—you may weigh 'em by th' ounces—I, boys of war, brave commanders that shall bear a breadth in their shoulders and a weight in their hips, and run over a whole country with a pound o' beef and a biscuit in their belly. Ho, widow, my kisses are virgins, my embraces perfect, my strength solid, my love constant, my heat comfortable—but to come to the point, inutterable.

WIDOW

But soft ye, soft ye. Because you stand so strictly Upon your purity, I'll put you to't, sir. Will you swear here you never yet knew woman?

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [kneeling]

Never as man e'er knew her, by this light, widow. 155

WIDOW

What, what, sir? [Aside] 'Shrew my heart, he moves me much.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

Nay, since you love to bring a man on's knees, I take into the same oath thus much more: That you're the first widow, or maid, or wife That ever I in suit of love did court Or honestly did woo. [Rising] How say you to that, widow? 160

WIDOW Marry, I say, sir, you had a good portion of chastity left you, though ill fortune run away with the rest.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER That I kept for thee, widow. She's of fortune, and all her strait-bodied daughters. Thou shalt have't, widow. 165

[She embraces her]

WIDOW Push! What do you mean?

MISTRESS LOW-WATER I cannot bestow't better.

WIDOW I'll call my servants.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER By my troth, you shall not, madam. 170
Enter Master Low-water [disguised as before]

MASTER LOW-WATER

Does your worship call, sir?

110 pleased kind, well-disposed

114 'mends amends

116 cross the book cancel the account

turn...leaf (proverbial)

119 credit (a) positive reckoning of money (b) reputation

121 fortune (a) sum of money (b) good luck use for't (a) interest on it (b) for the use of it

123 interest i.e. the money-lending system

124-5 setter-up beginner in business

129-30 Not...neither i.e. not of my body...nor of my good will

131 service (a) shop service (b) religious service, ceremony (c) sexual 'servicing'

134 has who has

136 stay (a) hold back, appease; or (b) sustain, strengthen

137 bit morsel

140 physic medicine

143 'tis The money is saved and the strength is found.

144 get beget

147-8 a...biscuit (soldiers' rations)

149 perfect complete, undivided

150 comfortable cheering, pleasure-giving

155 by this light An asseveration; this light is the sun.

157 on's onto his

159 widow...wife (the three proverbial classifications of women)

162 portion inheritance

163 the rest i.e. wealth

164-5 of fortune Chastity might be regarded as morally enriching, but at 1.211-14 Savourwit points out that it is also a commodity.

165 strait-bodied sexually restrained. Also

'narrow-bodied', i.e. young, virginal, boyish. As such the term is relevant to the opposite cross-dressing to Mistress Low-water's, and generally to the playing of women's roles by boy actors. Ironically, Mistress Low-water associates the chastity of her male disguised role with a slightly ambiguated female image. There may be a hint of sexual desirability, to some at least: Ben Jonson referred to 'strait-bodied [narrow-fitting] city attire' able to 'stir a courtier's blood'. daughters female adherents. Glances at the impossibility of a chaste woman having literal daughters.

167 Push pish. Can also be equivalent to interjectory 'fuck', which may be relevant here.

Scene 6

NO Help Like a WOMANS.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER Ha, pox! Are you peeping?
Throws somewhat at him. [Exit Master Low-water]
 [Aside] He came in a good time, I thank him for't.

WIDOW
 What do you think of me? You're very forward, sir.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Extremity of love.

WIDOW You say you're ignorant;
 175 It should not seem so, surely, by your play.
 For aught I see, you may make one yourself;
 You need not hold the cards to any gamester.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 That love should teach men ways to wrong itself!

WIDOW
 180 Are these the first-fruits of your boldness, sir?
 If all take after these, you may boast on 'em.
 There comes few such to market among women.
 Time you were taken down, sir.—Within there!

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside] I've lost my way again.
 There's but two paths that leads to widows' beds;
 That's wealth or forwardness; and I've took the 185 wrong one.
Enter a Servant, with the suitors

SERVANT [to the suitors]
 He, marry my lady? Why, there's no such thought
 yet. [Exit]

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside]
 O, here they are all again too!

WIDOW Are you come, gentlemen?
 I wish no better men.

WEATHERWISE O, the moon's changed now!

WIDOW
 See you that gentleman yonder?

PEPPERTON Yes, sweet madam.

WIDOW
 190 Then pray be witness all of you: with this kiss
 I choose him for my husband—
 [She kisses Mistress Low-water]

ALL THE SUITORS A pox on't!

WIDOW
 And with this parted gold, that two hearts join.
 [She parts gold and gives one part to Mistress
 Low-water]

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Never with chaster love than this of mine.

WIDOW
 And those that have the hearts to come to th'
 wedding,
 They shall be welcome for their former loves. Exit 195

PEPPERTON
 No, I thank you; you've choked me already.

WEATHERWISE I never suspected mine almanac till now. I believe he plays Cogging John with me. I bought it at his shop; it may learn the more knavery by that.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Now indeed, gentlemen, I can bid you welcome; 200
 Before 'twas but a flourish.

WEATHERWISE Nay, so my almanac told me:
 [Reading] 'There should be an eclipse, but not visible in our horizon, but about the western inhabitants of Mexicana and California.'

MISTRESS LOW-WATER Well, we have no business there, sir. 205

WEATHERWISE Nor we have none here, sir; and so fare you
 well.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER You save the house a good labour, gentlemen. Exeunt suitors
 The fool carries them away in a voider.—Where be 210
 these fellows?
Enter Servants: the Clown, and Master Low-water, [disguised as before,] and another Servant

SERVANT Sir.

CLOWN Here, sir.

SERVANT What your worship' pleasure?

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 O, this is something like. [To Master Low-water] Take 215
 you your ease, sir;
 Here are those now more fit to be commanded.

MASTER LOW-WATER [aside] How few women are of thy mind! She thinks it too much to keep me in subjection for one day, whereas some wives would be glad to keep their husbands in awe all days of their lives, and think 220
 it the best bargain that e'er they made. [Exit]

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 I'll spare no cost for th' wedding; some device too,
 To show our thankfulness to wit and fortune.
 It shall be so. [To the Clown] Run straight for one o'th' wits.

CLOWN How, one o'th' wits? I care not if I run on that 225 account. Are they in town, think you?

MISTRESS LOW-WATER Whither runn'st thou now?

CLOWN To an ordinary, for one of the wits.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER Why to an ordinary, above a tavern?

230 CLOWN No, I hold your best wits to be at ordinary; nothing so good in a tavern.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER And why, I pray, sir?
CLOWN Because those that go to an ordinary dine better for twelve pence than he that goes to a tavern for his 235 five shillings; and I think those have the best wits that can save four shillings, and fare better too.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER So, sir, all your wit then runs upon victuals.
CLOWN 'Tis a sign 'twill hold out the longer then.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER [to Servant]
What were you saying to me?
240 SERVANT Please your worship,
I heard there came a scholar over lately
With old Sir Oliver's lady.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside]
Is she come?—
What is that lady?
SERVANT A good gentlewoman,
Has been long prisoner with the enemy.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside]
245 I know't too well, and joy in her release.—
Go to that house then straight, and in one labour
You may bid them and entreat home that scholar.
SERVANT
It shall be done with speed, sir.
CLOWN I'll along with you,
And see what face that scholar has brought over:
250 a thin pair of parbreaking sea-water-green chops, I warrant you. [Exeunt Servant and Clown]
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
Since wit has pleased me, I'll pleasure wit;
Scholars shall fare the better. O, my blessing!
I feel a hand of mercy lift me up
255 Out of a world of waters, and now sets me
Upon a mountain where the sun plays most,
To cheer my heart e'en as it dries my limbs.
What deeps I see beneath me, in whose falls
Many a nimble mortal toils
260 And scarce can feed himself. The streams of fortune,
'Gainst which he tugs in vain, still beat him down,
And will not suffer him, past hand-to-mouth,
To lift his arm to his posterity's blessing.
I see a careful sweat run in a ring
265 About his temples, but all will not do;
For till some happy means relieve his state,
There he must stick, and bide the wrath of fate.

I see this wrath upon an uphill land.
O, blest are they can see their falls, and stand!
Enter Beveril [and Servant]
How now?
SERVANT With much entreating, sir, he's come. 270
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
Sir, you're—[aside] My brother! Joys come thick together.—
Sir, when I see a scholar, pardon me,
I am so taken with affection for him
That I must run into his arms and clasp him.
[She embraces him]
BEVERIL
Art stands in need, sir, of such cherishers; 275
I meet too few. 'Twere a brave world for scholars
If half a kingdom were but of your mind, sir;
Let ignorance and hell confound the rest.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
Let it suffice, sweet sir, you cannot think
How dearly you are welcome.
BEVERIL [kneeling] May I live 280
To show you service for't.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER [raising him]
Your love, your love, sir;
We go no higher, nor shall you go lower.
Sir, I'm bold to send for you to request
A kindness from your wit for some device
To grace our wedding. It shall be worth your pains; 285
And something more t'express my love to art,
You shall not receive all in bare embracements.
BEVERIL
Your love I thank; but pray, sir, pardon me;
I've a heart says I must not grant you that.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
No? What's your reason, sir?
BEVERIL I'm not at peace 290
With the lady of this house. Now you'll excuse me.
She's wronged my sister, and I may not do't.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER The widow knows you not.
BEVERIL
I never saw her face, to my remembrance.
O, that my heart should feel her wrongs so much, 295
And yet live ignorant of the injurer!
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
Let me persuade thee, since she knows you not,
Make clear the weather, let not griefs betray you.
I'll tell her you're a worthy friend of mine—

the stream'.

258 deeps deep waters (perhaps also 'abysses')

Scene 6

No Witt, no helpe like a Woman

300 [Aside] And so I tell her true; thou art indeed.
Enter Widow
 Sir, here she comes.
 WIDOW What, are you busy, sir?
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Nothing less, lady. Here's a gentleman
 Of noble parts, beside his friendship to me.
 Pray give him liberal welcome.
 WIDOW He's most welcome.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 305 The virtues of his mind will deserve largely.
 WIDOW
 Methinks his outward parts deserve as much then;
 A proper gentleman it is.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Come, worthy sir.
 BEVERIL
 I follow. [Exeunt; manet Beveril]
 310 Check thy blood,
 For fear it prove too bold to wrong thy goodness.
 A wise man makes affections but his slaves.
 Break 'em in time; let 'em not master thee.
 O, 'tis my sister's enemy, think of that!
 Some speedy grief fall down upon the fire,
 315 Before it take my heart; let it not rise
 'Gainst brotherly nature, judgement, and these wrongs.
 Make clear the weather.
 O, who could look upon her face in storms?
 Yet pains may work it out. Griefs do but strive 320 To kill this spark; I'll keep it still alive. [Exit]

Sc. 7 Enter the three late suitors (Weatherwise, Pepperton, and Overdone) joined with Sir Gilbert Lambstone

WEATHERWISE
 Faith, Sir Gilbert, forget and forgive.
 There's all our hands to a new bargain of friendship.
 PEPPERTON
 Ay, and all our hearts to boot, Sir Gilbert.
 WEATHERWISE Why, la you, there's but four suitors left 5 on's in all th' world, and the fifth has the widow; if we should not be kind to one another, and so few on's, i'faith, I would we were all raked up in some hole or other.

SIR GILBERT
 Pardon me, gentlemen; I cannot but remember
 Your late disgraceful words before the widow
 10 In time of my oppression.
 WEATHERWISE Puh, Saturn reigned then, a melancholy, grumbling planet; he was in the third house of privy enemies, and would have bewrayed all our plots. Beside, there was a fiery conjunction in the Dragon's Tail that 15 spoilt all that e'er we went about.
 SIR GILBERT
 Dragon or devil, somewhat 'twas, I am sure.
 WEATHERWISE Why, I tell you, Sir Gilbert, we were all out of our wits in't. I was so mad at that time myself, I could have wished an hind-quarter of my bull out of 20 your belly again, whereas now I care not if you had eat tail and all. I am no niggard in the way of friendship.
 I was ever yet at full moon in good fellowship, and so you shall find if you look into the almanac of my true nature.
 SIR GILBERT
 Well, all's forgiven for once. Hands apace, gentlemen.
 WEATHERWISE Ye shall have two of mine to do you a kindness.
 [He clasps hands with Sir Gilbert]
 [Aside] Yet when they're both abroad, who shall look 30 to th' house here?
 PEPPERTON and OVERDONE Not only a new friendship, but a friend.
 [They clasp hands with Sir Gilbert]
 SIR GILBERT
 But upon this condition, gentlemen:
 You shall hear now a thing worth your revenge.
 WEATHERWISE An you doubt that,
 35 You shall have mine before-hand. I've one ready;
 I never go without a black oath about me.
 SIR GILBERT
 I know the least touch of a spur in this
 Will now put your desires to a false gallop,
 By all means sland'rous, in every place
 40 And in all companies, to disgrace the widow,
 No matter in what rank so it be spiteful
 And worthy your revenges. So now I.
 It shall be all my study, care, and pains.
 And we can lose no labour; all her foes
 45

307 proper handsome, well-framed
 310 bold eager 311 affections passions. Beveril has fallen in love with his sister's enemy.
 312 Break 'em reduce them to obedience
 319 work it out exhaust it, expell it
 7.0.1 late former
 1 forget and forgive (proverbial)
 2-3 There's...boot (from the proverb
 'with heart and hand')
 11 oppression trouble, distress
 12 reigned had predominant influence
 13 third house The heavens were notionally divided into segments known as houses, through which the heavenly bodies passed each day: six houses below the horizon and six in the visible sky. The house in which a planet was situated at a given time was thought to modify its influence. In fact the twelfth house was traditionally associated with enemies.

 14 bewrayed revealed
 15 fiery conjunction A conjunction is when two bodies appear in the same sign of the zodiac. It is fiery (or 'combust') when one of them is the sun. The other is presumably Venus, the planet in the Dragon's Tail at 6.40. With a sexual implication: 'hot-blooded copulation' (OED, Conjunction, 2b), which (a) refers to the supposed gentleman and the Widow, and (b) quibbles on tail as 'anus'

 (taken up in 'Dragon or devil').
Dragon's Tail See note to 6.42 and
 previous note.
 30 th' house i.e. the almanac
 37 black malignant, deadly 39 false gallop canter. Often used figuratively of unregulated speech; 'to run a false gallop' was proverbial.
 42 rank (a) kind, manner (b) rankness
 45 lose no labour (proverbial)

Will make such use on't that they'll snatch it from us Faster than we can forge it, though we keep Four tongues at work upon't and never cease.
 Then, for the indifferent world, faith, they're apter
 50 To bid a slander welcome than a truth.
 We have the odds of our side. This in time
 May grow so general, as disgrace will spread,
 That wild dissension may divide the bed.
 WEATHERWISE and PEPPERON
 Excellent!
 OVERDONE
 A pure revenge; I see no dregs in't.
 SIR GILBERT
 55 Let each man look to his part now, and not feed
 Upon one dish all four on's, like plain maltmen;
 For at this feast we must have several kickshaws
 And delicate-made dishes, that the world
 May see it is a banquet finely furnished.
 WEATHERWISE
 60 Why then, let me alone for one of your kickshaws.
 I have thought on that already.
 SIR GILBERT Prithee, how, sir?
 WEATHERWISE Marry, sir, I'll give it out abroad that I have lain with the widow myself. As 'tis the fashion of many a gallant to disgrace his new mistress when 65 he cannot have his will of her, and lie with her name in every tavern though he ne'er came within a yard of her person; so I, being a gentleman, may say as much in that kind as a gallant: I am as free, by my father's copy.
 70 SIR GILBERT This will do excellent, sir!
 WEATHERWISE And moreover, I'll give the world thus much to understand beside: that if I had not lain with the widow in the wane of the moon at one of my Seven Stars houses when Venus was about business 75 of her own and could give no attendance, she had been brought abed with two roaring boys by this time, and the Gemini being infants, I'd have made away with them like a step-mother, and put mine own boys in their places.
 SIR GILBERT
 Why, this is beyond talk; you outrun your master. 80
Enter Clown
 CLOWN Whoop, draw home next time! Here are all the old shooters that have lost the game at pricks. What a fair mark had Sir Gilbert on't if he had shot home before the last arrow came in! Methinks these show to me now for all the world like so many lousy beggars 85 turned out of my lady's barn, and have ne'er a hole to put their heads in.
 WEATHERWISE
 Mass, here's her ladyship's ass; he tells us anything.
 SIR GILBERT
 Ho, Peccadill!
 CLOWN What, Sir Gilbert Lambstone!
 Gentlemen, outlaws all, how do you do? 90
 SIR GILBERT
 How! What dost call us? How goes the world at home, lad?
 What strange news?
 CLOWN This is the state of prodigals as right as can be:
 when they have spent all their means on brave feasts, they're glad to scrape to a servingman for a meal's 95 meat.
 So you that whilom like four prodigal rivals
 Could goose or capon, crane or woodcock, choose,
 Now're glad to make up a poor meal with news.
 A lamentable hearing! 100
 WEATHERWISE
 He's in passion, up to the eyebrows for us.
 CLOWN O, Master Weatherwise, I blame none but you.
 You are a gentleman deeply read in Pond's Almanac;
 methinks you should not be such a shallow fellow.
 105 You knew this day the twelfth of June would come
 When the sun enters into the Crab's room,
 And all your hopes would go aside, aside.

48 tongues Puns on the instrument used in handling metal in the forge.
 49 for as for
 53 That so that
 56 maltmen maltsters, beer-brewers
 57 kickshaws dainty dishes
 60 let me alone leave it to me
 65 lie (a) go to bed (b) tell lies
 66 yard Puns on the measurement of distance and the tavern courtyard.
 68 free (a) of the class of gentleman and above (b) free-tongued, unconstrained
 68–9 by my father's copy (a) as established in my father's legal document (b) by virtue of being a copy (i.e. son) of my father (c) by my father's rights as a copyholder (a recognized tenant on an estate, as distinct from a bondman). Sense (c) reflects the usual legal sense of copy, but undercuts Weatherwise's claim to gentry status.

73 in...moon Associated with age, and here with lack of vigour.
 74 houses taverns (with a quibble on astrological houses)
Venus i.e. (a) the planet conducive to sexual love, and (b) the tavern maid
 77 Gemini twins (in Weatherwise's astrological diction)
 80 your master i.e. the almanac
 81 draw home draw arrows that hit the target; i.e. better luck
 82 shooters (pronounced the same as suitors)
at pricks (a) to hit the bull's-eye (b) with penises 83 mark (a) archery target (b) vulva
 86–7 have...in Proverbial for homelessness; with a sexual innuendo.
 90 outlaws i.e. banished men
 96 meat food

97 whilom formerly
 98 goose...woodcock The Clown probably indicates each suitor in turn. Goose and woodcock were by-words for stupidity; capon suggests impotence; the crane was notoriously clumsy in taking flight, and was considered greedy. All were highly esteemed as food.
 100 hearing report, news. The strangest news is the suitors' eagerness for news.
 103 Pond's Almanac Edward Pond began publishing almanacs in 1601. The information that follows is not from Pond, who is named, as deeply and shallow suggest, for a pun on a pond of water.
 105 the twelfth of June (the summer solstice in the old-style calendar, when the sun entered Cancer)
 107 aside Crabs move sideways.

WEATHERWISE The fool says true, i'faith, gentlemen. I knew 'twould come all to this pass. I'll show't you presently.

CLOWN
110 If you had spared but four of your twelve signs now,
You might have gone to a tavern and made merry with 'em.

WEATHERWISE H'as the best moral meaning of an ass that e'er I heard speak with tongue. Look you here
gentlemen.

[He reads from his almanac]
115 'Fifth day, neither fish nor flesh.'

CLOWN
No, nor good red herring an you look again.

WEATHERWISE 'Sixth day, privily prevented.'

CLOWN Marry, faugh!

WEATHERWISE 'Seventh day, shrunk in the wetting.'

CLOWN
120 Nay, so will the best ware bought for love or money.

WEATHERWISE 'The eighth day, over head and ears.'

CLOWN By my faith, he come home in a sweet pickle then!

WEATHERWISE 'The ninth day, scarce sound at heart.'

CLOWN What a pox ailed it?

125 WEATHERWISE 'The tenth day, a courtier's welcome.'

CLOWN That a cup of beer, an you can get it.

WEATHERWISE 'The eleventh day, stones against the wind.'

CLOWN Pox of an ass, he might have thrown 'em better!

WEATHERWISE Now the twelfth day, gentlemen—that was 130 our day—'past all redemption'.

CLOWN Then the devil go with't.

WEATHERWISE
Now you see plainly, gentlemen, how we're used.
The calendar will not lie for no man's pleasure.

SIR GILBERT
Push! You're too confident in almanac posies.

PEPPERTON
Faith, so said we.

SIR GILBERT They're mere delusions.

135 WEATHERWISE How?
You see how knavishly they happen, sir.

SIR GILBERT
Ay, that's because they're foolishly believed, sir.

[Sir Gilbert and the Clown talk apart]

WEATHERWISE Well, take your courses, gentlemen, without 'em, and see what will come on't. You may wander like masterless men; there's ne'er a planet will care a 140 halfpenny for you. If they look after you, I'll be hanged, when you scorn to bestow twopence to look after them.

SIR GILBERT [to the Clown] How, a device at the wedding, sayst thou?

CLOWN Why, have none of you heard of that yet? 145

SIR GILBERT 'Tis the first news, i'faith, lad.

CLOWN O, there's a brave travelling scholar entertained into the house o' purpose, one that has been all the world over, and some part of Jerusalem. H'as his chamber, his diet, and three candles allowed him after 150 supper.

WEATHERWISE By my faith, he need not complain for victuals then, whate'er he be.

CLOWN He lies in one of the best chambers i'th' house, bravely matted; and to warm his wits as much, a cup 155 of sack and an aqua vitae bottle stands just at his elbow.

WEATHERWISE He's shrewdly hurt, by my faith! If he catch an ague of that fashion, I'll be hanged.

CLOWN He'll come abroad anon.

SIR GILBERT Art sure on't? 160

CLOWN Why, he ne'er stays a quarter of an hour in the house together.

SIR GILBERT No? How can he study then?

CLOWN Fah, best of all: he talks as he goes, and writes as he runs. Besides, you know, 'tis death to a traveller to 165 stand long in one place.

SIR GILBERT
It may hit right, boys!—Honest Peccadill,
Thou wast wont to love me.

CLOWN I'd good cause, sir, then.

SIR GILBERT [giving money]
Thou shalt have the same still; take that.

CLOWN Will you believe me now, I ne'er loved you better
170 in my life than I do at this present.

SIR GILBERT
Tell me now truly, who are the presenters?
What persons are employed in the device?

109 presently at once

111 tavern Appropriate because taverns display inn-signs.

115–30 Fifth...redemption The mottoes are assembled from various 'evil days' between March and December in Bretnor's 1611 almanac, except the ambiguous 'a courtier's welcome', which is listed as a 'good day'.

115 neither...flesh Proverbial for 'neither one thing nor the other', but here suggesting 'nothing of any kind will come of it', alluding to fish as the food of fast-days; and with the bawdy suggestion of no sexual success.

116 nor good red herring A common amplification of the proverb, ruling out the flesh-like fish.

117 privily prevented The Clown picks up on the lavatory senses of privy and vented.

118 faugh An expression of disgust.

119 shrunk in the wetting (proverbial)

120 for love or money (proverbial)

121 over head and ears (proverbial for 'completely immersed')

122 By...then (implying that he is over head and ears in drink or mire)

in...pickle (proverbial)

125 a courtier's welcome Presumably polite but cold and meagre, as indicated by a cup of beer. The phrase is from Bretnor.

127 stones against the wind (proverbial for a futile act)

131 Then...with't (picking up on the religious sense of redemption)

133 lie tell lies (and quibbling on 'lie in bed for sex')

134 Push pish

140 masterless men unemployed itinerents

141 look after take care of (but in l. 133, 'seek after')

142 twopence (the price of an almanac)

156 aqua vitae i.e. spirits such as brandy

157 shrewdly cursedly, badly (used ironically)

158 of that fashion in that way

164 goes walks

171 at this present (a) right now (b) for this gift

173 persons (pronounced the same as parsons)

175 CLOWN Parsons? Not any, sir. My mistress will not be at the charge; she keeps none but an old Welsh vicar.
SIR GILBERT Prithce, I mean who be the speakers?
CLOWN Troth, I know none but those that open their mouths.
Enter Master Beveril, [with a pasteboard]
Here he comes now himself; you may ask him.
180 WEATHERWISE Is this he? By my faith, one may pick a gentleman out of his calves and a scholar out on's cheeks; one may see by his looks what's in him. I warrant you there has ne'er a new almanac come out these dozen years but he has studied it over and over.
185 SIR GILBERT [to the Clown] Do not reveal us now.
CLOWN Because you shall be sure on't, you have given me a ninepence here; and I'll give you the slip for't. Exit
SIR GILBERT
Well said. Now the fool's pleased, we may be bold.
[The suitors talk apart]
BEVERIL [aside]
Love is as great an enemy to wit
190 As ignorance to art. I find my powers
So much employed in business of my heart
That all the time's too little to dispatch
Affairs within me. Fortune too remiss,
I suffer for thy slowness. Had I come
195 Before a vow had chained their souls together,
There might have been some hope, though ne'er so little.
Now there's no spark at all, nor e'er can be,
But dreadful ones struck from adultery;
And if my lust were smothered with her will,
200 O, who could wrong a gentleman so kind,
A stranger made up with a brother's mind?
SIR GILBERT [aside to the other former suitors]
Peace, peace, enough. Let me alone to manage it.—
A quick invention, and a happy one,
Reward your study, sir.
BEVERIL Gentlemen, I thank you.
SIR GILBERT
205 We understand your wits are in employment, sir,
In honour of this wedding.
BEVERIL Sir, the gentleman
To whom that worthy lady is betrothed
Vouchsafes t'accept the power of my good will in't.
SIR GILBERT
I pray resolve us then, sir, for we're friends
That love and honour her—
ANOTHER SUITOR That humbly serve her— 210
SIR GILBERT
Whether your number be yet full or no
Of those which you make choice of for presenters.
BEVERIL
First, 'tis so brief, because the time is so,
We shall not trouble many; and, for those 215 We shall employ, the house will yield in servants.
SIR GILBERT
Nay then, under your leave and favour, sir,
Since all your pains will be so weakly graced,
And, wanting due performance, lose their lustre,
Here are four of us gentlemen her friends,
220 Both lovers of her honour and your art,
That would be glad so to express ourselves,
And think our service well and worthily placed.
BEVERIL
My thanks do me no grace for this large kindness;
You make my labours proud of such presenters.
SIR GILBERT
225 She shall not think, sir, she's so ill beloved
But friends can quickly make that number perfect.
BEVERIL
She's bound t'acknowledge it.
SIR GILBERT Only thus much, sir,
Which will amaze her most: I'd have't so carried,
As you can do't, that neither she nor none
230 Should know what friends we were till all were done.
WEATHERWISE
Ay, that would make the sport.
BEVERIL I like it well, sir.
My hand and faith amongst you, gentlemen,
It shall be so disposed of.
SIR GILBERT We are the men then.
BEVERIL
Then look you, gentlemen.
[He shows them the pasteboard]
The device is single,
235 Naked, and plain, because the time's so short,
And gives no freedom to a wealthier sport.
'Tis only, gentlemen, the four elements
In liveliest forms: Earth, Water, Air, and Fire.
WEATHERWISE
Mass, and here's four of us too.
BEVERIL It fits well, sir.
240 This is the effect: that, whereas all those four Maintain a natural opposition

175 charge expense vicar Originally a clergyman who stands in for a parson.

181 calves (i.e. the stockings on them, perhaps of silk or some such costly material)

182 cheeks (presumably pale)

185 reveal us (as the former suitors)

187 a ninepence i.e. an Irish shilling, worth only nine English pence. A veiled complaint.

give you the slip (a) slip away from you
(b) give you a counterfeit coin (compare previous note)

196 though even if

199 smothered i.e. satiated

203 quick lively invention creative faculty, inventiveness happy fortunate (i.e. financially beneficial)

223 large generous

226 perfect full, complete

227 thus much i.e. with this qualification

234 single i.e. without preliminary episode, sub-plot, or the like

238 In liveliest forms i.e. most vividly represented in living form

And untruced war the one against the other,
 To shame their ancient envies they should see
 How well in two breasts all these do agree.

WEATHERWISE
 245 That's in the bride and bridegroom; I am quick, sir.

SIR GILBERT
 In faith, it's pretty, sir; I approve it well.

BEVERIL
 But see how soon my happiness and your kindness
 Is crossed together.

SIR GILBERT
 Crossed? I hope not so, sir.

BEVERIL
 I can employ but two of you.

PEPPERON
 How comes that, sir?

BEVERIL
 250 Air and the Fire should be by men presented,
 But the two other in the forms of women.

WEATHERWISE
 Nay, then we're gone again. I think these women
 Were made to vex and trouble us in all shapes.

SIR GILBERT [to Beveril]
 Faith, sir, you stand too nicely.

WEATHERWISE [to Beveril]
 So think I, sir.

BEVERIL
 255 Yet when we tax ourselves, it may the better
 Set off our errors when the fine eyes judge 'em.—
 But Water certainly should be a woman.

WEATHERWISE
 By my faith, then he is gelded since I saw him last. He was thought to be a man once, when he 260 got his wife with child before he was married.

BEVERIL
 Fie, you are fishing in another stream, sir.

WEATHERWISE
 But now I come to yours an you go to that, sir: I see no reason then but Fire and Water should change shapes and genders.

BEVERIL
 265 How prove you that, sir?

WEATHERWISE
 Why, there's no reason but Water should be a man, because Fire is commonly known to be a quean.

BEVERIL
 So, sir, you argue well.

WEATHERWISE
 Nay, more, sir. Water will break in at a little crevice; so will a man if he be not kept out. Water will undermine; so will an informer. Water will ebb and flow; so will a gentleman. Water will search any place; and so will a constable, as lately he did at my Seven Stars for a young wench that was stole. Water 270 will quench fire, and so will Wat the barber. Ergo, let Water wear a codpiece point.

BEVERIL
 Faith, gentlemen, I like your company well.

WEATHERWISE
 Let's see who'll dispute with me at the full o'th' moon. 280

BEVERIL
 No, sir; an you be vainglorious of your talent, I'll put you to't once more.

WEATHERWISE
 I'm for you, sir, as long as the moon keeps in this quarter.

BEVERIL
 Well, how answer you this then? Earth and Water 285 are both bearers; therefore they should be women.

WEATHERWISE
 Why, so are porters and pedlars, and yet they are known to be men.

BEVERIL
 I'll give you over in time, sir; I shall repent the bestowing on't else. 290

WEATHERWISE
 If I that have proceeded in five-and-twenty such books of astronomy should not be able to put down a scholar now, the dominical letter being 'G', I stood for a goose.

SIR GILBERT
 Then this will satisfy you: though't be a woman, 295
 Océanus, the sea, that's chief of waters,
 He wears the form of a man, and so may you.

BEVERIL
 Now I hear reason, and I may consent.

SIR GILBERT
 And so, though Earth challenge a feminine face,
 The matter of which earth consists, that's dust, 300
 The general soul of earth, is of both kinds.

BEVERIL
 Fit yourselves, gentlemen; I've enough for me.
 Earth, Water, Air, and Fire, part 'em amongst you.

243 envies malices
 254 stand too nicely insist too much upon niceties
 256 Set off put out of consideration
 258–60 By... married Puns on water and the name Walter, and quibbling on water as 'seminal fluid'.
 262 I... that i.e. we exchange 'streams'
 267–8 Fire... quean Alludes to fire as a figure for lust and as a euphemism for venereal disease.
 268 quean prostitute
 272–3 ebb and flow Applies to the gentleman as 'fluctuate in wealth'.
 275 Seven Stars (the tavern name)
 276 Wat (diminutive of Walter) the barber Barber-surgeons would treat venereal disease (fire)

Ergo therefore (Latin)
 286 bearers Playing on the senses 'child-bearers' and 'supporters'. The earth both supports those who stand upon it and is commonly figured as a 'mother' to all life; water supports floating vessels.
 289 give you over give up on you
 290 bestowing on't i.e. time spent on it
 291 proceeded in advanced through, graduated in 293 now The original 1657 printed text reads 'now in One thousand six hundred thirty and eight', an interpolation referring to the year of James Shirley's revival of the play in Dublin.
dominical letter The letter used to denote Sundays in a given year; often printed in red or large type in almanacs. It was established by giving each day in the first week of the year a letter from A to G. The dominical letter for 1611, the almost certain year of first production, was in fact F, but that for 1638 (see previous note) happened to be G.

 293–4 stood for would be reckoned as (quibbling on G as the initial letter of goose)
 296 Océanus one of the Titans; father of the rivers of the world and of the ocean nymphs
 299 challenge claim as its due
 301 of both kinds i.e. composed of the dead of both sexes
 302 Fit yourselves have it your way

WEATHERWISE

Let me play Air; I was my father's eldest son.

BEVERIL

305 Ay, but this air never possessed the lands.

WEATHERWISE I'm but disposed to jest with you, sir. 'Tis the same my almanac speaks on, is't not?

BEVERIL That 'tis, sir.

310 WEATHERWISE Then leave it to my discretion to fit both the part and the person.

BEVERIL

You shall have your desire, sir.

SIR GILBERT

We'll agree

Without your trouble now, sir; we're not factious,
Or envy one another for best parts

315 Like quarrelling actors that have passionate fits;
We submit always to the writer's wits.

BEVERIL

He that commends you may do't liberally,
For you deserve as much as praise can show.

SIR GILBERT

We'll send to you privately.

BEVERIL

I'll dispatch you.

SIR GILBERT [aside]

We'll poison your device.

Exit

320 PEPPERON [aside] She must have pleasures,
Shows, and conceits, and we disgraceful doom!

WEATHERWISE [aside]

We'll make your elements come limping home.

Exeunt suitors

BEVERIL

How happy am I in this unlooked-for grace,
This voluntary kindness from these gentlemen!
Enter Mistress Low-water and her man-husband,
[both disguised as before, unobserved by Beveril]

325 'Twill set off all my labours far more pleasing
Before the widow, whom my heart calls mistress,
But my tongue dares not second it.

MASTER LOW-WATER [aside to Mistress Low-water]

How say you now, Kate?

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside to Master Low-water]

I like this music well, sir.

BEVERIL

O, unfortunate!

Yet though a tree be guarded from my touch,
There's none can hinder me to love the fruit.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside]

330 Nay, now we know your mind, brother, we'll provide for you.

Exit [with her man-husband]

BEVERIL

O, were it but as free as late times knew it,
I would deserve if all life's wealth could do it! Exit

*Enter, at Sir Oliver's house, himself; old Sunset;
Sir Oliver's redeemed lady, Philip's Mother;
Master Sandfield; the Dutch Merchant; Philip, Sir
Oliver's son; and Saviourwit aloof off; and Servants*

SIR OLIVER [to Philip's Mother]

O, my reviving joy! Thy quick'ning presence
Makes the sad night of threescore and ten years
Sit like a youthful spring upon my blood.
I cannot make thy welcome rich enough
With all the wealth of words.

MOTHER

It is expressed, sir,

5

With more than can be equalled. The ill store
Lies only on my side; my thanks are poor.

SIR OLIVER

Blest be the goodness of his mind for ever
That did redeem thy life! May it return
Upon his fortunes double! That worthy gentleman, Kind Master Beveril! Shower upon him, heaven,
Some unexpected happiness to requite him
For these my joys unlooked for! O, more kind,
And juster far is a mere stranger's goodness
Than the sophistic faith of natural sons.
Here's one could juggle with me, take up the ransom,
He and his loose companion.

15

SAVOURWIT [aside]

Say you me so, sir?

I'll eat hard eggs for that trick!

SIR OLIVER

Spend the money,
And bring me home false news and empty pockets!
In that young gallant's tongue there, you were dead
Ten weeks before this day, had not this merchant
Brought first the truth in words, yourself in substance.

20

MOTHER

Pray let me stay you here ere you proceed, sir.
Did he report me dead, say you?

SIR OLIVER

Else you live not.

MOTHER

See now, sir, you may lay your blame too rashly,
When nobody looked after it. Let me tell you, sir,
A father's anger should take great advice
Ere it condemn flesh of so dear a price.
He's no way guilty yet, for that report
The general tongue of all the country spread;
For, being removed far off, I was thought dead.

30

PHILIP

Can my faith now be taken into favour, sir?
Is't worthy to be trusted?

SAVOURWIT [aside]

No, by my troth, is't not.

'Twould make shift to spend another ransom yet.

SIR OLIVER [to Philip]

Well, sir, I must confess you've here dealt well with
me;
And what is good in you I love again.

Scene 8

No wit like a Womans.

SAVOURWIT [aside]
 Now am I halfways in, just to the girdle;
 But the worst part's behind.

SIR OLIVER [to Philip] Marry, I fear me, sir,
 This weather is too glorious to hold long.

MOTHER
 40 I see no cloud to interpose it, sir,
 If you place confidence in what I have told you.

SIR OLIVER
 Nay, 'tis clear sky on that side; would 'twere so
 All over his obedience! I see that,
 And so does this good gentleman—

MOTHER [to the Dutch Merchant] Do you, sir?

SIR OLIVER
 That makes his honesty doubtful.

45 MOTHER [to the Dutch Merchant] I pray, speak, sir.
 The truth of your last kindness makes me bold with
 you.

DUTCH MERCHANT
 The knight your husband, madam, can best speak.
 He truest can show griefs whose heart they break.

MOTHER [to Sir Oliver]
 I'm sorry yet for more. Pray let me know't, sir,
 That I may help to chide him, though 'twould grieve
 50 me.

SIR OLIVER
 Why then, prepare for't. You came over now
 In the best time to do't you could pick out.
 Not only spent my money, but, to blind me,
 He and his wicked instrument—

SAVOURWIT [aside] Now he fiddles me.

SIR OLIVER
 Brings home a minion here—by great chance
 55 known—
 Told me she was his sister; she proves none.

MOTHER [to Philip]
 This was unkindly done, sir. Now I'm sorry
 My good opinion lost itself upon you.
 You are not the same son I left behind me;
 60 More grace took him.—O, let me end in time,
 For fear I should forget myself and chide him!
 Where is she, sir? Though he beguiled your eyes,
 He cannot deceive mine; we're now too hard for him.
 For since our first unfortunate separation,
 I've often seen the girl—[aside] would that were 65 true!—
 By many a happy accident, many a one,
 But never durst acknowledge her for mine own;
 And therein stood my joys distressed again.

SIR OLIVER
 You rehearse miseries, wife!—Call the maid down.
 [Exit Servant]

SAVOURWIT [aside]
 She's been too often down to be now called so. 70
 She'll lie down shortly and call somebody up.

MOTHER
 He's now to deal with one, sir, that knows truth.
 He must be shamed or quit; there's no mean saves
 him.

SIR OLIVER
 I hear her come.

MOTHER [aside to Philip]
 You see how hard 'tis now
 To rèdeem good opinion, being once gone. 75
 Be careful then, and keep it when 'tis won.
 Now see me take a poison with great joy
 Which, but for thy sake, I should swoon to touch.
 Enter Grace

GRACE
 What new affliction? Am I set to sale
 For anyone that bids most shame for me? 80

SIR OLIVER [to Philip's Mother]
 Look you, do you see what stuff they've brought me home here?

MOTHER
 O bless her, eternal powers! My life, my comforts,
 My nine years' grief, but everlasting joy now,
 Thrice welcome to my heart! 'Tis she indeed.
 [She embraces Grace]

SIR OLIVER
 What, is it?

PHILIP I'm unfit to carry a ransom? 85

SAVOURWIT [aside to Grace]
 Down on your knees, to save your belly harmless.
 Ask blessing, though you never mean to use it
 But give't away presently to a beggar wench.
 [Grace kneels]

PHILIP [to Sir Oliver]
 My faith is blemished, I'm no man of trust, sir?

MOTHER
 Rise with a mother's blessing.
 [Grace rises]

SAVOURWIT [aside] All this while 90
 She's risse with a son's.

SIR OLIVER But soft ye, soft ye, wife!
 I pray take heed you place your blessing right now.
 This honest Dutchman here told me he saw her
 At Antwerp in an inn.

MOTHER True, she was so, sir.

- DUTCH MERCHANT
95 Sir, 'tis my quality what I speak once
I affirm ever. In that inn I saw her.
That lets her not to be your daughter now.
- SIR OLIVER
O, sir, is't come to that?
- SUNSET Here's joys ne'er dreamt on!
- SIR OLIVER
O, Master Sunset, I am at the rising
100 Of my refulgent happiness!—Now, son Sandfield, Once more and ever!
- SANDFIELD I am proud on't, sir.
- SIR OLIVER [to Philip]
Pardon me, boy; I have wronged thy faith too much.
- SAVOURWIT [aside]
Now may I leave my shell and peep my head forth.
- SIR OLIVER
Where is this Saviourwit, that honest whoreson, 105 That I may take my curse from his knave's shoulders?
- SAVOURWIT
O sir, I feel you at my very blade here.
Your curse is ten-stone weight, and a pound over.
- SIR OLIVER
Come, thou'rt a witty varlet, and a trusty.
- SAVOURWIT
You shall still find me a poor faithful fellow, sir,
110 If you have another ransom to send over,
Or daughter to find out.
- SIR OLIVER I'll do thee right, boy.
I ne'er yet knew thee but speak honest English.
Marry, in Dutch I found thee a knave lately.
- SAVOURWIT
That was to hold you but in play a little,
115 Till farther truths came over, and I strong.
You shall ne'er find me a knave in mine own tongue;
I have more grace in me. I go out of England
Still when I take such courses; that shows modesty,
sir.
- SIR OLIVER
Anything full of wit, and void of harm,
120 I give thee pardon for; so was that now.
- SAVOURWIT [aside]
Faith, now I'm quit I find myself the nimble
To serve you so again, and my will's good,
Like one that lately shook off his old irons
And cuts a purse at bench to deserve new ones.
- SIR OLIVER
Since it holds all the way so fortunate still,
125 And strikes so even with my first belief,
This is the gentleman, wife, young Master Sandfield
here,
A man of worthy parts beside his lands,
Whom I make choice of for my daughter's bed.
- SAVOURWIT [aside]
But he'll make choice there of another bedfellow. 130
- MOTHER
I wish 'em both the happiness of love, sir.
- SIR OLIVER
'Twas spoke like a good lady. An your memory
Can reach it, wife—but 'tis so long ago too—
Old Master Sunset he had a young daughter
When you unluckily left England so,
135 And much about the age of our girl there,
For both were nursed together.
- MOTHER 'Tis so fresh
In my remembrance, now you've wakened it,
As if twelve years were but a twelve hours' dream.
- SIR OLIVER
That girl is now a proper gentlewoman,
140 As fine a body, wife, as e'er was measured
With an indenture cut in farthing steaks—
- SUNSET
O, say not so, Sir Oliver. You shall pardon me, sir;
I'faith, sir, you are to blame.
- SIR OLIVER Sings, dances, plays,
Touches an instrument with a motherly grace. 145
- SUNSET
'Tis your own daughter that you mean that by.
- SAVOURWIT [aside]
There's open Dutch indeed, an he could take it.
- SIR OLIVER
This wench, under your leave—
- SUNSET You have my love in't.
- SIR OLIVER
Is my son's wife that shall be.
- SAVOURWIT [aside] Thus I hold with't:
Is your son's wife that should be Master Sandfield's. 150
- MOTHER
I come in happy time to a feast of marriages.
- SIR OLIVER
And now you put's i'th' mind, the hour draws on
At the new-married widow's; there we're looked for.
There will be entertainments, sports, and banquets.

- 155 There these young lovers shall clap hands together. To whom, I've often heard, the enemy sold me. 180
 The seed of one feast shall bring forth another. MOTHER What's that?
 SUNSET GRACE
 Well said, Sir Oliver. Too often have I heard this piteous story
 SIR OLIVER [to the Dutch Merchant] Of a distressed mother I had once, You're a stranger, sir. Whose comfortable sight I lost at sea;
 Your welcome will be best. But then the years of childhood took from me 185
 DUTCH MERCHANT Good sir, excuse me. Both the remembrance of her and the sorrows.
 SIR OLIVER MOTHER [aside]
 You shall along, i'faith; you must not refuse me. O, I begin to feel her in my blood!
 My heart leaps to be at her.—What was that mother?
 PHILIP GRACE
 O, mother, these new joys that sets my soul up, Some said an English lady—but I know not.
 Which had no means, nor any hope of any, MOTHER
 Has brought me now so far in debt to you What's thy name?
 I know not which way to begin to thank you. GRACE Grace.
 I am so lost in all, I cannot guess MOTHER May it be so in heaven, 190
 Which of the two my service most constrains, For thou art mine on earth. Welcome, dear child,
 Your last kind goodness or your first dear pains. Unto thy father's house, thy mother's arms,
 After thy foreign sorrows.
 MOTHER [She embraces Grace]
 Love is a mother's duty to a son, SAVOURWIT [showing Philip his Mother and Grace]
 As a son's duty is both love and fear. 'Twill prove gallant.
 SAVOURWIT MOTHER
 I owe you a poor life, madam, that's all. What, son, such earnest work: I bring thee joy now Pray call for't when you please; it shall be ready for Will make the rest show nothing, 'tis so glorious. 195
 you.
 MOTHER PHILIP
 Make much on't, sir, till then. Why, 'tis not possible, madam, that man's happiness
 Should take a greater height than mine aspires.
 SAVOURWIT [aside] If buttered sack will. MOTHER
 MOTHER No, now you shall confess it; this shall quit thee
 Methinks the more I look upon her, son, From all fears present or hereafter doubts
 The more thy sister's face runs in my mind. About this business.
 PHILIP PHILIP Give me that, sweet mother. 200
 Belike she's somewhat like her; it makes the better, MOTHER madam. Here, take her then, and set thine arms a-work.
 MOTHER There needs no 'fection; 'tis indeed thy sister.
 Was Antwerp, say you, the first place you found her PHILIP in? My sister!
 PHILIP SAVOURWIT [aside]
 Yes, madam. Why do you ask? Cuds me, I feel the razor!
 MOTHER [to Grace] Whose daughter were you? MOTHER
 GRACE Why, how now, son, how comes a change so soon?
 I know not rightly whose, to speak truth, madam. PHILIP
 SAVOURWIT [aside] O, I beseech you, mother, wound me anywhere 205
 The mother of her was a good twigger the whilst. But where you pointed last; that's present death.
 [Philip and Saviourwit talk apart] Devise some other miserable torment, MOTHER [to Grace] Though ne'er so pitiless, and I'll run and meet it.
 No? With whom were you brought up then? Some way more merciful let your goodness think on GRACE With those, madam, May steal away my joys but save my soul. 210

155 clap hands together pledge themselves to each other before witnesses in a spousal

- I'll willingly restore back every one
Upon that mild condition; anything
But what you spake last will be comfortable.
- MOTHER
You're troubled with strange fits in England here.
215 Your first suit to me did entreat me hardly
To say 'twas she, to have old wrath appeased;
And now 'tis known your sister, you're not pleased.
How should I show myself?
- PHILIP Say 'tis not she.
- MOTHER
Shall I deny my daughter?
- PHILIP O, you kill me
Beyond all tortures!
- 220 MOTHER Why do you deal thus with me?
PHILIP
She is my wife; I married her at Antwerp.
I have known the way unto her bed these three months.
- SAVOURWIT [aside]
And that's too much by twelve weeks for a sister.
- MOTHER
I understand you now, too soon, too plain.
- PHILIP
225 O mother, if you love my peace for ever,
Examine her again, find me not guilty.
- MOTHER
'Tis now too late; her words make that too true.
- PHILIP
Her words! Shall bare words overthrow a soul?
A body is not cast away so lightly.
230 How can you know 'tis she? Let sense decide it:
She then so young, and both so long divided.
- MOTHER
She tells me the sad story.
- PHILIP Does that throw me?
Many a distress may have the face of yours
That never was kin to you.
- MOTHER But however, sir,
I trust you are not married.
- 235 PHILIP Here's the witness,
And all the wealth I had with her: this ring
That joined our hearts together.
[He shows the ring]
- MOTHER O, too clear now!
Thou'st brought in evidence to o'erthrow thyself.
Had no one word been spoke, only this shown,
240 'T had been enough to approve her for mine own.
See here two letters that begun my name
Before I knew thy father. This I gave her,
- And as a jewel fastened to her ear.
- GRACE
Pardon me, mother, that you find it stray.
I kept it till I gave my heart away. 245
- PHILIP
O, to what mountain shall I take my flight,
To hide the monster of my sin from sight?
- SAVOURWIT [aside]
I'll to Wales presently; there's the best hills
To hide a poor knave in.
- MOTHER
O, heap not desperation upon guilt!
250 Repent yet, and all's saved. 'Twas but hard chance.
Amongst all sins, heaven pities ignorance;
She's still the first that has her pardon signed.
All sins else see their faults; she's only blind.
Go to thy chamber, pray, leave off, and win. 255
One hour's repentance cures a twelvemonth's sin.
- GRACE
O my distressed husband, my dear brother!
Exit Mother, cum filia (Grace)
- PHILIP
O Saviourwit, never came sorrow yet
To mankind like it! I'm so far distressed
I've no time left to give my heart attendance, 260
Too little all to wait upon my soul!
Before this tempest came, how well I stood,
Full in the beams of blessedness and joy!
The memory of man could never say
So black a storm fell in so bright a day. 265
I am that man that e'en life surfeits of;
Or, if to live, unworthy to be seen
By the savage eyesight. Give's thy hand.
Commend me to thy prayers.
- SAVOURWIT Next time I say 'em.
- PHILIP
Farewell, my honest breast, that cravest no more 270
Than possible kindness. That I've found thee large in,
And I must ask no more. There wit must stay;
It cannot pass where fate stops up the way.
Joy thrive with thee; I'll never see thee more.
[He starts to leave]
- SAVOURWIT
What's that, sir? Pray come back, and bring those words with you. 275
You shall not carry 'em so out of my company.
There's no last refuge when your father knows it;
There's no such need on't yet; stay but till then,
And take one with you that will imitate you
In all the desperate onsets man dare think on. 280

211 restore back Prompted by steal away, but now Philip is the thief.
215 hardly obdurately
216 old inveterate
229 cast away i.e. condemned to death.
A single testimony was not considered sufficient proof in law.

236 with her along with her (by way of dowry)
240 approve prove
241 here (on the ring)
248 Wales (well known for its mountains)
254 she's only she alone is 255 leave off i.e. abstain from sex

257.1 cum filia with the daughter 260 give...attendance i.e. set my feelings in order
261 all at all
268 savage eyesight eyesight of savages
269 Commend...prayers Implies that Philip is contemplating suicide.

Scene 8

NO Wit Like a WOMANS.

Were it to challenge all the wolves in France
To meet at one set battle, I'd be your half in't;
All beasts of venom, what you had a mind to,
Your part should be took still. For such a day
285 Let's keep ourselves in heart; then am I for you.
In the mean time, to beat off all suspicion,
Let's to the bride-house too; here's my petition.

PHILIP

Thou hast a learning art when all hopes fly.
Let one night waste; there's time enough left to die.

SAVOURWIT

290 A minute's as good as a thousand year, sir,
To pink a man's heart like a summer suit. Exeunt

Sc. 9

Enter two or three Servants, [setting forth a stage for the masque, and] placing things in order, with Peccadill the Clown like an overseer

CLOWN Bestir your bones nimbly, you ponderous beef-buttocked knaves! What a number of lazy hinds do I keep company withal! Where's the flesh-colour velvet cushion now, for my lady's peaseporridge-tawny satin
5 bum? You, attendants upon revels?

FIRST SERVANT You can prate and domineer well, because you have a privilege place, but I'd fain see you set your hand to't.

CLOWN O base bone-pickers! I, set my hand to't? When 10 did you e'er see a gentleman set his hand to anything, unless it were to a sheepskin and receive a hundred pound for his pains?

SECOND SERVANT And afterward lie in the Counter for his pleasure.

15 CLOWN Why, true, sir; 'tis for his pleasure indeed; for spite of all their teeths he may lie i'th' Hole when he list.

FIRST SERVANT Marry, and should, for me.

CLOWN Ay, thou wouldst make as good a bawd as the best jailer of them all; I know that.

20 FIRST SERVANT How, fool?
Loud music [within]

CLOWN Hark! I must call you knave within; 'tis but staying somewhat the longer for't. Exeunt

Enter the new-married Widow, and Kate Low-water [as] her husband, both changed in apparel, arm in arm together; after them, Sir Oliver Twilight, Master Sunset, and the Dutch Merchant;

after them, the Mother, Grace the daughter, sad, with Jane Sunset; after these, melancholy Philip, Savourwit, and Master Sandfield

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

This fair assembly is most freely welcome.

ALL THE REST

Thanks to you, good sir.

WIDOW [to the Mother]

Come, my long-wished-for madam;

You and this worthy stranger take best welcome. 25

Your freedom is a second feast to me.

[Enter Master Low-water, disguised as before]

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside to him]

How is't with my brother?

MASTER LOW-WATER [aside to her]

The fit holds him still.

No love's more violent.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside to him]

'Las, poor gentleman!

I would he had my office without money;

If he should offer any, I'd refuse it. 30

MASTER LOW-WATER [aside to her] I have the letter ready.

He's worthy of a place knows how to use it.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

That's well said.—Come, ladies, gentlemen, Sir Oliver;

Good, seat yourselves. Shall we be found unreadiest?

[They sit]

What is yon gentleman with the funeral face there? 35

Methinks that look does ill become a bride-house.

SIR OLIVER

Who does your worship mean, sir, my son Philip?

I am sure he had ne'er less reason to be sad.—

Why are you sad, son Philip?

PHILIP

How, sir, sad?

You shall not find it so, sir.

SAVOURWIT [aside to Philip] Take heed he do not, then. 40

You must beware how you carry your face in this company. As far as I can see, that young bridegroom has hawk's eyes. He'll go nigh to spell 'sister' in your face if your nose were but crooked enough to serve for an 'S'; he'd find an eye presently, and then he has more 45 light for the rest.

PHILIP [aside to Savourwit] I'll learn then to dissemble.

282 be your half share the risk

283 what whatever

288 learning art skill in teaching

291 pink deck out, ornament (i.e., as applied to the heart, cheer up)

9.2 hinds servants

4 peaseporridge-tawny (mocking fanciful compounds for describing the colour of fabrics)

7 privilege (the Servant's mistake for privileged)

9 bone-pickers i.e. eaters of leftovers

11 sheepskin parchment, legal document (for a loan)

13 Counter (the name for either of the debtors' prisons; with a possible pun on cunt)

for (a) as amends for (b) to procure (the Clown's sense)

15–16 spite...teeths in defiance of them all (proverbial). Teeths might also suggest the seizing powers of usury or the law.

16 lie i'th' Hole (a) be imprisoned in the Hole (the worst room in the debtors' prison) (b) have sexual intercourse

17 for me as far as I'm concerned

25 this worthy stranger i.e. the Dutch merchant

merchant

29 without money Public offices were often obtained with bribes.

31 the letter i.e. the letter Beveril receives at l. 296.1 (but quibbling on a letter of recommendation)

32 worthy of a place i.e. deserves the office purely on merit

34 Shall we i.e. who's going to

42 As...see (proverbial)

43 has hawk's eyes (proverbial)

45 an eye i.e. (a) an eye in Philip's face (b) an eye to see the rest (c) a letter 'I'

SAVOURWIT [aside to Philip] Nay, an you be to learn that now you'll ne'er sit in a branched velvet gown as long 50 as you live. You should have took that at nurse, before your mother weaned you; so do all those that prove great children and batten well.

Enter Master Beveril, with a pasteboard

Peace, here comes a scholar indeed; he has learnt it, I warrant you.

WIDOW [to Beveril]

55 Kind sir, you're welcome. You take all the pains, sir.

BEVERIL

I wish they were but worthy of the grace
Of your fair presence and this choice assembly.
Here is an abstract, madam, of what's shown,
Which I commend to your favour.

[He gives her the pasteboard]

WIDOW

Thank you for't, sir.

BEVERIL [aside]

60 I would I durst present my love as boldly.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside, hearing him]

My honest brother!

WIDOW [showing Mistress Low-water the pasteboard]

Look thee here, sweetheart.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

What's there, sweet madam?

BEVERIL

Music, and we're ready.

Loud music a while. A thing like a globe opens of one side o'th' stage and flashes out fire; then Sir Gilbert, that presents the part, issues forth with yellow hair and beard, intermingled with streaks like wild flames, a three-forked fire in's hand. And at the same time [Weatherwise, presenting] Air, comes down, hanging by a cloud, with a coat made like an almanac, all the twelve moons set in it, and the four quarters, Winter, Spring, Summer, and Autumn, with change of weathers, rain, lightning, and tempest, etc.

And from under the stage at both ends arises

[Overdone presenting] Water and [Pepperton presenting] Earth: Water with green flags upon his head standing up instead of hair, and a beard of the same, with a chain of pearl; Earth with a number of little things like trees, like a thick grove, upon his head, and a wedge of gold in his hand, his garment of a clay colour.

The Fire speaking first, Beveril the scholar stands behind, gives him the first word, which he now follows

BEVERIL

'The flame of zeal—'

SIR GILBERT AS FIRE The wicked fire of lust

Does now spread heat through water, air, and dust.

BEVERIL [aside]

How? He's out in the beginning.—'The wheel of time—'

65

WEATHERWISE [aside] The devil set fire o'th' distaff!

SIR GILBERT AS FIRE

I that was wont in elder times to pass

For a bright angel—so they called me then—

Now so corrupted with the upstart fires

Of avarice, luxury, and inconstant heats

Struck from the bloods of cunning clap-fall'n daughters,

70

Night-walking wives, but, most, libidinous widows,

That I that purify e'en gold itself

Have the contemptible dross thrown in my face,

And my bright name walk common in disgrace:

How am I used o' late, that I am so handled,

Thrust into alleys, hospitals, and tubs!

I was once a name of comfort, warmed great houses

When Charity was landlord; I have given welcome

To forty russet yeomen at a time

In a fair Christmas hall. How am I changed!

The chimneys are swept up, the hearth as cold

As the forefathers' charity in the son.

All the good hospitable heat now turns

To my young landlord's lust, and there it burns.

Rich widows that were wont to choose by gravity

Their second husbands, not by tricks of blood,

Are now so taken with loose Aretine flames

Of nimble wantonness and high-fed pride,

They marry now but the third part of husbands—

Boys, smooth-faced catamites—to fulfil their bed,

As if a woman should a woman wed.

These are the fires o' late. My brightness darks,

And fills the world so full of beggarly sparks.

90

49 branched . . . gown (of a judge)

branched embroidered

50 at nurse at the nurse's breast

52 great (a) large (b) eminent, prosperous batten put weight on, thrive

53 has learnt it knows his stuff

62.1 A thing . . . globe Probably a circular flat painted like a globe. Court masques sometimes made use of large globes from which masquers issued.

opens Probably here 'is disclosed (by drawing back curtains)'.
62.3 the part (of Fire)

62.7 comes down i.e. is lowered on a wire from a trapdoor in the stage roof or 'heavens'

62.8 moons months; i.e. signs of the zodiac

62.18 wedge ingot

65 out out of his lines

66 distaff staff on which the unspun flax was wound. 'To have tow on one's distaff' was proverbial for having work in hand.

67-8 I . . . then Suggested by Psalm 104:4:
'Who maketh his angels spirits, | His ministers a flaming fire'.

69 upstart (both socially upstart and physically rising up)

71 clap-fall'n stricken with gonorrhoea

77 tubs sweating tubs (used for treatment of syphilis)

80 russet clad in coarse homespun reddish-brown woollen cloth

82-3 the hearth . . . son (developed from the proverb 'as cold as charity')

87 tricks of blood freakish turns of lust

88 Aretine in the manner of Pietro Aretino (1492-1556), famous for his licentious poetry; lustful

94 sparks (a) sparks of fire (b) gallants

BEVERIL [aside]

95 Heart, how am I disgraced! What rogue should this be?

WIDOW

By my faith, Monsieur Fire, you're a hot whoreson!

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside]

I fear my brother is beside his wits;
He would not be so senseless to rail thus else.

WEATHERWISE as AIR

100 After this heat, you madams fat and fair,
Open your casements wide, and take in Air.
But not that air false women make up oaths with;
No, nor that air gallants perfume their clothes with.
I am that air that keeps about the clouds.
None of my kindred was smelt out in crowds.
105 Not any of our house was ever tainted,
When many a thousand of our foes have fainted.
Yet some there are that be my chief polluters:
Widows that falsify their faith to suitors,
And will give fair words when the sun's in Cancer,
110 But at the next remove, a scurvy answer;
Come to the poor men's houses, eat their banquet,
And at night with a boy tossed in a blanket.
Nay, shall I come more near?—perhaps at noon;
For here I find a spot full in the moon.
115 I know youth's trick; what's she that can withstand it
When Mercury reigns, my lady's chamber planet?
He that believes a widow's words shall fail
When Venus' gown-skirts sweeps the Dragon's Tail.
Fair weather the first day she makes to any;
120 The second cloudy, and the third day rainy.
The fourth day a great storm, lightning and thunder;
A bolt strikes the suitor: a boy keeps her under.

BEVERIL [aside]

Life! These are some counterfeit slaves crept in their rooms,

O' purpose for disgrace; they shall all share with me.
Heart, who the devil should these be? Exit

WIDOW My faith, gentlemen, 125

Air has perfumed the room well!

SIR OLIVER

So methinks, madam.

SAVOURWIT [aside]

A man may smell her meaning two rooms off,
Though his nose wanted reparations,
And the bridge left at Shoreditch as a pledge
For Rosa Solis in a bleaching-house. 130

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside to Master Low-water]

Life, what should be his meaning in't?

MASTER LOW-WATER

I wonder.

OVERDONE as WATER

Methinks this room should yet retain such heat
Struck out from the first ardour, and so glow yet,
You should desire my company, wish for water,
That offers here to serve your several pipes 135
Without constraint of mill or death of water-house.
What if I sprinkled on the widow's cheeks
A few cool drops to 'lay the guilty heat
That flashes from her conscience to her face?
Would't not refresh her shame? From such as she 140
I first took weakness and inconstancy.
I sometimes swell above my banks and spread;
They're commonly with child before they're wed.
In me the Sirens sing before they prey;
In her more witchcraft, for her smiles betray. 145
Where I'm least seen, there my most danger lies;
So in those parts hid most from a man's eyes—
Her heart, her love, or what may be more close.
I know no mercy; she thinks that no loss.
In her, poor gallants, pirates thrive in me. 150
I help to cast away, and so does she.

WIDOW

Nay, an you can hold nothing sweet, Sir Water,

100 casements window-frames (with a quibble on 'vulvas')

101 air i.e. breath

103 keeps dwells

104 smelt out (a) detected, caught (b) smelt

105 house (a) place of abode in the heavens (b) household

109 Cancer (associated with the emotional and protective)

110 at the next remove i.e. when shifted to the next sign. As planets move backwards through the zodiac, the next sign would be Gemini, associated with changeability.

112 tossed i.e. are tossed

114 here Weatherwise is commenting on the chart painted on his coat.
a... moon From the proverb, 'The moon is not without spots'.

116 Mercury Said to influence artfulness, trickery, and thieving; depicted as youthful. Here stands for the young gentleman.

118 Dragon's Tail See note to 6.4.2.

119–21 Fair... thunder Again refers to the depictions on Weatherwise's coat.

122 keeps her under (both physically and figuratively)

123 rooms places

126 perfumed (playing on the sense 'fumigated')

128 wanted reparations needed repairing. Refers to collapse of the nose through syphilis.

129 Shoreditch A London parish renowned for prostitution.

130 Rosa Solis An alcoholic cordial that would make the breath smell (punning on Rosa Solace, the supposed name of the woman whose solace has caused syphilis).
bleaching-house The bleachery, or brothel, where Rosa Solace was to be found; perhaps also a hospital for curing venereal disease.

132 this room should if this room should

135 pipes water-pipes (perhaps also 'tubular body-organs')

136 water-house building in which water was raised from a conduit to a reservoir

138 'lay allay

142 I... spread A river bursting its banks was a common image of unregulated behaviour. Swell and spread also quibble on the physical appearance of a woman with child.

144 prey With possible wordplay on pray, referring to (a) the alternation of singing and prayer in a church service, and (b) prayer as metonymic for the wedding ceremony, giving a closer parallel with the previous line (and with sing suggesting 'have sexual intercourse with').

146 Where... lies Refers to treacherous hidden currents.

148 close enclosed, secret

151 cast away (a) wreck ships (b) reject

152 hold nothing (a) bear nothing afloat (b) keep nothing secret Water Puns on Walter.

- I'll wash my hands o' you ever hereafter.
- PEPPERTON as Earth
 Earth stands for a full point. Me you should hire
 155 To stop the gaps of Water, Air, and Fire.
 I love muck well, but your first husband better.
 Above his soul he loved it, as his end
 Did fearfully witness it. At his last gasp
 His spirit flamed as it forsook his breast,
 160 And left the sparkles quarrelling 'bout his lips.
 Now of such metal the devil makes him whips.
 He shall have gold enough to glut his soul;
 And as for Earth, I'll stop his crane's-throat full.
 The wealth he left behind him, most men know
 165 He wrung inconscionably from the rights
 Of poor men's livings. He drunk dry their brows.
 That liquor has a curse, yet nothing sweeter.
 When your posterity drinks, then 'twill taste bitter.
- SIR GILBERT as Fire
 And now to vex, 'gainst nature, form, rule, place,
 170 See once four warring elements all embrace.
 [They embrace]
Enter four, [one of them Beveril,] at several corners, addressed like the four winds, with wings, etc., and dance all to the drum and fife. The four elements seem to give back, and stand in amaze. The South Wind has a great red face, the North Wind a pale bleak one, the Western Wind one cheek red and another white, and so the Eastern Wind. At the end of the dance, the winds shove off the disguises of the other four, which seem to yield and almost fall off of themselves at the coming of the winds; so all the four old suitors are discovered. Exeunt all the winds but one, which is Beveril the scholar in that disguise. So shows all
- WIDOW
 How, Sir Gilbert Lambstone, Master Overdone,
 All our old suitors! You have took pains, my masters!
- SIR GILBERT
 We made a vow we'd speak our minds to you.
- WEATHERWISE And I think we're as good as our words, 175 though it cost some of our purses. I owe money for the
- clouds yet, I care not who knows it; the planets are sufficient enough to pay the painter an I were dead.
- WIDOW [to Beveril] Who are you, sir?
 BEVERIL [taking off his disguise]
 Your most unworthy servant.
- WIDOW Pardon me; is't you, sir? 180
 BEVERIL
 My disgrace urged my wit to take some form
 Wherein I might both best and properliest
 Discover my abusers and your own,
 And show you some content before y'had none.
- WIDOW
 Sir, I owe much both to your care and love, 185
 And you shall find your full requital worthy.
 [To the old suitors] Was this the plot now your poor envy works out?
 I do revenge myself with pitying on you.
 [To Master Low-water] Take Fire into the buttry; he has most need on't.
 Give Water some small beer, too good for him. 190
 Air, you may walk abroad like a fortune-teller;
 But take down Earth, and make him drink i'th' cellar.
 [Exeunt the old suitors, with Master Low-water]
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 The best revenge that could be.
- MOTHER [to the Widow] I commend you, madam.
- SIR OLIVER I thought they were some such sneakers.
- SAVOURWIT The four suitors! And here was a mess of mad 195 elements!
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Lights, more lights there! Where be these bluecoats?
 [Enter Servants with lights]
- WIDOW
 You know your lodgings, gentlemen, tonight.
- SIR OLIVER
 'Tis bounty makes bold guests, madam.
- WIDOW [to Philip's Mother] Good rest, lady.
- SIR OLIVER
 A most contentful night begin a health, madam, 200
 To your long joys, and may the years go round with't.
- WIDOW
 As many thanks as you have wished 'em hours, sir,

153 wash my hands o' Proverbial for 'have nothing more to do with', and quibbling on 'wash my hands with'.

154 full point full stop, i.e. end (because (a) Earth is the last speaker, and (b) the dead return to earth)

156 muck (a) manure, mud (b) money better i.e. loved muck better

159-60 His... lips Alludes to the belief that after death the soul left the body through the mouth; but the husband's spirit has qualities of precious metal and jewels.

163 crane's-throat The crane's neck is long and swells when swallowing a fish.

167 That liquor i.e. the sweat of poor men
 170.3 addressed dressed

170.4 dance... fife The fife is a pipe that could be played with one hand, leaving the other to accompany on the drum. The dance is probably an unruly jig.

170.11 fall... themselves fall away from each other of their own accord

170.14 shows all all is revealed

174 as... words (proverbial)

176-7 the... dead The planets of his costume are evidently made of coins.

187 poor envy petty malice works out devises

189 Take... on't Either fire is associated with alcoholic spirits or it induces thirst.

190 small beer watery beer

191 Air... fortune-teller Air is proverbially free

192 cellar (fittingly subterranean)

194 sneakers sneaks

195 mess of group of four

195-6 mad elements (with elements as in the 'four elements', but quibbling on 'constituents of madness')

197 bluecoats servants (so called from their livery)

199 bold i.e. confident of hospitality

200 begin a health (a) initiate prosperity (b) toast a health (taken up in go round with't, l. 201)

202 'em i.e. joys

Scene 9

No Witt, no helpe like a Woman

Take to your lodging with you.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER A general rest to all.
Exeunt; [manent Philip, Savourwit, the Widow, and Mistress Low-water]
PHILIP [aside to Savourwit] I'm excepted.
SAVOURWIT [aside to Philip]
205 Take in another to you then; there's room enough
In that exception, faith, to serve us both.
The dial of my sleep goes by your eyes.
Exeunt; manent Widow and Mistress Low-water
WIDOW
Now like a greedy usurer, alone
I sum up all the wealth this day has brought me;
And thus I hug it.
[She embraces her]
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
Prithce!
210 WIDOW [kissing her] Thus I kiss it.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
I can't abide these kissings.
WIDOW How, sir, not?
I'll try that, sure; I'll kiss you out of that humour.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
Push! By my troth, I cannot.
WIDOW What cannot you, sir?
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
Not toy, nor bill and imitate house-pigeons.
215 A married man must think of other matters.
WIDOW
How, other matters, sir? What other matters?
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
Why, are there no other matters that belong to't?
Do you think you've married only a cock sparrow,
And fit but for one business, like a fool?
You shall not find it so.
220 WIDOW You can talk strangely, sir.
Come, will you to bed?
MISTRESS LOW-WATER No, faith, will not I.
WIDOW What, not to bed, sir?
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
An I do, hang me. Not to bed with you.
WIDOW
How, not to bed with me? Sir, with whom else?
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
225 Why, am not I enough to lie with myself?
WIDOW
Is that the end of marriage?
MISTRESS LOW-WATER No, by my faith;
'Tis but the beginning; yet death is the end on't,
Unless some trick come i'th' middle and dash all.

WIDOW
Were you so forward lately, and so youthful,
That scarce my modest strength could save me from
you,
And are you now so cold?
MISTRESS LOW-WATER I've thought on't since.
It was but a rude part in me, i'faith,
To offer such bold tricks to any woman,
And by degrees I shall well break myself from't.
I feel myself well chastened since that time,
235 And not the third part now so loosely minded.
O, when one sees their follies, 'tis a comfort.
My very thoughts take more staid years upon 'em.
O, marriage is such a serious, divine thing!
It makes youth grave, and sweetly nips the spring.
240 WIDOW
If I had chose a gentleman for care
And worldly business, I had ne'er took you.
I had the offers of enough more fit
For such employment; I chose you for love,
Youth, and content of heart, and not for troubles;
245 You are not ripe for them. After you've spent
Some twenty years in dalliance, youth's affairs,
Then take a book in your hand and sum up cares.
As for wealth now, you know that's got to your hands.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
But had I known't had been so wrongfully got,
250 As I heard since, you should have had free leave
To have made choice of another master for't.
WIDOW
Why, can that trouble you?
MISTRESS LOW-WATER It may too soon. But go.
My sleeps are sound; I love not to be started
With an ill conscience at the fall of midnight
255 And have mine eyes torn ope with poor men's curses.
I do not like the fate on't. 'Tis still apt
To breed unrest, dissension, wild debate;
And I'm the worst at quarrels upon earth.
Unless a mighty injury should provoke me,
260 Get you to bed, go.
WIDOW Not without you, in troth, sir.
MISTRESS LOW-WATER
If you could think how much you wrong yourself
In my opinion of you, you would leave me now
With all the speed you might. I like you worse
For this fond heat, and drink in more suspicion of
you.
265 You high-fed widows are too cunning people
For a poor gentleman to come simply to.

207 The ... eyes An image of a sundial, with Philip's eyes as the sun, or of two clocks, one set by the other.

213 Push See note to 6.1.67.

214 toy dally

218 sparrow (proverbially lustful)

226 end purpose (but 'conclusion' in l. 227)

227-8 death is the end ... all Echoes the proverb, 'Death is the end of all'.

228 Unless ... middle (with a sexual innu-endo)

230 my modest strength the strength of my modesty

237 their Refers back to bold tricks, l. 233.

240 spring young shoot

248 book (a) account book (b) bible

267 simply (a) alone (b) artlessly, humbly

- WIDOW
What's that, sir?
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
You may make a youth on him;
'Tis at your courtesy, and that's ill trusted.
270 You could not want a friend, beside a suitor,
To sit in your husband's gown and look over your writings.
- WIDOW
What's this?
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
I say there is a time when women
Can do too much and understand too little.
Once more, to bed. I'd willingly be a father
275 To no more noses than I got myself.
And so good-night to you.
- WIDOW
Now I see the infection.
A yellow poison runs through the sweet spring
Of his fair youth already; 'tis distracted,
Jealous of that which thought yet never acted.—
280 [Kneeling] O dear sir, on my knees I swear to thee—
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
I prithee, use them in thy private chamber,
As a good lady should. Spare 'em not there;
'Twill do thee good. Faith, none 'twill do thee here.
- WIDOW [rising]
Have I yet married poverty, and missed love?
285 What fortune has my heart? That's all I craved,
And that lies now a-dying. It has took
A speeding poison, and I'm ignorant how.
I never knew what beggary was till now.
My wealth yields me no comfort in this plight.
290 Had want but brought me love, I'd happened right.
Exit Widow
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
So, this will serve now for a preparative
To ope the pores of some dislike at first.
The physic will pay't home.
Enter Master Low-water, [disguised as before]
How dost thou, sir?
- How goes the work?
- MASTER LOW-WATER
Your brother has the letter.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
295 I find no stop in't then; it moves well hitherto.
Did you convey it closely?
- MASTER LOW-WATER
He ne'er set eye of me.
[Enter Master Beveril,] above, [with a letter]
- BEVERIL
I cannot read too often.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside to Master Low-water]
Peace; to your office.
- [Master Low-water steps back]
- BEVERIL
What blessèd fate took pity of my heart,
But with her presence to relieve me thus?
300 All the large volumes that my time hath mastered
Are not so precious to adorn my spirit
As these few lines are to enrich my mind.
I thirst again to drink of the same fountain.
[He reads]
'Kind sir, I found your care and love so much in the performance of a little wherein your wit and art had 305 late employment that I dare now trust your bosom with business of more weight and eminence. Little thought the world that since the wedding dinner all my mirth was but dissembled, and seeming joys but counterfeit.
The truth to you, sir, is, I find so little signs of content in the bargain I made i'th' morning that I began to repent before evening prayer; and to show some fruits of his wilful neglect and wild disposition more than the day could bring forth to me, he's now forsook my bed;
315 I know no cause for't.'
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside] But I'll be sworn I do.
- BEVERIL [reading] 'Being thus distressed, sir, I desire your comfortable presence and counsel, whom I know to be of worth and judgement, that a lady may safely impart her griefs to you and commit 'em to the virtues 320 of commiseration and secrecy.
Your unfortunate friend,
The widow wife.
I have took order for your private admittance with a trusty servant of mine own, whom I have placed at 325 my chamber door to attend your coming.' He shall not wait too long and curse my slowness.
- MASTER LOW-WATER [aside] I would you'd come away then.
- BEVERIL
How much am I beguiled in that young gentleman!
I would have sworn had been the perfect abstract 330 Of honesty and mildness; 'tis not so.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER [aside]
I pardon you, sweet brother; there's no hold
Of what you speak now; you're in Cupid's pound.
- BEVERIL
Blest be the secret hand that brought thee hither;
But the dear hand that writ it, ten times blest. [Exit] 335
- MASTER LOW-WATER
That's I still; he's blest me now ten times at twice.
Away; I hear him coming.
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
Strike it sure now!
- MASTER LOW-WATER
I warrant thee, sweet Kate; choose your best bow.
Exit Mistress Low-water

268 make...him contrive for him to be a youth

269 at your courtesy subject to your indulgence

270 want lack, do without

275 got begot

277 yellow i.e. jealous

279 thought yet never acted was never even thought

290 Had...love i.e. if I had been poor but found love

291 preparative potion taken to prepare the body for a medicine

293 physic medicine

337-8 Strike...bow Strike suggests a phallic arrow; bow correspondingly suggests 'vulva' (and rhymes with now).

Scene 9

NO Wit Like a WOMANS.

Enter Master Beveril, [below]

BEVERIL

Who's there?

MASTER LOW-WATER

O, sir, is't you? You're welcome then.

My lady still expects you, sir.

340 BEVERIL

Who's with her?

MASTER LOW-WATER

Not any creature living, sir.

BEVERIL [giving money] Drink that.

I've made thee wait too long.

MASTER LOW-WATER

It does not seem so now, sir. Sir, if a man

Tread warily, as any wise man will,

345 How often may he come to a lady's chamber

And be welcome to her!

BEVERIL

Thou giv'st me learnèd counsel for a closet.

MASTER LOW-WATER

Make use on't, sir, and you shall find no loss in't.

[Exit Beveril to the Widow]

So, you are surely in, and you must under.

Enter, [at another door,] Kate Low-water,

[disguised as before, attended by Servants, and]

with all the guests: Sir Oliver Twilight, Master

Sunset, Twilight's wife (the Mother), daughter

(Grace), [Jane]; [after them,] Philip, Sandfield, and

Savourwit

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

350 Pardon my rude disturbance; my wrongs urge it.

I did but try the plainness of her mind,

Suspecting she dealt cunningly with my youth,

And told her the first night I would not know her;

But, minding to return, I found the door

355 Warded suspiciously, and I heard a noise

Such as fear makes, and guiltiness at th'approaching

Of an unlooked-for husband.

ALL THE GUESTS This is strange, sir.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [trying the door]

Behold, it's barred. I must not be kept out.

SIR OLIVER

There is no reason, sir.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER I'll be resolved in't.

360 If you be sons of honour, follow me.

Break open door, rush in; [manet Savourwit]

SAVOURWIT Then must I stay behind, for I think I was begot i'th' wooyard, and that makes everything go so hard with me.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER (within)

That's he; be sure on him!

345 come... chamber (quibbling on sexual penetration)

347 closet (a) lady's private room (b) study

349 under i.e. drown

355 Warded defended

359 resolved made certain

364 be sure on him i.e. keep him from escape

366 taken caught

369 quick alive

370 the lecher i.e. the plucked-out heart

pant beat

375 asks examines judicially

382 good parts (a) scholarly talents (b) physical endowments

387 book of fate i.e. the biblical Book of Life,

Enter confusedly [Mistress Low-water and Master Low-water, both disguised as before, and all the guests,] with the Widow and Mistress Low-water's brother Beveril the scholar

SIR OLIVER [to Mistress Low-water]

Be not so furious, sir.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

She whispered to him to slip into her closet.

[To the Widow] What, have I taken you? Is not my dream true now?

Unmerciful adulteress: the first night!

SIR OLIVER

Nay, good sir, patience.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER Give me the villain's heart,

That I may throw't into her bosom quick.

There let the lecher pant.

MOTHER

Nay, sweet sir!

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

Pardon me;

His life's too little for me.

WIDOW

How am I wrongfully shamed! [To Beveril] Speak your intent, sir,

Before this company; I pursue no pity.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

This is a fine thievish juggling, gentlemen!

She asks her mate that shares in guilt with her.

Too gross, too gross!

BEVERIL

Rash mischief!

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

Treacherous sir,

Did I for this cast a friend's arm about thee,

Gave thee the welcome of a worthy spirit,

And lodged thee in my house, nay, entertained thee

More like a natural brother than a stranger;

And have I this reward? Perhaps the pride

Of thy good parts did lift thee to this impudence.

Let her make much on 'em; she gets none of me.

Because thou'rt deeply read in most books else,

Thou would'st be so in mine. [Pointing to Widow]

There it stands for thee;

Turn o'er the leaves, and where you left, go forward.

To me it shall be like the book of fate,

Ever clasped up.

SIR OLIVER

O dear sir, say not so!

MISTRESS LOW-WATER

Nay, I'll swear more. For ever I refuse her;

I'll never set a foot into her bed,

Never perform the duty of man to her,

So long as I have breath.

SIR OLIVER

What an oath was there, sir! Call't again.

finally opened on the Day of Judgement (Revelation 20:12). Suggests that those who open and read the book find they are destined to be damned.

388 clasped up Larger books used to be held closed with a clasp.

393 Call't again revoke it

- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 395 I knew by amorous sparks struck from their eyes
 The fire would appear shortly in a blaze,
 And now it flames indeed. [To the Widow] Out of my house,
 And take your gentleman of good parts along with
 you.
 That shall be all your substance. He can live
 In any emperor's court in Christendom.
 You know what you did, wench, when you chose
 400 him,
 To thrust out me. You have no politic love;
 You are to learn to make your market, you.
 You can choose wit, a burden light and free,
 And leave the grosser element with me:
 405 Wealth, foolish trash, I thank you. Out of my doors!
- SIR OLIVER Nay, good sir, hear her.
 MOTHER and SUNSET Sweet sir!
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Pray, to your chambers, gentlemen. I should be here
 Master of what is mine.
 SIR OLIVER Hear her but speak, sir!
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 410 What can she speak but woman's common language:
 She's sorry and ashamed for't? That helps nothing.
- WIDOW
 Sir, since it is the hard hap of my life
 To receive injury where I placed my love—
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Why, la, I told you what escapes she'd have.
 SIR OLIVER
 Nay, pray, sir, hear her forward.
 415 WIDOW Let our parting
 Be full as charitable as our meeting was,
 That the pale envious world, glad of the food
 Of others' miseries, civil dissensions,
 And nuptial strifes, may not feed fat with ours.
 420 But since you are resolved so wilfully
 To leave my bed and ever to refuse me,
 As by your rage I find it your desire—
 Though all my actions deserve nothing less—
 Here are our friends, men both of worth and wisdom;
 425 Place so much power in them to make an evenness Between my peace and yours. All my wealth within doors
 In gold and jewels lie in those two caskets
 I lately led you to, the value of which Amounts to some five thousand pound apiece;
 430 Exchange a charitable hand with me,
 And take one casket freely. Fare thee well, sir.
- SIR OLIVER [to Mistress Low-water]
 How say you to that now?
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER Troth, I thank her, sir!
- Are not both mine already? [To the Widow] You shall wrong me,
 And then make satisfaction with mine own?
 I cannot blame you; a good course for you. 435
- WIDOW
 I know 'twas not my luck to be so happy.
 My miseries are no starters, when they come
 Stick longer by me.
 SIR OLIVER [to Mistress Low-water]
 Nay, but give me leave, sir:
 The wealth comes all by her.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER So does the shame,
 Yet that's most mine; why should not that be too? 440
- SIR OLIVER
 Sweet sir, let us rule so much with you:
 Since you intend an obstinate separation
 Both from her bed and board, give your consent
 To some agreement reasonable and honest.
 MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Must I deal honestly with her lust?
 MOTHER Nay, good sir! 445
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Why, I tell you, all the wealth her husband left her
 Is not of power to purchase the dear peace
 My heart has lost in these adulterous seas.
 Yet, let her works be base, mine shall be noble.
 SIR OLIVER
 That's the best word of comfort I heard yet. 450
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Friends may do much.—Go, bring those caskets forth.
 [Exeunt Servants]
 I hate her sight; I'll leave her though I lose by't.
 SIR OLIVER
 Spoke like a noble gentleman, i'faith.
 I'll honour thee for this.
 BEVERIL [aside] O, cursèd man!
 Must thy rash heat force this division? 455
- MISTRESS LOW-WATER [to the Widow]
 You shall have free leave now, without all fear.
 You shall not need oiled hinges, privy passages,
 Watchings, and whisperings. Take him boldly to you.
 WIDOW
 O that I had that freedom, since my shame
 Puts by all other fortunes, and owns him 460
 A worthy gentleman! If this cloud were passed him
 I'd marry him, were't but to spite thee only,
 So much I hate thee now.
 Enter Servants with two caskets, and the suitors:
 Sir Gilbert Lambstone, Weatherwise, Pepperton, and Overdone
 SIR OLIVER
 Here come the caskets, sir. Hold your good mind now,
 And we shall make a virtuous end between you. 465

402 make your market From the proverb
 'to make one's market', to determine one's own fortune.

403 You...free Proverbially, words are but wind, and air is free.

404 the grosser element i.e. earth (from which wealth, as land or precious metals, is derived)

411 nothing not at all

437 starters deserters, wanderers

440 that be i.e. the wealth be

457 passages (a) goings on, passings to and fro (b) corridors

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Though nothing less she merit but a curse
 That might still hang upon her and consume her still—
 As't has been many a better woman's fortune
 That has deserved less vengeance, and felt more—470 Yet my mind scorns to leave her shame so poor.

SIR OLIVER
 Nobly spoke still!

SIR GILBERT This strikes me into music. Ha, ha!

PEPPERTON
 Parting of goods before the bodies join?

WEATHERWISE This 'tis to marry beardless domineering boys. I knew 'twould come to this pass. Well fare a 475 just almanac yet; for now is Mercury going into the second house near unto Ursa Major, that great Hunks
 the Bear at the Bridge-foot in heaven, which shows horrible bear-baitings in wedlock; and the sun near ent'ring into th' Dog sets 'em all together by th' ears.

SIR OLIVER [to Mistress Low-water, opening a casket]
 You see what's in't.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 480 I think 'tis as I left it.

WIDOW
 Then do but gage your faith to this assembly
 That you will ne'er return more to molest me,
 But rest in all revenges full appeased
 And amply satisfied with that half my wealth,
 485 And take't as freely as life wishes health.

SIR OLIVER
 La you, sir; come, come; faith, you shall swear that.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 Nay, gentlemen, for your sakes now I'll deal fairly with her.

SIR OLIVER
 I would we might see that, sir.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER I could set her free;
 But now I think on't, she deserves it not.

SUNSET
 490 Nay, do not check your goodness. Pray, sir, on with't.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 I could release her ere I parted with her—
 But 'twere a courtesy ill placed—and set her
 At as free liberty to marry again
 As you all know she was before I knew her.

SIR OLIVER
 What, couldst thou, sir?

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 But 'tis too good a blessing for her.— 495
 Up with the casket, sirrah.

WIDOW O, sir, stay!

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 I have nothing to say to you.

SIR OLIVER Do you hear, sir?
 Pray let's have one word more with you for our money.

WIDOW [to Mistress Low-water]
 Since you've exposed me to all shame and sorrow,
 And made me fit but for one hope and fortune, 500
 Bearing my former comforts away with you,
 Show me a parting charity but in this:
 For all my losses pay me with that freedom,
 And I shall think this treasure as well given
 As ever 'twas ill got.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER
 I might afford it you, 505
 Because I never mean to be more troubled with you.
 But how shall I be sure of the honest use on't,
 How you'll employ that liberty?—Perhaps sifully,
 In wantonness unlawful, and I answer for't.
 So I may live a bawd to your loose works still, 510
 In giving 'em first vent. Not I, 'shall pardon me;
 I'll see you honestly joined ere I release you.
 I will not trust you for the last trick you played me.
 Here's your old suitors.

PEPPERTON Now we thank you, sir!

WEATHERWISE My almanac warns me from all cuckoldly 515 conjunctions.

WIDOW [to Mistress Low-water]
 Be but commander of your word now, sir,
 And before all these gentlemen our friends
 I'll make a worthy choice.

SUNSET [to Mistress Low-water]
 Fly not ye back now.

MISTRESS LOW-WATER [to the Widow]
 I'll try thee once. I am married to another. 520
 There's thy release.

SIR OLIVER
 Hoyda, there's a release with a witness!
 Thou'rt free, sweet wench.

WIDOW [to Mistress Low-water] Married to another? 525
 Then in revenge to thee,
 To vex thine eyes, 'cause thou hast mocked my heart
 And with such treachery repaid my love,

475 Mercury (representing the young gentleman)
 475-6 the second house (associated with money)
 476 Ursa Major constellation of the Great Bear (named for the animal's association with surliness and bear-baiting)
Hunks Originally the name of a particular bear at Paris Garden bear-baiting amphitheatre, hence a by-word for bad temper and meanness.

477 the Bridge-foot Location of a tavern called the Bear, over the bridge from London in Southwark, and on the way to the bear-gardens.
shows indicates 479 th' Dog i.e. the constellation of Canis Major, and its brightest star Sirius, the 'Dog-star'. The sun does not pass through Canis Major. The 'dog-days' (the time of Sirius' heliacal rising; late July-early August) were associated with pernicious events and dogs running mad. The reference is also to bear-baiting dogs.

sets...ears (proverbial)
 492 But 'twere if it were not
 500 one...fortune i.e. dissolution of the marriage
 516 conjunctions (quibbling on the astrological and marital senses)
 522 with a witness (proverbial for 'for sure, with a vengeance')

You wished for love; and, faith, I have bestowed you
 Upon a gentleman that does dearly love you.
 That recompense I've made you; and you must think,
 madam,
 I loved you well—though I could never ease you—
 585 When I fetched in my brother thus to please you.
 SIR OLIVER
 Here's unity for ever strangely wrought.
 WIDOW
 I see too late there is a heavy judgement
 Keeps company with extortion and foul deeds,
 And, like a wind which vengeance has in chase,
 590 Drives back the wrongs into the injurer's face.
 My punishment is gentle, and to show
 My thankful mind for't, thus I'll revenge this:
 With an embracement here, and here a kiss.
 [She embraces Mistress Low-water and kisses
 Beveril]
 SIR OLIVER
 Why, now the bells they go trim, they go trim!
 [To Beveril] I wished thee, sir, some unexpected
 595 blessing
 For my wife's ransom, and 'tis fall'n upon thee.
 WEATHERWISE A pox of this; my almanac ne'er gulled me till this hour! 'The thirteenth day, work for the hangman', and there's nothing toward it. I'd been a 600 fine ass if I'd given twelve pence for a horse to have rid to Tyburn tomorrow! But now I see the error: 'tis false-figured; it should be 'thirteen days and a half, work for the hangman', for he ne'er works under thirteen pence halfpenny. Beside, Venus being 'a spot in the 605 sun's garment' shows there should be a woman found in hose and doublet.
 SIR OLIVER Nay, faith, sweet wife, we'll make no more hours on't now; 'tis as fine a contracting time as ever came amongst gentlefolks.—Son Philip, Master 610 Sandfield, come to the book here.
 PHILIP [aside to Saviourwit] Now I'm waked
 Into a thousand miseries and their torments.
 SAVOURWIT [aside to Philip] And I come after you, sir, drawn with wild horses. There will be a brave show 615 on's anon if this weather continue.
 SIR OLIVER [to Grace and Jane]
 Come, wenches.—Where be these young gentlemen's hands now?
 MOTHER [aside]
 Poor gentleman my son!—Some other time, sir.
 SIR OLIVER I'll have't now, i'faith, wife.

WIDOW What are you making here?
 SIR OLIVER I have sworn, sweet madam,
 620 My son shall marry Master Sunset's daughter,
 And Master Sandfield mine.
 WIDOW So, you go well, sir;
 [Pointing to Jane] But what make you this way then?
 SIR OLIVER This? For my son.
 WIDOW
 O, back, sir, back! This is no way for him.
 SUNSET and SIR OLIVER How? 625
 WIDOW
 O, let me break an oath, to save two souls,
 Lest I should wake another judgement greater.
 You come not here for him, sir.
 SIR OLIVER What's the matter?
 WIDOW
 Either give me free leave to make this match,
 Or I'll forbid the banns.
 SIR OLIVER Good madam, take it. 630
 WIDOW
 Here, Master Sandfield, then—
 [She presents Jane to Sandfield]
 SIR OLIVER Cud's bodkins!
 WIDOW
 Take you this maid.
 SANDFIELD You could not please me better, madam.
 SIR OLIVER
 Hoyda! Is this your hot love to my daughter, sir?
 WIDOW
 Come hither, Philip; here's a wife for you.
 [She presents Grace to him]
 SIR OLIVER
 Zounds, he shall ne'er do that: marry his sister? 635
 WIDOW
 Had he been ruled by you, he had married her,
 But now he marries Master Sunset's daughter,
 And Master Sandfield yours. I've saved your oath, sir.
 PHILIP O, may this blessing hold!
 SAVOURWIT Or else all the liquor runs out. 640
 SIR OLIVER [to the Widow] What riddle's this, madam?
 WIDOW
 A riddle of some fourteen years of age now.
 [To Philip's Mother] You can remember, madam, that your daughter
 Was put to nurse to Master Sunset's wife?
 MOTHER
 True; that we talked on lately.
 SIR OLIVER I grant that, madam. 645

Shirley James Shirley's Prologue for the 1631 revival in Dublin
 We are sorry, gentlemen, that with all our pains
 To invite you hither, the wide house contains No more. Call you this term? If the Courts were
 So thin, I think 'twould make your lawyers swear,
 5 And curse men's charity in whose want they thrive,
 Whilst we by it woe to be kept alive.
 I'll tell you what a poet says: two year

He has lived in Dublin, yet he knows not where
 To find the city. He observed each gate,
 It could not run through them, they are too strait. 10
 When he did live in England, he heard say
 That here were men loved wit and a good play,
 That here were gentlemen and lords. A few
 Were bold to say there were some ladies too.
 This he believed, and though they are not found 15
 Above, who knows what may be underground?
 But they do not appear, and missing these,
 He says he'll not believe your chronicles Hereafter, nor the maps, since all this while Dublin's invisible, and not Brazil; 20
 And all that men can talk he'll think to be
 A fiction now above all poetry.
 But stay; you think he's angry? No, he prayed
 Me tell you he recants what he has said.
 He's pleased so you shall be, yes, and confess 25
 We have a way 'bove wit of man to please;
 For though we should despair to purchase it
 By art of man, this is a woman's wit.

THE LADY'S TRAGEDY: PARALLEL TEXTS

Edited by Julia Briggs

ON 31 October 1611, the Master of the Revels, Sir George Buc, read through, corrected and licensed a manuscript submitted to him by the King's Men, Shakespeare's company and the leading troupe of the day. On the last page, he wrote, 'This second Maydens tragedy (for it hath no name inscribed) may with the reformations bee acted publickly'. Buc gave the manuscript this provisional title because its theme of tyrannicide and its anti-court satire reminded him of Beaumont and Fletcher's The Maid's Tragedy, submitted by the same company in the previous year. The Second Maiden's Tragedy, as it has usually been called, was never printed, perhaps because of its anti-court sentiments, but it survived in the manuscript marked up first by Buc, and then by the King's Men, who used it as the prompt copy for their performances. In this edition, the play has been retitled The Lady's Tragedy, since its heroine, like the Duchess of Malfi, has no personal name, and is always referred to as the Lady, or else as Govianus's Lady. The heroine of the parallel plot also remains unnamed. Though she is usually identified as the Wife or Anselmus's Wife, she is four times referred to as 'Lady' or 'Anselmus's Lady' in the original stage directions (at A.I.2.290/B.I.2.289, 4.I.0.2, 5.I.37.2, and 5.I.120.2), while the word 'lady' itself occurs more than fifty times within the dialogue. Jacobean spelling (like modern pronunciation) did not distinguish between The Lady's Tragedy and The Ladies' Tragedy.

Surviving in a single manuscript without a title-page (though with the names of George Chapman, Thomas Goff, and William Shakespeare written in as later guesses as to authorship beneath Buc's licence), The Lady's Tragedy was first attributed to Thomas Middleton by the Victorian poet and dramatic critic Algernon Swinburne. His tentative suggestion has since been confirmed by a number of scholars, including E. H. C. Oliphant, R. H. Barker, and Samuel Schoenbaum and, in the 1970s, by David Lake and MacDonald P. Jackson, who used statistical linguistic tests and independently arrived at the same conclusion. Anne Lancashire's edition for Revels (1978), while shrinking from putting Middleton's name on the title-page, nevertheless found many verbal parallels with other plays of his, and in particular with No Wit/Help like a Woman's, written earlier in 1611; further parallels have been observed by Roger Holdsworth. In 1998, the play was finally published as the work of Thomas Middleton in a volume of Four Jacobean Sex Tragedies edited by Martin Wiggins, under the title The Maiden's Tragedy (although the word 'maiden' never actually appears in the play). In the present edition, the text is given in two versions—the first, in the left column, is as close as possible to Middleton's original composition, and the second, in the right column, is as it was performed, after various cuts and alterations had been incorporated. For the first time, the reader will be able to see how a Jacobean tragedy, written for the King's Men at the height of their success, underwent processes of censorship, addition, and revision before and during rehearsal.

Plot

The plot of The Lady's Tragedy resembles that of The Changeling in being constructed from two different narratives worked together to form a complex counterpoint: the Lady plot is assumed to have been Middleton's own invention. It draws on themes earlier dramatized in The Revenger's Tragedy (1606) such as court corruption and the fatal kiss of the dead, while the character of the Tyrant owes something to the sexually fixated Tyrant of The Bloody Banquet (1608–9). The Wife plot is adapted from Cervantes's story of 'The Curious Impertinent', included in the first part of Don Quixote (1605), and also published separately in a French translation alongside the Spanish text in 1608. This is a tale of the woes of marriage, characterized by ironies of misplaced confidence and sexual betrayal such as Middleton relished.

The play opens with the Tyrant ascending the throne and proposing to the Lady, who rejects him in favour of her betrothed—Govianus, the kingdom's rightful heir. The two are placed under house arrest, and the Tyrant sends her father Helvetius to woo the Lady on his behalf, but Helvetius repents when Govianus shoots him with a blank pistol, literally putting the fear of God in him. The next set of messengers lay siege to the house, and, in the midst of furious knocking, the Lady commits suicide to avoid abduction and rape, Govianus having failed to slay her at the crucial moment. The Tyrant, brooking no obstacle to his desires, breaks into the Cathedral and steals the Lady's corpse from its tomb. As Govianus mourns for her, her ghost appears to him, begging him to recover her body and re-inter it. Meanwhile in the Wife plot, Govianus's brother Anselmus is determined to test his Wife's fidelity, and so forces his best friend Votarius to tempt her. After some initial resistance, the Wife surrenders. The lovers set about deceiving Anselmus, but are betrayed to him by Leonella, the Wife's maid, who is eager to exonerate herself and create further mischief, especially as her own lover, Bellarius, is the sworn enemy of Votarius. The Wife attempts to convince her husband of her fidelity by staging a scene in which she fights off Votarius's unwanted advances, but she is again betrayed by Leonella, who poisons the sword with which the Wife defends herself. In the fighting that follows, everyone is killed. Govianus mourns for his brother Anselmus, and then sets off for the court where the Tyrant is paying homage to the Lady's corpse. Disguised as an artist, Govianus paints her dead lips with poison, so that the Tyrant dies from her kiss. A conspiracy of courtiers declares Govianus king, and the play ends with the Lady's funeral procession.

First Performance

Middleton wrote this play to be performed by the King's Men at their indoor theatre at Blackfriars, late in 1611: the boys' singing voices were one attraction there, and he included two songs—the mournful, 'If ever pity were well placed', sung by a page at 4.4.14–28, and the madrigal, 'O what is beauty that's so much adorèd?', sung offstage while the Tyrant worships the Lady's corpse at 5.2.14–19. The comparative darkness of the indoor theatre would have enhanced the effect in 4.3, where the ruffians break into the Cathedral with pickaxes and dark lanterns, and contributed to the coup de théâtre when 'a great light appears in the midst of the tomb' from behind or beneath the stage (4.4.42.2–3). Ceremonial music would have further emphasized the contrast between the Tyrant's worship of the Lady's corpse early in 5.2, and the dead march at its end. The Lady's tomb, 'richly set forth' (4.3.0.3–4), may even have included an effigy of the Lady herself, as Jacobean tombs often did (see illustration), perhaps also recalling the final scene of The Winter's Tale, which the King's Men had performed earlier that year. But unlike Hermione's statue, the Lady's corpse when taken from the tomb proves 'cold indeed' (4.3.94).

When Middleton had finished drafting his play, two copies would have been written out by a professional scrivener employed by the company. The copy which has survived was submitted to Sir George Buc, in accordance with government regulations. The second copy consisted of individual 'parts' for the actors. As the play went into rehearsal, Middleton was asked to supply some extra speeches. The same scrivener copied these onto a single folio page, twice. One of these was cut up and the slips were pinned onto the manuscript that Buc had sent back, marked up with his corrections; this now became the prompt copy. The other sheet was cut up to be distributed to the actors. The new speeches (at B1.1.198, B1.1.208–15, B2.1.3–10, B4.2.38–41, B4.2a.1–11, and B5.1.166–79) tidied up loose ends in the plot, making the shared house arrest of the Lady and Govianus more plausible, and covering the Tyrant's exit and immediate re-entry at the end of 4.2 and the beginning of 4.3 (disallowed by the stage practice of the day). The most striking of Middleton's additions gives Anselmus, the jealous husband, a moment of sudden reversal and discovery, an Aristotelian peripateia: instead of dying in the happy (if mistaken) belief that his Wife had proved her innocence by killing Votarius (5.1.136–42), he survives a few minutes longer to learn that his worst fears have been realized, and she had indeed cuckolded him (B5.1.166–79). The addition at B4.2a.1–11 prepared the audience for the reappearance of Helvetius in 5.2, but in production further substantial cuts were made, especially to the last scene, so that Helvetius's part in it disappeared entirely. The cutting of several long poetic speeches that hold up the action at crucial points (e.g. at A2.1.108–38, A5.2.127–38, A180–7) suggests that comparable long set speeches may have been cut from other plays of the period during rehearsal.

We do not know whether Middleton, having supplied the script and six additional passages, played any further part in the production of his play, but it seems unlikely. He was not an actor or a company shareholder, and so had no further reason to participate, once he had received payment for the script (probably around £6). The play text moved steadily away from his original conception as it passed through the hands, first of Buc, and later of the company, in the course of rehearsals. Sir George Buc had begun by correcting what he took to be a grammatical mistake (at 1.1.2), but then went on to delete a number of oaths (sixteen are deleted in all, five examples of 'Heart!', ten of 'Life!' and a 'By the mass!'), a reference to the recent death by torture of Henry IV's assassin, François Ravaillac (A5.2.141/B5.2.116), as well as a series of sarcastic comments on the court and its courtiers:

... heaven,
That glorious court of spirits, all honest courtiers!
(last three words deleted, 1.2.14–15)

I must put on
A courtier's face and do't. Mine own will shame me.
(‘courtier’s’ deleted, ‘brazen’ substituted, 1.2.164–5)

Push! Talk like a courtier, girl, not like a fool.
(‘courtier’ deleted, ‘woman’ substituted, A2.1.69/
B2.1.75)

There's many a good knight's daughter is in service
And cannot get such favour of her mistress
(‘knight’s’ deleted, ‘men’s’ substituted [ungrammatically], 4.1.74–5)

I would not trust at court, an I could choose
(‘at court’ deleted, ‘but few’ substituted, A5.2.80/
B5.2.66)

In addition, a number of passages have been marked for omission that comment specifically on the sexual misbehaviour of court ladies (e.g. at A2.1.72–81, A3.1.219–21), and the play's final couplet has been spoiled by substituting the more general term 'virtuous' for 'honest' (which carried stronger connotations of sexual chastity). It had originally read

I would those ladies that fill honour's rooms Might all be borne so honest to their tombs. (A5.2.212– 13/B5.2.163–4).

Although the play's original cast list was not recorded, the bookkeeper entered the names of two of the King's Men on the play script in the course of adding further stage directions. One was that of Master (Robert) Gough, written in at B4.2a.o.1. Gough had been with the company since before 1605, and almost certainly played Memphionius, though the particular speech where his name appears lacks its speech heading. The Lady was played by Richard Robinson, named in the margin at the entry for her ghost (B4.4.42.7). Robinson was one of the company's boy apprentices, and may also have played Shakespeare's Hermione. His name was included in the cast-list for Jonson's Catiline (1611), where he probably played Fulvia. Five years later, in The Devil is an Ass, Engine recommends Dick Robinson's talents as a female impersonator to Merecraft (2.7.64–73), but he is actually replaced by Wittipol (no doubt also played by Robinson himself), who later appears in drag as 'the Spanish Lady'. By the 1620s, Robinson was taking adult roles such as the Cardinal in The Duchess of Malfi, and had his own apprentice. He remained an actor and shareholder with the company until the 1630s. The part of the Tyrant would have suited the company's leading actor, Richard Burbage, who had played the lip-gnawing Richard III, Macbeth and, probably, Leontes.

Later History

The manuscript in which all these changes have been recorded is one of sixteen surviving promptbooks used in the public theatres before 1642, and one of only four to have been marked up by the Master of the Revels in his capacity as censor. The detailed stage directions entered on the manuscript of The Lady's Tragedy by the bookkeeper provide evidence of its performance, in the absence of other records; so, too, does its impact on other dramatists, especially John Webster, who borrowed several of its effects for The White Devil (1612), including the poisonous kiss, and for his fifth-act climax, Govianus's trick with the blank pistol shots and also a violent reversal resulting from a revelation. The character of the Lady, with her love of 'goodness' rather than 'greatness', also influenced that of The Duchess of Malfi (c.1614).

After the theatres closed in 1642, the manuscript of The Lady's Tragedy passed, with other playbooks belonging to the King's Men, into the hands of the printer Humphrey Moseley who registered it for printing on 9 September 1653 with several other Middleton plays (though the order of his list suggests that he had not identified it as Middleton's); in any case he never actually got round to printing it. A century later it resurfaced in the collection of the antiquarian, John Warburton, who claimed that it was one of only three play manuscripts that escaped being burned, or baked under pies by his cook. From Warburton it passed to Lord Lansdowne, and thence to the British Museum Library in 1807. It was first published in 1824 and nine further editions have been produced since then, most notably W. W. Greg's old-spelling transcript for the Malone Society (1910) and Anne Lancashire's exemplary modern edition for Revels (1978).

After nearly four centuries of complete theatrical neglect, the twentieth century ended with a sudden flurry of performances of Middleton's play under a variety of titles. The first was in London, in 1984, as The Tyrant's Tragedy, in a production by the Troupe at the Upstream Theatre. Ten years later, this time billed as Middleton's The Lady's Tragedy and using the earlier (left-hand) text given here, it was performed by 'Show of Strength' at Bristol, under the direction of Alan Coveney, who also played the Tyrant, in a production memorable for its menacing atmosphere and intelligent verse-speaking. But earlier that year, the appearance of a new and highly eccentric edition of the play created renewed interest in it: in May 1994, Charles Hamilton published a version under the title Cardenio, or The Second Maiden's Tragedy, attributing it to William Shakespeare and John Fletcher and renaming the characters from the 'Cardenio' plot of Cervantes's Don Quixote. Hamilton claimed it was Shakespeare's lost late play, Cardenio, on the grounds that Cardenio and the Wife plot of The Lady's Tragedy both derived from (different) episodes in Cervantes. Hamilton also claimed that the manuscript of The Lady's Tragedy was in Shakespeare's hand. His edition was launched with a play-reading by the Allied Theatre Group at Fort Worth, Texas.

Once (re-)attributed to Shakespeare, the play rapidly acquired a new lease of life: it was translated into German and performed at the Globe Theater at Neuss, near Düsseldorf, in August 1994, and into Serbian in 1996, to be broadcast by Radio Belgrade, where its focus on political oppression had a special immediacy. Meanwhile, back in the USA in 1995, the Upstart Crow Theatre Company of Boulder, Colorado, performed a carefully authentic version under the play's traditional title, attributing it to Middleton. Two further performances took place that year, both as Cardenio, by the Unseam'd Shakespeare Company of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and by the Palm Beach Shakespeare Festival, where Kevin Crawford produced and starred as the Tyrant; an off-Broadway run followed in 1996.

In 1998, Kate Buckley produced the play as Cardenio for the Next Theatre of Evanston, Illinois, and Melanie White directed the first English version as Cardenio at Essex University, and later at the Globe Theatre on Bankside. Her production used modern dress and a Gothic style, with off-stage screams and bright red blood and lipstick emphasized by a black and white set and costumes. In 2002, the Lone Star Ensemble played it as Cardenio in Los Angeles, again in modern dress, using newsreels and guns for swords in the manner of Baz Luhrmann's Romeo + Juliet. This version separated the two plots and performed them successively, with an interval between; soliloquies were videoed and Cardenio/Govianus's third-act swoon was drug-induced. The same year, the Ariel Society performed a Cardenio at Oxford with an almost all-female cast, Jessica Cullimore playing the Tyrant. In October 2004, Blue Eyes played a modern-dress version at the White Bear Theatre. As Shakespeare's Cardenio, The Lady's Tragedy has found a new theatrical life, though it still awaits a strong mainstream professional production.

Structure

Despite increasing interest in it, the play has so far failed to attract the critical attention it deserves, though its strong and independent heroine, its percipient exploration of marital distrust and betrayal, its highly politicized treatment of the court will attract future critics, and no doubt theatrical directors as well. Until recently, the vivid psychological detail of the Wife plot has appealed more strongly than the Lady plot which Samuel Schoenbaum considered 'less interesting', finding it 'unconvincing', and lacking in realism. He disliked its use of archetypes, and its serious and uninhibited use of the supernatural, so unlike the naturalistic stage practice of his day. Schoenbaum also complained of 'the two stories being joined together in a clumsy and arbitrary fashion', though, as Richard Levin was to point out, this was no more true of The Lady's Tragedy than it was of The Changeling: in both plays, the two plots are cunningly interwoven, and scenes of temptation, sudden reversals, play-acting, disguise, treachery, even particular words or phrases echo one another closely throughout. In fact, like the rest of Middleton's œuvre, The Lady's Tragedy displays a deep theatrical self-awareness (as David Bergeron has demonstrated).

Both plots represent sexual desire as self-destructive and spiritually dangerous, recalling the imagery used of Narcissus's death in The Wisdom of Solomon Paraphrased: 'O sugared kiss, dyed with a poisoned lip' (13.86), a metaphor made literal when the Tyrant actually kisses the Lady's poisoned lips (as in The Revenger's Tragedy, where the Duke kisses Gloriana's poisoned skull [3.5.145]). Poison also figures in the Wife plot where the sword that Leonella has baited kills her as well as Votarius, Bellarius, and perhaps the Wife too; its poison rages like a fire through breast and blood, as a foretaste of punishments to come (5.1.108, 132–5). The gendered symbolism of poisoned lips and sword suggests the way in which the Tyrant's lust propels the Lady plot, and the Wife's desire drives the Wife plot, although her husband's jealousy and the several treacheries of Votarius and Leonella also contribute to her downfall.

Both plots present relationships under breaking strain: the love of Govianus and his Lady (they are apparently betrothed rather than married—a familiar state for many young couples in early modern England) is threatened by outside forces in the shape of the Tyrant and his henchmen, while Anselmus's marriage is threatened from within by his own obsessive fears, a point he himself makes at the outset: 'He's lost the kingdom, but his mind's restored; | Which is the larger empire?' (1.2.6–7). For Anselmus, the Lady's independent choice of Govianus gives his brother the 'peace and pleasure' (1.2.18) that he cannot find within his marriage. His words expose the hidden cost of patriarchy which, by reducing women's opportunities to make active choices, sets up troubling doubts and anxieties in their masters. When the Wife is play-acting for Anselmus's benefit, she compares herself with the Lady, threatening that unless her husband can save her from Votarius's (supposedly) unwanted attentions: '... here I vow | I'll imitate my noble sister's fate, ... | And cast away my life as she did hers' (5.1.79–82). But by this point, the comparison merely emphasizes the difference between the Wife who has succumbed to temptation, and the Lady who has triumphed over it in death.

Staging Oppression

There is no obvious source for the dramatic confrontation between the Tyrant and the Lady in the opening scene—the meeting of an irresistible force with an immovable object—though it voices contemporary fears of absolute power, and of political or religious coercion, as Bushnell, and more recently, Allman, have shown. The Tyrant's transgressive desire reflects his refusal to submit to the law, a self-will so determined that it overrides fate and death. 'It is the mark of a tyrant, ...', wrote Erasmus, in The Education of a Christian Prince, 'to follow the unbridled will of [his] mind.' Like his predecessor in The Bloody Banquet, the Tyrant descends from sexual obsession into full-blown mania.

At one level, the Lady's resistance is emblematic of the (religious) conscience. The encounter between a female victim and a male authority figure is a recurrent motif in Middleton, though more typically, masculine power prevails, as in the encounter between the Duke and Bianca in 2.2 of Women, Beware Women. The chaste wife who becomes the sexual victim of a man in power, sacrificing her life, was epitomized in the Roman legend of Lucrece (used by Middleton in The Ghost of Lucrece, written at the outset of his career). The Revenger's Tragedy (1606) reworks different elements of Lucrece's story: Gloriana's death provides the Revenger with his motive, Junior rapes Antonio's wife, triggering a political conspiracy against the Duke and his family, and Castiza defends her virtue. Tales of sexual intimidation were, in any case, popular on the Elizabethan stage, and the Roman heroines Lucrece and Virginia, as well as the Biblical Susannah were dramatized in Thomas Garter's Most Virtuous and Godly Susanna (1563–9), R. B.'s, and later Webster's Appius and Virginia (1564 and 1624, respectively) and Thomas Heywood's The Rape of Lucrece (1607). Comparable situations of sexual and political oppression also occur in Anthony Munday's The Death of Robert, Earl of Huntingdon (1598), whose heroine Matilda, like the Lady, is conspicuously dressed in black, as well as in Shakespeare's Measure for Measure (1604) and John Marston's Sophonisba, the Wonder of Women (1605).

Closest in atmosphere to The Lady's Tragedy, and a significant influence on it (see notes to A4.2.38 and B5.1.192) is John Fletcher's Tragedy of Valentinian, performed some time during 1610 or 1611: here, the chaste wife, Lucina, is raped by the Emperor, whose corrupt court is deeply complicit in her ruin. One of the age's most influential books, Foxe's 'Book of Martyrs' (The Acts and Monuments, 1570), had recorded the lives of a number of early Christian martyrs, including that of Sophronia who, like Middleton's Lady and her Roman prototype, Virginia, or Olympia in Marlowe's Tamburlaine, Part Two, avoided rape by committing suicide. Foxe represented the resistance of martyrs, among them women and the lower classes, as part of the long and ultimately victorious struggle of the Protestant church against Catholic persecution.

All or any of these narratives could have contributed to the story of the Tyrant and the Lady. The Tyrant's illegitimacy, lustfulness, and acts of desecration and idolatry link him with the Catholic Church as it appeared to committed Protestants like Middleton, while the sombrely dressed Lady represents the reformed Church, persecuted but unafraid. She is the daughter of Helvetius, perhaps named after the (Calvinist) United Swiss Provinces and referred to as 'the father of the state' (B4.2a.9), and she is betrothed to the rightful, virtuous and godly prince, Govianus. As John Stachniewski observed, the play also employs a number of characteristically Calvinist images, whereby spiritual states are described in terms of physical processes: at A2.1.149/B2.1.115 Govianus acts as a surgeon, restoring Helvetius to spiritual health by cutting away his worldly ambitions, an operation that the good governor may be obliged to perform upon a people corrupted by evil rule. In the Wife plot, the temptation to adultery is experienced by Votarius first as the threat of a 'dead sleep' (1.2.226), then of sickness (1.2.229). Later, thoughts of jealousy and revenge course like poison or alcohol through his blood (2.2.110, 149–50), until they are overtaken by the literal action of the poison itself (5.1.108).

The sexual passions of the Wife plot contrast with the transcendent love of Govianus and the Lady who take comfort in the thought of sharing eternal joy: 'we'll walk together | Like loving spirits' (4.4.82–3). The Lady does not consider suicide a sin (St Augustine had argued it was) but as an act necessary to preserve herself from the Tyrant whose 'lust may part thee from me, but death, never. | Thou canst not lose me there, for dying thine, | Thou dost enjoy me still. Kings cannot rob thee' (3.1.144–6). The intensely dramatic scene (3.1) in which she stabs herself to the accompaniment of frenzied offstage knocking wonderfully conveys the lovers' conflicting desires to be united both in life and in death. The violent break-in of Govianus's house, and subsequently of the Lady's tomb symbolically enact her threatened rape and make powerful theatre. For the Tyrant, the Lady's spirituality is merely an obstacle to his desires; their sinister nature is made fully apparent when he embraces her corpse, in a gruesome echo of the Dance of Death, at once anticipating and acting out his damnation.

Body and Spirit

Yet even in death her spirit still resists him. Her presence as a ghost creates a number of problems, some metaphysical, others practical and theatrical. There is the whole question of the legitimacy of ghosts within the Protestant tradition: as in Hamlet, the ghost threatens to be incompatible with a belief system that no longer allows a place of transit for its dead. Female ghosts were in any case unusual on the Jacobean stage, appearing more commonly in complaint poems in which legendary figures such as Fair Rosamund or Jane Shore lamented their lost virtue. Middleton's The Ghost of Lucrece, a poem belonging to this genre, effects an interesting negotiation between poetry and the theatre when its heroine writes out her wrongs as if on stage, and speaking a prologue; but otherwise she has little in common with the Lady's ghost who has anticipated and avoided Lucrece's fate. The ghost's plea for reburial was traditional, common to a wide range of cultures (see, for example, the ballad of 'The Unquiet Grave', or Virgil's Palinurus in the Aeneid, 6.337–383), though the Tyrant's necrophilia gives it a peculiarly gruesome twist. The notion that the spirit requires proper burial to be at peace is very ancient and not especially Christian, though Govianus offers a rationale for it in terms of the contemporary belief in the resurrection of the body: 'Thy body shall return to rise again' (A5.2.162/B5.2.137).

The Lady's ghost is given specifically Christian, and even angelic overtones, as if to allay any suspicions it might arouse. As Lancashire has pointed out, its appearance at the tomb dressed all in white, accompanied by a supernatural wind and a mysterious beam of light (4.4.42.1–6), recalls the appearance of the angel at Christ's empty tomb in the 'Resurrection' play of the suppressed Mystery cycles. Traditionally, the angel appeared to the four soldiers guarding the tomb, who shifted from coarse jesting to panic, much as the soldiers do in 4.3. Protestant objections to those plays had focused largely on their representation of the divine in gross material terms; yet even in the very different medium of the secular stage, the representation of the supernatural remained a problem. The Lady (or her spirit) responds to Govianus's prayer with the strange words, 'I am not here' (echoing the angel at Christ's empty tomb in the gospels: 'He is not here, for He is risen')—words that emphasize the shifting and ultimately elusive nature of the self as body or spirit, even as actor. The stage direction 'Enter Lady | Rich Robinson' marking the ghost's entry at B4.4.42.7 draws attention to the physical presence of the boy actor, his face whitened with flour as convention required, dressed 'all in white, stuck with jewels, and a great crucifix on her breast', to resemble the corpse 'as went out' in the previous scene (and, perhaps, the Lady's effigy upon her tomb). The relationship between the Lady's ghost and her physical remains becomes even more complicated in the play's last scene, where the two are required to appear on stage together.

Disappointingly, the stage directions give no indication as to whether the Lady's corpse in 5.2 was represented by another actor or, as seems more probable, by a dummy which could also have been used for her abduction from the tomb at 4.3.81.1. After death, the Lady's body is emptied of its spirit, and the actor who played her living

A Jacobean tomb effigy from the Church of St Margaret, Paston, England. Did the Lady's tomb, so 'richly set forth', include her effigy?

must now play her ghost, although body and spirit are dressed identically, first in the white of grave-clothes or eternal brightness in Act 4, and then in fashionable if deathly black velvet, with pearls in Act 5. The transience of flesh is the theme of the off-stage song at 5.2.17 ('The dainty preserv'd flesh, how soon it moulders'), underlined by the corpse's 'too constant paleness' (A5.2.28/B5.2.23) and its tendency to sag: 'Keep her up, | I'll have her swoon no more, there's treachery in it' (A5.2.115-16/B5.2.101-2). The Tyrant's efforts to disguise from himself what he is worshipping reach a climax in the face-painting episode, which brings together various symbolic associations of deception (among them, the make-up used on the stage itself). In the opening scene, the Tyrant had attacked the Lady for wearing mourning garments, while she had responded by rejecting 'strange colours' (A1.1.113-25/B1.1.94-106). Now the Tyrant commands an artist to impose on her the colour she lacks. Face-painting in Jacobean drama is always linked with meretriciousness, the artifice of the prostitute. It was further associated with the Church of Rome through John Bale's identification of the Catholic Church with the Scarlet Woman of Babylon in the Apocalypse, in his Image of Both Churches (c.1545). The disguised Govianus paints the Lady's face with poison in order to kill the Tyrant and rescue her corpse, but to do so, he must first disguise her body as its own antithesis, the painted whore, so that in kissing the corpse, the Tyrant quite literally embraces death and sexual corruption. Such use of the Lady's body as the agent of destruction is deeply troubling, and not least for Govianus: 'A religious trembling shakes me by the hand | And bids me put by such unhallowed business' (A5.2.91-2/B5.2.77-8).

The Tyrant's sacrilegious desire to violate the Lady's body contrasts with Govianus's desire to honour it

'in memory | Of her admirèd mistress' (A5.2.197-8/B5.2.153-4), and the gap between them may be intended to bring to mind contemporary debate as to the meaning of transubstantiation: while Catholics consumed the wafer as the literal body of Christ, the reformers took it 'in memory of' the Last Supper. If such meanings were present, it is likely that Middleton necessarily left them inexplicit, though they are hinted at by the contrasting ceremonies of the final scene. In the first, polyphonic music plays while the Tyrant and the soldiers make low bows to the Lady's corpse, and the Tyrant kisses her hand. In an aside, the first soldier denounces this as 'mere idolatry! I make curtsy | To my damnation', linking it with incomprehensible 'Latin prayers' (A5.2.20-3), as well as the polyphonic music, bowing and kneeling that had been part of the old mass. The second ceremonial was to have been performed at Govianus's command, 'Here place her in this throne, crown her our queen' (A5.2.201), but a line in the margin indicates a cut at this point—whether marked in by the Master of the Revels as politically unacceptable, or by the actors because the scene was already too long, is impossible to tell. However we interpret it, Stephen Greenblatt's description of Hamlet as 'the conjunction of gross physicality and pure abstracted spirituality, of Body and Word, of corruptible flesh and invulnerable ghost' may also be applied to The Lady's Tragedy, which weaves together Renaissance anxieties about the relationship of body and spirit, and their embodiment on the material stage—a medium in which the paradoxes within the process of representation itself were always palpable to the beholders.

 Now we are king, she'll leave the lower path
 And find the way to us.—Helvetius,
 It is thy daughter. Happier than a king
 And far above him, for she kneels to thee
 Whom we have kneeled to, richer in one smile
 That came from her, than she in all thy blessings.
 20 If thou be'st proud, thou art to be forgiven;
 It is no deadly sin in thee. While she lives,
 High lust is not more natural to youth
 Than that to thee: be not afraid to die in't.
 'Tis but the sin of joy. There is no gladness

35 I have a wife. Would she were so preferred!
 I could be but her subject—so I'm now.
 I allow her her one friend, to stop her mouth
 And keep her quiet, give him his table free,
 And the huge feeding of his great stone-horse
 40 With which he rides in pomp about the city,
 Only to speak to gallants in bay-windows.
 Marry, his lodging he pays dearly for:
 He gets me all my children; there I save by't.
 Beside I draw my life out by the bargain
 45 Some twelve years longer than the times appointed,
 When my young prodigal gallant kicks up's heels
 At one-and-thirty, and lies dead and rotten
 Some five-and-forty years before I'm coffined.
 'Tis the right way to keep a woman honest:
 50 One friend is barricado to a hundred
 And keeps 'em out. Nay, more: a husband's sure
 To have his children all of one man's getting,
 And he that performs best can have no better.
 I'm e'en as happy then that save a labour.

55 Thy honours with thy daughter's love shall rise.

15 You dared to be my rival! Was't not bold?
 Now we are king, she'll leave the lower path
 And find the way to us.—Helvetius,
 It is thy daughter. Happier than a king
 And far above him, for she kneels to thee
 Whom we have kneeled to, richer in one smile
 That came from her, than she in all thy blessings.
 20 If thou be'st proud, thou art to be forgiven;
 'Tis no deadly sin in thee. While she lives,
 High lust is not more natural to youth
 Than that to thee: be not afraid to die in't.
 'Tis but the sin of joy. There is no gladness
 25 But has a pride it lives by: that's the oil
 That feeds it into flames.—Let her be sent for
 And honourably attended, as beseems
 Her that we make our queen. My lords Memphonius

 30 The royal business of my heart. Conduct her
 With a respect equal with that to us.

55 Thy honours with thy daughter's love shall rise.

20–6 If...flames Though pride can be a deadly sin, your pride in your daughter, while she lives, is as natural as the energy of the young, and as forgivable. Every happiness is fed by some kind of pride—it's the oil that feeds the flame.

28–9 Memphonius...Sophonirus Their names derive from Greek, Memphonius meaning 'a fault-finder' and Sophonirus meaning clever or wise of mind (with irony).

35–54 I...labour This soliloquy of the contented cuckold anticipates that of Allwit in Chaste Maid (1.2.12–56). It consists of a series of double meanings. Sophonirus wishes his wife might become queen, since he is already her obedient 'subject'. He persuades himself that this is to his advantage, since her present lover ('friend') performs all the sexual duties required of a husband. Mouth-stopping, feeding, riding, speaking (like 'intercourse') can all be used of the sexual act; a stone-horse is a stallion (like 'stud'); 'gallants in bay-windows' are ladies of fashion (or prostitutes). The lover pays for his 'lodging' (his possession of the wife's body) by begetting all her children, which he will pay for in another sense, since copulating was supposed to shorten one's life ('kicks up's heels', i.e. dies).

I shall read thy deservings in her eyes.
 HELVETIUS
 O may they be eternal books of pleasure
 To show you all delight.
 [The Tyrant consults his Nobles]
 GOVIANUS [aside]
 The loss of her sits closer to my heart
 Than that of kingdom, or the whorish pomp
 Of this world's titles that with flattery swells us
 And makes us die like beasts fat for destruction.
 O she's a woman, and her eye will stand
 Upon advancement, never weary yonder;
 But when she turns her head, by chance, and sees
 The fortunes that are my companions,
 She'll snatch her eyes off, and repent the looking.
 TYRANT [to Nobles]
 'Tis well advised. We doom thee, Govianus,
 To banishment for ever from our kingdom.
 GOVIANUS
 What could be worse to one whose heart is locked
 Up in another's bosom? Banishment?
 And why not death? Is that too easy for me?
 TYRANT But that the world would call
 Our way to dignity a path of blood,
 It should be the first act in all our reign.
 GOVIANUS
 She's lost for ever. [To Nobles] Farewell, virtuous men,
 Too honest for your greatness. Now you're mightier
 Than when we knew the kingdom, your styles heavier;
 Then, ponderous nobility, farewell.
 FIRST NOBLE How's that, sir?
 GOVIANUS
 Weighty and serious.—O, sir, is it you?
 I knew you one-and-twenty and a lord,
 When your discretion sucked; is't come from nurse
 yet?
 You scorn to be a scholar, you were born better.
 You have good lands, that's the best grounds of learning.
 If you can construe but your doctor's bill,
 Pierce your wife's waiting women, and decline your tenants
 Till they're all beggars, with new fines and rackings,
 You're scholar good enough for a lady's son
 That's born to living. If you list to read,
 Ride but to th' city and bestow your looks
 On the court library, the mercers' books;
 They'll quickly furnish you. Do but entertain

62 beasts . . . destruction animals fattened for slaughter
 63–4 stand | Upon remain fixed on
 78 styles titles
 A83 when . . . yet When your wisdom was being suckled—is it weaned now?
 A84–96 You . . . called In a sequence of complex puns, the young nobleman substitutes sexual and social exploitation for education, and in particular, learning Latin: he construes (i.e. inspects/translates) his doctor's bills, because he has caught a venereal infection; he pierces/parses (i.e. penetrates his wife's maids/identifies parts of speech) and declines (i.e. reduces the living standards of his tenants/inflects). Fines and rackings are fees and excessive rents charged. A living is an estate providing a source of income. Mercers' books are the account books of cloth-dealers. In an age of extravagant dress, tailors could expound (explain or comment on) the stuff (material, in both senses) and its title (i.e. the name, whether of a book or a type of cloth).

95 A tailor for your tutor, to expound
All the hard stuff to you, by what name and title
Soever they be called.

FIRST NOBLE I thank you, sir.

GOVIANUS

'Tis happy you have learned so much manners,
Since you have so little wit. Fare you well, sir. [Going]

TYRANT

Let him be stayed awhile.

SECOND NOBLE [to Govianus]

Stay!

FIRST NOBLE [to Govianus] You must stay, sir.

GOVIANUS [aside]

100 He's not so honest, sure, to change his mind,
Revoke his doom. Hell has more hope on him!

TYRANT

We have not ended yet: the worst part's coming.

Thy banishment were gentle, were that all,

But t'afflict thy soul, before thou goest

105 Thou shalt behold the heaven that thou must lose

In her that must be mine;

Then to be banished, then to be deprived,

Shows the full torment we provide for thee.

GOVIANUS [aside]

Here's a right tyrant now: he will not bate me

110 Th'affliction of my soul; he will have all parts Suffer together.

Enter [Memphoni] with the Lady, clad in black

Now I see my loss.

I never shall recover't. My mind's beggared.

TYRANT

Black? Whence risse that cloud? Can such a thing be seen

In honour's glorious day? The sky so clear?

115 Why mourns the kingdom's mistress? Does she come

To meet advancement in a funeral garment?

Back! She forgot herself. 'Twas too much joy

That bred this error and we heartily pardon't.

[To Attendants] Go, bring me her hither like an illustrious bride

120 With her best beams about her. Let her jewels

Be worth ten cities—that beseems our mistress,

And not a widow's case, a suit to weep in.

LADY

I am not to be altered.

TYRANT

How?

LADY

I have a mind

That must be shifted ere I cast off these,

125 Or I shall wear strange colours. 'Tis not titles

Nor all the bastard honours of this frame

That I am taken with. I come not hither

To please the eye of glory, but of goodness, [To the Tyrant] And that concerns not you, sir. You're for greatness. 110

I dare not deal with you. [Indicating Govianus] I have found my match
 And I will never lose him.

GOVIANUS If there be man
 Above a king in fortunes, read my story
 And you shall find him there. Farewell, poor kingdom!
 [To the Tyrant] Take it to help thee, thou hadst need on't now. 115

I see thee in distress, more miserable
 Than some thou lay'st taxations on, poor subjects.
 Thou art all beset with storms, more overcast
 Than ever any man that brightness flattered.
 'Tis only wretchedness to be there with thee,
 And happiness to be here. 120

140 TYRANT [aside] Sure some dream crowned me.
 If it were possible to be less than nothing,
 I wake, the man you seek for. There's the kingdom
 Within yon valley fixed, while I stand here
 Kissing false hopes upon a frozen mountain,
 Without the confines. I am he that's banished. 125

145 The king walks yonder, chose by her affection,
 Which is the surer side, for where she goes,
 Her eye removes the court. What is he here
 Can spare a look? They're all employed on her!— [To Helvetius] Helvetius! Thou art not worth the waking, neither. 130

I lose but time in thee. Go, sleep again:
 Like an old man, thou canst do nothing.
 Thou tak'st no pain at all to earn thine honours.
 Which way shall we be able to pay thee
 To thy content, when we receive not ours?
 The master of the work must needs decay
 When he wants means, and sees his servant play. 135

HELVIETIUS [to the Lady]
 Have I bestowed so many blessings on thee,
 And do they all return to me in a curse?
 160 Is that the use I ha' for 'em? Be not to me
 A burden ten times heavier than my years.
 Thou'dst wont to be kind to me and observe
 What I thought pleasing. Go, entreat the king.

LADY
 I will do more for you, sir—you're my father.
 I'll kiss him too. [She kisses Govianus] 145

165 HELVIETIUS How am I dealt withal!

 [Pointing to the Tyrant] Why, that's the usurper, sir.

 VOTARIUS That will I, madam.
Exit Wife
 Now must I dress a strange dish for his humour.
 ANSELMUS [aside]
 Call you this courting? Life, not one word near it!
 There was no syllable but was twelve score off!

90 kindred of us relationship with us
 (because they belong to our relatives;
 also, because they are related to our own)

 100 scarce . . . starlight where the moon gives scarcely as much light as the stars

107 kindness natural feeling, affection (see A1.1.189/B1.1.166)
 112 dress prepare (food)

115	My faith, hot temptation! Woman's chastity In such a conflict had great need of one To keep the bridge—'twas dangerous for the time. Why, what fantastic faiths are in these days Made without substance! Whom should a man trust In matters about love? [Anselmus comes forward]	115
120	VOTARIUS [aside] Mass, here he comes, too! ANSELMUS How now, Votarius? What's the news for us? VOTARIUS You set me to a task, sir, that will find Ten ages work enough, and then unfinished. Bring sin before her? Why, it stands more quaking 125 Than if a judge should frown on't! Three such fits Would shake it into goodness, and quite beggar The under-kingdom! Not the art of man Woman, or devil— ANSELMUS [interrupting] O, peace, man! Prithee, peace.	120
130	VOTARIUS —Can make her fit for lust. ANSELMUS Yet again, sir? Where lives that mistress of thine, Votarius, That taught thee to dissemble? I'd fain learn. She makes good scholars. VOTARIUS How, my lord? ANSELMUS Thou art the son of falsehood. Prithee, leave me. How truly constant, charitable and helpful 135 Is woman unto woman in affairs That touch affection and the peace of spirit, But man to man, how crooked and unkind! I thank my jealousy I heard thee all, For I heard nothing.—Now thou'rt sure I did. VOTARIUS 140 Now, by this light, then wipe but off this score, Since you're so bent, and if I ever run In debt again to falsehood and dissemblance For want of better means, tear the remembrance of me From your best thoughts. ANSELMUS For thy vow's sake, I pardon thee.	130
145	Thy oath is now sufficient watch itself Over thy actions. I discharge my jealousy. I ha' no more use for't now! To give thee way, I'll have an absence made purposely for thee, And presently take horse. I'll leave behind me 150 An opportunity that shall fear no starting.	145

115-17 Woman's...time Her chastity was so fiercely besieged that, like Rome, she needed a hero like Horatius (famous for single-handedly defending the Roman bridge against the Etruscans): Anselmus is being sarcastic.

118 fantastic faiths unbelievable promises (as in Revenge, 3.1.6-7)

123 Ten ages i.e. for ten ages

124 it i.e. sin

125 judge...frown indicating that he will condemn the prisoner

126-7 beggar | The under-kingdom depopulate hell

130-1 Where...learn Where does the mistress live who taught you how to act a part? I'd like to learn myself.

138 I...all Thanks to my suspiciousness, I heard everything you said.

140 wipe...score Don't count what happened this time.

141 bent determined

147 way opportunity

149 presently take horse set out riding at once

150 starting sudden interruption

Let but thy pains deserve it.
 VOTARIUS I am bound to't.
 ANSELMUS
 For a small time, farewell, then. Hark thee—
 VOTARIUS [interrupting] O, good sir,
 It will do wondrous well. Exit Anselmus
 What a wild seed
 Suspicion sows in him, and takes small ground for't.
 155 How happy were this lord, if he would leave
 To tempt his fate and be resolved he were so.
 He would be but too rich.
 Man has some enemy still that keeps him back
 In all his fortunes, and his mind is his, 160 And that's a mighty adversary. I had rather Have twenty kings my enemies than that part,
 For let me be at war with earth and hell,
 So that be friends with me.—I ha' sworn to make A trial of her faith. I must put on 165 A courtier's face and do't. Mine own will shame me.
Enter Wife

WIFE
 This is most strange of all! How one distraction Seconds another!
 VOTARIUS What's the news, sweet madam?
 He's took his horse, but left his leave untaken.
 What should I think on't, sir? Did ever lord
 170 Depart so rudely from his lady's presence?
 VOTARIUS
 Did he forget your lip?
 WIFE He forgot all
 That nobleness remembers.
 VOTARIUS I'm ashamed on him.
 Let me help, madam, to repair his manners,
 And mend that unkind fault.
 [He tries to kiss her]
 WIFE Sir, pray forbear.
 You forget worse than he.
 175 VOTARIUS [aside] So virtue save me,
 I have enough already.
 WIFE 'Tis himself
 Must make amends, good sir, for his own faults.
 VOTARIUS [aside]
 I would he'd do't, then, and ne'er trouble me in't.
 [To Wife] But, madam, you perceive he takes the course
 180 To be far off from that: he's rode from home,
 But his unkindness stays, and keeps with you.
 Let whos' will please his wife, he rides his horse;
 That's all the care he takes. I pity you, madam:
 You've an displeasing lord. Would 'twere not so,
 185 I should rejoice with you.

Let but thy pains deserve it.
 VOTARIUS I am bound to't.
